The hon. gentleman also referred to Mr. Henry Ford, and was evidently quite willing to accept Mr. Ford as an authority on the automobile question. I am not willing to accept Mr. Henry Ford as an authority on anything, even an automobile. The machine which bears his name is said to be an automobile; it is also said to be several other things, the names of which I need not enumerate this evening. So far as Henry Ford and his industry are concerned I might point out that he is in a different position from that of any other manufacturer in the world. He has a largely capitalized industry with a perfected organization; he has mass production, and I daresay he would be quite pleased to have free trade with all the world so far as automobiles are concerned. But Henry Ford is a man who has shown that he recognizes protection. I believe that in September 1915 he bought fifty acres of land in Ontario with the declared intention of building a tractor plant which was to employ 10,000 men. The government saw fit to remove the duty on tractors, with the result that Henry still has the land but the plant has not been erected. Henry Ford would never have established a factory in Canada if it had not been for protection. He thought he would supply the French trade from his factory in England, but France put a heavy duty on automobiles and Henry was obliged to put up a plant in France. He also built a plant in Ireland, I believe, and in several other countries. When Mr. Ford established his plants in these various countries he thereby gave recognition to the policy of protection.

Mr. Ford is a man who has made a great success of life from the financial standpoint; he is among the wealthiest, if not the wealthiest, man in the world. But he has some peculiar ideas. I believe he launched at one time what was called a peace ship; then he had an idea for a "synthetic cow." Asked what his idea was, he said he was going to do away entirely with the four-legged animal. "Where are you going to get milk?" he was asked, to which he replied, "I am going to manufacture milk chemically to supply the public. There is no further need for cows." Henry's synthetic cow was going to solve the problem. So I say when we speak of Henry Ford and quote him, it is well to remember that we are quoting a man who, while he has made a great success of the particular business which carries his name, is recognized as possessing some very strange peculiarities.

The hon. gentleman made several references to other things. I am not a sufficiently well-trained mental acrobat to follow him in all his various peregrinations and wanderings, and I shall not attempt to do so. He referred to one or two things also mentioned by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to which I wish to give just a little attention.

The hon. gentleman and the Minister of Finance made reference to the national debt of Canada, and I would also like to say a word or two on that subject. In 1896 the national debt of this country was roughly $258,000,000. In 1911, when the Liberals went out of office, in round figures it amounted to $340,000,000; in other words, they had added $82,000,000 to that debt in fifteen years. Between 1911 and 1914 the debt was reduced by $6,700,000. Then the war came on with its tremendous costs, and by 1921 our debt was in round figures $2,350,000,000. In 1925, according to the statements given by the Finance minister recently, it was $2,417,437,685 and on March 31 of this year amounted to $2,395,000,000. In connection with the national debt I wish to quote a statement made by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), who in 1921 was Finance minister. In presenting his budget that year he said:

"If we deduct the bare cost of the war but charge up pensions, soldiers' civil reestablishment and interest on the war part of our debt, none of which we would have had but for the war, our debt to-day would be $115,000,000 less than in March 1914."

He also made this statement, which was never contradicted, which was accepted as a fact and is a fact: The revenues for the last year, he said, exceed the ordinary expenses of the country, including all pensions and all current war charges, by $69,400,000. I wish to add another statement made by him on that occasion. War obligations have been met, he said, and paid to the extent of $698,809,700. I quote that statement, Mr. Speaker, because I want to apply it to the debt of this country. I want people to understand what that debt means and how much of that debt was due to the war.

During the years 1917 to 1920 inclusive we put through in this House seventeen appropriation bills totalling $1,755,705,235. No amendment was moved to any of those bills, nor was a motion made to strike out one single dollar of those appropriations.

I wish to call attention also to how some of this money was spent. We paid out in soldiers' gratuities, $164,000,000. May I add that that was a matter of expenditure dealt with by the Conservative government, and which was done with and settled and had not to be considered by this government after it took office. We also paid out $102,000,000 for soldiers' civil re-establishment; $90,000,000 for pensions; $80,000,000 for soldier land settlement; $7,000,000 for soldier insurance; $25,000,000 of a housing loan; $10,000,000 for technical education; a special grant to aid agriculture of $10,000,000; another grant for roads of $20,000,000; and our shipbuilding cost us some $30,000,000. The items I have enumerated total $538,000,000, and I want to emphasize this fact, that not one single dollar of that amount was challenged by any member of the House.

I want also to emphasize this fact, that many of the items to which I have referred, and which bore very heavily on the exchequer of the country at that time, the present government has not been required to deal with because they were dealt with and settled before they came into office, so they were relieved of that burden.

I would also like to add that in the last three years of the Conservative regime, in 1919, 1920 and 1921, we collected in total receipts during those years a little over $1,098,000,000. In the next three years, 1922, 1923 and 1924, this government collected $1,191,000,000; that is to say, the present government, or the government in power after 1921, had in the first three years they were in office $100,000,000 more revenue to run the country with than their predecessors had in the last three years they were in power.

Again comparing the last three years of Conservative rule, taking in the year 1921, with the first three years under the King government, the King government collected in special war revenue taxes over $234,500,000 more in the first three years they were in office than the Conservative government collected in the last three years they were in office.

When you take these facts into consideration, one wonders that the Finance minister was not able in presenting his budget to declare a larger surplus than he has declared. I shall not go into the reasons for that; they are many and various. Numerous commissions were appointed at very heavy cost to the country. An elevator was built at Prince Rupert which has never yet been used—built for the purpose of electing a government supporter for that constituency; wharves were built on this river and on that, for a like purpose. The reason why the government was not able to make a better showing in regard to a reduction in the debt was because of extravagance and waste of public moneys.

Another matter which was referred to by the Minister of Finance was the favourable balance of trade. I should like to refer to that for a moment. The hon. Minister of Finance is not in his place at the moment, but I think I am correctly interpreting his language when I say that he spoke of the favourable balance of trade with a good deal of satisfaction. It has been referred to by other speakers on that side of the House also with a good deal of satisfaction. They seemed pleased with the fact that we had a favourable balance of trade. If the Minister of Finance were here, I would put to him this question.

An hon. MEMBER: Here he is.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am very glad he has come in. I was just stating that in presenting his budget the Finance minister has apparently taken a good deal of satisfaction from the fact that we closed last year with a very substantial favourable balance of trade. The question which I was going to ask was this: Does he consider a favourable balance of trade for this country an indication of prosperity?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, in 1921 we had an unfavourable balance of trade and no person will say that we had prosperity at that time.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman, of course, has not answered the question. I was a little doubtful when I put it to him whether he would answer it. I will ask him again: Does he think that a favourable balance of trade for this country is an indication of Canada's prosperity? Would he regard an unfavourable balance of trade as an indication that Canada was not prosperous? I can understand, I think, what is passing through his mind. He is a little wary. He is almost Scotch, like my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke), when it comes to answering questions. This is the point, Mr. Speaker: Where do we get our favourable balance of trade? If the hon. gentleman says that a favourable balance of trade is an indication of our prosperity, then, per contra, he says that an unfavourable balance of trade is just the opposite, but for years we have had an unfavourable balance of trade as between Canada and the United States. The hon. gentleman knows that very well. He also knows the reason why we had that unfavourable balance of trade. It was because of the asinine policy of this government in not properly protecting the industries of this country, thereby enabling the United States to flood this country with their products, to the detriment of our people. That is the point I want him to consider. This matter has been considered by finance ministers before. I can quote the words of an acting finance minister who, in speaking of the unfavourable balance of trade as between Canada and the United States, said that something should be done to rectify that situation, that we should either buy less from the United States or sell more to the United States. I say that that is an unfavourable condition of affairs which exists between Canada and the United States, and has existed for years, and that it is not in the interests of this country, but is in the interests of the United States. One fault I have to find with the government to-day is that their tariff is framed not along sane, reasonable and national lines for the benefit of Canada, but for the benefit of the United States of America. In the last ten years, Mr. Speaker, the United States have sold over two billion dollars' worth more to Canada than Canada has sold to that country. I take the ground that at least a part of that two billion dollars may be regarded as so much of a mortgage on this Dominion.

We have had, Mr. Speaker, some recent additions to the ranks of this remnant of a government. It should have some further additions before it could really be called a government. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat said that the budget was "a message to the people from a people's government."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Some hon. members opposite say "hear, hear" to that. A message from a people's government! From a government which in the last election polled 40.1 per cent of the popular vote! A people's government! A government which, with the addition of its camouflaged allies over to the left, represents only 46.5 of the popular vote.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would permit my hon. friend almost anything.

Mr. JACOBS: In what respect are the Progressives "camouflaged allies"?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Well, Mr. Speaker, I guess I will have to retract my former statement and thank my hon. friend for his suggestion. It is perhaps not correct to call them camouflaged Grits. We can leave out the word "camouflaged" and I think we will be more correct. However, it is stretching the imagination very far to call this "a people's government" composed of a party or of two parties—yes, three parties—

An hon. MEMBER: Four parties.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Are there four? Well, that makes a four-ring political circus. I thought it was only a three-ring one.

An hon. MEMBER: No, there are actually five.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): But the two main rings of the circus, at all events, are composed of those representatives immediately opposite me, and those to my immediate left represented by that hon. gentleman who has so successfully played the part of Cincinnatus ever since he came into this parliament. The party across the way came back with 30,000 less of the popular vote than they had in the former election, while the so-called Progressive party, or what is left of it, came back with 486,788 less of the popular vote than they had before. And these two, making the principal combination, are what my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin calls "the people's government." The people's government!

After the election of 1925 the right hon. Prime Minister, having gone down to defeat with about half of his cabinet, looking round to find some place that would accept him and send him back to this House, sent his faithful henchmen out over the province of Ontario. Inquiries were made here and there but without success.

Providence created a vacancy in the county of Bagot but they would not have him represent a county in Quebec.

[Mr. J. W. Edwards.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Not as a member of a constituency, oh, no. In this dilemma, and when he was at his wit's end as to where he was going to get a seat, he received a message from a constituency in the northern part of Saskatchewan which was very specially interested in the construction of a railway. They made a proposition to the Prime Minister. They said: If you will build the Hudson Bay railway for us we will provide you with a Prince Albert to cover the seat you lost on the 29th of October. The cost of the garment was not going to come out of the Prime Minister's pocket, and he was not disposed to haggle about the price. The price has been variously estimated at anywhere from twenty to forty million dollars. I do not know what it will cost, but I will say this: It is the biggest price that was ever paid for a coat in the history of the world. Even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed in anything so expensive as that Prince Albert is or likely will be. So expensive a coat will it be that when the right hon. Prime Minister is through with it he ought to send it down for inclusion among the relics in the archives.

A short time ago there was introduced into this House a very fine gentleman, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Elliott). I am not disposed to add anything to the difficulties of the Minister of Labour. He is the only cabinet minister representing the province of Ontario, and he has had the responsibility for a great many portfolios placed upon his shoulders. His difficulties are many, but I wish him well. Whatever his qualifications may be to fill the various offices in which he has been placed, at least he has established a reputation for courage. The hon. Minister of Labour proved himself a brave man when he came into that cabinet of derelicts.

There is another hon. gentleman who has come into this House from another part of Canada. He is sometimes referred to as "The Crown Prince of Saskatchewan."

Mr. VALLANCE: By whom?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I think it was by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), "The Crown Prince of Saskatchewan" and heir-apparent to a very wobbly throne. Now, I am not disposed to be quite so friendly to the Minister of Railways as I was to the Minister of Labour, and the reason for that attitude is because the Minister of Railways has been very hostile to the province of Ontario. He challenged, a few days ago, the statement made by the hon.

member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). He stated that he had not said that he wanted to make the people of Ontario suffer. No, that was not correct; but he did admit that under oath he stated that his idea was to make the people of Ontario take a dose, and a full dose, of their own medicine.

Mr. WARD: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That remark did not come out very distinctly, although it was heard on the other side of the House. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman meant it or not. Would he mind rising and stating what his constituency is, or will some other hon. gentleman do that for him? He should not be ashamed of it.

Mr. STEVENS: It was the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward).

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. member for Dauphin, Manitoba, joins with the Minister of Railways in saying that he wants to punish the people of Ontario—for that is what it means—by imposing—> a good, steep, prohibitive duty on American coal and then to let the Canadian National Railways charge the fair freight rate for hauling it to them. It is the first time in history that the eastern people have been in the position to take a dose of their own medicine, and I think they should be allowed to take it to the full.

Mr. WARD: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I ask the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) if in saying, "hear, hear" he was also speaking ironically? The Minister of Railways excused his utterance by saying that he spoke ironically. The minister was on oath at the time. Well, if he wants the people of this country to regard him as a man who on oath speaks in that way, that is his business. The dictionary gives a definition of "irony" and "ironical" as follows:

> Expression of one's meaning by language of opposite or different tendency.

Is that what the hon. member meant when he was under oath,—to use words expressing the opposite to what he intended? A further definition is:

> Simulated ignorance to confute opponents.

We all know the Minister of Railways is a very wise man. He has told us so himself. He ought to know, if anybody knows; wisdom is oozing out of every pore of his anatomy. You have only to look at him to see how wise he is, and if you cannot get a sufficient idea of his consummate wisdom by looking at him, look at his record in the west and see how wise he has been in his devious ways in politics and political elections. From what I have been able to see of the Minister of Railways since he came into this House, he does not require, on any of the big questions coming up here, to simulate ignorance for the purpose of confuting any of his opponents. Simulation is absolutely unnecessary.

The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) made some reference to the war in his speech the other day. He referred to the fact that our men had gone over there to fight to save France and Belgium, and added that the sacrifice meant more than that. The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) challenged that statement and said:

> Is the hon. gentleman willing, then, not only to support, but if possible to strengthen a policy that can only perpetuate international friction and discord?

The hon. member for Southeast Grey in that sentence was expressing her adherence to the policy of free trade. She made that quite clear in a further expression a little later on, when she said:

> Will the hon. member admit that what caused the late war causes all wars? Will he admit that the prime cause was an economic one, and that the protection of women and children was no part of it?

The hon. member for East Algoma suffered, as you did, Mr. Speaker, irreparable loss in that war. There were others throughout the country who also suffered irreparable loss, in many cases the loss of an only son. There was only one thought, it seems to me, which would tend to brighten the dark cloud of sorrow that hangs over many homes which lost an only son in the war, and that is the thought that the boys who went over there, went there to fight in a just cause; that they gave their lives in defence of France and Belgium, in defence of our empire and of our country, and in defence of the civilization of centuries, the hon. member for Southeast Grey to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member evidently has not much patriotism when he makes a speech such as he is making now.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friend has a right to his opinion. I am not vaunting my patriotism. There are different ways, evidently, of showing one's patriotism.

Mr. FORKE: I would suggest that the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington has a poor way of showing it when he stands up and makes such a speech as he is making now.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The high-minded gentleman from the west who got up and made that statement does not hesitate to pose in this House as an independent, but he has not an independent thought in his mind—a man who has been known ever since he entered public life as a party man, who has camouflaged under the name of Progressive, and who, I say, has represented himself as an independent when everybody in this country knows that it is only camouflage. Why does he rise now in defence of the hon. member for Southeast Grey? What have I said further than to quote the hon. member's own words? Am I to understand from the interruption of my hon. friend that he objects to my stating that the boys who gave their lives in the war were fighting in defence of France and Belgium, our empire, our country and our civilization? That is what I said when he rose, evidently in a passion. We all know the hon. member for Southeast Grey will vote the way he wants her to every time.

Mr. FORKE: No doubt about that.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is not necessary for the hon. member to worry himself to get into her good graces. He is in her good graces already and will always be in that position. She will vote whatever way the hon. member for Brandon wishes, as she always has.

Allow me to refer to the statement made by the hon. member for Southeast Grey. That hon. member says that the cause of the war was economic and that the defence of women and children played no part whatever in it. She implies also, and practically asserts, that if we had no tariffs we would have no wars, and that protective tariffs induce and tend to bring about war. Does my hon. friend say "hear, hear" in support of that? Does the hon. member endorse that statement? He is not so vociferous just now.

Mr. FORKE: I object.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Sit down.

Mr. FORKE: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is putting words in my mouth that I did not utter.

Mr. HANSON: He did not put any words in the hon. member's mouth.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That may be a point of order, but I do not know what it is. I will say this; that if ever I put words in the hon. gentleman's mouth, when he utters them they will be more sensible than any words he ever uttered. Are we to understand from this argument of the hon. member for Southeast Grey, endorsed by the hon. member for Brandon, that it was the free trade policy of England that induced Germany to go to war? Or was it the tariff that little Belgium had against Germany that so incensed Germany that she sent her troops over to that little country, killing women and children and devastating the country? Was that what led to the war? I cannot imagine free trade nonsense being carried to a greater extreme than it was by the hon. member for Southeast Grey.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the hon. member aware that the League of Nations is discussing the question how far tariffs are a cause of war and whether the removal of some of the tariffs now in force in Europe might not help to bring about a peaceful settlement of the disputes over there?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Can the hon. member tell me what their decision was?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is one of the matters which they are considering.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It has not been decided yet, has it? Well there are a good many things discussed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that have not yet been settled, and for the good of Canada I hope to God that a great many of the things he has discussed will never be decided the way he wants them. We have had and we have in this country and in the House two or three hon. members who are here because they rely upon disturbed conditions and unrest to return them. We have those who depend upon, and whose chief support comes from, men out of work and women and children who are hungry. That is why these members believe in a tariff policy which will destroy our factories and industries and throw people out of work. Without that they would have no audience to talk to; they would have no basis upon which to work. We have had, Mr. Speaker, entirely too much socialistic and communistic claptrap in this country, and it was that sort of propaganda that caused the revolution in Winnipeg. I for one, therefore, desire to denounce anyone who is ever ready to flout the flag, to sneer at loyalty and to level adverse criticism at anything British, but whose mouth is always filled with praise of bolshevik Russia, the most immoral, the most debased, and the rottenest country on the face of the globe to-day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know whether it was because of my interruption—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order. If the hon. member is referring to me in such absolutely wild statements as he has been making I must resent the references and ask that he withdraw it.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I ask your protection, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I mean, of course, from the standpoint of the rules of the House. My hon. friends opposite who sat in this House with me in previous years know me sufficiently well to realize that I do not ask for quarter from any of them, just as I do not give any. When I refer directly to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre he may rise to a point of order, but he has no right to assume that I am referring to him, however correct his assumption may be.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do rise to a point of order. If the hon. gentleman implies that he was referring to me in the language he used a moment ago, I must ask that he withdraw the statements he made then.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The first thing the hon. member will have to do will be to establish the fact that I was referring to him.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If that is the case there is nothing to be said.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friend is becoming sensible.

An hon. MEMBER: He has been listening to you.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Perhaps you might imbibe a little wit, too; everybody will agree that you need it.

The budget, Mr. Speaker, is always a matter of great public interest, especially to those whose large investments may be sacrificed and those whose daily bread may be jeopardized by the stroke of a pen. There has been a good deal of misrepresentation of the Conservative party in regard to the tariff. I wish therefore for a few minutes to discuss the subject, going back a little way in history.

Between 1878 and 1896 we had a protective tariff in Canada known as the National Policy. Having regard to the threats made by the Liberal party for eighteen years while out of office there was a good deal of apprehension as to what they would do on coming into power. The Laurier government came into office in 1896 and the people found that Liberals in office were a different sort of people from Liberals out of office. At all events, fortunately for the country, that party maintained the policy and principle of protection throughout the fifteen years they were in power. There is absolutely not the shadow of a doubt about that. They went out of office in 1911. The issue in that election was the reciprocity pact, but even in proposing reciprocity the Liberal party did not depart from the principle of protection in relation to manufacturers. Between 1911 and 1921 the Conservative and Union governments still maintained the principle and policy of protection, and that principle and policy may be said to have been carried out by the present government, fairly well at least, up to the session of 1923, when the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding presented his last budget to parliament. In that year, in delivering his budget, the Hon. Mr. Fielding said:

> There is a thought which does not receive as much consideration as I think sometimes it should be given in public discussions, and that is the desirability of something like tariff stability. Business men do not like to be always threatened with changes in the tariff.....The tariff as it will be when the changes proposed to-day come into effect will be a moderate tariff and probably as low as the country can afford to have under present conditions. Of course we cannot expect that it will be satisfactory to everybody. It will not meet the desires of those who would rigidly apply the principles of free trade. It will not meet the wish of the advocates of high protection.

The leader of the opposition at this point interjected:

> It comes pretty close to it.

Mr. Fielding went on:

> I think the country should be content to accept the tariff as it will now stand as one as fair and reasonable as can be prepared under all the circumstances, and business men should be able to carry on the various enterprises without the fear of being soon disturbed by further changes.

That was an announcement on the part of a man who for some seventeen or eighteen years had occupied the position of finance minister of the Dominion, and however much any of us may have differed from him politically, I think I am putting it correctly when I say that the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding was respected from one end of Canada to the other by those of his own political party and also by those who were opposed to him politically. I think I am also correct in stating that it was because he and Sir Lomer Gouin were then members of the government that the wreckers, represented by the hon. member for Brandon, were unable to get what they wanted. But with the retirement of those two men from the government there was not much left that you could call a government. It was only a makeshift of a government even then; it is still less now.

On the occasion of the introduction of the budget of 1923 the hon. member for Brandon moved a resolution in amendment, in which I find these words:

> Whereas the tariff policy of the government, as indicated by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, and particularly his pronouncement in favour of tariff stability at existing rates, and the consequent intimation that the government contemplates no further appreciable tariff reduction, constitutes a repudiation of the tariff planks in the Liberal platform of 1919 and is inconsistent with the Finance Minister's statement last session that the changes then made were a step in the right direction.

So we see in these words of the hon. member for Brandon that stability of tariffs is something to which he apparently objects. He said further:

> And whereas the fiscal policy of the government as now brought down is based on the principle of protection, and in this respect is indistinguishable from that of their predecessors in office.

I quote this because it bears out my statement made a moment ago that during the whole time of the Laurier government's tenure of office and down to 1923 the principles of the national policy as laid down by the Conservatives were adhered to by the Liberals. There is another reference here which will bear reading in the light of the attitude now taken by the hon. member for Brandon in regard to the Speech from the Throne. He said:

> Therefore, be it resolved: That while recognizing that changes in the fiscal policy should be made in such a way as to give industries affected a reasonable opportunity for readjustment, this House is of the opinion that the principle of protection as a basis for fiscal policy in Canada is unsound, and that every claim for protection should be heard publicly before a special committee of parliament.

So at that time the hon. gentleman apparently thought that industries affected should have a reasonable opportunity for adjustment. Has any such opportunity been given to the automobile industry? The hon. gentleman in his resolution also stated his belief that where an industry is affected it should be heard publicly before a special committee of parliament. Well, we have now the Tariff Advisory Board. I should like to know from the government if they have lost faith so soon in this board of their own creation. If they still have faith in it, why did they not carry out the pledge given in the Speech from the Throne, that all industries would have an opportunity of placing their case before this board, and that on the facts thus adduced parliament would act? Mr. Speaker, I make this statement that since the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne was passed, this House stands committed to carrying it into effect. Those who voted for it certainly, and the members of the government more especially, were pledged by the adoption of that Speech from the Throne—which they framed and placed in the mouth of His Excellency—to carry it into effect; and I do not believe, Sir, that in the history of this or any other democratic country on the face of the globe there has ever been such a flagrant violation of solemn pledges given before the election and reiterated in the Speech from the Throne as this government has been guilty of in connection with the adjustment of duties brought down by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. I say that every member, especially on that side of the House, as well as every member who sits to my left, is in honour pledged to vote against that part of the budget, because if he does not do so he is repudiating the vote that he gave in support of the Address, and is therefore violating his honour as a public man.

A word or two more, Mr. Speaker, in regard to protection. We have had free trade theorists and free trade faddists in the country and in this House. I suppose we always will have them here until the people put the matter right by leaving them at home. The late President McKinley said on one occasion, "Nothing is cheap which enforces idleness on our people." I should like that statement to sink into the minds of every member, especially of those who profess to follow free trade doctrine. "Nothing is cheap which enforces idleness on our people." And idleness has been enforced on our people by the attitude and course of this government to such an extent that hundreds of thousands of our young men have been forced to go across the line to seek employment. The free trade theorists base their conclusions on two cardinal errors: first, that the burden of an import duty must fall upon the consumer; second, that a tariff must increase the cost of the article taxed. Both assumptions have been proved by experience and history to be absolutely false. The free trade theorist has a pet conundrum which he frequently brings forward when he seeks to annihilate his opponent: how can you cheapen an article by taxing it? I wonder if any hon. gentleman will carry his free trade ideas far enough to endorse that statement.

There are two distinct classes of import duties: Those levied on articles which are not and cannot be produced in Canada, for example, tea, coffee and cocoa; and those levied on articles which are or can be produced in Canada. In the first class the entire supply is imported and there is no possibility of competition between the dutiable article and the article produced here. In such cases the duty is added to the price, subject however to such modifications as may be brought about by the use of substitutes. In the second class there are both inside and outside sources of supply. That produced at home is duty free; that imported bears a duty, and the duty on the imported article has the effect of encouraging the increased production of the duty free article supplied at home. I answer the conundrum, therefore, in this way: The article cannot be cheapened by taxing the whole available supply, but is inevitably made dearer. It is perfectly possible, however, and history and experience have proved it to be true, that taxing a part of the supply as is done by a protective tariff may cheapen the article by encouraging increased production of that part which is duty free because produced at home.

Let me illustrate that contention by some indisputable facts. In 1883 the duty on agricultural implements was raised to 35 per cent. Between 1886 and 1890 we had nineteen factories in Ontario alone making binders, as against nine factories in the same line of business in the United States. Did binders go up in price? On the contrary, the competition in Ontario was so keen that many of the firms went out of business because of the low price of the article they were selling. I heard it argued in this House by the Hon. Mr. Crerar, on one occasion, that the duty imposed obliged the consumer to pay the amount of that duty extra, not only on the imported article but on similar articles made in this country. Supposing, for instance, there was a duty of $10 on an American mower coming into Canada. It was argued that the man in Canada who bought an American mower would have to pay $10 more because of the duty; but it was also argued that he would have to pay $10 more on a mower produced in Canada because of the duty. I wonder if any hon. gentleman in this House will endorse that argument. It has been presented here before, and I say it is absolutely fallacious. Canada produced some 280,000,000 pounds of butter last year, 95 per cent of which is consumed at home.

Mr. EVANS: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? If the duty did not raise the price of the mower manufactured in Canada why does the manufacturer need protection at all, or why does he ask for it?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is a fair question. In the first place I do not say that the imposition of a duty has no effect on the price; do not understand me as saying that. My statement was and is that the duty upon an article produced to some extent in this country is shared; a part of it may be paid by the consumer here and a part will be paid by the country from which the article comes. There the law of supply and demand will govern.

Why, Sir, if it is argued that the duty adds so much to the price of the article, on the 280,000,000 pounds of butter produced in this country, with a tariff of 4 cents, the farmers obtain every year $11,200,000 more for their butter than they otherwise would receive. If you can make me believe that I will immediately advocate the raising of our duty on butter to 8 cents and then to 12 cents, so that the farmers will have $22,000,000 and $33,000,000 more to put in their pockets. If the imposition of a duty adds the amount of that duty to the cost of the article, our farmers are reaping an extra profit of some $7,000,000 on cheese; of some $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 on eggs because of the 3 cent duty imposed on eggs. They will also reap a benefit of some millions of dollars because of the duty imposed on oats, wheat, barley and so forth. No hon. gentleman in this House believes for one moment, I am sure, that the addition of the duty on all these article adds so much to the price. It is just as consitent and reasonable to argue that the price of butter, eggs, meat and so on is increased to the full amount of the duty, as to claim that a binder, a mower or any other implement has its price added to by the amount of the duty on that article One proposition is just as sensible and reasonable as the other, but neither is reasonable.

When the McKenna duties came into operation in October 1915 they placed a 33⅓ per cent duty on motor cars, motorcycles, pianos and other musical instruments, clocks and watches, and cinema films. What was the result? The price of foreign cars in England dropped 21 per cent; the price of British cars dropped 30 per cent and the number of men employed in that industry increased from 50,000 to 300,000. Let me give you another illustration. Free trade England passed what is called the Dyestuffs Import Regulation Act in 1920, under Premier Lloyd George. In June 1921 the price of dyestuffs was 4s. 4d. per pound. In December of that year, under the protective tariff, the price was 3s. 6d. per pound; one year later it was 2s. 6d.; in 1923 it was 1s. a pound, or a reduction in three years of 73 per cent, under protection. Then we have the Safeguarding of Industries Act, which was passed in England in 1921. Hollowware goods came under that act, and the duty imposed led to a 33⅓ per cent increase in employment and a 15 per cent decrease in the price of the article.

In the United States in 1870 steel rails cost $107 per ton. A duty of $28 per ton was imposed; in 1874 the price dropped to $49; in 1876 it was $39. In 1883 the United States, considering the steel industry on its feet, reduced the duty to $17 a ton, and by 1898 the price had fallen to $17.62 per ton. In 1883 the United States raised the duty on wire nails to 4 cents a pound, and in eight years the price fell to less than 2 cents a pound. In 1890 the McKinley tariff placed a duty of 2.2 cents per pound on tin-plate, which was then selling in the United States at 3½ cents per pound, and by 1894 the price was down to 2.9 cents, and by 1898 it was 2.2 cents.

May I add a further statement? A committee was appointed by the United States Senate to inquire into the effect on prices of the McKinley tariff. That committee reported that in the first twenty-eight months of the operation of the McKinley tariff the retail prices of 214 articles of common consumption had fallen by 64 per cent, while wages had risen by 75 per cent. As a protectionist, Mr. Speaker, I claim that the duty is not added to the price except when people are entirely dependent on foreign supply. Primarily it is labour that is most interested in protection. The man with money can seek other avenues of profit or wait for his dividends, but the labourer cannot wait for his dinner.

There are a few things which I want to call to the attention especially of hon. gentlemen from the west. I want to refer for a few minutes to six staple articles of food—bread, butter, milk, meats, potatoes and eggs. Of these articles Canada as a whole produced an exportable surplus amounting in 1924 to $384,000,000. Each province, however, does not produce enough of all these articles for its own use, and to the extent to which any province falls short of producing these necessities of life, that province affords the best market in the world for the sister provinces which have a surplus of those articles.

Let me refer for a moment to wheat, because it seems to me—perhaps I am unjust in this; I do not want to be—that hon. members from the west make everything revolve around wheat. I know it is a very important article, very important indeed to the west, and I can understand to a certain extent their attitude, but let me point this out to them: Canada exports wheat to some thirty countries. Canada exports flour to some seventy-nine countries. Our exports of wheat and flour, that is, flour converted into bushels of wheat, amounted in 1924 to 309,340,000 bushels. Let us look at our principal markets for that. First of all, our principal market is the United Kingdom, which in 1924 bought from Canada 173,000,000 bushels of wheat and 4,234,000 barrels of flour. Who was our second best customer? The United States bought from us, in 1924, 21,228,000 bushels of wheat and 221,641 barrels of flour. Taking wheat and flour together, perhaps some would say that the United States is our second best customer, but so far as flour is concerned it is fourteenth on the list of Canada's customers. Our second best customer for Canadian wheat is not the United States, but the Dominion of Canada, which in the year I have mentioned, 1924, required for food and seed some 85,000,000 bushels of wheat. Prince Edward Island had a small surplus; Ontario had a surplus in that year of over 7,000,000 bushels; Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and British Columbia ran short of their requirements for food to the extent of 16,669,000 bushels, and to that extent those four provinces provided a market, that is for food purposes alone, to say nothing of seed, for the wheat of the west to the amount of 16,669,000 bushels. They sent to the west over $20,000,000 to pay for that wheat, an amount just equal to the total received from the United States for our wheat, an amount double that received from Germany for our flour, an amount greater than the total received by Canada for our flour from our next fifteen best customers.

In this connection I might also mention that our exports of flour in 1924 represented 403,307 tons of by-products, which are of immense value to our farmers in the west as well as to those in the east.

It has been said that the price of wheat is fixed in the United Kingdom. Taken as a general statement, I think that that is true, but I believe it is subject to some modification. The average price of wheat for all Canada in 1924 was $1.22; in Manitoba, $1.24; Saskatchewan, $1.21; Alberta, $1.20; Ontario, $1.27. Each of these provinces had an exportable surplus, comparatively small in the case of Ontario, but very, very large in the west. Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had a shortage. In Quebec the average price for the whole year was $1.66; New Brunswick, $1.78; Nova Scotia, $1.61; Prince Edward Island, $1.59. There was a shortage in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick of 4,216,000 bushels.

Prince Edward Island had a small surplus of some 50,000 bushels, so we can understand the reason why the price kept up in Prince Edward Island, because her small surplus of 50,000 bushels was very easily taken up by Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. There was a shortage in British Columbia. Now for the wheat required in British Columbia for food purposes, that province sent over $2,000,000 to Alberta; I presume they sent it to Alberta because that would be the nearest. Now I want to say this, that the farmers of Alberta who supplied the $2,000,000 worth of what was needed in British Columbia should not only be willing but should be glad to use British Columbia apples, instead of apples from the state of Washington, and that, Sir, is something which you can apply all around.

In regard to butter and milk products, our exports in 1925 amounted to $58,000,000. Our production in 1924 was 278,000,000 pounds. Our exports amounted to 13,648,000 pounds. Our home market took care of 95 per cent of our production. All of the provinces did not have what they required of butter. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and British Columbia fell short of their requirements some 12,000,000 pounds.

In regard to cheese, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia fell short of their requirements. I do think, Mr. Speaker, that there is some justification for people in the east charging those in the west with being selfish. I maintain that those provinces which fell short of their requirements of butter and cheese should buy from the provinces which have a surplus, and that those other provinces should return the compliment when they require something which the other provinces have to sell.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Did the production of the provinces fall short of their own requirements?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Do you mean in the case of butter?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No. The provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta had a surplus of about 27,000,000 pounds of butter.

Mr. EVANS: Then where does the selfishness come in?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): There are other provinces besides those I have just mentioned. My general statement was that in cases where the prairie provinces required products, for instance British Columbia apples, they should buy British Columbia apples as readily as that province buys their wheat. That is the statement I make and, it seems to me, it is plain and easily understood. In regard to cheese, the prairie provinces did fall short. Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta each fell short, the total shortage for the three provinces being about three and a half million pounds.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Where did they get their supplies?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I cannot say where they got their supplies. I presume they got them from the provinces which had a surplus. My argument is that is what they should do. Other provinces take your wheat, as in the case of the provinces I mentioned a while ago. Seeing that the prairie provinces are able to market their surplus wheat in the province of Quebec and other provinces, then when those provinces fall short in their supply of cheese they ought to be willing to back up the industry which makes cheese in eastern Canada. But apparently that is not what they are willing to do. We in the east ask for and think we are entitled to a fair degree of protection in those articles which we handle especially.

Mr. BROWN: To make his argument fair the hon. gentleman ought to show that we are getting protection on our wheat such as British Columbia is asking for its apples. My hon. friend's argument is not fair unless he points that out.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I want to ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): One at a time if you please. I do not think the hon. gentleman's position is quite right. He says I must show that the west has protection on its wheat in order to make good my argument that we should be accorded protection on our products in this part of Canada. Is that what I understood my hon. friend to say?

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member has made a comparison between the prairie provinces and British Columbia. He says we in the prairie provinces ought to buy British Columbia apples because they buy our wheat. The point is this: Is British Columbia buying our wheat because it is Canadian wheat or because it is the wheat most convenient for them to get?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I presume that British Columbia is buying your wheat in Alberta because it is most convenient for them to do so.

Mr. BROWN: Exactly.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I presume that is true, but it does not alter the fact that they are buying your wheat. You say it is impossible to protect your wheat. Very well, if it is impossible to protect your wheat is that any reason why you should deny protection to an article which requires and can be accorded protection? I do not think that argument holds good.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): We buy all our cheese from the other provinces. Why is it necessary for them to ask protection in our markets? They have it anyway.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I will come to that in a moment, I think the question is very easily answered. Speaking in a general way my statement would be this: I contend that a farmer in Canada, I do not care what he is producing, should, by a fair and reasonable adjustment of the tariff, be practically guaranteed that the article he produces will be used on Canadian tables instead of imported articles. You can apply that to anything you like, and if you can show me that you need protection for your wheat I will hold up both hands for it.

Mr. EVANS: How are you going to do it?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I say that we do require protection in regard to such commodities as butter, eggs, meat, and many other articles this country produces.

Mr. EVANS: Will you say how wheat can be protected?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No, I will not say how it can be protected. I do not think that it needs protection.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has it not been proven that the production costs more than we get for it?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): You mean the cost of production is more than you get for it?

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I have heard that stated. I presume you would know better whether the statement was correct than I. If that is a fact one would naturally suppose that in continuing to raise wheat you are only digging the hole all the deeper. Still you go on raising more wheat. But what has that to do with my argument? I was arguing the point as to whether you require protection for your wheat or not. We will let it go at that as far as wheat is concerned and I will finish my argument with respect to the things that do need protection.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Do you consider it fair to compel the producers in other parts of Canada to buy your articles at an artificial price when they have to sell their own products in the world's markets?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): You do not sell all your wheat in the world's markets, not by any means.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Absolutely.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Oh, no, you do not; and I have given you figures to-night which bear out my statement that the average price of $1.22 in 1924 did not apply in that year to all parts of Canada.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Consider the freight and the handling charges.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): You would have the freight and the handling charges on whatever you sent down to the east where the price was more than $1.22. But I said in the beginning that so far as the price of wheat was concerned, speaking generally I was willing to admit that the price was fixed in the markets of the world. Generally speaking I believe that is correct, but in my judgment that is no reason why you should deny the protection which is needed in all fairness to the mixed farmers of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. EVANS: Does the hon. gentleman imply that we get more in Canada for our wheat than we do in the world's markets?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac). I did not imply that, I stated it. I gave you the figures which I have taken from the government's own reports, and inasmuch as you are supporting this government very faithfully I do not suppose you will question the correctness of any of those reports.

Mr. BROWN: The figures may be reliable but a very wrong inference may be drawn from them.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is a matter of judgment. I presume my hon. friend will admit that if there is a wrong inference drawn it may be on his part.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Does the hon. gentleman think we should be compelled by the tariff to buy at artificial prices when we have to sell what we produce in the world's markets at the prices prevailing there?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friends think that if I answer yes to that question I would be conceding that the placing of a tariff on an article gives that article an artificial price. That is what is in my hon. friends' minds. I do not concede that for a moment. It is not true, and history and experience have proved that it is not true Again and again it has been proven that the imposition of a tariff does not place an artificial price on an article which is protected. That will apply in the case of an article which cannot be produced in this country. Get that into your heads and keep it there. I direct that advice especially to the hon. member for Rosetown.

Mr. EVANS: Give us an instance.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I have given instances already.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): May I ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Sit down for a minute. I think I have been very good to the Saskatchewan kindergarten this evening.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask one more question?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Well, yes, I will.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member be kind enough to give us an instance of goods produced in Canada, instead of quoting exclusively in regard to goods produced in Britain and the United States, as to the price being raised by the tariff?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not know whether or not my hon. friend was in the House when I began to speak; I do not think he was. I did give an instance in the case of agricultural implements where the duty was raised to 35 per cent, and where, as a result of that, some nineteen establishments were set up in the province of Ontario, where the price was reduced because of the home competition. If my hon. friends are willing to admit that competition from outside will reduce the price, what is the matter with admitting that the same result will follow if we have competition at home? We had lots of competition introduced by the protective tariff which led to the establishment of industries.

Mr. EVANS: Will my hon. friend again give an instance?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The thirst for knowledge which is being exhibited by the hon. member for Rosetown and certain other members of the House is, I will admit, very commendable, but I recognize, Mr. Speaker, the utter impossibility of filling the aching void in their craniums between now and this time to-morrow. With all due respect, therefore, and with due regard and anxious solicitude for their welfare, recognizing their need for information of a reliable character, I will take a week-end off some time and try to pump some common sense into their heads, even into the head of the hon. member for Rosetown. Now, perhaps my hon. friend's question may be answered if he will listen to some further statements I have to make. I gave instances of the prices in Great Britain—

Mr. EVANS: We are speaking of Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Why not Great Britain as well as Canada? My hon. friend would not question for a moment that a tariff which would produce the result it has produced in Great Britain would not have the same effect in Canada. There is no use trying to get anything in that hon. member's head. It is simply a waste of effort, and I have spent too much time on him already. I would not mind spending the time on him or on any of the kindergarten members over the way if there were any chance of getting results, but for some reason or other they seem to be past hope; they do not seem to be able to grasp anything to-night.

Mr. EVANS: The hon. member is up against it.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Perhaps the reason my hon. friend interrupted once or twice is that he wanted to get his name on Hansard. I have noticed several times that hon. members on the other side of the chamber make it a business to interrupt in order to get their names on Hansard, but when it comes to making a speech, that is another matter.

The attitude of the present government in regard to the tariff is most unfair to the Dominion of Canada, as between Canada and the United States. I have in my hand a list which will show the duty imposed by the United States for the protection of their farmers and the protection given to Canadian farmers by the King government on the same articles. The list includes some fifteen articles, showing the Canadian duty and the American duty. I presume, in view of the many interruptions, that no person will deny me the right to put this list on Hansard without reading it all. Surely I have the consent of hon. members to that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The following list will show the duties imposed by the United States for the protection of their farmers and the protection given to Canadian farmers by the King government:

—	Canadian Duty	American Duty

I want to put on record the same thing with regard to Australia, comparing the rates of duty imposed by Australia on Canadian goods and the Canadian duty on Australian goods imported into this country:

I wish to express my appreciation of the extreme generosity of the House in permitting these figures to go on Hansard without my reading them. I admit they have been read before, but I am anxious to put them on record, because I really think after all that even my hon. friend from Rosetown, if he will sit down and seriously consider this matter, may change his view. I do not know. I say "may", and I put emphasis on that word.

I have said that under the Laurier government we had a policy of protection. Allow me to make good that statement by giving the figures. The Canadian tariff under the Laurier government on dutiable goods averaged for the fifteen years they were in power 28.25 per cent. The tariff under the Conservative government in 1921, on dutiable goods entering Canada, was 23 per cent. The tariff prior to 1911, on all imports dutiable and free, under the Liberal administration was 16.5, and in 1921, it averaged less than 15 per cent. The tariff on farm implements previous to 1911 averaged 20.18 per cent, and the tariff on farm implements under the proposed reciprocity agreement averaged 17.33 per cent. The tariff under the Conservative government in 1921 on farm implements averaged 14.64 per cent. So that when hon. gentlemen opposite say, as they do sometimes, that their policy is to adopt, if they get a chance, the reciprocity pact of 1911, they are proposing to expose the farmer of this country to the competition of the world in the sale of all that he produces, and to oblige him to pay a higher duty on articles of production than he is paying at the present time, because the reciprocity pact of 1911 had a higher range of duties on agricultural implements than that which obtained in this country in 1921.

Mr. BROWN: How will that affect them? The hon. member just said that the tariff did not raise the price.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does the hon. gentleman think it hurts him?

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member is advancing that as one of the offsets to the benefit of reciprocity.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No, I am not advancing it in that way at all. I am trying if I possibly can to get something resembling consistency into the minds of the hon. gentleman and those around him. That is a very hard thing to do, because one moment they talk as if they wanted free trade in agricultural implements, and in the next breath they say, "Give us the reciprocity pact of 1911." I am pointing out their own inconsistency, because in asking for the reciprocity pact of 1911 they are asking that the duties be raised higher than they are at present.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Under the reciprocity pact the duty was 17½ per cent.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. member is wrong again. Under the reciprocity pact it was not 17½ per cent, it was 15 per cent, and the hon. gentleman did not know it; so I have given another lesson to one of the kindergarten class. With the permission of the House I will put on Hansard a comparative table showing respectively the rates of duty on sixteen farm implements under the Liberal and the Conservative governments and under the proposed reciprocity agreement:

11 p.m.

Farm Implement	Liberal Government		Reciprocity Agreement		Conservative Government		United Grain Growers' Co.

It will be noticed that in thirteen of the sixteen implements the Conservative tariff was 5 per cent lower than the Liberal tariff and 2½ per cent lower on one, and that while the Liberals imposed a duty of 20 per cent on traction engines and ditching machines, these were free under the Conservative government. On those sixteen implements the average rate of duty under the Liberal government was 21.25 per cent. Under the proposed reciprocity agreement it was 17.6 per cent and under the Conservative administration in 1921 it was 14.5 per cent. Converted into dollars, the duty on these sixteen articles amounted to $191.29 under the Liberal government; $161.40 under reciprocity, and $146 under the Conservative tariff of 1921.

I want to call attention to another matter —and this is for the particular delectation of hon. gentlemen from the west. During the time that we had a duty of 12½ per cent on binders an institution in the west—

An hon. MEMBER: Twelve and a half or 15 per cent?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The duty on binders under the Liberal government was 17½ per cent, under reciprocity 15 per cent, and under the Conservatives 12½ per cent. Let me tell my hon. friend for his further information—I do not think it will crowd his grey matter too much to get a little more knowledge—that in the reduction of the duty from 35 to 6 per cent, that is to say, a reduction of 29 per cent, 9 per cent was taken off by the Liberals and 20 per cent by the Conservatives. But the point I want to refer to particularly, as being of special interest to hon. gentlemen from the west, is that while they and others in western Canada were complaining against the duty of 12½ per cent which they said obliged the farmer to pay $22.80 more for his binder, the United Grain Growers Grain Company was taking 21 per cent of a profit on the same implement, or $38.30. That is a fact. They were also taking 21 per cent on mowers. That is to say, they pocketed $13.18 on a mower while at the same time they were complaining that the tariff obliged the farmer to pay $7.85 more than he should And so it was in regard to all these articles I have mentioned. According to the sworn evidenc of Mr. Rice Jones—I do not think he was speaking ironically, either, while under oath, because he was getting $13,000 a year and he should have been able to tell the truth on that—the company made some considerable profits. As manager for the United Grain Growers' Grain Company he declared in his sworn evidence, given before a committee in this building, that the company took in profits in one year, on the farm implements they sold, the sum of $272,215, while they pocketed $68,383 in profits on lumber. On coal they took profits to the extent of $89,363.50 and on apples, $14,378.58. In the year 1915-16 their grain profits amounted to $855,288, or 62.2 per cent. This will be found at page 821 of the evidence. In 1916-17 their profits were $844,401, or 44.92 per cent, and in 1917-18 they were $441,769, or 19.7 per cent—there was not so much grain that year. Their total profits in two years amounted therefore to $1,699,689, or an average of 53.56 per cent. And those profits, be it remembered, were made in war years. They were war profits and these were war profiteers. According to the sworn evidence of this gentleman they had in five years a shortage of 3,800 bushels of grain which had leaked out of the cars. They covered that shortage by what they called overages made possible by underweighing the farmers' grain, so that they took in those same five years 357,000 bushels of overages, or ten bushels from the farmer for every bushel of shortage.

Mr. EVANS: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I will not; I must ask the hon. member to sit down. He cannot work that sort of game. They sold the overages for $418,000.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I rise to a point of order. The hon. member said that the United Grain Growers underweighted the grain. He must know that neither the United Grain Growers nor any other company can weigh grain at the terminals.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I suppose we have to put up with these children. What the hon. member says does not constitute a point of order, and if my hon. friend from Melfort had any intelligence—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I rise to a point of order. No hon. member has any right to cast reflections in any way on other hon. gentlemen.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does the hon. gentleman—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member be directed to withdraw the remark.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Well, the kindergarten is becoming really amusing. I suppose the hon. gentleman wants to get something off his chest and pretend it is another point of order. However, to proceed. In the five years during which they said they had a shortage of 3,800 bushels they had overages to the extent of 357,000 bushels, and as the grain was weighed in their own elevators the only way in which the overages could occur was by giving the farmers less than their grain really weighed.

Mr. BROWN: That shows what the hon. member knows about it.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I was not getting any dividends from it; perhaps you were. They sold the overages for $418,000

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I appeal to you on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the old man across the floor to be more respectful.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Now, Mr. Speaker, I have endeavoured to be as good humoured in this matter as possible, but my patience has about reached its limit. I do not propose to submit to any further interruptions of this sort from hon. gentlemen opposite. I have correctly estimated the intelligence of the hon. member for Melfort and have made allowance for it, but there is a limit beyond which even he may not be permitted to go, and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to see that my right is respected and to prevent the hon. gentleman from acting as he has been doing.

Let me call the attention of the House to another point. They invested $100,000 in a subsidiary concern in New York known as the New York Export Company, and according to the sworn evidence of their manager their profits from that company in one year amounted to $530,000, or 530 per cent—this on the part of heaven-sent politicians, the angels of political purity, who were howling their heads off about a duty of 12½ per cent on binders. They objected to such a duty but they could take 530 per cent out of the farmers. Every vestige of profit this company made they secured from the grain they bought from the farmers, and from the implements and supplies they sold to them. Indeed, they made such exorbitant profits, as revealed in their own evidence given before a committee of this House, as would cause them to damn any company in the Dominion, outside their own concern, which had received even one-quarter of what they got. I say in the presence of these gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, that the most conscienceless, cold-blooded, soulless profiteering monopoly that ever existed in the Dominion was the United Grain Growers' Grain Company, whose leaders framed the policy of the Progressive party that is now sitting in this House. I might refer to the profits they made on screenings. During those years, including the war, screenings averaged $8.84 a ton. When Mr. Crerar was Minister of Agriculture he bought some, as he said, for the benefit of the farmers down east at $35 a ton. The government lost $96,446.46. He was Minister of Agriculture at that time as well as president of this big company in the west. That was one occasion when the president of the company, in the person of Mr. Crerar, put one over on the Minister of Agriculture, also in the person of Mr. Crerar. He bought 1,616 tons from the Maharg Company at $46,560.

Now, Sir, it has been suggested that tariffs do not make any difference in trade. The effect of the Fordney-McCumber tariff may be seen in the following figures covering a period of three months just before that tariff came into operation and the same three months of the year following.

EFFECT OF FORDNEY TARIFF

Some Exports of Canada for three months before and thre months after Fordney Tariff

—	June, July and Aug. before Fordney Tariff	June, July and Aug. after Fordney Tariff
Butter	3,176,158 lbs. (2½c.)	200,926 lbs. (8c.)

Meats	10,434,000 "	5,650,000 "

Potatoes	249,514 bush. (F)	66,749 bush. (50c)

In last 10 years United States has sold to Canada $2,000,000,000 more than Canada has sold to the United States.

This shows the effect which the Fordney-McCumber tariff had upon our export trade to the United States.

I want to say that that tariff was placed on the statute books of the United States at the demand of the farmers who live in the northern tier of states, where they have found it impossible to compete with the cheap farm production of the southern states. Half of the states in the Union, as their statistics show, report a reduction in the value of farms and in improved farm acreage. Where are they? They are in the northern part where their climate is similar to ours. The other half having a mild climate show an increase of farm acreage and farm values. The farmers of these northern states went to congress and said: "We realize that we cannot get protection against our neighbouring states, but we insist that we be protected against the importations from Canada and other countries; you can protect us to that extent." It was to meet that demand that the Fordney-McCumber tariff was passed. Those farmers just recently demanded an addition to the duty on butter, and at their request it was raised from eight to twelve cents a pound. In the face of these facts we are told that our farmers do not need any protection; we are told that we are not affected by severe climatic conditions; when the dairymen of New Zealand and Australia are producing butter at the lowest cost of production, and our dairymen are producing it at the highest cost of production, we are told that we must not have protection. Hon. gentlemen like my friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans) and some of those occupying the kindergarten from Saskatchewan repeat that they are not particularly affected, that the only thing they are interested in is wheat. Apparently they do not care anything for the people of Ontario and Quebec—the two provinces which to-day are paying seventy cents of every dollar collected to run this country—the people of those provinces in the estimation of some hon. gentlemen in this House are deserving of no consideration at all. I realize quite well of course that the government and its assistants are actuated by a spirit of revenge. They do not like the result of the elections in October last; they will like even less the results when the next elections come around not only there but in other parts of the country.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is my hon. friend asking something?

An hon. MEMBER: No, he is just groaning.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The only other matter I wish to refer to is immigration In the speech from the Throne it is said:

> We have formulated and put into operation a comprehensive immigration plan.

What comprehensive plan have they put into operation? What comprehensive plan have they even formulated? Plans they have spoken of every year, one, two, three, but I should like any person to tell me of one single plan in regard to immigration which this government has put into successful operation. Even their plan to bring out 3,000 families from Great Britain has fallen down. I am informed that the government notified the railways not to bring out any more families under that scheme. Why? Well, they say they cannot provide them with farms. I have some information in regard to that, Mr. Speaker. I have in this hand a list of over 700 farms in Ontario, prepared by the provincial government. Those farms are available. In this other hand I have a list of 656 farms in the little province of Prince Edward Island. Those also are available if the government choose to place settlers upon them. I have a further list of 65 farms in that province. I have another list of a similar number of farms in New Brunswick, farms running from as low as $150 up to $800 and upwards. Here is a 50 acre farm, 25 acres cleared, price $1,000. Here is a 232 acre farm, 150 acres cleared, house barn and good water, price $4,000. Here is a 50 acre farm, 25 acres cleared, good buildings, price $400. Here is another 50 acre farm, also 25 acres cleared, with good buildings, price only $700. Those farms are in Prince Edward Island. The New Brunswick list contains farms, with buildings and running water, priced from as low as $800. There are numberless opportunities to place the proper kind of settlers in the Dominion; they need not all be sent to the west. The places which need to be filled up are those older provinces of Ontario and especially the Maritimes. But the trouble with this government is that in immigration matters they are a ten cent government dealing with a hundred dollar matter; those are about the correct dimensions. The immigration question is the big question of to-day, and therefore it never can be successfully handled by the aggregation across the way. They have never handled anything of any size; they cannot do so, because they have not a capacity for anything big, and never will have. Anything done in immigration matters since this government came into power has been done by the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways, the different provinces and certain organizations such as the Salvation Army. Meanwhile our farmers are asking for farm help; no assistance is coming from this government because, as I said before, they are absolutely inadequate, inefficient and do not know how to deal with big questions.

It has been repeatedly stated that the Conservative party stands for a high protective wall, a brick for a brick. That is not true, Mr. Speaker, and never was true. I have shown that in the eighteen years from 1878 to 1896 we had a protective policy; that in the fifteen years of the Laurier government that protective policy was maintained; that the tariff on dutiable goods under the Laurier government was 5 per cent higher than the tariff on dutiable goods when the Conservative party went out of power in 1921. That apparently will not stop these hon. gentlemen from repeating what has already been said so often. Up until 1923, when the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding brought down his last budget, all the parties in Canada had fairly consistently followed the traditional National Policy laid down by the Conservative party in 1878. That policy was departed from when the King government lost the services of the only two of its members who had any standing in the country, Right Hon. W. S. Fielding and Sir Lomer Gouin. It then ceased to be a government, and there has been nothing since which could be dignified with the name of government. It has been getting worse and worse all the time. When we had those two big men in the government they could hold such wreckers as the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) in check, as well as those from Saskatchewan occupying the kindergarten seats. When these big men went out and the mantle fell on the pigmy shoulders of the present Minister of Finance and his colleagues, there was no one left to stem the tide. Since 1923 this has been a government of compromise, pussyfooting, log-rolling and bartering for power; nothing else. They have thrown their promises and pledges to the winds; they have violated the pledge given during the last election campaign, which was reiterated time and again. Where in this Dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, will you find a man with money to invest who will show any confidence in this government? Who can have any confidence in a government which has violated its pledges, as this government has done? They have not only injured the automobile industry by their reductions regardless of their promises, but they have done worse; they have absolutely deprived the people of this country of that which is absolutely necessary, if you are to have industrial development—confidence in the government which controls affairs. They have destroyed that confidence, and by that action have struck a severe blow at the development of this Dominion.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, having taken so much time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friends should not say "hear, hear", because if they were at all generous they must have recognized the fact that a large part of my time was taken up in what I believe was a fruitless effort in trying to force some common sense into heads which, so far as we have been able to judge, have shown no sign of possessing that desirable quality. I have not much hope that what I have said, and the instructions I have given, will have any effect, because you have to plant seed in fertile ground if it is to produce anything, and there is no fertility over yonder; there are no brains to furnish the necessary soil to produce results. I can only leave the matter with them, hoping against hope that Providence, which has done so much for the Liberal party, will still exercise its beneficent influence and furnish some of the gentlemen of the kindergarten school with what they so much need, a little common sense and ordinary brain power.

Mr. F. W. PERRAS (Wright): Mr. Speaker, it is with some hesitation that I rise to address this honourable House. If I do so it is because of a sense of duty which I feel towards this country, and in an especial manner to the county of Wright, which I have the honour to represent in the federal parliament.

So many able speakers have preceded me, representing the three—indeed I may say the four—parties of Canada in this House, that I felt my views might be construed by many as "a voice in the wilderness". I have not the gift of oratory; I am a simple business man, somewhat lacking in flights of eloquence, but content to possess at least the virtue of sincerity.

This is my maiden speech, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure some of the hoary statesmen who are listening to this my first utterance on the floor of this House, remembering their first efforts, will listen to my few remarks with sympathy and attention.

The budget as introduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) will not only receive my wholehearted support but commands as well my admiration for its eminently fair and just policy towards the different economic industries of our country. I do not claim it is perfect, but I do maintain that it is the best policy under existing circumstances in Canada. When we consider the terrible burdens, financial and otherwise, we have had to shoulder since the world war, I consider it a marvellous tribute indeed to the present government, that in spite of reduced taxation, they have succeeded in reducing the national debt by so many millions of dollars. Penny postage, which originated under a Liberal government, has been re-established by a Liberal government. The income tax has been materially reduced, and taxation in other matters has also been reduced. The consequence is that the farmer, the labourer and the man of modest means sees daylight and comparative prosperity ahead, while a few, and only a very few, moneyed interests are finding fault with a government that is honestly and intelligently doing its utmost to render justice and fair play to all, without favouritism to any particular class or privileged class. There are those who are criticizing the tax on the automobile industry, and declaring that it means the ruin of this important industry. A close analysis of the true facts of the case will not bear out their argument. The automobile industry is on a solid and thriving basis. Let us only take last year's turnover and sales as an example. I quote from the Montreal Star of April 22, 1926:

> The automobile industry attains record for 1925 output. One car to every 13 persons in Canada. Figures show record production was attained in the automobile industry in Canada in 1925, according to a statement just issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics at Ottawa. In that year, the eleven automobile factories in Canada produced 124,458 passenger cars, 22,144 trucks and 15,368 chassis, a total of 161,970 cars which was an increase of 22 per cent over 1924, and 10 per cent above the figures for 1923—the previous best year, when 147,202 cars and trucks were produced.

Does any intelligent member of this House imagine for one moment that the reduction in the tariff on motor cars is going to kill this industry? Far from it. As we say in French, my mother tongue, "c'est pour rire".

As regards the smuggling which it is said was going on, it is comforting and consoling to learn that there was an increase in the net sum collected in customs duties. There will always be a certain amount of smuggling in this country, as in all others, but our government is to be congratulated for the zeal and courage it is displaying in the prosecution of this investigation.

It has often been said of the Liberal party that it panders only to the agricultural interests, that it is at the beck and call of the farmer, especially those of the western provinces under the leadership of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). If it were true—and I deny it—I would be glad to see our government favouring the agricultural classes of this country. In Canada they are to-day, and will be for many years to come, the predominant industry and the backbone, marrow and sinew of Canada. I have the honour of representing an essentially agricultural county, the county of Wright, in the province of Quebec. Our agriculturists are men and women of worth; they are the sturdy, healthy and progressive pioneers of our country—I use the term "progressive" advisedly. I will continue to support the present government in all its just measures for the welfare and advancement of the great Canadian west; and let no man forget that the prairie provinces were founded on toil, sacrifice and perseverance; and justice, if not humanity, calls for fair play to these worthy pioneers. As long, Mr. Speaker, as this government continues to protect the agricultural interests of this country, it will receive my wholehearted support. I must congratulate the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) in his effort to promote forestry conservation.

It is a regrettable fact that $15,000,000 has been lost to us annually through criminal negligence and otherwise. I am glad to see that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. King) has interested himself in this subject. Outside of the prairie provinces, they have no direct legislation, but they have the force of advice, co-operation and co-ordination.

I am also in accord with the present administration in its old age pension policy. I would go even further and support a measure that would reduce the age at which the pension should begin from 70 to 65.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, let me ask you and this honourable House: Is there to-day a more prosperous nation than Canada? Let us not be pessimistic but optimistic as regards the future of our country and Canada's wonderful natural resources. What Canada requires to-day is the spirit of optimism, not pessimism.

I am sorry that I have taken so much of your time, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the House for its generous attention.

On motion of Mr. Smith the debate was adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lapointe moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope the leader of the House will not be offended if I ask for confirmation or denial of the late reports that certain changes in the budget are to be announced shortly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend has received information that I have not got. I do not know of any changes; I do not think there will be any.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

Wednesday, April 28, 1926.

The House met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

HOUSE OF COMMONS CLEANING STAFF—WAGES

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. Has a reduction been made in the wage paid to the cleaning staff of the House of Commons since the end of the fiscal year?
2. If so, what amount, and why?

[Mr. Perras.]

Mr. SPEAKER:

1. The wages of the temporary servants of the House of Commons have varied between $3 and $3.65 per day for men doing exactly the same work and working the same number of hours. This caused discontent. As the bonus was discontinued last year, it was decided that in order to equalize the pay it would be fair and just to all concerned to fix a uniform rate of pay at $3.50 per day. This has been done accordingly.
2. Answered by No. 1.

LOBSTER FISHING SEASON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. J. DOUCET (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) based upon two telegrams received by me this morning? I shall read only one of these as the substance of the other is contained in it.

Have been requested by fishermen Sapin to Richibucto cape to ask you if you could not bring before parliament very serious charge against A. and R. Loggie, W. S. Loggie of Escuminac. Last week fishery overseer and Barry of Newcastle notified all packers lobster season would not open before third May and not to set any lines before that date. Understand request for this change made by parties names above on account conditions along shore. Yesterday great number fishermen were ready to set lines. The shore was free of ice. They again phoned fishery overseer asking permission set lines which was refused and threat made heavy fine imposed for each boat who would go out and set lines and traps. Nothing could be done before fourth May. Yesterday afternoon the Loggies allowed their men to go out, take the best ground, set their lines. Fishery overseers were notified. Barry chief overseer also notified by phone by packers and myself and again notified this afternoon. No action has been taken. The Department Marine Fisheries has been notified the Loggies instead of taking their lines back ashore are now hauling traps outside. Fishermen do not understand why Loggies have not been asked by this time to go out and take their lines back ashore. We kindly request you to protest and force the department to oblige packers named above take all lines back ashore so all interested in the districts between Burnt Church and Chockpish will have equal rights. Fishermen anxiously awaiting your answer. Please advise me. Am keeping in touch by phone with all of them.

E. PATUREL.

My question is: Has the department directed the parties mentioned to take their lines and traps ashore? If not, does the department intend taking such action?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have no direct information in regard to what is contained in the telegram just read by my hon. friend, but I am quite ready to make any inquiry in regard to the situation and to take proper means to deal with it. In regard to the change of date, I may say that it was not made upon the recommendation of the gentlemen mentioned in the telegram.

Mr. HANSON: On whose recommendation?

Mr. ROBERT K. SMITH (Cumberland): I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) a question in connection with the change in the lobster fishing season on the Northumberland straits. This particular zone borders on the constituency of Cumberland, and I have a telegram here from a reliable fisherman of that district which states the question clearly. With the permission of the House I will read the telegram:

Lobster season changed from April 26 to May 4; unsatisfactory to majority fishermen and packers. Please ascertain on what grounds and representations this change was made. Cumberland county inspector or packers not consulted.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The change has been agreed upon as a result of numerous representations to the effect that on account of ice conditions it was impracticable to start the fishing season on the 26th, which is the normal date for the opening of that season in this particular district. Representations have been made to the department and to myself personally by members of this House, as well as by telegrams and letters from interested parties. All the representations were based upon the ice conditions in this part of the country, but in the meantime we have received word that the ice is gone and that conditions now permit the opening of the season. Accordingly we issued orders this morning that the opening of the season should not be delayed any longer, and that fishing can be commenced this morning.

OTTAWA—ENLARGEMENT OF CONNAUGHT PLACE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, in view of the announcement in the press yesterday regarding expropriation proceedings by the government to acquire a couple of blocks of land in the centre of the city of Ottawa, may I ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) if he has any statement to give to the House as to the cost involved and the purposes to which this land is to be put? It is a very important matter and I think hon. members would be interested to have these particulars.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): It is the intention of the government to expropriate a portion of the property lying between Wellington, Elgin and Sparks streets. In that triangle the government already own from one-third to one-half of the property, back of the post office, and it is now proposed to take over the balance. The cost, of course, will be settled by the expropriation proceedings. The assessed value of the property is about $450,000; the price the government will pay is unknown as yet. It is hoped that eventually these buildings will be removed and that area made part of a public square.

Mr. MANION: Is it the intention of the government to put up other buildings in the place of those now standing?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, it is intended to leave an open space there.

INCORPORATION OF OIL COMPANIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): May I ask the Secretary of State whether he is now able to give a further reply to my question of Friday last regarding the oil companies of the province of Alberta, the charters of which have been withheld, and as to whether the oil companies to which he promised charters have as yet received them?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Secretary of State): Referring to the second question I have given instructions that these charters should be sent to the parties applying for them, and I have no doubt they have been forwarded. In reference to the next part of this question, I have prepared a statement which I desire to read:

Until quite recently applications for the incorporation of local mining and oil companies have not been made under the Dominion Companies Act. It is the practice of the Department of the Secretary of State not to incorporate companies having local activities only. Such companies are within the jurisdiction of the provinces. The Dominion, however, incorporates companies where it is stated in the applications that the operations will be carried on in more than one province.

The recent oil development in the province of Alberta has been the occasion of a large number of applications for the incorporation of oil companies. In each case it has been alleged by the applicants that they propose carrying on business in more than one province. It is impossible to investigate the genuineness of intentions, and the department has been forced to accept these statements.

It is suggested, however, that the reason for these applications being made to the Department of the Secretary of State, is the decision of the Supreme court in the case of Lukey versus The Ruthenian Farmers' Elevator Company, in which it was held that Dominion companies are not subject to the Sale of Shares Acts of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. If this allegation is well founded, the immediate inference is that many of these companies are what is generally known as "wild cats", brought into existence for the purpose of selling shares rather than boring for oil. The fact that Dominion oil company charters are advertised in the Calgary press, indicates a very unsatisfactory condition.

The western provinces are agitating for an amendment to the Dominion Companies Act under which Dominion companies would be made subject to the Sale of Shares Acts of these provinces. This is a difficult question and it raises many others which should be discussed when the necessary amendment of the Companies Act is under consideration. For that reason such an amendment could not be submitted to parliament at the present session and could not likely be dealt with until the next session of parliament. By then the deluge of oil company flotations may be over, and in the meantime it is necessary to take some action to protect the investing public.

It is a widely-held belief that the voluntary provision of the Companies Act, under which shares without nominal or par value are issued, are more effective in protecting the public than "blue sky" legislation. This was one of the principal arguments put forward when these provisions were adopted. It has been decided, therefore, that in applications for the incorporation of oil and mining companies, which are suspected to be purely local concerns, the charter shall limit the issue of shares to shares without nominal or par value.

Mr. BURY: May I ask the Secretary of State if that regulation is to be made retroactive?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will not be retroactive concerning those companies mentioned by my hon. friend, to whom assurances have been given that charters will be issued, but for other companies it will be retroactive.

ALLEGED FRAUDULENT COMPANIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Secretary of State): The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) on March 26 called the attention of the government to certain comments appearing in the English press with regard to two companies, the British Associated Oil Company, Limited, of Canada and the Westminster Finance Company, Limited, of Canada. These comments suggested that these companies were fraudulent in character, exploiting the public, and so forth, and my hon. friend asked the government to see whether incorporations had been granted by this House or by any department of the government, and what the remedy might be. I have directed that an investigation be made, and I am informed that these two companies, the British Associated Oil Company, Limited, and the Westminster Finance Company, Limited, were both incorporated by the province of Ontario on November 26, 1925. They are therefore provincial companies, not under the control of this government or this parliament.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

NATURAL GAS AND PETROLEUM LEASES

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) say whether his department have substantially altered the regulations with respect to oil exploitation, or whether it is proposed so to do. The alteration which I have in mind as possibly under review is one looking to the restriction of individual exploitation of oil, and what is believed to be the more economical development under large territorial rights.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I did not follow my hon. friend's question. Is it the areas of leases that are in question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed that attempts have been made to secure the rights of the larger operating companies, to the exclusion from certain territories of the individual oil company or oil borer. Have the regulations been so changed as to make it more difficult for the individual oil borer to secure his lease?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not that I am aware of; however, I will make inquiries and see if any changes have been made. Applications are coming in for the subdivision of existing leases, and I know that is being done, so I do not think there would be any attempt made to set aside large areas.

NOVA SCOTIA SENATE VACANCY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): May I ask the leader of the House if it is the intention of the government in the near future to fill the vacancy in the Senate caused by the death of Senator Roche, and thereby relieve very much the aspirations of the five or six gentlemen who have been in the capital during this week.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE: I am pleased to inform my hon. friend that the vacancy will be filled in due course.

PRIVY COUNCIL DECISION

RIGHT OF APPEAL IN CRIMINAL CASES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on March the 16th I asked the government whether any action was being taken in regard to the recent decision of the Privy Council in the Alberta appeal case. I should like to ask again whether the Minister of Justice has read that decision, and whether he is prepared now to make a statement as to the action of the government.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have read the decision, but no action has been taken, and I am not prepared to tell my hon. friend what decision will be reached.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 27, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. ROBERT K. SMITH (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, with the permission and indulgence of the House, I intend to make some observations on the budget in its particular application to some of the many interests in the eastern portion of the Dominion of Canada and the Maritime provinces. The House has been treated, if I may be permitted to use the phrase in that sense, to many matters of concern directly affecting us in the east, and what I shall have to say will not be in any sense a survey of our Maritime situation or a review of the seriousness of the difficulties under which we are labouring, which have already been quite fully stated, or of the grave burdens which we are forced to bear under ordinary circumstances without relation to the customs tariff.

It will be recognized at once that many of our troubles and difficulties have a close bearing on the tariff—coal, steel, agriculture, and our industries, for instance—while other problems apparently difficult of solution, such as transportation, have no bearing on the tariff. It is with the former—coal, steel, agriculture and industrial pursuits, or certain phases of them—that I desire to place some facts before this hon. House, and it will be observed that the remarks I have to offer apply not alone to the Maritime provinces, but to other portions of Canada, in fact, to the whole Dominion.

My first word, Mr. Speaker, on the budget as brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is that it is a notable one, notable I believe mainly for its omissions and its startling disregard for some of the main interests of this country, most particularly the labouring class. It is my purpose to place before the House some of the very striking omissions affecting materially, in my opinion, the portion of Canada from which I come, and having a general effect throughout the country through lack of recognition in a protective manner.

We from Nova Scotia have stressed the urgent need and long overdue protection essential to our two main industries, coal and steel. This government in its frantic desire to cater entirely to the western portion of Canada has entirely overlooked our legitimate and reasonable request for protection on these two main key industries. This request has been treated with somewhat of a silent and unwarranted contempt. I presume that some members may think that our mouths from the Maritime provinces should be closed because a royal commission has been appointed to investigate Maritime conditions. Whatever may be thought in this connection, I wish to make perfectly clear to the House that I do not intend to surrender my constitutional privilege, yes, my bounden duty to represent as best I can my riding by placing before parliament the views of the people who sent me here, royal commission or no royal commission. I trust that the royal commission appointed will serve some good purpose in the province of Nova Scotia after they have reviewed our distressing situation, but whether they do so or not, it is not my intention to forfeit what I consider to be my plain duty to the riding which sent me here, and that is to place the situation and circumstances affecting us as I see them before the House, and to offer whatever suggestions I can in my humble way to remedy the present conditions.

Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, on both sides of the House for and against this budget, appertaining to the changes, forecasts and their effects. It will be my humble task to deal as best I can with matters entirely overlooked by the Minister of Finance, some of which, and one in particular, have been brought very pertinently before this House during this session, but have been entirely disregarded by this government of lower tariffs and many diversified elements. I refer particularly to the question of coal.

First let me repeat what I stated in this connection in the House some weeks ago, that the frantic demand for increased duty on coal was brought to a head in Nova Scotia in December, 1924, when Liberals, Conservatives, and all others united and sent a delegation to Ottawa demanding more duty on coal and steel. That delegation was headed by the Hon. E. H. Armstrong, who was at that time

Liberal premier of the province of Nova Scotia, and with the permission of the House I should like to quote some of the appeals made by the delegation through their spokesman, ex-Premier Armstrong, to the government on that occasion. These appeals are tersely stated, being extracts from the memorandum which was presented to the government by the delegation on that occasion. I quote:

"The allied coal and steel industries of Nova Scotia have been for some years in a depressed condition."

"The prospect for the future is that there may be even more serious depression and resultant poverty."

"The Province of Nova Scotia is largely dependent upon these industries which are the main, and in some instances, the sole support of the population in important centres."

"This will be easily understood when it is considered that from 20,000 to 25,000 men are employed in the mining of coal and its associated industries."

"And that directly dependent on these there are not less than 100,000 to 125,000 people, or more than one-fifth of the population of the Province."

The delegation asked the King government for adequate tariff protection to prevent foreign coal and steel products from flooding Canada's markets: to stabilize and promote the coal and steel industries in Nova Scotia; and give the workingmen engaged in them steady and remunerative employment.

That delegation was splendidly received by the government. Their appeals were taken into consideration by the Prime Minister and his government, and the result was that when the budget was brought down in 1925 it contained an increase in the duty on slack coal from 14 cents to 50 cents a ton, and a decrease in the duties on screened and run-of-mine coal from 53 cents to 50 cents a ton. This change did not produce the favourable results that were desired in connection with the coal industry of the province of Nova Scotia. Now, I call attention to the fact that in this House a few days ago, speaking about the increases last year in the duty on slack coal, the Prime Minister stated that this was a case where relief was necessary and where the exception proved the rule; that it was a good thing to give our slack coal more protection, and he urged his Progressive friends to support the exception. If it was necessary to make an exception then I ask why not make an exception now? The conditions are worse now than they were then. Therefore, why not follow the exception to its logical conclusion, and give the industry the protection it requires? The Prime Minister realized the necessity and admitted the urgency of more protection on slack coal. He is quoted as having said that no legitimate industry in Canada would suffer from the fiscal policy of his government. This industry is suffering, has been suffering, and will continue to suffer until it is relieved by adequate protection. It is suffering under the fiscal policy of the present government, and we would like to take the Prime Minister at his word in this matter. I might refer to the fact that some of his candidates in Nova Scotia in the campaign of 1925 advocated higher duty on coal and steel.

For the information of the House I will review the duties on coal in Canada from 1867 to date. From December 21, 1867, to May 12, 1870, coal and coke were free. From May 12, 1870 to April 1, 1871, there was a duty of 50 cents per ton on coal and coke. From April 1, 1871 to March 15, 1879, coal and coke were free again. From March 15, 1879, to May 7, 1880, there was a duty of 50 cents per ton on coal and coke. From May 7, 1880, to April 20, 1883 there was a duty of 50 cents per ton on anthracite coal, a duty of 60 cents per ton on bituminous coal, and a duty of 50 cents per ton on coke. From April 20, 1883, to May 13, 1887, there was a duty of 50 cents per ton on anthracite coal, a duty of 60 cents per ton on bituminous coal, a duty of 20 per cent on bituminous coal dust, and a duty of 50 cents per ton on coke. From May 13, 1887, to March 28, 1890, anthracite was free. There was a duty of 60 cents per ton on bituminous coal, a duty of 20 per cent on bituminous coal dust, and a duty of 50 cents per ton on coke. From March 28, 1890, to March 27, 1891, anthracite coal and anthracite coal dust were free. There was a duty of 60 cents per ton on bituminous coal, a duty of 20 per cent on bituminous coal dust, gas coke for Canadian manufacturers was free, and there was a duty of 50 cents per ton on coke. From March 27, 1891, to April 23, 1897, there was no duty on anthracite coal or anthracite coal dust. On bituminous coal there was a duty of 60 cents per ton, a duty of 20 per cent on bituminous coal dust, and coke was on the free list. From April 23, 1897, to November 30, 1906, anthracite coal and anthracite coal dust were on the free list. On bituminous slack coal such as would pass through a half-inch screen, there was a duty of 20 per cent. On bituminous coal —round and run-of-mine—there was a duty of 53 cents per ton, and coke was on the free list. From November 30, 1906, to March 25, 1925, there was no duty on anthracite coal or anthracite coal dust. On bituminous slack coal there was a duty of 14 cents per ton. On bituminous coal—round and run-of-mine—there was a duty of 53 cents per ton. From March 25, 1925 to date, anthracite coal and anthracite coal dust are on the free list. There is a duty of 50 cents per ton on bituminous coal and coal not otherwise provided for. Coke is placed on the free list.

It will be noted that in the placing of the duties, from April, 1867, down to date, there has not been a very great spread in the amount of duty on the product of coal; the duty has ranged around 50 cents per ton ever since it was first placed. It will be recognized at once, I think, by every reasonable person that if 50 cents per ton was adequate protection back in the seventies it is surely not adequate protection to-day. The increased cost in the price of coal is so apparent and so evident, and is felt to such an extent by every manufacturer and householder in this Dominion, as to obviate any necessity of labouring that particular argument. As a matter of fact we have not one-half the protection on coal to-day that we had back in the seventies on account of the increase in the price of the product; and in Nova Scotia we are urging that this particular point be taken into consideration by the government and that it be regulated in accordance with the price of coal to-day.

It has been stated that in order to have more of our own coal used, a campaign of education should be carried on in this country. This may be so, but if there is to be a campaign of education there must also be one of example. The largest publicly owned corporation in Canada that I know of is the Canadian National Railway. I should like to ask the House what example it sets with regard to the use of Canadian coal on the National system of railways. The figures I will quote, and they are figures contained in answer to questions put to the government in this House during the present session by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall), tell the tale. Last year the Canadian National Railways purchased coal to the following extent:

	Tons
Coal mined in the mines of Nova Scotia..	718,826
Coal mined in the United States..	2,971,706
Coal mined in Cape Breton..	21,430
Coal mined in western Canada..	1,146,667

It will be observed on examining these figures that approximately three million tons of the five million tons of coal used by the Canadian National Railways in the year 1925 came from the United States. More coal by nearly one million tons was purchased by the Canadian National Railways for use on the National system from the United States than was actually purchased from mines in this Dominion.

May I give some idea of the importations of coal into Canada, covering the last ten years from 1916 to 1926? This will tell the story of the enormous sums of good Canadian money forwarded to the United States for coal when our own coal mines were idle, our miners out of work, their families in dire want, and general commercial stagnation existed in the coal provinces, as a result of want of adequate protection for this basic and highly important industry. I find that in 1925 the total importations of coal into Canada amounted to 15,671,635 tons. I have the figures, Mr. Speaker, for the last ten years covering the importations of coal from the United Kingdom, from the United States, and from all other countries, and with the permission of the House I would like very much to have these figures placed on Hansard. The statement is as follows:

(a) In 1923, from Newfoundland also, 76 tons, $781; from Philippines, 140 tons, $750. (b) In 1926, from Germany also, 5,711 tons, $66,063.

The importations of coal into Canada for the past ten years show an average of over 15,000,000 tons per annum. This is most significant, in view of the fact that there has been stagnation of a very startling character in the coal mining districts in the Dominion of Canada. As I stated, our coal miners are not able to procure work. They are not able properly to feed and clothe their families, but at the same time we are importing from a foreign country over 15,000,000 tons of coal annually. Think of an industry in Canada being exploited, our miners thrown out of employment and our coal provinces commercially stagnated, not to mention the Canadian money, over a hundred million dollars, being spent for the purchase of American coal, providing employment for American miners to the detriment of our own miners, and incidentally increasing the wealth of the United States, at the same time reducing our own wealth in Canada, and allowing our Canadian market for coal to be robbed by American operators. If we follow this suicidal policy in other things, I think it will be found before long that, as a business country, we will have to pull down the blinds, nail up the shutters, lock the door and disappear. Our coal resources in Canada are of a very substantial character. Our consumption of coal in Canada annually is nearly 29,000,000 tons. Our own Canadian coal supplies only 12,000,000 of that market, approximately 17,000,000 tons being supplied by foreign countries, and still we have no relief from this government in this connection. Let me quote the importations in 1925 into this country. They are as follows:

Anthracite	Bituminous	Lignite
3,249,497	12,957,738	18,368

Importations from the United Kingdom included 606,832 tons of which 57,585 was bituminous. The total importations for last year amounted to 16,832,435.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that it is necessary to deal with those figures which are accurate, being government figures, and which speak very loudly in regard to the great disadvantage the coal miners all over the Dominion of Canada are labouring under on account of being robbed of the Canadian market which is going to a foreign country and, as I said before, being exploited by foreign mine operators. There is invested in Canadian coal mines the colossal sum of $146,000,000. The value of the output of coal in Canada in the past has reached a total of over $82,000,000. In 1925 the selling value of coal was $49,092,649, being below that of 1924 by over $3,000,000.

Let me examine for a minute the policy of the leader of the government in Canada in connection with the coal mining industry. I am quoting from a Canadian press report of an address of the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, delivered at Orillia, Ontario, October 15, 1925, and I find the following:

> As at Parry Sound, Mr. King attacked Mr. Meighen's proposal to put a tariff on foreign coal, and to give assistance out of federal taxes to transportation rates from Maritimes and the west to the central provinces. "I do not think," said Mr. King, "that the people fully realize what this proposal means. At a moment when the nation is striving to throw off the burden of taxation Mr. Meighen is proposing to add to the burden of taxation. I have seen some winters in Canada when we have almost had to go down on our knees for the coal needed in the homes and factories of this country."

I think that the policy as outlined by the Prime Minister at Orillia last October is a policy, if followed, so far as we are concerned in the eastern portions of the Dominion of Canada, will ruin our coal and steel industries completely and entirely, and the importance of this industry in our province I think may be gauged from the fact that one-fifth of the entire population is wholly dependent on it.

Then, Mr. Speaker, in this connection I wish to deal with the source of supply to-day from the American coal mines. I think this applies particularly to the anthracite coal mines in the United States of America. The supply is not inexhaustible. It is estimated, and I think it was mentioned by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) in this House not long ago, that twenty-five years at the outside will exhaust the supply of anthracite coal from the United States. So that we in Canada, whether we desire it or not, will be driven to the use of our own coal after that period and perhaps before. If we must in the end be driven to the use of our own Canadian coal, why not adopt that policy now? Why not build up our own Canadian market for our own Canadian miners, and then when the time comes we will be ready for any exigency on account of the exhaustion of the supply in other countries?

I think it might very reasonably be expected that if double the present supply of the Canadian coal were granted to the Canadian miners in the future, if they could secure double the market in Canada that they have to-day, there would be a material decrease in the price of coal. I am positively sure that if there was a market for Nova Scotia coal double the market of to-day, it could be reasonably expected that there would be a substantial decrease in the cost of coal to the consumer. It seems to me that if it could be guaranteed to our Canadian mine operators that we would receive approximately 20,000,000 tons of the 29,000,000 tons consumed, we might have every reason to hope for a reduction in the price, and if we were to place, as we must place in order to protect this industry, a duty of $1 a ton on coal, it would not mean that the consumer would have to pay more for his coal, because the increased production and the volume would more than offset any other disadvantages in this connection. I think it is reasonable to argue, Mr. Speaker, that this industry would prove to be one of very great importance to Canada, much more so than it is to-day, and the Canadian consumer would also be almost guaranteed a reduction in the price of coal

I desire to quote from the report of the Royal Coal Commission investigating this matter in Nova Scotia last year. The reason I do so is that in the addendum to the main report, which was presented by Major Hume Cronyn, the coal situation is dealt with in very terse language. In the addendum Major Hume Cronyn says:

As a native and resident of the one, and a life-long admirer of the other, I take the liberty of making this appeal on behalf not only of Nova Scotia, but indeed of the well-being of the Dominion as a whole.

It will appeal from our report that one, perhaps the greatest, cause of distress and discontent is due to irregularity of employment in the mines. At the moment this statement is being penned there have been further outbreaks of violence in Cape Breton due to lack of employment with the destitution and ill-feeling consequent thereon.

The reasons for unemployment have already been explained, but to my mind that one which overshadows all others is the inability of Nova Scotia coals to compete in the St. Lawrence markets with those imported from the United States. This condition is due to the fact that in certain of the American coal fields, notably those of West Virginia, coal can be produced at a much lower cost than is possible in eastern Canada. Some of the factors explanatory of this lower cost may be briefly set out:

(1)—The ease with which coal can be mined and conveyed to the pit mouth.

(2)—The absence of gas and the benefit accruing from natural drainage.

(3)—The many economies possible, due to the fact that submarine mining in unknown, whereas more than half the output in Nova Scotia is mined several miles under the sea.

The marked difference in mining costs due to the above causes enables American coals to be transported, largely by water, from the field named and, after payment of the present Canadian import duty of 50 cents per ton, to be sold in Montreal and other Canadian markets at prices below the actual cost of production and transportation of Nova Scotia coal.

Most of the remedies suggested and set out below were forcibly brought to the attention of the Dominion government in December, 1924, by a representative delegation headed by the then premier of Nova Scotia. It would be a lengthy and perhaps unprofitable task to examine in detail the merits of each; suffice it to say that in my opinion the two first named are those best fitted to bring relief to what is little less than a national calamity.

1st.—Federal assistance towards the establishment of coking ovens. This remedy has been fully discussed in section 36 of our report and need not be further elaborated.

2nd.—A substantial increase in the import duty on all bituminous coal and anthracite screenings; or, in the alternative, a federal bounty on coal shipped from the Maritimes to Montreal or beyond, and on coal shipped from Alberta or British Columbia to Winnipeg or eastward.

Further on Mr. Cronyn states:

The economist may logically ask why an industry which cannot survive competition should be allowed to exist and consumers in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario may denounce any increase in the tariff as that must inevitably raise the price of bituminous coal. As one whose academic training has been that of the Manchester school I must admit the cogency of both question and denunciation. But there are considerations involved in this problem which transcend cold-blooded political economy or even the losses which may fall on the more thickly settled portions of Canada.

May I attempt in the briefest fashion to outline these considerations.

More than one-fifth of the population of the province of Nova Scotia are directly dependent upon its coal industries and the subsidiaries thereof and over 12 per cent of the revenues of the province are derived from the royalties paid on coal mined. After spending weeks on the ground and discussing the question with many residents of the province in all walks of life I concur in the statement made by the deputation before mentioned that "It is not possible to exaggerate the calamitous consequences to Canada should coal mining in Nova Scotia be permitted to decline."

Let us consider but two of these consequences. We in Ontario are accustomed, if not hardened, to the accusation made in the prairie provinces that the east treats the west unfairly but the sense of grievances unredressed which prompts this charge is as nothing to the depth of feeling which exists in the Maritimes against the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. That resentment is of old standing and one of its causes is the belief that the Atlantic provinces were more or less cajoled into confederation by promises and alluring prospects which have failed of fulfilment. It is indeed not going too far to say that the tie of sentiment which binds Nova Scotia to the Dominion has worn very thin.

If then we of the central provinces are unwilling to sacrifice something of our prosperity on the altar of common citizenship to aid, perhaps indeed to save, the main industry of Nova Scotia, we may witness an estrangement of far reaching consequences. For it is not exaggerating the situation to say that the inhabitants of the Maritime provinces are in a frame of mind that insists upon relief from the disadvantages under which they labour.

Then he goes on to state:

My appeal then to my friends (if I may so term them) of Quebec and Ontario and through them to the parliament of Canada is on the highest ground of national unity. Let us, overlooking the pecuniary sacrifices invoked, take the necessary measures to safeguard the welfare of our brothers by the sea.

The second calamitous consequence to central Canada which might follow a collapse of coal mining in Nova Scotia will become clear if we but exercise sufficient foresight to discover what will be the probable course of events in regard to the supply of American anthracite upon which to-day we almost wholly depend for domestic heating. As our reports sets forth the lifetime of the mines from which we are supplied is limited and their exhaustion is already in sight. At the same time the demand for the American market has enormously increased. In the light of former actions, political and otherwise, and bearing in mind the warnings already given us, we need not be surprised if at some not far distant future an embargo be placed upon the export of anthracite. Should we not then be forehanded enough to protect ourselves against this day of reckoning by so encouraging the development of a native industry as to have available a plentiful supply of that unexcelled substitute, to wit: Canadian coke?

Lest objection be taken that from one cause or another Nova Scotia might be unable to supply the coal or coke necessary for our requirements it is suggested that the increase of the customs tariff or bounty grants should only remain in force so long as it is clear that the supply of the native product is ample for all purposes.

The reason I read that quotation at some length was because of what I consider the very sound commonsense displayed therein. We want only sufficient protection on our coal to protect the industry in order to protect the Canadian market for our Canadian coal miners. If a dollar a ton duty will serve that end, well and good; if seventy-five cents a ton duty will serve it, all right. We have no objection; we are not making a particular plea, stating any positive and specific amount of duty that should be imposed, but we ask that a sufficient duty be imposed to protect the industry and keep the Canadian market for Canadians.

I should like to discuss for a few moments the question of steel. It will be and is recognized by all—and I think this has particular application to Nova Scotia—that the industries of coal and steel are inter-dependent and interlocked. It cannot be denied by any hon. member that the steel industry in the Dominion of Canada has been sufficiently protected to enable it to survive and compete with other industries along the same lines. I read a few minutes ago in connection with the coal industry an extract from the report of the committee that waited on the government in 1924 requesting additional duties on coal. In the same report I find there are extracts in connection with the steel industry in Canada. Let me read some of them:

> The steel industry of Nova Scotia is the only portion of the general steel industry of Canada which is in any real sense self-contained, or able to produce manufactured material of genuinely Canadian origin.
> It is the one industry of its kind in Canada the output of which is the result of the expenditure of practically its total cost in the form of wages paid to Canadian or other British workmen.
> The coal used is mined by Canadians, the ore by Canadians assisted by their neighbour Britishers in Newfoundland, while all the work of smelting and refining is done in Canada by Canadians, many of whom have given years to the acquisition of their art which is now a valuable asset that is in danger of being lost to their native country. In the other steel plants in Canada both coal and ore for making pig iron and refining it to steel are imported from the United States, and should that source of raw materials for any reason become unavailable, iron and steel manufacture and the fabrication of iron and steel into finished goods would necessarily cease.
> For this reason the steel industry of Nova Scotia deserves especial consideration. It is the only possible native source of the primary material of the iron and steel arts, and for national preservation, and to avoid complete dependence upon the outside for iron and steel supplies, requires to be kept in existence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am informed it is estimated that for the past seventeen years Canada has, in round figures, imported over 500,000 tons yearly of iron and steel in the form of pig iron, billets, plates, bars and rods, due wholly to inadequate protection, and in some instances to inequality of freight rates. Our steel importations from the United States alone now closely approach, if indeed they do not exceed, 2,000 tons per working day. Belgium is shipping iron rods into Canada at prices several dollars per ton below our cost of production. Meanwhile, our furnaces are cold and thousands of our men idle, with a certain percentage of our coal output uncalled for.

Our importations of iron and its products for the year ending February 1926 amounted to $171,165,943. Of this amount we imported from the United States alone over $150,000,000 worth. During the same period we exported to the United States $7,225,561 worth. That leaves a difference against us of over $145,000,000. During the same period we imported from the United Kingdom $17,638,232 worth, and we exported to the United Kingdom about $8,000,000 worth. For the year ending February 1926 we imported from all countries iron and steel products to the value of $174,165,943, and we exported $72,855,942. In other words, there is a balance against us on iron and its products of over $100,000,000.

A short time ago, Mr. Ross H. McMaster, the president of one of our large steel industries in Canada, made the following statement in connection with the steel industry:

> Steel manufacture is a basic industry in this as in other countries, but it has been exposed in recent years to growing competition, facilitated by tariff reductions. An average duty of less than 10 per cent does not protect, the result being that steel imports have nearly equalled the domestic output, and that Canadian production has increased by less than one and one-half per cent in fifteen years, as against an increase of 75 per cent in the United States, the Canadian production for 1925 being actually lower than the output in 1912.

An examination of our tariff reveals that there are fifty-five items which admit steel and iron of various descriptions duty free or provide a drawback of substantially the entire duty when intended for particular purposes.

Mr. McMaster goes on to say:

Some in Canada will state that the profits of the Steel Company are large.

He refutes the assertion, and in the concluding paragraph states that they have earned a dividend rate of but 2½ per cent on the capital invested. That does not appear to me to be a very exorbitant rate of interest for that or any other industry.

I am also reliably informed, Sir, that 51,600 tons of steel rails were imported in 1924. Had those rails been bought in Sydney, hundreds of men in the steel mills would have had three months more work, while the coal miners at Sydney would have had 115,000 more working days and $2,000,000 which left this country would have been kept here.

Statistics show that the production of steel ingots in Canada has been as follows:

1912..	821,000 tons

That is, in 1925 we produced nearly 100,000 tons less than we did in 1912.

A recapitulation of our steel imports over recent years, embracing rolled products and other lines of iron and steel which this and other Canadian companies produce, shows the duty on imports is at the following ad valorem rates:

	Average rate of duty
Year ending March 31, 1922..	10.65
Year ending March 31, 1923..	10.59
Year ending March 31, 1924..	9.29
Year ending March 31, 1925..	9.48

Or an average rate of less than 10 per cent.

I understand also, Mr. Speaker, that in 1922 the value of fuel used in our iron and steel industries was nearly $8,000,000. The production of pig iron in Canada in 1913 was 1,129,000 tons, and in 1923 it was only 880,000 tons, while in 1924 it was less than 600,000 tons. At the same time our imports of iron and steel increased from 110,000,000 tons in 1922 to 138,700,000 tons in 1923. I do not think the question of the inadequate protection of steel in Canada need be laboured; it is most obvious. The steel industry has been crippled; the production has fallen below that of fifteen years ago; other countries of the world are absorbing our Canadian market; our manufacturers are losing the home market—all these indisputable facts call for a complete revision upward of the tariff on steel. I urgently suggest to the House that this is another of those matters overlooked in the budget presented by the Minister of Finance.

Now I want to pass on to the textile industry. This is one of our most important industries; it employs 19 per cent of our total industrial workers; it pays 15 per cent of the total industrial wages; it produces 14 per cent of our total manufactured products and employs 9 per cent of the total industrial capital engaged. To show the magnitude of this industry—and I am sure this will be interesting to my western friends—within the past ten years there have been times when the value of the textile products manufactured in Canada was greater than the value of the wheat crop. In 1923 the value of our textile products amounted to the colossal sum of $334,439,196.

Mr. FORKE: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question in that regard. In making up these figures of the value of the total production of this industry, was the price of the raw material deducted?

Mr. SMITH: I do not think the cost of the raw material has been deducted from these figures.

Mr. FORKE: I would like to point out to the hon. member that in order to ascertain the actual value he must deduct the cost of the raw material entering into the production of the finished article.

Mr. SMITH: These figures were taken from the Canadian Textile Journal, and I believe them to be reliable. I think my hon. friend's question is quite fair, and I also believe that his statement with respect to the consideration of the cost of the raw material is quite correct. But I do not think that detracts from my argument. In the fiscal year ending March 1925, the total imports of manufactured textiles into Canada amounted to $124,592,074. Of this total 77 per cent came from countries where the standard of living is lower than in Canada, and where the wages paid are from one quarter to one half less than those paid in Canada. In the same year, 1925, the total imports of wool, manufactured, amounted to $40,220,768, of which 94 per cent came from low standard of living countries. Manufactured cotton imports amounted to $34,406,109, of which 64 per cent came from low standard of living countries. In 1923 there were 1,817 textile establishments in Canada, representing a total investment of $283,248,204; employing directly 92,669 workers and providing an annual payroll of $81,244,205. These establishments produced goods to the value already stated. The raw materials purchased by the industry during that period amounted to $176,445,427.

In the fiscal year ending March 1924, which approximates the calendar year of 1923, raw textile fibres to the value of $40,611,749 were imported into Canada, and the importation of manufactured textiles amounted to $129,183,911. I would like to point out also that in the fiscal year 1925 Great Britain exported to Canada 82 per cent of the manufactures of wool coming to this country; the United States 6 per cent, and other countries 12 per cent. In the calendar year 1923, the latest I have showing both home production and imports, the total value of all manufactured woollen and knit goods imported into Canada amounted to $40,700,908, of which goods to the value of $33,111,173 came from Great Britain. That is, the imports totalled over 50 per cent of the value of the home products, and over 22 per cent of those imports came from Great Britain. In 1924 we imported from Great Britain 30,154,200 square yards of woollen and worsted cloth. English manufacturers of textiles are applying for protection in the Old Land; they ask for a 33⅓ per cent ad valorem duty on foreign woollens and worsted cloth.

I pass from that phase of the subject, to return later. In the fiscal year 1925 the total imports from Great Britain amounted to $151,100,207, of which $72,128,723 represented textile products. Of this total, manufactured textile goods represented $67,594,121; manufactures of wool amounted to $33,005,358, and manufactures of cotton amounted to $18,701,523, with the remainder other or mixed textile products. On examining the imports from Great Britain it will be immediately seen that approximately 50 per cent were in competition with our own textile industry, while the remaining 50 per cent is spread over all the other industries in Canada.

Now we come to the effect the French treaty has had in Canada, and I would like to classify it briefly as having two main effects. In the first place it increases the amount of goods made in France and sold in Canada; in the second place it replaces goods made by workers in Canadian mills. The increased imports of cloth from France under the French treaty and the increased importation from Great Britain are closing our mills, and to-day many of our Canadian workmen are out of work. It is an undeniable fact, I think, that a good many of our textile workers are without employment, and a great many of them have left for the United States, which amply protects its textile industry. In the town from which I come we have a very good example of the effect the tariff is having on the textile industry. An industry which in 1921 employed approximately 200 men today employs but two, a night watchman and a day watchman.

Mr. HEAPS: What has been the effect of the United States tariff on the textile workers in that country?

Mr. SMITH: I am not in a position to give my hon. friend exact information as to conditions in the textile industries in the United States, but I can give him a quotation with regard to the conditions among the workers in the textile industries in Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. gentleman was saying just now that the textile workers in this country were being forced to the United States on account of—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. HEAPS: I have the privilege of asking a question What I am getting at is this: The hon. gentleman says that the textile workers of this country are leaving for the United States because conditions in the textile trades there are better than in Canada, and I am asking if he has information to show that that is the case.

Mr. SMITH: I hardly need any very accurate information from the United States on that point, because we have the fact that our textile workers are leaving this country and going to the United States. I know personally that men who were working in the textile industry in the town of Amherst have gone to the United States. I am not in a position to say whether they were absorbed into the textile industries over there, but this fact is perfectly clear: We are importing into the Dominion of Canada a very substantial quantity of textile products that could very easily be manufactured in Canada, and the result must be to throw our own textile workers out of employment.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not disputing that fact, but is the hon. gentleman aware—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I could not hear the hon. member. Is he asking a question?

Mr. HEAPS: I have the permission of the hon. member who has the floor to ask a question, and I do not see very much courtesy in hon. gentlemen opposite trying to prevent my asking a question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: As long as the hon. member has the permission of the hon. member who has the floor, he is in order.

Mr. SMITH: I have no objection.

Mr. HEAPS: I was going to ask the hon. gentleman if he was aware of conditions in the textile industries in the state of New Jersey at the present time.

Mr. SMITH. I am not familiar with conditions in New Jersey, nor am I very greatly concerned about industrial conditions in the United States, but I am agitated, as I think everybody in this country, and as I am sure my hon. friend as a Labour member is agitated, over the fact that our Canadian workmen in the textile industries have left and are still leaving this country and that our own textile industries are being shattered by the importations of textile goods from other countries, particularly Great Britain. That is the only point I am making in this connection. It may be as my hon. friend intimates, that there is curtailment of production in the textiles industrie in the United States. That may be due to various causes. I do not know what particular causes may be bringing it about, but there are many that could bring it about. But the point I am making is that our own Canadian market is being absorbed by other countries.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What protection do the textile industries of this country enjoy on woollen goods, for instance?

Mr. SMITH: The preferential rate is 24¾ per cent. I can give my hon. friend the tariff on all the items, if he wishes.

I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, that certain firms in the Old Land applied for protection against the goods imported into Great Britain from other countries. It is a fact that the Bradford manufacturers in England requested a duty of 33⅓ per cent on woollen goods imported into England. Now if they require that duty on goods imported into England from countries where the production costs and wages are lower, countries perhaps where there is depreciated currency and non-union labour, and in some cases, I believe, child labour, it seems to me that we in Canada must have an equally high duty against the goods imported into this country from Great Britain, because our relative positions are the same. What I mean is that wages in England are about one-half what they are in Canada, and wages in European countries are just about one-half what they are in England, so that relatively we are in the same position to England that England stands to the European countries, and if England requires a duty of 33⅓ per cent against these goods it seems to me that we shall not be able to compete with England unless we have an equally high duty.

The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) a few days ago mentioned the question of wool. It has been mentioned before, but it is important and will bear repetition that in Canada we have only about 2,500,000 sheep, which is practically the number we had thirty or forty years ago; in other words, there has been no growth whatever in the sheep raising industry in this country. I am informed that we use in Canada annually 70,000,000 pounds of wool, and that our sheep supply only 15,000,000 pounds of our annual consumption. I have also observed from various sources that our sheep raised in Canada are of the best quality, as I think was evidenced last year or the year before when they swept the boards in prizes at the International Live Stock Show at Chicago. The Commonwealth of Australia has about 30,000,000 sheep, and Great Britain 25,000,000 as compared with our 2,500,000, so there appears to be something radically wrong with the sheep industry in Canada. I realize the fact, which has been pointed out before, that Australia is particularly well adapted to the raising of sheep because they can graze there practically the whole year. This advantage is offset, however, by the fact that the sheep in Australia have to endure droughts, and are also subject to diseases to which our sheep in Canada are not susceptible. I will read what the Canadian Textile Journal of January 10, 1925, has to say on this very point:

> In 1897 a system of specially low duties on goods manufactured in Great Britain was granted by Canada and increased to one-third off the general tariff in 1900. These low duties are collectively known as the "British preference." As Great Britain had the advantage of mass production and a much lower wage, more than eighty-eight woollen mills in Canada, with just about half of the cards and looms in the country, were forced to close their doors and the employees were thrown out of work and much of the capital invested lost, creating hardships in numberless small Canadian towns. Up to this time the increase in the sheep population in Canada was keeping pace with the increases in other live-stock. It is regrettable, however, that in round figures there are no more sheep in Canada to-day than there were when the British preference was first granted. Sheep breeding got a black eye because at that time the wool growers sold their wool to the local mills, who graded, sorted and used it; and with the closing of the Canadian mills the market was gone, as there was no machinery available immediately for the careful grading and preparation which is necessary for obtaining markets abroad.

It seems to me that this is a very serious matter for the Dominion of Canada. I do not know that I would want to venture any definite opinion or assertion as to where the responsibility should be placed. It is a fact, however, that we have a country which is suited in large measure for the raising of sheep and yet it is not being done; at any rate it is not being done to a degree which is at all comparable with the commonwealth of Australia or even with the British Isles.

With respect to the importations of fibres and textiles. In the year ending February, 1926, we imported from the United States into Canada $78,850,608 worth of these products. During that same period we exported $4,721,979 worth of these articles to the United States. We imported seventy odd million dollars' worth during the same period, and to offset that we exported to the United Kingdom the small sum of $1,457,781 of fibres and textiles. I have here a table showing the imports of manufactured textiles and of imports manufactured and raw; of manufactured wool imported, imports of wool manufactured and raw; of manufactured cotton imported and imports of cotton manufactured and raw. I do not wish to weary the House by reading them, and should like to have them placed on Hansard. They are as follows:

MANUFACTURED TEXTILES IMPORTED INTO CANADA FROM GREAT BRITAIN, UNITED STATES, AND OTHER COUNTRIES

More than one half, or an average of 52¼%, of manufactured textile products imported into Canada come from Great Britain. Over 70% of the total manufactured imports come from countries where the rate of wages paid in the trade are from one quarter to one half of the rate of wages paid in Canada. Comparing the government figures for the first four months of the fiscal year 1925—that is to say the months of April, May, June and July—with the same months in 1923 and 1924, the imports of raw wool, worsted tops, noils and waste, on an estimated grease wool basis, amounted to:

Four months—	Pounds
1923	13,658,060
1924	8,728,501
1925	6,726,543

The importations of yarns for further manufacture in Canada during the same period were as follows:

	Pounds
1923	1,278,944
1925	855,678

Coincident with this tremendous reduction of raw and semi-raw materials to be further manufactured by Canadian workingmen, the importations of woollen and knit goods further advanced than yarns, for the same four months' periods reached the following tremendous totals:

1923	$11,154,208
1925	10,603,207

In other words the imports of raw material for manufacture during these comparative periods was 130 per cent greater in 1923 than in 1925, with all that implies to the pay envelope of the Canadian worker.

The tremendous increase in the importation of goods made by workers abroad since the reductions in Canadian duties on goods from Great Britain in 1922 and 1923 are shown by the British government figures of the exports to Canada of woollen and worsted cloth for the calendar years as follows:

	Square yards
1921..	13,095,400
1922..	27,014,500
1923..	28,834,700
1924..	30,154,200

These figures do not include blankets, furniture stuffs, flannels, carpets, hosiery, underwear and fancy knitted goods.

The effect of the reductions in Canadian duties on goods made by workers in France, which went into effect in September, 1923, is shown by the Canadian government figures of importations of woollens and knitted goods from France for the twelve months ending March in each year. The figures are as follows:

1923..	1,020,122
1924..	2,061,935
1925..	3,284,976

As will be observed the figures in 1922 were $699,000 odd, but in 1925 they jumped up to over $3,000,000. That shows the effect of the reductions under the French treaty in that line of goods.

With respect to the way in which the Commonwealth of Australia deals with the question of the importation of textiles into their country it may be interesting to note that woollens from the United Kingdom enter Australia under a duty of thirty per cent, whereas in the case of similar articles from other countries the duty is forty-five per cent. In other words the Canadian manufacturer is discriminated against by fifteen per cent in favour of the British manufacturer.

Now let me give a comparison of the woollens imported into the United States and those imported into Canada during the years 1923 and 1924. These imports include cloth, carpets, knit goods, yarns, made-up, and felts. The figures are as follows:

Importations into United States in 1923..	$52,467,059
Importations into Canada in 1923..	40,700,908

In other words, the imports per capita into United States of the articles I have mentioned for the year 1923 were 43 cents as compared with $4.79 per capita in the case of imports into Canada. It seems to me this tells a very striking story of the difference per capita between importations into the United States, where these industries are protected, and importations into Canada, where the industries are not sufficiently protected Covering the same articles in the year 1924 there was very little difference. The per capita importations from the United States amounted to about 42 cents per head, and in Canada in 1924 they amounted to $4.69 per head. Speaking again about the Australian tariff, to show how tariffs work out, compare the duties paid on a yard of tweed or of worsted cloth invoiced at five shillings a yard, and 36 inches wide, when imported into Canada and Australia. The rates of duties are:

	Canada	Australia
	per cent	per cent
British preference	24½	30 plus 1/—per sq. yd.
France, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland..	29½	40 plus 2/—per sq. yd.
Intermediate..	35	40 plus 1/6 per sq. yd.
General..	35	45 plus 2/—per sq. yd.

Coming back for a minute to a further comparison between the United States and Canada: one and one-quarter square feet of woollen and worsted cloth per head of population was imported by the United States from Great Britain in the calendar year 1924, while during the same period Canada imported 32 square feet per head of population. As to Great Britain, the comparative figures are as follows:

To Canada was imported 30,154,200 and to the United States 17,189,500. The population of the two countries being taken into consideration gives a per capita of 0.14 in the United States as against 3.54 in Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to show the attitude displayed towards this very important industry in the United States by the president. He said:

I confess that I desire to see our country prosperous; I am aware there can be no prosperity in which the textile industry does not have a generous share.

President Coolidge said at Washington, April 6:

There are sound and accepted historians who date the beginning of the modern phase of the industrial epoch from the invention of power-driven machinery for textile making.

From our national beginning it has been an almost uniform policy to conserve to the American producers the rights of first opportunity in the home market. The American home market is the most wonderful commercial development in all human experience.

The fact that our buying and consuming capacity is so great proves that, despite some inequities, we have on the whole maintained a more equitable distribution of the proceeds of industry than has been possible in less favoured communities. We are reaching a very fair approximation of democracy in industry.

The pride of quality and craftsmanship has always been maintained to a notable degree throughout most of the textile industry. It necessarily denotes the payment of as liberal wages as the business can justify, and thereby the establishment of a great community of skilled and intelligent workers. Industrial prosperity depends almost entirely on men and women of skill.

Industry has come thoroughly to recognize its responsibilities towards its employees. The government approves of and shares in that responsibility. It has come to be recognized almost universally that only upon justice to wage-earners of the nation can there be reared any lasting prosperity.

It seems to me that if we would adopt a similar motto in this country we would be doing something of a very substantial and commendable character toward this industry. I spoke a few minutes ago about an industry in the town of Amherst, which is in the constituency I represent. I have a letter from the president of the Stanfield concern which was located there—the buildings are still there but they are not in operation—in which he relates some matters of interest. In reference to the Amherst mills he states:

We found we were not getting a new dollar back for the old dollar expended; were wearing down our plant, and it was better to close down—take our liquid assets and convert them into cash and loan same out. The past twelve months have proved to us that this was a wise course for us to take in the interests of our shareholders.

He states further:

A beautiful mill like the Amherst Woollen Mills, if in the States, would be worth hundreds of thousands of dollars and would be employing hundreds of workmen. The same thing applies to a less extent to the Oxford Woollen Mills.

He further states in his communication to me:

Years ago there were in the province of Nova Scotia woollen mills at Yarmouth, Eureka, Hopewell, Amherst, Oxford and Truro.

I think I am correct in saying that of all those mills referred to, the one at Truro is the only one in operation to-day. The Oxford Woollen Mills recently commenced operations on a small scale in the hope that they may be able to compete under the serious disadvantage to which they are subjected. I had a letter which I wished to read for the benefit of my hon. friends from Winnipeg in connection with the attitude of labour in the Dominion of Canada towards the textile industry. I am sorry I have mislaid it, but it was quite significant and stated in substance that the textile workers in the Dominion of Canada were not being treated fairly by the government in that their markets were being absorbed by foreign countries, and that if this policy of allowing other countries to come in and absorb the markets was continued they could not hope for anything of an encouraging nature for the workers in the textile industry of Canada.

I desire to speak for a few minutes on the question of the boot and shoe industry and its relation to the tariff, another matter that has been entirely overlooked by the Minister of Finance. The manufacture of boots and shoes is usually one of the first things to start in any country. Footwear is undoubtedly a necessity. There usually is a domestic supply of hides, so that one finds the primary condition for manufacturing, namely, a demand for the product and a supply of the raw material. This is another industry which, I submit, is suffering on account of unfair competition, and an industry for which there has been no relief under the tariff. This industry is one of the oldest in Canadian history. As far back as 1667, the Jesuits wrote to France that as a country could not be formed entirely without the assistance of manufactures, an industry was already in operation making shoes and hats and another was in contemplation for linen and leather. From its early beginnings the shoe industry has been completely revolutionized, and the manufacture of fine shoes in this country may be said to date from only about 1885 or 1890. This development has been accomplished against tremendous odds and in the face of many handicaps. United States factories for a long time supplied a very large proportion of the fine footwear sold in the Dominion, our factories not being able to afford to manufacture those finer types and styles.

It may be interesting to note that during the war the shoe industry consolidated its position and proved to the world that its product in all lines was second to none. We made 3,000,000 pairs of army shoes during the conflict, and in the years 1919 and 1920 we exported to twenty-five countries, our exports of boots and shoes amounting in 1920 to $5,678,720. After the war other countries started to adjust their tariffs and Canada's export market was shut off, the result being that Canada's exports of boots and shoes for the twelve months ended February, 1926, amounted to only $265,000 as against $5,678,720 in 1920. The industry to-day is operating at approximately seventy-five per cent of its full time capacity.

It is significant that the production of boots and shoes in Canada last year was less than the output in 1912 by 1,800,000 pairs and, that while United States factories increased their production from 313,230,157 pairs in 1924 to 323,553,055 pairs in 1925, the Canadian output dropped from 15,800,000 pairs in 1924 to 15,500,000 pairs in 1925. It is estimated that more than a hundred shoe manufacturing firms have failed or been forced into financial reorganization since 1920. During the last four or five years the shoe factories have been operating at a loss.

The industry certainly requires protection, but what has been the situation? In 1922 the government reduced British preferential rates on boots and shoes from 17½ per cent or 20 per cent, depending on the class, to 15 per cent or 17½ per cent. In 1923 a further reduction was made and the lower duty now stands at 15¾ per cent. Importations of British footwear into Canada for the years 1922, 1923, 1924 and 1925, showing the number of pairs and the value, are as follows—I cannot supply the number of pairs for 1922:

Year	Number of pairs	Value
1922	records not complete	$ 456,073
1923	341,814	738,760
1925	805,201	1,132,850

Hon. members will note the striking difference between the imports in 1922, amounting to $456,073, and those in 1925, amounting to $1,132,850. This shows quite conclusively, I think, why so many of the factories I have mentioned have been forced either to close their doors or to go into financial reorganization.

English manufacturers have the important advantage of lower wages and the importation of all their raw materials free of duty. Leather tanned in Germany and other European countries is used in the manufacture of English footwear. The duty of 15¾ per cent afforded our Canadian shoe industry is practically offset, it is estimated, by lower wage costs in England. There are 190 shoe factories in Canada. British manufacturing plants have been so slack that it is stated that they have been cutting their prices to a non-profit basis and in many cases quoting prices for export without figuring any charge for overhead in order to get the export business, their overhead being carried by the home market. Another important point is that Canadian regulations allow goods to be sold here at prices five per cent less than those in the country of origin before the dumping duty is applicable. Canadian appraisers in most cases have no knowledge of shoe costs and values and are unable to check alleged fair market prices in England.

I have in my hand a statement of the importations into Canada of boots, shoes and slippers for the years 1922, 1923, 1924 and 1925 showing the number of pairs and the values. With the permission of the House I will ask the liberty of placing it on Hansard.

The statement is as follows:

I would like also to put on Hansard a statement of the factory production of machine-made boots and shoes in Canada since 1911. The figures are as follows:

Factory Production of Machine-Made Boots and Shoes in Canada

	Pair
1911	13,980,000
1912	17,300,000
1913	15,736,000
1914	13,954,000
1915	15,393,000
1916	20,000,480

1921	14,460,000
1922	16,600,000
1923	16,050,000
1924	15,800,000
1925	15,500,000

Importations from the United States for the year ended February 1926 amounted to $774,533 and exports to the United States during the same period amounted to but $125,165. We imported from the United Kingdom leather unmanufactured goods to the amount of $626,070, leather manufactured goods to the amount of $1,312,503, and boots and shoes to the amount of $748,441.

As regards the handicaps under which our shoe manufacturing business is operating, one is the small quantity of shoes made in Canada as compared with the large quantity made in the United States, and it naturally follows that with the mass production they have in the United States they can produce their goods more cheaply. One of the principal troubles to-day with the shoe manufacturing industry of Canada is the competition we are getting from England. The tariff on goods coming in from England to-day, as I have stated, figures out at only 15¾ per cent. The rate of duty is 17½ per cent less 10 per cent when the goods are imported through a Canadian port, making the duty 15¾ per cent net.

Another important point is that most of the raw materials that we use in our shoes, such as fine kid leathers, findings of all kinds, are subject to a much higher rate of duty coming into Canada than the finished product, that is the shoes coming into Canada. The tariff on these articles runs all the way from 15 per cent up to 35 per cent in some cases, and as the tariff on shoes coming in from England is only 15¾ per cent one can see in that case there is a higher tariff on the raw materials coming into Canada than there is on the finished product. By raw materials I mean the shoe manufacturer's raw materials, such as leather and other things, which in turn are the preceding manufacturer's finished products. There are several leathers made in Canada as good as can be purchased anywhere; but a great many lines, particularly in the finer leathers, and practically all the findings that go into shoes, cottons, are very much cheaper in England, and are subject to a tariff on entering Canada. So it can be seen at a glance how absolutely necessary it is that our shoe manufacturing industry should have reasonable tariff protection if it is to function successfully.

Adequate protection is essential to offset, first, the mass production of shoes in the United States, and, second, European competition, particularly that from England. During the past few years our imports from England have been increasing rapidly, as the figures I have quoted show. One part of these imports is men's fine grade shoes, and when comparison is made of the number of pairs of shoes of this grade imported with the number of pairs of a similar grade made here, the percentage of imports is very much greater than would be indicated on the surface by a comparison of the value of the shoes imported with the value of the total of our own production. The actual imports of men's fine shoes from England last year amounted to 242,000 pairs, while we made during the same period from 525,000 to 550,000 pairs of similar grade. It will be seen that the percentage of imports of this grade of shoe is very high, being practically from 35 to 40 per cent, instead of only 5 per cent, as is often claimed by people who talk about the imports of foreign shoes. Their figure is arrived at by making a comparison of the value of all kinds of shoes imported with the value of our total production. The shoes imported consist principally of two grades, a very good men's shoe and a cheap slipper from Europe, and from the United States a fair quality of women's shoe; whereas the total value of the shoes manufactured in Canada is made up of all kinds of leather footwear, such as larrigans, moccasins, and all the various kinds of men's, women's, children's, misses', boys' and youths', and all other kinds of shoes, both leather and canvas uppers, with only the exception of rubber footwear.

Labour costs in Europe in the shoe industry—in England, in fact where labour is the highest paid of any country in Europe—are only 40 to 50 per cent of labour costs in the shoe industry in Canada, and in Germany the relative labour costs are considerably less. Then you have to consider the fact that raw materials, such as findings, nearly all of which have to be imported, and some kinds of fine leathers which also have to be imported, are not subject to any duties when imported into England, therefore, the cost of their materials in that particular is considerably lower than in Canada. For these two reasons it is absolutely essential that a substantial tariff—a tariff considerably higher than it is at present—be imposed upon shoes imported from England.

The application of the British preferential tariff has dealt a very severe blow to the shoe manufacturing industry in Canada on account of the large imports from Great Britain during the past few years. There should be no preferential tariff on shoes coming in from Great Britain to Canada. The tariff should be equally as high as it is on shoes from the United States. It is argued by some people that higher tariffs mean higher prices to the consumer. I think I can assure you that in the shoe industry it would mean just the reverse, that, for instance, if the tariff on British shoes was increased it would enable the manufacturers of similar grades in Canada to reduce their prices. They would be glad to do so, as their output would be considerably increased by the elimination, or partial elimination of the present British competition. I think it will be acknowledged by every member that our shoe industry has been suffering severely on account of unfair competition, mainly from England, and it must be recognized by those who have shoe industries in their constituencies that this is a very lamentable state of affairs. I have some personal knowledge of this by reason of the fact that there is a shoe industry located in my county. It was established away back in 1867 and was prosperous until within the past five years, when it began to decline, and to-day instead of running at full capacity, as it had done during most of its existence, it is working only part time, and the employees are not receiving the wages that the company could otherwise afford to pay them if they had ample work. The only way to secure ample work in this industry is by giving it the protection it requires.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with respect to agriculture, in my county we have a good agricultural district, but it has been suffering for a long time, and I suppose my friends the agriculturists will say that it will always continue to suffer. It is the basic industry in the Dominion and one of the most important. It has been stated in the past by various Canadian legislators that too much could not be done for Canadian agriculture, and I believe that statement holds good to-day. There are different ways of helping agriculture. The federal Department of Agriculture is spending large sums of money annually in order to further its interests, and I have no particular criticism to make of this expenditure, but I have with respect to the disadvantages which our farmers are labouring under through being robbed of their home market, that market being taken away from them by the United States, Australia and other countries. I understand that for the year ending February, 1926, the agricultural and vegetable products we imported from the United States amounted to $96,359,445, whereas we exported to them but $63,549,695—a difference of over $30,000,000. I believe we should follow the motto in agriculture as in textiles that I have mentioned before as having been enunciated by the President of the United States. Although frequently quoted in this House I believe it is of sufficient significance to merit at least one more repetition. Speaking of agriculture,

Calvin E. Coolidge, President of the United States, said:

> We have built agriculture squarely into the structure of our protective system, and the American farmer must not be undersold at home by New Zealand mutton, Argentine beef, Canadian wheat, Danish butter, Bulgarian tobacco, Chinese eggs or Cuban sugar.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that we have been following since 1922 a most mystifying and peculiarly absurd fiscal policy in this country. In the light, knowledge and complete understanding of what tariff measures practically the whole civilized world has adopted since the war affording more adequate protection, we in Canada stand as the only country of importance adopting a policy of an opposite character, namely the lowering of our tariff barriers.

That the question of trade is one of international niceties and fraught with intricacies, we all admit. That we must adhere to some extent to international trends, to hold our own in international trade relations with the world, is axiomatic. The world's policy is against us in our costly experiment. We are a strong, virile and intelligent people; our country is teeming in a wealth of natural resources, the envy of civilization. A great deal depends on our international attitude under the world's trading policy as to whether we will be able to forge ahead in the race for international trade supremacy. With our country's fiscal policy out of step with the world; with our markets held for and being absorbed by foreign countries; with our industries shattered or stultified; with our exodus to highly protectionist countries. we should learn at least the simple lesson that, clever as we may be, proud and courageous as our government may wish to appear in the eyes of the world, we are as yet a small, struggling nation bent on building up our country. We should be following a main essential recognized world policy of protection that will inure to the safeguarding of our small and crippled industries; to keep our Canadians in Canada, to hold our Canadian markets for Canadians, and to protect all other interests. We fail in our purpose, in our obligations to the labouring classes, to our agricultural interests; to our industrial structure; we fail to promote our country's general welfare and to recognize our duty to posterity unless we pursue the course of recognized international advantage by safeguarding and protecting every legitimate interest in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, after all the sad utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite, it was a pleasure to listen to the cheerful budget deliverance of the Finance Minister (Mr. Robb). His message is full of promise. It entirely dispels the delusion that Canada is not now upon the wave leading to another great tide of national prosperity. The House was delighted to know that after meeting every financial obligation, even to the capital interest charges due the public on Canadian National Railways, we had been able to reduce the public debt during the year by $22,353,000.

There was one incident in the opening of the budget debate which I cannot help recalling. I may be wrong in my interpretation, but I give it to the House for what it is worth. At the conclusion of the address of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) when his leader approached him in congratulation, I imagined him as saying, "Well, friend, you did well; you made the best of a very weak case. But oh, Hugh, isn't it a pity that we did not get the chance to deliver that budget?" While I congratulate the hon. member for South Wellington on his remarks, they contained a serious weakness; a complete want of harmony with his leader. When he told this House that the fiscal policy of the King government was a departure from the settled fiscal policy of Canada, he knocked all the powder out of his leader's gun. If there is one thing more than another which the right hon. leader of the opposition has sought to impress upon this House and emphasize with all his vigour, it is "that protection is the settled fiscal policy of this country; that the King government had abandoned its low tariff policy; that it never was sincere in its anti-protection platform," and that "it dare not verge by one hairbreadth from the policy of protection." Therefore one of two things must be done; a house divided against itself cannot stand. He must either take his half-baked supporter out behind the door and apply the taws, or politely step down himself.

With some of the statements of the hon. member for South Wellington I at once take issue. The fiscal policy of the Liberal party was never a policy of protection, and is not so to-day. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not a protectionist, and when such an unwarranted aspersion is cast upon his memory, especially from such a source, I at once hurl it back. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was always the friend of the common people as against the encroachments of the specially protected interests. The Liberal party had been twice defeated on the platform of unrestricted reciprocity, once under the leadership of the Hon. Edward Blake and again under his own leadership, the people saying by their votes that they were trying to give too much at once. With such an experience after assuming office Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government proceeded more cautiously, through the medium of the British preferential tariff, and the following are some of the substantial reductions which have been made. I ask to be allowed to place this table on Hansard without reading it, so that every hon. member may have an opportunity of studying it.

May I also observe at this point that special trade agreements with individual nations are now so common as to have become the more popular means of encouraging international trade, and the present government has very wisely sought to break down international trade barriers by proceeding along these lines.

In addition to the substantial reductions which the Laurier government made in the tariff, it gave to this country a record of clean, efficient and progressive government, and, Sir, the brightest page in that fifteen years' record is the page which records the fact that that administration was asked to step down and out because its great leader staked its life on a question of high principle, without even a breath of scandal having been attached to its name. The fact that that administration was defeated fighting on the finest low tariff platform ever presented to the people of Canada is the pride of every Liberal, as it was the crowning satisfaction of our noble leader.

Following that record, we had a ten year term of Tory government in this country, of which the less said the better. Had it not been for the remarks of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) yesterday, I would have let it go in silence, but, Sir, after fifteen years of progress such as this country attained under the Laurier administration, and with only an increase in ordinary expenditure of some $4,000,000 per annum, their successors in the three years before the war increased the ordinary expenditure by over $36,500,000. They had become so extravagant that even their own political friends were saying freely that they were squandering the money of this country like a lot of drunken sailors.

Then came the war, and in its direction and prosecution, together with the debasement and desecration of the franchise through the medium of the War-time Elections Act and the Soldiers' Voting Act, both of which are the special children of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), we had the most diabolical government record of mismanagement and maladministration which ever stained the pages of Canadian history. In the face of such a record, and after the way they borrowed money and added to the national debt more than Canada's entire war cost and cost of demobilization, at a time when they could have and should have collected hundreds of millions of dollars in war time taxation—in the face of such a record, it is a wonder to me that hon. gentlemen opposite are not reticent, rather than charging this government with delaying the return of prosperity to this country.

]Mr. McMillan.]

As a result of the record of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power, no Canadian government ever assumed office under greater difficulties than the present King administration. Their first act was to bring order out of chaos. Their work of reconstruction was necessarily slow, and it had to be done with care. They had to face enormous annual expenditures of nearly $464,000,000, and they could only effect reform through lessened taxation and otherwise as their carefully planned gradually reducing expenditures would permit. But their record is good. In the four years time, without taking the National railways into account—I believe we should discuss the business of the National railways in this House, but I say again now, as I said in my remarks on January 21, that I believe we should keep the business of the Canadian National Railways separate from the general public business of this country—this government has been able in the four years to reduce the expenditure by $354,000,000 below the basis of the last year of the Meighen administration.

The very first act of this administration was a marvellous stroke of business for the Canadian people. In the appointment of Hon. P. C. Larkin as High Commissioner, this government obtained the services of a man of outstanding diplomatic and business ability. His record to date is one of which every Canadian may well be proud. While the Borden government had received the promise in 1917 that the cattle embargo would be removed, yet they sat on the fence until the Hon. Mr. Larkin went over there in 1922, and in eight months' time, on the 15th day of December, 1922, he was able to see the statute finally removing the embargo obtain the royal assent.

Apart from the ordinary duties to which the office of High Commissioner had previously confined itself, Mr. Larkin has been able to collect for the Canadian government $136,313,795 from different countries. These were debts which had been lying idle for three or four years before he went over, and our government was receiving neither principal nor interest on account of these debts. He has also succeeded in funding the $24,000,000 Roumanian loan and the $11,000,000 loan to Greece, on account of both of which we are now receiving interest and sinking fund payments regularly. These were debts which Sir Vincent Meredith, president of the Bank of Montreal, had considered hopeless, but the high commissioner has been able to secure in those, obligations which are as good as gold.

Coming now to the budget proposals and the reductions proposed in the tariff, I am not surprised at the calamity howls that have been going up from across the way. Why, it would not be the Conservative party if they did not indulge in that kind of thing, and the very fact that they offer such a half-baked amendment to the budget shows to us that they are not sincere in what they are saying. I go further. I believe that we will get ninety per cent of the people to favour these budget proposals. What did the Conservative party do two years ago? Their howling was the same when this government reduced the agricultural implement duties They said the agricultural implement industry was going to be destroyed, and the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) even went so far the other day as to say that it had been destroyed, and that there were very few mowers and self-binders being manufactured in this country now, but that we were supplying our needs from the United States. What are the facts? For the fiscal year 1921-1922, 1,271 mowers came into this country from the United tSates; for the twelve months ending February, 1925, only 396 mowers came into Canada. For the twelve months ending in February of the present year, only 353 mowers came into this country. So that we have an importation of 353 mowers in the year ending February, 1926, as against 1,271 in the year 1921-22 when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. When it comes to self-binders what do we find? For the fiscal year ending March, 1921, the imports of self-binders into Canada numbered 5,485. For the twelve months ending February, 1924, the number was 3,226, and for the year ending February, 1926, there was an importation of 2,118. But hon. gentlemen opposite told us nothing about the exports of agricultural implements from Canada to the United States. What do we find to be the case in this regard? In 1921-22 the export amounted to $583.005. For the twelve months ending in February, 1925, the figure had grown to $1,201,179, and for the twelve months ending February, 1926, it had increased still further to $2,324,073. These were exportations into the United States, meeting the competition of American manufacturers in their own country. Now let me take the total export of agricultural implements.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman has given the amounts in dollars. Has he the figures at hand showing the number of machines?

Mr. McMILLAN: No, I have not those figures at hand. The total export of agricultural implements for the year ending February, 1924, before the tariff reductions were effected, amounted to $9,028.596. For the twelve months ending February, 1926, the total export amounted to $13,516,407, showing that the manufacturers of agricultural implements were thriving as they had never done before.

It will be the same in the case of the automobile industry. We hear very humiliating references to the manufacturers of automobiles; a reference of that kind was made last evening to Mr. Henry Ford. May I be permitted to say that Mr. Ford is the kind of manufacturer that we want to see in this country? We want here men who are willing to rely on their own resources rather than on government favours. I am surprised to observe how hon. gentlemen opposite endeavour to decry the standard of the Canadian people. We have the best people in the world, able to meet competition from any country. We farmers are ready and willing to do that, and I believe that if the matter were fairly placed before them the majority of the people of this country would support that stand. We hear quite a lot about automobiles these days, but in my opinion at no distant date there will be more automobiles sold than ever. The increased production will give employment to more workingmen, a greater number of men will be engaged in the trade, and the same satisfactory results will be noticeable in the case of that industry as in the case of the agricultural industry today.

Coming to the matter of electric light plants for the farmers, hon. gentlemen opposite have not much to say about it. If there is one class in the community that are entitled to the benefits of electric lighting plants in their homes where they cannot be served by the hydro it is the hard-working farmers of the country, and more especially the farmers' wives. The present government is entitled to the highest credit for reducing the duties on the machinery necessary for power and lighting purposes on the farm. What are the facts in that connection? There was formerly a thirty-five per cent duty, but when we required repair parts we had to pay fifty per cent over the American price list. It was time to make a reduction of duty in that direction. Oh, the poor farmer! Hon. gentlemen opposite have been shedding tears over the state of the poor Ontario farmer, and claiming credit for the manner in which they wish to come to his relief. The hon. member for South Wellington, in his speech the other day, declared that the farmers of Ontario were thoroughly protectionist in sentiment. He made that statement in the face of the fact that the six townships in his own riding turned him down by the handsome majority of 1,709 votes, the largest Liberal majority, I believe, that was ever accorded in the history of those townships. When I hear hon. gentlemen opposite express so much solicitude about the Ontario farmer, I am reminded of the many arguments that have been advanced in this House since 7th January, which depend so greatly upon the little word "if". Let me say that "if" hon. gentlemen opposite could only shed enough tears to float themselves on to the treasury benches, the floor of this chamber would become a lake in less time than is occupied in making this statement. When we hear hon. gentlemen opposite arguing that we should impose high duities upon agricultural products in order to benefit the Canadian farmer it reminds me of the words of Thomas Carlyle respecting the corn laws of England, when he said:

> Impartial persons have to say with a sigh, that for so long back they have heard no argument for it but such as might make the angels and almost the very jackasses weep.

The arguments of hon. gentlemen are on a par with this expression. Perhaps the present moment is an opportune time to refer to a statement made during the general election by the right hon. leader of the opposition. The statement in question was that when two hundred thousand people left this country they carried with them a purchasing power in agricultural products to the value of $100,000,000. What does this mean? It means that every man, woman and child carries with them a purchasing power of $500 per capita. According to the press reports this statement, or its equivalent, was made at Wingham, Chatham, Charlottetown and Calgary, showing that the right hon. gentleman wished to give it nation-wide publicity. What are the facts? As I have already shown, in 1923 the total agricultural production of Canada was $1,342,132,000, of which $543,601,734 was exported, leaving less than $800,000,000 to feed our live stock and support our 9,000,000 people, which is not $500 per capita but less than $90 per capita. Is it possible that the truth in this case was not sufficiently high sounding to suit the right hon. gentleman's purpose, and in order to make it so he was willing to stretch the figures to over five times their breaking point? In view of such expressions on the part of these public men is it any wonder if the farmers of Canada pause and hesitate, and ask themselves the question: Must we, or can we, put any degree of confidence in these would-be champions of the farmer's cause?

Now, Sir, take that same production and that same exportation, $543,601,000 which is sent out to the markets of the world, where the price is set, and which regulates the price of the same articles at home. Knowing that, the most superficial observer ought to know it would make no difference to the price if the government put one hundred per cent duty on this class of products. You cannot through the medium of a high tariff increase the domestic price of any article of which there is a large exportable surplus. So that this whole talk about high tariff duties on farm products is a blind; and higher duties on small fruits and vegetables simply a lure to commit the Canadian farmer to sky-high protection for the benefit of another class. Small fruits and vegetables come in now under a 30 per cent duty. Is that not sufficient?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does the hon. gentleman not think the producers of these fruits and vegetables ought to be fairly good judges of what they want, and how is it they are passing resolutions and sending them in to the government asking for protection?

Mr. McMILLAN: I will deal with the vegetables first. They only come into the country in any considerable quantity at a time when the Canadian farmers are not putting them on the market. In such a sectional matter as that involving small fruits and vegetables, or any other sectional matter, the interest of the great body of the people should always be the paramount consideration. Any government worthy of the name will always take a national rather than a parochial point of view, and when it comes to the matter of vegetables we are shipping more vegetables to the United States by a considerable margin than they are shipping to us. For the twelve months ending February, 1926, our exports to the United States were as follows:

Potatoes (for 12 months ended Feb., 1926)..	$3,968,893
Vegetables (for 12 months ended Feb., 1926).	5,127,808

We imported from the United States $4,709,150 worth, so there is nothing to complain of in that. I say again that doubling the tariff duty on those articles which in the main do us no good will be used as a justification to double the duty on manufactured goods, and that will have the effect of increasing the price to the farmer himself and to the general consumer of this country.

Then my hon. friends talk about raising the duty. Have we heard one of them say in all their arguments that they desire higher duties on the goods which the manufacturer requires in his business? Not at all. In that respect they are absolute free traders, in that they want everything they require at the lowest possible price; but they are human, intensely human in that when it comes to their finished product they want to get the highest price they can, even to the extent of persuading the government to jack up the tariff to such a degree that like productions from other countries will not come in and as a consequence they will have the consumers of this country entirely to themselves. That is high protection such as this country will have if we ever allow hon. gentlemen opposite to take their seats on the treasury benches, but that is what we are going to prevent. Whenever a government begins to hand out special favours to any line of industrial activity through the medium of high tariff duties, they do an injustice to those who buy those goods; those people become dissatisfied and come to the government asking them to increase the duty on their finished products, and thus the vicious circle is begun and continued by one class of producers or manufacturers handing the increase on to the other. It goes all the way round the board until it comes back to the farmer, who cannot pass on his increased cost of production because the price of his goods is set in the markets of the world. So that it is a burden on the farmer which he cannot possibly remove, and it is also a burden on the working class consumer, who is required thereby to pay more than he ought to pay for every requirement on which high duties have been levied.

If there is one class in this country more than another to which the government should give special consideration, one class more than another to which they ought to be considerate, it is those God-fearing men and women who pledge themselves to each other for life, who establish homes, who raise families and bring them up to become the best citizens of the world. Such families are usually found upon the farm and among the middle and struggling classes of our people. To that great class a system of high protection is untrue. It places an unjust burden upon every home and family in the land in the unduly high prices they have to pay for every requirement upon which high duties are levied. Never was this fact more strongly impressed on me than on November 29, 1920, in London, Ontario, when I sat for hours while three members of the late Meighen government—sworn ministers of the crown, sworn servants of the people, sworn to do justice by all the people—sat fairly courting the evidence of men representing one manufacturing concern after another, as they came forward pleading for higher duties upon the goods they produced—and for what purpose? Simply to enable those manufacturers to put their hands a little deeper into the pockets of the people and take from them more than they ought to take for the goods they must buy.

That, Sir, is undoubtedly what high protection does, and assuredly what many producers will be allowed to do if the present Tory party are ever allowed to take their places upon the treasury benches of the government of this country.

Mr. MULLINS: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. McMILLAN: Yes.

Mr. MULLINS: No doubt the hon. gentleman is a farmer. When the duty was 27½ per cent you could buy a binder in Manitoba for $150, and to-day, when the duty is 6 per cent, you are paying $258 for a binder in Manitoba.

Mr. McMILLAN: If my hon. friend would study economic conditions for a moment, he would know better. By his question he reveals the fact at once that he does not know anything about the principle of economics, otherwise he would not have asked it.

Mr. HOCKEN: What is the answer?

Mr. McMILLAN: The answer is that economic conditions to-day are not at all what they were at that time. We have heard a great deal about foreign countries imposing high tariff duties and thus preventing us from trading with them and possibly I shall have something to say about that before I conclude.

Place me in a position whereby I can take a little toll from every individual in a community and I will rapidly become wealthy. It will take all the people in the community some little time to realize that my additional wealth is obtained at their cost, that they are being robbed for my benefit. That is precisely the way in which high protection acts, and if we ever allow these people to get on to the treasury benches of this country, that is what will occur. I say again: One class above all others to which a high protective tariff is unjust is the working classes and the farmers, so that the Liberal party are fighting the cause of the common people as against the encroachments of the specially privileged interests, fighting the battle of the struggling fathers and mothers who are busily engaged in providing their families with the necessary food and raiment which ought to be given to them at the lowest possible price, and which, if this government continues to remain in power, will be given to them at the lowest possible price consistent with the revenue requirements of this country.

I have often heard it said that high tariff duties will give the artisans, the mechanics and the working classes better wages. Such is not the case; it is not borne out by the facts. I am not going to put the statements on Hansard again, but if hon. members will turn to page 329 of Hansard of the present year they will find out what the heads of labour organizations and the president of the textile trade in the United States tell us regarding conditions in the textile trades in that country of high tariffs. We are also told that we ought not to encourage the importation of foreign manufactured goods; that we should produce at home everything which can be produced at home and so to such a degree discourage international trade. No greater mistake could be made by any Canadian government.

I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and the debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, April 29, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED

Annual Report of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada for the crop year ended October 31, 1925—Mr. Robb.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

REMISSION OF PENALTY

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard) moved:

That subsection (c) of section (3) of rule 89 by which a penalty of $200 is imposed on private bills presented to the House after the twelfth week of the session be suspended for the present session of parliament, and that pursuant to the provisions of rule 115 this motion be referred to the select standing committee on Standing Orders for a report thereon.

Mr. ROBB: Explain.

Mr. CLARK: Briefly, the explanation is this. No private bills at this session were filed within the prescribed time. The matter was referred to the private bills committee, and that committee recommended that the penalty of $200 be remitted. However, they overlooked this phase, that when bills are presented there is another penalty payable, and it was purely an oversight on the part of the committee not to recommend that this penalty also be remitted. I might say that those bills which have been presented might still be withdrawn and taken to the Senate and thus escape this penalty. The penalty has been withdrawn in one respect, and I suggest there is no reason why it should not also be withdrawn in the other.

Motion agreed to.

REFORESTATION

Mr. WHITE (London):

1. What is the policy of the government in regard to reforestation?

2. Has any expenditure been made? If so, what amount?

3. Has any area been secured or set aside in any of the provinces for this work, and, if so, to what extent?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. (a) On the forest reserves in western Canada, comprising over twenty-two million acres, administered by the federal forest service, timber is sold under conditions designed to provide reforestation by natural regeneration. This method is much more economical and, in the long run, more satisfactory than clear cutting and artificial planting. Areas which have been entirely denuded by exploitation and fire can only be re-established to forest cover by seeding or planting, but, owing to the high cost of this work and the limitations of the forestry appropriation, only experimental plantations have been made so far.

The total area so planted to date is 325 acres.

The policy of the government is to extend these forest reserves so that eventually they shall include all non-agricultural lands capable of supporting tree growth, and to provide for their maintenance in a forested condition by natural regeneration, except where entirely denuded areas demand artificial methods.

(b) For the establishment of shelter belts on the farms of the prairie provinces, the forest service has for many years operated two tree planting stations, at Indian Head and Sutherland, Saskatchewan. These stations have a capacity of five to six million trees and cuttings per year. For encouragement in planting, this stock is distributed free, except for express charges; the consideration required of the recipient is that he shall prepare and establish the plantation along definitely approved lines, and that subsequently he will give it the necessary cultivation until it is fully established.

Over a period of 25 years, a total of 80,499,455 deciduous and 1,374,418 conifers have been distributed; 75,141 plantations, aggregating 34,053 acres have been established, of which 70 per cent have been successful, 15 per cent fairly so, and 15 per cent failures due to improper treatment.

(c) In eastern Canada the forest service has no administrative responsibility on crown lands, the latter being held by the respective provinces. However, for the purpose of advancing forestry methods, the federal forest service conducts experimental and research work relating to the regeneration of timber. In some cases this is done independently, in other cases in co-operation with the provinces or the industries.

2. The appropriation to the forest service in the last fiscal year was $1,185,000.

(a) $842,000 is spent in the protection administration and improvement of forest reserves. It is possible to segregate the proportion expended in reforestation as an entity, because the management of these lands, including fire protection, all have a bearing on reforestation.

(b) $75,600 is spent annually in operation of the tree planting division.

(c) $50,000 is spent in silvicultural research and experimental work in eastern Canada.

(d) The balance of the appropriation is absorbed: (1) Operation of the Forest Products Laboratories at Montreal and Vancouver, (132,400) these institutions carrying on research and tests on wood and wood products; (2) $233,611 is devoted to fire protection on timber lands of the west not as yet dedicated as forest reserves; and (3) numerous other activities of the forest service aimed at the promotion of forestry throughout the Dominion.

3. The federal government has full control of forestry matters in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the railway belt and Peace River block in British Columbia. In eastern Canada, permanent experiment stations are established as follows:

(a) Petawawa Military Reserve, Ontario, 63,360 acres; (b) Lake Edward Station, Quebec, 3,200 acres; (c) Lake Tremblant Station, Quebec, 1,500 acres; (d) Lake Kenogami Station, Quebec, 200 acres; (e) Bathurst Station, New Brunswick, 500 acres; (f) Cains River Station, New Brunswick, 200 acres; (g) Salmon River Station, New Brunswick, 400 acres; (h) Miscellaneous areas under temporary control only for limited and specific studies.

The foregoing relates to the work of the federal forest service. The provinces of British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia also operate services which exercise somewhat similar functions on the lands over which they have control.

CUSTOMS INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): May I inquire of the Prime Minister, in view of the most damaging evidence which has come to light regarding the conduct of officials high in the public service, and more particularly the members of the Civil Service Commission of Canada, what is the attitude of the government and what steps do they intend to take in this vitally important matter?

An hon. MEMBER: Well played.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What about the minister?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out that it is against the rules to bring before the House matters which are still pending before a committee until that committee has reported to the House. Bourinot, fourth edition, page 274, is clear on the subject.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES REVISION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Minister of Justice if the government have come to any decision in regard to the report of the Civil Service Commission on the revision of salaries which was promised some time ago?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): No decision has yet been reached.

AUTOMOBILE DUTIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Last Friday a large deputation from Oshawa and elsewhere came to Ottawa to interview the government regarding the proposed changes in the tariff on motor cars. Speaking to this delegation the Prime Minister is reported as follows—I quote from the Ottawa Citizen of April 24th:

> He assured that delegation, however, that the government had obtained expert advice before making the reduction and that the most careful consideration was given to the matter. It was not an impulsive act, he said.

In view of the great interest taken in this question throughout the country, I think it would be very helpful if the Prime Minister would make known the name of this expert and would lay on the table of the House all papers and documents connected with such consultation and advice. I would ask the right hon. gentleman if he will do this.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in answer to my hon. friend I would say that, as he is aware, there are in the departments of the government members of the permanent service who have over a period of years given a great deal of attention to, and are regarded as experts upon, tariff questions. One gentleman in particular, Mr. Russell, of the Department of Finance, is not only an expert adviser to this government, but was also an adviser of previous governments, and he has had perhaps a larger experience in tariff matters than any other individual in Canada. He is one of the officers I had in my mind when I told the delegation the other day that the matter had been carefully gone into by advisers. Mr. Russell has had conferences, I understand, with officers of the Department of Customs and of the Department of Trade and Commerce with relation to the many bearings of the tariff upon motors in this and in other countries. I am not in a position to say what documents or data he may have in his possession; I would have to ask my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) about that, but what I did say to the delegation, and what I would like to repeat here, is that not only this year, but last year, when the subject was discussed in the House, the government undertook at that time to have its officers look into the question of the duties on motor cars, and a considerable amount of data and opinion has been gathered in the interval. That is what I had in mind when I referred to the matter.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Would the right hon. gentleman be willing to bring down any papers there may be without my having to ask for them on the order paper in the usual way?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I said a moment ago, I would have to leave to my colleague the Minister of Finance the decision on that point.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): In view of the fact that a committee was appointed last year to study the rules of the House with a view to revising them, and that the committee brought in its report in the dying days of the session, may I ask the government if it is the intention to appoint a committee again this year to make a study of that report with the same end in view?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend that the government has thought of having a conference between the leaders of the different groups in the House as to the advisability of reconstituting this session a committee to deal with the matter of the rules of the House. Naturally we are not anxious to prolong the work of the session. but the government is of the opinion that it would perhaps help to shorten matters materially if the rules of the House were amended in accordance with some of the recommendations of the committee of last year The committee would have to be reconstituted to permit of action being taken on a report by the present parliament. When my right hon. friend is again in his seat I shall have a word with him concerning the possibility of agreement upon reconstituting the committee with a possible change of personnel.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, April 28, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned at six o'clock last evening I was in the act of saying that our Conservative friends tell us we should not encourage the importation of foreign manufactured goods, that we should produce at home everything which possibly can be produced at home, and so to such a degree discourage international trade. In my humble opinion no greater mistake could be made by any Canadian government. If there is one particular in which this government is entitled to the highest praise, it is its wonderful success in the healthy development of international trade, whereby it demonstrates its faith in the fundamental principles of true economics, namely, that in order successfully to build up markets abroad for our constantly growing surplus of Canadian production of every kind we must also be prepared to accept goods in return. It is a well know fact that high tariff duties will prevent international trade, and thus kill the opportunity for return cargoes, which must be encouraged to obtain reasonably low ocean freights. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) told us the other day that other countries of the world were imposing very much higher tariff duties, and in this way shutting us out of their markets. His statements are not borne out by the facts. When the hon. gentleman spoke the other day he quoted from a report published in 1924, although in saying that I speak subject to correction. Is he not living in the realms of antiquity! May I recall for his benefit the words of Thomas Carlyle when he said:

> The race for life has become intense. The runners are treading on each others' heels. Woe be unto him who stops to tie his shoelaces.

So that while my hon. friend has been tying his shoelaces he has taken too long to do it, and the world is going ahead. While the report from which the hon. gentleman quoted, according to my understanding, was published in 1924—

Mr. MANION: No, 1925.

Mr. McMILLAN: —may I read from a report, which I think is the latest authentic publication extant, the report of the Trade Commission, under the chairmanship of Sir Arthur Balfour, presented to the Baldwin government in June, 1925?

Mr. MANION: The report from which I read was published in 1925 also.

Mr. McMILLAN: While it is a fact that at the close of the war foreign countries, more particularly the countries of Europe, did impose high tariff duties, they are beginning to realize the mistake they made by so doing:

> The political settlement following the war nearly doubled the number of independent customs administrations in central and eastern Europe, and also that the administration of restrictions has been largely in the hands of comparatively new and inexperienced authorities; the burden thus imposed on trade will be readily imagined.
> Nor is it necessary for us to pronounce any opinion on the justification or efficiency of the measures taken during a period of abnormal crisis.

The report goes on to say:

> We therefore rejoice to note that there is now a tendency to recognize the evil effects of customs prohibitions as an instrument of fiscal policy, and to reduce the number of such prohibitions towards the minimum necessary to ensure public security, health and morals, and other objects of essential national importance. Since the latter part of 1923 great progress has been made in Czechoslovakia in removing restrictions, and that Hungary removed all her import restrictions at the beginning of 1925. The intention of Germany to sweep away the greater part of her prohibitions is expressed in the recent Anglo-German treaty. In France, Italy, Poland, and a number of other foreign states few obstacles at present remain to British trade arising from import prohibitions.

And then the report makes this statement:

> The conclusion emerges that, taken as a whole, the ad valorem incidence of overseas tariffs on British goods has slightly declined since 1914.

Then again:

> The board of trade calculation brings out clearly the remarkable fact that the main increases of tariff rates on British exports have been within the British Empire, where the average ad valorem incidence has risen, by nearly two-thirds, while in foreign countries, despite the great increase in the United States tariff, the average ad valorem incident has decreased by one-fifth, the net result, on balance, being a slight decline, as stated above.

The figures speak for themselves, and may I also say that aided by the hand of a beneficent Providence, and under the wise direction of the King government, fortified as it is by such a noble band of true and loyal supporters, not only to my right but behind the government, Canada's international trade will not refuse to grow. This is shown by the following figures: During the four years since this government assumed the reins of power our entire foreign trade has risen from $1,501,000,000 in 1921-22 to over $2,255,000,000 for the year ending March 31 last, or an increase during those four years under the present government of over $750,000,000. Furthermore we have the very favourable condition that exists to-day, a favourable trade balance of over $401,000,000, and what is still better, our Canadian dollar is away above par on the New York exchange. Consider this present condition of Canadian trade with what it was during the last full year of the Meighen government when we had an unfavourable trade balance of over $29,000,000, and the Canadian dollar was worth only eighty-five cents on the New York exchange.

We have heard a great deal from hon. members across the way regarding the unpatriotic and most radical expressions which emanate from our friends of the Progressive party. I have no brief for the Progressive members but I resent any insinuations that the opinions which they have expressed in this House will not tend in the highest degree towards the progress and betterment of this country. These men from the west—both Liberal and Progressives—as well as my hon. friends further to my left, represent the very soul of honour, and they have shown us that they have the highest and truest interests of this country at heart. No wonder when our friends of the Progressive party had a chance to come in and view the situation, and when they saw the band of men over here behind such a leader, they said: "There are the kind of fellows we want to co-operate with."

This question of international trade has become a burning problem in the United States of America. Many writers and economists there are beginning to ask how long a nation can continue to sell goods abroad without making purchases. The majority opinion is insistent that gold cannot be piled up indefinitely, and that pay must be taken in goods if the foreign trade of the country is to be maintained. As the situation in the United States stands to-day, it is only a question of time when they must radically change their present policy of high protection. They are faced with the necessity of holding their foreign trade markets and also with the greater difficulty of safeguarding some $9,500,000,000 invested in other countries, the payment of which can only be effectively secured through the medium of returning trade. The American government to-day is now spending over $3,500,000 annually to retain those foreign trade markets, and even at that it finds those markets slipping away. In view of the following facts:

1. That the American government will be compelled to open her markets to foreign goods, and materially modify her international trade policy in order to safeguard her enormous investments abroad.

2. That her people need and will continue to need in greater quantity much of our Canadian surplus of agricultural productions.

3. That freedom to that great consuming population with so many wealthy people would open the world's best market right at our own door.

4. That it would be a real solution of our economic maritime difficulties.

5. The fact that in the face of the high tariff walls now existing between these two countries, over $1,070,000,000 worth of trade out of our entire foreign trade of $2,255,000,000 is now done with the American people shows: first, that the people of both countries are desirous of encouraging further mutually beneficial trade, and second, it shows the power of natural trade laws, which is an indication of the only rational trade policy. Therefore, I urge the government to do everything in reason to cultivate the most friendly relations with the American government, with a view to arranging for favourable trade relations between the two countries whenever the opportunity may afford; and to that end, the Canadian government should have its trade representative in Washington. I urge this the more because in 1911 the United States government passed an act giving to Canada reciprocal trade in cattle, and a nominal tax of one-quarter cent per pound of beef. That provision remained in force for eleven years. In 1915 congress put cattle and beef on the free list, giving our Canadian farmers the benefit of that great open market. At the same time they placed wheat, flour, and potatoes on the tentative free list. Canada during those years never showed any appreciation, but kept an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent against American cattle and three cents a pound against American beef. After such treatment the American government quite naturally withdrew the provision. Of course Canada had then a Conservative government in power.

In the case of such an arrangement as I have indicated, care must be taken—and this government deserves credit for having taken every precaution—to preserve the health of Canadian herds. The department must also be ready to grapple with any destructive pests and to prevent them getting a foothold through importations. Consider the destruction the corn borer has wrought because precautions were not taken in time. There is also the bean weavil, and other pests, and it is the urgent duty of the government to go the limit, if need be, even to place an embargo on any foreign importations which might endanger the health and success of this profitable and most desirable crop.

The more we study the problem of Canadian agriculture and the vital necessity of placing and maintaining on the land a sufficient farm population, the more do we realize that the problem is basic and all-important to the progress and development of the nation. Although it may seem almost chimerical, yet what is needed in this country is such a readjustment of national ideas, as will place agriculture and its claims to the best intelligence and the highest skill of our people in the very forefront of national thought; and when this re-awakening is sufficiently emphatic, there will then be no more hastening away from the farm, but rather such a just conception of agriculture as our main resource and our most dignified and independent vocation as will attract to its just aim in the improvement of methods, the increase of yields and the clearing away of the unjust economic obstructions which lie across its path, the wisdom and the science and the willing hands of millions who may then obtain a just remuneration for their labour, and also be able to hand on to posterity an unimpaired inheritance.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): Before dealing with the budget—

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): The remark I would address to the House—

Mr. SPEAKER: I saw the hon. member for Toronto West Centre first.

Mr. HOCKEN: Before proceeding to discuss the budget, I would like to make a few observations in reply to my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan). I think I should in the first place congratulate him upon having the opportunity to make the speech he has delivered to us in this House. He is entitled to great credit for his perseverance over a period of ten years to enable him to enjoy this opportunity, and, possessing that Scottish quality of determination that we all admire, he finds himself to-day able to say things which are to me reminiscent of discussions I have heard in the general store at Seaforth. I consider the hon. gentleman in a class by himself in this House. He is a hard-boiled free trader, pretty nearly the only one in the House.

Mr. McMILLAN: Allow me to say that under present conditions it is quite impossible to have free trade in Canada.

Mr. HOCKEN: That does not alter my characterization of the hon. gentleman. He is a hard-boiled free trader, and if conditions in this country permitted it, we would have absolute free trade if my hon. friend had his way. Is that right? Silence gives consent.

Mr. McMILLAN: Would the hon. member like me to answer?

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN: If the hon. gentleman will only turn up the records of parliament when a certain large deputation waited on the government of Canada in December, 1911, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was Prime Minister, he will notice that when we asked for reductions in duties we said also that we were willing to resort to direct taxation, if necessary, in order to meet any reductions which we called for. Might I also say that I believe I was the first man to mention that at that convention?

Mr. HOCKEN: That does not alter my statement. Absolute free trade is the goal to which my hon. friend proceeds. As for direct taxation, I observe that now that we have direct taxation by this government, the particular class to which my hon. friend belongs is not notable for the contribution that it makes in the way of direct taxation.

Mr. McMILLAN: I am only sorry that it is so.

Mr. HOCKEN: What taxes his class pays are paid through the tariff, and if we remove the tariff, it would pay nothing at all.

Mr. McMILLAN: Oh no.

Mr. HOCKEN: I admire the courage of my hon. friend. He impresses me as being a man of convictions, and having the courage to stand up and declare those convictions much more freely and definitely than most men holding his views. I am always able to get along with a man who has convictions, and who will stand by them. It is the wobbler with whom it is hard to get along. My hon. friend charged this party with insincerity and I will deal with that a little later on.

He quoted Mr. Henry Ford as an advocate of free trade. Mr. Henry Ford has made about two billion dollars under protection; he has put himself into a position of financial strength that enables him now to say: I can make machines under free trade and I believe there ought to be free trade. He would do now what the British people did. In Great Britain they had protection until their industrial supremacy was established, and when that time arrived they said: Now let us have free trade. That is exactly the position of Mr. Ford to-day. I do not think a man who has made two billion dollars under a protective policy is one who can be quoted favourably as an advocate of free trade. I would ask my hon. friend: What did free trade do for the farmers of Britain? Is British agriculture in a state of prosperity to-day? Has it been in a state of prosperity for forty years?

Mr. McMILLAN: That cannot be answered in a word. The British farmers have been able to show to the world what we ought to do in regard to live stock production and they are not dependent on their own production of agricultural foodstuffs. For twenty years I went back and forth and I am conversant with conditions in Great Britain. The best farmers there are doing as I have been doing all my life. They have never been selling one cent's worth of agricultural produce, unless it is a little wheat. In addition to what they grow they are buying largely of foodstuffs from foreign lands and feeding animals on their own farms, in this way building up agriculture to the highest possible extent. The British farmers to-day are able to show to the world that they can lead the world, more particularly in live stock production.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think I ought to remind the hon. member that we are not in the corner store in the town of Seaforth and a discussion in parliament is conducted in a somewhat different manner. The fact however remains that about forty per cent of British land capable of being tilled is in grass, and there can be no doubt that the agricultural industry in Britain is, and has been for forty years past, greatly depressed. If free trade is good for the farmers in Canada, why is it not good for the farmers in Great Britain? The farmers of the United States are more prosperous in that most highly protected country in the world than the farmers of Great Britain. Those who argue in favour of free trade for the farmers ought to cast their minds a little further than the horizon bounded by the county of Huron. Let them look over the world and find out where the farmer is prosperous; let them view the tariff conditions under which those farmers live, and I submit it will be found that the most prosperous farmers are to be found in protectionist countries.

I was sorry to hear my hon. friend belittle the fruit and vegetable grower, who is a land holder of small dimensions but who is one who works harder than any farmer in the west, harder than most farmers in the east. The only way in which a man can make a living on a fruit and vegetable farm is by bending his back and cultivating every inch of his land. These men are maintaining families on ten and twenty acres. You can go through all the older part of Ontario and you will find fruit and vegetable growers with ten to twenty acres, maintaining as many people on that acreage as are to be found on 200-acre farms in other parts of the province or in the west. Surely that man, who works not part of the year but every day of the year and who maintains his family on a small acreage, is entitled to just as much, if not a little more, credit than the man who has a large area of land to cultivate.

My hon. friend became quite eloquent in discussing the burdens that are placed upon the poor working people of the towns and cities by a protective policy. How does he account for the fact that about ninety per cent of these poor working people, these poor mechanics and others with their little homes and families, voted for a protective tariff on the 29th October last? Throughout all industrial Canada with the exception of Quebec—and conditions there were somewhat peculiar, because the policy voted upon in that province was not the fiscal policy of the country at all—the issue was the tariff. In the province of Quebec the issue was conscription. In Manitoba, in the Maritimes, in Ontario and in British Columbia the issue was the tariff, and in every industrial centre the people voted strongly for the policy of my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen). If, therefore, the poor people for whom my hon. friend is so highly concerned know what is best for themselves, it is quite clear that they believe in the policy of protection. My hon. friend may talk free trade in this House, as Michael Clark of Red Deer, did, session in and session out, and he will make no impression upon the government nor upon the country. The people who have the intelligence to see the situation in which we are placed, alongside a highly protected nation competing with us in so many things, will agree that the protective policy is necessary for Canada.

The budget has evidently been prepared for the purpose of impressing the public of Canada with the idea that this country is prosperous, and that it was prosperous last year. A substantial reduction is made in taxation, and it is attributed by the government, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), to the increased prosperity that prevailed in the year 1925. I maintain, however, that the country is not prosperous; it was not prosperous last year nor the year before, and it is not prosperous to-day. But to make my point I will take the figures of the railways. There is no better barometer of trade than the railways; if trade is good traffic is good, and if traffic is good the railways are prosperous. I find, as I have discovered myself, that business depression has reflected in the railway reports was more severe in 1925 than in 1924, and I take the ground that the relief in taxation afforded by this budget is by no means equal to the extra burdens put upon the people of the country by the government.

I take the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway and from it I quote the following:

> The gross earnings for the year increased $853,849 over those of the previous year. Working expenses, however, decreased $2,073,684, resulting in net earnings, before deducting fixed charges, of $40,154,775.

The report goes on to say:

> The relatively small increase in gross earnings is largely accounted for by the depression which existed in Canada during the first part of the year, the effects of which in general traffic were only overcome by the excellent harvest, to which is largely due an increase of $10,354,946 in the gross earnings during the last half of the year over the corresponding period of 1924.

But for the abundant harvest, therefore, the earnings of Canadian Pacific Railway would have been $10,000,000 less than the year previous. If that is an evidence of prosperity I should like to have it explained to me by some member who has a keener mind than I possess. It is to my mind absolute proof that the year 1925 was not equal to that of 1924. The same report goes on to say:

4 p.m.

> From a shipping standpoint the year 1925 . . . . was perhaps the worst of which there is record, and the result of the operations of your Atlantic and Pacific fleets were unsatisfactory, particularly in passenger revenue. The number of immigrants carried by all lines was less by over 40,000 than in 1924. Notwithstanding a decrease in expenses of $706,951 the net earnings from all traffic were substantially less than those of the previous year.

[Mr. Hocken.]

So that the opinion of this great railway company, upon whose board there are some of the ablest businessmen in Canada, is that the year 1925 was much less prosperous than the year 1924. I notice from the report that the grain traffic carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1925 was 263,000,000 bushels or 31,000,000 bushels more than in 1924.

I will admit that agriculture was more prosperous in Canada in 1925 than in 1924, but the fact is that general business suffered more serious depression. And that fact is borne out by the railway figures.

I take the Canadian National Railway report in which some interesting disclosures are made. For example, I find the following statement:

> The results for 1925 may be regarded as generally satisfactory and were due to a combination of increased gross earnings and decreased expenses. From January to June inclusive, the gross earnings in 1925 were less than for the corresponding months in 1924. The movement of the large western crop made itself felt towards the end of the year with a consequent increase in gross revenue of 3.9 per cent for the year. In the face of the decreased business which obtained during the greater part of 1925, every effort in the direction of economy was put forth and maintained throughout the whole of the year. These efforts resulted in a decrease in expenses for the year of $5,637,143.25.

So that it was due to the efficient management of the Canadian National Railways that the showing was so favourable this year. I find in the same report that the Dominion government's estimate for all grains in the Canadian grain crop for the calendar year 1925 was 1,126,113,000 bushels or an increase of 33.5 per cent in the crop. In other words, the farmers of Canada in 1925 had 375,371,034 bushels more than in 1924. That includes all grains, and it is fair to assume that on the average the grain crop would run about $1 per bushel. We may therefore fairly estimate that $300,000,000 was earned by the farmers of Canada last year in excess of the year before. Yet the railways in their general traffic did not do nearly so well as they did in the previous year. The report of the Canadian National Railways makes this statement: The grain movement to the head of the lakes was increased by 9.9 per cent, and in addition to that 9,000,000 bushels were shipped out at Vancouver. It will be found that this movement of grain accounts for all the increase that was enjoyed by the two great railway systems of the country. My argument, therefore, is that the traffic arising from sources other than the carriage of farm products was substantially less in 1925 than in the year before, so that in consequence we had a greater degree of general business depression last year. Take the passenger earnings of the railways. The passenger earnings of the Canadian National Railways decreased by $615,516. The number of passengers carried by the Canadian National Railway system last year showed a decrease of 1,032,641, or 4.5 per cent.

We all rejoice in the growing prosperity of our national railway system, but the credit for this belongs—I do not think the government will be bold enough to claim it—to the efficiency of the management and to the loyalty of the 95,000 employees. This efficiency is indicated by the fact that with an increase of $9,000,000 in gross earnings—all from the abundant harvest—there was a decrease of $6,000,000 in operating cost.

I should like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the depression in general traffic resulted in a decrease last year of slightly over 3,000 employees on the Canadian National Railways and of 1,500 on the Canadian Pacific Railway. So that railway employees to the number of 4,500 lost their positions, or, if not, they worked half or part time. When 4,500 men connected with these two great railway enterprises, employing in the case of the Canadian National 98,000 men and, I presume, a proportionate number for the smaller mileage of the Canadian Pacific, are without work for a year, or are working only half time, it cannot be argued that this country is in a prosperous condition.

But, Sir, I think of all Canadians my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) should rejoice most over the prosperity of the Canadian National Railways. As was pointed out by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), the right hon. gentleman had a desperate fight before he succeeded in merging the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern into one great national railway system. He was not assisted by hon. gentlemen opposite. I sat in the House during that period and I know the pessimism that prevailed among the Liberal party with regard to the future of the Canadian National Railways, and that pessimism has continued almost down to the present day. But in spite of all the opposition which he encountered the right hon. leader of this party perservered in his efforts and succeeded in establishing this great railway enterprise—a railway system run by the people and for the people. To-day, Sir, we see it rapidly approaching the time when, as he predicted, it will meet all its fixed charges, and become a valuable asset. Indeed, a prominent railway man has stated that it will be an asset equivalent in value to paying off our national debt.

Mr. Speaker, let me discuss for a moment or two the decrease in taxation. We are told that during the past fiscal year there was an increase in revenue of $29,965,000, in consequence of which the Minister of Finance is relieving the country of $25,000,000 taxation—entirely by reducing the income tax. But I should like to point out to the House that the collections of excise taxes last year amounted to $85,000,000. There are no reductions in those taxes. On the contrary, the sales tax was raised from 3 per cent to 6 per cent by the present government, and afterwards reduced to 5 per cent—at which figure it still stands—as against 3 per cent under the government supported by the Conservative party. That means the government since 1921 has added 40 per cent to our excise taxes. That percentage of $85,000,000 represents $34,000,000. So while the administration say, "We are reducing your taxes by $25,000,000," they stand convicted of having raised the taxes of the people to the extent of $34,000,000, or if we take their estimated figures for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, $95,000,000, they will collect an additional $38,000,000 of taxation during this period. And yet they ask for the applause of the people. Well, they are not much entitled to it.

An hon. MEMBER: They are getting it.

Mr. HOCKEN: I doubt that very much. A government which increases taxation by $39,000,000, and then comes seeking credit for a reduction of $25,000,000, is surely not in a strong position to ask for the thanks of the heavily burdened taxpayers of this country. What the government should have done in addition to decreasing the income tax—and that is something for which the country has been clamouring for a long time as being long overdue—was to cut off that 40 per cent of excise taxes. Then we would have had our taxes approximating very close to those which were collected by the Conservative government. The present administration put on the receipt tax and took it off, and then said, "What a good boy am I!" And that tax was entirely a tax imposed by this government. The cheque tax was added to enormously. Originally under the preceding government it was two cents on all cheques; under this government it is two cents on every fifty dollars. Therefore I submit that the excise tax collected last year was 40 per cent in excess of the sales tax collected in 1921.

I go further, Mr. Speaker, I say that of all taxes collected the most burdensome is the sales tax. It is felt most heavily by the consumer, it is felt in every home, and when it is finally paid it comes close to a 10 per cent tax on many of the necessaries of life. It is a more grievous tax to bear than the income tax—which does not touch the average home—or the tariff tax, which if it falls at all on the people at least gives them in return steady employment; and without steady employment, even if one had no taxes to pay he would still be poor indeed. So that the tax felt most seriously by the people is the sales tax, which this government has increased to an extent equivalent to an increased collection of $38,000,000. So I do not give them very much credit for that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the government is evidently expecting a great deal of gratitude from the people for reducing the taxes on automobiles. My friends to the left have been charged with forcing the government to make that reduction. For myself, I do not think that is the case. The Progressive party made its arrangement with the government at the beginning of the session, and the programme brought down in the Speech from the Throne is the programme which the Progressives insisted upon as being necessary to gain their support. But in connection with this reduction in motor duties something happened. There was some other influence brought to bear upon the government, or else the government was simply dealing with those constituencies in which motor factories existed in a fashion that was called by one of that party at one time "cold justice," or, in other words, getting even with them. I think my hon. friends to my left see the wisdom, and the fairness, of the amendment introduced by my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion). His amendment says that before this reduction is made it should be submitted to the Tariff Advisory Board. That is a board of so-called experts, and if they are not experts, they can get expert help.

Mr. EVANS: Why not submit it to the tariff commission of 1920?

Mr. HOCKEN: I would hardly expect this government to submit it to any body but one of its own creation. They would not submit it to the tariff board of 1920 surely; they would not have confidence in them. Apparently they have no confidence in their own board either. They have appointed three men of some eminence in the country, but they have not sufficient confidence in them to submit to them this very first tariff change that comes up for settlement. In the Speech from the Throne there is a direct statement that there would be no reduction in duties, nor interference with the tariff, until the board of experts had considered each proposed change and made their recommendations. But only a few days afterwards, comparatively speaking, the government go back on their promises and make a cut in the automobile duties the effect of which neither they, their experts, nor any other person can know without a most exhaustive and expert investigation—a cut that, in my opinion, is calculated seriously to impair one of the basic industries of this country. I submit to my friends of the Progressive party that a fair position for them to take is that this question of the duties on motor cars should be submitted to that tariff board. That is all that is being asked in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Fort William. That is not only fair, Mr. Speaker, but that is the record on which my hon. friends of the Progressive party rest to-day.

Mr. EVANS: That will come for the next cut.

Mr. HOCKEN: My hon. friend says that that will come for the next cut. If they can stand for this cut, why will they not stand for the next cut without reference to the tariff board? Why will they not stand for every cut? Is my hon. friend expecting any more cuts?

Mr. EVANS: Sure.

Mr. HOCKEN: What on?

Mr. EVANS: Automobiles.

Mr. HOCKEN: After automobiles, what next?

Mr. EVANS: Boots and shoes.

Mr. HOCKEN: And then what?

Mr. EVANS: You want to know too much.

Mr. HOCKEN: If my hon. friend knows what is going to happen, I would like him to tell me. He says the first cut is on automobiles, then there is to be a cut on boots and shoes, and then when I press him he says: I will not give the rest away. What the government is going to do in regard to other industries he is going to keep concealed in his mind.

Mr. EVANS: The government know.

Mr. HOCKEN: I would say that on this question my hon. friend ought to be one of the best posted men in the House, because he has given great consideration to tariff reduction, and he ought to be in touch, if not directly, at all events through his leader, with the tariff intentions of the party to which he is for the moment giving his support.

We stand to-day, Mr. Speaker, in the position where a great industry in this country, an industry with ramifications through all our commerce, is threatened with serious impairment, and it is threatened without investigation, without taking expert advice, and absolutely contrary to the pledges of the government as contained in the Speech from the Throne.

Just here, Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to the remark of my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), who charged this party with insincerity. Whatever faults we may have on this side, and I am free to confess that we are not quite perfect, we can claim this, at least, that our leader and his followers are sincere in the policies which they present to this House, and they have been all through their existence. What is the record of my hon. friends opposite? I am going to sketch it, Mr. Speaker, for the information of my hon. friend for South Huron. They adopted a platform in 1919 in which the party pledged itself to lower duties. They went to the country in 1921, and they sent their agents among the manufacturers, and told their candidates that they could assure the manufacturers that the duties would not be lowered. First they pledged themselves to the country to reduce duties, and then they go to the men affected and say: We will not reduce the duty. Then they come into this House and sit during two sessions and keep their pledges, not to the country—they break their pledges to the country—but they keep their pledges to the manufacturers. There follows another session, and then comes reduction of duty. They pledge themselves to the country to reduce duties, and they pledge themselves to the manufacturers not to reduce duties. Then they come into the House and they do reduce duties. If my hon. friends can find anything like sincerity in such conduct as that, I am at a loss to understand their mentality. We had the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, Mr. Marler, in the last parliament stand up in this House and declare that he had been authorized by the leaders of the party to tell the manufacturers in his riding that the duties would not be lowered, and he protested most vehemently in this House against the reduction of duties made in the first budget of my hon. friend the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). If that is not insincerity, what is? If that is not a wobbling course, what is a wobbling course? Then we come to this session, and in the Speech from the Throne the government says to the people of this country, to the manufacturers as well as to all others: Before any reduction in duties is made, the question of each industry shall be submitted to an expert Tariff Advisory Board. But scarcely is the ink dry on the document containing that pledge, before the government brings down a reduction of duties without submitting it to the tariff board. No such insincerity as this, Mr. Speaker, has ever marked the course of any government, or of any party, since confederation. The government stands convicted by the record, by the statements of their own members, and by their legislation, as a government in which sincerity has no place whatever.

I want particularly to say a few words in behalf of an industry that is making a losing fight for existence in this country. Three years ago I brought before the House this question of protection for the magazine and periodical publishers in Canada, not merely for their sake, Mr. Speaker, but for the sake of Canada, for the sake of the young men and the young women of Canada, to prevent the denationalizing of the spirit of Canada. The late Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, stood in his place in this House and gave his approval to the suggestions that I then made, but nothing was done. I have brought this question before the House since, but without having any relief given to this industry. A large deputation of men representing this industry came down to Ottawa this session, but they could not get a hearing, so that the government stand to-day with regard to this industry as treating it as one that is of no consequence in Canada.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend allow me to put a question? Does he say that a deputation came here and could not get a hearing?

Mr. HOCKEN: That is my information.

Mr. ROBB: Who is the informant?

Mr. HOCKEN: I can give the minister the names of the deputation. They could not get a hearing before the budget was brought down.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend allow me to make this statement. I recall that there were two gentlemen who, I am told, represented they were lobbyists paid to bring this matter to the attention of the government, and who camped on the doorsteps of ministers; but at no time has any delegation been refused a hearing by this government that I know of.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Who were the lobbyists?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is altogether too inquisitive.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not think that I am. The minister asked the hon. member who is speaking to give the names of certain persons. I am no more inquisitive than the hon. minister; my question was just as pertinent as his.

Mr. HOCKEN: The statement made is:

> We tried to make arrangements with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to bring a delegation down composed of representatives of such national bodies as the Canadian Authors Association, the Canadian Clubs, the I.O.D.E., National Council of Women, Pulp and Paper Association, Ink Makers Association, Engravers Association, Typographical Unions, Canadian Manufacturers Association, Associated Boards of Trade, Association of Canadian advertisers, etc.
> The above mentioned ministers could not give us an appointment until after the budget was down.

I propose to show the volume of American periodicals coming into this country and it is simply staggering. That volume has increased from $881,621 in 1912 to $2,776,885 in 1924 and 1925, an increase of 200 per cent in a period of thirteen years. There are over 300 of these publications coming into this country free, and there are over 20,000,000 copies of American made magazines and periodicals entering Canada every year. There are over 20,000,000 copies of twenty-five different publications coming into Canada yearly, while the total circulation of American magazines in this country is over 40,000,000. For every single Canadian magazine purchased in Canada there are eight copies of American magazines purchased. In addition to that, from fifteen to twenty million copies of week-end papers, and of daily papers, published in the United States are coming into this country with all the influence of Americanism which they can exercise. I will give you the Canadian circulation of one paper, a very salacious one. The Buffalo Times circulates 1,460,264 copies in this country every year. I have before me a piece of advertising from that publication which is of the most suggestive and dangerous character. It advertises that it is telling the story of the Princess Chimay and the Hungarian gypsy musician Rigo, with respect to whom an international scandal prevailed for years. This scandal, in all its nauseating details, is told by the gypsy musician himself. Is that the kind of stuff we ought to have in Canada? We are told that obscene literature can be rejected by the customs. Still, that paper is not barred, and there can hardly be anything worse than the gypsy Rigo story in the Sunday Times.

This tremendous importation of American magazines makes it impossible for Canadian magazines to live. One after another they are going out of existence and leaving the entire field to American publications. My information, and it comes from an authentic source, is that the Curtis Publishing Company of Philadelphia has opened six branches in Canada lately for promoting the sale of their Saturday Evening Post and their Ladies' Home Journal, and their objective is 500,000 copies of the former magazine every week. That is the objective of the Curtis Publishing Company, and that magazine comes into the country free. It comes in by reason of a conflict of two items in the customs tariff. But it is within the power of this government to cancel one of these items—item 184—and that would leave them in a position to collect 25 per cent duty on that magazine. I have a list here, a copy of which I presume is in the possession of other hon. members, of twenty-five different publications. One of these circulates 145,000 copies a month in Canada, another 113,000, the Saturday Post 101,000 weekly, the Cosmopolitan 69,000, the True Story—one of the most salacious of all the American magazines—90,000, the total being 1,002,000 copies. That is the kind of material coming into Canada without paying duty.

The Saturday Evening Post is a publication of 226 pages of which 40 per cent is reading and 60 per cent advertising matter. If that 60 per cent of this particular publication were sent in without the reading matter it would pay a tax, under our tariff, of fifteen cents a pound, but because it is mixed up with a certain amount of literary matter it is allowed to come in free. It is within the power of the Minister of Customs, with the consent of the government, to remedy this thing to-day, or to-morrow, by making an amendment to the customs tariff eliminating item 184.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would it carry the same weight then as the advertising matter?

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, it would carry more. Let me read item 169, of the customs tariff to the following effect:

> Books, namely: novels or works of fiction, or literature of a similar character, unbound or paper-bound or in sheets, but not to include Christmas annuals. . . . British preferential tariff, fifteen cents a pound; intermediate tariff 22½ cents a pound; general tariff 25 cents a pound.

That is the item under which this stuff should be imported, but it is not. It is classified under item 184 of the tariff which reads this way:

> Newspapers, and quarterly, monthly and semi-monthly magazines, and weekly literary papers, unbound. . . . . free

All that is necessary for this government to do is to wipe out item 184, which in any case absolutely contradicts item 169. The last named item says there shall be a duty on these things; item 184 says there shall not be any duty. But in order to make item 184 apply the Minister of Customs has to say that that book is not bound. Now that book is bound, but the Department of Customs says it is not bound. If they said it was bound they would have to pay a tariff of 25 per cent. It is bound as much as a great majority of magazines published in this or in any other country are bound. In my judgment it is a bound book, and should come in as a bound book, but the tariff under which it comes in says that if it is unbound it will come in free, and an arbitrary ruling of the department which has been in existence for many years makes it possible for the American publisher to flood this country with his work, to the detriment, not merely of the public, but of the men who turn out these magazines, of the workmen engaged in the work, and, more than anything else, of the people of Canada who are being Americanized by their reading matter more than by any other or all other influences put together.

But I was going to explain why Canadian publishers cannot compete. In the first place here is a magazine of 262 pages. Every cent of overhead cost in the production of that magazine is paid for by the American circulation. There is a cover that will cost them $1,000 to begin with. Then there are all the editorial expenses, the payment of the writers, all the cost of ilustration, of making plates and all that goes into the preparation of the magazine. This copy coming into Canada does not bear one fraction of a cent of all that cost. It is all borne by the two million circulation in the United States. This is the by-product of a great magazine factory. All the cost they are put to is the paper and the printing that is put in the magazine. The advertiser who pays $7,000 a page for his announcement makes up the difference between the actual cost of the paper and the price for which it is sold in Canada. How can a Canadian magazine compete with that? The publisher here has to pay the cost of editing, the cost of the writers of the articles, and what chance have the Canadian authors to get into Canadian magazines? None at all. They have to pay rent and taxes, pay for type setting and everything, and they have to do it in competition with men who do not have to pay any of these expenses. Surely it requires but a moment for a man of perspicacity to realize that while these conditions exist the Canadian magazine is an impossibility, and I submit the Canadian periodical press is very desirable. But these are not all the handicaps they labour under. The materials that enter into Canadian magazines are all taxed. If they import their paper it is subject to a duty of 25 per cent. If they import ink they have to pay 20 per cent. There is a duty of 20 per cent on engraving and a duty of 20½ per cent on art work. There is a duty from 10 per cent to 25 per cent on machinery and a duty of 15 cents a pound on advertising plates. All these things have to be paid for by Canadian publishers, while they are all covered by their competitors who circulate in competition with them in Canada.

Another feature of it, Mr. Speaker, which to my mind is very interesting is the effect it has upon Canadian goods. In this magazine I have in my hand we have ninety-four pages of advertising—some of the most alluring and attractive advertising that you will find any place in the world, all advertising American products and making a market in Canada for American gooods, and not a single Canadian manufacturer can place his advertisement in that magazine. He will have to pay the cost of two and a half million circulation to get 100,000 circulation. The thing is absolutely prohibitive to the Canadian manufacturer, and it works out, according to one manufacturer whose statement I have here, very injuriously indeed. I will quote from Mr. Newman, chairman of the Picton Board of Trade. He says:

> I might mention the county of Prince Edward is putting out about one-half of the canned vegetables manufactured in the Dominion of Canada. The county of Prince Edward puts out the best tomato in the world. Yet we are using ten or twenty times the amount of American-made Campbell's tomato soup, which our country is so famous for producing. The Canadian canners put up a tomato soup the equal of any other, but the American soup is purchased because of the large full page colour advertisements in the American magazines. The housewife looks at that, and it makes her almost hungry for tomato soup, and she goes down town without considering where it is made, or considering that she is employing American labour, and makes her purchase. Or she calls up on the 'phone, and orders Campbell's soup.
> I have no interest in any publication; the Prince Edward Board of Trade is not interested in a publication, but we are interested in that demand which American publications are creating in Canada for American-made goods, and the fact that Canadians are using so much of the class of goods which can be just as well purchased in Canada.

That is the effect, according to the chairman of the Picton Board of Trade, upon one industry. I do not think there is an hon. member in this House, who, from his own experience, does not know that what Mr. Newman says is absolutely correct, and if it affects all our industries similarly, is it any wonder that there is business depression in Canada? Our manufacturers cannot get their product advertised, while their American competitors have the most attractive advertising to be found in any country in the world, these advertisements are put into the homes of Canadians duty free and their goods are thus put into competition with Canadian goods. I have a statement here which says that over 25,000,000 pounds of advertising comes into Canada each year in these publications. If that came in unmixed with a little literary matter it would be subject to a duty of 15 cents a pound, but they mix it up, and they get an arbitrary interpretation of a certain clause in the customs tariff, and in it comes, to drive out of employment the workmen who would otherwise be engaged in such work, and to ruin scores of publishers, to my certain knowledge, who have endeavoured to establish Canadian magazines. In that way this whole country is left to the mercy of Americans promulgating their own ideas of nationality, and their own ideas, sometimes, of morality. I will quote another author, Colonel Owen Lobley, of the Holland Varnish Company, a large Canadian manufacturer who, speaking on the menace of imported advertising, said:

> Gentlemen, the popular foreign magazine is one of the most powerful and pernicious aids to peaceful penetration. Persistent advertisements attract the attention of our families to foreign products. Stories and articles are moulding the minds of our young people along American lines, and towards American ideas and ideals. What progress can a "Produced-in-Canada" compaign make against resistance such as this?

And I will give you a quotation from an American source, none other than J. I. Britain, United States Consul General at Winnipeg. Speaking of the American magazine advertising he says:

> The advertisements in these magazines are perused with considerable advantage to the advertiser as they keep before the public numerous lines of American merchandise.

These are authorities, these are men who have been up against it and who are entitled to speak. During the past few years these Canadian publications, in addition to others, have been driven out of existence: Canadian Weekly, Canadian Courier, Women's Century, Pictorial Review, Everywoman's World, The Listening Post, and a host of relatively smaller publications. The effect of this is understood by national and social societies of the country. The National Council of Women passed this resolution:

> Whereas, the efforts of the Canadian Magazine Association to have a duty placed upon United States magazines are entirely in line with the resolutions of the I.O.D.E. adopted at the annual meeting; be it therefore resolved that we, the national executive heartily endorse the action of the Canadian Magazine Association and pray the government to take early and favourable action thereon.

This is one by the Canadian Club:

> Resolved: That our executive is of the opinion that every effort should be made to encourage literary effort in Canada, and it is felt that a protective tariff on imported magazines, more particularly those from the United States, would result in lessening the importation of magazines many of which are of an undesirable type and would promote the production of Canadian magazines edited from the Canadian viewpoint.

I might go on with quotations from the Typographical Union, manufacturers' associations and others who are more or less affected by the flooding of Canada with this pernicious kind of literature. There is no desire, no intention to exclude, and a tax would not have the effect of excluding any good United States magazines. A duty of ten or fifteen cents a pound on the Century or Harpers' Monthly or any other good magazine would not be a serious tax and would not prevent them from coming into this country. People in Canada who want that type of magazine would be glad to pay for it, if in return they could secure the exclusion of the villainous literature that comes in duty free at the present time.

One thing I object to is the utter disregard of the present government for the welfare of this country as it is affected by this importation of United States magazines. I myself have been arguing the matter for four years. My arguments met with the sympathetic approval of the Minister of Finance, and I have yet to be told by any member of the government or any member of the party that the restriction of this flood of United States literature would be unwise. They all agree with me but they will not do anything. Surely this is something that should have the sympathetic attention of a government that wants to keep Canada a part of the British Empire, that wants to keep Canada from annexation to the United States. How long can we stand the literary penetration of this country by United States writers? That is a question that my hon. friends should ask themselves. How far is this responsible for the exodus from this country to the United States, which is painted to our young men and young women as a land of promise, with higher wages, better conditions and good times?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the hon gentleman aware that this question of the peaceful penetration of Canada by United States writers is sanctioned and countenanced by MacLean's Magazine, a journal which reprints stories and articles from the Hearst journals of the United States?

Mr. HOCKEN: I have no such knowledge, and I do not believe it to be so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is so. I can show the hon. gentleman the articles to which I refer.

Mr. HOCKEN: I know intimately the publisher of MacLean's Magazine and I know the proprietor; there is no stronger advocate of the duty on United States magazines than he is.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That may be, but he reprints stories out of Hearst's Cosmopolitan.

Mr. HOCKEN: The hon. member will find that they are written by Canadian writers.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, and he is using the clause in the Copyright Act by which he can get possession of these stories. He is paying royalties to Canadian writers who sell their product first to United States magazines, and why? Mr. Stringer and other Canadian writers can sell their stories to the Cosmopolitan and other United States magazines for five times the price that any Canadian publisher can afford to pay. Naturally they go there, and until the Copyright Act was changed and it was made possible for a Canadian publisher to get a license to publish anything that was published in United States and was refused publication in Canada, Mr. Stringer's work could not be published in Canada; it appeared only in the paper that bought it. But under present conditions of the Copyright Act, MacLean's Magazine or any other magazine can go to headquarters and say: I want a license to publish that, and the authorities of the Copyright branch will say: We will give you a license and you pay the author so much. It is possible now to force United States magazines to have these Canadian writers' articles published in Canada. What is the result? Canadian publishers do not have to take out a license. The fact that it is possible for them to get a license enables them to make an arrangement with United States publishers to get stories of Canadian writers.

Mr. BROWN: In this matter I have a good deal of sympathy with the position the hon. gentleman has taken; but from the standpoint of peaceful penetration of Canada with United States ideals is it not the case that the magazines that might most be feared for that reason are among the higher class of magazines, and those which from the point of view of their moral standard we would never think of objecting to; and that magazines that are really salacious in character and that we would like to exclude from Canada are not to be feared from that standpoint at all?

Mr. HOCKEN: I appreciate the attitude of my hon. friend. Would he call the Saturday Evening Post the better class of United States magazines? I believe my hon. friend is speaking of the Geographic or Harper's or the Century. All these papers sell at a price of twenty-five or fifty cents a copy and a duty of ten cents a pound would not mean anything to them at all. The publisher could absorb the duty, or if he did not, the Canadian purchaser would not object to paying it. We want those high class magazines in this country. I do not believe they are as dangerous as the Saturday Evening Post, for instance, which is the most dangerous from the standpoint of penetration.

Mr. BROWN: From the standpoint of morals?

Mr. HOCKEN: No, from the standpoint of making our young people believe that the United States is the place to live in. This is true not only of the stories but of a number of articles that appear in this magazine. Then there are the Cosmopolitan, True Stories—three hundred of them, all telling the same story: "Come over to the land of the free, the land of promise."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. member mind going a little further and specifying some of the publications which he would characterize as belonging to the class of villainous literature?

Mr. HOCKEN: I could give my hon. friend a long list of them if I had time, but for the moment I will mention Snappy Stories.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was thinking of others. One that goes into many homes is the Ladies Home Journal, which I presume is one of the outstanding United States publications. Does the hon. member regard that as undesirable, or not?

Mr. HOCKEN: That is not at all undesirable from the moral standpoint.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member, I take it, objects to certain American magazines on two grounds, first, for moral reasons, and secondly because they purvey American sentiment. Would he exclude papers of the type to which I refer?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not arguing for the exclusion of anything that is not obscene and immoral. I would admit the Ladies Home Journal, which is an excellent publication; but I do say that it ought to pay a tax. But one of the arguments against the Ladies Home Journal is that, to a larger extent even than the Saturday Evening Post, it is an advertising medium, and as such affects our business relations. I do not think that it is pernicious on the ground of denationalizing our Canadian sentiment. If it does this it is only to a very small degree. I repeat, I believe the Ladies Home Journal to be an admirable publication. But why should we not have a Canadian woman's home journal? As a matter of fact we have one published in Toronto by the Consolidated Press, and if that paper were not obliged to compete with the Ladies Home Journal it would do twice the business; it would be twice its present size and its advertisers would derive twice the benefit they now get from it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Could the hon. gentleman, as a publisher, give us an idea of what it would cost to produce in Canada a paper of the style of the Ladies Home Journal?

Mr. HOCKEN: And size?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. HOCKEN: It could be nothing but a rough guess, But I should say that to produce 100,000 copies it would cost probably $50,000 or $60,000, and you could not raise the price of advertising in Canada to enable you to secure that revenue. The manufacturers in Canada could not afford to pay the advertising rates that would make the publication of such a magazine feasible, whereas in the case of the Saturday Evening Post the advertisers pay as high as $7,000 and $8,000 a page. Why, it was computed that in one issue of that journal a short time ago there was over $1,000,000 worth of advertising. It was a little larger in volume than the magazine I have here, and the rates were so enormous that in that one issue the advertising amounted to the total I have mentioned.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In that case a magazine of that kind, if produced in this country under present conditions, would have to be sold at thirty or forty cents per copy.

Mr. HOCKEN: It could not be sold for fifty cents in Canada, taking all overhead expenses into account.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: One more question and I am through. Do I understand the hon. member to advocate putting on such a tax as would raise the price of a publication of that description to thirty, forty or fifty cents?

Mr. HOCKEN: As my hon. friend will see in Hansard, what I have advocated is that section 169 of the tariff be enforced, and that we be given 25 per cent protection. However, if my hon. friends opposite are not willing to concede 25 per cent, then they might give us 15 per cent or 10 per cent. At any rate, let them give us something, so long as they acknowledge and adopt the principle of protecting the Canadian publisher, not only for his own sake but—because this goes much further than the welfare of the individual—for the good of Canada as a whole. Those men who have money invested in Canadian magazines can withdraw it and go into something else, as in fact they have done. They do not suffer materially; they may lose some money, but they can go into something else. But it is the great masses of the people that suffer, and that is my principal objection.

I have a whole mass of material disclosing the views of Canadian newspapers, and while I will not read very extensively from it, there are two or three things which I think should certainly be put on Hansard. For instance, I take the following from the Vancouver Morning Star:

> The Morning Star in a recent cartoon, pointed out how the very children of Canada are being led away across the border, in their mind at least, by a new Pied Piper in the guise of the cheap American magazine. The menace of this seduction to national distinction, national aspiration, national pride, and even national independence is serious. The mentality and morale of impressionable young Canadians, which should be kept clean and apart to their own land, is being merged in the reeking gas cloud of the lower Americanism. Crime featuring and salacious magazines from across the line are flooding every Canadian news-stand and book shop so that one is hard put to it in the pile of them to pick out a single copy of a Canadian, or even of a British magazine. Something should be done and done quickly to dam this trash which is flowing over the border; demoralizing trash which is deplored by the best type of Americans as well as by Canadians.

I went into a news-stand in Toronto on one occasion and asked for a copy of MacLean's magazine, and although the storekeeper had not a single copy in his place he had, stretched across a large frame on one side of the store, about 100 American magazines. He had not a single Canadian magazine on sale, because he could make more profit out of his salacious literature.

An hon. MEMBER: Where was that?

Mr. HOCKEN: In my own city, but I presume the same is true everywhere. I have figures here showing that some 2,000 copies of one magazine alone are sold in Ottawa. The newspaper goes on:

When Canadian politicians adopt the new national policy of preventing the export of raw materials to American manufacturers in order to make them make them in Canada then Canada will have, among other things, the best and cheapest paper in the world, because she has the best and cheapest supply of wood pulp.

The article is a column long but I will not read further from it. Let me now quote a few words from Saturday Night:

The Canadian field for Canadian periodicals and in a measure Canadian newspapers is being lost. That is to say our periodical press is being strangled to death by United States competition. There are printed today in Canada a far less number of publications than was the case when our population was half of what it now is, and those that are left are struggling for an existence for the most part. . .

Slowly but surely Canadian publications are being crowded to the wall, and each day the position becomes worse. United States periodicals are practically given away to the readers in Canada, the national advertisers, with headquarters in the United States, footing the bills. Presumably they get their money back by the sale of American goods to Canadians.

A certain United States weekly publication now making a drive for more circulation in this country is selling for $2 per annum, of which amount $1.80 goes to the canvasser. The white paper in this journal could not be bought in the open market for less than ten cents per copy—

Whether they are referring to the Saturday Evening Post or not, the fact is that there is ten cents worth of paper in this issue I have here.

—to say nothing of the many dollars expended in one way and another before the finished product reaches the reader. And our postmen are becoming round shouldered carrying them around.

What are we going to do about it? Why, nothing of course.

It really looks as if the editor of Saturday Night were in the confidence of the government. They are not going to do anything about it.

It would be a burning shame to place, for instance, a tax on the advertising in United States periodicals coming into Canada.

I think the editor is ironical, Mr. Speaker.

Of course, it would save many millions of dollars now expended for goods, mainly luxuries, made in the United States, and it would add millions of dollars annually to our wage bills, because we could then employ our own people in place of driving them away. Somebody might even have to start a new ink company, or a new type foundry, or a new paper mill or two. And lastly, but not least, we might teach our people to be steadfast Canadians in place of secessionists.

In a generation simon pure Canadian publications, with very few exceptions, will be scarce as the dodo. They simply cannot survive under such conditions.

But I want to give another quotation. This is from the Globe, that old Liberal journal which is eighty years old and still going strong. It says:

Sooner or later the Canadian government will be obliged to take cognizance of the vast circulation of United States publications in this country. They are strangling the publishing industry here, depriving Canadian workers of millions of dollars' worth of employment; they are "Americanizing" Canada by means of the reading material offered; they must have a very grave effect on Canadian industry in general, owing to the tremendous amount of advertising of United States products carried in their columns.

The Orillia Packet says:

By all means let us have a duty on the American publications that are flooding Canada, to the extent of more than a million copies a week. It is one new tax to which no objection can be taken.

The Kitchener Record, with which my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) is more or less closely connected, says:

Acting upon the contention that the Canadian publishing trade is suffering from outside competition, the delegation suggests the imposing of a tariff of 10 cents a pound on all periodicals and week-end magazines entering Canada. It is estimated that the consequent revenue would be approximately $5,000,000.

Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance ought to listen to that. Does he want $5,000,000 extra revenue?

Mr. ROBB: Certainly; and I must get $5,000,000 additional revenue if I am to meet the demands of the city of Toronto for new federal buildings.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, the city of Toronto, through its representative, is giving my hon. friend the means of getting the money, and having done that I think there should be no objection to his spending it in that city.

Mr. HOWARD: Does my hon. friend know how many tons of Canadian newsprint are used by the American papers that come into Canada?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am dealing with periodicals and magazines which do not use newsprint. But, Sir, $5,000,000 is a lot of money and we ought to have it.

Now, I am taking up more time than I expected to—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. HOCKEN: —but there are other sides to this question that I think ought to be dealt with. I have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a statement prepared by Dr. Bell, of the provincial Department of Public Health, Ontario, showing that in March last—only a month ago—3,454 native born Canadians applied to him for their certificates of birth in order to enter the United States. He sets the figures out by weeks:

For the week of March 1..	708
For the week of March 8..	716
For the week of March 15..	756
For the week of March 22..	812
For the week of March 29..	452

That gives a total for the month of 3,454 native born Canadians who secured their birth certificates in order that they might go to the United States to live.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Does my hon. friend notice that the number was considerably less after the budget was brought down?

Mr. HOCKEN: What was the date?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I cannot give the exact date at the moment. It was late in the month.

Mr. HOCKEN: My recollection is that it was during the month of April.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): Yes.

Mr. HOCKEN: These figures are for the month of March.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): I was referring to the last week.

Mr. HOCKEN: The last figure of 452 was only for part of the week ending March 29.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Long Lake): The good news of the budget had gone before.

Mr. HOCKEN: How did it get out?

Mr. MANION: A lot of our people had gone also.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Don't wory; they are coming back.

Mr. MANION: You cannot find them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are showing up everywhere.

Mr. HOCKEN: Here is something, Mr. Speaker, that the publishers of Canada have reason to feel aggrieved about. I have a statement signed by the secretary of the Magazine Publishers that it was known in the United States two weeks before the budget was brought down that there was to be no change in the tariff so far as American magazines were concerned. Yet in Canada the men interested in this particular industry could not get a word of information. The publishers' organization in the United States printed a bulletin weeks before this tariff was brought down in which they said they had it on reliable authority that no tax of the kind was going to be imposed. There is the printed document.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will allow me—has he read in the Financial Post of last week the compliments paid to the officials of the Finance and other departments of government because there was absolutely no leak, no person knew what was in the budget until it was brought down?

Mr. HOCKEN: I can only conclude, Mr. Speaker, that the American publishers have a special aptitude at mind reading, for they issued a bulletin in which they indicated something which absolutely turned out to be correct.

Now, Sir, the moral effect of this flood of magazines is something which we ought to take cognizance of. In this connection let me quote from a letter which appeared recently in the Montreal Gazette, signed by "A Catholic Reader". He says:

> It is a pleasure to turn to the fine, public-spirited letter of a Montreal physician, Dr. Korenberg. As a medical man, he states: "Nothing can so easily and surely demoralize our children (and grown-ups) as constant reading of scandalous and filthy literature. Constant reading of such journals by our young generation, and by our older generation as well, will tend definitely to mould their character, their opinions and their outlook on life in a very undesirable (to put it mildly) cast."

Now, what have the Americans to say of their own magazines that are flooding this country? This is written by Frank R. Kent, the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, and it appeared in The Independent, a journal published in Boston:

> "And not only have we produced a great smut crop of a coarseness peculiarly our own," he says, "but the more obscene of the French papers have now been translated into English and appear on the news stands along with the originals. When you stop to analyse, scrutinize, and check up, there is here presented more reason for apprehension as to the future than any other single symptom in America to-day.
> "The place to fully appreciate its proportions—"

And this applies to Canada quite as much as to the United States.

> "—is in the smaller cities and towns, with populations ranging from 20,000 up to 100,000—towns, for instance, like Fairmont, West Virginia—"

Or we might say Hamilton, Ontario:

> —where one news dealer sells 2,200 copies of every issue of a single monthly, exclusively devoted to stories of sex experiences and the nude in art; or like Steubenville, Ohio, where out of 110 periodicals on sale in a single store, 60 were either out and out a prurient type or bordered on the libidinous line.
> "It is not the cheap and sexually suggestive fiction magazines, although these are many and rotten, that constitute the real shock troops of these paper battalions of literary indecency so much as the smaller and more compact non-fiction affairs frankly and exclusively given over to obscenities. Some of these are published in Chicago, some in Philadelphia, but most of them in Newark, New Jersey, and are issued by the same individuals under different corporate names. They mainly contain a rehash of the dirty stories and jokes told in the smoking rooms of pullman cars or hotel lobbies.
> "If you want to know whether these things are widely read, all you have to do is check up with any intelligent news dealer in any city, big or little, in any part of the country. The candid ones will not hestitate to tell you, not only that the demand for this sexual literature is enormous, but that there is no such thing as oversatisfying it. Those who buy one of these periodicals will buy every similar one on sight. The more you feed it, the keener it gets. That is why there is a constantly increasing number of these things. As fast as one lewd venture is launched and successfully established, a little twin brother, under a different name and in a dress of a different colour, is sent out and is equally successful with the same clientele."

That is the kind of stuff a large part of which is coming into Canada free, because of the conflict in the items in the customs tariff, and that is the kind of stuff that our young people should be protected from. If it is not the duty of the government to protect the people of this country from that kind of thing, I would ask the members of the administration, who else will do it? How is it to be done? To my mind, it is one of the most important duties the government has to perform.

I go this far, Mr. Speaker. If there is one thing under modern conditions that a nation should endeavour to do, it is to establish and develop a periodical press. I base my argument, Sir, upon this fact, that to a very large extent the periodical press has taken the place of books. A very much larger and increasing proportion of our people all over the country are reading magazines and periodicals of various kinds. The amount of book reading is less in proportion to-day than it ever was, and it is due to the periodical press taking the place of books to a very large extent. It is possible for a periodical press to develop national sentiment in a way that no other form of publication can do. It goes out weekly or monthly, it contains articles building up the national sentiment, strengthening the national spirit, and it goes to the people who read it this week, and next week, and the next week, all through the year. Like drops of water constantly falling upon a stone, it makes an indelible impression. The young mind filled with national sentiment built up by the reading of a Canadian periodical press would remain forever Canadian, but if, instead of being cultivated by a Canadian press, the young mind is cultivated by an American press, it acquires American ideas instead of Canadian ideas. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the young people of Canada to-day know more about President Coolidge than they do about the right hon. leader of this government. The name of Mackenzie King is not in literature that is read in Canada as much as the name of President Coolidge.

An hon. MEMBER: Not in Ontario?

Mr. HOCKEN: Not in any part of the country. Besides, Mr. Speaker, this is not a joking matter, as I see it. I may be all astray in my opinion, but to my mind this is one of the most serious questions that a government can take up. If we are not to protect the young people from obscenity, which is our duty; if we are not to make laws that will develop and strengthen national sentiment, how can we expect that Canada will remain Canada? If we want to protect our people and provide against a secessionist sentiment, we must get our young people to learn what Canada means to them, what we have in Canada, and why Canada should be built up. Teach them that Canada is as good a country to live in as there is in the world, if not better. But we are not teaching them that, and we are allowing our neighbours to the south to teach them something entirely different.

I say, Sir, that the periodical press occupies a position in the world to-day that it never did before, and Canada has no periodical press. Canada ought to have one, and Canada can only get one if there is a certain degree of encouragement given in restricting the flood from a neighbouring and a foreign nation, and then providing, so far as can reasonably be provided, for a flood of Canadian periodicals.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask a question? The hon. gentleman has been very fair to us so far, and I hope he will extend this courtesy to me. A moment ago I asked a question with respect to stories appearing in Hearst publications being reprinted in MacLean's Magazine. The hon. member replied that MacLean's reprinted only stories by Canadian authors. The hon. member was wrong. I have in my hand MacLean's Magazine of the issue of March 15, in which there appears a story entitled "Here Comes the Bride," by Fanny Hurst, a story of the Bowery, the East side of New York City, reprinted from the Cosmopolitan.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not acquainted with the lady. I do not know whether she is a Canadian or not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am informed that she is a United States Jewess.

Mr. HOCKEN: If it is a particularly fine article and it does not affect our national spirit I do not see why MacLean's should not publish it. But Mr. MacLean's idea, as expressed to me personally, is to develop and encourage Canadian writers. By reason of the Copyright Act you can get the works of Canadian writers, and so far as possible, he gets Canadian writers in his paper in every case rather than American writers. He is a strong Canadian, a strong imperialist, and he as much as any man in this country is trying to stem the tide of this avalanche of American publications.

I want to point this out to the House: We are a young country, we are yet in the formative stage. Our future depends upon the present and the rising generation, more so perhaps than is the case in most other countries. That makes it increasingly important for us to see that the present and the rising generation are not denationalized in sentiment, but that on the contrary they should have their Canadian spirit and Canadian sentiment highly developed. So that we are perhaps in a different position from any other country in the world in that respect. We are to-day laying the foundations, and they must be laid in the minds and in the hearts and in the intellects of the people; that is the only foundation for a nation. I venture to say, Sir, that the province of Quebec is the only province in the confederation that can be said to-day to have its ideals fixed, and that is due to the fact that it has been made impervious to American influences. Premier Taschereau told us a short time ago that the attitude of the people of Quebec to day was the same as it was three hundred years ago. That makes them impervious to this Americanizing. Then again, all these magazines are printed in English, which is not read fluently by a great many people of the province of Quebec. Therefore these American magazines cannot permeate that province in the way in which they can all the rest of the provinces. But every other province in confederation is in a state of flux so far as its national sentiment is concerned. That sentiment is not fixed, and it is being fed by the most pernicious anti-Canadian literature that is printed anywhere in the world. We are rapidly imbibing American ideals, and that must inevitably weaken and ultimately destroy that definite Canadian sentiment which it is our duty to strengthen. If Canada is not to be absorbed by the republic our government must take measures to protect our people from this infiltration of Americanism.

We all deplore the exodus of our young people across the border; it is an economic loss that no country can stand for any length of time. The first members of a family who cross the line act as a sort of magnet to all the other members of the family, drawing them at one time or another to the substantially better conditions that are said to prevail in the United States. In my opinion the flood of American periodicals that enter Canada is doing nothing more or nothing less than rob this Dominion of its native-born citizens who have free and unlimited entry to the republic. All they have to do is to get a certificate of birth, and over they go without any further question. We are being left with a population born elsewhere than in Canada, much of it very desirable, some of it not quite so desirable. In any event a Canadian-born citizen has greater potential value to this country than a man from any other part of the world. If there is any of the population we should endeavour to preserve, it is the native-born Canadian, and we are not doing that.

I am not arguing that our relations with the United States should be any other than intimate and friendly. We have lived beside them for over one hundred years without any dispute that could not be settled by arbitration. Our social, our business, our fraternal relations with the United States are about as intimate in the case of some provinces and states as are the relations between the different provinces of Canada. I have no objection to that; I wish to encourage it. I happen to belong to two or three international organizations myself. But it is one thing to maintain friendly and intimate relations of that character, and it is something entirely different to allow our young people to be tempted or to be influenced in such a manner that they come to think more highly of the United States than of their own country. Unless we are willing to watch our country drift into annexation with the United States we must do something to strengthen a national Canadian sentiment, and as I have argued before, nothing will be so effective in enabling us to do that as a strong Canadian periodical press that will emphasize the advantages of our own country and make Canadians proud of their native land. We should, as far as possible, guard against the cultural as well as the economic penetration of this country by the United States.

To those who favour our absorption by the republic to the south my argument will have no weight; but with all who desire that Canada should remain a member of the British commonwealth this must be a question of the first importance. I present it to the House not for the first time or for the second time. I urge the government once again to sit down quietly and consider solemnly the ramifications, the evil results that are following and will increasingly follow the continued free entry of American magazines into this country. I realize the differences we have in Canada, yet I believe we have an opportunity to build up one of the greatest countries in the world. We have the soil, we have the resources of all kinds, and we have a climate that ought to make men just a little better than they are in any other part of the world. But we can only succeed if we make Canadians proud of their country—so proud of it, in fact, that they will be willing to make some little sacrifice to live in this Dominion. Unless we can do that the great republic to the south, with its 110,000,000 of people, with its better financial opportunities awaiting all the time, will attract the very cream of our population. Our only hope, our only remedy, is so to cultivate a national sentiment among Canadians, particularly young Canadians, that they will be proud of Canada, they will resist the appeals that come from the other side of the international boundary line, and will say: As for me and my house, we will remain Canadians.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the remarks that I wish to address to the House on this occasion will be directed not so much towards the budget itself as towards certain criticisms that have been made of it, and trade conditions in general in Canada. It is not my purpose so much to build up a constructive argument as to endeavour to show up some of the fallacious arguments that have been used. If we can do that I think perhaps we shall have laid in some measure the foundations for a better understanding of the situation that confronts us.

I might make a few remarks, however, upon the budget itself. I shall not refer at all to the general financial situation; but speaking of the matter of trade conditions in Canada it has been pointed out, and very properly so, that the satisfactory conditions that prevail in this country are dependent in large measure upon the splendid harvests that have been reaped by the farmers in all parts of the land. It is only natural of course that the government should be pleased that the two conditions should have coincided—that is, the continuance of the government in office and the splendid harvest that has been reaped. It is only natural that hon. members on the government side should refer to that fact with pride and take some satisfaction out of it. On the other hand it is only natural that their opponents should belittle as much as possible the activities of the government and give all the credit to Providence. Now, we in the west who have received these large crops recognize that Providence has blessed us wonderfully during the past two years. We also recognize that the large exports of wheat that are going forth from this land have been brought about by the co-operation of Providence with the hard-working diligent farmers of the Canadian west.

I should like to call attention again to some very wise remarks that were made by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) in which he showed the position which the Canadian west is occupying now in the economic life of the Dominion. Perhaps this was never more strongly stated than in an address that was given by Sir Henry Thornton, president of the Canadian National Railways, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of Saturday, January 9, 1926. This address was delivered in November last, and I wish to refer to only two or three sentences. He points out in the course of this address that during the early part of last year the Canadian National Railways did not show a very strong position as regards the business done, but that towards the middle of the year conditions began to improve. He then goes on to say:

> About the middle of July, however, a definite firm undertone in Canadian business began to manifest itself, so that the decrease in gross earnings has now been wiped out and an increase in gross of approximately $7,000,000 will be shown at the end of the year.

At the beginning of July it was perfectly manifest there was going to be a magnificent harvest in the west, and naturally that made itself evident in the immediate increase of the business of the country. Again he says:

> The crop conditions for the year undoubtedly helped the position, but a large measure of success is due to the healthy growth of business in general in all parts of the Dominion. Because of the important part played by the crops in Canada's general business conditions it seems inadvisable to go beyond the first six months of next year in venturing any predictions. Given an average crop, however, I believe that the sound undertone which has made itself felt in Canadian business during the latter half of 1925 will continue to increase in strength during the first half of 1926.

Perhaps it might not be amiss for the government and all of us to take the warning given by Sir Henry Thornton when he said that it might not be wise, in the matter of predictions, to go beyond the first six months of the year—another recognition of the fact that the prosperity of Canada is very closely bound up, indeed absolutely dependent upon, the prosperity of the farm.

It is a matter of pride on the part of all Canadians that our National railway has reached the status that it has now attained. For my part—and I think I speak for those, in the main, who sit in this corner of the House—we never criticized the action of the government of the day in taking over the railway lines and beginning the amalgamation of them into a united whole. We recognized that it was a matter of necessity that such a step should be taken, and for my part I am inclined to give credit to those who controlled the government of the day. But when these lines were taken over they were not in a position to compete effectively with the Canadian Pacific railway, and while hon. members claim that credit should be given to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) for having brought about the amalgamation, we should also remember that he has taken the position that we should not spend one dollar more in the way of equipment. I think he has used expressions of that kind on different occasions. We in this House have voted large sums of money during the past few years for the equipment of the National lines, and that equipment is now such that the railway will become a very effective competitor with the Canadian Pacific. For the next few years I do not think it should be necessary to spend any very considerable amount in equipment in order to make it possible for the Canadian National to compete with the other road.

I had intended to speak at some length on the question of the income tax, but the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) expressed pretty nearly my sentiments in regard to that matter. It is seemingly a popular move that the income tax should be reduced. I note with approval, however, that the government has acted in certain respects as some of us have argued during the past few years. I notice with particular pleasure the provision in regard to the tax upon dividends. We have been arguing that distinction should be made between revenue derived from investment and revenue derived from salaries or from business. For my part I cannot agree with the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion); I cannot work up a great deal of sympathy for that hypothetical widow who has to pay an increased tax on an income of $5,000 which she receives from dividends. There are a great many widows in the country for whom I have a great deal more sympathy than the widow who receives an income of $5,000 from her husband's estate. I would like to commend the government for taking a step in the direction of another principle we advocated, namely, that for the purposes of taxation the income of the husband and wife should be considered a joint income. They have not perhaps gone as far in that respect as some of us have advocated, but a step has been made in that direction and I think the policy is eminently sound.

It is quite obvious that different views are held by hon. members in this House in regard to these matters. One feature of the income tax as set forth in the proposed change was condemned by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie), and that is the feature that made the strongest appeal to me as praiseworthy. The hon. member criticized the proposal that carrying charges on unproductive property should no longer be exempt. I commend that change most heartily. I do not see why a man speculating in land, for instance, or having any other unproductive property, should be allowed to deduct the carrying charges when he makes his claim for exemption.

The postal reductions have been received generally with a measure of favour, and perhaps the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) expressed what was a very common attitude toward the postal service when he said it was one that should be rendered to the people at cost, and that the government should not make any excessive profit out of it. I know that that position is very generally taken by people, and I am not going to combat it; but I would like to present another point of view to which we might give some consideration. It should be remembered that the government is rendering many services to the country at less than cost. It might very well be argued, if that is the case that some of these services which show a small profit might be continued in order that other unproductive services might be continued—provided always of course that these services should not be in any degree burdensome on the country. That, to my mind, is a point of view that might very well be considered.

That is all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in regard to the budget itself. I wish now to make some references to certain arguments that have been used in this House that seem to me to be absolutely fallacious. I wish to refer to some statistics that have been given, upon which the wrong conclusions have been based and from which false inferences have been drawn. Perhaps one of the chief offenders in this respect was the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) in his speech yesterday. Speaking generally in regard to these statistics, I think the fault is a very common one: hon. members will go to the Bureau of Statistics, get figures which may be absolutely correct, and place them on Hansard, but the conclusions they draw from them are absolutely wrong, and when we make any criticism in the matter they tell us that the figures are taken from government reports. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) was good enough to say a few weeks ago that he had more confidence in Mr. Coats as a statistician than he had in the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). I agree that Mr. Coats is a better statistician than the hon. member for Lisgar; it is not with Mr. Coats that I have any quarrel. My quarrel is with those who take the figures Mr. Coats compiles and use them in such a way that they lead to wrong conclusions and result in altogether unwarranted inferences. Hon. gentlemen fall back upon the principle that figures do not lie. Figures do not lie—but hon. gentlemen can complete the quotation. Indeed, when some of these hon. members engage in mathematical calculations I cannot but be reminded of a little algebraical puzzle we used to have put before us by which it could be absolutely demonstrated that one is equal to two. The question was to find the fallacy—because there was a fallacy in it; anyone would know that one was not equal to two. The fallacy lay in this, that on each of the two sides of the equation you found a factor that was equal to nothing, consequently the whole thing was equal to nothing. Everybody, I think, unless it be the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington, will be prepared to recognize that once nothing is just as much as twice nothing.

I am sorry the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington is not in his seat, because I wish to direct my remarks particularly towards some of the figures that he placed on Hansard only yesterday. When he gave those figures to the House I could not be sure just what he was trying to get at; I could not see what particular fish he was trying to catch in the muddy water he had stirred up. But a little later on he showed clearly what he was trying to do. On page 2880 of Hansard we read this:

> Mr. Edwards (Frontenac): I did not imply that, I stated it. I gave you the figures which I have taken from the government's own reports, and inasmuch as you are supporting this government very faithfully I do not suppose you will question the correctness of any of those reports.
> Mr. Brown: The figures may be reliable but a very wrong inference may be drawn from them.
> Mr. Edwards (Frontenac): That is a matter of judgment. I presume my hon. friend will admit that if there is a wrong inference drawn it will be on his part.

I admit nothing of the kind. I propose to show the utter fallacy of the figures compiled by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington, who was good enough to say to our hon. friends opposite that they belonged to the kindergarten class, the Saskatchewan kindergarten. I propose to show that the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington is not even in the kindergarten class, but in swaddling clothes. Let me say to the hon. members from Saskatchewan: Do not be discouraged if you should be spoken of as "young cubs" and "kindergarten kids." Some of the old "ginks" on this side at least think we can discern in you some qualities of statesmanship, and possibly when you grow older you will be wiser. I remember when the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) was spoken of as the "boy"—and look at him now. He will remember that in the early days when he was campaigning in southern Manitoba. But to go back a little further into history, you all know the experiences of Disraeli, how he felt he had made a mess of it when he first spoke in the House, but said that there would come a day when he would be heard. To go back a little further, hon. members will remember that the great William Pitt was at one time taunted by his great opponent Walpole with his youth and inexperience, and Pitt in the course of his remarks used words something like these—I trust I may be forgiven if I do not quote them exactly, for it must be about forty years since I saw the printed page:

> Whether youth may be attributed to any man as a reproach I shall not, Sir, assume the province of determining, but surely age may justly become contemptible when the opportunities which it brings have passed away without improvement. The wretch who having seen the consequences of a thousand errors continues still to blunder is surely an object either of abhorrence or of contempt, and deserves not that his grey hairs should secure him from insult.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BROWN: When the House rose at six o'clock I had been endeavouring to offer some words of encouragement to the "kindergarten class" from Saskatchewan, urging them not to take too seriously the criticisms that had been made by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington. I had pointed out to them that some great statesmen had overcome the weaknesses of their early youth. Disraeli, for example, in spite of his first failure in the House of Commons, became famous, and the great William Pitt, although taunted with his youth and inexperience, rose nevertheless to be one of England's greatest prime ministers. As a further word of encouragement, I would say to the "kindergarten class" that with patience and perseverance they may possibly develop not merely into Beaconsfields and Chathams, but even into statesmen of the high eminence of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Don't forget yourself. My hon. friend should not be so modest.

Mr. BROWN: I had called the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington has advanced an argument in regard to the prices of grain in Canada. I could scarcely conceive it possible at first that the purpose he had in making that argument was what he told us, but he admitted it himself. That purpose was to prove that the western farmers received, for that portion of their wheat which was sold in the provinces in which there was a shortage, a greater amount than they received for that which was sold on the world's market.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I did not say so.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member did not say so?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No.

Mr. BROWN: Then I shall have to quote Hansard again:

Mr. Evans: Does the hon. gentleman imply that we get more in Canada for our wheat than we do in the world's markets?

Mr. Edwards (Frontenac): I did not imply that, I stated it.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Exactly.

Mr. BROWN: (Reading):

I gave you the figures which I have taken from the government's own reports, and inasmuch as you are supporting this government very faithfully I do not suppose you will question the correctness of any of those reports.

Mr. Brown: The figures may be reliable but a very wrong inference may be drawn from them.

Mr. Edwards (Frontenac): That is a matter of judgment. I presume my hon. friend will admit that if there is a wrong inference drawn it will be on his part.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It may be.

Mr. BROWN: Let us go back to the figures the hon. gentleman adduced in support of his contention. At page 2878 of Hansard this is what we read:

It has been said that the price of wheat is fixed in the United Kingdom. Taken as a general statement, I think that that is true—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Hear, hear.

Mr. BROWN (Reading):

—but I believe it is subject to some modification. The average price of wheat for all Canada in 1924 was $1.22; in Manitoba, $1.24; Saskatchewan, $1.21; Alberta, $1.20; Ontario, $1.27. Each of these provinces had an exportable surplus, comparatively small in the case of Ontario, but very, very large in the west. Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had a shortage. In Quebec the average price for the whole year was $1.66; New Brunswick, $1.78; Nova Scotia, $1.61; Prince Edward Island, $1.59. There was a shortage in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick of 4,216,000 bushels.

[Mr. J. W. Edwards.]

The hon. gentleman endeavoured to show from these figures—if he did not, then I do not know what meaning he intended to convey—that that portion of the crop of the west which was sold to make up the shortage in these other provinces was sold at higher prices than were paid for the other portion of the crop that went upon the world's markets. So he stated in that first extract I read. Now the veriest tyro in mathematics will see the fallacy of his contention; one has only to look at it on the surface to detect it. Let me call the attention of the House to the hon. gentleman's mistake. He says that the average in Canada was $1.22; that the average in Manitoba was $1.24, in Saskatchewan, $1.21, and in Alberta, $1.20. In other words, the average for the three prairie provinces was $1.21⅔. I am not building up an argument on averages, for there is nothing more fallacious than some reasoning upon that basis. Indeed, I sometimes think that it would be well for us if that word averages were entirely deleted from our vocabulary.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does the hon. member question the correctness of those figures?

Mr. BROWN: I shall deal with that in a moment. The school-boy's definition of an average was that it was something that hens laid eggs on. It seems to me that it might be just as well, for all the good it does, to confine the word to that meaning. You will notice that after stating the averages in the three prairie provinces the hon. member went on to quote the higher prices in other parts of the Dominion—Ontario, $1.27, and the other provinces, respectively, $1.61, $1.66, $1,78. Now the most elementary mathematician could see that if you added the higher figures to the average I have already given, of $1.21⅔, the quantity included at these higher prices must be infinitesimal. That of itself shows the absolute absurdity of the argument that the hon. gentleman has made. Let the House consider it. We have an average of $1.21⅔ for the three prairie provinces, then $1.66 for Quebec—I need not deal with the other provinces. Why, anybody knows that if you have any appreciable quantity at those prices you are going to raise the average away above $1.22. The whole thing is so palpably absurd that I think I was justified in consigning the hon. member not only to the kindergarten class but to swaddling clothes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Now, may I ask my hon. friend again—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am not asking hon. gentlemen opposite in the kindergarten class, I am asking my hon. friend. Does he dispute the figures which I gave as to the average price?

Mr. BROWN: No.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Very well.

Mr. BROWN: I said this afternoon that my quarrel was not with the statistician. I pointed out the unfailing custom of these gentlemen to my right that when we questioned their figures they would point to their being contained in a government report. My quarrel is with the hon. gentleman who misused the figures. I said figures do not lie. Neither do they. I have the highest respect for the exact science of mathematics. It is a most fascinating study, the relations of number, the invariable, unfailing rules of mathematics. But science is one thing and a pseudo scientist another. Figures are one thing and figurers are something entirely different. I do not dispute the figures for a moment.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Very good.

Mr. BROWN: I am going to take up that point.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Thank you; that is what I was coming to.

Mr. BROWN: I will give them to you. I did not get the full force of the hon. member's argument when he was presenting it, but in reading it over I saw at once its fallacy, and to confirm myself in my own opinion I got into contact to-day with the Department of Statistics. There I found that these figures did not mean what he said they meant. All that they mean is this: the figures for the other provinces simply referred to the local prices at which the locally raised wheat was sold in those provinces.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Absolutely correct.

Mr. BROWN: That is all it means.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is right. I did not say it meant anything else. I did not imply that it meant anything else.

Mr. BROWN: Very well, we will have to cut out this first selection.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No, all you need cut out is your interpretation of my figures.

Mr. BROWN: I invite any hon. member to read the extract that I quoted from Hansard. It will be found at page 2880.

Mr. FORKE: Read it again.

Mr. BROWN: I will.

Mr. Evans: Does the hon. gentleman imply that we get more in Canada for our wheat than we do in the world's markets?

Mr. Edwards (Frontenac): I did not imply that, I stated it. I gave you the figures which I have taken from the government's own reports.

And so on.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Will my hon. friend permit a question again? I thank him for his courtesy in doing so. He says he accepts the figures I gave as the average prices. Those figures for the eastern provinces by reason of some scarcity he must admit are higher than the world's market prices. That is all I said.

Mr. BROWN: If the hon. member had confined himself to that I might have been willing to put his interpretation on it, but when in answer to the direct question by the hon. member for Rosebud—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Rosetown.

Mr. BROWN: —Rosetown, he made the further statement, then he throws himself open to question. It is quite possible of course, and everybody admits it, that in a community where there is a comparatively small portion of wheat grown, those who own that wheat and are not able to come in contact with the world's supply will possibly get a higher price than the world's price. No one disputes that for a moment. But the hon. gentleman was not warranted in the conclusion that he drew from those figures.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Did I not say—I want my hon. friend to be fair—that the general price of wheat was controlled in the world's market?

Mr. BROWN: But he went on also to urge that because of this shortage in the other provinces, as he pointed out and admitted himself, we got more for that portion of our wheat that was sold in the Canadian market than in the world's market.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): You have admitted it yourself.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): He is too old to learn.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): And you are too young.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That can be remedied, the other cannot.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. gentleman also on that occasion had another fling at that much maligned company, the United Grain Growers. It will be recalled that when the Hon. Mr. Crerar left the Union government at once a tremendous attack was started against him and against the company of which he was president. That was in the parliament elected in 1917. Amongst the leaders in that attack was the hon. member for Frontenac,—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Hear, hear

Mr. BROWN: —ably supported by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), the then member for Dufferin, Mr. Best, and I think the then member for Peterborough, Mr. Burnham, these hon. members led the attack upon Mr. Crerar because he had left the government. Now, that attack was carried on all through the prairies, and I want to remind my hon. friend that everything that could be done to prejudice the minds of the western farmers against Mr. Crerar and his company was done. Election pamphlets were sent out—not according to law, because they did not bear the signatures of those who circulated them, but we know who used them. They came through my constituency during the 1921 election. I do not know whether the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers), who was my opponent then, was responsible for their circulation in my constituency or not, but the fact is they were circulated there. I repeat, everything was done that could be done to discredit Mr. Crerar and that company. I want to remind my hon. friend that the people of the west, the people who had a grievance—if there was a grievance—and who understood the situation, answered the attack by turning down every candidate then supporting the government that appealed to the country; and it is a little too late in the day for the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington to come down here and get off this kind of stuff. It may be believed by people who do not know the facts of the case, but those facts are as I have stated.

Then the hon. gentleman spoke about overages in the terminal elevators. I can perfectly well understand how difficult it is for an eastern man to grasp this question of overages in the terminals, to see how an overage can be created except by fraud on the part of the elevator people weighing wrongly, and thus defrauding the farmer. But that is an entire mistake. If the hon. member or any other member would step into my office, in about ten minutes I could convince him of the fallacy of that position. I have not time this evening to discuss the question of overages in the terminals.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. BROWN: I will have to speak a little longer than I intended.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead.

Mr. BROWN: Understand, I am speaking only of terminal elevators.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Which I did not speak of at all.

Mr. BROWN: Very well, then your figures did not have any concern with terminal elevators.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My figures were taken from the sworn evidence of Mr Rice Jones.

Mr. BROWN: Which referred to the terminals.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Not at all.

Mr. BROWN: They did. The hon. member just shows how little he knows about the subject. I think I am right in this. When we revised the Grain Act last session an amendment was added requiring country elevators to make returns of their overages, but until then such elevators had never been required to make reports. I think I am correct, and that the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) will support me in this statement. So the hon. member did not have figures for country elevators. The figures he had referred to terminal elevators.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I can give my hon. friend the evidence given by Mr. Rice Jones, which will support absolutely what I say.

Mr. BROWN: If hon. members wish me to make a brief explanation, I can do it, although it will take me away from the subject with which I intended to deal. I shall not go into it fully, but will simply illustrate. Different factors may enter into that overage. I admit at once that if a car of wheat goes to a terminal elevator and is wrongly weighed, —and remember, the weighing is done by a government weighmaster—the terminal elevator may benefit by that, and possibly some of the overage may be explained in that way. But that is not necessarily the explanation of overages.

Let me illustrate. A farmer sends a car of wheat down to the terminal elevator at Fort William. Passing through Winnipeg that car of wheat is graded by the inspector, and the amount of dockage determined. Let us suppose that a 1,000-bushel car of wheat is graded by the inspector as of a certain grade, with 4 per cent dockage; what does that mean? It means that the terminal elevator has to account to the farmer for 960 bushels of wheat on that car. But remember, that car of wheat has to be cleaned. In actual practice they do not clean a carload at a time, but for the sake of my argument we will suppose that they do. Now it is a physical impossibility for the elevator operator to run that car of wheat through his cleaners and take out 960 bushels of wheat for the farmer and 40 bushels of screenings; it is no more possible for him to do it than it was for Shylock to take one pound of flesh, neither more or less. Very well; you put the terminal elevator up against that responsibility. What does the operator do? He cannot afford to be short, for he would have to make up the difference out of his own pocket, so naturally he takes care that he has a slight overage. He cleans it just a little light; it may be that he has 961, 962 or 963 bushels. That extra amount constitutes the overage on that particular car, and of course in the aggregate the overages amount to an immense sum. I do not say that is the only way, but in large measure that is the way in which the overage is built up.

This question of overage is one to which we western people have been compelled to give a great deal of consideration. A few years ago an amendment was made to the Grain Act making this provision, that the government should take control of all the overage from the terminal elevators except one-quarter of one per cent. That provision was declared to be ultra vires because of its interference with property and civil rights, and so it never really came into operation. It was inserted in the Grain Act again last year when we revised the act, and provision was then made in the act that these elevators should be declared works for the general benefit of Canada, just in order to overcome that constitutional difficulty. As I have said, this question of overage has always been a serious one for the farmers. We have endeavoured to meet it, and that was the solution offered by the Canadian Council of Agriculture. I want to say this also—I am in a position to know, because I was a member of the council—that that solution was brought to the attention of the council by the United Grain Growers, which was a member of the council. If hon. members were as familiar with some of these things as those of us who come from the west and are in constant touch with them, they would not make the wild and reckless statements they do. We naturally want this question of overages settled, but it cannot be settled in the way some hon. gentlemen have suggested, and it cannot be settled unles there is an understanding of all phases of the question. I am quite certain that with his present knowledge of the grain trade the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington cannot afford us any help in the solution of that problem. While I am on the subject of this much maligned company—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Before my hon. friend leaves the question of overages, does he dispute my statement that there were 357,000 bushels of overages sold for $418,000?

Mr. BROWN: I am not disputing the figures at all; they are probably correct There was a larger overage than that even in the government elevator.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is the amount that went to the United Grain Growers.

Mr. BROWN: Why single out one grain company simply because of a prejudice against the manager of that company?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Was my statement correct?

Mr. BROWN: I am not denying that the figures are correct. The point I am making is that the hon. member is drawing a wrong inference from them.

I want to say something further about this much maligned company. Many noble patriotic services were rendered this country during the war, and some things were done that were not so noble and patriotic. We have rolls of honour all through the country, and the records of this House will show that we might also have rolls of dishonour. But as to service rendered to the country, speaking only from the standpoint of material gifts, there was none more worthy of note than that rendered by the United Grain Growers, who turned over their whole export business at New York for the handling of oats at cost price for the allies. I do not remember the exact amount, but it ran into many, many millions of bushels.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Was that the year they made 530 per cent?

Mr. BROWN: They never made it.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Your own manager swore they did.

Mr. BROWN: He did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. MULLINS: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to read this letter?

Mr. BROWN: No.

Mr. MULLINS: For the benefit of the hon. member, I might say that I have a ticket here showing a difference of 50 cents a bushel as between the street and the track paid to the farmer by this company he is speaking of. They took 50 cents a bushel from the farmer.

Mr. BROWN: If I had the exact details, probably I should find the hon. member (Mr. Mullins) wrong too. I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that this much maligned company turned over its export business and handled millions of bushels for the allies without one cent of profit at a time when graft was rampant in some parts of this country. I do not expect hon. members will ask the details.

I had intended to deal with the question of fertilizers because of some remarks that were made on this subject some little time ago. I have, however, taken up so much of my time with other questions with which I had not originally intended to deal that I shall have to reserve a discussion of this question for another occasion, except briefly to refer to the statements that were made. The statement was made in a general way that fertilizers were higher priced here since the duties were removed at the same time that prices in the world's markets were lower. I have some figures here which show that at the very best there is not the slightest foundation for such a statement. The inquiries I have been able to make and the figures I have been able to secure, dealing with this matter as fairly as I can, show that there is absolutely no warrant for that statement, but as this question will come up again when the agricultural estimates are before us, I shall wait until that occasion to deal with the matter.

There are some other things I want to deal with. I want to come to some other hon. members who have put certain figures upon Hansard that I think will bear some criticism. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) have left themselves open, in my judgment, to very serious criticism. These two hon. members are still harping on the subject of imports. I was not able to understand all the figures that the hon. member for East Algoma put on Hansard, but the only conclusion I could come to was that he wanted to stop this trade altogether; I could not see any other explanation for it than that. Now if these hon. members really want to stop this trade altogether, I should like them to say so. They certainly want the tariff put up to such a height that it will stop that trade, so they say. Let me ask where we would get our revenue if that were done. That is the question that used to be asked of us when we advocated a reduction of the duties: Where would you get the revenue? I remember when the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) was in Brandon in 1920 with the tariff commission. He was met there by farmers from all over the country. We advocated reductions in the tariff, and the invariable question was: Where would you get the revenue? And yet the arguments of these hon. members mean nothing less, if we carry them out literally, than that there will be no revenue from the customs tariff—at least not from this source. And then what about our revenue? I should like to know what system of taxation we are going to get that would be popular, or to which these hon. members will not offer criticism? The income tax has been condemned, the sales tax has been condemned, and now they want to shut off importation and we will have no revenue from customs duties. They have also denounced the "nuisance" taxes. Really, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what sources of revenue we should have left.

There is one statement made by the hon. member for East Algoma to which I want to refer. I will quote again from Hansard at page 2756. The hon. gentleman is reported there as saying:

> Why, one industrial city the size of Hamilton consumes more beef cattle in a single year than the whole Dominion exported last year, and that was the greatest exporting year we have ever had.

Mr. McMILLAN: They must sit up at nights there.

Mr. BROWN: To use a slang phrase, the people of Hamilton are some beef eaters. A little investigation of the records would show that if that statement is true this is also true—that the people of Hamilton each consumed two live animals, and 244 pounds of beef as well.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BROWN: That is, that every man, woman and child in the city of Hamilton ate two live animals and 244 pounds of beef.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BROWN: I will give the actual details.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): They did not eat them alive, did they?

Mr. BROWN: The figures are for the year. Now let me give the actual figures: Cattle, one year old, 42,506; cattle, more than one year old—that includes export steers—175,578; total 218,084. The population of Hamilton is given in the electoral returns as 107,487. I have estimated my figures at about 110,000 to allow for good measure. Now, possibly I am going to forestall an argument; the hon. member may come back and say, "Well, Hamilton is a bigger city than simply the electoral division; it includes the suburbs." Very well, we will grant that and so double the population. I will give the population as 220,000, and still you have one beef animal and 120 pounds of beef for every man, woman and child in the city.

An hon. MEMBER: You must remember that a million tourists stop there every year.

Mr. BROWN: Well, there is still a big margin. I think I have allowed sufficient margin by doubling the population.

I am going to refer again to the hon. member for East Algoma later on in my speech. I want to go back now to the hon. member for Fort William. The trade returns, he said, for 1925 show that we imported, largely from the United States, $149,201,000 worth of agricultural products that we could have produced on the farms of Canada, and we imported as well $236,000,000 of farm products such as cotton, tropical fruits, vegetables, and so on, which we could not produce in Canada. These figures, except that they refer to the wrong year, are correct as figures but have been wrongly interpreted as they have been used and as they have been presented to the country. I do not want to urge the point very strongly, but it is perhaps worthy of note that the figures the hon. member has given are for the year ending March 31, 1924. I do not know whether there is any significance in the fact that out of the three years that he gave —1923, 1924 and 1925—he chose the largest for the purpose of his argument. The exact figure, the figure I have used in my calculation, is $143,920,611. There is a difference of a few dollars between the figures as given in a monthly return issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce and the figures in the larger volume, Trade in Canada, for the same year, but the difference is so slight it can be ignored. One point I want to mention just here—and I have referred to it already—is that on this amount of imports we collected a total duty of $27,534,932, a by no means inconsiderable proportion of our revenue, and a sum well worth taking into consideration.

Now what about this $143,000,000? The hon. member tells us it is agricultural produce that could have been produced in Canada. My objection is not so much to the statement itself as to the implications of that statement, and sometimes the implications in a statement are just as important as a statement itself. The implication is that these were goods that we could have produced but did not produce. The fact is that we do produce large quantities of these goods. Some of them were exported, some of them entered into home consumption, and the conveniences of trade required that a considerable portion of the same goods that we have exported be imported. The convenience of trade brought about that situation and always will have that result, unless we either establish an embargo definitely or put the duty so high that it would amount to an embargo. So the implication that these were goods that we could have produced in Canada and did not produce is entirely wrong.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member admits we could have produced them?

Mr. BROWN: Certainly I admit we could have produced some of them, but if we did, there are conditions that at present we do not know anything about that should be taken into consideration.

Mr. CAHAN: Such as?

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member surely knows he cannot base a sound argument upon any hypothesis of that kind.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. member please explain. I should like to know the grounds for his statement.

Mr. BROWN: I am going to analyse these figures a little further. These figures include not only raw materials but goods manufactured and chiefly or fully manufactured. Mr. Coats is perfectly correct in his compilation; I do not find fault with him, but I do find fault with the way the figures have been used by hon. members. The figures are as follows:

Raw material..	$52,258,600
Partly manufactured..	11,815,225
Fully or chiefly manufactured..	79,846,786

In that list of fully or partly manufactured goods we have the total wool products, and I think I have the correct figure, namely, $36,534,592, of the different manufactures that make up the vast total. In that list we find also alcoholic beverages and the figure of the imports is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $18,000,000 or $19,000,000. In discussing this matter I do not want to introduce my personal views in regard to liquor. I am willing to join with the hon. member for Fort William or anyone else in preventing the manufacture, sale and use of alcoholic liquor for beverage purposes, but

I am simply pointing out the fact that we did import that much liquor, and in that figure of $143,000,000 odd, alcoholic liquors are included, because they might be produced from Canadian grain. For instance, in the footnote of the page from which these figures are quoted I find the following:

Canadian farm products refer in case of imports to all commodities of which the basic raw materials are such as Canadian farms produce.

And of course alcoholic liquors are included because they might have been produced from Canadian grain. While I am not defending the traffic in alcoholic liquor, that traffic did bring in a revenue of $16,225,532 for that year. Surely that is not an inconsiderable revenue. We had better not venture a statement as to the amount exported and the amount manufactured for home consumption.

Mr. CAHAN: Suppose they are manufactured in this country, could they not bring in the same revenue under the same duty?

Mr. BROWN: Possibly in the case of alcoholic liquors that would be so, but there is also an excise duty on the goods manufactured here. However, I am not urging strongly the question of revenue. I am objecting to their being included in this list. Turning more directly to the raw products of agriculture, I said that the import trade in agricultural products would always go on for the purpose of convenience. Let me illustrate this. We imported hay in 1925 to the extent of $156,556, incidentally bringing in a revenue of $20,564. That was done for the purpose of convenience, because we exported in the same year $3,725,282 worth. So that the imports of hay were so insignificant as compared with the export that it only means we would have been inconveniencing our people if we tried to give absolute protection to the farmer who produced hay. Perhaps I should give a more extreme illustration, because it requires an extreme illustration to bring home the point. We exported straw to the extent of $154,186. We imported straw to the amount of $1,021, bringing in a revenue of $146. That was a matter of convenience. Is there any farmer from the western prairies, any member of the "kindergarten class," who would advocate a prohibitive duty on the import of straw? We need only mention it to hon. members to show the absurdity of the idea. Further there is included in that list of agricultural products the following:

Horses for exhibition..	$1,686,847
Live stock of other kinds..	56,553
Total..	$1,743,400

[Mr. Brown.]

These all go into the figures. I have no quarrel with Mr. Coats, but I have a quarrel with the man who would use these figures without such an explanation as I am making. Further items are :

Animals of all kind for the improvement of stock, goats, horses and sheep, 291,178.

I got these figures from the Department of Statistics. I notice another item, asses. Unfortunately we have been very negligent; I find there were none imported. Let us take a few more figures—I am not going to take them all. Take grains of all kinds; and I am going to use oats as an illustration. "We imported oats to the extent of $513,602, and incidentally obtained a revenue of $93,000 odd, but at the same time we exported oats to the amount of $16,044,436. Will any hon. member contend for a moment that in any degree these things work injury to the farmers? It is quite possible that in a few isolated communities some individual farmer might have had a supply of oats for himself and would have been able to charge his neighbour a little higher price in those local individual transactions if he had an absolute embargo or prohibitive tariff on oats, but the trouble is that these matters are considered from a parochial and sectional standpoint; hon. members refuse to take the wider view. I need only refer to the export and import of oats to prove that point. Then corn is included in the total figure.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does the hon. gentleman think it is fair that our duty should be five cents lower than the United States duty?

Mr. BROWN: It does not make a particle of difference. I am not worrying about that at all.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Would the hon. gentleman take it off altogether?

Mr. BROWN: It does not make any difference, so far as protecting the farmer is concerned. If hon. members would kindly try to clear their minds of the idea that trade is necessarily war, and get it into their heads that trade is carried on for the mutual benefit of the parties engaged in it, we would get on a great deal further in the discussion.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Would we take it all off.

Mr. BROWN: Their ideas of trade are very much like those of a boy I once knew. This is an actual fact and happened in my district. The teacher in the school—and it was not a kindergarten, either—was trying to instruct the boys in the theories of trade. He was telling them that trade in its essence was the exchange of products: a man with a horse would trade the horse for something else that he wanted of equal value. Whereupon a boy in the class said, "That would not be any kind of trade at all." The only idea of trade which that boy had was that he must be getting the better of somebody; a trade was not a trade at all unless one party was getting the better of the other. That is the fallacy that underlies all the arguments that come from these hon. gentlemen.

Mr. CAHAN: What is the hon. gentleman's idea of trade?

Mr. BROWN: Mutual convenience, mutual benefit.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it not far better to have that mutual convenience, mutual benefit and mutual profit in one's own country, than to have convenience, benefit and profit on only one side of the bargain as is the case when you trade with people outside of the country?

Mr. BROWN: The trouble with hon. gentlemen again is that they single out one part of the community and say: We are the people.

Mr. CAHAN: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is depending upon his imagination for his facts.

Mr. BROWN: I mentioned the question of corn and I want to deal with it. We import large quantities of corn for purposes of distillation. I do not know whether it is better or worse than any other grain, but I will give the figures. We imported $874,306 worth in 1925, and incidentally we got a revenue from that of $58,436. As regards corn not for distillation, which will be very largely for feeding purposes, we imported $7,780,919 worth. These hon. members are contending that all these imports are to the disadvantage of the farmer and the community generally. Who wants and uses that corn, and for whose benefit are we importing it? It is very largely for the farmers of Ontario. As a western farmer, as a member of a section of the country that produces for sale large quantities of feed grain, such as oats and barley, I am not going to come to parliament and ask that in our interests the Ontario farmers, who are all said to be protectionists, be deprived of getting that feed stuff, because the use to which they put it is of immense value to the people of Canada.

Another item is hides, and I will only mention the figures because I am going to deal with this matter a little later on. We exported $7,163,888 worth of hides and we imported $8,279,492 worth, or an excess of imports over exports of roughly speaking, a million dollars.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What year is the hon. gentleman quoting from?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Not the calendar year 1925?

Mr. BROWN: No. I have confined my remarks to the year mentioned by the hon. member for Fort William except that he took the year 1924. I am dealing with the year 1925, but both of us are using the fiscal year. I am prepared to admit that there may be a slight error in my additions, because I did not get these figures from the statistical department; I had to compile them myself from the larger work, Trade of Canada, but I was careful with my figures and there is very little error. We admit there is an excess of a million dollars of imports over exports in the matter of hides.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Would the hon. member give the figures in pounds?

Mr. BROWN: I have not that at hand: I did not think it was necessary for my purpose. The hon. gentleman can easily get the figures himself.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the hon. member the figures for unmanufactured leather?

Mr. BROWN: Yes. I am going to deal with the whole question of leather a little later on. I might have said that the total importation of leather, manufactured and unmanufactured, that is included in that list of $142,000,000, amounts to $7,324,028, incidentally bringing in a revenue of $1,307,113.

I want to go on to some of the other items included in this total. We imported nursery stock to the value of $1,123,949. We scour the whole world for nursery stock for the betterment of our gardens and orchards. I find that one of the items which go to make up this total is rose bushes brought in from England. Will any one seriously contend that we should not be carrying on that trade?

As regards hops, we exported $236,176 worth and we imported $826,690 worth, incidentally bringing in a revenue of $199,051. That is a trade in which the exports and imports do not exactly balance, but it is a trade that is carried on for mutual convenience and it is quite evident that we do not produce enough for our wants. Then there is the question of turpentine.

Surely nobody will contend that turpentine—that is, for the purpose for which it is being used—should be included in that list; but we imported turpentine to the value of $823,593. I might mention animal manure, glycerine, and lard. As regards lard, we admit that $638,157 worth was imported, but we exported lard to the value of $1,681,462 and we incidentally got a revenue of $99,500 from the imports. Therefore even in the matter of lard, as regards which there has been some criticism, our exports exceeded our imports by a little over a million dollars.

The severest criticism has been made in the case of fruits and of course we admit that these fruits are being imported. We imported fresh fruits to the value of $5,035,328 and fresh vegetables to the value of $4,118,221, but our exports of fruits are in excess of our imports by very large sums. I want to be absolutely fair, and I might say that in connection with those fruits I took in account such things as these. I have been very liberal in making up this estimate because some things are included in it that I think properly might be left out, but because these or similar things are or might be produced in Canada, I included them. For instance, I have included imports of apples to the value of $867,826. I have included apricots, quinces, nectarines, wild berries, blackberries, gooseberries, raspberries, cherries, cranberries, currants, grapes. We imported fresh grapes to the value of $862,298. Our Canadian fresh grapes are on the market for only a very short period of the year and therefore it must follow that while this amount is included in our imports these are kinds and varieties that can not be produced in Canada. And yet, because grapes are produced in Canada, the amount is included here. The same thing applies to melons, the figure in this case being $320,885. It is true we do produce some melons in Canada, but does anyone seriously contend that we could meet the demand for melons with the home production? We can therefore reduce the total in connection with these two items by well over $1,000,000. Then there are pears, plums, strawberries and so on.

The figure I have here in regard to fresh vegetables such as onions, potatoes, tomatoes, cabbages and others not otherwise provided for is $4,104,000. There is a slight variation between it and the figure I gave before, but that makes no difference. I find that the amount in the case of tomatoes is $903,816, and these imports come in at a time of year when we are not producing any tomatoes. I know that tomatoes can be and in fact are being produced in Canada in hothouses. In conversation with a hothouse grower in Hamilton with whom I am well acquainted I learned that he was producing large quantities in his hothouse, selling them on the Hamilton market wholesale—at any rate, he did with his last crop—at $5 per fifteen-pound basket. Now these are the prices which the people of Hamilton are paying for hothouse tomatoes. They want to live up to that high standard and they expect us to give them protection for the industry that caters to their expensive taste. The imports represented in the figure I have just quoted are tomatoes that are sold through the country at a time when, with the exception of the hothouse fruit, there are none on the market. Is anyone going to say that we ought to stop that trade? I do not think so.

Mr. MORAND: Did the hon. member state the time of year when these imports come in?

Mr. BROWN: No, but they certainly cannot to any great extent come into competition with our tomatoes once the local product is on the market.

Mr. MORAND: Most of the tomatoes included in that item are grown in hothouses in the United States where they are produced more cheaply.

Mr. BROWN: I do not think that is relevant at all. As a matter of fact I think the hon. member is wrong, but from what I gathered from that Hamilton grower to whom I have referred and with whom I am well acquainted he does not fear competition from the American article even if it is grown in hothouses, for the simple reason that it is inferior in quality to the Canadian product. But I do not think that the tomatoes imported could be grown in hothouses judging from the character of the fruit itself. Those tomatoes are grown in the south and are picked in the green state and are shipped north. However, the fact that they may be produced in hothouses does not enter into the argument at all.

Now I shall discuss for a moment or two the hide situation. The hon. member for East Algoma made the statement that the western farmers were breaking their farms with teams of horses the harness on which was made out of hides taken off the backs of Argentine republic steers. And he appeals to our prejudice on that ground. Just let us analyse the situation. I stated before that our total imports of hides were $8,297,492, and the exports $7,163,888. I want to deal particularly with two of the larger items, showing the extent of our imports as compared with exports. Take cattle skins: the imports amount to $5,342,085, and the exports, $4,884,201, a difference of half a million or thereabouts. Now I took the trouble to ascertain the price per pound at which these hides were sold. I may observe, by the way, in connection with the hides we import that they come principally from three countries, the Argentine, Uruguay and the United States, the imports from other countries being practically negligible.

Mr. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): Was that for the year 1925?

Mr. BROWN: The year ending March, 1925. These hides which we import from the three countries I have mentioned are heavy hides that are wanted for a specific purpose. I am informed that certain tanners in Kitchener do not use a single pound of Canadian hides; they do not want them for the simple reason that they are altogether unsuitable for their purpose. They want the heavy hides that are produced in the southern countries. I find that we paid thirteen and a half cents per pound for those hides, while the hides produced in Canada brought only eleven and a third cents. Surely the difference between the two prices must suggest something to hon. gentlemen. Our tanners do not import hides at thirteen and a half cents per pound simply because they are foreign, when Canadian hides are sold to our neighbours for eleven and a third cents. They must have wanted the imported hides for a special use. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) will bear me out in this, for he and I have talked the matter over. He knows that I am right, as in fact he has admitted. The hides that Canada produces are suitable for certain purposes, but not for others. We use a very large proportion of the home product locally, and if all Canadians consume as much beef as they do in Hamilton we must use an enormous amount of hides. Then it must be remembered that a lot of hides exported were exported on the backs of the animals. We cannot export the animal and keep the hide. These things have to be taken into account.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the hon. gentleman in the list of hides include those on the backs of the animals exported?

Mr. BROWN: No, that is only by the way. I am simply referring to the fact that we do use large quantities of our home grown hides, and we use them for the purposes for which we want them. We export the surplus that we do not need, and then we import other hides that we do want. That is my argument. We import them only because we want them, and are willing to pay the extra price to get them.

Mr. CAHAN: And you suggest that we cannot grow the heavier hides in this country?

Mr. BROWN: Yes. In proof of my statement, there are tanneries that do not use a single pound of Canadian hides because they do not serve their purpose.

Some hon. members plead for the industries of Canada, and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) some little time ago spoke of tanneries that were closed up. Yet these hon. gentlemen, appealing to the prejudices of the farmers on this question of imported hides, are advocating a policy which would mean that these tanneries could not get the raw material that they want. The result would be the tanneries would be closed, the men would be out of employment, and we would lose a tremendously profitable business. That it is a profitable business I am going to show the House by further figures. In dealing with hides we must take into account leather. An hon. gentleman a little while ago asked about unmanufactured leather. I will give the figures. They refer to leather that we export, which business would in large measure be shut off if we did not purchase these other hides:

Harness leather	$ 385,568
Sole leather	2,324,961
Upper leather (probably very largely made out of our own local hides)	4,580,892
All other leather	92,467
Total exported	$7,383,888

Now, bear in mind that the following figures are for our imports of unmanufactured leather, namely, $3,954,482 worth. In other words, our excess of exports is well over $3,000,000. I want to remind the House that of those exports there went to the United States—the country that we cannot compete with—out of the total of over $7,000,000 worth the very large proportion of $5,311,184 worth. This is the kind of trade that these gentlemen want to stop. At least, they would stop it if we carried out the policy they are advocating, for that would necessarily be the result of putting it into effect.

Mr. CAHAN: How would the protective policy in Canada prevent your sending to the United States leather manufactured in Canada?

Mr. BROWN: It was not that feature of it I was condemning; it is the contention that we should not import these hides, that the farmers should be given protection against them. That is the point of the argument I am attacking. To secure raw material is just as necessary to the trade as it is to get the market where you have the leather made.

I must apologize, Mr. Speaker, for taking up the time of the House at such length.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh no.

Mr. BROWN: I have said on many occasions that no man should speak for more than an hour. I have already overstepped my mark, but I have been led off into many highways and byways. However, I hope I have been able to prove the point I set out to prove. I said I was not going to develop a constructive argument, but that I wanted to demolish absolutely the fallacious arguments that had been advanced by members sitting to my right.

An hon. MEMBER: You have done it.

Mr. BROWN: I think I have been able to show with some degree of success the fallacies of the position that they take.

I said I was not going to deal any further with the budget, but I cannot refrain from making a remark in regard to the question that is brought up in the amendment—the reduction of the duties on automobiles. I want to point out, especially for the benefit of the hon. member for Marquette, the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Murphy), and the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hay), that in my election campaign I was opposed by a Conservative. He announced his policy and said that if he got into parliament he would stand for the reduction of the duty on autos. He declared, "That is our policy, that is what we will do."

Mr. MULLINS: That gentleman got defeated, did he not?

Mr. BROWN: He was defeated; but a man who was infinitely more honest in regard to the question of automobile duties was elected.

Mr. MULLINS: I mean your opponent was defeated on that auto question.

Mr. BROWN: I undertook to show that no matter what this particular individual said, it was not his policy that would govern but the policy of the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen. I do not think the people were at all deceived by the statement that he made. At least I took good care that they understood the facts of the case, that when a resolution was introduced into this House a year ago for the reduction of the duty on automobiles the members of that party in large measure—there were six who voted otherwise and others took good care to be absent; anyway, they were absent—that the members of that party to the number of twenty-three voted against the reduction. I did not forget to let the electors know that. On the question of the reduction of the duty on automobiles, I think I am safe in asserting that it will meet with the approval of the people of Manitoba, and I would just like to say for the benefit of my hon. friends that as I took good care that the people were not deceived at the last election, so we will take good care if we have to deal with the matter again to see that the situation is correctly presented to the people and that hon. members will not be able to escape on a technicality.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the hon. gentleman insinuating that we tried to deceive the people on that occasion?

Mr. BROWN: No, nothing of the kind. I am simply pointing out that we will watch with a great deal of interest the votes of hon. members from Manitoba on this particular question.

Mr. MULLINS: I am particularly well satisfied that you specified Marquette, because by your threats you might induce me to run next time.

Mr. BROWN: If I was thinking of things only from the political standpoint I would almost be tempted to hope that the hon. gentleman and his confreres would run, for I am sure they would not be elected. But since the welfare of the country demands that the budget be supported, I naturally hope they will have regard to the national welfare and support the budget, as I intend to.

Mr. J. F. POULIOT (Temiscouata): Sir, several years after a member of this House had described one of his colleagues as "the gramophone of Mackenzie and Mann" and several months before the appearance of the last article of the Montreal Star on the Conservative leadership, a most famous oration was delivered in Hamilton. May I quote the beginning of this speech in the Montreal Gazette of November 17, 1925?

"I do not speak the language of resentment or of bitterness. I speak only the language of truth when I say that never in the history of elections in this Dominion has a great party stooped to methods at once so dishonest and so dangerous as did the Liberal party in the late campaign in the province of Quebec," declared the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, Conservative leader, speaking at a banquet given here to-night by the Wentworth Conservative Association in honour of Gordon C. Wilson, member-elect for Wentworth. "While the Prime Minister," said Mr. Meighen "was talking unity in English-speaking Canada, and was presenting himself as its only true guardian and apostle his lieutenants were adopting every means known to the platform speaker or the pamphleteer to stir up all the old war animosities and to conjure new fears and new hostilities in the minds of the good people of Quebec."

In reply to this statement may I read part of an article headed "The Conservative Party" published in September, 1924, before this famous Hamilton speech?

Is the protectionist party poorly led? The late election (St. Antoine) seems to supply an affirmative answer. . . . . A gathering of Conservatives wedded to protection from which men of note like Mr. Sauve and his eminent colleague, Mr. Patenaude—

He is not so eminent now:

—are conspicuous by their absence, denotes the weakness that neither excuse can explain nor conditions justify. Without unity there is no strength. Why these things are, all know. To paraphrase Chatham, "It is not repealing a piece of parchment that can restore Quebec; you must repeal her fears and her resentment." Leadership is not all, but it is much, as the radiant eras of Macdonald and Laurier attest. Few possess the personal magnetism which compels confidence and loyalty, and the golden tongue of oratory, and we cannot hope to soon look upon the like of these men again.

A convention of delegates drawn from all parties of Canada should be summoned in order that a declaration of principles be drawn up, a spirit of co-operation and confidence cultivated, local leaders consulted, and free expression given to party preference on the subject of leadership. It is the simple truth that for a long time the practice has been to attain the office of leader by descent—

I would like my hon. friends opposite to note those words——and not by selection by representative delegates, and it may well be worth while trying the latter method. For a surety, whoever may lead the party when the fight is on will possess greater prestige, greater authority and greater popularity, if he be the choice of a convention and can rally to his support all who believe the policy he presents best calculated to promote the welfare of Canada. It would be folly to pretend that such a situation now subsists.

That is not taken from Le Soleil or Le Canada, but from the Montreal Gazette, whose chief editor at that time was the present member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) in this House, a firm supporter of the right hon. leader of the opposition.

May I quote another short extract from another Quebec paper? This article is also headed "The Conservative party." It is the title that best suits that kind of article.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, the hon. member for Mount Royal is no longer the editor of the Gazette.

Mr. POULIOT: He was editor when this article was written on September 9, 1924.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: One of the editors.

Mr. POULIOT: The article reads:

The Conservative party, under its present leaders, is beaten now, before the next general elections start.

This was published, not in Le Soleil or Le Canada, but in the Quebec Chronicle, a Tory paper, of September 30, 1924.

I have another quotation from a letter to the Montreal Gazette, dated December 10, 1924, also before the famous Hamilton speech. I will read only the most interesting part of the letter, which I am sure several hon. members have already read. It is also entitled "The Conservative Party," but it is not written by a Liberal:

His defects (Mr. Meighen's) seem to lie in his apparent indifference to changes of public opinion, his dislike of new ideas, his reluctance to analyze current economic problems to which he is not accustomed and which tend to disturb the fixity of his own preconceived opinions, and his seeming lack of discernment and tact in dealing with his fellowmen.

Another apparent defect in Mr. Meighen's leadership is his overweening desire to preserve a semblance of personal consistency in his political opinions. The electors are only slightly interested in the aberrant mental growth of any individual, whether he be leader of the government or of the opposition.

Yet when Mr. Meighen comes to Quebec, his addresses seem to sound a note of challenge to each of his hearers to find any flaw or fault in the conduct, during the war, of the administration of which he was a member; and he thus provokes a division and vote upon issues which had best be deemed dead and buried and upon which he can never hope to procure in this province a popular verdict favourable to himself and to his colleagues of the old regime.

The Conservative electors of this province frequently express regret that the Conservative leader seems to regard the consistency of his own personal history as of so much more vital importance than the future progress and prosperity of the country, that, instead of utilizing existing conditions as a means of restoring the Conservative party to place and power, he ignores the problems of the present and creates widespread distrust by diverting public attention to the dead issues of the past in respect to which he may never expect the approval of a large majority of the Quebec constituencies.

As I said, this was published in the Montreal Gazette of December 10, 1924, and after having read that I am sure the right hon. leader of the opposition must have said to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, "Tu quoque, Brute."

The other day my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) quoted a letter from a gentleman of the province of Quebec about home-made carpets. I asked him if the letter came from Mr. Patenaude, and he said:

No, but I do say this, that a lot better things come from Mr. Patenaude than from my hon. friend, judging by some of the speeches he has delivered in this House.

Well, I may be able to please my hon. friend from Fort William this time by quoting and allowing him to read in Hansard tomorrow morning, as he is not in his seat at the moment, a false argument made by Mr. Patenaude himself in his maiden speech at St. Laurent last fall, on the 19th of September. In that speech, which has been reported by all the papers, Mr. Patenaude stated two things which are contradictory, and which show his insincerity. First he said:

I do not intend to create a third party.

Next he said:

I am free of Mr. King as well as of Mr. Meighen.

Now these two things are contradictory. If he was not going to create a third party, how could he be independent of Mr. Meighen and Mr. King? That is very hard to understand. May I quote to the House what took place at a joint meeting held during the last election?

A man in the audience asked:

If it is true that you are free of Mr. Meighen as well as of Mr. King, on which side, you Patenaude candidates, will you sit in the House?

We will stand up.

Anybody familiar with the rules of the House knows that no hon. member can stand in the House while another member has the floor. But so few Patenaude candidates were elected that this statement is not of any consequence. A man in the audience said:

"You say you will stand up if you are elected. That is too tiresome. To give you a chance to rest we will force you to stay home."

Now, Sir, what was the real purpose of Mr. Patenaude in running as Liberal Conservative leader in the province of Quebec? Was he influenced by motives of patriotism? Did he act as the result of money considerations? No, I think it was capitalism that pushed him into the fight. The matter is very well explained in an article in the Montreal Gazette, and it seems that I am destined to quote mainly from Tory papers to-night. The article in question appeared in the Montreal Gazette of September 22, 1925, and contained the following statement:

Mr. Patenaude has entered the federal field to turn out the King government.

This with respect to a man who is supposed to be independent. The article goes on to say:

He has no praise for its work, no respect for its policy of drift, only contempt for politicians without stable views who count noses before they determine lines of legislation. Mr. Patenaude is not a Janus.

I do not know who wrote that article. I do not know whether it was the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) or somebody else. Whoever the writer was he made a big mistake because if Mr. Patenaude was not a Janus he did not always tell the truth. I continue quoting:

He has not two faces looking in opposite directions, but is a man of fixed convictions and firm resolution, fit to be trusted. His platform is made of Conservative planks. While steadfast in support of the constitution and of the rights of Quebec, in the broad spirit as well as the narrow letter of that charter, he believes, as he well may, that a prosperous and contented French-Canadian province contributes enormously to the prosperity and contentment of the whole Dominion, in the general welfare of which he is deeply concerned. His return to a larger arena of political activity—

His return was stopped, by the way.

—than he has recently engaged in is one of the most hopeful signs of the day, hopeful for the success of Conservative principles, hopeful for new policies in government, hopeful for the hush of provincial strife and the burying of issues long dead. It is the present and the future that concern Canadians. They are in a rut. The country drifts without strong leadership and sage counsel, such as men of the type of Mr. Patenaude can supply. Behind him, we believe, will rally men of good purpose and strong patriotism, men who are convinced that conditions call for change of government. To all these the new provincial leader appeals for support, and that appeal, we are confident, will not be made in vain.

It has been made in vain. How did Mr. Patenaude's friends try to turn out the King government? The story is very interesting. I will read another quotation from the same Tory paper, and the gentleman speaking is not a Liberal but a die-hard Tory, Dr. Thibaudeau, of Two Mountains. His speech was made at a convention to choose a Conservative candidate, and Dr. Thibaudeau, who as I have said is a genuine Tory, expressed himself as follows:

Dr. Thibaudeau said his impression was that Mr. Fauteux, who was too good a man to risk a seat, would have a better chance elsewhere.

He was a bad prophet, that fellow. The report goes on to say:

A hint was then dropped by the speaker about the unpopularity of Hon. Mr. Meighen, for which reason he would support Mr. Filion, who, being a new man had had no relation with the federal leader of the party.

Mr. Filion is Mr. Patenaude's legal partner. that is the reason why he is such a good man, according to Mr. Thibaudeau. The report goes on to say:

The convention should therefore consider the letter before them as final as regards the decision therein. He supposed, he said, that Hon. Mr. Fauteux had realized the unpopularity of Mr. Meighen would reflect on him in such a way as that it would be impossible to overcome in the country that obstacle to his election.

That speech was made at the Conservative convention at St. Eustache, and is reported in the Montreal Gazette of September 28, 1925.

Now, may I quote a little interview that was published by Le Devoir of September 30, 1925. I will translate the interview, which is in French, for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite:

An old Conservative member from Ontario, very well known for his military and financial activities, was lunching last week with a Montreal friend.

"Colonel, are you interested in the elections? You are a die-hard Conservative."

"Yes, a Conservative, as there are very few now in politics."

"But they say that Mr. Meighen's party is very strong in Ontario."

"Not amongst the out-and-out Conservatives. He is not considered as a Conservative and he has none of the characteristics of the true Conservative. He is not safe. He falls into state socialism and seems to be a visionnaire. May I tell you a thing that will perhaps surprise you; I, an old member, a veteran of politics, who hears the bugle call like an old war horse, in election time, I go. . . . .hunting. And several friends of mine will do the same. We wish that Mr. Meighen is beaten in his own constituency, sa that we might get rid of him once for all.

These sentiments were uttered by a gentleman clearly indicated as an old Tory member of the province of Ontario. This gentleman's name is not given in the paper but it has never been denied.

Mr. FOSTER: He would be a great friend of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, I do not know whether he ever made a horse trade, or whether he ever indulged in horse racing, but what he said is horse sense. If my hon. friend desires me to do so I will quote the words uttered by Sir Robert Borden in this House in 1915, and then he will hear those words again. May I quote now from the Montreal Gazette of September 19, 1925, a report of a speech by the right hon. leader of the opposition in Charlottetown. The right hon. gentleman is reported to have said on that occasion:

The principles which the Conservative party had advocated in the last election campaign were intact, Mr. Meighen said. Conservatives came before the country with no broken pledges.

This was before the Hamilton speech. May I now give a quotation from the speech of a prominent Conservative gentleman, Mr. Thomas Louis Bergeron. It is reported in Le Soleil, of September 22, 1925. He said:

As for me in the present election, I support the Liberal candidate Mr. Sylvestre. Since 1917 I have fought with you, Liberals, against the ideas of the Conservative leader. Since 1917, did Mr. Meighen abandon his political ideas? I find the same men with him.

And sometimes when I look round at the House I am surprised to see the same men who were with Sir Robert Borden when he was in the House. I should like to repeat to my hon. friends the old Greek proverb: "Tell me whom you go with and I will tell you who you are." It is old Greek wisdom. Some time ago there was an interesting editorial in the Toronto Mail and Empire. I went to the library to get it, but I found that the page had been cut out of the file. I was able to find the editorial, however, in a French paper, and I will give an extract from it in English for the benefit of my hon. friends: Referring to the leader of the opposition, this was published in the editorial page of the Toronto Mail and Empire of December 14, 1925, page 28:

He does not presume to tie his party up to a mode of procedure that has his present-day approval.

Some time ago my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) made a short speech of five hours. I asked him when he adjourned the debate on Wednesday afternoon if he would be good enough to read also a part of his Toronto speech. This was a great speech, and I note it was published in extenso in the Montreal Star the same day it was delivered in Toronto; that is good information service. I read from Hansard of February 17, as follows:

Mr. Pouliot: Would the hon. member be good enough to read also part of his Toronto speech?

Mr. Cahan: As it is now six o'clock, I will reserve that for to-morrow, when I am perfectly willing to read the whole of it if the hon. gentleman will repeat his question.

As I did not repeat the question and he did not read the speech, I will have the pleasure of dealing with it myself. I have here a copy in extenso of the report in the Montreal Star of December 8, 1925.

Mr. CAHAN: Do you not think it was a very good speech?

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot judge of it, and I must leave it to the House to judge. I am sorry the right hon. leader of the opposition is not here. He is the man who could judge of the appropriateness of the speech.

Mr. CAHAN: What is your opinion?

Mr. POULIOT: I am sorry that some hon. members speak in a Liberal way and vote in a Conservative way.

Mr. CAHAN: When has any issue embodied in the Hamilton speech ever been before this House in a vote?

Mr. POULIOT: Louder, please.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member insinuated with respect to myself that I speak in a Liberal way and vote in a Conservative way.

I ask the hon. member whether that applied to my speech. Was that not a good Conservative speech, and does it not meet with the approval of the Liberals of the province of Quebec also?

Mr. POULIOT: I am very sorry that my hon. friend speaks against his leader and votes with him. That is the point. If he spoke in a Liberal way, how is it he never supported the Liberal party in this House?

Mr. CAHAN: The government has never introduced a real Liberal measure in this House to be voted upon since I came here.

Mr. POULIOT: It is a very funny thing that when my hon. friend goes to Toronto, which is a Tory city, he thinks Liberal, and when he is in Ottawa he thinks Conservative.

Mr. CAHAN: When he is in Toronto he speaks good Conservative doctrine and when he is in Ottawa he also speaks good Conservative doctrine, and in the province of Quebec he speaks also in the same way.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall be very glad tc read his speech myself.

Mr. CAHAN: I offered to read it and I will be very glad if my hon. friend will read it.

Mr. POULIOT: The right hon. leader of the opposition would be a little surprised at the language used by my hon. friend in Toronto, where he had no reason to meet with any kind of obstruction. On December 8, 1925, a year after the famous letter in the Montreal Gazette which has been quoted, he made that speech. It is directed against the leader of the opposition. It was late in the fall, just before the winter. This seems to be a yearly occurrence. I will read it:

> It may be that the personal policy which Mr. Meighen recently announced at Hamilton, and more recently at Bagot, may temporarily turn the tide of local sentiment; but speaking also personally, with a quite intimate knowledge of the views and sentiments which generally prevail in the province of Quebec—

What does my hon. friend know about the sentiments which prevail in Saint Jean de Dieu, Notre-Dame du Lac and Saint Paul de la Croix?

Mr. CAHAN: Does the hon. gentleman want a reply to that?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: I think that generally speaking I know the sentiment of Quebec quite as well as my hon. friend. I knew the sentiment of Quebec before he was born. I have lived there and been in contact with a large part of Quebec as long as he has, and I think the statements I have made with regard to the sentiment of Quebec are amply justified.

Mr. POULIOT: I will continue; I am very sorry for the interruption because it breaks the charm of the quotation:

> I do not believe that the Hamilton pronouncement will be regarded, either in Quebec or in the other provinces of Canada, as binding upon the conscience and judgment of the Conservative party as a whole, nor as controlling the discretion of parliament, whenever grave international complications may arise in the future. Nor do I believe that such a pronouncement made by a political leader, however able and esteemed he may be, will serve to remove permanently the estrangement which at present exists between Quebec and the majority of the provinces outside of Quebec.

This is honey or maple syrup in a barrel of vinegar.

> Personally, I am confident that a clear understanding could be reached by which these vital interests could be dealt with effectively by the Conservative party of Canada, which has now the largest representation in the House of Commons, but that end and object can only be attained by maintaining unity and solidarity of the Conservatives throughout all Canada—

I do not know whether it is by speaking against the right hon. leader of the party that my hon. friend wanted to promote confidence amongst the members of the party. The letter continues:

> —and, more than that, the unity of the Conservative party in Canada can only be maintained if and so long as the leader or leaders of the Conservative party shall avoid all mere temporary expedients.

The right hon. leader of the opposition must know that this comes from one of his supporters, one of his best friends who always votes for him. I would not dare believe that if it had not come from a Tory. If a Liberal had said that to me, I would have answered: You do not know Mr. Meighen. Mr. Meighen must be better than that. But this comes from one of his closest friends, a man who has voted with him since the beginning of this session, so what can I say. I say: He knows him very well; it must be true. What I would not believe from another fellow, I am bound to believe when it comes from the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). He says he knows the people of Quebec very well. He is a psychoanalyst; he has studied psychology and he must know the leader of the opposition very well. When his name is mentioned in the papers, he is called not only by his first name and his family name, but it is always Mr. So-and-So, the eminent Montreal lawyer. I do not think that kind of lawyer defends his leader very much even in Ontario. I do not like to be disagreeable to my hon. friend;

I respect him very much and this is why I am surprised that he has revealed such a secret. This is not what happened to Noah. When Noah was drunk, his sons were told to bring a blanket to cover him, but my hon. friend uncovers his leader. This is perhaps why he has lately defended the sale of liquor. The hon. member continued:

But that end and object can only be attained by maintaining unity and solidarity of the Conservatives throughout all Canada, and, more than that, the unity of the Conservative party in Canada can only be maintained if and so long as the leader or leaders of the Conservative party shall avoid all mere temporary expedients and all off-hand and captious decisions, and shall call to their councils for the due consideration of these questions the representatives of all sections of this wide Dominion.

Is it not great? This is one of the best orations I have ever read in my life.

Mr. CAHAN: What objection does the hon. member have to it?

Mr. POULIOT: I have this objection, that I think party supporters must have respect for and show loyalty to their leaders. That is my point. I show loyalty to my leader; I am ready to defend him because I am proud of him. If my hon. friend is not satisfied with his leader, the only thing for him to do is to vote against him, come over to our side and vote with us.

Mr. CAHAN: However much I may differ or may have differed from my right hon. leader, he is so far superior to any leader on the opposite side and his measures are so far superior that an independent man could not but endorse them.

Mr. POULIOT: I have only one question to ask of my hon. friend. Were my quotations correct?

Mr. CAHAN: I think so, as nearly as I can remember.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all I want.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): When the hon. member refers to the leader of his party, does he mean the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Mackenzie King) or the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke)?

Mr. POULIOT: Our party is the Liberal party and we are very glad to defend our leader the Prime Minister, when he is attacked in such a dirty way as he has been attacked in Quebec by some of the Patenaude speakers. I am glad my hon. friend has brought the question up. I will answer him immediately by quoting an extract from a speech by Mr. L. J. Gauthier, a former member of this House, and I am sure that this extract from his speech will not meet with the hon. member's approval.

I am sorry the leader of the opposition is not in his seat. I would ask him if he approved of what was repeated throughout Quebec by the ill-fated L. J. Gauthier. I dare not believe so. May I quote the following to the shame of that Patenaude speaker? I take this quotation from a small French Tory paper called "L'Homme Libre" under date of Saturday, September 12, 1925. I wish to quote it because it was said in my constituency at Rivière-du-Loup, and I heard that fellow himself say the following:—

En remaniant la maison de Laurier, en vendant sa bibliothèque à l'encan, je dis que M. King a porté une main criminelle sur l'idole de la race. La salle où le grand homme d'état travaillait à résoudre les problèmes angoissants de l'avenir du pays, M. King l'a transformée en une salle de danse.

Et ensuite cette vieille canaille de Gauthier disait:

Ma réponse, la voici. Continuez à salir ma réputation; continuez à salir mes cheveux blancs, je continuerai à combattre pour ce que je crois être les meilleurs intérêts de mon pays et personne ne pourra m'empêcher de proclamer la vérité.

May I translate this:

By making alterations to Laurier house, by selling Laurier's books by auction, I say that Mr. King has put a criminal hand on the idol of the nation. The library where the great statesman studied such important problems relating to the future of the country, Mr. King has changed it into a dance hall. . . .

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: Will any hon. member on the other side take the responsibility of what has been said there? They are good at shouting "Hear, hear", but they are not good at getting up.

Continue to throw dirt on my reputation. . . .

This is the way the old dirty scoundrel was speaking:

Continue to throw dirt on my reputation, continue to throw dirt on my white hair; I will not cease to fight for what I think are the best interests of my country, and nobody will prevent me from proclaiming the truth.

This is one of the most infamous and direct lies uttered by a filthy liar who suffers from halitosis of speech. Laurier's books never belonged to the Prime Minister. They were left to Sir Wilfrid Laurier's nephew, Mr. Robert Laurier. They were his own property; they have never been the property of the Prime Minister, and Mr. Robert Laurier has given me some of those books which bear the signature of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The Prime Minister could never have sold those books; they did not belong to him; he never had them in his possession, but this is the way that fellow—I do not say that gentleman because he is not a gentleman—spoke in the province of Quebec. He said that the Prime Minister had converted the library of Laurier house into a dance hall. This is absolutely false, for there is no dance hall in that house. It is a remarkable fact that Mr. Gauthier has never been invited to Laurier house since the Prime Minister's occupancy of it, and this perhaps may in part explain his ill feeling. This only gives you an idea of the sort of campaign that was conducted not only in the province of Quebec generally but in my own constituency. And to make his statements emphatic, to give to them a greater show of sincerity, he would say, "Look upon my white hairs and ask yourselves whether I would be untrue." Now that is the way in which the tariff was discussed in the province of Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that all?

Mr. POULIOT: I could mention a good many more instances. There are a large number of potato growers in my constituency and during the election the friends and supporters of Mr. Patenaude frequently told the farmers there that they might as well dispose of their product because they would never get more than a dollar a bushel for it in the event of Mr. King's coming into power. Many of the people, believing this, sold their potatoes, with the result that they suffered a great loss, while those who held on to their crop have been rewarded with prices of $2, $2.50 and $3. I see by L'Evenement of March 18 that potatoes were selling at that time at $2.65, and on April 27 the price was $3.65.

I do not think that the leader of the opposition was quite serious when he moved on June 2, 1925, the resolution from which I take the following:

> To preserve and enlarge the Canadian market for Canadian farm products—this Dominion requires an immediate revision of the Canadian tariff on a definitely and consistently protective basis. That such revision should apply to natural products such as farm products, fish and coal with no less thoroughness than to manufactured goods.

If I understand English at all, I gather that the right hon. gentleman considered that it would be a boon to the farmers of Canada to have protection, and high protection. What did the same gentleman declare in the House on April 8? I will not weary the House with any long extract but I want to quote just a few words:

> Mr. Ross (Moose Jaw): You contend that if the tariff is taken off the prices immediately rise?
> Mr. Meighen: We contend it and we know it, because we see the facts.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Last year the right hon. gentleman told us that if we had protection for agriculture, as well as generally, Canada would be a paradise for farmers inasmuch as they could dispose of their products at very satisfactory prices. This year he says that if the tariff is removed the prices for farm products in this country will go up. Vérité au delà des Pyrénées, erreur en deça. His two arguments are entirely contradictory: what he said on April 8 altogether refutes his own argument and the arguments of his friends with reference to tariff protection for the farmers.

It is not at all surprising that in the province of Quebec the Tory party has no considerable following; the fact is easily explained. When Sir Robert Borden was Prime Minister he made an important statement on April 15, 1915, as will be seen at page 2612 of Hansard of that session. I quote:

> And let me say now, for the benefit of parliament, and particularly for the information of persons throughout this country who may be concerned in selling supplies or materials to the government, that if any man in Canada, be he Conservative or Liberal, proposes to commit any fraud or imposition upon the government and people of this country, or to be concerned in any attempt for that purpose, especially in connection with the war vote, he should remember that there are courts of justice in this country, and that the doors of the penitentiary are yawning for every man who commits such an offence.

I am free to refer to this matter, for in my own constituency, although I supported a candidate so long as he acted honourably, the moment he did wrong I denounced him, in spite of the fact that he belonged to the same party as myself. I was not in politics then but when he afterwards opposed my election I beat him by some 3,000 votes. He declared that I was a bad Liberal; but what did he do himself in the last election? Why, he supported the Patenaude Tory candidate.

If there are some very nice fellows on the other side of the House there are others who bear the stigma of graft on their forehead, and during the war, while money was spent legitimately in many ways, there was a great deal that was used for purposes of graft. What was done then was disgraceful and if it were necessary for me to-night to give a catalogue of the scandals that occurred between the years 1911 and 1921 my speech would cover a period of years. It would last at least ten years, for session after session during the Borden-Meighen administration some scandal or other was unearthed. That is why the people have no confidence in the Conservative party. There are nice fellows on that side, I admit; indeed I have personal friends among them. But there are also black sheep in the Conservative family. I do not suppose,

Mr. Speaker, that anyone will raise a point of order in reference to what I am now saying; everybody knows that it is true, and it was a disgrace to the country that such a state of affairs should have been tolerated.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil): I must ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark. The term "black sheep" is not parliamentary.

Mr. POULIOT: I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker. I will use the word "golden fleece." Now I come to the question of the railways. I saw by Le Devoir of September 19 that the leader of the opposition had a proposal to settle the railway problem if he got into power. He is not in power and perhaps that is why we have not heard anything about it. Let me quote also, from the Montreal Gazette of September 14, 1925, a speech delivered by the right hon. leader of the opposition:

> They—
> That is, the Liberals
> —have driven the Canadian National system into a financial bog under the pretence of giving it fair play, and from the swamp in which it is mired it can never be rescued by the government of Premier Mackenzie King.

Let me quote a little further from this report. The same gentleman said:

> The government had asked for the resignation of the members of that board, and thrown them "out on the ash-heap". One or two of the members had been reappointed, but the new appointees of the government were inexperienced individuals who were given the appointments for political reasons.

When the board of management are able to show such satisfactory results, I do think they should be encouraged instead of being referred to in these deprecating terms. Let my right hon. friend give the board of management a chance. I have before me the last annual report of the Canadian National Railways, and it is so satisfactory that I am not surprised it has been so well received by the country. The board of management state that they do not wish to have any political intereference. They are right, and they are not. As the representatives of the people, it is our duty to ask questions about the Canadian National Railways before we vote money on their behalf. Whether they come before the House to ask for money because the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway was over-valued when that road was taken over as part of the National system is not the question. We should know why we are asked to vote that money, and even if some of the information required by members is of a confidential nature we should have it, at least in a confidential way. We are in the position towards the Canadian National Railways that a banker is towards his client. He is interested in his client's business, and when that client comes to him for a loan, the banker has a perfect right to say, "Well, Sir, I will grant you the loan provided you furnish me with a satisfactory statement of your business." We are pretty much in the same position towards the National railways: we do not ask for information for our own personal benefit, but for the benefit of our constituents and for the country at large. I wish to give a word of praise to Sir Henry Thornton, who seems to be doing his best to conciliate the different interests in the Canadian National Railways. Under his management I am sure the system will to a great extent be a success.

Now a word with respect to the public service. There are some very capable people in the civil service, some who have grown up in it and are interested in their work, a work that enables them to help along the good government of this country. Such public servants deserve praise. But let me say that every civil servant should be judged according to his personal ability and that no secret society interference or other influence should enter into the consideration of his promotion.

Before closing, Sir, I should like to direct the attention of the House to two articles which appeared last November in the Montreal Gazette. One refers to an address delivered by Sir John Aird as retiring president of the Canadian Bankers' Association and is entitled "A Hopeful Outlook." The other article refers to the annual report of the Bank of Montreal for the year ending October 31 last, and is headed "An Encouraging Statement." The first article appeared in the Montreal Gazette of November 16, 1925, the second in the issue of November 27, 1925. We can look not only to the editorial page but to the financial columns of every newspaper, whatever may be its political views, and find ample testimony to the fact that Canada is rapidly improving her position, that the hard days are past, and that she is now entering an era of prosperity under the prime ministership of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Mackenzie King.)

Some time ago, Mr. Speaker, I said that there are nice people on the other side of the House. I do not say that of them all, but of some, those I know best. That is my sincere opinion. While I do not admit the soundness of their programme, I think we should all unite in promoting measures for the national welfare, and I am sure the country would be all the better for this unity of action.

Mr. FRANKLIN SMOKE (Brant): Mr. Speaker, one thing I have noticed to-night, and I have noticed it also on previous occasions is that there is a very great difference between the manner of the speaker who has just resumed his seat when he is outside and when he is inside this chamber. Outside he has a smiling face and charming manner, which certainly appeals to me and I am sure must appeal to other members who meet him. The tone of his address, however, in the House, Mr. Speaker, is so objectionable, even to his own colleagues, that I feel they must hang their heads with some degree of shame when listening to such remarks as those made by him to-night. If this is the way in which the national issues were discussed in his own province during the last campaign, we need not wonder at the decision then given by the people of Quebec. The question of the tariff apparently was never discussed there. I do not think that such an address tends to elevate the tone of this House. It would be a want of respect on my part to this House if I devoted any time whatever to remarks along that line. While his remarks appeared to cause some degree of merriment on the opposite side of the House, I should hope that the spirit of his speech does not appeal to the better sense of hon. gentlemen opposite.

As a new member of this House, though not by any means the youngest, I have thought it my duty not only to my constituents and myself but also, Sir, to you and the other members of this House to sit back and pay heed to the occasional words of wisdom which might happen to fall from those better versed in parliamentary procedure and in the public business of the country.

I have been much interested and fully occupied in feeling my way about, in endeavouring perhaps, first of all, to learn the first principles of parliamentary procedure; perhaps next, in paying heed to the way in which those members of the administration who occupy seats in this House have sought, though sought in vain, to justify both their right to administer and their administrative acts, activity or inactivity; and next, in observing the way in which those who have criticized the government and its acts have performed their task. I have willingly sat back to listen to the older and more experienced members of this House and, indeed, to very many new members, and when I have observed the splendid way in which all these hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have acquitted themselves, I have felt that my silence up to this point has been justified.

My constituents, I may say, do not expect me to take a prominent part in the debates of the House. They are very inexacting in this respect. I believe they will be quite satisfied if I do my share in the work they sent me here to do, namely, to give my support to our right hon. leader—and we do not ask lessons from the opposite side of the House as to our leadership; we are all loyally devoted to our venerated leader—in the splendid effort he and his supporters, and in fact the great bulk of the Canadian people, have made and are making to hurl from power the most incapable government this country has yet seen.

I did not come to this parliament imbued with the idea that all of our statesmen of the past have failed to grasp the essential principles of government, nor with the enthusiasm, often misdirected, of youth. I have attempted to read history and to study mankind, and to learn from these studies those lessons which only such studies can teach. We are heirs of the ages and should, from the wisdom of the ages, have acquired some wisdom ourselves. We should not forget that problems as great as we at present are faced with have presented themselves in all past ages since the beginning of time; and that the condition of things existing at present is the composite result of the best minds of all times. Our present constitution is the composite result of the labours of our forefathers and predecessors, arrived at after full discussion of all the pros and cons, and I am satisfied that the works of our forefathers have resulted in a constitution and a set of laws, perhaps not the best, but good enough until we or our posterity can evolve a better; and that we should go slowly in making changes.

What we have is the result of centuries of careful thought and development, and should command and receive some degree of veneration from the present generation, and changes made either in our system of government or in details should not be made hastily or without the best consideration we can give to them; we should not forget, in our haste for change, the struggles of the past from which our present laws have resulted. In this sense I claim to be a Conservative, and I am proud to admit allegiance to the party which adheres to Conservative principles—never averse to change when it is clearly shown that the change is for the better; but until so shown I prefer to stick to what has come down to us as a result of the experience of the ages.

We found ourselves called to assemble in the first session of the fifteenth parliament of Canada, presumably to do the business of the country. We found no business to do, or rather, no business which the government had ready for us to do. When we got here we found it was not the country's business but the private affairs of the members of the government that were to engage our attention; and that until we said whether the right hon. gentleman who was Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) during the fourteenth parliament and several other hon. gentlemen, half of whom were and half of whom were not members of this parliament, should continue to administer the affairs of the country when the people of the country, by their votes at the polls in an election called at a time which the government thought would be favourable to them, and on issues selected by them, had expressed their want of confidence in the government, we should not do any business. And even after that question was decided, the government ruled that we should not do any business until a further period of six weeks, or such part thereof as might have remained, should have elapsed.

The Speech from the Throne does not promise the legislation outlined in pre-election addresses, all of which have been thrown into the discard. This government is consistent only in its inconsistency. It is impossible of characterization by even such an epigrammatist as George Bernard Shaw. As a government it is the laughing-stock of the civilized world.

There is a parallel to the situation here recently exhibited in New South Wales. I shall quote from the Spectator, London, of February 27, 1926, and by the way the editor of that paper was until quite recently—and he still is on the editorial staff—Mr. J. St. Loe Strachey, who kindly presented to this parliament and the people of Canada a bust of Lord Durham. The Spectator is perhaps the most high-class of English weeklies, and is respected by all English-speaking people in the world who know its traditions. It says:

> Last week we wrote about the constitutional crisis in New South Wales. In the Times of Wednesday we read that events there have taken an unexpected turn. At the instance of Mr. Lang, the Labour Premier, the Governor, Sir Dudley de Chair, had consented to a swamping nomination of members to the legislative council. Mr. Lang was intent upon abolishing the council, which he calls a reactionary body, though in fact it has always interpreted its revising duties temperately. This nomination to the council of twenty-five new members was the largest ever made in the history of New South Wales. Mr. Lang assumed that his nominees would vote for political suicide. But he was mistaken. In vain he threatened that if the members of the council were obstinate he would deprive them of the rights to prefix "Honourable" before their names, and to travel free on the Sydney tramways. By a majority of six the council threw out the motion to restore the Abolition bill to the business paper.
> We wonder what will happen now. Very likely Mr. Lang will ask the Governor for a fresh and still more swamping nomination. But by that time feeling in New South Wales will have grown even stronger than it is now against Mr. Lang's passion for having a so-called democratic state run by a Labour caucus. Mr. Lang has a tiny majority in form only; numerically he is in a minority.

Note the parallel:

> —yet he has tried to pass a startling series of measures which were not mentioned at the elections. How strange that such things should be done with a straight face in the name of democracy!

The issues upon which the government chose to go to the people were outlined at considerable length by the Prime Minister in his Richmond Hill speech on the 5th of September last. Finding that the people, by their votes, did not approve of the policies laid down at Richmond Hill parliament was summoned for another purpose and a Speech from the Throne was placed in the mouth of His Excellency which ignored entirely the principles laid down at Richmond Hill. Not one single feature appearing in the Speech from the Throne was a real feature in the election campaign.

Among other matters featured in the Speech from the Throne was the selection of a Tariff Advisory Board, whose duty it would be to investigate all matters of tariff adjustment and to report to the government. The government took great merit to itself in professing to take the tariff out of politics, to the extent, at least, of having, before making any changes, the benefit of advice from the Tariff Advisory Board and its experts.

One of the most radical changes in the tariff which this country has seen in many years was brought down in the budget speech of the hon. the Finance Minister on the 15th of April, the result of which, so far as the government know and so far as anybody else can know at the present, may be the complete wiping out of an industry in which it is said from seventy-five to a hundred millions of capital is invested. In support of this change in the tariff the only reason the Finance Minister gave in the budget speech was that there seems to be a widespread opinion that the tariff on automobiles is too high. He did not say—for he could not say—that a thorough investigation had been made by experts qualified to pass judgment on the question and that this tariff change was justifiable. Thus, within eight days of the passing of the order in council reporting the personnel of the Tariff Advisory Board, this government flouted the board and announced to the world that, no matter what the Tariff Advisory Board may say or do, this government is actuated solely by a turbulent clamour that somebody in business in Canada is making a little more money than he should make.

These sudden changes in policy cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be justified on the ground of principle but only on the ground of expediency. It is a last desperate effort on the part of this government to hang on to the reins of office through appeals which they think will secure votes. In this connection we are reminded of the couplet appearing in the Bigelow papers, of James Russel Lowell:

> A marciful Providence fashioned us holler
> O' purpose that we might our principles swaller."

And also in the following from the same author:

> "I du believe in prayer and praise
> To him thet hez the grantin'
> Of jobs, in everything thet pays,
> But most of all in cantin'.
> This duth my cup with marcies fill,
> This lays all thought o' sin to rest.
> I don't believe in princerple,
> But I du in interest!"

It is not my intention, however, to pursue the course which I have observed most frequently during the debates which have taken place in the process of arguing before this House the economic questions which were so thoroughly discussed in election speeches during the October campaign and to support it with statistics. It strikes me that that feature has been fully covered and if repeated further, should be by someone better qualified than I am. Rather than go into general principles, I would ask the House to bear with me while I inform it of the local conditions which prevail in my own constituency and which are characteristic of a hundred other constituencies and try to point out some of the object lessons to which it would be wise on the part of the government to pay some heed.

My riding, Brant, consists of about half rural and half urban population. As part of the city of Brantford and most of the suburbs dependent on the city are in my riding, I claim an equal interest—as I have an equal right—with the hon. member for Brantford to deal with the situation there.

It should be our effort to discover what was the verdict of the electorate on the 29th of October; and if and when discovered, to give effect to it; and I can, I believe, best devote the time which I intend to take in this debate by acquainting the House with local conditions.

To question the fact that the tariff was the great, and in fact the only, question which decided the result of the election in both Brant ridings, would be trifling with the matter, and I hope the House will appreciate this fact and bear with me in what I have to say.

Dealing first with the riding of Brantford, it will be remembered by some that in the general election campaign of 1921 Mr. W. G. Raymond was elected as a Liberal by a majority of about 2,000. Brantford is, or at least it was prior to 1921, a great industrial city, and we all on this side of the House hope it will not be long before she is restored to her former proud and enviable position. The present Prime Minister was brought to Brantford in the 1921 campaign and on Mr. Raymond's platform gave the people of Brantford the assurance that no change would be made in the tariff which would injuriously affect Brantford industries, relying on which promises the electors of Brantford chose Mr. Raymond as their representative. These promises were not kept. When the definite vote came which resulted in so great a disaster to the Brantford industries and has practically closed many of them down, Mr. Raymond is said to have protested but the legislation went through notwithstanding his protest, and having made his protest Mr. Raymond after all supported the government in its general policy. The result to Brantford was the loss in four years of one-seventh of its population, most of whom formed part of the exodus of over half a million who went to the United States during that period. The condition as regards unemployment was deplorable and the financial loss cannot be computed.

At the general elections of the 29th of October last, the people of Brantford rose en masse, defeated Mr. Raymond by about 2,500, and elected for its representative a consistent advocate of adequate protection, who can be relied upon at all times to uphold the interests of his constituents not only when the particular measures intended to benefit the city are in question, but even if such should be the case, as it was in the last House, when its interests were jeopardized by the government in power, if the government should be the government led by our right hon. leader.

The result of this state of affairs in the city of Brantford was, of course, apparent not only in the three polling divisions of the city which form part of my riding of Brant but also in the suburbs and throughout the whole country, the latter for many reasons. Many of the suburban residents derived their living in Brantford and were equally affected by the depressions in the city. Factory after factory closed down and the most of those that did not close down went on short time. There being such an exodus and so great a want of employment among those who stayed, the home market for the poultrymen and the market gardeners was demoralized and this class of the population suffered accordingly not only by a reduced population in Brantford and Paris but by the inability of those who remained to buy, due to the fact that they were unemployed and had perforce to draw in their belts in lieu of taking a hearty meal. The inequitability of tariff rates,—that is, those on produce coming into Canada as compared with the rates of duty on goods going into the United States,—was a great factor in the country districts. Importations from the warmer climates.—early fruits and early vegetables—to the Brantford and Paris markets satiating the appetites of the consumers before the domestic varieties could mature, affected the price of similar products in the country round about when later on their products reached the mature and marketable stage. This worked to the disadvantage of the home producer. It reduced the prices he was able to get for his early vegetables and, to the extent of the amount of foreign goods consumed, displaced just so much of the products of the Canadian farmer and the market gardener. People must eat. If they do not eat foreign goods, they eat domestic products. It may be what is left over from the last season's crop but if not as palatable, it is quite as nutritious or nearly so, as the imported article. The home market was completely demoralized. The fiscal policy was responsible for the slowing down or stoppage of the factories, caused much unemployment, and the exodus referred to. Is it any wonder that there was such a revulsion of feeling in both rural and urban sections of the country!

I have told the result in the riding of Brantford. Brant has, with the exception of two previous parliaments, been Liberal since confederation, the majorities being up in the several hundreds and sometimes over one thousand. The recent election resulted in a Conservative majority of 978 out of a total vote polled of a little over 7,000. It was recognized by the Liberal party that, there being a Progressive in the field, it would be impossible to elect a Liberal and after giving the matter consideration for the best part of a month, the candidate who had received the nomination from the Liberal convention withdrew and left the field to the Progressive and myself, the machine Liberals trying, though ineffectually, to stampede all former Liberals into the Progressive camp.

To arrive at the result that was arrived at in the riding of Brant, this government must surely understand that at least 500 and perhaps 1,000 of their former most staunch friends and supporters changed their allegiance in the recent campaign. Is it the intention of this government to ignore entirely these staunch former supporters who always were quite as good citizens and quite as good Liberals as any who have remained in the Liberal party? They exercised some independence in their judgment. They saw the trend of affairs. It was not easy for them to renounce their allegiance to the Liberal party. Only those people voted Liberal in the last election who were either not thorough students of public affairs and who had been former Liberals and followed their party as a matter of course, or those who had been and would remain Liberals through thick and through thin no matter what those at the head of the Liberal party might say or do. I do appeal to this government to pay some heed to those Liberals who most reluctantly left their party in the last campaign and who would no doubt be glad to go back to their party if the leaders would only get their eyes open and listen to reason.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it was the tariff that was the one and only issue in the good old riding of Brant. Liberal and Progressive speakers take great delight in accusing us of being in favour of a high tariff. This is a false accusation except in so far as it applies to the tariff on poultry and garden produce. On these I say and believe, with my honoured leader and all his supporters, we should apply the motto: "Brick for brick." As for manufacturing industries, however, our motto is: An adequate tariff to insure that an industry run efficiently and economically, shall be able to operate at a reasonable profit and that the tariff adjustments should be made entirely on this consideration.

Much ado is raised over the so-called "big interests." Do the people ever stop to consider that this term is greatly overworked? Nearly all the industries of any magnitude I know of are joint stock companies whose stocks are listed on the exchanges and whose stocks can be acquired on the open market. Few of the industrial stocks are quoted at over par, and anyone with $100 or so to invest can become part owner. As a matter of fact, it can be said of but few of our big industries that they are either one-man companies or companies in which the stock is held by a few shareholders. The number of shareholders more frequently runs into the hundreds and the thousands. It is a rare thing for a so-called capitalist to invest all his money in one company. He is much more apt to invest in mortgages, bonds or debentures and be content with a smaller, though safer, rate of interest for his money.

I look upon capital as the greatest of blessings to the workingman. You can only get capital out of the hands of the capitalist by giving him the inducement of a larger probable profit from industrial concerns than from such safe investments as mortgages, bonds and debentures.

An adequate tariff which safeguards the investment of capital placed in the hands of efficient management insures work for the workingman, a market for agricultural products, and an adequate rate to the man or group of men who supply the money without which no industry can exist. Some plan of supervision and audit should be devised to see that the tariff protection afforded does not permit undue profits to be made or exploitation of the public. When such appear, the time will come for a reduction in the tariff but while this parliament has the power, it would be very unwise for them to exercise the power to make any alteration in the tariff unless and until some one or more experts fully qualified to make a thorough study of the question should advise that the change is desirable, will benefit the public, and will not do an injustice to those interests which are affected by the change. The word "adequate" is the most appropriate word that can be applied to such a tariff.

If there is one thing that has struck me since coming to this parliament, it is that there appears to be an unwritten law that you must not, on the floor of this House, call a spade a spade. What is apparent to the man on the street, and to which he gives free expression as to the relations existing between this government and the Progressive party in this House, upon whom the government are entirely dependent for a continuance in office, must not, it seems, be discussed in plain words on the floor of the House. Even at the risk of using language which may be challenged as unparliamentary, it seems to me and to everyone in the country outside the walls of parliament, whether Labour, Liberal, Conservative or Progressive, that the party in the House which pulls the strings ought to be in the place of power and in receipt of the emoluments of office and the honours which go with filling such important positions. It says much for the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) that he is willing to forego all these honours, but only goes to show that he is a Liberal at heart and that the Progressive side of his nature is merely camouflage, as all other pretences are.

The Liberal party have been prone to refer to their principles as sacred, and to themselves as the great upholders of responsible government. We see here, instead of responsible government, a government carried on under the more euphonious, if less honest, name of co-operation. The government itself cannot carry on, however. They are shackled at every step by the chains which, in refusing to recognize the voice of the people, they have forged upon their own ankles. Is it not more patriotic to bow to the will of the people than to mark time, as they admitted they were doing before the elections, or to do even less than that if such a thing were possible; and it may almost be said that that is what they are doing at present. At one of the first sessions of this parliament in a burst of impatience, the hon. Minister of Justice, then acting leader of the House (Mr. Lapointe), reminded my right hon. leader of a saying of Oliver Cromwell to his supporters: "In the name of God, my friends, get it into your heads that you may be wrong." I say to the right hon. Prime Minister and his government: In the name of God, my friends, get it into your heads that you may be wrong in pursuing the course that you are pursuing.

In every election since confederation in which the tariff was the first issue, the cause of protection has won. The National Policy was first advocated about 1876 or 1877; it was an issue in the election of 1878 and it succeeded at the polls. In every subsequent general election up to and inclusive of 1891 the tariff issue, in one shape or another, was the paramount issue and in every case our party was successful. In 1896 the tariff was relegated to the background. Other issues prevailed and the result was a change of government brought in especially on the strength of the Manitoba school question, though other issues no doubt played a considerable part in the decision the people of the country arrived at. In no other election subsequent to 1896, until the reciprocity election of 1911, was the tariff a real issue, and in that election the Liberal party, which favored reciprocity, went down to defeat. We all know what happened to this government in the 1925 election.

We can quite understand the favour which the idea of reciprocity received in the mind of the Prime Minister of this country. Perhaps the greatest disservice that the Liberal party has ever done to Canada was in the Liberal convention here in 1919, when they selected the present Prime Minister as the leader of their party after the lamented death of Sir Wilfrid Laurier; as usual the United States has got the better of the bargain. They gave us a Liberal leader and a prospective Prime Minister, and they took from us five to six hundred thousand red-blooded Canadians.

May I make a special appeal to the French-Canadian element in this parliament? I notice, and I am sorry to notice it, a feeling among the French-Canadian element in this House of race antagonism, particularly toward the province of Ontario. Let me say to the French-Canadian members that I trace my ancestry back to one who came from France to Quebec nearly three centuries ago, and that the other strains in my blood come from other countries of continental Europe by way of the United States, those who came in this way leaving there at the time of or immediately after the American war of the revolution. I thus have no blood relationship with the English speaking portions of Canada, who derive their ancestry from the British Isles, and I therefore feel that I can, with some measure of reason, appeal to the French Canadian element of our population without having my motives impugned. Some things have been done in our past history which were not conducive to the entente cordiale which should exist between the two principal races which form a part of our population. I have never found in my lifelong association with the English speaking portion of our people any real antagonism to the French Canadian race. Across the floor I am glad and proud to see a second cousin of mine, a French Canadian, and I appeal to him, and through him may I appeal to the other descendants of the French race in this House, to align themselves with that party in this House with which, in the days of Sir John A. Macdonald, the people of Quebec were almost solidly in accord, and with his political successors who stand for an adequate protective policy for all classes in this country and for equal rights to all.

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Smoke) on his splendid address this evening. So long as the discussion is carried on in the high plane which he attained to, we shall be taking the right method of arriving at decisions in this House at least in a friendly spirit.

The budget which has been brought down this session has received the approbation of all fair-minded Canadians. It is one that will appeal to the large masses of wage earners, to the farming communities and to the industrial people who are prepared to take their fair share of the great responsibilities that rest upon every Canadian. The budget speech was a clear and lucid exposition of the situation as it exists in Canada to-day, and it was a budget that cannot fail to make for greater prestige in the near future for this government.

The bringing down of a budget is always a difficult matter. In a country situated as ours is, with our tremendous area and with our interests varied and conflicting in different sections, the sanest and safest course the government can pursue is to elaborate a policy that will bring the greatest good to the largest number. In order to realize the difficulties which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) had to meet when he brought down this budget we have to turn a retrospective glance to the situation as it existed in Canada in 1921 when this government came into power. In 1921 our national debt was about $2,250,000,000; our National railways were creating an annual deficit of over $85,000,000; the merchant marine was costing Canada $12,000,000; we had a situation that was difficult for men engaged in all activities; agriculture was depressed in the west; there was unemployment all over Canada and instability of trade; our currency was depreciated in the markets of the world, and our situation generally was as bad as it had been at any time since confederation.

This year's budget is what I would term a "prosperity" budget. It is a workingman's budget. To-day the labouring man feels the improvement by the size of his savings bank account, and the farmer realizes that there is a general improvement by the high prices he is getting for his farm products. The manufacturer is also feeling the effects of the policy of this government by the increase in the number of his orders, and there is a feeling of confidence in the future and of stability that this country has not experienced since the period of deflation.

Canada has now entered upon a new era of prosperity. This has been admitted by some of our hon. friends on the other side of the House. This afternoon the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) admitted that our Canadian National Railways had improved and he attributed 11 p.m. that fact to the loyalty of the 95,000 men in the employ of that railway. But as a travelling man who travelled many times over the length of the Canadian National Railways before its management was assumed by Sir Henry Thornton, I may say that we should at least give Sir Henry Thornton credit for the improvements which we find in our National railway system. If such a genius could take our National railways in the situation in which they were just before he took control and bring them up to their present state of improvement, I think the opinion of Sir Henry Thornton, with his great experience and his real genius for organization, should bear weight with the people of this country in regard to present conditions. I should like to read an article taken from the Montreal Herald of March 13, which states:

My faith in the future of Canada is deep-rooted and sincere. It passes the realm of statistics, which after all can picture only past performances, and finds its foundation and its support in the faith of the citizenry in contact with whom my duties have brought me in almost all parts of the Dominion during the past year. Further, the past year has permitted me to visit many parts of the United States and several European countries. Not only have these experiences allowed me to gauge for myself conditions here, but they have given me the opportunity to look at Canada through the eyes of neighbours and business rivals, and I can say in all truthfulness that I have returned home imbued with a stronger belief in the greatness of our country's ultimate destiny than ever before.

I have been accused of being on optimist. I am more than an optimist. As far as the future of Canada and Canadians is concerned I am a super-optimist. For no country are the opportunities so splendid, the outlook brighter. Nothing, in my opinion, can prevent Canada grasping those opportunities except the people themselves, and failure is out of the question as long as Canada retains what she has to-day, the will to accomplish; the faith of her people and a clean national consciousness.

Conservatism is a very necessary and a very proper part of every business undertaking whether it is individual or national. Every ship must have an anchor. But when the ship gets under way an anchor which drags is not only an impediment to navigation but a positive menace. The apostles of conservatism who transcend their sphere of usefulness become only apostles of gloom. Canada has her apostles of gloom and because of their wailings and the dust they are flinging from their sackcloth and ashes, it might be well, before proceeding to the results of the past year, to retrospect and see what progress Canada has made in the last two decades as compared with the United States which is used so extensively as our "weather" barometer.

That is the opinion of Sir Henry Thornton, whose unbounded faith in Canada is the result of a thorough observation of the conditions as they exist from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Surely the opinion of such a man at this present juncture is one that must carry weight with the citizens of Canada. I have here a business summary issued by the Bank of Montreal in which further evidence of the prosperity which Canada is enjoying to-day, and of the prosperity which lies in store for us, is very well exemplified. I quote:

The Finance minister was able to present a favourable balance sheet in respect of Dominion finances and to point to an unusually large expansion of foreign commerce during the recently ended fiscal year. There was a surplus of revenue over expenditure of nearly $34,000,000 in the year's operations, a reduction of net debt of $22,353,000, and a marked increase in the operating profits of the Canadian National Railways, these having amounted to $30,443,000 in the calendar year of 1925 or about $13,000,000 more than in the preceding year.

The foreign trade of Canada continues to mount both in volume and value. In the year ended March 31, this commerce reached the very considerable sum of $2,258,500,000, of which $1,330,000,000 was made up of exports and $927,000,000 of imports, the favourable balance thus being $402,695,000. So large a credit in the external trade of the year has been a potential factor in restoring Canadian currency to par.

Domestic business has not presented any novel factors during the current month, but the condition remains more satisfactory than in recent years and the spirit of confidence in the future appears to grow. Commodity prices are fairly steady and would appear to have been pegged at about 60 per cent over a pre-war average, with inevitable fluctuation in price of one or another commodity. Railway car loadings and railway earnings are in excess of last year. Business mortality in the first quarter of 1926 was substantially less than in the corresponding quarter of the previous year, the number of failures declining from 669 to 593, with aggregate liabilities down from $10,683,000 to $7,566,000.

The estimated quantity of Canadian wheat remaining in Canada at April 1 was 161,376,000 bushels or 40,000,000 bushels greater than on the corresponding date in 1925, which fact gives promise of an active shipping season, and continued expansion of export trade. Building operations the Dominion over are much in excess of last year. It is too early in the season to forecast agricultural production but the acreage to be sown in the three western provinces this year will be practically the same as last. Live stock has wintered well and expectation is that the steady growth in the cattle export trade since the removal of the British embargo will not be interrupted. Cold weather has somewhat delayed farming operations in the eastern provinces. Immigration gives indication of reaching a larger volume than for a considerable time past. Taken as a whole, it can be said that the bright spots in the business situation greatly predominate.

Let me contrast the foregoing with the condition that exists in the United States. We have heard many speakers opposite comparing Canada with the republic to the south of us, much to our own disadvantage Now, I am sure that every true Canadian resents these attacks on his native country, which must have an injurious effect upon business, as is evident in northern Ontario, for example. In northern Ontario we require outside capital to develop industry. Can we expect to attract that capital for the development of our tremendous resources in that northern country so long as these tales of woe and of blue ruin are broadcast throughout Canada and elsewhere? The fact that we require that capital is well known to every member of this House. The Minister of Mines of the province of Ontario has a faith in that country which I should like to see shared by hon. gentlemen opposite. Recently he made the statement that $80,-

000,000 could be spent in northern Ontario in development of that area which is so rich in natural resources. It is interesting to compare the conditions in Canada with those in the United States and right here I want to emphasize this important fact, that northern Ontario offers better opportunities and greater chances of success in life than does any part of the United States. There is no part of the United States where a young man has the same likelihood of making a success of his life as he has in that section of Canada. The United States, we are told, is a country that has been greatly developed under a high protective tariff, but the conditions there are not so bright as some of our friends would have us believe. I have here a despatch from Washington to the New York Herald from the Washington correspondent of that journal. I quote the following:

> The east, either through preoccupation with its own prosperity or for whatever reasons may be, failed to know what was happening among the farmers. At a moment when values of corporations were mounting on the New York Stock Exchange, the value of land was going downward. When manufacturing corporations were announcing stock dividends and eastern banks announcing record earnings, western banks and other institutions were embarrassed, in many cases to the point of failure, by the decline in values of farm land, farm mortgages, and some farm crops. Now that Washington's attention has been called to it forcibly, the contrast between east and west is almost dramatic. The western condition includes an average of more than two bank failures a day; sheriff's sales in nearly every county seat; cuts in the rents of city houses and apartments of as much as 50 per cent; an estimate by the Nebraska State Bureau of Crop Statistics that the purchasing power of the farmers has suffered a reduction of $62,000,000 this year.
> This condition gives rise to a political mood just beginning to express itself in attacks on the tariff, on the railroads, whose earnings and values go up as the farmers' go down; on the federal reserve system, and on "big business." It is in some degree similar to the condition which arose in the middle of President Taft's term, and which expressed itself in the election of a Democratic congress and in Roosevelt's attempt to prevent Taft's renomination.
> "The farmer's situation presents the greatest, most far-reaching and most perilous problem with which the American people are faced," declares B. F. Yoakum, chairman of the board of the Frisco Railroad System, and a recognized authority on the farmer's problems. According to Mr. Yoakum, "the American farmer is in a worse situation to-day than at any time in his history."

Now, Sir, it is well for us when speaking as Canadians to remember that we are to-day producing more dollar for dollar than the United States did in 1880, with a population of 50,000,000. Unemployment in the United States averages 1,800,000, which is very much greater than has ever occurred in Canada. It is also well to remember—and this has been published throughout the United States—that more than 75,000 of its farmers have left their farms in the last decade.

One of the most strking features of this budget, and one that has been commented on very generally, is the increase in our foreign trade during the past fiscal year. It reached the tremendous total of $2,258,000,000, made up of exports, $1,330,000,000, and imports, $927,000,000, leaving a favourable trade balance of $402,695,000. The principal gains in exports were shown in the groups of animals and animal products, wood and paper, non-ferrous metals, and so forth. Our sales abroad of cattle increased $2,156,000; of cheese $10,000,000, of milk, fresh and condensed, $1,800,000; exports of lead reached $27,500,000; of nickel, $2,100,000; of zinc, $2,000,000; of gold, $9,000,000. Asbestos also showed a gain of more than $2,000,000. Of highly manufactured goods we sold $500,000 worth more of acids, nearly $100,000 more of cyanide, $400,000 more of cottons and $5,300,000 more of rubber goods. Our fisheries also shared in the expansion of export trade, shipments increasing by $3,946,000.

Examining our trade with various countries, we find that our sales to the United Kingdom increased by $42,000,000, while our purchases from her went up $9,000,000. The United States took $30,000,000 more of our goods, and we bought from them additional business amounting to $11,000,000. We secured marked additional business in Russia, $11,500,000; the Netherlands, $11,000,000; Germany, nearly $14,000,000; Brazil, $2,000,000; Belgium, $2,500,000; Argentina, $1,600,000, and New Zealand, $1,700,000.

A comparison of the figures of Canadian trade for the past two fiscal years of 1923 and 1925 with Latin-American countries in which bank branches were established—ample evidence that Canadian banks are doing much to foster and buiid up Canadian trade abroad—is very interesting. Take the figures for 1923:

	Imports	Exports
Argentina	$3,076,000	$4,445,000
Brazil	1,391,000	1,929,000
Colombia	365,000	151,000
Peru	4,700,000	416,000
Uruguay	310,000	286,000
Venezuela	353,000	747,000

Let me contrast those figures with the business for 1925:

	Imports	Exports
Argentina	$6,263,000	$10,322,000
Brazil	1,818,000	3,417,000
Colombia	719,000	270,000
Peru	3,533,000	929,000
Uruguay	228,000	859,000
Venezuela	175,000	1,065,000

This, Mr. Speaker, is one of the results of the enlightened policy of the government which sends its trade representatives to these countries and thus brings about an expansion in our foreign trade.

But if there is one activity which is contributing very largely to the prosperity of Canada it is mining. I fear we have not given to this industry the consideration which its importance demands. The industry has prospered owing to the enterprise and intelligence of the people who have interested themselves in it; it has received no government aid. I believe that this industry should be fostered by the government, for in my opinion there is no factor that will go further to solve our problems, especially those of transportation, than the development of our mineral wealth. The progress made in our mining industry last year is scarcely appreciated by those who have not followed it very closely. I have before me the estimated production of 1924-1925. This is perhaps the best evidence we can have of the remarkable development, especially when we consider that most of these mining areas have not been operated very much more than a decade. The estimated production is as follows:

Estimated Production in 1925

Metals	1924 Value	1925 Value
Gold	$31,532,443	$35,768,000
Silver	13,180,113	13,469,000
Nickel	19,470,178	24,140,000
Copper	13,604,538	15,813,000
Lead	14,221,345	23,238,000
Zinc	6,274,791	8,469,000
Other Metals	4,123,120	4,513,000
Total	$102,406,528	$125,410,000

In order that we may fully realize the important bearing the mining industry has on other industries in Canada, I shall quote from an article published in the annual financial review of the Toronto Globe, dated January 1, 1923, which gives an estimate of the value of the 1922 mineral production of Ontario and its distribution, as follows:

Estimate of Value of 1922 Mineral Production of Ontario and its distribution

Gross value of metallic production		$ 36,000,000

In order to show the House what money is invested in the mining industry in this country, I shall give the expenditure at Copper Cliff in the Sudbury district from September, 1902, to December, 1920, as follows:

Labour and Salaries	$35,900,000
Miscellaneous Supplies, not including fuel	13,915,000
Wood from local Contractors	685,000
Freights to Railway Companies	11,736,000
Contractors erecting plants and etc	2,014,000
	$64,250,000

Our investment in plant in the Sudbury district is as follows:

Smelter and Mine and Power Equipment	$14,651,000
Dwellings and stores	1,632,000
Hospital	203,000
Club house	61,000
	$16,547,000

We who live in that section of the country, Mr. Speaker, realize what the future development of the immense mineral deposits we have in that north country means for the rest of Canada. We feel we are not exaggerating when we say that the future of the province of Ontario and of Quebec, notwithstanding their present great industrial development, rests in a very large measure upon the development of the tremendously valuable natural resources we have in that country. It is only within the last decade that real development has taken place. From the very first start in Cobalt, the discoveries of valuable minerals have extended both east and west of the original discovery, and today in that great pre-Cambrian shield, which contains practically all the valuable minerals known to science, we have a source of greater wealth than is to be found in any other similar extent of territory known to civilization.

Reference has frequently been made in this debate to the woollen industry, and in every instance the present situation in the woollen industry has been attributed to the tariff. As a matter of fact the depression in the woollen industry has been world-wide. Just a few years ago the American Woollen Company, which has practically a monopoly of the woollen industry in the United States was forced, owing to the fluctuating prices of its raw material and to the general depression of the business, to close down one-half of its plants and to turn out of its factories from 15,000 to 20,000 of its employees. Similar conditions exist in Great Britain, where a general depression has existed in the woollen industry. In Canada the depression was felt much more acutely by those engaged in the manufacture of all-wool cloth. In Canada we have a very large number of small mills, but the modern tendency is towards concentration or mass production. In the manufacture of tweed, owing to the variation of styles and patterns, it was impossible for our small manufacturers in Canada to change their patterns or alter their designs as they could in establishments where there was mass production, or production on a very large scale. But there is another factor which has entered into the situation, and which has not yet been referred to in this debate. It is the discovery of a new textile known as rayon. This is becoming to-day an article of general use and its manufacture is progressing, perhaps, at a faster rate than any other industry at the present moment. In the United States rayon has replaced some forty thousand bales of wool annually, but the industry is, as yet, only in its infancy. Hon. gentlemen will have noticed that in the budget the Minister of Finance announces a drawback on rayon silk, or yarn, and on rayon waste. In Canada to-day there are two corporations which will soon be manufacturing this article and no doubt in a few years it will become one of the great basic industries of the world. In order to afford an idea of the progress of the industry within the last few years I will read the following extract taken from the Artificial Silk Supplement of the Manchester Guardian Commercial of April 15, 1926:

World Production of Artificial Silk

	1922	1923	1924	1925
Total..	79,738	97,000	141,164	197,000
United States. ..	23,500	35,400	38,750	50,000
Great Britain. ..	15,340	16,500	23,947	30,000
Italy..	6,292	10,000	18,480	28,000
Germany..	12,584	13,000	23,672	26,000
France	6,292	7,700	12,333	23,000
Belgium..	6,292	6,000	8,874	13,000
Holland..	2,517	2,600	3,366	9,000
Switzerland.. ..	1,888	3,700	4,004	6,000

The British production in 1925 has been variously estimated at from 25,000,000lb. to 32,000,000lb., but it must have been somewhere in the region of 30,000,000lb. The imports during the same period were 11,551,662lb., and the exports 7,366,029lb., so that the total consumption of artificial silk in Great Britain was about 34,000,000lb., or rather more than one-sixth of the world's production.

The American statistics for the consumption of artificial silk in that country are shown in the following table:

	Per cent
Stockings..	23
Interwoven with real silk..	18
Ladies' underwear and lace..	16
Interwoven with cotton..	15
Knitted articles..	14
Ribbons, braids, etc..	8
Upholstery and house furnishing..	3
Plush..	2
Interwoven with wool..	1
Total..	100

Imports into the United States will probably total 12,000,000lb., in spite of a tariff wall of 40 per cent. Domestic production is estimated for this year as follows:

	Lbs.—1926
Viscose Company..	45,000,000
Dupont..	12,000,000
Tubize..	8,000,000
Industrial Fibre..	5,000,000
Celanese..	3,000,000
Others..	3,000,000
Total..	76,000,000

Assuming a net profit of one dollar a pound, which the income-tax returns of the producers bear out, we have this new industry returning more profits during 1926 than the entire cotton industry.

Silk versus Artificial Silk in the United States of America

The inroad which the increasing use of artificial silk is making into other textile fields is a subject which comes up for discussion periodically. A few months ago the suggestion was thrown out that artificial silk had displaced 40,000 bales of wool in the woollen industry, particularly in hosiery manufacture, while similar statements have on various occasions been made by cotton and real silk interests. It is therefore of interest to see from the survey drawn up by the Silk Association of America that there has been a steady increase in silk imports into the U.S.A. for the last 30 years, and consequently of silk consumption in that country, notwithstanding the advent of artificial silk. In 1925, the year when artificial silk output broke all records in the U.S.A., the aggregate number of bales of real silk imported showed an increase of 26 per cent as compared with 1924. It does not appear from these figures that the growing consumption of artificial silk has had any effect on the demand for real silk.

This accounts in a very large measure for the depression that has existed in the knitting industry in recent months in Canada. We have not had sufficient quantities of artificial silk, which has become an absolute necessity to-day. Artificial silk is accepted now as an absolute substitute for real silk, and its manufacture must become in the course of a few years, as I have already said, one of the basic industries of the world. Now, Canada is particularly interested in this industry as pulpwood is the basis of artificial silk.

I have given these few details because I believe in the future of Canada. I think this country has entered upon an era of prosperity such as it has never known before. I believe that the interests of this country will be very much better served, and that emigration may be lessened, if we look at home for the development which is necessary to keep Canadians in Canada. As we look and see the improvements that are taking place daily, and as we view the prosperity that is in store for us, let each of us, regardless of political affiliations, do our very best for the future development of our beloved country.

On motion of Mr. MacDonald (South Cape Breton), the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

NATURAL GAS AND PETROLEUM LEASES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): A few days ago I was asked by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) whether any changes had been made in the regulations governing natural gas and petroleum leases. I am now informed by the officer of the department that no changes whatever have been made in those regulations.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, April 29, the debate on the Motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. FINLAY MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Before saying the few words I have to say on the budget, I would like to extend my congratulations to the hon. member who preceded me in this debate (Mr. Lapierre). I listened to his speech last night with a great deal of interest. I think it was an excellent speech, moderate in tone, and well sustained in argument. I agree with a great deal of what that hon. gentleman said, but I have to differ with him in some of the conclusions he has drawn. I had heard before of the great wealth of that rich northern country from which he comes, of the great mineral resources that are there waiting to be developed, and of the necessity for capital to develop those resources, but I would remind him that capital is very timid; it will go no place to develop any industry unless it is assured of protection. It is said that the doe of the forest is not more timid than the wolf of Wall Street, and before the hon. gentleman can hope to have the capital necessary to develop that country invested in it, I venture to think he will have to have a government in power here that will assure that capital adequate protection for its investments.

With regard to the budget, I regret to say that when the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in presenting his annual financial statement a few days ago spoke of the prosperity that existed in Canada, he spoke in a tongue that was foreign indeed to the ears of the people of the part of the country from which I come. It is useless to tell people that they are prosperous. People know whether they are prosperous or not, and if they are prosperous they will find some evidence of it in their own pockets. So far as I have been able to observe, there have been no indications from any province in Canada of the existence of prosperity there at the present time. It is pleasant news indeed, Mr. Speaker, to hear of prosperity existing in any place, even if our own common sense tells us that such is not the case. But I am afraid that this alleged prosperity has no existence outside the imagination of some mathematician in the Finance department.

The Minister of Finance attributed this alleged prosperity to various causes, chief among which was prudent administration on the part of this government. Other causes may have contributed such, for instance, as good crops, increased production at home, and increased buying abroad, but when the Finance Minister couples with these things which we are all agreed have contributed to what little prosperity the country has enjoyed, the statement that some of the credit is due to the prudent management of this government, he goes far to destroy whatever confidence we may have had in his budget. Following the announcement of the Minister of Finance came the usual chorus of applause from hon. members supporting the government. I do not begrudge those hon. gentlemen any satisfaction they can get out of the budget. The occasions have been few indeed during the present session on which hon. gentlemen opposite have had reason to applaud the acts of the government. Furthermore, the party press from one end of the country to the other took up the jubilant refrain, and we were informed that this budget was one of the greatest the country had ever known. It was, they said, a Liberal budget, a budget for the people, one that was going to reduce taxation and the burden of the people. Now that was pleasant news for us, and when the budget was being delivered I felt very much like joining the supporters of the government in applauding the statements of the Finance minister. However, a little further examination disclosed that possibly the budget was not all it was claimed to be. At the first glance it seemed to be an attractive budget, some have even gone so far as to say that it was an election budget, but like many attractive things it was more or less deceptive in its character; and as we come to examine its chief features we realize that it is very far indeed from meriting all the encomiums that have been passed upon it in this House and in the party press.

I think the usual course in discussing the budget is to call attention first to what it contains, and in the second place to point out its omissions. There are some attractive features about the present budget. Some taxes have been eliminated, and to the extent that there has been lessening of the burden of taxation we must all feel duly grateful. The government is entitled to credit for the remission of the stamp tax and some of the sales taxes. But there are three main features in the budget for which particular credit is claimed and these are such as to invite special attention. The first of these is the reduction in the income tax, but I cannot help thinking that the Minister of Finance has been extravagant in his claims as to the extent to which the burden of taxation has been lessened. It is said that there are but two things in this world from which we cannot escape, death and taxes, but the physician who holds out a hope of a postponement of the one and the Minister of Finance who promises a remission of the other may very often raise expectations that may prove illusory. When subjected to the acid test of practicality highly extolled remedies are frequently found disappointing. In the case of this budget I think careful examination discloses that it falls very far short of the merits claimed for it. I cannot claim to be an authority on the subject of income tax. It seems that a certain number of people will be exempt from the payment of income tax. To the extent to which this is true, the budget will be popular. But there are a great number of people who are going to pay very much higher income tax than they did before. I refer to those people who hold stock in Canadian companies the dividends of which were formerly exempt but are now subject to income tax. It would appear, therefore, that the income tax has been shifted from the shoulders of one class of the people only to be placed on the shoulders of another class. I do not believe that very much revenue is going to be lost by this adjustment, but that the taxes paid by the people of Canada under this shuffle will be just as large as they formerly were, and that there will be no remission of the burden in such cases.

The second feature of the budget to which most attention is directed is the reduction of the duty on automobiles. When I heard that reduction announced by the minister I felt very much like joining in the applause in which hon. gentlemen opposite indulged. We have no automobile manufacturers down in Nova Scotia, and I felt very satisfied indeed when I learned there was a possibility that we were going to get our cars at a very much cheaper rate. That is a local and a selfish view, but it was the view I held until my eyes were opened by the delegation that came to the capital recently from Oshawa and other towns in Ontario. That delegation did not consist of manufacturers. It was composed of workingmen, the class of men that I am used to and that I represent in this House. In addition the delegation comprised representatives of the municipalities of cities, towns and counties in the province of Ontario. I have been closely associated with municipal government for a quarter of a century. I know from my own experience in the city of Sydney just what the feeling is and the fear of anything that threatens danger to the industry upon which our livelihood depends. I have talked with these men and got their point of view, and I could almost imagine myself talking to a lot of my old workmen in Sydney. I knew what their feelings were, when fear entered their homes, when it seemed inevitable that their little savings were to be dissipated, that their jobs were to be lost and that they would have to seek elsewhere their means of livelihood. We have had that experience down in my own home town, and I know what it is. Then came the delegation which waited on the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I attended that meeting and listened to their addresses and their pleadings to the Prime Minister. They appealed to him to faithfully carry out the solemn pledge he had made to them as Prime Minister of Canada. That is all, and there is nothing unreasonable in that request. One man reminded him of sitting on the same platform with him in the city of Oshawa and told him of the solemn pledge he had given to the people of that city that their industries would not be interfered with pending full investigation. The Prime Minister was then pleading for his job. He was then speaking to them as Prime Minister of Canada, asking to be continued in that high position, and giving them that solemn pledge. They were here pleading for their jobs, and asking him to carry out the solemn pledge which he made. Their argument was reasonable and was unanswerable. Mr. Speaker, I looked then for the Prime Minister to rise and tell them that no matter what the influences were, no matter how secret or sinister, he was going to carry out his pledge to them, if the government had to be wiped out of office next day. Unfortunately, that was not the tone of the Prime Minister's reply, but in answering them he made a political speech in which he stated some very strange and curious things. He said the matter was in the hands of parliament, and that so far no person had ventured to move an amendment to the provision in the tariff regarding automobiles. Unless I have terribly misconceived the meaning and purport of the amendment which has been moved in this House by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), that is exactly what it means. They were asking him not to touch that industry without due investigation, and that is exactly what the amendment asks. I want to make clear my own position on this matter. I am in favour of reducing the duty on automobiles, but I am also in favour of giving the automobile manufacturer a chance for his life. He has to convince me that he needs this protection in order to live. It is a difficult and complicated matter, but I am willing to take the judgment of the tariff board on it. I confess they would have difficulty in convincing me, but I am at least willing to allow the automobile manufacturers to have a day in court.

There is another feature of this matter that should receive a little attention. If the automobile manufacturer is stabbed in the back to-day, what is going to happen other manufacturers to-morrow? What is the use of a tariff commission, if we are not going to wait for their finding on any question, but are going to determine whether or not we will reduce or increase the tariff on account of some underhand or secret or sinister influence. Possibly, Mr. Speaker, this exemplifies the great distinction and difference that exists between the two parties in this House on the question of protection. The Conservative party stands for protection and has so stood since 1878. There has been no wavering or turning aside. We have spoken with one voice from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Everywhere that our leader has gone the same declaration has been made regarding the adherence of this party to the great principle of protection. Without meaning to cast any reflection on the good faith of my hon. friends opposite, I venture to point out to them that their history and present attitude with regard to this great question of protection has been a varied and difficult one to understand. Up to 1896 they opposed protection, and they offered alternative policies of various kinds. From 1896 to 1911 there appeared to be some difference of opinion among our friends opposite as to what policy they were putting forth. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) yesterday stated, I think, that the Laurier-Fielding tariff was not a protective tariff. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Donaghy) previously had said it was. We know among a certain following of the present government free trade and lower rates of taxation appear to be favoured. On the other hand, we have seen in this House instances where member after member supporting the government has risen and declared that he won his election on the policy of protection and that he stood for it in this House. It is not therefore difficult to understand to which party great industries must look for protection if we are to ask capitalists to invest their money in industries in this country.

By this downward revision of the tariff the government has given a stab in the back to various industries, and this example, popular as it may be in some localities, is but another tolling of that knell that was to proclaim the death of protection in Canada. When we come to view the matter in that aspect we see that the very slight benefit that the country is going to derive from the lower purchase price of automobiles is more than offset by the great danger that will strike Canada even through the mere threat of the destruction of the principle of protection.

The third feature of the budget to which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) directed attention and for which he took credit was the great progress that has been made by the Canadian National Railways. It is a matter of congratulation, I think, to us all that the Canadian National Railways has reached within seven million dollars of payment of interest due on its securities held by the public. So far, so good. But when you come to ask us of the Maritime provinces to throw our hats in the air cheering the present management of the Canadian National Railways, you are asking too much. We are not going to do that.

There are two views held with regard to this great railway project in this country. One view which is held largely in Montreal and Toronto is that the Canadian National Railways is to be treated and operated as a private company with the object first, last and all the time of paying its way and, second, for the purpose of developing the resources of the country. I have seen lately two editorial utterances from leading papers in Montreal and Toronto on this question and I am going to read one from the Montreal Gazette, a very responsible paper. It says, dealing with the question of coal transportation from Alberta and Nova Scotia:

> What has happened, however, exemplifies one of the greatest dangers to which the Canadian National Railways can be exposed, the danger of being forced by politicians to operate upon a political rate schedule.

Right there I take issue with the article. I say: You cannot take the Canadian National Railways out of politics if you regard politics as it should be regarded as the management and development of the country. The Canadian National Railways must be regarded as an integral part of the machinery of Canada, the main object being not to produce dividends but to develop that portion of the country through which the railway passes. Those two divergent views are clearly held. We hold one; the centres of Montreal and Toronto hold the other.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What would happen to the Canadian Pacific if that were the case?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I was pointing out the difference between a privately-owned company and a publicly-owned company. I regard the Canadian National Railways as a part of the machinery of this country and the earning and paying of dividends as a secondary matter altogether to the development of that part of the country through which it passes. The article continues:

> That this danger has been averted for the time being is due to the fact that Sir Henry Thornton, fully appreciating his responsibility as a public trustee, declined to play the part set for him by the governments of Ontario and Alberta. The Dominion government have boasted repeatedly of their determination to keep the Canadian National system out of politics. The public know, and Sir Henry Thornton certainly knows that, if the system is ever to succeed, its administration must be unhampered by political considerations. In yielding to the importunities of the Ontario and Alberta governments, Sir Henry would have committed himself to a hopelessly unsound principle and would have opened the door to a long series of political impositions. That he resolutely refused to take this dangerous step is a fact which is decidedly to Sir Henry's credit, and the public of Canada will learn to thank him for the course that he pursued. It is the president's natural ambition to build up the earnings of the Canadian National Railways to a point at which the railway will be self-supporting, and he has been able already to show a very comfortable operating surplus. If, at the bidding of any politician or group of politicians, he is to accept traffic at losing rates, the aim to which he has devoted so much energy and ability will never be realized, and the railway, into which the taxpayers have poured so many millions of their money, will never pay its way. There are probably few people in Canada who would not prefer that the country's fuel requirements should be met out of Canada's own resources, but that preference must always be subject to practical economic considerations, and the Canadian public will not improve their position by aggravating one problem in the effort to solve another.

As regards the railway situation we want our own railway back. Take your Canadian National Railways and do what you please with them; but give us back our Intercolonial railway and we shall be satisfied to bear the deficits which that road may incur, because that road and the management of it will give us some consideration and hope that does not exist now for the development of our natural resources in the provinces. The Canadian National Railways are being managed entirely with a view to the west. They have an enormous system of hotels in the west and none in the Maritime provinces. They lost hundreds of thousands of dollars in their hotel system throughout the west where they have magnificent hotels and golf courses. We have nothing of the sort in the east and they pay no attention to any request we make in that direction. In the town of Pictou they started a little bungalow system of hotels but got no encouragement from the Canadian National management, although an expansion of the hotel system throughout the Maritime provinces would secure an immense tourist trade and pay dividends on the capital invested in the hotels themselves. The service we get in the Maritime provinces is poor in every respect; the train service, the motor service and the track service are all inferior. As a matter of fact the management is starving the track. They shortened up the track force with the result that we have had within the last two or three months three or four accidents which I am told have been due entirely to the diminished service on that portion of the railway. The difference between the treatment accorded the west and the treatment, or lack of treatment, rather, which the east has received was very well exemplified here last spring when we tried to get our coal moved from Nova Scotia at the same rate as Alberta coal was carried for. Did we get any concession in that respect? Alberta coal was moved at a lower rate than actual cost but this concession was refused Nova Scotia, and when the representatives of that province related the sufferings of the miners there they were met with goodnatured smiles and jocularity on the part of members of the government. The government appear to have one idea when dealing with the Maritime provinces, and that is to exact everything that the traffic will bear. I know of numerous instances which display very bad business judgment on the part of the management itself. For example, I know of a little industry in that section of the country which all along has been giving about $50,000 a year in freight to the Canadian National Railways. The company have been using, for the purpose of transporting the freight to the main line, about one mile of track which was laid down years ago by the railway. They have not been paying for the use of this track, but this year the management of the Canadian National Railways insisted that the company pay an interest charge upon it, although, as a matter of fact it was nothing but scrap when it was first laid down. The company refused to meet this demand with the result that the railway spiked the switch, declining to afford this service any longer. In consequence, the company are making an effort now to have their products transported by water, and the Canadian National Railways will in all probability—I hope they will—lose this revenue of $50,000 per annum from the company.

A few years ago we had in Sydney a terminal wharf in connection with the Canadian National railway. It was partially destroyed by fire some years ago and has never been rebuilt, having been allowed to fall into disrepair. No attention has been paid to that wharf. In the estimates of this year I find an item of $75,000 for the purchase of the site and for the building of a wharf within 200 feet of that railway terminus. One-half of that amount would repair the old terminus and the other half of the money could give us a new wharf. Unfortunately, however, one structure is under the Public Works department while the other comes within the purview of the railway. Surely these two departments must be on speaking terms with each other. As the money which will be spent for wharf facilities there will come out of the common treasury of the country, I would urge the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay) to look into this question carefully, for I am sure he can save the country many thousands of dollars.

Cape Breton is the natural gateway of Canada. The government may spend a lot of money, as in fact this Dominion has spent, in developing port facilities at Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and St. John. But notwithstanding all the millions which have been already expended and the millions which will be spent in the future, the fact remains that Cape Breton offers the natural advantage of being the front door of Canada. Some years ago a rather interesting experiment was made when a transatlantic steamer was stopped some miles off Sydney harbour, where some of the passengers and the mails were removed and sent by rail from Sydney to New York and Montreal. These passengers and mails arrived in New York twenty-four hours ahead of the steamer. The incident was never repeated, the matter having been hushed up. Nothing further was ever heard of it. What was the reason for this? The explanation is that it did not suit the financial interests that had all their money invested in the port facilities of these various ports to have it acknowledged that the natural trade route from Europe to the orient passed through the island of Cape Breton. No doubt the time will come when that island will come into its own, but this will never be while such a government as this remains in power or while the Canadian National Railways continues under its present executive. I do not like to make cheap criticisms of men occupying high executive offices, but I am bound to say with regard to the head of the Canadian National Railways that as a chief executive he is certainly a very good afterdinner speaker.

Now, in a budget debate it should, I think, be the object of every speaker to view things from the national standpoint; but we may be forgiven if in discussing questions of this kind we assert our own point of view and claim the rights that are due our own industries in the Maritime provinces. And certainly none of those industries is afforded any encouragement by this budget. From the Maritime point of view the budget is indeed a very disappointing and discouraging document. We have in that part of the country three great industries in which I am particularly interested, the fisheries, coal and steel. Off the coast of Nova Scotia there lie the greatest fishing grounds of the world. From the shore to the banks, 400 miles away, nature has placed at the disposal of man the most abundant school of fish that is to be found in the known world to-day, but we cannot take advantage of this wealth.

Our shore fishermen pursue a hazardous occupation, but they receive no benefit from any rural credit scheme; they are obliged to fit themselves out with their own little fishing plant, and on that plant they cannot secure a loan of any kind. Frequently their nets are brushed away by steamers and by floating ice, and in many cases the fishermen lose all their equipment, but no assistance has ever been given them by this or any other government.

Now, the development of our fisheries is a very important question, indeed, it is a national question and should be treated as part of a national policy. There should be a great national development of our fishing industry from the catch to the table. We want our fishermen in the first place to be educated in curing fish. I understand there is some movement on foot by the government to do this, and I commend its purpose. We want a system of transportation and cold storage, and most of all we want a system of education in cooking fish, especially throughout the province of Ontario. I do not believe that the people of this province know how to cook fish. Perhaps they do not get the right kind of fish to cook. Certainly they appear to give all their attention to fresh fish, and I hope some epicure will commend to the people of Ontario the good qualities of salt fish, which in may instances are preferable to the fresh article. Some years ago the United States government sent a lady through the states to teach the women how to cook fish. Possibly the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) might use his good offices to have her sent over here to instruct our people how to properly cook fish from the Maritimes so that the market for our fish may be developed in this province. It is said that meat comes from the Lord, but cooks come from some other place. After eating fish in this city I am inclined to agree with that dictum.

I am not going to take up the attention of the House by a lengthy discussion of the coal question. It has been stressed, perhaps beyond the point of patience of many hon. members, but I think we have made plain to them exactly what we want.

4 p.m. We want an increased duty on coal. We want freight rates that will enable us to get our coal into the central market. We also want introduced this session, if possible, the bill which I understand the government introduced last session, providing for assistance in the establishment of coking ovens.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Introduced the resolution, but dropped it after the election.

[Mr. MacDonald.]

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Well, it will take some years to get coking ovens ready for operation. I am content that the government of the day should receive every credit that may be due to them for the introduction of such a bill. I put a question on the order paper the other day relating to this subject, but I received a somewhat evasive answer as to the intention of the government. There is one thing, however, they could do to help our coal industry—they could make the Canadian National Railways buy Nova Scotia coal and Alberta coal—Canadian coal—in accordance with the pledge given by the Prime Minister to the people of Nova Scotia at Amherst on October 4, 1921, when he said:

> Free trade is not the policy of the Liberal party.

Might I call that to the attention of the hon. member for South Huron?

> Free trade is not the policy of the Liberal party. If it were I would oppose it because I believe it would bring disaster to our industries and remove from the farmers the home market, which is practically the only market they have left.
> I am a firm believer in the establishment of a national coal policy for Canada. No country, especially a country with cold winters, which depends on a foreign nation for fuel, can claim to be independent of that nation.

These are the words of the man who was entrusted with power four years ago:

> Every pound of coal purchased by the government should be mined by Canadian miners and transported over government railways to the points of consumption. Coal required by other consumers in Canada should be transported at cost.

We want nothing more than the fulfilment of the Prime Minister's promise. And far be it from me to entertain for a moment the thought that a person occupying such a proud position will not carry into effect the promise he made on the hustings.

With regard to the steel industry, we have in the city of Sydney a steel plant organized and put into operation some twenty-five years ago. It began under the most favourable auspices and continued until some four or five years ago, when unfortunately this government began to tinker with the tariff, with the result that that great institution in which millions and millions of dollars have been invested is to-day on the verge of bankruptcy, and the men employed in it meet me on the street with the same look on their faces that those men had who came here from Oshawa the other day. Possibly that is the reason why I felt sympathy for them and changed my mind so quickly with regard to the reduction of automobile duties. The following is a list of the various drawbacks and tariff tinkerings which this government has put into force. It is rather long and I ask the permission of the House to put it on Hansard.

This is the statement referred to:

Drawback of Duty on Spring Steel, Steel Billets and Axle Bars

According to items 1007 and 1008 of the present tariff, a drawback of duty is provided on importations of the above articles. This drawback is absolutely unwarranted at the present time, since the Canadian steel industry is able and we are prepared to make the steel necessary for the purposes.

Steel Products free of Duty

The following steel products are now allowed into Canada free of duty:

Barbed wire of 9, 12 and 13 gauge for fence-making; pig iron for most agricultural implements; used rails for re-rolling into reinforcing steel, bed slats, etc.; rolled steel for most agricultural implements; bright wire 10, 11, 12 and 13 gauge for springs and mattresses, and many other products.

Rebates of Duties on Steel Products

The following items are subject to rebates of duties:

Pig iron used in the manufacture of agricultural implements; billets, axles bars and flat spring steel when used in the manufacture of other than railway and tramway vehicles; steel for manufacture of spiral springs for railways; steel under 1½ inch diameter or 1½ inch square when used in the manufacture of locks and knobs; steel used in the manufacture of hardware as specified in item No. 1009 of the general tariff; bar steel for chainmaking; wire rods not over ⅜ inch diameter when used in the manufacture of 9, 12 and 13 gauge galvanized wire.

Coke

At the present time coke imported into Canada for metallurgical, foundry and domestic purposes comes in free of duty. This coke is being made in Canada, and if a duty were imposed greater sales would be possible, with the result that by-products in the form of gas, tar, sulphate of ammonia, and so forth are left in this country. What is needed to properly assist Canadian coke production is a duty of $1.00 per ton on coke imported for metallurgical purposes other than pig iron.

Rebate of Duty on Coal imported by Operators of By-product Coke Ovens

Under present tariff regulations bituminous coal imported for the manufacture of coke by operators of by-product coke ovens is subject to a rebate of 99 per cent. Suitable coals for the manufacture of metallurgical and domestic coke are available in Canada, and any coals imported for this purpose should be subject to the regular duty on bituminous coal. If it is considered necessary to pay steel plants using American coal 50 cents per ton as is being done at present, we believe operators using Canadian coal should receive the same treatment.

But another feature of the tariff tinkering is brought to my attention by a resolution which was passed by the Works Committee of the steel industry a short time ago. The resolution was introduced at the regular meeting of the committee on Tuesday, October 6, 1925. Mr. T. M. Keating, of the rolling mills, was the mover, and Mr. D. J. McDonald, of the mechanical department, the seconder, and the resolution met with the unanimous approval of the committee. These men are known to me, Mr. Speaker. They are men of more than ordinary intelligence, men who have been Liberals all their lives so far as I know, but who, in their own defence, were obliged to forsake their party at the last election and throw in their lot with the Conservatives. The resolution is as follows:

Whereas, the population of the city of Sydney and surrounding districts are depending either directly or indirectly on the steel and coal industry;

Whereas, anything of an industrial or economic nature that effects adversely these industries must necessarily be reflected in loss of wages to the employees and lack of prosperity to the whole community;

Whereas, steel rods, billets, and other steel products, from European countries are being dumped into Canada in competition with the Canadian-made article;

Whereas, steel rods have been landed at Sydney at a much lower cost than they can be produced at our own steel plant;

Whereas, the underselling of the product of our own plant is made possible because, first on account of the depreciated currency of these European countries, second, because the present duty on steel products, billets, rods et cetera, is not sufficient and does not give the amount of protection that was afforded previous to the war, or when the cost of production was much less than obtains to-day;

Whereas, the workers in these countries with depreciated currency have a much lower standard of living than our Canadian workmen;

Whereas, on account of this unfair competition the steel trade is losing some of its best customers—fact we are prepared to prove;

Therefore, be it resolved, that the General Works Committee, representing the men most seriously affected, in meeting assembled call upon the Sydney Board of Trade as being the representative body of the communities interests to demand of the federal government that provision for protection be made against the importation of iron and steel from countries with depreciated currency.

So much with regard to that.

Another statement that I wish to put on Hansard is one issued by the general manager of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company to the representatives of the General Works Committee reading as follows:

In keeping with the discussion we had with you at a joint committee meeting held on September 3, covering the subject of plant operations. The question of importation of foreign billets and rods was taken up with the idea of ascertaining why it was more advantageous to the company to purchase continental billets or rods than to manufacture same in our own plant.

We were asked for a price on 5,000 tons of billets for delivery to our very good customers in Montreal, the Peck Rolling Mills, and lost the business.

We understand the billets have been purchased from Europe at $22.75 per gross ton, c.i.f. Montreal. (This is within 50 cents of the price of pig iron at Montreal.)

It would cost the British Empire Steel Corporation $5.20 per gross ton to take a similar quantity of billets from the billet mill, load them on a boat and deliver them in Peck's plant at Montreal.

Why is this?

1. The steel plants in France are mining ore, coal and limestone, and making steel with labour paid in francs, which are now worth 4.7 cents of Canadian money per franc, and were worth before the war 19.3 cents per franc.

2. If the workmen in Cape Breton and France have received the same rate of increase in wages upon those paid before the war, it simply means that the French workman is being paid 4.7 cents in worth of Canadian money instead of 19.3 cents formerly paid, or say 25 cents instead of a dollar.

What are the remedies?

The government should protect Canadian workmen against imports from countries where wages are paid in depreciated money.

Those customs duties which are fixed by the ton, and to-day give only half the protection they gave when first imposed, should be increased to cover the increase that has taken place in wages.

Coal should be available for steel-making purposes at a much lower cost.

Such, Mr. Speaker, are the views of the men who are engaged in this industry of making iron and steel in the island of Cape Breton. That concern to-day is on the verge of bankruptcy simply because this government has withdrawn little by little the protection which was absolutely necessary to enable it to conduct its business at a profit.

The commision which this government has appointed to look into Maritime matters will no doubt take up the question of coal and steel. With regard to the commission itself, we from the Maritime provinces were at first opposed to the idea. We did not want a commission to look into our affairs or to tell us what we required, but now that the commission has been appointed I, for one, intend to give them whatever assistance may be in my power, and to place before them all the evidence that is available touching on the interests of my constituency. I do hope, perhaps not as confidently as I might otherwise, that when their report comes in here, suggesting and recommending certain remedies for the ills from which we are now suffering in the Maritime provinces, it may be received, adopted and acted upon by the government of the day, and that the disabilities under which we labour may disappear.

Mr. W. A. HALL (South Bruce): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), not so much on the splendid financial statement he has presented, but upon his courage and good sense in taking advantage of the circumstances that made it possible? Doubtless this is the best budget since the Fielding budget of 1897. Its good effects will be felt by people of all conditions, especially the working classes. The circumstances that made this budget possible constitute the greatest achievement of the King government. According to the press of both political parties the Robb budget is being well received by all the people in this country, except by two cities where motor cars are assembled, or perhaps I should say where motor cars are manufactured in part. However, Henry Ford, of the Ford plant, has declared himself in favour of a reduction, not only of 15 per cent, but of 35 per cent in the duty on automobiles, in other words, in favour of free trade. This may be accounted for by the fact that the Ford plant has passed the stage of infancy and does not require further nursing. Let me remark here that it would be a Godsend if we had more Fords in Canada.

The Robb budget presents six things—three reductions and three increases. Reductions, first in taxation, both direct and indirect; secondly, reductions in expenditure; thirdly, reductions in the national debt. It presents increases, first in trade and commerce; secondly, in reveune; and thirdly, an increase in the surplus.

Direct taxation has been reduced in four different ways: First, by removing the sales tax on many articles; second, by wiping out the receipt stamp; third, by adopting two-cent postage instead of three-cent, and fourth, by lowering the income tax. These adjustments in the income tax have been so well planned that the greatest relief will come to the most numerous class of our income tax payers. It will bring relief to the people of small incomes, and will doubtless produce widespread benefits. The reduction in the income tax will doubtless not affect national revenue very much, as there will be more money available for production. This has been the experience of the United States and also Great Britain.

Coming to the increases, first, the trade of Canada has been increasing during the last eight years by leaps and bounds. Canada ranks second among exporting nations of the world on a per capita basis, and stands fourth among the world traders in foreign markets. The total trade for the fiscal year ended March 31, last including exports and imports was $2,258,534,455. The increase in exports from last year was $249,000,000, and the increase in imports $130,000,000. The favourable balance of exports over imports during the year amounted to $402,695,000, as compared with a favourable balance of trade of $29,000,000, during the last year of the Meighen government. Our import trade accounts for about ninety per cent of the increase in the balance of trade which shows the value of trade treaties within the empire.

Now let me deal with the question of expenditure. The expenditure has been reduced in five different ways: First, by practising rigid economy in the different departments of the government; second, by lessening the number of civil servants; third, by lessening interest in the refunding of debts; fourth, by lessening the deficit of the Canadian National Railways; fifth, by lessening the deficit of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. The total expenditure last year was $342,890,000, or $120,000,000 less than the total expenditure for the last year of the Meighen government. The national debt was reduced from $2,417,437,685 to $2,395,084,685, by applying the surplus or excess of revenue over expenditure to reduce it. The revenue for the last fiscal year was $376,000,000 as compared with a revenue for the previous year of $346,000,000, showing an increase of $30,000,000. The surplus of revenue over expenditure was more than $22,000,000 or an increase in surplus over last year of almost $22,000,000. The deficit on the Canadian National Railways amounted this year to $38,800,000. This represents interest to the public amounting to $7,400,000 and interest to the country amounting to $31,400,000 on money loaned to the railways by the government. The deficit on the Canadian Government Merchant Marine last year was $668,000. This shows a great improvement as compared with the deficit in the last year of the Meighen government which was over $9,000,000.

The Liberal party stands for a downward revision of the tariff, while the Conservative party calls for an upward revision. But there are insuperable obstacles in the way of too great reductions, chief among which are financial obligations. The Conservative party argues for stability of the tariff, while at the same time it talks of building a tariff wall brick by brick equal to the United States tariff, necessitating change and thus instability. The United States during the last quarter of a century has had the Wilson tariff, the McKinley tariff, the Dingley tariff, the Underwood tariff, and the Fordney-McCumber tariff. In Canada we have had the National Policy, the Fielding tariff, the White tariff, and the Robb tariff, the last the best of all. Thus we see that in neither Canada nor the United States has there been any great stability, but rather stability by change. A gradual reduction in the tariff should be our aim.

Let me remark here that a tariff for revenue and for protection is somewhat of a contradiction. This double function cannot operate at the same time. If our industries have to be protected the tariff must keep goods out of the country. If revenue is the aim of a tariff goods must be brought in. Goods cannot be brought in and kept out at the same time. Tariff revision downward is all important. The limit to this is adequate revenue. The future prosperity, solidarity and stability of our country depends on increase of our exports and imports. The only way to carry on foreign commerce is to import and to sell exports in exchange for imports. We need to export $200,000,000 worth of produce yearly to pay our foreign liabilities, namely, the interest on borrowed money. This is the only way we can pay that interest. These exports are derived largely from agriculture and allied interests. The products of the farm, the products of the forest, the products of the mines, the fisheries and so forth must pay the greater part of our external liabilities. We must be able to meet our financial liabilities as a nation. Consequently we must not place any unnecessary obstacles in the way of trade —no high tax on instruments of production, no unjust tax on capital, and no high tariff wall to obstruct trade and international commerce.

Just as expenditure of the individual should be within the limits of his income, so should the expenditure of the government be within the limits of the revenue. But what is far better is to have a large surplus, as the King government had for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1926. Doubtless this government has made long strides along the road of public economy. This, Cobden described as public virtue. While lavish expenditure is a terrible public evil carying in its train many others, the only solution is individual and national economy. The estimates presented for this year show a very great reduction in expenditure, $120,000,000, from that of the last year of the Meighen government, 1921-22.

Then to return to the tariff again, may I ask what is a sound and sane and sensible and safe tariff policy for Canada? To whom shall we go for such a policy? Not to the Conservative party. We all know that the historic policy of the Conservative party is a policy of protection—protection for protection's sake—to enrich the few who are protected, at the expense of the many who are not. But the right hon. leader of the opposition endeavours to meet this in a rather sly way by promising to place a high duty on the products of the latter class. Is this not another blind intended to deceive? Although many good citizens believe this to be a sound policy, yet many more, just as good citizens, pin their faith to a moderate tariff—a tariff only for adequate revenue. This is the policy of the present government. However, I am of the opinion, if we are to get a sound and sane tariff policy we shall have to turn back to the policy of the Liberal party in 1911. That is the tariff as it then was with the amendments that were contemplated by the government when it went out of power. In this there is the framework of a sound and sane tariff policy. However, with changing conditions, variations must be made to suit the changed conditions.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said that the policy of the Liberals from 1897 to 1911, was the national policy of the Conservatives from 1879 to 1896. This is not so. If the hon. member will read his own speech, as recorded at page 1705 of Hansard of 1901, I think he will be convinced that this is not the case. In that speech he charges the Conservatives with inconsistency. He reminds them that they said that the policy of the Liberals at the revision of the tariff in 1907, had torn down and destroyed the National Policy, and then afterwards, when things changed, he says they turned to a sane and sound policy. If you will turn to the records of that time you will find that the Tory leaders as well as the Tory press denounced the Liberal policy of 1897. They said that the Liberals had torn down and destroyed the National Policy. But as the years passed and the country prospered and developed the Tories swung around and claimed the policy to be theirs, namely: to be the National Policy. In the same manner the hon. member claims that the right hon. leader of the opposition is the father of the Canadian National Railways, having unified and consolidated the different railway systems. But what is the truth? The Meighen government passed the Railway Act to take over the different systems, but the unification, consolidation and co-operation of the different systems was left to the King government to accomplish. This government placed the Canadian National Railways under one board of directors with one president and general manager, Sir Henry Thornton, instead of under four or five boards with as many presidents and managers. We all know the results produced by this policy.

But to return to the Liberal policy of 1897; proof that it was not the National Policy of the Tories is afforded by taking the facts and figures of the period from 1897 to 1911. Take the actual savings in custom duties, and the savings that were made by the reduction in the prices of home manufacturers. You will find the changes made represented hundreds of millions of dollars in the pockets of the people of Canada. Then how could it be the old National Policy? It was the policy which made this country grow and prosper as it never had before. During this period, there was the greatest development, the greatest prosperity, and the greatest increase of population—amounting to 34.17 per cent—that had ever taken place in Canadian history. There was added to the population almost two and a quarter millions. This was Liberal rule under Laurier, with a tariff for adequate revenue. But the period from 1879 to 1896 was characterized by depression, by lack of development, by lack of prosperity, by a very small increase of population, amounting to only 11.44 per cent, the smallest of any like period in the history of Canada. Mark you, this was Tory rule with a high protective fiscal policy. They called it the National Policy. Indeed, several of the then leading Conservatives confessed in the House of Commons that high protection had not accomplished what it was intended to do,—in other words, it had failed.

But in the early part of this period of Tory rule, their leaders as well as the Tory press claimed that the National Policy would cause industries to flourish, would give employment to everyone, would retain in Canada her own people and would increase her population greatly. What happened? From 1881 to 1891 there came to Canada 886,000 immigrants. Out of this number only 36,000 remained in Canada as shown by the census containing the number of foreigners born in Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, permit me to read some extracts from Hansard bearing on this matter. In 1892, Hon. T. M. Daly, Minister of the Interior, in the Tory government, said:

> I do not believe that our fiscal policy has anything to do with our people going to the other side of the line. As the census showed that the National Policy had not accomplished its objects.

Mr. Daly declared that the National Policy had nothing to do with the emigration. In the same year, Mr. R. Armstrong, president of the Young Conservative Association of Toronto, said:

> The question as to why thousands are leaving this country every year and going to the United States, should engage our serious attention, for it is quite evident that the older heads are not going to do so. I am informed that no fewer than 6,000 persons have left this city during the past year—left all that is near and dear—and gone into foreign exile. In short, there is no concealing the fact that we are being annexed in job lots every week and there is not a voice raised against it.

In the same city, Mr. J. H. McGhie, afterwards one of the members for Toronto, said:

> The men who were spangled with knighthood, sit talking of loyalty in the midst of ruin and desolation. It was from the young men, that they must expect a new order of things.

Now judging from these statements and facts, a few out of many that might be cited, those were very dark days for Canada,— manufacturers making no headway, unemployment, emigration almost keeping pace with immigration, Canadian-born drifting by thousands across the line, farmers quitting the land, skilled workmen leaving for the country south of us and unsatisfactory conditions generally due to industrial depression. This is another case of promises made to the people of this country—promises that could not be fulfilled. The National Policy of the Tory party was to be a panacea for all ills. But it utterly failed. Consequently, the Tory party with its policy became discredited, was defeated at the polls in 1896 and was succeeded by the Liberal government which had a real fiscal policy.

One of the first things to engage the attention of this new government was tariff reform. In 1897 a thorough revision of the tariff took place when forty-seven different articles were added to the free list and duties reduced on 147 others including farm implements. In addition a substantial preference over the rest of the world was given to the products and manufactures of Great Britain. Sir Charles Tupper, and his party due, I suppose to their super-loyalty, bitterly opposed the British preference as well as the whole revision of the tariff. Sir Charles surprised the House by his historic attacks found in Hansard, volume I, page 1291, year 1897. He said in part:

> The result is that this tariff goes into operation and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed, while hon. members gloat over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail of these industries in the Montreal Gazette, where one manufacturer after another declared that these industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face, a return of the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

I ask, where was his super-loyalty? The Tory cry was, as it is to-day, preference for preference, Canada first. This makes one think of the present leader of the Conservative party in his pre-election speeches last year when he repeated Sir Charles Tupper's words: "preference for preference, Canada first." Thinking like this, made it easier for him to make his famous Hamilton speech.

The concessions given to the farmers of free binder twine, barbed wire, other fencing wire, Indian corn, cream separators, and so on, were denounced by the Tories on the score that they would result in the wiping out of these industries in Canada. But what happened? These industries continued to flourish as never before. The Robb tariff will have a similar effect on the automobile industry. Although binder twine and the other products mentioned are on the free list still as far as I am aware, and although these gentlemen declare that the British preference and the tariff changes would seriously injure our manufacturers, the contrary has proved to be the case. Mr. Speaker, will you allow a few more extracts from Hansard? On different occasions the Tories moved in the House the following resolutions:

> Moved, that the House, regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory, is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy of such adequate protection to its labour, agricultural production, manufacturers and industries as will at all times secure the Canadian market for Canadians.

Speaking on this resolution, Mr. Rufus Pope, Conservative member, said:

> The resolution that I would have preferred would be a resolution for a Chinese wall all round.

Mr. Blain, member for Peel, during the same session—1902—said as reported in Hansard of that year, page 1499:

> I hold that the tariff should be so arranged that every institution in this country which is manufacturing goods to be consumed by the Canadian people, should have sufficient protection to keep out the same class of goods made in any foreign country; and I have no hesitation in saying that if that country should be England, the policy of Canada should be framed in the interests of the Canadian taxpayer as against the people who are producing the same class of goods even in the Old Country under the same flag.

Mr. Henderson, Conservative member for Halton said, during the same session:

> It was said in the early days of the present tariff that the Liberals had stolen our clothes. I have never said so, and I do not consider that they have done anything of the kind. I am only sorry that they did not, for it would have been better for the country if they had. Their tariff is instead just the antithesis of ours.

That is what Mr. Henderson states in regard to the Liberal tariff as compared with the Tory tariff. He says that one is the antithesis of the other. These quotations amply show that the Tories regarded this as a new fiscal policy. Indeed, they claimed that the Liberal policy would paralyse the industries of the country. They hoped and prayed for this, but their expectations were doomed to disappointment. On the other hand the Liberals claimed that this new policy would benefit the industries instead of injuring them, just as they claim that the Robb tariff will help the automobile and allied industries on account of increased sales rather than hurt them. Indeed, I challenge anyone to point out a single industry ruined by similar changes in the tariff. On the contrary, all modifications of this kind have invariably produced beneficial results to the industries affected.

In this instance, as in all others, time proved the Tories wrong and the Liberals right. There followed a great revival of business, trade and commerce improved and even manufacturers flourished as never before. After this the Tories swung around and said that the Liberals had made no material changes in the tariff; that their so-called National Policy was still in force, and that the Liberals were wearing their clothes. Is this not what the Conservative party now claims? But the people had not forgotten what the Tory leaders as well as the Tory press had said and done when the Fielding tariff was enacted.

Perhaps the most outstanding feature of the new tariff was the British preference. Its results have been highly beneficial alike to Canada, Great Britain and the empire. This preference at first was a reduction of one-eighth, later one-fourth and still later one-third of the general tariff. As I said before, the Conservatives strongly opposed this preference; they spoke of it as a myth, a sham, a fraud on the British people, a danger and menace to manufacturing industries, the thin end of the wedge to destroy protection in Canada.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) referred to this preference in his speech at Kitchener last October in the following words:

> I would give a preference to the people of Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, any people within our empire, but on this condition that they give us a preference in return, until then it is no duty of Canada to continue the preference.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what does the leader of the opposition mean by this statement? If he were leader of the government would he terminate this preference? That seems to be the logical conclusion. The Conservative party is certainly true to its name; the same yesterday, to-day and forever. The very language of Sir Charles Tupper is employed by the present leader of the opposition, namely: preference for preference. Let me say here, that the Hamilton incident is in keeping with this occasion at Kitchener. On both occasions, what a manifestation of super-loyalty! By the way, further proof of Tory super-loyalty in Lord Elgin's time was shown by the burning of the parliament buildings in 1849, by pelting the Governor General with malodorous eggs, and by other manifestations of hostility.

We also heard during the campaign last autumn a great deal about the decrease of immigration and the increase of emigration. The opposition in the House as well as the Tory press still continue the mournful, doleful wail. May not this account for the great increase in the favourable balance of trade—the large export of exaggeratedly pessimistic news? The leaders and press of the Tory party have indulged in this trade, apparently with a certain morbid satisfaction. This tendency has been altogether too general among responsible persons in the Tory party. Their dismal prophecies, loud wails, though not taken too seriously at home, cannot fail to be believed by the people of other countries, and thus produce incalculable injury to Canada. The Robb budget, however, should dispel any such lurid and unwarranted impressions in Canada.

We are ready to admit that since the Great war immigration has slackened and emigration has been more active. There are many reasons for both, which we all know. But I am glad to say that the grounds for these reasons are gradually passing away and conditions are already fast improving. But my Conservative friends claim to have one sure remedy: "protection for all industries"—their cure-all nostrum. Why, Mr. Speaker, it reminds one of a patent medicine advertisement. What are its claims? It would beckon the exiles back to their homes. It would call home the sons and daughters who have gone. It would give work to those who are here. It would bring immigrants from other lands and so forth. But will this remedy do all these things? No more than any patent medicine will cure all diseases. Why, Sir, this is an old remedy, tested and found worthless, tried by the Tory party for nearly twenty years. The experience they had with it was that the longer it was used the worse conditions became, especially during the five or six years from 1891 to 1896. These were the darkest days of Canada.

The population of Canada was practically at a standstill outside of Quebec. The population in the Maritime provinces actually diminished. Ontario's population increased in these five years only about one per cent. Most of the few immigrants that came to Ontario soon found their way into the United States. The results of the Conservatives' efforts during this time to populate the west was described by a western Tory paper in the following graphic language:

> The trails from Manitoba to the states were worn bare and brown by the wagon wheels of departing settlers.

During this period between 1891 and 1896, about 100,000 immigrants were brought into Canada at a great cost, most of whom crossed the line later into the United States. Indeed, we could not keep our own people. The United States census of 1900 showed that over 1,000,000 of the population of that country had been born in Canada. Is it any wonder then that the people of Canada discarded this once much lauded nostrum of "High Protection" and voted a change of government in 1896, thus securing for themselves a worthwhile remedy—Liberal rule?

Then followed the golden era of prosperity and contentment under Laurier, the brightest and most glorious period in Canadian history. In conclusion, let me say that the Robb budget augurs well for a repetition of similar conditions in Canada under the King government.

Mr. R. E. RYERSON (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, as this debate has been running on for some time and, to my mind, has covered every feature of the budget, I find that it will be difficult for me to add anything new to the discussion and consequently my remarks will not take up very much of the time of the House. From the standpoint of the workingman and his family there is not one feature in the budget generally that has anything to offer him of benefit. They will not be interested in the reductions in income tax. They will probably be interested to learn of the wonderful trade expansion and the increased prosperity of this land so ably set forth by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). But they will wonder just what share of that increased prosperity will be their proportion. What the workingmen of this country are most anxious and concerned about in all this is the proposed drastic tariff reduction in regard to the automobile industry which so closely affects the many centres where this industry flourishes, and which again threatens to upset and demoralize the labour markets of Canada.

With good reason they will remember their experiences of the past four years, during which other manufacturing industries have been attacked by drastic reductions in the tariff.

They have suffered in the past, and the majority of them have a definite opinion as to the principal cause of this suffering. Is there any wonder that this important class of our citizens will look with suspicion and doubt upon this particular feature of the budget?

Representing as I do, Mr. Speaker, the industrial city of Brantford, I claim to know something of the burden of taxation which has rested so heavily upon the shoulders of our citizens, and also the evils of tariff reductions and the tariff tinkering of this government, which have from time to time so seriously upset and injured the industrial life of our city, and it is in connection with these two features of the budget that I desire to offer some criticism. However, Sir, before touching upon these matters, may I be permited to say that while many hon. members of this House will not agree with the government as to the cause, I feel sure every one of us, as well as the general public, will rejoice and be thankful for the improved trade conditions which prevail throughout Canada and which have made possible the very satisfactory financial statement which the hon. Minister of Finance has presented. That the government has, as a result of these favourable conditions, been enabled to some extent to reduce the burden of taxation, particularly in the case of moderate incomes derived largely from salaries, is a matter for further congratulation.

Now then, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the reduction on income tax, may I be permitted to point out that a close study of the proposed changes reveals the fact that there is a large class of our citizens who will receive none of the benefits of this reduction, but who on the contrary are penalized and will have to pay more. I refer, Sir, to that class whose incomes are largely derived from dividends from Canadian corporations whose earnings are subject to the corporation tax. Under the old act, this class of income was exempt for normal tax purposes but now will be fully taxed the same as other incomes. In my opinion this double tax will prove a very great mistake and one that will seriously hamper the further industrial development of our country.

Many of our industries are languishing today for lack of additional working capital, and millions more are required for new enterprises. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, where is the additional capital to come from? Those of us who have experienced the difficulties of securing new capital for existing and new industries during the past two years well know that the investing public have been very careful and timid. The general business depression which has existed, and the uncertainty caused by reductions in tariff from time to time has made the investor extremely cautious. What will his attitude be now when the effect of this increased taxation becomes known? Is there anything in this budget to encourage him to continue investments of this nature? On the contrary, I claim there is much in this double tax and in the tariff reductions to turn him entirely away from this class of investment.

There is another point, that I wish to bring out, and it is this, that in the matter of these dividends there is also a third tax, which of course this parliament is not responsible for, but which however exists. I refer to the municipal income tax, which is levied on all dividends. It will be observed that by adding this municipal tax to the double tax, under this proposal, there will be three distinct taxes levied. The total of these combined taxes will run anywhere from 15 to 20 per cent upon the earnings of every industrial corporation whose earnings are paid out in the form of dividends.

In the city of Brantford, and I doubt not but what this statement will apply to any manufacturing centre in Canada, there are many of our citizens who have invested their surplus savings in local manufacturing industries, largely, in the first place, for the purpose of building up their city, and who have from time to time put back into these companies the dividends received from them, to provide additional capital, and whose income to-day is partially or wholly derived from this source. Is it reasonable or fair, Sir, that this class of our citizens should be penalized, as they will be, under these proposed changes? I maintain that they are entitled to equal justice, and it is on their behalf that I appeal to the Minister of Finance for consideration in this matter.

I would like now to refer briefly to the tariff reductions as proposed in the budget, particularly those relating to the automobile industry. I frankly admit, Sir, that I possess very little knowledge of this industry, but I do claim to know something of the demoralizing effects upon a community where important industries have in a similar manner, during recent years, been attacked by the policy of this government. Many of our manufacturing centres have gone through this experience, and have suffered untold hardships because of this policy. Not only has the manufacturer suffered, whose particular product has been directly affected by tariff reductions, but the general feeling of doubt and uncertainty as to where these reductions in tariff would stop and which industry would next be placed upon the altar for sacrifice, has acted as a damper upon all manufacturing enterprises. These conditions have in turn reflected upon the entire life of the community, causing lack of capital for new and existing enterprises; unemployment problems for the municipalities; increased taxation; trade depression in all lines of business; decreased values in real estate; untold hardships and sufferings by the industrial workers; separation of families, and thousands of our people have been compelled to leave their homes, to seek employment across the line. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that I view with concern and alarm, this latest attack upon the industrial life of this province?

I do not for one moment charge this government with all these distressing conditions. No more do I credit them with the distinct improvement which now exists.

But, Sir, I conceive it to be the first duty of any government, at a time of general depression such as we have been passing through, to extend, to the very limit of their energy and powers, every assistance and help to foster and encourage the flagging industires of our country. Has this been the policy of the government? Have they, during the past four years, given to this country one item of important legislation that has in any way assisted or helped the existing manufacturing industries or encouraged the establishment of new ones? I claim not, Mr. Speaker. On the contrary, every move and action has been one of blundering and open hostility. The "fixed policy" of the government has been one of attack and tearing down instead of intelligent assistance, fostering and building up.

I am not in a position or qualified to offer an opinion as to whether the automobile industry has been too highly protected or not. I know that throughout the country there is a well-defined opinion that in comparison with American prices we in Canada are paying too much for our cars, and that Canadian manufacturers have been taking an undue advantage of the protection they have enjoyed. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the whole subject is one of technical knowledge and that we in this House, who are not in full possession of that knowledge, have no right to pass judgment. For this very purpose has the tariff commission been appointed. If not for this, then how can the government justify its existence? Why, Sir, this very feature was one of the campaign promises of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Again, in the Speech from the Throne, a definite promise was made in the following words which I quote:

> They believe that in the interest of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncertainty with respect to tariff changes; that changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto. A Tariff advisory board will accordingly be appointed forthwith. This board will be expected to make a careful study of the customs tariff, the revenue to be derived therefrom and the effect of the tariff and allied factors on industry and agriculture.

After accepting and voting for the adoption of this definite policy, how can any member of this House support the budget in respect to this drastic reduction in tariff? Are the promises and pledges of this government to be considered as worthless and of no meaning? They either do not know their own minds or deliberately seek to deceive and fool the public.

May I suggest another reason for these broken promises? It is this—the selfish desire and determination to cling to office at any cost, and the absolute necessity for the support of the western group of free traders. I have listened to speeches delivered in this House by Progressives and western Liberals, some of whose vision does not appear to extend beyond the four corners of a wheat field. No one reading or hearing these speeches could doubt their meaning and that nothing short of free trade or the total annihilation of all manufacturing industry would satisfy them. As a sample of this, I need only quote from Hansard, at page 283, January 20, of this year, a portion of the speech delivered in this House by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden):

> Suppose that over night or in the course of a few days our manufacturers from end to end of the Dominion closed their doors, I wonder what the effect of their action would be on the country. Would we have to shut down? Would we have to move out? I am willing to admit that the country would receive a very rude jolt, and that commerce generally would be badly embarrassed for a time, but eventually conditions would readjust themselves. The farmer would probably continue producing crops every year and selling them in the world's markets. Within a certain period of time the population directly affected by the action of the manufacturers would either settle on the land or find other occupation, the country would recover from the shock, and in the long run I imagine we would not be so very much worse off.

The only comment I desire to make, Mr. Speaker, is this. If the hon. member has fairly expressed the sentiment and opinions of the other nine Liberal candidates who contested constituencies in Manitoba in the recent elections, then the workingmen of our industrial centres can truly give thanks that the other nine were defeated and that he is the sole Liberal elected from that province.

May I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that just so long as this government retains power by the domination and dictation of any sectional class of free traders, just so long will real prosperity and national unity be denied us.

Mr. ARMAND SYLVESTRE (Lake St. John) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to take part in such an important debate as the one now engrossing the attention of the House, especially when I note the enthusiasm with which the budget has been received. There is no doubt that this budget has brought relief to all the homes; however, on the other hand, it has spread confusion in the ranks of our opponents. The best evidence of this can be found in the speeches of the hon. members for Fort William (Mr. Manion) and South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who, forced to admit the prosperity of our country, find no other justification than to ascribe this prosperity to Providence. It is a fact, Sir, that Providence has been especially kind to us, but our hon. friends forget the old proverb, which is always true: Help yourself and God will help you. Ever since the present government have assumed power, they have given proof of moderation and especially of economy in the administration of public affairs. They succeeded in wiping out the endless deficits which took place under the Conservative regime—in this instance Providence came to our rescue—while under the Conservative rule we have never known anything else but bad administration, wild and foolish expenditure. There is, therefore, nothing astonishing that Providence did not lavish its favours on such a government.

I am overjoyed with the budget. I spoke, a moment ago, of the relief which it has brought in the homes. I wish now to say a few words about the cutting down of the income tax. To-day, owing to this reduction, every home and in particular every individual will be able to set aside a good deal of savings. Indeed, not only do we reduce, but a remedy is applied to a state of things which was in the past entirely unjust; we discriminate as between the earned and the unearned income. It was unfair that a man who had but his salary to live on or to provide for the needs of his family, should be placed on the same footing as the one who drew the same income, but derived it from dividends or inheritance. To-day, we assess the income with more fairness. The doing away with the stamp duty on receipts is also an excellent measure.

Another very popular measure throughout the country is the return to the penny postage rate. On and after July 1, 1926, instead of 3 cents the postage fees on letters in Canada and to the United States will be but 2 cents, that is a saving of 33 per cent. Everybody will admit that it is quite an appreciable reduction.

Another item in the budget which meets with my entire approval, is the tariff reduction on automobiles. I live in a district where this means of travelling is at present, spreading more and more. The automobile is no more considered an object of luxury, but is in daily use, owing to the precious saving of time which we realize. As this reduction applies to low price cars, it is again a popular measure, because it especially affects the mass. When I see manufacturers organize delegations, regardless of expense, in order to come and tell us that on account of such reduction —of so little moment—they will be forced to close their factories, I cannot, Sir, believe in the sincerity of these people, for I am not aware that the profits which the manufacturers make go to the people; they rather go to a priviledged class of society. No, this reduction will not be the cause of the closing of these factories. On the contrary, there will be a compensation owing to the increased number of sales.

It also affords me pleasure to discuss the important question of our railways. By a subtle intellectual effort, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) tried to ascribe to his leader, the one who, at present, guides the policy of the opposition, all the merit of the good management of the state railways. It is quite true, that it was under the rule of the leader of the opposition that the National railways were purchased, however, the hon. member forgot to mention the fabulous and fantastic price paid for a heap of old scrap iron and an entirely depreciated stock. We should rather congratulate the government on its judicious choice in selecting Sir Henry Thornton for the management of our railways, who, thanks to his able management, obtains magnificent results, to such an extent that these railways instead of being a burden to the state will before long be a source of revenue. And while on the subject, allow me to refer to something which especially interests the portion of the population which I represent in this House.

The county of Lake St. John located beyond this granite wall which is called the Laurentides, is reached only by the National railways. Half, at least, of the population of my county is at a distance of ten, fifteen, forty and even fifty miles from the railway. There is no need of further emphasizing this fact—since I represent an entirely farming community—in order to point out not only all the disadvantages and inconveniences which result, but also the necessity incumbent on the government railway to encircle with rails the county I represent. And that is what I beg the government to do. The time of evading the issue has passed! Too long have the farmers and settlers waited! Too long have the farmers and settlers of my county borne the burden! The time has come to grant them what they ask and I shall only cease insisting on my claim when this object has been attained.

[Mr. Sylvestre.]

Last night I listened attentively to the speech of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Smoke). I must acknowledge that he had at least the frankness of expressing his views when so many of his freinds, in the opposition, share these views but dare not express them. He stated that he had noticed that there existed in the province of Quebec a certain antagonism against the province of Ontario. My good friend is very much ill informed. It is evident that he has never visited our province or he would express himself otherwise. I especially extend an invitation to him to visit us and if he accepts, he will meet a busy, hard-working and sympathetic people; he will meet a law-abiding people; finally, he will meet this good old French cheerfulness, as well as the smile which is seen only among our own people and impossible, Sir, to find on the faces of those who sit in the opposition.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear! hear!

Mr. SYLVESTRE (Translation): At the outset of this session, the sympathetic and distinguished member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard), in a brief speech, paid a very high compliment to the French Canadians. It is always delightful to hear people sharing neither our faith nor our language, speaking about us in praiseworthy terms. The hon. member for Sherbrooke lives among us and he has learned to respect us instead of despising us. Is this not the best example of tolerance which can be found? I do not think that it is an easy task to find many such cases in the other provinces. Although not belonging to the same faith or race as ours, the hon. member for Sherbrooke, nevertheless, represents a county of which three-fourths are French Canadian, and I admit that never has this county been better advised than in choosing the member who, at present, so worthily represents it. That is why I state: No antagonism whatsoever exists in our province against the province of Ontario. We are proud of our province, we are proud of our country. When I listen, for instance, to certain patriotic statements of my friends in the opposition, I would be inclined to believe that they alone love their country. I am not aware, however, that the opposition have a monopoly of all virtues and learning. I might retort: We also love our country but not in the same way. With your exaggerated high protective policy, you only think of the large interests, while we—I am not a free-trader, I rather place my trust in a moderate protective policy—love our country in a different manner because we concern ourselves with every class of society. We do want our industries to prosper. They prospered under our rule and they will still prosper; however, we want the small wage earner to also have his share of happiness in this country; we wish to protect him and we come to his relief by reducing the tariff and helping him in every possible way. And I am convinced, Sir, that our love, if it is less demonstrative than that of the opposition, is certainly more to the point, for instead of contenting ourselves with uttering high-sounding statements, we use means which bring results. That is why I am convinced that, under the present rule, we are but at the dawn of our expansion, we are but at the beginning of an era of prosperity which will ever increase. For, it cannot be denied, it is self-evident, from one end of the country to the other, from ocean to ocean, there reigns an epoch of prosperity unknown for a long time past. It is not by appealing to race prejudices; it is not by attempting to set up classes, one against the other, that we will accomplish the most useful work; but it is simply by advocating closer ties, by asking that, throughout Canada, people perform the same good work as practised in our province, for in Quebec all races come into contact daily without any friction whatsoever, in Quebec all religious denominations carry on without people insulting one another. That is why, the day—to which we all aspire—when conditions which prevail in our province will have become general throughout Canada, we shall become a united nation, we shall form a whole, concentrating all our efforts—the common daily effort—towards the same goal, the same ideal, which consists in the development and expansion of our country, thus shall we succeed in making it greater, more beautiful, more united and more prosperous.

Mr. T. H. STINSON (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to congratulate the Finance minister (Mr. Robb) for the comprehensive way in which he has presented the budget. It is clear in most parts, contains some jokers in others, but on the whole it does not offer to the country the Christmas tree that the Speech from the Throne contained for our Progressive friends.

I believe in giving credit where credit is due. We thank the minister for some reduction in taxes. The receipt tax is gone, for which we are truly grateful. That tax was always a tax in the line of a nuisance. I think that he would have been well advised if he had abolished the cheque tax also, and left the postage rate as it is. The cheque tax retards business, and everything that stands in the way of holding back business should be removed as far as possible, with the hope of developing business and creating employment for our people. The postage reduction we appreciate, but the saving will not fill the dinner pails of many people in Canada, and I trust that the minister will not take part of those savings out of the pockets of the poorly paid postmasters. I want to read an extract from the letter of a country postmaster in my riding touching on this question. He says:

> I would like to draw your attention to the statement in the paper re two-cent postage. It is coming to the people all right, but there is no statement as to how they are going to treat your postmasters. As you know, all postmasters are paid on commission. If Mr. Robb takes one-third of their salary away, how does he expect them to carry on?

I would be glad if the Minister of Finance would keep them in mind, and do something for these poorly paid postmasters throughout the country districts.

The income tax reductions will not afford relief to very many actually requiring relief at the present time. The ordinary workman is not now paying income tax. We appreciate the reductions, but I am afraid that the changes are going to do more harm than good; certainly they will seriously operate against Canadian industry. The fundamental principle that money should only be taxed once by the same government is taken away by this amendment. When invested in Canadian corporations the income of the company is taxed nine per cent. When passed on in dividends, it is again taxed in the hands of the shareholders. This is going to make it difficult to get money to finance new enterprises in Canada. It will have the effect of forcing capital into foreign investments, capital that is badly needed for development purposes in Canada. The proposed amendment will be particularly hard on a certain class of well-to-do farmers who have put their money into co-operative enterprises, such as elevators, flour mills, seed and grain businesses. The company will pay to the government nine per cent on its income, and the dividends when distributed are taxed again in the hands of the shareholders, while the non-incorporated company or man, in opposition to the farmers' company, only pays the one tax.

Clause 11 provides that where a corporation having undistributed income redeems its shares at a premium, the premium shall be taxed as a dividend against the shareholders. Such a regulation would seemingly disrupt the entire stock market, on shares listed at over par and which are subject to call at a price over par. These shares may be sold four or five times on the market during the year, and to determine who is to pay that tax is going to be a difficult question. Let me read an extract from the Financial Post in its issue of April 23:

"It's a fine day; let's go out and kill something," is the reputed watchword of the sporting Britisher. "It's a prosperous period; let's go out and stop some of the prosperity," is the condensed substance of the Hon. Mr. Robb's budget, delivered just after we went to press last week. Most Canadians had not realized how prosperous the country was, until Mr. Robb had, so to speak, "drawn a bead" on that prosperity.

The reductions in the income tax are admirable. That is, they would be if the revenue thus lost to the Exchequer were being made up from any proper source. But the proposal to impose a special tax on corporate profits, over and above all ordinary taxation of the company's business and of the incomes of its proprietors—a tax on the company for being a Canadian company and nothing else—is so astounding that for a long time we were unable to believe that this was what the government intended to enact.

Next we come to the question of reduction in the motor duties, which brings up the whole question of the tariff and what our policy should be as it vitally affects the whole Dominion of Canada. The problem of the tariff has been one of the most persistent and controversial in Canadian history, affecting as is does the well-being and prosperity, directly or indirectly, of every citizen. When Canada was New France the control of trade and commerce was vested in the king alone. It led to excessive favouritism and caused a tremendous amount of smuggling, while trade itself was almost at a standstill—and apparently history is repeating itself, according to the evidence that is coming out at the customs probe these days. In the early days of British rule the regulation and division of customs duties was the source of bitter quarrels between Ontario and Quebec. In 1859 Canada asserted definite control of her tariff problems when Sir Alexander J. Galt made a firm declaration of Canada's right to regulate her own tariff, and Great Britain at once acquiesced. Since confederation the tariff has been a leading political issue, with the announcement in 1878 by Sir John A. Macdonald of a National Policy "to benefit and foster agriculture, mining, manufacturing, labour and other interests of the Dominion."

With Sir John A. Macdonald's success in the elections of 1878 Canada became a protectionist country. It is significant testimony to his vision and foresight that since then no political party, until recently, has ever advocated complete free trade as the proper course of action for Canada. We have had cries of "low tariff", "commercial union" with the United States, or "reciprocity," but never "free trade" as a party slogan, but the present Progressive group from the west have in the back of their minds free trade, as expressed by some of them. As early as 1876 Sir Wilfrid Laurier declared himself a moderate protectionist, admitting that protection was a matter of necessity for a young nation in order that it might obtain the full development of its own resources. When the Liberals came to power in 1896, after eighteen weary years in the wilderness, there was no real change in the tariff except for the preference extended to Great Britain. The lapse from orthodoxy in the ill-timed reciprocity plan of 1911 was decisively rejected by the country. During the war period the only alteration in the tariff was a sur-tax imposed for special war revenue. Thus from 1878 to 1921 Canada, with the general approval of her people, was a moderately protectionist country. Since that time the altered aspect of the political scene has made the tariff problem a serious and disturbing one.

With the formation of the farmers' or Progressive party a strong group appeared in 1921—since materially diminished—advocating a new national policy which included, (1) a wide extension of the free list; (2) free trade with Great Britain within five years, and (3) a general all-round reduction of duties. That party had gathered around it the doctrinaire free traders, some labour groups which the general post-war depression had hit hard, and some farm groups. The Liberal party also began to fish in troubled waters, and in 1919 pledged themselves to tariff reforms almost as drastic as those of the Progressives. The Conservative party alone remained true to the principles of adequate protection for all—a Canada first policy.

Owing to the three party system, the electors in 1921 put the Liberals, though a minority party, in power, and since their accession the tariff has been tinkered and tampered with, the hand of the Liberals being forced by the Progressives until nothing is certain in the business world but uncertainty. Following the precedent of 1896 the Liberals increased the British preference with calamitous results to the woollen industry. In a single year 1923 Canada imported from Great Britain eleven and a half million yards of tweeds and worsteds, even more than the United States. The importation of woollen hose jumped from approximately two and three-quarter million pairs in 1921 to eight million pairs in 1923. It is significant to note here the effect that has had on the sheep industry in Canada. There are to-day from 750,000 to 1,000,000 less sheep in Canada than there were in 1921. Even such a staunch Liberal as Senator David has protested against this policy, which cuts directly at our own manufacturers. Then, with a wary eye to the farmers' vote, the duty on American agricultural machinery was reduced two and a half per cent, causing no reduction in price to the farmer but leading to an increase in imports of $3,716,000 and seriously damaging our steel industry. These reductions give new hope to the low tariff and free trade supporters, and the free trade movement has already increased in noise if not in strength. And now follow the motor reductions.

In view of these facts it is well worth our while to analyse carefully four aspects of the tariff problem:

1. What has been the growth in Canada under protection?

2. What is the relation of the present European situation to our industrial welfare?

3. What is the position of the United States?

4. Why should Canada not follow the example of Great Britain and pursue a free trade policy?

Now, as to the first problem, the development of Canada under protection. If the basic industries, agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing have made remarkable progress, as well as the manufacturing industry; if the trade of Canada has enormously expanded, then we may reasonably draw the logical inference that protection has not hampered our advancement but has been a positive boon, keeping our raw materials for manufacture in Canada, creating new sources of wealth causing the appearance of factories backed by foreign capital, and making Canada a broader and more self-sufficient nation.

First of all let us note the remarkable development of our aggregate trade, which under protection has multiplied almost sixteen times. Our export trade climbed in 1922 to fifth place in the world as compared with tenth place in 1913. We are surpassed only by Great Britain, the United States, France and Germany. In 1922 we exported products valued at $100.63 per head of population, standing third in the world. In imports Canada stands eighth in the world. In 1879 our aggregate trade amounted to $149,488,188; in 1923 it had increased to $1,747,760,880. Our export trade with the United States in 1924 was $430,715,496, while in the same year we imported from the United States $601,295,121. Our trade with the British Empire increased, amounting to $414,163,218, of which $360,094,021 went to Great Britain in 1924. A noteworthy feature is the increased trade to the Orient, China buying $15,058,259 and Japan $25,696,621 in 1923.

The growth of agriculture in field crops between 1900 and 1923 is over five hundred per cent. Wheat production has increased three thousand per cent. The agricultural wealth of Canada in 1923 was $7,365,475,000. The agricultural revenue of Canada in 1923 was $1,342,132,000. Of that agricultural revenue Saskatchewan had $291,493,000, and Ontario $400,511,000. Ontario paid income taxes in 1923 to the amount of $25,435,613, whereas Saskatchewan paid $1,527,606. There was not much difference in the agricultural revenue, but as to taxation the large difference was paid by business, and yet our western friends would destroy it by their policy. If the Ontario farmers follow our western friends it will lead to their paying more taxes than they ever did before.

Now let me deal with other branches of industry. The lumbering industry between 1881 and 1922 increased over 300 per cent. The pulp and paper industry, a new industry fostered by our tariff which compels the most of our pulpwood to be manufactured in Canada, has a capital investment now of $381,006,000. Our fisheries, the finest in the world other than those of the North sea, have an annual production of $41,800,000 and have increased 600 per cent. The mining industry, in the period from 1881 to 1923, increased 210 per cent, and has a capital investment of $493,694,000. Our railways have increased in mileage 1,450 per cent. In the foregoing statistics I have covered the basic industries of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing.

Now let me come to manufacturing, which our friends from the west decry so much. The following figures will indicate the growth of this industry in the period from 1881 to 1921 inclusive:

	Employees	Capital	Production
1881..	254,894	$ 164,957,423	$ 309,731,867
1921..	517,141	3,210,709,288	2,747,926,675

In 1921 our exports to all countries amounted to $1,189,163,701. In 1924 our exports to all countries were $1,045,141,056, being less after the tinkering had taken place with the tariff. These figures bear silent and sure testimony to the increase in prosperity of Canada under a system of moderate protection. No branch of our life has failed to share in increased wealth, while on the other hand manufacturers have not excessively prospered at the expense of others. The fact that the average number of employees in a Canadian factory is less than twenty shows that protection, as is so often charged, cannot have fostered monopolies and trusts to any appreciable degree, if at all. Furthermore, the tariff has been far from hampering the export of our primary sources of wealth, especially in agriculture, which cannot be entirely absorbed here. To-day Canada is the leading wheat exporting nation of the world, and our agricultural produce accounted for 55 per cent of our exports in 1923. Farmers are not so seriously off, if protected as they should be.

The problem of markets is acute in Canada to-day for the reason that this country has not done what other countries have done. The products of Canadian agriculture are without profitable markets because while other countries have taken measures for their own protection this country has not done so. While the markets of countries competing with Canada in agricultural production have been closed against the Canadian farmer the market of Canada has been opened still wider to those same competitors. This country, whose principal industry is agriculture, is importing agricultural and vegetable products for consumption at the rate of close on two hundred million dollars a year, because of our inadequate protection in that regard. Canada is in no position to make terms with the United States if relief from the American tariff barrier should be sought by this country. The United States enjoys all the advantages of the Canadian market now and has no need to make concessions. We have nothing with which to bargain. If our own markets were protected as is the American market we would have something with which to deal, something the Americans did not get for nothing. The farmer in this country to-day is competing with his fellow farmer in other countries under conditions of absolute unfairness. That is why we say that the first tariffs that should be increased are the tariffs on farm products, to help the farmers.

The importance of manufactures in our national well-being is strikingly indicated by our population figures. Since 1891 our urban population has steadily increased until it is now nearly half of the total population. In 1921, for the first time in our history, two cities, Toronto and Montreal, had a population of over 500,000. In Ontario as a whole 58 per cent of the population is urban, an increase of 20 per cent in thirty years. This increase in city and town is due to a variety of causes which would take too long here to analyse, but we may note that it makes industry an even more vital factor in Canada. Apart from the actual number of factory employees, it is obvious that in any city or town the wholesale and retail merchants, the banks, the professions, the real estate agents the municipality itself, are largely dependent upon the factory as the dynamo of their prosperity. If the factory is ruined by any trade reverse, the city and town must suffer the same fate. Hence any ill-timed and thoughtless tariff is a matter of vital concern to the city or town dweller. He is as directly interested in the tariff as the manufacturer, and this is not a time to endanger the well-being of nearly half our population.

Moreover, the farmer too has many interests in common with the city and town dweller. In 1920, in eastern Canada, 80 per cent of Canadian produce was consumed in Canada, of which a large proportion was used by the city, town and village population. Decrease the buying power of the city and the farmer must inevitably suffer. Mouths are markets and the more mouths we have to feed the better the market for the farmer. Can the farmer afford to destroy the goose that lays the golden egg? The welfare of city town and country are inextricably mingled; therefore the welfare of all depends upon the tariff.

At the present time some 41,000 factories employ nearly 600,000 workers, upon whom directly depend nearly 2,000,000 people. In 1921 the manufactures of Canada had a capital investment of $3,210,707,288 and paid out in wages $581,402,385. These factories produced goods valued at $2,747,926,675 and contributed nearly 40 per cent of the nation's exports. Can Canada afford to jeopardize the fate of these people and reduce her capital investments and national trade? It is a condition, not a theory, which confronts us, and the ardent free trader would do well to ponder over these figures. He may ask one question, however, that needs consideration. "Your figures," he will say, "show the extraordinary increase in importance and value of manufactures. Surely forty-five years of protection has given our industries time enough to stand firmly on their own feet and do without protection. Let them face the world on their own merits as do the British manufacturers." Now this statement implies that Canada has given in the past heavy and even excessive protection. But what are the facts? As we have seen, the tariff was unchanged from 1907 to 1920 except for war taxes. The average rate of duty on all dutiable importations was 22½ per cent, and a considerable quantity of goods came in duty free. Since 1921 the tariff has been steadily reduced. Can that be called high protection? American, French, Italian and German manufactures would say, no. It is unsafe to lower the protection afforded to our industries, in view of the post-war factors, the European situation, the position of the United States and the financial condition of Canada. What the country will need for years to come is adequate protection based upon a scientific examination of our natural resources and world trade, and calculated to further the interests of agriculture and industry, labour and business.

I maintain that that is exactly what should have been done in connection with the motor industry in this country. It is a highly developed industry upon which a great number of people depend for a living and in which a great amount of capital is invested, and before any move is taken that will put an industry of that kind in jeopardy some scientific examination should have taken place, especially in view of the statement in the Speech from the Throne which reads:

> My ministers believe that in the interest of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncertainty with respect to tariff changes; that changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto. A tariff advisory board will accordingly be appointed forthwith.

An advisory tariff board has already been appointed. Drastic cuts have been made in the tariff on automobiles, but to what extent that will affect that industry, or those who are dependent upon it nobody can tell at the present time. It seems to me, in view of that statement in the Speech from the Throne, in view of the fact that the dealers all over this country will be loaded up with cars upon which they must take a loss, that they have a good claim in equity to come back to the government and ask to be recouped. In the present estimates there is an item of $1,690,000 for the purpose of refunding to the dealers the luxury tax paid by them on automobiles remaining in their hands and unsold when the tax was repealed in December, 1920. If those dealers are entitled to a refund, surely they have a much stronger case now in view of the statement in the Speech from the Throne and the pronouncement made by the Prime Minister at Richmond Hill in September last.

The economic depression of 1921-24 has slowly brought home to every Canadian the influence of European conditions upon Canadian prosperity. A disorganized, war-torn and debt-laden Europe after the war reduced its food consumption to seventy per cent of pre-war amounts, to the great detriment of agricultural prices the world over. Hence the difficulties of the Canadian west. Apart from war losses the plunge into bankruptcy or near bankruptcy of Russia, Poland, Germany, Austria, Hungary and the Balkans completely disorganized European trade, with the result that twenty-five per cent of the world's markets have been "frozen" for nearly six years. This situation has created for Britain an unemployment problem which four governments have tried in vain to remedy. Every industrial country in Europe at the close of the war was faced by the twin spectres of depreciating currency and a labour market flooded with demobilized soldiers, and therefore increased the tariff to safeguard the home market and protect its own people. We did the very opposite, with the result that we have been going through some very difficult times.

On some goods Italy's tariff after the war was raised nearly 300 per cent; France increased her tariff from 10 to 300 per cent; Spain, Switzerland, Roumania and Czecho-Slovakia all pursued a similar course. Even Great Britain maintained the McKenna duties of 33⅓ per cent on certain goods. Import or customs duties in 1920 in Great Britain amounted to $149,360,000, and yet she is called a free trade country. Those duties lasted until August, 1924, when they were repealed in spite of stormy protests from industries; they have since been partly re-established. In South America there has been a steady increase in duty ranging from 17 to 46 per cent, while Japan in the Far East has increased her tariff.

Just at this point I want to read a little extract from the budget speech of Mr. Winston Churchill, Chancellor of the Exchequer, as follows:

> On the general fiscal question, he asserted that restoration of imperial preference had been advantageous in home consumption of empire sugar, wines, raisins and tobacco. The duties on silk and artificial silk had been so successful he was sure any suggestion to repeal them would be received by the trade with dismay. The manufacturers' profits had not been reduced and the prices to the public had not been increased; therefore there was no doubt the customs duties had been paid by the foreigner. In short, the duty had raised over £6,000,000 and had worked with unexpected smoothness.

That is a case where you have the market protected and the manufacturer helped at no expense at all to the consumer. Let us see the result in Australia, which has recently embarked upon a high tariff policy. Writing in the Sydney Daily Telegraph Premier Bruce said:

> We can contemplate the financial and commercial outlook of Australia with well founded confidence and a healthy optimism.
> It is stated that the changes made last August in the Australian customs tariff have already had a profound effect in stimulating local manufacture, while they have certainly tended to increase revenues. In introducing the new tariff schedule, which gave substantial increases of duty on more than 50 items, Mr. Pratten, Minister for Trade and Customs, stated that within two years from 25,000 to 30,000 additional employees would be required for industrial development resulting from the new duties. Assuming that five persons were directly and indirectly dependent upon each wage-earner, from 100,000 to 150,000 persons would be advantaged. The new schedule reflected the desire of the Commonwealth government to assist industries which could be developed in Australia.

Meanwhile, the position of the primary producers of Australia is being steadily improved, not through tariff reductions which would be detrimental to industry, but through the introduction of better and more efficient marketing methods which tend to stabilize prices on a more profitable basis. A federal Department of Markets has been established, and according to the Prime Minister, the work of the new department "is giving satisfactory results in the orderly marketing of our primary products. The increasing production from our industries and the expansion of our overseas trade during the last decade is a wonderful record of achievement.

From many points of view textile and clothing factories provide the most interesting section of Australia's manufacturing industries. The doctrine that it has been an economic waste to send Australian wool to other countries and import manufactured goods made from that wool, instead of using the raw material locally and providing employment for a large number of Australians, has appealed to an increasing extent to the public mind of the commonwealth as the years have advanced. This point of view found expression in the recent changes made in the tariff, which have already had an important influence in improving the prospect of many mills and factories, and of stimulating greatly increased manufacture.

The effect of these tariff changes, plus trade depression and the reduced buying power of the farmer, has been very serious for the Canadian manufacturer. Between 1920 and 1922 the number of employees decreased from 685,349 to 517,144. Since then there has been some increase, but even now there are only 89 men employed in 1924 to 100 in 1920.

It is true that the tide of depression has already receded with Europe returning to normal, but competition for trade will be far heavier than in pre-war days. Belgium is back to pre-war production and hopes to expand. She has taken our glass trade. France has restored her devastated areas with the newest and most efficient equipment and has acquired the iron ores of Alsace-Lorraine and the coal of the Saar Valley. She is today the leading iron and coal country of Europe; she is almost entirely self-sufficient and potentially the richest country in Europe. Her greatest industrial problem is to secure sufficient labour without being swamped by foreigners. Italy has undergone a drastic purging and reorganization, will balance her budget in 1926 and is planning an intensive industrial campaign in order to absorb the labour of the large number of Italians now barred from America. The German manufacturer, at ridiculously low cost, was able to wipe out his mortgages when the mark declined, and he modernized his plant. Concentration of industry has proceeded, then, by leaps and bounds. The German railways are now the best in Europe. Under the Dawes plan, accepted by the great powers, Germany will be paying heavy reparation sums for at least a decade to come. Fundamentally those reparations must be paid with goods, which means increased German production and increased export trade. As Herr Stresemann says:

The war caused the hot-house growth of manufactures —competition has grown much keener in the international market.

Austria is almost back to efficiency and is regaining her hold on Balkan trade, while Czechoslovakia is the best governed and least unharmed industrial country in Europe. Even Poland is settling down to peaceful ways. Mr Strachey, of the London Spectator, says:

Europe is at bottom in a thoroughly sound position for trade revival. It is full of skilful, eager workers, managers and traders of all sorts. It is also full of well-equipped factories and it has develop the scientific use of the various forms of power to a high degree of perfection.

In the light of these facts it can be seen that the Canadian manufacturer may scarcely hope to make any appreciable gain in export trade for some time to come. In fact, he will do well to retain his increased share gained during war time when Europe could not compete with him. He has certain prospects in the Orient but even there the German is fast becoming a powerful rival. One is more and more forced to the belief that the home market must be the great mainstay of the Canadian manufacturer, and the eastern farmer for years to come. If that market is destroyed for him by a low tariff or free trade his position will be exceedingly hazardous. We must see to it that such a thing does not take place.

The second great factor in our tariff system is the United States, the colossus of the industrial world, with an area of unbounded fertility, of every variety of climate, with almost every resource for manufacturing except rubber and some of the minor metals and with a protection system established 135 years ago. The war gave her the supreme chance to seize world leadership in trade. She turned from a debtor to a creditor nation; she now possesses half of the world's gold and her wealth equals that of any other five nations combined. Her wealth was 350 billions in 1921, sixteen times our own. She possesses 45 per cent of the world's iron and steel, 50 per cent of the coal, 60 per cent of the copper and cotton, 70 per cent of the oil. Through the war her manufacturing plants outgrew her home market and she is to-day the greatest exporting nation in the world. In 1922 her exportable surplus was 653 millions, an increase in nine years of 33⅓ per cent.

SECOND READING

Bill No. 92, respecting the Grand Orange Lodge of British America.—Mr. Hocken.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

[Mr. Stinson.]

Mr. STINSON: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was pointing out some of the natural difficulties we have to encounter owing to a decreased tariff. Geographically, Canada and the United States are one—the Maritime provinces looking to the New England states, British Columbia belonging to the Pacific, Ontario and Quebec sharing the Great Lakes system with the eastern states, and western Canada having the natural frontier. The resulting "pull" of the United States upon us, offering as she does superior wages and opportunities has been tremendous. Between 1921 and 1925 we lost in population to the United States some 500,000 people. Obviously with her wealth of population and her industrial machine American industry can in nearly every instance produce at a lower cost than can Canadian industry, and can offer a greater variety with her mass production. The effect is to be seen in our adverse trade balances with the United States. In 1901 our imports from the United States were $107,377,906. In the same year our exports to the United States were $67,983,673. Coming to the year 1923 we find that our imports from the United States were $540,917,432 and our exports to that country $369,080,218. In 1923 our imports from the United States formed 67 per cent of our total imports. The total import amounted to $60 per head of our population, while our exports to the United States amounted to $3.25 per head of her population.

The greater part of our imports from the United States are of manufactured articles, and the need of a tariff against her is obvious if we are to have any manufactures of importance and to become at all self-sufficient. Since the war the United States has seen fit to increase her tariff against us, especially against our farm products, in order to protect her farmers. If a wealthy nation thinks protection advisable, we should have even more reason for adopting a similar policy. Moreover, protection compels the American manufacturer to establish branch factories in Canada, in order to share our trade. They employ Canadian workmen, and make investments in Canada which are of great value. Since 1901, six hundred and eleven American factories have come to Canada on account of protection, and nearly two and three-quarter billion dollars are invested in Canada. These factories represent 61 per cent of our motor industry, 40 per cent of our electrical apparatus, meat packing, rubber, brass and copper, condensed milk and petroleum industries. Without our tariff would these industries have come to Canada? I say no. Without increased protection shall we be able to attract new firms or can we withstand American increased wealth and efficiency? Again I say no. The lower our tariff the fewer workmen we employ and the more of our sons we lose to the United States—a loss which we cannot replace and which we can least afford. The exodus from Canada during the last few years, especially the younger men, has been a great drain upon this country. We are losing some of our best brains to the United States, and this should not be allowed to take place.

Lastly our serious financial position makes it dangerous for us to run any risk of financial depression in industry through a low tariff. During the war we had to take over control of the Canadian National railways with 22,000 miles of track. These railways are built in excess of our present needs, they are heavily capitalized and have heavy interest charges to meet. Until 1923 they failed to meet operating expenses apart from interest charges. The annual fixed charges are nearly $70,000,000, if we include interest on loans and allowances made by the government. Despite the skill and energy of Sir Henry Thornton, we must face the prospect of a heavy burden in our railway system for years to come. If our industries are ruined by a low tariff the railways will be among the first to suffer, and their losses are the country's losses. If the industry of Ontario and Quebec be destroyed, the western freight rates must of necessity increase. If you take the report of the Canadian National Railway, you will find that the line is divided into three divisions, the eastern regional division, the central division and the western division, and of the three divisions the one that is making the profit is the central division, where you have the industrial population and industrial development. If that industrial development is ruined it means that the freight rates to the west must of necessity be increased. I acknowledge to our western friends that they cannot profit from protection to the same extent as we in the central provinces can. That being the case, so far as I am personally concerned I am willing to make amends to them in the matter of freight rates sufficient to take care of any additional amount that they lose by reason of protection.

The war has given Canada an increased debt of $2,453,776,869 as compared with $338,996,850 in 1914. The interest on our debt has increased from $14,687,796 to $136,007,667. Nearly two billion of that sum is war debt—an unproductive debt which added nothing to our resources. Furthermore we have not as yet reduced that debt one iota. On the contrary, when the railway financing is included, it has increased. So long as that debt remains such a heavy charge, economy in government, coupled with increased production, is essential if we are to build up a surplus revenue. Our protective tariff represents a revenue of nearly $130,000,000. Reduce the tariff and that revenue falls. Can Canada afford that? Does the farmer want to pay the amount of tariff reduction in direct taxes? Our taxation is heavy enough, in all conscience—$43.15 per head as compared to $22.41 in 1913, or $5.88 in 1871. So far in discussing the tariff issue we have noted the progress made under protection in every branch of production, the growing dependence upon manufactures of our Canadian people, the increased competition in world trade caused by post-war conditions in Europe and America and the special need for stability, sound production and increasing revenue in order to meet our heavy burden of national debt. In view of these facts it is difficult to see how a low tariff is wise or justifiable.

There is one argument of the free trader, however, that has not yet been discussed. That is the argument by comparison, in which the theory is advanced that Great Britain has prospered as a free trade country and that Canada should do the same if she followed her example. By analysis of Britain's position that argument may be shattered. First of all, Britain only became a free trade country after centuries of protection during which she laid the foundation of her commercial and industrial strength. In the reign of Edward III, in the middle of the fifteenth century, England began to foster the weaving industry, to limit importation of goods and to discourage exports of raw materials. This policy was steadily pursued especially in Tudor times. Navigation acts in the seventeenth century fostered colonial trade and British shipping. At the close of the seventeenth century 1,200 imports were taxed. In the late eighteenth century, however, a series of inventions, coupled with abundant iron and coal and a long commercial experience, caused the famous industrial revolution which landed Britain on her career as the world's workshop. Europe was torn by wars and political unrest, the United States was a young struggling nation and Britain thus had the start by a half century. As Cobden and Bright boasted, Britain feared no competition at home and could undersell anybody abroad. Under these conditions Britain could well afford to relax protection, especially excessive duties on raw materials and food, since at that time agriculture was protected by the Corn Laws of 1815. Those laws particularly affected the workers who were poorly paid and who were forced to pay high prices for food, and the manufacturer who wanted cheap raw materials, cheap food for his men and an increased exchange of manufactures from England for food in other countries. Then arose the campaign led by the middle class manufacturers for the repeal of the Corn Laws. Subsequent to 1820 numerous duties were reduced; the Corn Laws disappeared between 1846 and 1860, and by 1860 virtual free trade existed. Hon. members will note that the transformation was spread over a period of forty years and took place only when Great Britain had a position of unsurpassed superiority.

The results of the movement are interesting. The repeal of the Corn Laws led to a concentration on manufacturing and a one-sided development of national life that made Britain dependent upon the world for seventy per cent of her food supplies. Her agricultural population fell from 49.8 per cent in 1846 to 21.9 per cent in 1913. In spite of such protection methods as her embargo upon Canadian cattle, only recently lifted, agriculture is one of the greatest problems of British life.

In the advancement of industry, while free trade has been her tariff policy, England has helped industry by such methods as the Trade Facilities Act, which affords ample capital for industrial concerns—surely an indirect form of protection; by discrimination in insurance risks against Canadian shipping, and other methods, and latterly by the Safeguarding of Industries Act.

To-day many in Britain seriously doubt whether she can afford to maintain free trade as her tariff policy. All parties are worried over British trade. The London Nation has opened its columns for a discussion of the conditions of British trade, while Labour admits that it cannot be a conjurer and sweep away unemployment at will. To-day Britain pays annually on her debt to United States a sum almost equal to her pre-war budget. She is beginning to wonder whether her present tariff policy is the safest one. She no longer leads the world in industry, being surpassed by the United States, while Germany and France are crowding on her heels. Even as matters stand she has an advantage over us in having no country such as the United States as a next-door neighbour and geographical twin.

We cannot, then, like Britain, accept free trade as our policy, because we have not the foundations of wealth and supremacy that Britain possessed when she accepted free trade; because our geographical position is vastly different and because economic conditions have totally changed since that time. Viewing the matter from every angle we must admit that Canada must retain her policy of protection, that she cannot afford a low tariff as economic conditions are at present, and that the present uncertainty must be ended if Canadian industry and Canada itself are to prosper.

I read this afternoon a memorandum from the Premier of Australia showing conditions that had operated to their benefit by reason of their adopting a policy of manufacturing their wool in Australia rather than of shipping it abroad. Following that up it seems to me we should take a leaf out of her book in regard to our wheat. At the present time we are building up on Canadian wheat one of the greatest cities in the United States. The greatest milling centre in the world is Buffalo, and it has been built up there in the last few years largely upon Canadian wheat. Last year there was milled in the city of Buffalo something like 7,000,000 barrels of flour, while there was milled in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific some 19,000,000 barrels. They have adopted a system of milling in bond; in other words Canadian wheat can be shipped to Buffalo, milled in bond and sent out to compete in the world market with our Canadian flour. The result is that the United States is getting the direct benefit of that, is building up that wonderful city and at the same time taking away from us transportation charges that our railways need. If there was an export duty on Canadian wheat forcing the milling to take place in Canada, it would not in my opinion decrease or curtail our market, but it would add that further industry to Canada for both our labour and our railways.

This matter was referred to the royal inquiry commission and they made a report on it in which they stated that it was a matter of great importance not only to the millers of Canada but to the farmers of the country generally. I am going to read a short extract from the report as was made at that time:

> At the present time, the duty on Canadian wheat—entering the United States—is 42 cents per bushel. On wheat flour, crushed or cracked wheat, and similar wheat products, the duty is $1.04 per hundred pounds. These duties are practically prohibitive in their effect. They prevent Canadian wheat or wheat products having access to the American domestic market. On the other hand under the provisions governing milling-in-bond and drawbacks, it is quite possible for the American millers to obtain Canadian wheat virtually free of duty to grind for export. Considerable quantities of Canadian wheat are ground in American mills, and exported abroad under these conditions. This American flour ground in American mills, but the product of Canadian wheat, enters into competition with the output of the Canadian flour mills. The benefits of manufacture are lost to Canada, while at the same time, the general benefits of reciprocal free trade in wheat and wheat flour do not exist. It was suggested to us that in view of these conditions, an export duty should be levied at the same rate as in the American tariff, upon Canadian wheat and wheat products entering the United States. The American tariff having already closed effectively the domestic market to the Canadian farmers, the result of such a levy would be to eliminate the export of American flour ground from Canadian wheat, and to transfer this market to the Canadian millers.

Now let us see for a moment how this milling in bond has been increasing. In 1921-22 the quantity of Canadian wheat milled in bond in United States was 6,172,837 bushels. In 1922-23 this had increased to 9,280,787 bushels, and in 1923-24 it had increased to 13,904,837 bushels. It will be noted that of the crop of 1923-24 the total reached the large quantity of over 13,900,000 bushels. The flour product of this quantity of wheat would be in excess of 3,000,000 barrels while the offal by-product would be 111,000 tons. These 3,000,000 barrels of flour made from straight Canadian wheat was sold abroad under United States trade names in direct competition with the product of Canadian mills. In the same twelve months Canada exported to countries other than the United States 11,973,916 barrels of flour.

Out of a total demand of 15,000,000 barrels of flour of Canadian quality, United States millers supplied no less than 20 per cent. With free Canadian wheat for this export trade, United States millers have certain advantages in rates and position which will always enable them to sell in competition with Canadian mills. Had the Canadian mills been in the competitive position natural and proper in view of all the conditions, then the extra 3,000,000 barrels should have been ground in Canadian mills and would have represented an increase of 25 per cent in export output. Now what does this mean to Canada? The manufacturer's costs of converting wheat into flour, including labour, selling expense and overhead, but not including the cost of bags or other containers, may be estimated at approximately sixty-five cents per barrel. At this rate the costs on 3,000,000 barrels would be $1,950,000. This amount was actually paid out in the United States in the year instead of being distributed to labour and capital in Canada. If Canada had milled this additional quantity Canadian transportation companies would have moved 14,000,000 bushels of wheat to Canadian mills and would have moved 3,000,000 barrels of flour and 111,000 tons of offal from Canadian mills, whereas this wheat actually moved direct by water from Fort William and Port Arthur to United States ports, chiefly in United States lake vessels, and no part of the product afterwards used Canadian routes. This meant that the loss to Canadian transportation companies on the movement of the wheat to the mills and the flour to the seaboard was in excess of $1,500,000. In addition to that, on the 111,000 tons of bran and shorts the additional earnings of Canadian transportation companies would have been 31½ cents per 100 pounds, or a total of $679,300, if distributed for consumption in Canada, or a substantial portion of $550,000 if exported.

This movement of wheat to the United States is directly affecting a number of our own towns and cities in the matter of railway transportation. Take the town of Lindsay, which is a divisional centre on the Canadian National Railways. The wheat moved on the lakes and on Georgian bay to Midland passes through the towns of Lindsay and Belleville on its way to seaboard. But since this great milling industry has been established at Buffalo there has been a gradual falling off in the movement of wheat through Georgian bay to seaboard, with the result that the railwaymen earned $200,000 less in wages in 1925 than in 1921 in the town of Lindsay. I am not attributing this fact entirely to the difference in the movement of grain, because certain other factors have to be taken into account; but in large measure it is due to the fact that the grain is going to Buffalo rather than through our own ports. It is time therefore that action were taken to remedy this condition of things. The grain should go through Canadian and not through American ports.

There is something else that must be considered. Canada is losing all the advantage that would accrue from the sale of this flour under Canadian trade names. It is exported as United States domestic flour, thus helping the United States to retain its reputation in the world's markets for high grade flour, to the benefit, whether blended or not, of all the domestic produce of that country. The effect on Canada is unfavourable. When selling, the United States miller may represent the flour as the product of Canadian wheat, or he may not. If he does not, the impression is created that perfect substitutes for Canadian wheat and flour can be found in another country, and that is absolutely to our detriment. The magnitude and importance of the Canadian milling industry are clearly shown by the official returns published in the latest issue of the Canada Year Book for the year 1922. The capital employed in 434 flour mills was

$65,928,521 and salaries and wages paid during the year totalled $7,083,398. The purchasing power of industry in the year, as represented by the amount paid out for material and supplies, was the very large sum of $125,312,923, and the value of the products, $151,237,671. The net difference between the latter two items, $25,924,748, represented the values created in Canada by the industry.

I realize that the prosperity of the Canadian farmer is fundamental to the development and success of the milling industry and wish it to be clearly understood that in advocating this duty I do so in the belief, not only that it would not depress prices, or restrict opportunities of sale for producers, but that on the other hand it would strengthen the position of Canadian products with advantage to every Canadian interest. If this flour were consumed in the United States, as it is not, that would mean that a market for Canadian wheat, which otherwise has been very limited and uncertain, would be enlarged by the use of wheat in this way. But under existing conditions no increase in the demand for Canadian wheat is brought about. If there is no increase in consumptive demand there can be no effect on the basis of prices. Indeed, the United States miller cannot be as substantial a support to the market as the Canadian miller, for the former can drop out of the business the moment he finds it equally profitable to grind United States wheat. The greater part of the milling in bond is done at Buffalo, but at any lake Erie port Canadian wheat can be laid down from Fort William-Port Arthur at a freight rate lower on the average than that to any Canadian port on the lakes. A mill at Buffalo pays lower transportation costs on Canadian wheat than does any eastern Canadian mill. It is by special laws and regulations of the government of the United States that the American miller has been put in a position to do this business. It is the policy of that government to give all the employment possible to United States labour and capital in its milling industry, even when the main product is not required in, and is even denied access to, the domestic market. As imports of Canadian wheat into the United States for actual consumption in that country are, under the present tariff, absolutely negligible and merely permit the export of a little more United States wheat or flour, in competition with Canadian products abroad, the general application of an export duty would not in such a case be open to objection on the ground that it might restrict the market for Canadian products.

[Mr. Stinson.]

I am deeply interested in Canada. I am interested in everything that will make Canada a nation worthy of her great natural resources, and I will support legislation that will bring that about, no matter what political party may introduce it. I should like to see Canada develop in such a way that we might have a job for every man at a reasonable wage so that he could maintain his home, educate his family and send them out fully equipped to take their place in the world. We want a Canada where the young Canadian can use his education and ability for the benefit of the land of his birth, and thus free his father and mother from the anguish of seeing him expatriate himself to a foreign country to make a living. We want a Canada-first policy, and that can be built up only upon a reasonable tariff system based upon scientific examination. That must be the settled policy of Canada. Tariff stability based upon protection is the greatest confidence builder known to business. It helps the farmer, the labourer, the manuacturer, the retailer; it assists and promotes every branch of our national life.

Mr. CHAS. B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): I rise to give my unqualified support to what is perhaps the most popular all-round budget that has ever been brought down in the Canadian parliament. I join with my leader in thankfulness that Canada which suffered so much during the Great war is one of the first of the allied countries to recover from the after-war depression. I also join with my friends on the other side of the House in "thanking Providence for having been so good to us". At the same time I like to think of the old maxim which was mentioned by my good friend from Lake St. John (Mr. Sylvestre) that "God helps those who help themselves".

Canada's great and increasing prosperity has been accomplished because all classes; the rich and the poor, the mighty and the weak, the capitalist and the labourer, regardless of race or religion, have joined together in this commendable work. The common people have placed their shoulders to the wheel, and guided by a sane government, have accomplished world-renowned achievements! I was pleased the other day to listen to the speech of one of the oldest members of this House, my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), who did not hesitate to say that the present budget was the finest of any that he had listened to during his twenty-seven years as a member of this House. Twenty-seven years takes us back to the days when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power and when the national debt was at its minimum, and consequently taxation was light and any increase of taxes did not affect the people so directly as it would at the present time, particularly as any increase then naturally followed the steady development of the country. But during the ten years from 1911 to 1921, our national debt was increased by $2,000,000,000, as we say in French; parce qu'ils avaient tous les mains dans le plat; and therefore our rejoicing to-day is all the greater that the Minister of Finance has been able to bring down a budget containing a substantial reduction of taxation. I am pleased to be a member of the House in this fifteenth parliament because I believe that in the years to come this budget will be regarded as one of the greatest achievements in our political history and will be looked back upon as one of the milestones in Canadian development.

I pick up the local paper from my home town and on the front page in big headlines I read this:

British budget is presented by the Hon. Churchill. General trade improving, but basic industries depressed.

I present this by way of comparison after listening to my hon. friend on the other side (Mr. Stinson) who stated in his speech that the basic industries of Canada were improving. The next statement is this:

Under budget as presented existing rate of taxation will be continued for 1926-27.

England, the Mother of Parliaments, and her taxation rate for 1926-27 is to be continued on the same basis! Contrast this with the budget of Canada—notre pays—substantially reducing taxation so soon after the war. There is no question about our increasing prosperity. Money in the pockets of the people will show that business is improving. But in case my statement should be doubted, let me cite two items which it has been a great pleasure for me to read recently. One is:

The Canadian Pacific Railway March net best since 1918. Gross up $1,300,000 over March 1925, while expenses increased only $623,306. Good first quarter. Net $2,675,000 above that shown in first quarter of last year.

In other words, the net for the first quarter of the year of that transportation system of which we are all so justly proud shows an increase of $2,675,000. Then we are also pleased that the Canadian National Railways—our own system—for the month of March comes out with these figures:

A net of $4,191,000, an increase of $2,500,000 over the same period last year, or an increase of 156 per cent.

Now, these reports coming from our two great railway systems are significant. Taking the Canadian National figures, if you multiply the $2,500,000 by twelve, I think you will see that by the end of this year the system will be able to meet its interest to the public.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. gentleman really understands what he is saying.

Mr. HOWARD: I have a fairly good idea.

Mr. BENNETT: The Canadian National Railways did not earn its interest charges by over $40,000,000.

Mr. HOWARD: I did not say anything to the contrary.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman said it would earn $40,000,000 next year.

Mr. HOWARD: I said that this year and last year it nearly met its interest on all the outstanding indebtedness to the people of Canada, not on the money that has been put up by the government.

Mr. BENNETT: The balance of it is part of our national debt.

Mr. HOWARD: I would ask hon. members to listen to this evidence of prosperity in the business world:

The Ford output at the Canadian plant is still growing, there being an increase of over 8,000 cars in the five month period compared with a similar period last year. The output of tractors is also on the increase.

This is not a statement given out for the government, but a statement furnished to the company's shareholders. At the bottom I find the following:

The total sales and income for the five month period is $16,191,000, an increase of over $5,000,000 in the first five months over last year. Showing a net profit of $1,000,000 for the period.

Let me give another item concerning the automobile industry generally:

"The auto industry attains a record output for 1925." There were manufactured in Canada during 1925, 124,000 cars, worth $82,000,000. . . . export shipments from Canada were the highest on record, the total value of automobiles and parts exported during the year being $39,000,000.

One more item to show our increasing prosperity. This is from the banking standpoint, and it comes very near to me, for it is published in the Financial Times, and we know the politics of this paper. It states in connection with the building of a new paper mill just north of the city of Sherbrooke:

About five years ago this same company was obliged to put out a bond issue carrying a rate of interest of 8 per cent, and it sold just as few bonds as it possibly could. When it is ready to build its new paper mill, instead of re-financing, the president says: "We have arranged with our bank to loan us the money by our putting up these 8 per cent bonds as collateral security and getting our money at 6 per cent."

This shows the improved financial situation in the banking and industrial world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what I think we should ask ourselves in connection with the budget is this: Was this reduction in taxation justified? In replying to that question, lest my figures may be disputed by some hon. members on the other side, as they have just been disputed by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), instead of taking my figures from the Canada Year Book or the blue books of this government I will take them from the 1925 report of the Royal Bank of Canada. I take that report because I see from its first page that the president of that institution is one of the head Tories of Canada, so I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite will not dispute these figures. There are no figures given for 1911, but at page 26 of that report I find that in 1910 the net public debt of Canada was $48.64 per capita, and that in 1921, when this government came back into power, the net debt per capita was $266.36; in other words, it had jumped from $48.64 to $266.36. The next year there was an increase of $4. Then what do I find? In 1925 it had decreased to $258.16, a decrease of $8.20 per capita for every person in Canada.

Turning to the next page of the report, page 27, I find that the total gross debt of Canada was practically the same in the years 1923 and 1924, but in 1925 it had decreased by $80,000,000. I also find that the net debt in 1923 was $1,814,000,000, and in 1924, $1,804,000,000, or a decrease of $10,000,000. In 1925, the net debt of Canada was $1,767,000,000, a further decrease of $37,000,000, which, with the $10,000,000 decrease of the previous year makes for the two years a decrease, according to Conservative figures, of $47,000,000. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this justifies the reduction which this budget proposes in the present income tax.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon. gentleman not know that the apparent decrease in the debt is largely due to the fact that this government ceased making direct loans to the Canadian National Railways, as was done under Mr. Fielding, and instituted the practice of guaranteeing the bonds, and in that way showed a saving in one year of $70,000,000?

Mr. HOWARD: I have reason to believe what was stated by the Minister of Finance, that the system of bookkeeping has not been changed.

[Mr. Howard.]

It has been stated in practically all the Tory press during the past two weeks that every member on the Liberal side and on the Progressive side of this House discusses only the reduction in the automobile tax. I shall therefore for a few minutes pay attention to the reduction in the income tax, and the first thing I wish to take up is the method of taxation.

I would like you to remember, Mr. Speaker, that this income tax was put in force in 1917 and became effective on the 1st of April, 1918, and I have no hesitation in saying to this House that the system of income taxation as called for under the income tax legislation of 1918 was one of the rottenest systems that has ever been put over any country. I say so because it disregarded the fact that all people in this country have the same rights. The government of that day placed upon the statute book that famous surtax, and anybody who knows what a surtax is knows that it is simply a way of allowing the rich man to get a preference over the man who is earning an ordinary salary. I am proud to stand on this side of the House and to say that under the income tax proposals brought down by the present Minister of Finance there is no class distinction of any kind. I also wish to state that the load has been lightened especially for those people who needed relief, the man whose salary was reported by his employer, and who perhaps was raising the large or the largest family, and therefore needed the most relief. This government has seen fit to raise the exemption of that class.

About two days after this budget was brought down, somebody ran across a certain kind of income that might bear a heavier tax than in the previous year. The Tory press broadcast the fact that the income tax reduction was only a bluff, that as a matter of fact there was an increase in the tax. There can be no question about the $3,000 exemption, but let us take the business man who is carrying the load of the country and has an income of, say, $10,000. Last year the man with an income of $10,000 paid $619.50; this year he will pay $290. But the man with the same income derived from dividends on, say, Canadian Bank of Commerce stock, probably left to him by his great grandfather, and who last year paid only $115.50 while the business man paid $619.50, will this year pay, not more than the other man—because this government does not go on that basis—but he will pay the same as the other man, namely $290.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the hon. gentleman would allow me to ask him a question. Does he realize what that means to the people who bought securities from brokers free from normal tax and now find themselves deceived and having to pay this extra tax?

Mr. HOWARD: I do not think the question affects my argument in the least.

Mr. GEARY: I suppose the same would follow in the case of a widow whose whole income had been left to her?

Mr. HOWARD: They are as well able to pay as the man who is carrying the load and has six children to provide for and educate. The great point is this, Mr. Speaker, that under this budget every man knows where he stands.

One thing more. Travelling up and down this country in the last five years I have come across this situation, which has been remedied by this budget. A man will ask you on the train: Who makes up your income tax? Naturally you will mention whoever is your auditor in your home town, and then he will say to you: "I used to be employed with the Income Tax department, but I am now in business for myself; if you will allow me to make up your income tax I will save you one-half of what you are paying now and we will go fifty-fifty on the balance." But under this budget, Mr. Speaker, there will be none of that kind of business for any man can sit down and find out for himself exactly what he has to pay.

The Tory press call this a Progressive budget. I would like to ask them how they get that way. There is not one single Progressive member from the province of Quebec, and yet there is not a member from that province who does not support every clause of this budget. If this budget was dictated by the Progressives, how do you account for the cut in the rich man's income tax? I go further: I say that this budget was brought down by the Liberal party with the help of the Progressive party, because they are willing to assist in the passing of any legislation which is in the best interests of the people of Canada as a whole. There have been many governments with a majority running from thirty to fifty in this House who would never have dared to face the financial interests of Canada and bring down a budget favourable to all classes, but this government, which on the first vote taken in this House had a majority of only three, and which, with our allies the Progressives, has a majority to-day running from only ten to fifteen, were not afraid to take the consequences. We stand, therefore, on the merits of this budget.

We have been criticized by our Tory friends and the Tory papers on the ground that Canadian industries are hurt by this budget. I should like those who really think that is the case to turn to page 2456 of Hansard and in the part of the budget recorded there they will see whether this government stands by Canadian industries or not. An industry in the town of Drummondville which is spending $7,000,000 to-day on the erection of one of the finest cellulose manufacturing plants in Canada, came to this government and received what? They were allowed to bring in from the United States a certain part of the material they required for one year practically free of duty, and another part of the material for two years, so that they could get their own plant going by that time. When their own plant is in operation the tariff will be applicable as it is to-day.

With respect to the argument that this budget will discourage Canadian industries let me point out that the Montreal Gazette of yesterday states that the Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company's industry will be developed at a cost of $25,000,000. That industry is in the province of Ontario. Now that industry is not afraid to spend $25,000,000 just after the bringing down of the budget. But I want to tell hon. gentlemen of the prosperity that is coming to the province of Quebec. Perhaps it is not generally known that the Aluminum Company of America is spending in the northern part of that province the enormous sum of $100,000,000, two and a half times the total valuation of the city which did me the honour to send me here. One development involving an expenditure of $100,000,000! And those people are coming here and are going to manufacture aluminum in the face of the budget brought down on April 15 last.

I do not desire to criticize the budget in any way, but I should like to see the time soon when the stamps on notes will be the same as on cheques, and I feel sure this will be realized in due course. I should like also to see the restoration of the duty that was taken off cyanide pumps in 1914 by the Tory government, thus allowing them to be manufactured in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and shipped to the great mining companies in northern Ontario and northern Quebec free of duty. Whatever that duty was I should like to see it restored, so that the business of $50,000 which went out of Canada last year will go to the city of Sherbrooke. I say that not because I want the price to be increased.

but because I think Canada is entitled to that business. I congratulate the government on keeping out inferior spring scales such as might cheat the Canadian consumer.

Now I come to the tariff on automobiles. I wish to be perfectly frank in my statement. Most of you know my position on the tariff question, but I will state it again. I believe in using the tariff to protect our industries, to protect our farmers, and to protect our consumers as long as that protection is not taken advantage of to increase the price unduly. I believe in using the tariff to eliminate foreign competition—

An hon. MEMBER: Good Tory doctrine.

Mr. HOWARD: —but I do not believe in allowing any monopoly to start in this country, keeping it on the nursing bottle for over twenty years, and then allowing it to bleed the Canadian consumer without taking any steps to reduce the price. The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) stated the other night that the tariff would not increase the price of articles. If he were here to-night I would ask him how he could make such a statement as that in view of the price of Canadian automobiles as compared with the price of American automobiles? The same hon. gentleman quoted an item, which I now hold in my hand, with respect to Henry Ford, and he stated that Henry Ford was not an authority on automobiles. Well, if Henry Ford is not an authority on automobiles I do not think the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington can be an authority on the Orange Lodge.

To illustrate my point with respect to the effect of the duty, let me say that in Sherbrooke we have an industry employing five hundred hands. There is a duty on the class of goods which it makes of twenty-seven and a half per cent. But the Canadian price to the Canadian consumer instead of being higher than the American price to the American consumer is actually less. There is another industry in Sherbrooke engaged in another line of manufacturing, which enjoys a protection of thirty-five per cent, the same as the manufacturers of automobiles had. Yet that factory's price in Sherbrooke to the Canadian consumer is exactly the same as the price for the same line of goods in the United States. There are two other industries in Sherbrooke, two of the biggest in that city. They manufacture full-fashioned silk stockings for ladies and enjoy a protection of thirty-five per cent. When these articles are imported into Canada they are subject to thirty-five per cent duty, but do Canadians pay a higher price for silk stockings? No, in every retail store throughout the Dominion these stockings can be bought at $2 a pair, which is exactly the same price as that paid in the United States for the same quality of goods. There is also in Sherbrooke a big factory which employs one thousand hands. That industry runs day and night and, as I said before, sometimes on Sundays. The duty on the products of this industry is twenty per cent. It used to be twenty-five per cent, but a reduction of five per cent was made and no delegation came to Ottawa to protest. But in spite of the fact that there is that protection of twenty per cent, the average yearly sales price to the Canadian consumer is only five and three-quarter per cent over the American price. Now, Mr. Speaker, these are examples of industries that are engaged in manufacturing in Canada and yet treat the Canadian consumer fairly.

Now let me come to the question of automobile prices. I will give some figures in that regard, but I will be brief. I have given the figures before, but on account of the fact that they were disputed I wish to repeat them. This is taken from American Motor, a magazine published in the United States, of the issue of April, 1926. It gives the price of every car in the United States, f.o.b. Detroit or at the manufacturing town. This is what I find:

	Canada	United States	Per cent
McLaughlin Buick Sedan..	$2,020	$1,295	56
Oakland Coach..	1,720	1,095	57
Oldsmobile coach..	1,495	950	57½
Chevrolet Coach..	1,055	645	63½

Then I find this statement appearing in our daily press:

"In spite of legislation which we do not consider to be in the best interests of the country, we believe it is the duty of all patriotic citizens to carry on and do their utmost to build up Canada," said Wallace R. Campbell, vice-president and treasurer of the Company, in making the announcement.

"We hope that the increased production will justify the cut, and we are depending on the people of Canada to keep us going."

And alongside of that in the very same paper I find the following item:

"We have definitely decided to discontinue the manufacture and assembling of the Oakland, Cadillac, Oldsmobile and G.M.C. truck immediately, and all these cars will now be imported complete from the United States," said R. S. McLaughlin, president of the General Motors of Canada, Limited, this afternoon. The General Motors plant here employing 3,000 hands, closed down temporarily on Friday morning after the tariff announcements of Hon. J. A. Robb, Dominion Minister of Finance, but will reopen on Monday morning. Mr. McLaughlin declared that the closing of the plant was "no bluff".

There is not a member in this House who does not know that the Canadian workman is the finest workman in the world, bar none. We want to do everything we can to protect him, but I ask hon. gentlemen to be honest and fair. Industries that were in the business during the war, employing 4,000 to 6,000 men, did not close their doors the morning after the Armistice was signed in November, 1918. They did not put their workmen at once on the streets, but kept them for months afterwards; they did not remove them until the country could absorb the surplus labour. That is why I say—and I believe it is the opinion of the people of Canada generally—that any firm who would close their doors and put their faithful employees on the street before knowing what the effect of the budget on the people of Canada would be, have no right to manufacture in this country. If the manufacturers had been honest and played the game fairly, no government, neither this government nor any other, would want to do anything to injure the industry, because we all should have but one aim, the upbuilding of our country.

Some feeling has been expressed, some suggestions have been thrown out and statements made, that this was a movement of the province of Quebec against Ontario. I deprecate such remarks as these. Anything that benefits Ontario benefits Quebec, and anything that benefits Quebec benefits Ontario. I will give you one example to-night to show whether or not Quebec is playing fairly. The Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company is paying to this country, an income tax of three-quarters of a million dollars and is supplying power to the citizens of the province of Quebec in the district of Montreal, while the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission, which is supplying citizens around Toronto, is not paying one nickel by way of income tax. We in Quebec think they should be on the same basis as our Quebec companies. When we talk about justice in this country we mean justice to everybody, rich and poor, the people in the west and those in the Maritime provinces, and as long as the present government remains in power this country can be assured that they will rceeive even-handed justice.

In the United States there is one automobile to every six people. In Canada there is only one automobile to every thirteen people. When an automobile manufacturer tells you that he will close up his factory in Canada and go back to the United States he knows he is bluffing. He knows that this country of ours, Canada, which our taxpayers have built up, is the only country in the world where he can build a car, get the advantage of the British preference and sell it in the British Empire, which extends round the whole globe. The automobile manufacturer knows that the Australian government demands that in order to obtain the benefit of the British preference he has to make 50 per cent of his car in Canada, and that is where the rub comes. He wants to get the benefit of the British preference if ten per cent is manufactured in Canada. He also knows that in one of the small British possessions, India, there are three hundred million people; they are only beginning to build their highways, and they will be the greatest purchaser of automobiles in the future. For my part I want to do justice to the automobile manufacturers. We want to treat them fairly but we should see that they treat the Canadian purchaser accordingly. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), stated he would apply the golden rule. In other words, we should treat them the same as they treat us—meaning the United States. A book was handed to me by the Minister of Finance which showed that you could manufacture automobiles in Canada and ship them to the United States on the payment of 25 per cent duty. But when you make them in the United States and bring them in Canada there is a duty of 35 per cent. My hon. friend must have forgotten that in advocating his policy of brick for brick!

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) following the speech of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) the other night, directed a question to me, namely, he asked me how I liked the tariff policy which the hon. member for St. Boniface has expounded. I leave it to the House to say whether there is any difference between the policy I have enunciated to-night and the policy expressed by the hon. member for St. Boniface. He spoke about the duty on vegetables coming into Canada, the duty on potatoes, strawberries and so forth. We have a tariff board, and my opinion on this subject is that there is no need to place a duty on those products from the month of January to the month of July when Canada does not produce any of them. But if the tariff board adjudges that these products during the season they are produced in Canada are subjected to foreign competition, it is for them to decide whether they should put on a duty to eliminate that foreign competition. The matter has already been submitted to them.

In conclusion, as I see the situation it amounts to this: when this House convened on January 7, the present government was sustained by a majority of three. This government asked for an adjournment of six weeks in order to elect their ministers in the best interests of Canada. But that adjournment was held off and was cancelled by the action of members of the opposition. If they had granted that adjournment, they might have reduced that majority by one, but they did not do so and consequently the majority is increasing every day and has increased. I sat in this House and heard the speech delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) when he spoke for about three hours—one of the greatest addresses that has ever been delivered in this chamber—on the eve of the election in Prince Albert. It was supposed to have been in the interest of Canada, but I have decided that it was in the interest of the Conservative party. The result of the Customs investigation, which we cannot speak of in this House until the report from that committee comes in, will justify my remarks in due course. But up to date there has not been one particle of suggestive criticism offered.

In closing I am frank to state that all that is the matter with the opposition and their discussion on this question is the fact that they regret that their lack of tactics and generalship has increased our majorities and has placed the present government in power for years to come and prevented the opposition from bringing down this very same budget!

Mr. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I beg the indulgence of this House for a time, I hope not too long to-night, to offer my support to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). There has been a good deal of discussion in this House over the budget and no doubt a great deal of interest is being taken in it throughout the whole Dominion of Canada. This interest is well justified because it constitutes the business programme of the country for the coming year.

Some have termed it an "election" budget. If it is it may still serve for better government. Others term it a "Saskatchewan" budget, and as hon. members from that province smile almost in jubilation at the most contentious changes it enunciates, one cannot help thinking that the desires long since expressed by the three ministers from Saskatchewan on fiscal matters are being more and more felt by the government. It has also been termed, I believe, by the hon. member for Fort William as an "American" budget, and I fear if its principles are put into effect that such a description may be justified. As I listened, however, to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), independent though he professes to be, enthusiastically defend it in detail, and with apparent satisfaction endorse it in full and laud the government in general, I wondered if it would be fair to term it a "Forke-handled" budget. Whether or not there is in any of these terms a proper description the government alone may know, but surely such a budget would have been indescribable to themselves at the time when the Speech from the Throne was brought down in this House, when parliament and the people in general were solemnly promised that no change in the fiscal policy of the country would be made without a thorough investigation by the tariff commission into the affairs of the industries concerned. Since then the tariff commission, which was appointed in due time, was expected to assume the responsibilities for which it was created, namely, to investigate such industries.

I cannot say whether the automobile industry has been unduly protected or not or whether this is too great a reduction in the tariff or not enough. If this government assume to know, why appoint a tariff board? If they do not know, why speculate so recklessly with a theory that practically threatens the existence of a great and growing industry? It is surely reasonable to assume that an industry involving $60,000,000 of capital investment in this country, employing 20,000 skilled labourers with a payroll of over $30,000,000 annually and supporting 100,000 people who are directly interested, would be worthy of the consideration of this new board if its appointment is in any way going to be justified by this government. The action of the government seems as if it realized the futility of the board to act effectively without any principle by which to function. If that should be the reason for our not having a report from this new tariff commisison, this reduction in the duty of 15 per cent, or a reduction of 43 per cent of the original protection on automobiles by the government will at least serve as an enlightenment of the principle on which the government desires the new board to function with reference to the boot and shoe industry, the furniture industry, the silk industry and other industrial enterprises that enjoy similar protection.

The hon. member for Brandon has on different occasions explained his unselfishness, stating that sectional desires are far from his mind. As a farmer I might be pardoned if I too give expression to my own unselfishness as to these tariff changes, as I represent the riding of Dufferin-Simcoe which has not a manufacturing plant in any way subsidiary to the manufacture of automobiles, but which is a large rural riding almost solely engaged in agriculture for which its fertile soil is favourably adapted, and therefore which is a riding of purchasers of motor cars and other machinery manufactured outside of the riding. I feel that if I were to admit any selfishness it would certainly not be with any lack of interest in the agriculturists of Canada. When I say "agriculturists" I do not mean only those who are engaged in one phase of that great enterprise, but I am also mindful of those engaged in mixed farming who make up by far the greater majority of the agricultural class in Canada to-day.

The reason that I am here to-day is because the agriculturists of my riding realize that a national protective policy as enunciated by the leader of the Conservative party is of fundamental importance to their interests. Therefore I wish to make it clear to this House that even though the hon. member for Brandon leads a remnant of what once promised to be an important party in this country and though he has a special circumstantial influence in this parliament which he may never enjoy in the same way again, he in no way represents the farmers in Canada outside of a very few sections when he states that the farmers do not want protection and that a home market is not of fundamental importance to the future success of our business.

I do not want to reflect in any way on the sincerity of my hon. friends to the left when they say that they are not a class or a sectional representation in this House because I feel that they are sincere in their interest in the whole welfare of our Canadian people. But I regret that such a reference to their sincerity of purpose is in no way a tribute to their judgment of practice in the interest of agriculture because I feel that the interests of industry and agriculture in Canada are so closely identified that any fiscal policy that retards in any way one of these great basic industries, similarly reflects on the other. I realize that at this particular time in our country's history wheat-growing does not feel the benefit of a protective policy to the same extent that the balance of agricultural production does and while I hope I realize fully the value of wheat production in agriculture, I also realize that no matter how fertile any soil may be, it cannot be used indefinitely for the production of wheat alone, so that Canada is already fast becoming a country of mixed farming.

We saw long ago the effects of lowering the duties to benefit one particular class in this country, and the results invariably were such as were experienced in the lowering of duties on farm implements. This did not benefit the farmers one dollar; in fact, after that reduction by this government they paid more for almost every tool of production which they used on their farms, and other classes suffered and were forced to deplete the home market by going to a foreign market to manufacture the implements there. We have watched our Canadian people leave our country to seek employment since this government came into power. There are 15,000 Canadians engaged in the farm tractor industry in the United States who ought to be working in this country. What we need is a policy that will keep these people employed in Canada, preserve to them a high standard of living, and increase the home market for all our agricultural producers, as well as for our manufacturers and retailers. Such a policy is bound to react favourably upon those who are engaged professionally and upon all other classes of the community.

It is not necessary to put on Hansard facts and figures which probably are already on record. It would seem, however, that the government at any rate has not yet realized the situation in Canada sufficiently to see the error of its ways. We know what the effect of its policy has been on the fertilizer industry as well as on farm implements. The result of their theorizing has been to put out of business a large portion of our fertilizer manufacturing industry. This has depleted the market for farm products in Canada by driving out of the country, to seek employment in the United States and elsewhere, those workmen who were engaged in this industry. And far from the government's efforts resulting in a lowering of the price of fertilizer it has increased it: the American manufacturer is now able to charge higher prices because of less Canadian competition.

Some Canadians may be satisfied to remain just producers of wheat and the recipients of the surplus industrial products of the United States. But is it fair that, because they happen to hold that innocent international view, this country should give to the American, the Australian and the New Zealand agriculturist, as it does to-day, an advantage over the Canadian farmer in eggs, butter, cheese, meats, grains, fruits and in fact every other commodity for which the home market is badly needed? I need not put on Hansard the list of duties, which I fancy has already been reported, but why should we allow almost $200,000,000 worth of foreign agricultural products to be sold in Canada under an advantageous tariff? The wheat producer of Canada prays that Europeans may continue to eat white bread in order to take his surplus, and he wants special transportation rates. He is not concerned with the home market. But he seems to forget that after all wheat growing is only one phase of a great enterprise in a district in which, unless all natural precedents fail, there will be a more diversified production before long. If only the Canadian market were protected for the Canadian farmer there are many lines of agriculture which would prove just as profitable as the growing of wheat. Under a proper system of protection, not only would our home market be enlarged, but important phases of agricultural endeavour would be directly stimulated, as for example, the textile industry. Surely this government should have studiously avoided the error committed by its own party under its great chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who, realizing the disastrous effect upon eighty-eight woollen textile mills after the lowering of the duty in 1897, retrieved his mistake and increased the tariff again from 23½ to 30 per cent in 1904. Is it not a strange fact that before 1900 we had more sheep in Canada than we have to-day? In 1921, before the present government speculated in freer trade and lowered the duty on textiles, we had 1,000,000 sheep more than we have now. Our textile industry suffered heavy losses and thousands were put out of employment, being forced to leave their homes. Previous to that time we had 3,600,000 sheep and lambs, as against 2,500,000 to-day. Canada is by climate adapted to the raising of sheep, and with our vast areas we have only 2,500,000 as compared with 25,000,000 in England, with its small territory. And Australia has 80,000,000 head. With the aid of the so-called farmer party this government saw fit to reduce the duty on Australian mutton from three cents to one-half cent, allowing that dominion a special advantage also in woollen products. Since the British preference was lowered we find that almost one-half of the total imports from Great Britain have been textile products, which in 1925 amounted to over $72,000,000. Is this fair to the Canadian textile industry?

In 1923 the present government, through the French treaty, reduced our duty on French textiles to nineteen per cent on some lines, and below 30 per cent on all. Although Great Britain, still believed by some to be a free trade country, protects its textile manufacturers to the extent of 33⅓ per cent against competition, the idustry in that country pays less in wages to its factory hands than do the Canadian mills. Since 1923 our imports of woollen and knitted goods from France have increased three-fold, until in 1925 they amounted to over $3,000,000. When we consider that we produce only one-half of the textile requirements of our people and that the farmers produce only one-fifth of the raw wool consumed in Canada, is there any justification whatever for any action that tends to discourage such a great dual enterprise as the woollen industry? As a producer of mutton and wool I claim that with adequate protection for our textile industry, as well as protection against foreign mutton and raw wool, we might increase our sheep industry by one hundred per cent, with considerable advantage to this Dominion. The sheep industry is one that increases the fertility and productive qualities of the soil instead of robbing it of its best elements, as the growing of wheat tends inevitably to do.

When I say, Mr. Speaker, that a sound protective policy is as essential to argicultural development as it is to industry, I think I am only voicing the opinion of our party, as enunciated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) in his resolution of a year ago, that we should protect the products of Canadian agriculture against unfair competition from foreign commodities which enjoy a tariff advantage. This particular phase of a national protective policy is recognized as most essential to the agricultural area of Dufferin-Simcoe which I represent. But realizing that a policy of national protection is bound to reflect its advantages in every locality, I would not consider it fair if I did not advocate, equally in the case of other activities, the same principle of adequate protection. I believe in the principle of protection as applied not only to the enterprises of my own constituency, but to coal and steel in the east, and industrial enterprises, just as I view with sympathy the question of western freight rates. My ideal is a policy that will make for national development throughout the Dominion as a whole.

I want to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the picture he has painted in his budget of the improved conditions of the country at the present time No doubt he had the advantage of the blessed co-operation of Providence; nature smiling on our wheat fields during the past year provided a good background for that picture. I have no doubt the reductions in the income tax and the stamp tax will be welcomed, even if they do seem to be a couple of years late in coming. It would appear that the sales tax, the receipt tax and the tax on cheques, all increased by this government when it came into power, might well have been materially reduced if not abolished. Since the present government took office in 1921 the tax collections have been greater year by year than they were in any year of the former government.

Now, independent of the bright and picturesque appearance of the budget, we find that last year's expenditure was some $22,300,000 over previous years, and our estimates for the coming year promise still greater expenditure. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while the government seem to have become artists in the painless extraction of taxes from our people, it would be more economically sound if, first, they would show a reduction of expenditure; then the other side of the ledger might be expected to follow favourably, as a natural consequence.

It is indeed gratifying to anyone in public life to note the great respect that the members of the different parties have in common for the traditions and lives of those two great leaders, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the late Sir John A Macdonald, but I am sure the country regrets that there is no evidence in the present government of a desire to perpetuate the policy of their late great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose traditions of stable government have been forgotten, or exchanged for the good-will of the Progressive party in order that the government may continue to enjoy administrative power.

The hon. member for Brandon, (Mr. Forke), who was at one time hailed as a farmer leader, according to a press report, stated in Toronto that he had been termed a Liberal, but that he was not, that he was only a Liberal in action, or an "advanced Liberal". If he is correctly reported, he no doubt was talking true to form by classifying himself as nearly to the Liberal party as words could classify him, and the only evidence of any greater similarity would be his votes and utterances in parliament. His words, Mr. Speaker, were surely carefully selected, because it seems rather unique that in order apparently to secure the support of himself and his party the government might well be classified as "advanced Liberals," they having never hesitated to break any advanced promises they have made in order to allow the hon. member for Brandon and his friends to be "Liberals in action." For some time I have been much interested in the hon. leader of the Progressive party. He follows the same vocation as I do, and he was at one time supposed to represent that particular class of our people in parliament. But the large and expansive agricultural area that has constituted his environment no doubt tended to broaden his views. Therefore it is not any wonder to-day that the people of Canada can scarcely perceive whether the one time Farmer party has broadened from its earlier class consciousness and absorbed the Liberal party, or whether the Liberal party has broadened from its identity with great traditions and absorbed the Progressive party, or whether both parties, as David said of his enemies, "have covered themselves with their own confusion." Perhaps so far as the interests of Canada are concerned that matters not; but one thing they have done—they have covered industry and labour with a confusion of dissatisfaction, uncertainty and lack of confidence that will reflect on many lines of enterprise and possible development in this country.

Is it not time, therefore, that we had some stability in our fiscal policy in the interests of commercial, industrial and agricultural advancement in this favoured land of great resources and possibilities? Is it not also time that we had some stability in government policy to restore confidence in a great and energetic people who await Canadian opportunities for a high standard of living in preference to the hope of employment in a foreign country?

Mr. W. R. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, as this is the first occasion of my addressing this House I crave your indulgence while I make a few observations on the budget. Before doing so I wish to draw attention to a few remarks made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Stinson) with reference to the milling of wheat in Canada. He quoted a recommendation in the report of the grain inquiry commission, which was appointed to investigate the grain trade from A to Z, that an embargo of 42 cents per bushel be placed on wheat going to the United States. I have a memorandum here which shows that the average price of Canadian flour on the Liverpool market for the month of March was 38⅝ cents per sack lower than the price for the same quality of Canadian flour in Winnipeg. If we add the 42 cents duty, or the embargo, to that 38⅝ cents, we would be paying 80⅝ cents more for our sack of flour in western Canada than the Liverpool consumer would have to pay.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), who has just sat down, has told us how the farm implement business has gone to pieces in the last few years, particularly since the election of 1921. I am sorry I have not the exact figures before me, but they have been placed on Hansard, and if my memory serves me correctly they show that there are considerably more than one thousand more men employed in that industry now than four years ago.

He also made reference to the textile industry, and argued for protection for that industry. It is amply protected now, I think, to enable it to stand on its own feet. I would just like to remark here, dealing with it more fully a little later on, that any business that is running efficiently must of necessity manufacture as cheaply as possible. It must get its raw material as cheaply as possible, and must cut out all waste and all non-essentials if it is to compete in the world's markets with other industries of the same character. We are producing what we can produce in Canada more cheaply than other countries. We are doing it sometimes under a handicap of weather, sometimes under a handicap of other conditions, but always under the handicap of protective tariffs. While we export many millions of dollars' worth of the products of this country, we have to import a similar amount of other articles that we do not produce, or cannot produce as cheaply, in Canada, and if you inquire into the textile industry in detail you will find that that is the reason why the textile industry in this country is suffering to some extent, and especially does that apply to the cotton industries.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe was very solicitous for the welfare of the Progressive party. I do not wish to take up his remarks in a critical spirit, but if he continues to speak in the same tone of the Progressive party I should just like to suggest that he may find himself in a year or two in the position described by these lines:

> Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
> As to be hated needs but to be seen;
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

In another year or two we shall possibly see him embracing the principles of the Progressive party.

I should like to speak for a moment of the beneficial effect the principle involved in this budget will have upon business in general throughout Canada. It is very pleasant, I am sure, to the entire population of this fair Dominion to know that we have at last come to the point where we can meet our expenditure from current revenue, and have a tidy sum left over to our credit. Some few years ago in western Canada, and I have the privilege of representing a western constituency, we almost despaired that that time would ever come, but here we are. We have reduced our national debt, not by a large amount it is true, but still very appreciably considering the years through which we have come. It is also very gratifying to know that the Canadian National Railway is almost at a point now where it will no longer be a drain upon the Dominion treasury. We are sure that the managing general, so to speak, of that great railroad, will soon bring it to the point where it will be paying back large sums every year of the money that has been advanced.

I think all will agree with me that the great basic industry of Canada is agriculture. I do not need to argue that point, or to bring any proofs, because it is generally admitted. We have been told for a number of years at election time, we have been told on the floor of this House, and we have been told through the press of this country, that agriculture is our great basic industry, the foundation of all other industries. The reports of all the Canadian banks in the past year bear out my contention. Agriculture is our great basic industry; it produces an enormous amount of wealth, and because of the new wealth it brings into the country it has a beneficial effect on all other industries in Canada that cannot be gainsaid. The agricultural production of this country has contributed to the exports of Canada to the extent of 82 per cent, and an industry contributing such a large percentage to the wealth of Canada surely deserves consideration. But agriculture has been in distress for some time. I am sure that when I have finished my remarks hon. gentlemen will see that it is necessary to relieve this industry from that distress, in order that other industries may enjoy what they would like to enjoy through protection.

Through protection the whole cost of living is gradually raised to a higher level. The man in the factory has to pay more for his clothes, for his furniture, for everything that he consumes. Therefore, he has to get more wages. That increase in wages has to be added to the cost of the article that he produces, and so the merry circle goes, until we have built up a cost of production in Canada that will not enable us to compete with other countries in the world's markets. There is another thing that has added very materially to this cost of production of which I shall speak a little later, but I wish to say here that the principle involved in this budget, namely, that of lowering the duties, is a step in the right direction which will gradually lower the cost of production so that we can successfully compete with other countries in the world's markets.

I would suggest that in the next budget submitted to this parliament there be a reduction in the duties on the necessities of life. That would be of advantage to everyone throughout Canada, and would tend to lower the cost of production of which I have just spoken. We have heard a good deal about the loss of population in Canada, about our young men and young women crossing the international boundary line to get work. The situation seems to me to resolve itself into a fight, as it were; a competition between the industrial part and the agricultural part of Canada, or between other industries and the great basic industry of agriculture. A certain pressure has been exerted against this great basic industry that it has not been able to stand, and it has been crumbling. Coming from western Canada I know whereof I speak. Many a farmer in consequence of this pressure has gone to the wall and has crossed to the United States, and in some cases has been assisted to go there. In other instances the farmer has saved enough out of the wreck to enable him to go to the United States without assistance in order to get work. This has been the result of the crumbling process I speak of which has been in operation for a number of years and was largely brought about by the war. Of course other industries have felt the effect, because the farmers could not produce from the soil the amount of wealth they had been producing, and could not give the factories of this country the orders they needed so much.

We have embarked upon an immigration policy with the idea of building up Canada and of filling up its vast spaces. With that policy I agree. But when we get immigrants it is necessary to supply them with work. It is not coal miners for Nova Scotia or the western provinces that we need, or artisans. We require the class of immigrants that will go on the land and produce. There is plenty of land available in western Canada and plenty of work for immigrants of the right class, and there are still many farms in eastern Canada that should attract agriculturists from other lands. So there ought to be no difficulty in these newcomers making good homes for themselves. or in making a success of agriculture provided this basic industry is placed on a fifty-fifty basis with other industries in Canada. After we have secured these immigrants, and they have started to work, then we must secure markets for their products. The securing of markets is important, probably more important than securing the immigrants, because if there are not markets for the products of these people they will not stay long with us. What is more, we need profitable markets. I will leave this part of my subject for the moment, and return to the question of markets a little later on.

The industrial depression in Canada, of which we have heard so much during the present session, has been due greatly, I think, to the depreciation in the value of the agriculturist's dollar. We worked hard to produce wealth, and at the end of the year when we balanced our accounts we found we were no better off. We kept at it for a number of years, and then began to inquire what was the matter. We commenced to look around. We found that the bed on which we slept enjoyed a protective duty of thirty per cent. All our clothing and all our furniture were protected to the extent of thirty-five per cent. Our agricultural machinery has a protection of from seven and a half per cent to seventeen and a half per cent according to the character of the implement. Our harness, in fact everything that we use on the farm, is protected. We apply our brains and our brawn to the cultivation of the soil and we produce beef, pork, grain, and other commodities which we have to sell on the world's markets. With the duties as they are we realize that we are greatly handicapped, and if the Progressive party stands for anything it stands for a gradual lowering of the protection of which I have spoken, so that those engaged in the great basic industry of agriculture can compete successfully in the markets of the world. If we were placed in a position to do this, such a flood of orders would pour from the farming sections of Canada into the manufacturing centres as would cause the manufacturers to forget all about a protective tariff; they would not need it then. But we are starting at the wrong end. We are building up the structure before we have constructed the foundations.

There is another thing that has entered very materially into the cost of production in Canada. I am not offering this as any argument for my remarks to-night, but I make reference to it because I think something could be done in this direction. I refer to the costs of distribution in Canada. I have before me a little memorandum containing the price of a few articles sold in the west as compared with the manufacturer's price for the same articles in eastern Canada. For one of these articles the price charged in western Canada is from

$2.75 to $2.85, whereas the manufacturer's price is $1.38, a difference of $1.47. In the case of a second article, which is used in all Canadian homes, the cost to the manufacturer is a little less than $55, whereas the retail price to us is over $110. I make these references because I think they will have some effect on my argument as to what we are doing to help ourselves in western Canada. We studied the tariff, we studied the cost of distributing goods from the manufacturing centres of Canada, and also what it cost to distribute farm products, and it led us up to the point where we formed an organization that is known probably all over Canada and in a good many parts of the world—I refer to the wheat pool. We found from our study of the situation as it existed in the marketing of wheat and other grains that there was a great discrepancy between the price which we received and the price which the consumer paid. So we thought out the plan of forming this wheat pool and getting our products on the world's markets at the lowest possible cost. As a result of this I can say that outside of the physical handling charges it has cost us less than a cent a bushel, we market our wheat at a saving, in some instances on the lower grades of wheat all the way from a few cents to a sum as high as thirty-one cents a bushel and possibly higher. I wish to point out that we are doing all we can by this means to increase the value of our dollar, so to speak. We are enhancing the net return to ourselves in the manner indicated. The two articles to which I refer are produced in eastern Canada—

Mr. EVANS: Name them.

Mr. FANSHER: I do not wish to name them. I can give the names of the articles and the prices privately to any hon. member who wishes that information, but I do not desire to make a public statement because that would not be fair to the parties concerned. I would point out that we farmers of western Canada have gone a long way to make the purchasing power of our dollar one hundred per cent, and I will throw out the challenge to the industrial magnates, as I may call them of the manufacturing centres of Canada, that they do something from their end of the business and give us the products of their factories at the least possible cost of distribution. Perhaps it is not a fair thing to put up to them, because they manufacture so many different things, of such different natures, that they would not be able to do as we have done with wheat. If that is the case, if it is not possible for them to do so—as some of them have suggested to me—then it is up to us to go further and organize our purchasing power.

I stated a few moments ago that when we got immigrants of the class who could go on the farm and they began to produce, we would need markets for the products of their labour, and I want to quote a few figures showing that outside of the United States Great Britain is our best market for our products. There is a great difference between the amount of goods we import from and the amount we export to Great Britain. The figures will be shown by the following table:

Year	Imports	Exports
1924..	153,586,690	360,057,782
1925..	151,083,946	395,483,433

I quote these figures to show that we are importing from Great Britain less than half the amount we export to that market, and I want to draw some conclusions from this fact. I wish to give two illustrations which occurred in very recent history, well within the memory of any young man who is within my hearing. Hon. members will remember some few years ago that Great Britain was short of rubber. The United States had a corner on rubber, and as a result of that condition British rubber manufacturers were somewhat handicapped. It was not, however, as large an industry then as it is now. They proceeded, therefore, to evolve a plan whereby they could supply themselves with rubber. I do not need to relate all that took place in this connection, because the facts are well known. But I want to make a reference to one other article, to show the efficiency of British capital in dealing with a situation of this kind and to indicate the manner in which an application of the same principle may be made to our wheat market.

For a time this rubber question caused the British industry some concern. But hon. members know what has happened in this connection in recent years. British financiers proceeded to plant rubber in every section of the empire in which it could be grown, and the result is that to-day seventy per cent of the entire rubber production of the world is controlled by British finance. In fact they so efficiently control it that prominent citizens of the United States have stated that England is paying off her war debt to that country out of the bounties on rubber. So much for the efficiency of the British financiers in regard to the rubber question. The same thing happened in respect to cotton. The United States at one time produced the greater portion of the world's supply of cotton, and the consequence was that Great Britain found herself short of a sufficient supply to keep her mills running. In order to take care of this condition the British government proceeded to build great dams across the river Nile for the purpose of providing irrigation for the waste deserts of Egypt, which, it was proved, could produce the best cotton in the world, so that in a few years they will be able to supply themselves with their own raw material.

Hon. members may ask, what has this to do with the question before the House at the moment? Well, this is what it has to do with it. When Ramsay MacDonald was in power in Great Britain he sent a commission over to Russia to investigate trade conditions there, and investigations and negotiations have been going on to some extent ever since. To-day the Prime Minister of Great Britain has two delegates in Russia inquiring into conditions with a view to the supplying of British goods to the Russian peasant in exchange for the wheat which he produces. The expert economic adviser of the Prime Minister of Great Britain is now at the head of the commission consolidating the co-operatives there, so that they will be able to carry out this proposition. I may be asked, what has that to do with Canada? Well it has this to do with Canada; if Russia supplies Great Britain with wheat and Great Britain supplies Russia with manufactured goods, what are we going to do with our wheat? Great Britain has been taking and will continue to take our wheat until such time as Russia can produce enough to supply the British market. Britain has been taking enormous quantities of wheat and flour from Canada—not all directly from Canada, because a considerable quantity of Canadian wheat is ground in the United States and shipped from there to the British market; yet it is the Canadian product, produced on Canadian farms.

The figures which I have quoted as to the exports and imports between Great Britain and Canada show that our imports from Great Britain are so small compared with our exports to them that British financiers are getting tired of the position in which we stand, taking from them, as we do, less than half the value of our exports to them. They will probably do just as they did in the rubber and cotton industries; they will turn their attention to Russia, and they will secure from that country the wheat which they so much need for their home consumption. What is the use of bringing immigrants to this country and putting them on the land to produce, if we do not look well to the holding of that market for our products in the future? I think we should make every effort possible to take more goods from Great Britain so that she will be in a better position to take the products of our farms.

Some hon. members have argued in this House that we do not need to take imports for exports. But let me point out that if I produce wheat or other agricultural products, they are the product of my labour. Some hon. members say that when that product goes over to Great Britain it can be paid for in gold. That is all very well, but that wheat or other agricultural product is of no value until it is consumed, and who consume it? Industrial workers consume it. And how do they pay for it? They pay for it with the product of the labour of their hands, the same as I pay with the product of the labour of my hands for the things I buy. They have to produce goods to pay for what I produce and export to them, and if I cease to take their goods they will cease to take mine.

I think I have shown in a few brief remarks that we must do something pretty soon in regard to our British market or we may lose a large portion of it to the Russian people. The trade commissioner from Russia to the United States was at St. Paul when that general conference of representatives of different countries in regard to marketing the products of the farm, or what we might call the great pool conference was held there. He made the statement that they would have 200,000,000 bushels of wheat for export next year and that before 1930 they would have reached their pre-war standard of 500,000,000 bushels of wheat. This is something that we should not treat lightly; we should do all in our power to retain the British market so that we may have at least a reasonable chance of exporting our surplus farm products. True it is that we are developing markets in other parts of the world. Some of our wheat is going to Japan and China, some to South America, and possibly in the not distant future the United States will be compelled to come to Canada for some of the wheat she needs for her great nation.

In connection with the tariff on automobiles, I wish to deal with the question of trucks. I think it was in 1917, when the greater production campaign was on, that farm tractors under $1,400 in value were admitted into Canada free. I think trucks of a large tonnage should be admitted into Canada free. In Canada we have no manufacturers of this style of truck and I will explain why I think these trucks should be admitted into Canada free. We have in western Canada a vast railway system, in fact two systems, but they do not cover the entire country. There are on each side of our railway lines tremendous stretches of land that are non-productive because it is almost impossible to farm in that land and draw the product to market at a greater distance than fifteen miles from a railway. Some are drawing their grain twenty miles and some further, but that is not profitable. My contention is that trucks of a five-ton capacity could bring in the products of farms thirty miles away to those lines of railway as profitably as a farmer can now draw his grain with horses fifteen miles. This would widen the territory of production on those branch lines; it would practically double the quantity of traffic those roads would have to haul. That, I think, would be a very simple solution of part of our railway problem. This idea has not been advanced in the House before to my knowledge, but it is one that came to my mind several months ago.

The United States has often been referred to as being a very rich country and its high tariff has been advanced as the reason for that. That is a matter of opinion. The United States comprises the largest population and the greatest area of free trade country in the world, and that fact has contributed very largely to its success. In other words, it has become very rich and well established as a nation probably above all others because of its unique position in having such a large stretch of country within which free trade exists.

But another thing that has not been mentioned before that has been one of the greatest factors in the advancement of the United States in the last few years is their improved banking system. I have no quarrel with the Canadian banks as they now exist. They manufacture money, I was going to say, and turn it out to us for use, but I believe it is principally for the good of the banks. In comparing the two systems I would say that the banking system of the United States excels that of Canada in that it is useful to the common people; it has given them a chance to buy, to sell, to produce, and the United States have prospered more from that cause in the last eight or nine years than owing to their protective tariff or their unique position in being practically a self-contained country having a tropical climate in the south and also the northern climate of the great wheat belt.

I want to make one more comparison before I take my seat. I have often thought of Canada as a young giant. We know that the young men and young women of these days have rather insatiable appetites and they often slake those appetites to their own detriment. A young person to be strong and vigorous must adhere to certain rules governing the appetite, the digestive organs and so on. This young giant of Canada has had its tastes pampered to a very large extent. It has stuffed its stomach, as it were, the central provinces, and it has caused gout in its feet down by the Atlantic and an anaemic condition in the great arms of production in western Canada. The diet on which this young giant has been fed during the past number of years has contributed very largely to that situation and that is the diet of the old National Policy. I would suggest a change in the diet of this young giant so that the lifeblood may pulsate from one coast to the other. I would suggest that the rations of the old National Policy be decreased gradually and that there be substituted for that the new national policy as propounded by the Progressive party. In that way, we would have a strong, vigorous country, well able to take care of itself in the competition that is now becoming so keen with other countries of the world.

[Mr. Fansher.]

Mr. SEGUIN (L'Assomption-Montcalm) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take much of the time of this hon. House, however, I deem it my duty to express the great satisfaction felt by the electors of the beautiful and large county of L'Assomption and Montcalm in regard to the budget speech lately delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). Moreover from one end of the country to the other, since the budget has been brought down, numerous and very clear signs of approbation have come as an endorsation of the stand which the government has taken. The budget speech characterizes well the Liberal policy which lends itself to the needs of the people and knows how to put forth, notwithstanding the protests of interested financial and manufacturing groups, a wise legislation, far-seeing and devised toward protecting the interests of the great majority of the people of the country.

The most striking points in the budget speech are the following: A surplus of $55,000,000; a reduction of $22,353,000 in the public debt; revenues estimated at $376,800,000 for the fiscal year 1925-26; a decrease of taxes estimated at about $25,000,000; a substantial reduction in the income tax affecting particularly the small wage earners and the head of families; the disappearance of the stamp duty on receipts; a cutting down and further exemption in connection with the sales tax; a reduction of the duty on automobiles; conditional drawbacks allowed on material entering into the manufacture of automobiles; penny postage on letters; balance of trade in our favour amounting to more than $402,695,000, the largest since the war is over; British preferential tariff applied to goods transported directly into the country without being reshipped.

This is, I think, one of the most democratic budgets that we have had for a number of years, if indeed such an instance can be found in the fiscal history of our country since Confederation.

The present government through the mouthpiece of their Minister of Finance, have clearly and precisely defined the policy which they intend to follow, in order to lighten as much as possible the people's burden while providing sufficient revenues to balance the budget and meet the national indebtedness. The present government is proceeding strictly on the lines of the Liberal policy which were laid down by the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Always anxious to give full and entire justice to all the provinces and to grant the utmost privileges, in keeping with the exceptional conditions prevailing in our country, the government has striven to give to all groups and to all parties in the country, as well as to all classes, the greatest possible measure of favours.

The government's ultimate aim, so far as the situation created by war allows, has been to unceasingly endeavour to bring down the cost of living by lowering the customs duties wherever it was possible, without endangering the life of the industries which are essential to the economic structure of the country. It has also directed its efforts towards reducing the cost of production in the basic industries, by allowing a freer entry into the country of the raw material essential to these industries. The government has endeavoured to contribute as much as possible to the lowering of the cost of living; and that is why the tariff has been reduced to such an extent on a great number of articles which are not produced in our country, as well as on certain tropical fruit, also on ginger, spices, cane sugar and sponges; this will enable the Canadian people to effect a saving of many thousands of dollars yearly in the home.

Mr. Speaker, the marked reduction in the tariff on automobiles valued at $1,200 or less is a further proof that the government is endeavouring to unburden the people. The automobile industry, in Canada, if we are to believe the statistics which have been published of late by most of the financial newspapers, has realized substantial profits. It was but right, therefore, to reduce the tariff on automobiles so as to bring down the price for the Canadian consumer. To-day, the automobile has become an entirely indispensable accessory in the commercial and social life of the people, and the farming class itself is, perhaps, the one which will benefit the most from the reduction in the tariff.

The lowering of the tariff on tin which is not produced in our country will allow the manufacture of tin cans at a lower cost and be a factor in reducing the cost of living. This is a further proof of the Liberal government's earnest desire for the welfare of the people and its endeavour to lift the burdens which the war has accumulated upon their shoulders.

The doing away with the receipt tax, the reduction in the income tax, and the sales tax in certain cases, are so many measures which the public highly welcome. An effort was made in certain quarters to rouse the workmen of automobile factories. The untimely announcement of the closing of the works of the General Motors, at Oshawa, did certainly create a sensation; however, the reconsidering of this decision taken with the sole aim of embarrassing the government has produced the opposite effect and has shown up the bad faith of the protectionists. We must not forget that the automobile industry in our country is made up, in general, only of American branch establishments which control the market without any other competition than that which may exist between them. We must neither forget that most of these branches were established in this country in order to take advantage of the British preferential tariff and allow them to reap greater profits on their exports.

One will recall that last year, when the reduction in duties on farming implements took place, the same protests were registered, the same warnings of disaster were given by these Tory prophets. Yet the manufacturers of farming implements continued to prosper and some of them even increased their profits notwithstanding this reduction in the tariff.

Last year, like to-day, Sir, we were given to understand that the industries so affected would close their doors, that a large number of workmen would be thrown on the street, that the trekking of our people across the borders would increase in a more alarming proportion. What was the outcome of these warnings of disaster?

The manufacturers of automobiles have realized millions in profits, thanks to the high protective and preferential tariffs. Is it fair that these manufacturers, for the most part Americans should continue to amass wealth in such a scandalous way at the expense of the Canadian people? Is it fair that the difference between the sales price in the United States and in Canada exists simply because of the high tariff which has, up to now, allowed Canadian manufacturers to demand exorbitant prices for their cars? The difference in these prices does not only apply to touring cars, but also and especially to tractors and motor trucks. Owing to this high protective tariff, the Canadian farmer found himself at a disadvantage in relation to the American farmer. The same could be said for the manufacturer, the contractor and the trades people who made use of motor trucks in their business.

The reduction, Sir, in the income tax and the changes brought on in its administration also receive the public's sanction. Hence, the government gives further proof of its desire to lighten the people's burden. It is but fair that the business man who draws dividends from his investments, should not be placed on the same footing as the wage earner, who gets a living by the sweat of his brow. In most cases the people with independent means live on their income without being of any benefit to the community, while the wage earner is an asset owing to his work. Was it not but fair to establish a difference between the two in regard to the income tax?

What do you think now of the return to the penny postage? Is it not true to state that this measure is purely a Liberal conception, and that there does not exist one person in the whole Dominion who will not feel its good effects? Might I suggest to the hon. Minister of Finance, in order to commemorate with still more joy Dominion Day, that in making the first issue of these postage stamps they be made bilingual, thus doing justice to the two official languages recognized by the constitution of the country.

Are not all the changes, Sir, announced in the budget speech of a nature to spread joy among all classes of society, as well as being a final answer to the whisper of death? It is, therefore, with confidence that the Canadian people can look forward to the future, now that the Liberal party, with the help of Providence no doubt, has succeeded in bringing prosperity to our country which the evil Borden-Meighen governments seemed to have banished forever. As a whole, the budget seems to meet the public's approval, if we make an exception for those who are directly affected or are blinded by their political passions. Judging from the measures brought down, the Liberal party once more has emphasized the policy it intends to follow, which has been that of its leaders for the last thirty years past. It is the golden mean between high protection and free trade. It is the wisest policy for a country like ours, it is the only policy which acknowledges the rights of the people in every part of our vast country. It is this constructive policy that the people endorsed at the last general elections, it is that policy that the province of Quebec approved by its vote. And it is for the pursuance of this beneficial policy that I shall register my vote in favour of the budget resolutions, as submitted by the hon. Minister of Finance.

I think, Sir, that it will be to the satisfaction of everybody if, at this late hour, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Motherwell, the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Monday, May 3, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Return showing the amount of customs duty collected in each province during the year ending March 31st, from 1921 to 1925 inclusive—Mr. Boivin.

Annual report of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine—Mr. Dunning.

DIVORCE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 94 to amend the Divorce Act (domicile of married women).

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. WARD: The purpose of the bill is to establish equality of domicile as between man and wife. I think, probably, that no further explanation is required at this time. We are all quite familiar with the spirit of legislation of this kind at the present day. This is in keeping with the Women's Franchise Act, other divorce laws, and legislation pertaining to man and wife. The present bill is intended to "round out", so to speak, equality of domicile as between man and wife.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The Attorney General is not here. There may be a Divorce Act but I really did not know we had one.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): I may say that I am familiar with this legislation, and have discussed it with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. It seems to me that if this bill should be given its first reading we could, on the second reading, make such explanation as will enable the House to be seized of the whole circumstances.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question, but seeing that he is not in his seat I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. Some time ago I asked the government to advise the House with regard to the report on the revision of the salaries of the civil service. I have asked that question on numerous occasions, but nothing definite has yet been brought down. I now have a telegram from Mr. C. Gardiner, general secretary of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, dated from Regina and addressed to myself, which reads as follows:

Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada request immediate publication of the Civil Service Commission's report on salary revision and personnel boards. Request also staff side representation on Civil Service Commission when present vacancies are being filled.

I do not know whether the Prime Minister is ready to make a statement to-day, but as to the first part of this telegram, regarding the Civil Service Commission's report on salary revision, I think the House is entitled to a statement pretty soon. That matter has been standing for some considerable time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think my hon. friend is mistaken in saying that this matter has been standing for some time. It has been standing a few days.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite a number.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A committee of council has been considering this report but unfortunately it is difficult to get a complete meeting of the committee just at the moment. I think I can promise my hon. friend that during the present week there will be plenty of opportunity to consider it. I would not like to say that the report itself will be published for some days to come, but the government will make an effort to have it considered forthwith.

Mr. STEVENS: Just a word of explanation. I do not wish to appear as being too unreasonable, but I would direct the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that it was, I think, in March that this question was brought up first.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was in March that the question was brought up, but I think I am right when I say that it was only within the last fortnight that the report itself was made.

FISHERY AND FOREST AIR PATROLS

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): May I be permitted to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether he is aware of the strong objection which has been aroused in British Columbia to the abandonment of the air patrol of the British Columbia salmon fishery areas. I would direct the attention of the minister particularly to a leading article which appears in the Vancouver Morning Star of 27th April, last. The Star, by the way, is a paper which supports the government. I will not attempt to read this article because it is quite lengthy, but I would crave the indulgence of the House while I read the headlines. They are as follows:

Salmon Fisheries in B.C. imperilled by lack of planes

Enforcement boats outstripped by fishing vessels of double speed—Poachers use unchartered waters—Lack of communication, with inexperienced crews on patrol boats, leave great areas at the mercy of violators—Replacement of three planes by seventeen additional seaboats boosts cost from $18,000 to $30,000, while service rendered is not comparable.

I should like to ask whether the minister is considering replacing the air patrol service? I can assure him from my information that that patrol service has been very effective.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Before the minister answers I should like to add my confirmation to what the hon. member for New Westminster has said. The seaplane service was by far the more efficient.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the matter has not come directly to my attention, but I will be only too pleased to investigate it and consider it most favourably.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): More or less in the same connection may I ask the Minister of National Defence if it is a fact that the air station at Jericho, in Vancouver, is being closed, and the cruising of timber in British Columbia also abandoned?

Hon. R. B. BENNETT: Before the hon. gentleman answers, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question in regard to the High River station about which I received a telegram only yesterday. There seems to be very great apprehension on the part of many citizens there that the forest protection service, which has been so efficient in days gone by, is going to be abandoned.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): The whole question of the air service for Canada during the coming season is now under consideration. It is being given careful attention by the department.

AUDIBILITY OF DEBATE

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): We have not heard anything at this end of the chamber of what has been going on; we do not know anything about it. I suppose we shall find by reference to to-morrow's Hansard what has happened.

Mr. BOIVIN: The hon. member has not missed much.

SHIPMENT OF HORSES FROM SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. ROWE:

1. Was an experimental shipment of horses made from the province of Saskatchewan to any other country during the year 1925?
2. Where were the said horses purchased?
3. By what government official were they purchased?
4. What prices were paid for said horses and what were the names of the parties from whom they were purchased?
5. From what point were they shipped?
6. What was the point of destination to where they were shipped?
7. In whose charge was this shipment made?
8. Is the man in whose charge they were placed a neighbor of Honourable Mr. Motherwell?
9. Have all the horses been sold?
10. If not, what has become of the balance of said horses?
11. What is the name of the man who was sent in charge, and his present address?
12. What was the total cost of transportation and all other expenses connected with the said consignment?
13. What was the total amount received from the sales of said horses?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes, an experimental shipment of horses, largely for advertising purposes, was sent to Europe in 1925.

2. In Saskatchewan and Alberta.

3. Mr. Jack Byers and Mr. R. E. Wilson, assisted by the provincial veterinarians of Alberta (Dr. Talbot), and of Saskatchewan (Dr. McLellan).

4. From Mr. D. J. Wylie, Maple Creek, Sask., 36 head at $35 each; from Olaf Olafson of Mortlach, Sask., 7 head at $35 each; from Jas. Jackson of Orion, Alta., 1 at $75, 1 at $70, 1 at $35; from Fred Goodner, Orion, Alta., 1 at $52.50; from H. G. Rogers, Orion, Alta., 1 at $55; from Pete Crabb, Orion, Alta., 2 at $70, 2 at $50, 1 at $40, 1 at $55, 1 at $90, 1 at $75; from Pete Strand, Orion, Alta., 1 at $55; from Harry Peck, Orion, Alta., 2 at $75; from J. P. Biesterfeldt, Manyberries, Alta., 2 at $70; from Lawrence Biesterfeldt, Manyberries, Alta., 2 at $75; from Rex Peacock, Maple Creek, Sask., 1 at $70, 2 at $75, 1 at $65, 1 at $60; from H. H. Fauquier, Maple Creek, Sask., 2 at $55; from Geo. R. Hammond, Maple Creek, Sask., 1 at $45; Jack Redhead, Maple Creek, Sask., 1 at $40; Bridge Hartley, Maple Creek, Sask., 1 at $65, 3 at $70; E. Birchell, Maple Creek, Sask., 1 at $70; Harry Dowkes, Maple Creek, Sask., 1 at $70; J. J. Wilson, Maple Creek, Sask., 1 at $55, 1 at $50, 1 at $30, 1 at $25; Olaf Finneteg, Maple Creek, Sask., 2 at $65.

5. Moose Jaw, Sask.

6. Rotterdam, Holland.—It should be stated, however, that when it was first decided to undertake this experimental shipment of horses, it was intended to land them at Hamburg, Germany. After the ocean space had been booked, however, Germany announced the imposition of a duty on horses of 500 gold marks per head, which, at 24 cents, amounts to $120 per head. It was felt that this duty was prohibitive, but, inasmuch as the horses had been bought, and space contracted for, that the shipment should go forward, but to a different destination, and Rotterdam was, we were advised, probably the next best market. Arrangements were therefore made to ship the horses from Hamburg on arrival, to Rotterdam, Holland.

7. Mr. Jack Byers.

NOTES:

1. The figures given in the replies to questions 12 and 13 are subject to revision, as some of the accounts are still being adjusted.

2. The low prices at which these horses had to be sold and part of the expenses are attributable to several causes, the principal being:—

(a) The putting into effect of the new duty of 500 gold marks on horses entering Germany as at October 1, 1925, the anticipation of which had caused the German market to be overstocked with horses from all sources of supply previous to the date of going into effect of the new duty.

(b) The failure of forage crops in German territory adjacent to the Dutch and Belgian frontiers, with the result that horses in this territory were thrown on the market owing to lack of feed.

(c) The smallness of the shipment made it hardly worth while shipping the horses for marketing to Czecho-Slovakia or Russia where there seems to be the greatest demand.

(d) Shortly after arrival epidemics of ringworm and influenza broke out among horses, and practically closed off all sales, at same time running up expenses. Nevertheless, much advertising was done and Mr. Byers visited various countries getting in touch with governments or horse men, and induced many prospective buyers to visit the stables in Rotterdam with a view of giving them some idea of the type of horse available in Canada. As a result of this advertising, a number of inquiries have come forward from European countries, and one firm in Canada has several contracts under consideration for a large number of horses for delivery this year and next.

MARKING OF ENVELOPES

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Has anybody lodged a complaint in regard to the Post Office Department allowing on envelopes, which are in circulation throughout the country, the following words in both French and English: "Help to stop forest fires"?

2. If not, why does the said Department not take advantage of the new postage stamp issue in order to make them bilingual; thereby putting into practice the official use of the two languages in this country?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING (for Hon. Mr. Lapointe):

1 and 2. Dies bearing the words, in both French and English: "Help prevent forest fires," are in use at Montreal, Quebec and Trois Rivieres. At other points throughout the Dominion the die is in English only. The Post Office Department is not aware that any complaint has been lodged in regard to these arrangements.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED IN 1925

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

For a return of all orders in council passed in the calendar year 1925.

He said: I suggest that the motion pass subject to an arrangement to be made between the Prime Minister and myself. I have gone partially over the list, and will take it up and complete it later.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Dropped.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No; I should like the order to issue subject to an arrangement to be made between ourselves as to what orders in council will be covered by the order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Carried in respect of those.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Friday, April 30, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. GEORGE W. McPHEE (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the debate was adjourned by the hon. member for L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Seguin) and I did not expect to be called upon at this early hour in the afternoon. However, before discussing the matter which is now engaging the attention of the House, namely the budget and the amendment, permit me to offer a few observations with regard to an address delivered in this House last Tuesday evening by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). The manner in which the words were used would leave no doubt in our minds that the hon. gentleman expected a reply. Lest there be some misunderstanding with regard to what the hon. gentleman stated, let me read into my address the record of what was said by the hon. member:

Mr. Edwards (Frontenac): My hon. friends should not say "hear, hear", because if they were at all generous they must have recognized the fact that a large part of my time was taken up in what I believe was a fruitless effort in trying to force some common sense into heads which, so far as we have been able to judge, have shown no sign of possessing that desirable quality. I have not much hope that what I have said, and the instructions I have given, will have any effect, because you have to plant seed in fertile ground if it is to produce anything, and there is no fertility over yonder; there are no brains to furnish the necessary soil to produce results. I can only leave the matter with them, hoping against hope that Providence, which has done so much for the Liberal party, will still exercise its beneficent influence and furnish some of the gentlemen of the kindergarten school with what they so much need, a little common sense and ordinary brain power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the word kindergarten naturally associates itself with infancy and youth, and as I listened here with some patience, and I must admit with some degree of irritation, my mind went back to my college days, and I remember committing to memory the reply of William Pitt to Walpole, and the words so aptly suit the present occasion that I may be permitted to repeat them. The reply was:

The atrocious crime of being a young man, which the hon. gentleman has with such spirit and decency charged upon me, I shall neither attempt to palliate nor deny, but content myself with wishing that I may be one of those whose follies may cease with their youth, and not of that number who are ignorant in spite of experience.

Whether youth can be imputed to any man as a reproach, I will not assume the province of determining: But surely age may become justly contemptible, if the opportunities which it brings have passed away without improvement, and vice appears to prevail when the passions have subsided. The wretch that, after having seen the consequences of a thousand errors, continues still to blunder, and whose age has only added obstinacy to stupidity, is surely the object of either abhorrence or contempt, and deserves not that his grey head should secure him from insults.

Much more is he to be abhorred, who, as he has advanced in age, has receded from virtue, and becomes more wicked with less temptation; who prostitutes himself for money which he cannot enjoy, and spends the remains of his life in the ruin of his country.

The late Joseph Howe, the great Nova Scotian statesman and orator in his fight against the old, entrenched, aristocratic family compact of his day had to put up with taunts similar to those which we have been subjected to and in replying to an hon. gentleman this is what he said on one occasion:

The hon. gentleman appears to have leaned over the Castalian spring.

The spring in fable that served a double purpose for the shepherds; they could mirror their faces in the water and also drink the water. Howe continued:

And the hon. gentleman appears to have leaned over the Castalian spring not to slake his thirst or arrange his robe to set off the harmonies of nature, but to fall in love with his own image and die with admiration of himself.

The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington is a Tory in the true sense of the word. He believes absolutely in the principle of protection, political and otherwise. Hon. gentlemen remember the other evening when he was hurling his insults across the floor of the House at us, one of our members asked you, Mr. Speaker, to intercede and prevent him from continuing in that strain. What was his reply? It was: "I want you, Sir, to protect me." Protect him for what? To protect him, to close our mouths, so that in a protected field he might hurl across the floor of this House at us the putrid broth of his distorted imagination.

Now let us proceed with the matters under discussion.

Mr. HOCKEN: Having got that off our chest.

Mr. McPHEE: We will get a little more off before we are through. Since the House opened on 7th January, there have been several inconsistencies on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite.

An hon. MEMBER: More quotations.

Mr. McPHEE: You will get more quotations too, that is if my hon. friend will understand them. There have been several inconsistencies since the 7th January. In the first place you remember that in the debate that featured the early portion of the session, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), who is the chief financial critic of the opposition, in addressing this House, made this dramatic pronouncement:

I submit that no member of this House should look beyond the question in the resolution; but if we are tempted to go beyond it, if we are tempted to consider ulterior results, then let me say this in the presence of my leader and with his authority, that if this motion carries, if this government resigns, and if he is called upon to form a govenment in this House, he will undertake the task. He will undertake to carry on that government from session to session without dissolution.

That was the statement made by the hon. member for South Wellington at the time he was asking the support of our good Progressive friends to turn the government out of office. But what did he do a month afterwards? We find the same hon. gentleman making this pronouncement:

I ask the Progressives whether they will join us and send the whole question back to the people for a solution at a general election.

And when I heard the hon. gentleman make that statement I said to myself, "Consistency thou art a jewel." The amendment which is now before the House is another of these inconsistencies. We all remember that on January 18, of this year, in speaking on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne and in discussing the question of a tariff advisory board the right hon. leader of the opposition made the following remarks:

Whatever may be said for a tariff commission, there is need—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. McPHEE:

—of no tariff commission to inform this House, or to inform any fair-minded man or woman, that agriculture to-day, in respect of the tariff, labours under a disability, and a disability which it is the duty of this House at once to remove.

If that principle is true with regard to the disability which my hon. friend pictured in his mind that agriculture suffered under, why is it not true with regard to the automobile industry? In this House a whole afternoon and an evening were spent in discussing the question of the reduction in duty on automobiles, and the figures quoted are sufficient to prove to any reasonably-minded man that this House, according to the dictum of my hon. friend in regard to the duties on agriculture, should at once have taken the step and reduced the duties on automobiles instead of waiting for a tariff commission.

The figures quoted by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) when the resolution with regard to reducing the duties on automobiles was before the House, showed with respect to the profits made by one manufacturing concern in this country that an enormous toll was paid by our people to one protected industry. On an original investment of $62,500, without any addition of capital, this company in twenty years paid to its stockholders in dividends $12,851,238. But this is not all. The statement which they have given to the public shows that they have invested in their business $31,275,530 and not one cent of additional capital except what the company earned was put in. Therefore, instead of the profits being $12,851,238, the total profit made amounts to $44,126,768 on an original investment of $62,500. I am not one who would criticise any industry on any profit it can legitimately make; but when an organization of this kind in supplying a commodity so largely used as the cheaper priced car is protected by a protective tariff of 35 per cent and is thus enabled to bleed users and purchasers of these cars to such an extent as to make the profits which this company made, I rise in protest against that tariff being continued.

Supposing there was no duty on automobiles coming into Canada, what would be the cost to us? The Ford coupe in Detroit costs $500. If you add $12 for excise tax that makes a total of $512. The Canadian sales and excise tax would then add 10 per cent to the value, or $51.20, bringing the total cost up to $563.20. The Canadian selling price before the reduction in duties was $714.88 according to the booklet distributed by the Ford Motor Company among members of this House. That is, before the duty was reduced we were paying $151.68 extra price on the same car. That amount of $151.68 left in the pockets of every owner of a Ford car in Canada would be a nice contribution to the prosperity of this country as it would result in an increased purchasing power amongst a widespread number of people from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Those opposed to the reduction in the duty on automobiles point to the pay-roll and they make the bold statement that if the duty is reduced these companies will go out of business. Will they? The same argument was used twenty years ago in 1897 when the Fielding tariff was brought in placing 160 articles, including binder twine, barbed wire and cream separators, on the free list. Have these companies gone out of business? Statistics to-day show that these companies have increased and their business has increased during those twenty years. I think it is a safe statement to make that the cheaper you make a commodity the more extensively it will be purchased. A demonstration of this principle is to be found in the history of the Post Office Department. Hon. members will remember that in 1897 when the then Postmaster General reduced the rate of postage from three cents to two cents there were those in this country who said that our revenues would be crippled. But the result was that previous annual deficits of three-quarters of a million were at once turned into surpluses. Five years afterwards, in 1902, the Post Office Department had the first surplus of more than $5,000 over its operating expenses, and these surpluses went on increasing until, when the Liberal government went out of power in 1911, the annual surplus was upwards of $1,000,000.

The same principle holds true in regard to all the great business enterprises in the world. Henry Ford realized that himself in the great industry which he established. He was, of course, a pioneer in his line; he believed in the principle that lower prices would increase production, and as production increased, Ford's prices were reduced. The latest statistics we have show that in 1924 we had 653,121 cars in operation in Canada. The proposed reduction on motor cars if applied to that number would mean a vast saving to the people, a saving that would materially increase their purchasing power, and that increased purchasing power would add much to the general prosperity which is now in evidence from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Did the hon. gentleman say that the production of Ford cars in Canada was 600,000 in 1924?

Mr. McPHEE: I made no such statement. I said that statistics showed that 653,121 cars were in operation and the reduction proposed if applied to that number of cars would mean a great saving to our people.

That brings us down to the question of protection and I am sure my hon. friends across the way will relish the next morsel which I propose to give them. A year or so ago the Canadian Manufacturers' Association circularized the manufacturers of the Maritime provinces with regard to the question of tariff duties and I wish to quote the reply which they received from Mr. Angus McLean of Bathurst, New Brunswick. We notice that our friends the Canadian Manufacturers' Association did not spread this letter very freely throughout the country. He was circularized with others to find out his opinion with regard to this matter of tariff protection and this is a portion of Mr. McLean's letter:

"The principal difficulty we have to face," said Mr. McLean, "is the high cost of protection, brought about by too much tariff protection on Canadian-made goods."

Mr. McLean by the way is one of the largest lumber and pulp men in the Maritime provinces.

We find that almost invariably the Canadian manufacturers charge the Canadian consumer the foreign price plus the protection they enjoy under the tariff. Until the Canadian manufacturer is brought to realize that this is taxing the consumer in the most unfair way and changes his ways we are going to have to struggle and work hard to carry on business in the Maritime provinces. Our chief products are from the farms, forests, mines and seas and we must find a market for those products outside Canada. What we must have to become prosperous is an opportunity to buy our requirements cheaper than we can under a protective tariff; and, next, we need broader markets for the things we produce.

Commenting on this letter the Manitoba Free Press had this to say:

What the busy and devoted secretary of the Manufacturers thought of this communication can be left to the imagination; doubtless he rent his clothes and put ashes on his head. Mr. McLean is, it may be accepted, regarded as an economic heretic, a lost soul.

What did the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) himself say with regard to this matter of high tariff and protection a few years ago in this House? Turning back to Hansard of 1920 at page 2708 we find that he is reported as having used these words:

We never can have a high tariff in Canada. We cannot have a high tariff in Canada for the most obvious reasons. In the first place, a high tariff is unsound in principle in that it tends to eliminate one of the factors of competition, namely, foreign goods.

And further on:

So I say we cannot have any immediate or high tariff for the reason, first, that it tends to exclude that healthy element of fair conditions, namely, foreign competition; secondly, we have in Canada a territory of wide extent. We have one portion of Canada, newer than the other portion, a more predominatingly agricultural country, newer to manufactures and industrial development, and consequently the advantages of the tariff do not accrue to them as yet as they ultimately will accrue to them. They come more immediately to one portion of this country than to another. On account of these two reasons we must always have in this country nothing more than a moderate tariff under any conditions whatsoever.

In view of that pronouncement of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) six years ago in this House, on what ground does he advocate to-day a tariff wall in this country brick for brick with that of the United States, the most highly protected country in the world? A few days ago the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith) made the statement that the industries of Canada were going down, and he instanced some in his own province which had gone out of business entirely. He left the inference that the people engaged in the textile industry in the Maritime provinces had emigrated to the United States and that the United States so far as textiles were concerned was in a flourishing condition. Now I have here an article which appeared in a western newspaper a few weeks ago and which analyses the textile industry in the United States so convincingly that I cannot do better than place a portion of it on Hansard. It is headed "Textiles under High Tariff." Within quotation marks there appears the following slogan:

What are we striving for? More bread and butter, more bread and butter.

The editorial then goes on:

This is the chant of the striking textile workers in New Jersey. All day long the refrain comes from the throats of pickets. Imagine such a condition of affairs in one of the highest protected industries in the United States! How could there be a strike? Do not our Conservative friends tell us that a high tariff wall insures plenty of employment and big wages? We heard a good deal of that gospel during the federal election campaign last year. Nothing could save the textile business of Canada unless this country imitated our neighbour and increased the duty on the imported article. The fact of the matter is the textile workers in the United States are not on full time and have had their wages reduced because the selling price of the commodities they produce is too high for the consumer to pay. There is no other explanation.

Tariff protection for any business is a sort of legal permission for the manufacturer of articles so protected to add the amount of the import duty to his own catalogue figures and put the additional profit into his own pocket. The worker may get a little of it for a time. But as soon as the limit of the consuming public's purchasing power has been reached the demand drops. So there is no benefit at all to the worker and the slump hits the producer fairly quickly. This has happened across the border. Protection is running true to form—it is not protecting.

What about Canada's textiles under a low tariff? Take the case of Penman's, Limited, of Montreal and Paris, Ontario, on the strength of the firm's annual statement just issued. This concern operates a string of factories in Ontario and Quebec and the year which has just closed is described as one of the most satisfactory years in its history. It is a well managed and conservatively financied company, and, as a matter of fact, a similar state of affairs in industries which are complaining of conditions, as a contemporary points out, "might be productive of a rather different tone to that from which so much political capital is being made."

In the year reviewed by the statement referred to the Penman company has increased its sales by over a million dollars, increased its operating profits by nearly $50,000, and, after laying aside a substantial sum for depreciation and bad debts, has added $100,000 to its net assets. On top of all it has paid its regular dividends and a bonus of two per cent to its common shareholders.

A similarly satisfactory year has been experienced by the Belding-Corticelli company. Both gross and net earnings showed considerable improvement over the previous year. Earnings applicable to the common stock amounted to 20.6 per cent and compare with 9.3 per cent earned in 1924. The statement likewise shows an increase in the working capital which now stands at well over $1,000,000; the amount standing at good will account has been reduced from $700,000 to $500,000. And total profits for the year amounted to $345,853 as compared with $254,771 in 1924.

There are other equally convincing proofs that Canadian business continues on the up grade. The country refuses to lie down and die because Mr. Meighen warned it that it would if it did not elect a Conservative government. Every month reveals new progress. And our high tariff advocates have a good deal of explaining to do in connection with the country's textile industry in view of what is happening in New Jersey.

The Conservative party in Canada in trying to bolster up a protective tariff for the benefit of the manufacturers endeavour to make the farmer believe that protection will operate to his advantage as well. Will it? We exported from Canada for the year ending February last, according to the figures I got from the Statistical Bureau, 6,803,437 bushels of potatoes. Will any sane man argue that by putting a protective tariff on potatoes coming into this country we can add one single cent to the return which Canadian farmers receive from their exportable surplus of potatoes? The hon. member for West Essex (Mr. Gott), in a speech in the House some time ago, said that we imported $451,999 worth of potatoes. Suppose we did: these potatoes were consumed by people along the border and they were brought into Canada at a time between crops when we had no potatoes in this country. But, I repeat, will any sane man contend that the imposition of a high duty on potatoes coming into Canada will serve to increase the price received by Canadian farmers for the 6,803,437 bushels which they exported?

Take wheat. We exported last year, during the same period I have mentioned, 239,295,927 bushels of wheat. The same principle applies in this case: why should we place an increased duty on wheat coming into Canada when we export that enormous quantity ourselves and when our price for wheat is controlled by the conditions prevailing in the world's market?

The same thing is true again of butter. We exported last year 25,598,527 pounds of this commodity; we exported 1,486,118 hundredweight of cheese, and 2,495,063 dozen eggs. Canada, therefore, is a large exporting country, and in face of that fact we are asked to submit to a protective tariff which ostensibly will be of no benefit to our farmers who are exporting on this scale.

What has protection done for the farmers in the United States? Some hon. gentlemen opposite argued the other day that the American farmers had prospered under high protection. Well, let me quote an article which appeared in one of our newspapers recently under this heading:

The United States farmers revolt against protection.

The article reads:

That the farmers of the American west are now in revolt against the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act is not hard to understand.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): What paper is that?

Mr. McPHEE: The Manitoba Free Press.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Oh.

Mr. McPHEE: I presume if I quoted from the Mail and Empire or the Telegram or the Orange Sentinel my hon. friend would say Amen. However, to proceed:

By tradition low tariff men, they became, in 1920, protectionists overnight. They were told, and apparently believed, that high tariff duties on agricultural products would bring them boundless prosperity. Now, after five years of experience, they find agriculture almost on the verge of collapse.

The farmers in the corn belt have an enormous surplus of corn and are many of them in real distress. Of what avail to them is the tariff duty on corn? No corn is likely to be imported into the United States in the course of a century because domestic production far exceeds domestic consumption. A considerable portion of the corn crop is exported either as corn or meat, and the domestic price seldom rises above the export level.

And what is true of the corn grower is true of the cotton planter and the great bulk of farmers in the United States. They are less concerned about the theory of protection than they are about their present condition. High tariff duties were to make them rich, and after five years of experience they find themselves poor.

The big farm organizations are unanimous in saying that whatever benefit may be conferred upon the farmer by high tariff duties on agricultural products is taken away from him threefold by the higher prices which he has to pay for everything he buys, from aluminum to zinc. They blame this, not so much upon the tariff duties themselves, as upon the monopolies which have grown up under protection. It is a revival of the Iowa idea which led to a wholesale revolt of the farmers against the Payne-Aldrich tariff law some 15 years ago. This present day revolt of the American farmer against the tariff is not to be under-rated. It is not under-rated by men like Senator Capper, of Kansas, a lifelong protectionist, who voted for the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act. He warns the manufacturers of New England that the whole protective system may be swept away by a western tornado unless the east consents to an immediate downward revision of the tariff.

So much for tariff protection to the farmers of the United States. I hope this information will not be lost upon those in this country who would like to inflict similar disabilities upon our agriculturists.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some time ago I gave certain figures in regard to the loss sustained by the Winnipeg Hydro-electric system in relation to their plant, and I wish to place on record the editorial that I then had reference to, because my remarks were questioned by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Stinson), and I want to put him right. The editorial reference is headed "A theory bowled over by the facts":

Persons who listened during the late election campaign to the argument that a higher tariff would not mean an increase in the cost of living in Canada will be interested in what took place at the meeting of the Winnipeg city council held last Monday night. If they came out of the federal election campaign with an idea that the argument advanced by Mr. Meighen and his friends was well founded they might put the theory up against the facts as they came out in an actual business transaction. The Swedish company which tendered on two generators for the city of Winnipeg's hydro plant offered to supply them at a price that was $15,000 lower than the tender of a Canadian firm. Sweden, of course, is a long way from Canada. Before it can get its generators into Canada the Swedish firm will have to pay duty to the Canadian government at the rate of 27 per cent, or a total in this case of about $30,000. The Swedish firm will also have to pay transportation on the ocean from Sweden to Canada and on a Canadian railway from the port of entry to Winnipeg. The firm is to do all these and yet is able to effect a saving of $15,000 to the people of Winnipeg.

Was there any doubt in this case about the benefit of outside competition? By buying this particular machinery outside of Canada at the price quoted the people of Winnipeg are saved $15,000, the Canadian government gets $30,000 duty to help in tax reduction and the railways get the benefit of the long haul from the port to Winnipeg. Faced with these facts, one of the aldermen, a supporter of Mr. Meighen, too, said that he could not vote to keep the contract in Canada under the circumstances. To bar foreign competition, he said, would be to leave the city in the hands of the Canadian manufacturer.

A tariff that would bar foreign competition would cost every Canadian citizen more money to live just as in this case the barring of foreign competition would have cost the city of Winnipeg an extra $15,000. If the council had gone back on the principle which the majority stood for on Monday night it would mean that every time the city went into the market for machinery it would pay the highest instead of the lowest price. Over a course of years this would run into thousands of dollars which would come out of the pockets of the consumer and the taxpayer. Most of these will agree that they are already paying about all they can stand.

On that occasion the hon. member for Victoria immediately contradicted me. He said that this machinery was not manufactured in Sweden at all, but in Canada. I was not in a position to dispute his statement, although I was aware of the integrity and reliability of the newspaper from which I quoted. My hon. friend spoke last Friday in this debate, and no doubt in the interval he had ascertained the facts, and I think he should have had the decency to put those facts on record in his latest speech. After his contradiction I endeavoured to get in touch with the parties concerned, and knowing that the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) was a former member of the Winnipeg council I asked him to write and ascertain the facts for me. I have before me this letter in reply written by the chief engineer of the city of Winnipeg hydro-electric system:

Replying to your telegram of the 19th instant, the list given below shows the tenders received for 2—6500 K. V.A. generators for the Pointe du Bois Plant:

Swedish General Electric Ltd..	$143,700,000
Canadian General Electric Co., Ltd..	159,200,000
Canadian Westinghouse Co., Ltd..	161,000,000
C. A. Parsons Co., Newcastle-on-Tyne.. ..	159,200,000

The contract was awarded to the Swedish General Electric, Limited, on November 30th, 1925, and the machines will be manufactured in Stockholm, Sweden.

If there is any other information you would care to have in connection with this contract we would be pleased to let you have it at once.

Not content with that, I wrote to the agency of the Swedish General Electric Co. in Toronto, and the letter which I received from them, dated February 19, confirms the information given to the hon. member for North Winnipeg. Now I put these figures on record and repeat the statement which my hon. friend from Victoria contradicted, and I ask him to make whatever apology he deems fit in public decency for calling in question the facts when I first submitted them to the House.

Before dealing with the budget, Mr. Speaker, let us consider briefly the legislation which has been before the House for some time. It has been said by some members that this is sectional legislation. Let us examine some of it. Old age pensions—is there any one in this House who will say that that is a sectional matter? Every province will benefit by this legislation provided it takes advantage of it. I know cases in my own constituency of men who were pioneers, who cleared the land and raised large families, and who now in the twilight of life, through no fault of their own, find themselves almost the subjects of charity. Is there any reasonable, sane citizen to-day who in this country of prosperity, individual and collective, would deny to these unfortunate people the right to have their declining years made as happy as possible? Revaluation of soldier settlers' land—surely that cannot be termed a sectional matter. It is applicable to every soldier settler from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Settlement of crown lands—that possibly is somewhat sectional, for the Dominion crown lands are largely in western Canada. Those are fertile lands and simply require to be cleared. Cut in the western country the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have seen fit to invest, I should judge, in the neighbourhood of one thousand to fifteen hundred dollars on certain quarter-sections of their land to convert them into what they call "ready-made farms." They build a small house and a small stable and fence the quarter-section. These improvements make the "ready-made farm" attractive to the settler. Well, if it is good business for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to do that, is it not equally good business for the Dominion of Canada to spend a similar amount of money in making our crown lands more attractive to settlers?

The next matter I wish to discuss is the Hudson Bay railway, with regard to which we have had some very conflicting statements. I have in my hand some of the statements made by the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) at his nomination convention in the city of Winnipeg last fall. He said that increased immigration and the completion of the Hudson Bay railway were two of the needs of western Canada which the Conservative party would remedy. The right hon. leader of the opposition, speaking in Regina, said that Canada is too vigorous, too virile and too proud to see the Hudson Bay railway carried to within seventy or eighty miles of completion, and then left, a spectacle to the world. We were told, during the campaign in Yorkton, that the Conservative party should be credited with the construction of the Hudson Bay railway; my opponent said the railway was started by a Conservative government, and made the boast that it would also be completed by a Conservative government. Bearing that in mind, Mr. Speaker, it was rather disquieting to read in the newspapers during the recent by-election in West Middlesex a statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). He is a good stalwart Conservative, and in regard to the Hudson Bay railway is reported to have said:

4 p.m.

> That is the whole substance of this by-election and it is up to the electors of West Middlesex to decide on this change of platform which has as its main plank the expenditure of some $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 on a Hudson Bay railway, which can be of absolutely no use to us and which may not be a particle of use to the people of the west. We must not be selfish, but, until we are satisfied that this project and its great expenditure is feasible, it should not be started at this time of heavy tax burdens. If you vote for J C. Elliott you are committing yourselves to the spending of nearly $3,000,000 for over ten years for Mr. King's special little railway

[Mr. McPhee.]

On the platform with the hon. member for South Oxford was the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins), a colleague of the hon. member for South Winnipeg, but the newspaper account makes no mention of any protest by the hon. member for Marquette.

Mr. MULLINS: Would my hon. friend say what paper he is quoting from?

Mr. McPHEE: I do not know; it was in all the newspapers of eastern Canada.

Mr. MULLINS: I would like to know.

Mr. BROWN: Did I understand the quotation from the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford to be that he questioned whether the road would be of any use to the people of the west?

Mr. McPHEE: Yes.

Mr. BROWN: I can hardly understand that, because at a picnic in my constituency he made the statement that the feasibility of the Hudson Bay railway had been proven for a hundred years.

Mr. MULLINS: I would like to ask the hon. member to name the paper from which he is quoting. I will abmit being on that platform.

Mr. McPHEE: That is sufficient for my argument. My hon. friend will have an opportunity later on to make a speech.

Mr. MULLINS: If my hon. friend would wait for my statement in regard to my stand on the question of the Hudson Bay railway, he might find it as explicit as his own.

Mr. McPHEE: Mr. Speaker, I refuse to have my hon. friend interrupt me for the purpose of making a speech; I do not mind answering a question. However, that is not all. We have the Ottawa Journal, a Conservative newspaper, making some statements in regard to the Hudson Bay railway which are rather at variance with those made by the hon. member for South Winnipeg and by his leader, which I would like to make a matter of public record. My first quotation is from an editorial appearing in the Ottawa Journal under date of March 17, 1926:

> The first monetary instalment upon the Progressives' price for keeping the King ministry in office was paid in parliament on Monday. It was in the form of $3,000,000 in the estimates for the Hudson Bay railway. It is $3,000,000 thrown at icebergs, seals and wolves.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McPHEE: I think I had better read the rest of the editorial.

> Canada is still burdened with railway deficits. Our Transcontinental, built specifically to haul grain, gets comparatively no grain to haul. Our ports of Quebec, Halifax, and St. John, into which we have put millions, are largely unused. Most of the wheat of Alberta, and some of the wheat of Saskatchewan, now goes through the port of Vancouver. In addition we are putting more millions into the harbour of Prince Rupert; rebuilding the harbour of Quebec; propose spending $55,000,000 more on the Welland canal; and talk about deepening the St. Lawrence waterway.

Nine million people, with a debt of $2,300,000,000, plus staggering provincial debts, plus war-peak taxation, are faced with these realities. Yet here we have a government, just returned from a smashing at the polls, brazenly proposing to extract $3,000,000 from the taxpayers for an insane railway project, so that it may mock the public will and purchase retention of office.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Winnipeg and the hon. member for Marquette stand as dumb as oysters and permit this Conservative organ of eastern Canada to make that statement unchallenged.

At a time when debt reduction is vital, when decrease of taxation is our more challenging need, we are being plunged further into a morass which has already swallowed twenty millions and which, on a conservative estimate, will swallow thirty millions more.

The "patient oxen" of the Scripture had nothing on the people of Canada. Yet there is a limit. And the limit has been reached, we think, when a government begins using the public's money to scoff at the public's verdict.

Again I ask if the hon. member for Marquette and the hon. member for Winnipeg will endorse that editorial. I have another editorial from the same paper under date of February 12, 1926:

Of all the asinine reasons advanced for completion of the Hudson Bay railway—and their number is legion—the lowest in intelligence is that it was begun by the Conservatives. As a matter of plain record, it was begun by the Liberals. In 1910 the Laurier government started it by building the swing bridge to The Pas, over the Saskatchewan river, and in 1911, just prior to the general election of that year, let to J. D. McArthur the contract for the first section of the Hudson Bay railway, 185 miles. It was largely to pay for this work that the Conservatives were called upon to vote over $3,000,000 in 1914.

But what does it matter now who started it? Is it to be seriously argued that just because Liberals and Conservatives sanctioned something years ago that has since been demonstrated as folly that the folly must be persisted in?

The people of Canada are not now much concerned with the Hudson Bay railway's origin. They are concerned to see that thirty millions of good money is not thrown after twenty millions of bad money; and their concern will not be appeased by tu quoque arguments about the parties responsible for the evil.

Again I ask those hon. members if they assent to those statements which appeared in this Conservative paper. The Hudson Bay railway is by no means a sectional proposition. It is a necessity, and time will demonstrate that it will work to the benefit of Canada as a whole. I have here an article reporting certain statements made by Senator Robertson in the city of Toronto some little time ago, which sets out fairly the facts in regard to the future of that road. The article is as follows:

The senator said that completion of the line would make it possible to tap the iron ore deposits of Belcher island and would provide a route whereby that iron can be taken to the coal fields of Alberta. Belcher Islands are on the east side of Hudson bay, north of James bay. Their iron mines, says, the story in the Toronto Star, "furnish ore that is said to be higher in quality than the mines that furnish the ore for Bessemer steel. It has a 62 per cent content of hematite as compared with about 50 in the American mines. It can be economically handled in Alberta, where there is coal, gas and oil in large quantities, making the sort of industrial proposition which made Great Britain an industrial nation. The climate of Alberta is also milder and conditions are ideal for industrial development."

In the course of the interview, Senator Robertson provided an answer to the question: "Is another outlet needed?" He is quoted as saying that when the big tracts of northern farm land are opened up there will be more grain than existing routes can handle. Then "the Hudson Bay route will be imperative." The senator predicts also the development of a water route between Port Nelson and Moose Factory, at the south end of James bay, "which will connect the heart of the west with Ontario and Quebec with cargoes moving both east and west."

One could go on and enumerate the advantages of the completion of the Hudson Bay railway to the people of the whole of Canada, but the matter will no doubt be threshed out more fully when the resolution dealing with the Hudson Bay project is before the House.

The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), in addition to criticizing the Hudson Bay railway, had some things to say in the House a few days ago with reference to western Canada. Here is what he said on that occasion:

This budget as a whole is what might be termed a Saskatchewan budget. That statement deserves a little explanation. The general policies in Saskatchewan seem to be policies of annihilation and assassination rather than protection—

What did the hon. member mean when he made that statement. What are the policies in Saskatchewan that are policies of annihilation and assassination?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): Free trade.

Mr. McPHEE: We have in Saskatchewan a province that is second to none in Canada from an agricultural point of view, and in every other way. Let me give my hon. friend a few statistics. I will quote from the Monetary Times, and I do not suppose the hon. gentleman will offer any objection to my authority. That paper says: That the gross debt per capita in the province of Saskatchewan is $66 and the net debt $33. The gross debt per capita for Ontario is $87, and the net debt is $30. In the province of Saskatchewan we spend per capita $4 on education. Only one province in Canada spends an amount higher than that, and that is the province of British Columbia. The per capita expenditure of British Columbia for that purpose is $6.64; in Saskatchewan it is $4, and in Ontario $3.38. We have an educational system in Saskatchewan that is equal to any in Canada. No other province in the Dominion, no state in the American union, has on its statue books more advanced legislation for the general benefit of the great mass of the people than has the province of Saskatchewan. How, then, does my hon. friend get away with the statement that the policies of Saskatchewan are those of annihilation and assassination?

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): The hon. gentleman has enumerated provincial policies. I have no objection to them; it is when you come down here with your national policy of free trade that I object.

Mr. McPHEE: We will analyze the statement a little further. There is one species of human being in Saskatchewan we do annihilate and extinguish; it is the species of Tory we see down in this part of the country. The former hon. member for Regina, Mr. Darke, in the address he delivered here before he resigned his seat, made the statement that there are Conservatives in Saskatchewan, but added that if you want to see a real Tory in action you have to come to this House. That is one species that we in Saskatchewan absolutely desire to exterminate, a species of Tory that is unknown to the zoology of Saskatchewan or the good common sense of her people.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): You exterminate them with a political steam roller.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): No; the Tory just naturally dies out there.

Mr. McPHEE: The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) in a speech last week advocated the imposition by the government of an import tax on American publications coming into this country. For what purpose? There are good American magazines. Personally, I have taken the National Geographic Magazine for the last ten years and find it a splendid magazine. Why does my hon. friend want these magazines prohibited from coming into Canada?—because that will be the effect if the duty is increased. If my hon. friend and his associates would advise the Canadian people to get good material for reading instead of spreading throughout the country reckless Tory propaganda that is so obnoxious to a large proportion of the Canadian reading public, it would not be necessary for them to come to this parliament and ask for an increase in the duty on American publications. Here is an example of the kind of sentiment the hon. gentleman is trying to spread throughout the country. I have here an editorial taken from the Orange Sentinel of February 23, 1926, and I will read it slowly so that my hon. friends can drink in the full effect.

An hon. MEMBER: They are all teetotallers.

Mr. McPHEE: This is how it reads:

> Prime Minister W. L. Mackenzie King was elected in Prince Albert, Sask., with a majority of over five thousand. That did not startle the country. Anything less than five thousand majority would have been surprising. Mr. King has the honour, if it be such, of representing a constituency stretching up to the Arctic circle, and with a voters' list that reads like a directory published in some city of the Ukraine. One poll which The Sentinel had an opportunity to examine contained 178 names, only two of which were English and about seventy-five per cent of them ended with "sky." It is rumoured that the Eskimos voted solidly for the Prime Minister, and the "sky's" were ninety-nine per cent in his favour. There was great rejoicing about it in Ottawa on the night that his success was announced. But in the quiet midnight hour, when W.L.M.K. finds it hard to get to sleep, it must be somewhat depressing for him to think that he had to go to the last north and find a constituency on the northerly boundary of the northern province of Saskatchewan in order to get a seat in the House of Commons, whence he can give leadership to the sixty-one French-Canadians who form two-thirds of his party in the House.

And yet the editor of the newspaper that published that libel on the people of Saskatchewan and on the people of Canada comes here and asks the government to place an import duty on American literature and keep it out, in order that he may spread such kind of propaganda as this through his advertising columns. I should like to make a fitting reply to such action, but in the mood in which I find myself I am afraid I might say something for which I might afterwards be sorry.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Do not worry.

Mr. McPHEE: Instead of doing that I will give the well-considered opinion of a newspaper editor of high standing in this country, the editor of the Saskatoon Star. Here is his reply to this editorial, and to other articles of a similar nature, which have appeared in the Toronto press:

> Saskatchewan has many citizens who were born in foreign countries and is proud of the industry they have shown in their private affairs and of the public spirit they have shown in their relations with the people of native or British stock. In Saskatchewan no distinctions are made, so harmoniously do the various elements in the province's population live together. Here all are Canadians, citizens of the Dominion.

Elsewhere in this country no such broadminded and tolerant notions prevail. Since the Prince Albert by-election which sent Mr. Mackenzie King back to parliament, certain newspapers published in central Canada have repeatedly sneered at the character of Saskatchewan's population and insulted the intelligence of Saskatchewan electors. One writer referred to the "middle-European aspect of the voters' list" in Prince Albert riding. Another said the significance of the by-election was that Mr. King had to go to the least British of all the constituencies to find a seat. These, however, are mild statements, comparatively speaking. One Conservative journal published in Ontario was kind enough to say that the vote of a bull moose or jack rabbit would be as intelligent politically as the votes cast by some Prince Albert electors.

It may appear superfluous to answer this sort of thing with statistics, but a few numerical facts may be illuminating if they reach the notice of the scoffers at Saskatchewan. Census bulletins published since 1921 deal with such matters as school attendance and literacy in that year. Here are some census findings: The percentage of children between seven and fourteen attending school was 88.85 in Saskatchewan, 91.87 in Ontario. Of the whole population over ten years old 93.47 per cent in Saskatchewan and 96.55 per cent in Ontario could speak English. Of the whole population over five years old 87.85 per cent in Saskatchewan and 92.99 per cent in Ontario could read and write.

There is a small difference in Ontario's favour in each instance, but Ontario has centuries of history to Saskatchewan's decades, Ontario is more densely populated, it contains fewer remote and new settlements. The insults to Saskatchewan occasioned by recent political events are not justified by the facts of the situation. But they are more than mere errors of statement. They show a contemptibly mean and narrow concept of Canadianism.

And I wish, Mr. Speaker, that some of our editorial writers in the editorial sanctums of Toronto would take this article to heart. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) in the course of his address the other day, made the statement that nobody would invest a dollar in Canada under the present government. He said:

> The two things we require in Canada in order that we can make out of this country what it is designed to be is, first, people and, second, capital, but this whole plan is devised to make it impossible for any man who has money to put it into Canadian industry because he is penalized the moment he does so whether he is a Canadian or not.

Before replying to that statement permit me to read another statement which he made. He said:

> Why, one industrial city the size of Hamilton consumes more beef cattle in a single year than the whole Dominion exported last year, and that was the greatest exporting year we have ever had.

Let us reason out the last statement before we undertake to analyze the first. That is the statement that the city of Hamilton or a city of that size consumed more beef cattle in a single year than was exported from Canada during last year. What are the figures? For the year ending March 31, 1926, we exported beef cattle, one year old and upwards to the number of 228,107. By packing house experience and by butchers' methods, I am told by the statistical branch that the average weight per head of these is 450 pounds dressed beef. Then 228,107 cattle at 450 pounds each dressed beef would make the amount of 102,648,150 pounds of beef. The population of Hamilton was 114,151 at the last census. That would mean, if my hon. friend's statement was correct, that each man, woman and child in the city of Hamilton used per year 900 pounds of beef. There are 365 days in the year, and I suppose in Hamilton, as in other places, they are not all meat eating days either. Therefore each man, woman and child in that city would consume per day on an average two and a half pounds of beef Just imagine, if you can stretch your imagination to that extent, in the city of Hamilton the aged man and woman in the twilight of their days, the middle-aged man and woman, the sun-kissed maiden and the stalwart youth, the babe on its mother's knee, all vieing with one another, munching beef in this meritorious task of extending the home market in Canada. That leads me to the conclusion that the author of this statement of the beef eating proclivities of the citizens of Hamilton will go down in the public records of this country as the greatest beefer in the political life of the Dominion.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Would not the number of pounds consumed per head be greater, if we accepted the statement of the hon. member who said that our artisans are moving away by the hundreds?

Mr. McPHEE: Yes, and I think it would also do away with the egg market in Canada. Bearing that statement in mind, let us examine the other statement by the hon. member, that nobody would invest a dollar in industries in Canada under this government. What are the newspaper reports for the last two months in that regard? Let me put a few of them on record in answer to my hon. friend. The first I put on record is of April 15, 1926, from Fredericton, N.B.

> April 14.—The agreement under which the International Paper Company will develop Grand Falls, on the St. John river, was completed here late this afternoon, and now bears the signatures of the presidents of the International Paper Co., and the Fraser Companies, A. R. Graustein and Archibald Fraser, respectively.
> Under the provisions of the agreement a block of 20,000 horsepower—13,000 primary power and 7,000 secondary power—is reserved for the Fraser companies, who will embark in the newsprint business with the construction of a 200 ton daily capacity mill on the Restigouche river, at or near Campbellton.

The International Paper Company will also take out a paper manufacturing charter in New Brunswick. These and other industrial developments now scheduled for immediate undertaking in New Brunswick involve expenditures running, it is estimated, to from twenty-five to forty million dollars.

Another quotation, from Sudbury, Ontario, March 29—and if I mistake not Sudbury is not far from where my hon. friend from East Algoma comes. It reads as follows:

Sudbury, Ont., March 29.—An important announcement respecting the future development of the nickel industry in Sudbury district was made at the Rotary luncheon to-day by J. L. Agnew, president of the International Nickel Company, who said that the development of the Frood mine, situated one and a half miles from Sudbury, would commence July 1 next with a force of 250 men, which would be gradually increased until the peak production, for which hoisting equipment is to be provided, will engage from 1,800 to 2,500 workmen. The total expenditure called for is $8,000,000. The speaker said it was not the intention of his company to build a townsite at the mine, but rather that it was the wish that they reside in Sudbury where all facilities in the way of public utilities and educational institutions are already available. It would, however, necessitate a considerable home-building programme and add several thousands to the town's population.

Let me read a few more. This is from Hamilton under date of February 9:

Indication of improved industrial conditions in Hamilton was given to-day by the National Steel Car Co., here, in announcing that the plant was working upon the largest single order ever received. The company is building for the T. and N.O. railway three steel coaches and six steel baggage cars. The C.P.R. has ordered fourteen steel coaches, ten first-class coaches for smoking cars, eight buffet parlor cars, ten tourist cars, and 315 freight refrigerator cars. Both orders are for delivery early in the summer.

This is dated New York, February 8:

The outright sale of the ten million dollar bond issue recently floated here for the Manitoba Power Company, by Kissel, Kinnicutt and Company, was reported to-day.

Proceeds of the sale are to be used by the Canadian concern for the erection of new projections in the western province.

This is dated Montreal, February 8:

Confirmation of the coming establishment of a new artificial silk industry at Drummondville was given to-day by two organizers of the Canadian Celanaese Limited, Dr. Rene Clavel, of Basle, Switzerland, and Charles L. Auger, president of the Dominion Silk Dyeing and Finishing Company, of Drummondville, Quebec.

The building and plant equipment will cost $7,000,000, it is said.

This is dated Port Arthur, March 28:

Announcement is made that a 60-ton per day sulphide plant is to be added to the Thunder Bay Paper Co., here, supplementary to the 400-ton paper mill announced, would be built in consequence of timber limits having been obtained from the Ontario government. Work is to be started on the sulphide plant as soon as ground conditions are suitable this spring. Construction will give employment this summer to between 300 and 400 men.

This is dated Quebec, March 28:

The sale of 4,200 square miles timber limits at the legislative buildings on Saturday brought an additional revenue of $500,000 to the province.

The next one is dated Montreal, March 28:

The annual financial statement of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada, Limited, for 1925 shows, after all charges properly applicable to earnings before dividends, net profits $11,215,316, or nearly one and one-quarter millions above the highest of recent estimates.

The last one I will cite is dated Toronto, April 28:

Announcement was made here to-day that the Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company, Limited, had been granted a provincial charter for operations at and near Kapuskasing, Ont., involving an investment of $25,000,000.

And so on all along the line. These are only a few of the statements appearing in the public press showing that this country is going ahead industrially and agriculturally and that all along the line we have prosperity and progress. The beacon lights of general prosperity are burning from the Atlantic to the Pacific, while in this House of Commons of Canada we find some of our Conservative friends fiddling and the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) engaged in the Herculean task of trying to drive down the throats of the unsuspecting citizens of Hamilton the whole exportable surplus of Canadian beef.

Just a word or two with reference to the budget and its provisions. Is there anything in the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) anything that would injure any portion of Canada? The reduction in the duty on automobiles, the reduction in the postal rate, the reduction in the income tax—all these are for the benefit of the whole population of Canada. Our hon. friends from the Maritime provinces have this further advantage under the budget, namely, that the preference extended to Great Britain can be taken advantage of only if the trade comes through Canadian ports so that this will benefit more materially the Maritime provinces. Can hon. gentlemen from the Maritime provinces, who realize in their hearts that the budget proposals are in their best interests, vote for the amendment which is after all the shadow while the budget is the substance?

What do the people of Canada think about the budget? Let me read a few brief editorial references from east to west. This is from the Vancouver Province:

Among post-war budgets, the one presented yesterday is notable for several reasons. It shows a country swinging upward on a wave of prosperity. It shows increasing trade and buoyant revenues. It indicates an honest and successful effort to meet and clear off a portion of our accumulated obligations, and it gives evidence on the part of the government, of a desire to meet the wishes of the Canadian people for reduced taxation. . . . Altogther, the budget is one which does credit to the government and the Minister of Finance, and should prove highly popular in the country.

This is from the Calgary Herald:

The Herald repeats that the government has taken a step in the right direction. The immediate effects of lower taxes will be appreciated. The new policy will probably not affect the national revenue, as more money will be released for productive activity. That has been the experience of both the United Kingdom and the United States.

This is from the Winnipeg Tribune and I am sure the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) will appreciate anything that appears in the Winnipeg Tribune:

The budget produced by Mr. Robb yesterday is excellent in some respects. It provides the taxpayers of the Dominion with much needed relief, and in direct form so that the relief can be appreciated.

The article goes on to enumerate the reductions and then it says:

All these are reductions of which the country will most heartily approve. The budget is obviously a bid for popularity and in a degree a successful one.

This is what the Edmonton Journal says:

Mr. Robb's budget was full of agreeable surprises. He was expected to reduce the income tax, but on nothing like so extensive a scale as he has done, while in addition we are to have two cent postage again, beginning with July 1, the receipt tax is abolished, the automobile duties come down, and relief is given to the taxpayer in numerous minor respects. . . . Under the circumstances, the ministry is to be especially commended for doing the right thing. The benefit accruing to the country will be far-reaching. . . . As for the general effect of the lowering of taxation, in developing a better spirit throughout the country, in encouraging fresh enterprize and in making the Dominion more attractive as a field for settlement and investment, it is bound to be very great.

Just one more quotation. This is from the Vancouver Sun:

With the first real, Liberal-minded budget since pre-war days, the Mackenzie King government is to-day sitting on top of the world in Canada. Reduction in income tax, two-cent postage, elimination of the receipt tax, further exemptions in the sale tax and the reduction of automobile tariff will create a great wave of public approval throughout the Dominion.

In conclusion let me say as regards some of my hon friends across the way: Around them at the present time the political black robe is about to be wrapped; their funeral requiem is being sung; for some of them the wake is being held, that is for those who will vote against the provisions of the budget, and there will be for them no political resurrection when they go to the country and when the public intelligence of the electors of Canada will carry them and what remains of the old Tory party to the grave of their political incapacity, infidelity and imbecility, unwept, unhonoured and unsung.

Mr. HARRY J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) must feel better. I know if I had that much on my chest I would certainly feel better after having had an opportunity of relieving myself of it. We have listened patiently to the arguments advanced by our friends opposite in support of the budget as brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) a few weeks ago, and if the government's case is no stronger than the hon. member for Yorkton has presented it, then I am afraid they will fail to convince this House and the people of the country that the present budget is in the general interests of Canada.

Before proceeding to a discussion of the budget itself I want to refer for a moment or two to some remarks made by the hon. member. He told us that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had experienced some trouble in Prince Albert, but he did not mention the fact, as rumoured, that the right hon. gentleman had desired the constituency of Yorkton but had found the price a little too high. That is what we understand.

Mr. McPHEE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. No such proposition was ever made by the leader of the government as the hon. member seeks to imply. No suggestion of the kind was ever discussed or even thought of.

Mr. BARBER: The hon. member himself referred to a lot of rumours and this one we believed was well founded. However, I am quite ready to withdraw the remark.

Mr. ROBB: I do not want to break the thread of the hon. gentleman's remarks, but I must point out that he has said either too much or too little. If he cannot go further than he has gone I would suggest that he withdraw the insinuation entirely.

Mr. BARBER: I am quite willing to withdraw it, Mr. Speaker. But there are so many reports current, and this was one of them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): It is absolutely without foundation.

Mr. ROGERS: He only gave it as a rumour.

Mr. BARBER: The hon. member for Yorkton brought up the question of bargaining between groups in this House, and I shall refer to the matter later on. For the moment I may observe that the budget now before us has been described variously throughout the country as a Robb budget, an election budget and a Forke budget. As I see it, it seems to me that portions of it may well be termed an election budget, while in other respects it may be described as a Forke production. What have we witnessed in this House since the seventh day of January? We have seen a government which was defeated at the polls bargaining with groups in parliament and even sacrificing the principles of the Liberal party as laid down by its great leaders, in order that hon. gentlemen may retain office. And the present budget I consider another bid on their part for support. The hon. member for Yorkton denied that there was any significance in the talk about bargaining between groups. I have here a clipping from a Toronto paper dated Toronto, March 28, which reads in part:

J. S. Woodsworth, Labour member of parliament for Winnipeg North Centre, in a speech at a labour gathering here Saturday night, stoutly denied that Labour's representatives in the federal parliament had entered into any agreement with the Liberal government.

Mr. Woodsworth said the fact that the Conservatives and Liberals at Ottawa were evenly balanced had helped labour tremendously in getting what it wanted. If, he said, there were 12 Labour members at Ottawa, instead of two, the Labour men would be in a position to get almost any legislation they wanted.

Claims Credit for Pensions

Mr. Woodsworth considered the old age pensions bill was a Labour victory.

I do not intend to deal with the question of old age pensions, and as a matter of fact I had little opportunity to discuss the bill when it was before the House. But I may tell the hon. member for Yorkton that he is no more anxious to see the aged of Canada cared for than we are on this side, although I fear that a host of them will have passed to the great beyond before there is any relief from this piece of legislation now before parliament.

The budget, I say, is another bid for support. The reduction in income taxation and the favourable trade balance are heralded by the government as evidence of prosperity in Canada at the present time, but I think the Prime Minister would find it difficult, if he made a tour of Canada, to convince twenty-five per cent of the people that they are enjoying prosperity at this moment. We have had ample testimony to the contrary from farmer members who have been deploring conditions during the session. Indeed, all the evidence goes to show that the farmers as a class are not prosperous. Furthermore, thousands of labourers are leaving the country, and that is no indication of prosperity among the workingmen. The firm of Penman's has been referred to; it is about the only textile industry which has been mentioned in this House. But if any hon. member will go through some of the smaller towns in the province of Ontario he will find numerous mills which have gone behind over $40,000 during the past year. So that there is no great prosperity in that direction either.

That part of the budget providing for a reduction in income tax cannot, in my opinion, be called a Forke budget if what I read in the press is anywhere near correct. I have here a clipping which reads:

When the Canadian Council of Agriculture met the Cabinet the other day the members, expressed themselves strongly against the reduction in the income tax.

Last year according to recent figures there were exactly 3,061 farmers in Canada paying income taxes, and the sum total they paid was $162,000. This chicken feed was contributed by 530 Ontario agriculturists, to the amount of $19,351. In Quebec 42 paid $3,775, which was just about half the sum that British Columbia farmers paid. In the Canadian west farmers appear to have a reasonable view in respect to their responsibilities. In Saskatchewan 1,492 farmers paid $70,956. In Alberta 663 farmers paid $49,894, though Manitoba fell down with only 171 farmers paying $6,303, but this was nearly twice what Quebec paid. . . . .

In 1925, 168,000 persons employed in non-agricultural occupations contributed to the income tax collected $13,973,000.

In 1924 Ontario and Quebec paid $44,000,000 out of the total of $56,000,000 paid in income and war taxes.

And this brings up another question. If the government proceeds to rip the vitals out of industry who is to pay the taxes? Where is the government to find that six or seven hundred million dollars necessary to meet the yearly liabilities? Land taxes look to be in sight.

The budget, in so far as it affords relief in connection with the income tax and postage, has been well received throughout the country. The reduction in income taxation is welcome even though it is rather late in coming; the fact is that the people have been anxiously looking forward for four long years to some relief in this respect. If the people have been obliged to practise economy in order to make ends meet and to discharge their obligations to the state, they are perfectly reasonable in expecting that the government of the country shall also economize. Has there been any attempt on the part of the government to retrench? The government last year spent more than they did the year before, and according to the announcement made by the Minister of Finance, with the legislation before the House and the supplementary estimates, the expenditure will be still greater this year. In the last four years millions of dollars have been expended on unnecessary public works, abortive royal commissions, worthless immigration schemes, and if present reports are correct, millions of dollars have been lost through the lax administration of the Customs department. All these unnecessary expenditures have been incurred in spite of the statement in the Speech from Throne:

> Every effort will be made to reduce expenditures.

We are certainly not disposed to bestow much credit on the government for the taxation relief announced in the budget. Without doubt the most important factor in our financial success of the last fiscal year has been the bountiful grain crop. I think the hon. member was right when he said that Canada had been blessed with a kind Providence during the past year. This enormous crop, in addition to the very large exportations of raw materials, has no doubt accounted for the surplus.

What have other countries been doing while Canada has been standing still? Let me quote the remarks of President Coolidge in presenting the 1925-26 budget to congress:

> The establishment of a system of drastic economy in public expenditure which enabled us to pay off about one-fifth of the national debt since 1919 and almost cut in two the national tax burdens since 1921 has been one of the main causes in re-establishing prospertiy.

The Australian commonwealth in four years reduced its income tax by forty-seven per cent, calculated on a per capita basis. New Zealand for the year commencing April 1923 reduced its income tax by 20 per cent, except on incomes derived from debentures; in 1924 this reduction was increased to 33⅓ per cent. Its net debt was reduced in the three years from 1921 to 1924 by about $55,000,000. Then we have Great Britain struggling under her enormous war debt. Let me quote from the budget as brought down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer a few days ago:

> Mr. Winston Churchill was able to tell that British trade was improving, that the nation was richer than last year, that the exchange rate was being maintained, that return to the gold standard had made for stability, that the bank rate was no higher than before the war, and that prices were not increasing. More than that, England, during the past six years, had reduced her floating debt by over $3,000,000,000.

I also note that the excise profits tax put on in 1915, with an assessment ranging from 50 to 80 per cent, was terminated in 1921. During all this time no great effort has been made by this government to reduce our national debt or our taxation. On the contrary, after increasing the sales tax from three to six per cent, they merely reduced it to five per cent. They imposed a new tax on receipts, and increased the cheque stamp duty.

No doubt the return to penny postage will be popular with all classes, but I regret that no provision is made for a corresponding reduction in the rates of postage on drop letters and postcards. I have always understood that the Post Office was never intended to be a revenue producing department. Therefore I hope the reduction in the postal rates will not interfere with the continued efficiency and further extension of rural delivery, and that the department will not be forced to continue its policy of employing underpaid rural mail carriers.

The Minister of Finance points to a large and favourable trade balance, but he does not add that large numbers of our people have not been able to share in the wealth produced by our expanding trade. Naturally, our raw materials figure largely in these exports, for instance, agricultural products, the products of our forests, pulpwood and pulp, and the products of our mines; these make up the bulk of our exportations. I will not attempt to analyse all the figures relating to our export trade, but will confine myself to our exports to one country. I do so because this branch was referred to particularly by the Minister of Public Works in the course of his speech last week. I mean our trade with Japan. It is very noticeable, Mr. Speaker, that whenever oriental matters are mentioned at Ottawa, immediately oriental propaganda is set in motion at the coast. I have before me a clipping from a Liberal paper in the city of Vancouver, of a report which appeared in its issue about two weeks after a certain resolution was placed on the order paper. It is all the more remarkable that the statistics quoted by the Japanese consul are similar to those used by the Minister of Public Works the other day. I am sorry he is not in his seat, for I should like to know from him why he did not quote the figures for 1925. No doubt he confined himself to those for the preceding year because 1924 was one of the biggest years of business we have ever had with Japan. In 1924 our exports to Japan were $26,991,860; whereas for 1925 they had dropped down to $22,046,486. I have received from the department of Statistics a copy of the figures sent to the Japanese consul in Vancouver, and they are for 1925. The Vancouver paper to which I have referred headed its report in this way:

Japan spends $25,163,278 in Dominion—Vast Trade Growth Between Two Countries Shown—Consul's Statement—Country Favours Canadian Products, Figures Reveal.

I have analysed the figures sent to the Japanese consul in Vancouver, and the larger items appearing as exports comprise the following:

Wheat	$ 6,735,859
Cattle hides	192,089
Cedar and other logs, shingle bolts	1,545,422
Wood pulp	2,421,824
Aluminum in bars	1,517,814
Lead in pigs	2,504,952
Zinc spelter	1,988,139
Raw asbestos	321,322

So we have this substantial proportion representing raw materials out of a total of $22,050,721. As to wheat, I see by a report from Japan that the Japanese are now raising about 25,000,000 bushels per year, and every effort is being made to increase the production. An application was made to the governing board this year by the agriculturists of Japan to impose a higher duty on foreign wheat, and it was explained that the day was not far distant when they would be in a position to raise sufficient grain to supply their own requirements. Included in that list of exports is an amount of $104,137 for flour. That is all the flour manufactured from our wheat which was exported. We find the list of imports largely made up of foods and supplies for the Japanese who reside in the province of British Columbia including ale and beer $9,810; spirituous liquors $52,661; fruits $167,615, as well as items such as dried fruits, beans, corn, peas, rice, and vegetables in cans. We also imported from this cheap labour country $65,244 worth of incandescent lamps, an import which I believe materially affects one of the industries in this province. I have given this simply as a sample of what the balance of trade really means. We are exporting our raw material in order to make up this so-called favourable trade balance.

One of the main points of the budget is the reduction of the tariff on automobiles, to which the last speaker devoted a considerable time. I believe the term I mentioned earlier in my remarks might well apply to this subject—the Forke budget. The credit for this resolution goes not only to hon. gentlemen to my left, but also to hon. members from the province of Saskatchewan. We admit that Saskatchewan should receive some special consideration at the hands of this government; having produced not only the largest crop of grain but also the largest crop of cabinet ministers of any province in this Dominion. They have no doubt promised their constituents that they will bring back the bacon, in the shape of cheaper automobiles; their speeches fairly bristle with automobile statistics. We are of the opinion that the Prime Minister allowed himself to be swayed by the third party which has everything to gain and nothing to lose in these tariff reductions. I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this is only the beginning; it has already been intimated that other cuts will follow, and we may expect the boot and shoe industry, the cotton goods industry, the furniture industry and others to receive similar treatment to that accorded the automobile industry.

I stated that the government was forced into line by the Progressive party. They were apparently forced by some party, because we find that during the last election campaign the Prime Minister stated on numerous occasions that there would be no further reduction in the tariff until a tariff commission had investigated those industries likely to be affected by such reductions. When this House met we were presented with a Speech from the Throne, in which the government expressed themselves very clearly, as follows:

5 p.m.

-that changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto. A Tariff Advisory Board will accordingly be appointed forthwith. This board will be expected to make a careful study of the customs tariff, the revenue to be derived therefrom and the effect of the tariff and allied factors on industry and agriculture.

The Prime Minister kept his word and appointed a tariff commission, whose duty it would have been to advise the government on this very matter. Then came the budget, with its drastic cut in the import duties on motor cars and accessories, affecting one of our greatest industries. Did this tariff board inquire into the matter before action was taken? No; this was one time the Prime Minister broke his word and did not keep his promise to the people of this country. He failed to have the board investigate this industry. That should have been done, and if it were found that the automobile industry was making too great a profit, a reasonable cut in the tariff could have followed.

The Minister of Finance, in introducing this portion of the budget, said:

There is a pronounced sentiment throughout Canada that the automobile industry enjoys more protection than is needed to maintain it on a reasonably profitable basis, and in deference to that sentiment we propose a downward readjustment of automobile, motor truck and motor cycle duties.

The minister seems to have acted altogether on sentiment, and I believe he is mistaken in the sentiment of the people of Canada. He may know what the people of the praire provinces think, but the pronounced sentiment of the people throughout Canada is not that the automobile industry enjoyed too much protection. In my own province, where I believe we pay more for Canadian cars than in any other province of Canada, owing to the long freight haul, the feeling is that Canadian cars are altogether too high in price as compared to those across the line. The feeling in my province is that the government should have investigated this industry long ago; its books should have been thrown open to a body of experts and the report of that body acted upon. The people of my district, and of many other districts as well, have suffered under the tariff policy of this government, but they are loyal to the core; loyal to Canada and to Canadian industry. For the sake of a few dollars on a car they do not want to see one of our greatest industries closed, thousands of workers driven to the United States, and cars imported into British Columbia from Seattle.

Many of the speakers opposite and to my left have been very unfair in their arguments in support of this budget. I would like to refer to one statement made by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard). He quoted the price of the McLaughlin Buick sedan as given in an American magazine, which price I believe to be correct. If the hon. gentleman will make inquiry he will find that the advertised prices of all American cars cover the bare car at the factory. To that price must be added taxes, freight and equipment. The price of this same car manufactured in Canada was also given correctly, but why was not the hon. member fair enough to state that the Canadian price included taxes and equipment? Included in that price were the following items: extra tire $25.20; tube $4.65; chains $12; bumper $15; sales and excise taxes $135.75; freight $40; tank of gas and handling charge $10, making a total of $242.60. It must also be remembered that 40 per cent of the parts of this same car had to be imported from the United States, under a duty averaging 30 per cent. It is also admitted that the trimmings and finish of the Canadian car are very much superior to those of the American car.

It has been charged that these big firms, in their protests against this cut, have been bluffing, but I think we find as a rule that big business firms do not resort to very much bluff. The General Motors Corporation has been singled out. This is a big concern, and I find that the Canadian factory is one of twenty-eight branches. I am advised that so far as profits are concerned this branch has always ranked twenty-eighth, with the exception of one month when it ranked twenty-seventh. I have made inquiries concerning the export business and I find that this end of the industry is handled for the twenty-eight factories of General Motors through a New York organization, and that in spite of the British preference this branch lost over $200,000 on their export business last year. This is accounted for by the immense mass production of the United States, and is the reason why you can buy a McLaughlin car quite often in London for less than you can in this country. In spite of the preference, which is in our favour, the immense production in the United States enables them to sell cars more cheaply in the Old Country than can be done through this Canadian factory. I do not think there is any bluff in the matter as far as these people are concerned, because I have noticed already that a trainload of Buicks has arrived in Winnipeg from their Flint factory. There has been considerable argument advanced as to what the position of the Ford Company will be. They are not worrying, for the simple reason that the American Ford car will not be placed in the Canadian market. This is provided for by an agreement entered into at the time of the establishment of the Canadian factory when the parent company agreed not to enter the Canadian field.

Mass production accounts for the lower priced car in the United States. Here is one fact which is responsible for it: Very expensive machinery is required to stamp out several parts. On account of the cost of this machinery a certain addition to the cost of each car is made. At the Flint factory $1 is charged for the use of this machinery, whereas in Canada the charge is $60 for each car. The executives of many of these automobile concerns have unanimously reported that they cannot carry on if these tariff reductions continue in effect. From what I have mentioned already, I do not think that we can consider their representations as bluff.

Furthermore, we must take into consideration the appeals from the labour people. I have here a copy of The Labour Leader, which calls itself Canada's National Labour Weekly, and it contains an appeal addressed to the members of the House of Commons. The appeal reads as follows:

An Appeal to the Members of House of Commons of Canada

Representing, as you do, the citizens of this great Dominion, "The Labour Leader," on behalf of the men who work in the Canadian automobile factories and the various factories that make parts and accessories, numbering about 25,000, with about 100,000 women and children dependent on them, earnestly request you to refer the clause in the budget that deals with the tariff on motor cars to the new tariff commission, so that these workers may have an opportunity of placing their views before them. Gentlemen, forget your political parties, and lend a hand to these hard-working toilers.

Then we have a statement from Controller Joe Gibbons, Business Agent of the Toronto Street Railway Employees' Union. He says:

"I believe that the Dominion government should appoint a tariff commission of, say, five men—one to be a representative of Labour, and one a manufacturer. This commission to have the power to examine the books of Canadian motor car manufacturers, and as a result of their finding, to determine the tariff on imported cars and parts and to name a fair selling price for the respective Canadian-made cars."

Then we have a statement from Mr. Lew Lewis, president of the Toronto Typographical Union, in which he says:

"While the reduction in the price of small cars looked good to the worker, I believe it only fair to the workers in automobile plants that the whole question should be held for twelve months and given to the tariff commission, so that the workers of Ontario could appear before them and state their views. It is an awful thing to, with one stroke of the pen, jeopardize the jobs of 25,000 men overnight!"

The following press comment is also of interest in this connection:

The Reid Press, a large printing house in the city of Hamilton, on Monday last placed their employees on half time owing to the cancellation of some $70,000 worth of printing orders that they had on hand from the General Motors of Canada and another Toronto automobile plant. This shows the far-reaching effect of the recent tariff revision, and is another good argument to show that more careful study should be given this subject before a change is made.

What do the American people think of these tariff reductions? I have here a special wire to a Canadian newspaper from New York which says:

The proposal of greatest interest to this country, however, is the reduction of the 35 per cent duty on automobiles to 20 per cent on cars valued at $1,200 or less and to 27½ per cent on cars of greater value. To American manufacturers who have no factories in Canada the prospect for increased sales there will be welcome, but in a larger sense it is gratifying to note Canada's willingness to lower her tariff barriers against American products at a time when our own tariff policy embodies the quintessimo of selfishness.

Now this is a very important industry boasting a total production last year of $110,835,380, an increased production over the previous year of $22,000,000, an industry which paid $17,249,270 to employees during the year 1925. I should now like to quote again from what the hon. member for Sherbrooke said on Friday night. The hon. member gave the following quotation as an indication of industrial prosperity.

There were manufactured in Canada during 1925, 124,000 cars, worth $82,000,000. . . . Export shipments from Canada were the highest on record, the total value of automobiles and parts exported during the year being $39,000,000.

This is pointed out as one of the indications of prosperity in Canada, and still the intention is—according to the budget, and according to the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite—to wipe this industry out. I cannot consider the representations made to the government and to parliament a bluff. I consider there is something to the appeal made on behalf of the automobile industry, enough at any rate to satisfy us that the case should be investigated before taking such drastic action. I have a suggestion to offer in this connection; I should like to carry the bacon home just as well as the members for Saskatchewan. The suggestion I should like to make is this: that the government amend this resolution by leaving the tariff as it was, and immediately have a thorough investigation into the whole industry commenced by the tariff commission. Let the government strike out the sales tax and the excise tax. By eliminating these two taxes, equal to ten per cent, you will have almost if not as great a reduction in the price of cars as you will have under this tariff reduction, and the industry will have a chance to survive. I have not been able to compare the new prices with the old prices of automobiles, but I have noticed the price reduction in Fords, which runs from $15 to $40. This is certainly not equal to the ten per cent reduction which would be given by the elimination of the two taxes referred to.

Now, I wish to refer to the question of immigration, one of the big problems of Canada. In this country we have a railway system, an industrial skeleton, and vast areas of vacant land, sufficient for a population twice the size we have at present. We need more people; there is no doubt about that: this government during the last four years spent millions of dollars on scheme after scheme of immigration. They spent over $3,000,000 in one year to bring in 110,000 people. What has been the result? The emigration was greater than the immigration. The policy of the government might be termed a minus instead of a plus one. It is a negative quantity; it is one of loss, not one of gain in population. Under this policy we have been unable to hold our own people. Ever since this government came into power in 1921 there has been a steady drift of population from this country to the United States. Over half a million people have had to leave their own country. They had no chance here; they loved Canada; they were the very best of our population, industrious, self-reliant, progressive, bent on making their own way in the world and providing for those dependent upon them. The half million the United States gained from Canada in the last few years are worth more to that country than four times as many people drawn from central Europe. I do not hold out any more hope for success under the present scheme of the government than has been achieved under the policy of the government for the past four years.

I wish to refer to the opinion given in the British House of Commons, by Lady Astor on April 26, as follows:

> In the House of Commons to-day Lady Astor appeared as an advocate of British settlements in the United States instead of Canada. Colonel Amery said the government had no official confirmation of the statement that the new American quota system would increase the British admissions to the States from 34,000 to 85,000. He added it was British policy to encourage migration to empire countries, but most of the emigrants to the States were industralists, for whom there was little or no demand in Canada.
> Lady Astor, "Are we not most fortunate in getting our industralists into America," (cries of "Oh") "so long as there is no work for them in Canada?" she asked.
> Kinlock Cooke, M.P.; "We don't want them to go to America."

That is the present situation and the opinion in regard to these new schemes.

There is another immigration in regard to which I should like to see the tables turned. I refer to the oriental immigration on the Pacific coast. A resolution on this subject was placed on the order paper of the House some time ago, but owing to the curtailing of private members' day it was withdrawn so that an opportunity might be given those from British Columbia to discuss this question along with the general immigration policy of Canada. For the information of those who were not in the House in 1922 when this question was thoroughly discussed and very ably placed before hon. members by the various representatives from British Columbia, I just wish to say that oriental immigration dates back to 1886. The first Chinese came into British Columbia in that year, and 90,328 had entered up to the end of 1924. Japanese immigration commenced in 1905, and up to the end of 1924 the immigration amounted to 21,706. Furthermore, 5,381 East Indians entered Canada during the same period so that up to the end of 1924 the Asiatic immigration amounted to 117,415. Consider the source of this supply—800,000,000 facing us on the Pacific slopes of this country. There are 60,000,000 in Japan, 340,000,000 in India, 400,000,000 in China. It is estimated that we have in British Columbia 50,000 to 60,000 orientals, or one in ten of our population. We cannot afford to absorb many more from such a source as this. The improved transportation facilities make this problem all the more serious. We cannot afford any longer to leave our door ajar. This is not all. What about the increase? First remember that there are twenty Chinamen to every Chinese woman, and only two Japs to every Japanese woman. The number of Japanese will soon outstrip the Chinese. The increase is hard to discover, because the white people have to register the birth of every child, while it is difficult to get a record of all the births of orientals. Oriental children do not come into the world like our own children do. We have nursing homes, doctors and nurses, but not so with the oriental: A baby is born in the gloom of Chinatown or in the solitude of a Japanese home and scarcely anyone knows anything about the event. During the ten year period from 1910 to 1920 the estimated Chinese increase was 172 per cent, and the Japanese, 218 per cent. Our best guide is the growth of the school population. I have here a report from the Minister of Education for British Columbia which reads:

> The minister stated that whereas there were 1,422 young Japs attending public schools in 1923 and 1725 in 1924 there are no less than 2,414 enrolled in 1925. The Chinese attendance, on the other hand is going down slightly. It was 1,346 in 1923 and 1,423 in 1924, but this year it is 1,313. Of Hindu children there are 26 as compared with 30 last year and 16 in 1923.
> The white school population, which would naturally be expected to be increasing at a greater ratio, is relatively standing still. It was 92,120 in 1923, 93,156 in 1924 and is this year 94,228. In other words, the number of white children attending the public schools of British Columbia in 1925 has increased by two and one-third per cent over 1923, while the attendance of Japanese children has increased by seventy per cent.

I present the figures of one man who has made a great study of this problem, and as to the matter of increase he states:

> With 60,000 orientals at present in our province, estimating at the present rate of increase, in thirty years from now we would have 34,882,643 orientals in British Columbia. This is not taking into account the fact that we have oriental young people growing up and that many of them will marry.

I cannot agree with this gentleman that these 35,000,000 odd orientals will remain in British Columbia. They will drift east and enter into competition in all lines of business, with the result that white labour will gradually be squeezed out in your great industrial centres. That peaceful invasion of the east has been taking place during the last few years; orientals are doing business in many of your towns and cities to-day. It is estimated that in the city of Toronto last year two million dollars was paid to Chinese laundries. I was surprised to see in Hansard of 1922, when this subject was before the House, an hon. member stated that in the city of Ottawa at that time there were 65 chinese laundries, 4 grocery stores, and 21 restaurants, conducted in such a way they could not be recognized as Chinese.

As I have said, the number of orientals in our province number one to every ten of the whites. After a few years of marriage these young orientals will increase with amazing rapidity. In California there are 150,000 Japanese with 40,000 children, and they say that in 1949 at the present rate of increase there will be enough to outvote the white population in California twice over. I am citing all these figures, not to scare hon. members with the "yellow peril", but I want the House to be impressed with the seriousness of the situation from a racial standpoint. The Americans brought the negroes over from Africa and when it was too late they tried to get rid of them, but it cost them a bloody war of four years among their own countrymen while the black man looked on. They could not send them back to Africa after they had made such increases in population, and to-day there are approximately 14,000,000 of them in the United States where they are increasing by leaps and bounds. We do not want a race war. This is more than a British Columbia problem; it is a problem that must be dealt with by Canada. We must deal with the oriental problem before we are inundated, crowded out and displaced by the flood of orientals.

One man has said: "Why not follow the example of China and build a wall around our country?" We are not asking that a wall be built; we are not asking to keep out the oriental who wants to vist our country or to do business with us, but we want the gates of immigration closed so that they cannot come here, settle and become citizens of Canada. A race which you cannot assimilate, you cannot associate with geographically. Oriental and occidental cannot successfully mix. If the oriental had been on this continent first, well and good; but it is a fact that the white man was here before the oriental. White people pioneered the great Pacific province, endured many hardships and made many sacrifices in order to build up our country. The white man developed our rich valleys and laid bare the rich resourecs of our great province. The orientals are not pioneers. They come into our developed valleys, buy land, settle, multiply, spread and cause the original settlers to sell their property at low prices and leave.

This brings me directly to the economic side of this problem. The white man cannot compete with the oriental. The oriental can stay and stick; he is the hardiest of all races in God's world; he has been hardened by 8,000 years of heartache and history. You can see the 8,000 years in their very gait. You have seen them walking in single file along the street and their gait shows that for 8,000 years they have walked the narrow passages. They have been trained to suffer hardship; they can stand extreme heat and work long hours; they have a lower standard of living, and yet the white man is put alongside the oriental and expected to compete with him. Is it any wonder that it was estimated that 18,000 Britishers left British Columbia in 1924 for the United States, while 50,000 orientals remained and partook of the inheritance that rightly belonged to our kith and kin? They have not hesitated to take advantage of the opportunity afforded them in this country. Their activities threaten the very life of the Anglo-Saxon on the Pacific coast.

One is simply astounded when the Japanese complain of their treatment by the white man in view of the treatment they mete out to the white man. Canadians are much more generous to the Japanese than the Japanese are to the Canadians. We have no sacred rights in Japan; in fact no white man has any sacred rights in Japan. Japanese in Canada have every agricultural, mineral, industrial, commercial and financial opportunity enjoyed by native-born Canadians, but no reciprocal privileges are extended to Canadians in Japan. We cannot own farm land or forests or mineral resources there. In only a few cities can we own anything and even this privilege tends to be swept away rather than to be fortified or extended. We cannot get justice in Japanese courts; Japanese jurisprudence operates in such a way that white litigants prefer to settle all cases out of court. We are discriminated against by Japanese freight boats. For example, if a white man and a Japanese ship from Yokohama to Vancouver the same quantity of rice of the same quality on the same Japanese boat, the white man will be charged twenty per cent more than the Japanese.

It is estimated that at the present time the fishing industry is 75 per cent in the hands of the orientals. The milling industry—that is saw mills—is 75 per cent in their hands. Pulpwood, barrel staves, shingle bolts and cordwood production is almost entirely in their hands. They control and operate about 35 per cent of the logging industry. In one case in my riding a mill had been supplying the Japanese with cedar in clear cut timbers from selected logs at about $80 per thousand. They no longer purchase these timbers; they export the logs for which they pay about $18 per thousand, ship them on their own boats to Japan, manufacture them by cheap labour and export to the countries of the world. A large quantity of our best cedar is in this way being permitted to be exported to Japan and in 1925, for instance, $1,325,713 worth of choice cedar logs was taken out of our province by Japanese boats to Japan.

Truck gardening is almost entirely in the hands of the orientals. They are entering in a large way into all lines of mercantile business. They compete against our white people in the grocery, tailoring, barbering, restaurant hotel, taxi and other pursuits. They are eating the heart out of our industrial and commercial life, and more especially our heritage, namely, our basic raw materials such as fishing, lumbering, logging, farming and mining. In the agricultural industry a census was taken and the returns are accurate, being supplied by the Farmers' Institute of British Columbia. It shows that in 1920, 500 Japanese owned some 8,000 acres. 116 Chinese owned some 5,600 acres, 103 Japanese leased nearly 1,800 acres and 368 Chinese leased over 11,000 acres.

A report of the British Columbia berry growers shows that in 1920 there were 234 oriental growers occupying 970⅓ acres and in 1924 this had increased to 366 oriental growers with 1,465¼ acres. They have penetrated our best agricultural districts. In my own riding there is one of the finest districts in Canada where the chief industry is small fruits and mixed farming; it is an ideal spot for the Canadian or Britisher to make his home; but as you pass along those roads you would imagine you were traversing one of the highways of the Orient. I am told that there are about eighty Japanese on one rural mail route in this district. As you drive along the road you will pass groups of little black-headed children wending their way home from school. Every one of these families is taking the place of a good Canadian or British family and every oriental holding an industrial job to-day has chased a white man out of the country and across the line. If you replace these with white men we will retain in this country the $15,000,000 that is being remitted every year to the Orient and we shall have people who will contribute to building up healthy communities in this Canada of ours.

What is the remedy? Four years ago this question was before the House with the request that the government grant us exclusion from British Columbia of Japanese immigrants. The government at that time told us that they would give us "effective restriction" which we were assured would give us the same results as exclusion. How has this worked out? Since that year we find a steady increase in Japanese immigration. In 1923, 369 came in; in 1924, 448 and in 1925, 501. Of these 501, 182 were males, 269 females and 50 children. These are the details according to the report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1925.

What we ask for is some provision similar to that enacted in the amendment to the Chinese Immigration Act of 1923 as respects Chinese. Under the provisions of that act the admission to Canada of persons of Chinese origin upon the payment of the head tax was abolished and the entry of such persons restricted to the following classes:

(a) Members of the diplomatic corps, or other government representatives, their suites and their servants, and consuls and consular agents;

(b) Children born in Canada of parents of Chinese race or descent who have left Canada for educational or other purposes on substantiating their identity to the satisfaction of the controller at the port or place where they seek to enter on their return;

(c) (1) Merchants as defined by such regulations as the minister may prescribe;

2) Students coming to Canada for the purpose of attendance at any Canadian university or college authorized by statute or chapter to confer degrees.

During the fiscal year 1924-25 no Chinese immigrants were admitted to Canada: we ask for precisely the same regulation in regard to Japanese. To show what the Americans have done, the following extract from the report on immigration will be of interest:

The new United States immigration quota law was passed by congress May the 15th 1924, after going to conference, where an effort was made, and later repudiated, to extend the time of the going into effect, of the Japanese exclusion clause from July 1st 1924 to July 1st 1925: The vote in the house was 308 for and 58 against; the vote in the Senate was 69 for and 9 against:

President Coolidge had requested this postponement of the date so that a suitable treaty might be negotiated with Japan. Congress refused; the President signed the bill May 26th, 1924.

This question is one that affects British Columbia particularly at the present time, but it is one in respect of which we feel that we have a perfect right to appeal to the federal government for action. We do not want to create any racial hatred or any invidious discrimination against any people in Canada, but we do want both parliament and the country as a whole to have an intelligent grasp of the oriental problem as it exists today. We should be delighted to follow the example of our friends to the south. They appointed a commission to inquire fully into the whole question, with the result that an exclusion regulation has been introduced there. We would urge the government to appoint a commission to study the problem here, to have all the facts placed before them, and to report their findings. If this is done we have no doubt the proper remedy will be applied. I can assure the government that such a commission would have the heartiest support of the people of British Columbia. We would welcome orientals to such an inquiry. The government and the House might hesitate at the cost of a commission, but I wish them to bear in mind that the federal government has collected in head tax and registration from Chinese immigration the sum of $22,523,921. There is therefore some consideration coming to British Columbia in this matter.

I wish now to refer to a matter which has been mentioned on several occasions and which interests my riding particularly. As I have already stated, there is without doubt a certain amount of satisfaction over the budget, but I know of one class that is greatly disappointed. I refer to mixed farmers, dairymen, poultrymen and fruit men. The government failed to recognize the necessity for protecting this class of producers. They have failed to give the necessary tariff protection, their interests not having been consulted in the negotiating of treaties with other countries. Appeals have been made to the government on behalf of these industries by almost every representative from the districts affected, and there has been pointed out quite clearly the disastrous effect that must ensue from the policy outlined in the budget so far as this particular section of the community is concerned. This is an important industry and one that should undoubtedly have received the very best consideration at the hands of the government. A large amount of capital is invested in these forms of production. The following table will give an idea of the importance of the dairy business:

Invested in Dairy Business:
Dairy Herds	$193,989,000
Plants	41,585,586
	$235,574,586

Production:

Total dairy production estimated for 1925, $300,000,000.

Egg production, 1925, 224,778,867 dozen.

Value, $57,950,340.

Total value of products from these industries, $357,950,340.

The total imports of dairy products for the calendar year 1925 amounted to $2,409,233. In the same period we imported 2,721,606 dozen eggs at a value of $957,780, of which quantity 2,577,400 dozen came from the United States. Butter comes in from the United States under a tariff of four cents per pound, while the United States tariff against us has recently been raised from eight cents to twelve cents per pound. Against Australia and New Zealand we have only one cent per pound protection. Eggs come in from the United States under a tariff of three cents per dozen, but their tariff against us is eight cents. We import cheese from the United States under a tariff of three cents while their tariff against Canadian producers is five cents. I notice from the report issued by the Statistical branch that we received from the United Kingdom, the United States, New Zealand and Australia for the three months ended March 31 of this year, a total of 6,755,732 pounds of butter at a value of $2,552,000. In the same period we imported eggs from China and the United States to the value of $863,269. This makes a total importation of these commodities for the three months mentioned of $3,415,269. In view of these facts surely the dairy industry should receive some concessions from the government. But the fact is that the budget now before parliament ignores our producers altogether.

The government apparently has not given any consideration to the fruit growers, whose market is not protected. This matter has been very fully discussed, and while I am not going to enter fully into it I wish to point out to the House that this industry has been discriminated against. For example, the American tariff on apples is 25 cents per bushel of fifty pounds; on dried apples, 2 cents per pound; on berries 1¼ cents per pound. All the protection we have is 25 per cent. The government inflicted a hardship on the fruit growers as well as on the dairy industry of Canada in the concessions they made to Australia and New Zealand in the treaty that came into force last fall. Canned fruit, canned vegetables and fresh fruit were admitted free, while perhaps the most serious injury was the placing on the free list of fruit pulp for canning purposes. Our growers always depended on this market for their surplus product.

Speaking of the Australian treaty, I am reminded of the remarks of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) who expressed the following view:

> I am safe in saying, I believe, that there is not much butter manufactured in Canada in winter, the vast bulk of our product being made when the cows are in full milk in summer. The milk and cream offered for sale in Canada in the winter months goes directly to the dining tables of the land as such. The fact is that, our butter is being made in summer when cream is plentiful and being stored by the creameries and the cold storage plants, if anyone suffers through the admission of Australian butter it cannot be the primary producer.

I am very sorry the hon. gentleman is not better informed on winter production. The department of Agriculture has spent a large amount of money and done a lot of work in order to encourage our farmers to carry on winter production. In this connection, allow me to refer to the report of the Finch dairy station, Ontario. Among the objects aimed at in establishing this station, I find:

> (c) encourage the production of winter milk.

I find the report contains a table showing the amount of milk received from December to March, inclusive, and following it is this comment:

> The production during the winter months of 1922-23 shows an increase of 828 per cent as compared with the winter months of 1912-13.

This paragraph I have no doubt will interest hon. members:

> The operation of the Finch Dairy Station on a commercial basis has demonstrated among other things that an increased output means lower manufacturing costs and permits of dual equipment being installed without unduly increasing the overhead charges. The dual equipment enables producers to reap the advantage from turning out either butter or cheese, whichever happens to be the more profitable for the time being. It is possible to operate the large factory continuously throughout the year and thus encourage winter dairying.

I wish also to direct the attention of the House to the report of the Superintendent of the experimental farm at Agassiz, B.C. The dairymen in the surrounding country are spending large sums of money not only to provide for winter dairying but also to improve their herds. The record of 22 cows which have completed lactation periods during 1924 is interesting as showing the improvement that has taken place in the dairy herds. The following summary I desire to place on Hansard:

Average number of days lactation periods ..days	344.0
Total amount of milk produced..lbs.	296,567.4
Amerage yield of milk per cow..lbs.	13,480.0
Amerage yield of milk per cow per day..lbs.	39.19
Average percent of fat in milk produced ..per cent	3.355
Total amount of fat produced..lbs.	9,951.84
Average yield of fat per cow..lbs.	452.3
Average feed cost to produce 100 lbs. of milk..cents	111.16
Average feed cost to produce 1 lb. of butter..cents	28.11

It is apparent that Canada has made great progress in establishing and encouraging winter production of dairy products. The same remark applies to poultry. It is impossible to carry on profitably either the dairy industry or the poultry industry for only three months in the year. Every effort is made to keep up winter production. To show what perfection has been reached, let me cite the experiment made at the Agassiz experimental farm commencing on November 29, 1921. For the third period dating from December 1, 1923, until September 30, 1924, two pens of Barred Rocks were chosen, comprising ten pullets in each pen. The following table shows the results of the leading pen:

Eggs	Value of eggs	Cost of feed	Gain

Now, my hon. friend from St. Boniface seems to think that it would be only right to import butter from New Zealand. It must be remembered that during the winter months it costs our farmers a great deal more to produce a pound of butter than it costs their New Zealand competitors during the same season. Therefore, the competition is very unfair to Canadian dairymen, and naturally they expect some protection.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the only policy which will tend to solve the problems of Canada is the policy of the Conservative party. That policy was fairly and squarely placed before the people by my right hon. leader, and from coast to coast the electors accepted it wherever it was not beclouded by other issues. The Conservative party is not a high tariff party, as has been charged in Liberal propaganda. The Conservative party stands for a protective policy, which, without permitting the exploitation of Canadian consumers, will protect Canadian markets for Canadian producers, be they manufacturers, agriculturists, or wage-earners. It stands for a policy that will give goods produced at home preference at home; that will build up Canada instead of the United States or some other country; that will develop Canadian resources; that will as far as possible have Canadian raw materials manufactured in Canada; that will provide work and wages to keep Canadians at home; that will build up Canadian communities instead of American or other foreign communities; that will provide home markets for Canadian farmers, purchasing power for Canadian artisans, and traffic for Canadian railroads. In a word, it is a policy that will provide a measure of prosperity for all.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, we are now in the third week of this debate. I do not know why it should take so long to discuss a question of this kind when, as anyone listening to the debate will have noticed, nine-tenths of the speakers seem almost unanimous in their expressions of opinion. Apparently there is only one question which has so far divided the various parties, that of the reduction in the tariff on automobiles. I do not know whose are the unseen heads which determine how long this discussion shall last, but I believe they would confer a favour upon a great many members of this House if the debate could be closed this week. We have had cited on many occasions precedents established in the British parliament; I do not know of any British precedent for a debate of this length. In the English House of Commons the debate begins and finishes within a few days, and I think this House would be doing a good thing if it followed that custom.

After listening to the discussion which has gone on for the past few weeks one begins to realize the ramifications of the tariff policy of Canada. We have had to listen to a discussion on our trade relations which took us into practically all the corners of the globe. Canada exports her goods to not only the various European countries but to the Orient and Australia, as well as other parts of the world. As a result we are brought into direct relationship with all these various countries. After all, trade is barter pure and simple; international trade is international barter. When we send goods to Great Britain they are bound to send goods to Canada in return; when we send goods to oriental countries we must receive goods from the Orient. That is a fundamental economic axiom which most people who have given thought to this question realize and admit. We could not, even if we so desired, become an exporting country alone. If we attempted to do so, refusing the imports of other countries, it would not be very long before Canada ceased to be even an exporting country.

One of the main questions I wish to deal with to-night is one which has not been touched at any great length by previous speakers. For a short time I would like to deal with the question of the tariff as it affects wages. A great deal has been said about the workingman, how he is affected by the tariff and so on, and I would like to speak in that particular phase of the question. I claim that a high tariff does not mean high wages; on the other hand, neither does a low tariff mean low wages, nor does a high tariff mean low wages. I claim that the tariff plays a very small part in the question of wages, and when we begin to look into the question of wages from the purchasing standpoint we realize the truth of that statement. What determines wages? I contend that wages, speaking in a general way, hover around the subsistence level; that is, an employer is going to pay his employees the amount of money they can subsist on, and not much more if he can help it. If there are certain places which have a higher standard of living, that standard has come about through other causes than the tariff. One of the main reasons why some countries have higher wages than others is the organization of the workers themselves; if there had been no organized labour movement I really hate to think what would be the standard of the workers to-day in some countries. The worker, whether in a protected country or a free trade country, has only one thing to sell; that is his labour power, and as a rule he gets the most he can for it in the market where it is sold. Although it has been provided in the Peace treaty in the past few years that labour is not a commodity, it is just as much of a commodity to-day as it was when that provision was framed. We find countries to-day in which wages are very low. They are very low in the Asiatic countries. They are low in India, China, Egypt, and Japan. In these countries a very low standard of living exists. Now, the British worker and the Canadian worker in the textile mills have got to compete with the workers of the textile mills in China, Japan and India where the wages are extremely low. What is the international viewpoint of labour to-day on that particular question? It is one of trying to raise the standard of living in those countries where a low standard prevails, because it realizes that is the only hope there is for the workers. We have had a recent example of that in India where the textile workers were on strike in the city of Bombay for many weeks, and where British capital and the employers were engaged in trying to beat down the standard of subsistence among the Indian workers, although it is at present very low. What was the reply of the British workers in that case? They took up subscriptions in Great Britain for the strikers in India because they realized that if the Indian worker was beaten a time might come when there would be an attempt to force a reduction of wages in Great Britain.

We find another very important factor at work to-day in connection with the international relationship of labour. Within the last few weeks a conference was held in London on the invitation of the Prime Minister of Great Britain. This conference was called for the purpose of establishing an eight-hour day in five of the European countries, namely, Great Britain, France, Belgium, Germany and Italy. Even the employer in Great Britain realized the necessity of the movement. On account of the strong labour movement in Great Britain the employer there was compelled to give to the employee the eight-hour day. But having done so he found himself at a disadvantage in competing with the products of longer hours of labour in some of the other European countries. The consequence was that an agreement was arrived at between the representatives of the five European countries named and they recommended back to the various governments for whom they were acting that they should enact an eight-hour day in their respective countries. The trend of events is such that, as I view it, the same policy will have to be pursued in other countries where the conditions so far as labour is concerned are favourable, because the workers in countries where there is now a higher standard of living is not going to see that standard lowered gradually in other parts of the world; rather they are going to work for a raising of the standard of living where it is at present unduly low. That improvement is not going to be brought about by any tinkering with the tariff.

What were the conditions of the Indian workers? Mr. Tom Johnson, one of the Labour members of the British House of Commons, was sent to India to investigate conditions in the textile industries and report back. I shall quote now from a report, taken from the Daily Herald, London, England, of February 17 last, in which Mr. Johnson says:

> Forty millions go to bed at night having eaten only one meal during the day, and twelve millions perish in an influenza epidemic because their bodies are so emaciated that they cannot resist the attack.
> But where is the evidence that when Brownface supplants Paleface in the governorship (as he must soon do), the ryot and the artisan will be freed from the toils of the landlord and the money-lender? When, recently in Bombay, 150,000 cotton operatives struck bravely and without strike pay for 11 weeks against starvation wages, neither Swaraj nor British raj lifted a finger to assist them.
> Indeed, when Mr. Bose moved his resolutions in the Bombay Assembly for a public inquiry into the conduct of the cottom mill industry and for a lak and a half of rupees grant for rice to the starving women and children, he was turned down with emphasis by a combination of Indians and English. What help the strikers received was from their own class overseas, and I am specially commissioned by the workers of Bombay to thank the British trade unions who sprang so readily to their assistance and made a successful issue possible.

Now, the average wage of the worker in India at the present time is about $1.25 per week, and India is not a free trade country. The policy of protection is in force there, and yet the product of that country has to compete with the product of Dundee, Scotland. At the same time, whilst the wages of the worker in India were so low—so low in fact that they can only be termed a miserable pittance—the jute companies in India in ten years made $300,000,000 of profits, which is equal to eight and one half times the wages paid in the same period.

I turn from India and come to a consideration of the conditions in Japan. Now Japan is one of the the most highly protected countries in the world. Why, the United States has not got a look-in when it comes to protection. I have in my hand a copy of the revised tariff of the Empire of Japan, with classifications dated 1923. The new tariff was put into effect on July 8, 1924, and the duty under it was increased by one hundred per cent.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is not that a lovely country?

Mr. HEAPS: What do we find subsequent to that? In the report of our trade commissioner, published in the Commercial Intelligence Journal of May 1, 1926, I find this with respect to the Japanese anti-dumping law. The report says:

> In the supplementary budget for the fiscal year 1926-27, the Japanese government has asked the Diet for the approval of an appropriation of 12,825 yen as the initial cost of the establishment of an anti-dumping investigation commission. This commission is empowered to deal with all matters concerning the prevention of the dumping of foreign goods which act to the detriment of domestic industries. Concurrently with the putting into operation of the new tariff on March 29, the anti-dumping law is to be promulgated by an imperial ordinance and become immediately effective.

There is an anti-dumping law now on the statute books, but it has never been put into operation. It is anticipated that the revised law, details of which are not yet published, will provide for the prohibition of the importation of those commodities sold in Japan at the low production cost of fair market price in the country of origin, or when the industry producing these goods is receiving a government or state subsidy, or when they are sold below cost as a result of trade competition.

Competition by foreign firms in iron and steel, dyestuffs, sulphate of ammonia, soda ash and pulp will probably be the first subjects of inquiry by the anti-dumping commission.

I wonder if hon. members of this House realize the significance of a statement of that character. Here we have a nation whose workers are among the lowest paid in the whole world. Yet its government passes an anti-dumping law against nations whose employees receive wages five, six and ten times as high as the wages paid in Japan.

Miss MACPHAIL: And in the name of labour I suppose?

Mr. HEAPS: I suppose so. What are the conditions in Japan, in this the most highly protected country on the face of the globe? I will read another quotation from the Daily Herald of March 25, 1926. The statement comes from one who was in the country and who speaks with some knowledge. This is what he says:

There are 104,000 women employed in the mines in Japan, more than 80,000 of whom are working in the coal mines of Kyushu, the southernmost island. Wages are low, and hours and conditions are appalling.

Then it goes on to say:

Most of the women in these mines are the wives of the miners, whose special work is to load the coal on the small cars (inside the mines), which are hauled up to the surface, where the coal is loaded for exportation.

Women work for 11 or 12 hours a day in a damp and foul atmosphere. The usual method is for the family, including the wife and children, especially those over 12 years of age, to work in the mine together.

It states here that there is a law which prohibits children under twelve years of age from working in the mines actually in operation. It says:

A law prohibiting children under 12 years of age from working in the mine is now actually in operation, it is said, making the number of children workers less, although this law is never carried out in some sections of the country.

Nurseries, called "hoikujo," have been established by the companies for the purpose of taking care of the young children while the mothers work in the mines. Many of the mothers work at night owing to the failure of the Japanese government to carry into effect the International Labour Convention prohibiting night work for women and children.

Then there are nearly a million women and children employed in the factories, including cotton and silk spinning, weaving and dyeing factories. Wages range from sixpence to three or four shillings a day, the length of the working day stretching from 11 to 13 hours.

I will give the average wage of the worker employed in the textile mills in Japan according to figures issued by the Japanese Cotton Spinners Association.

Average Japanese wages on a yearly basis appear so low when translated into American or Canadian money that they might easily be mistaken for the monthly wages of an unskilled labourer or the weekly wages of a skilled tradesman in this country. The figures for male and female employees in the spinning mills are:

Japanese Cottonmills

Year's Pay	Male	Female
1914	$24 55	$15 95

This article continues:

Women workers outnumber the men 3 to 1 in the spinning mills and 5 to 1 in the making of cloth so that the average wage in the Japanese cotton industry is less than $65 a year. These workers keep Japanese textile machinery working 22 hours a day in two 11-hour shifts.

Cotton cloth from Japan goes to China, India, the Dutch Indies, Australia, the Philippines and in considerable quantities even to the United States. The value of these exports increased from 3,437,474 in 1903 to $21,701,705 in 1914 and to over $163,000,000 in 1924. Taking Alexandria, Egypt, as a typical foreign market we find Japanese goods offered at $5.90 per piece in competition with the product of American mills at $7.65.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that foreign countries are, to a very large extent, responsible for the exportation of these cheap goods from these oriental countries. It was mostly foreign capital that was sent there to exploit the natives. What do we find? Cotton goods normally constitute about one-fourth of British exports. To a great extent England's world dominance has been built up by the Manchester merchants who sold cotton cloth, principally to India and China. And now though the products of Lancashire cannot compete with the goods produced by the cheap labour of Japan, China, India and Italy, these merchants appear to be prospering. The answer appears to be that when the orders come into England as formerly these patriotic merchants fill them with goods produced in the mills of Japan, Italy, and so forth. Sometimes these goods are shipped direct from the place of production. At other times they are shipped via England camouflaged as British goods. Meanwhile British capital goes on in Asia developing competition for British workers. The export of British textile machinery to India, China and Japan is an illustration. In 1913 Britain exported about $9,600,000 of textile machinery to India. The corresponding figures for 1921, 1922 and 1923 were $42,000,000, $38,000,000 and $27,000,000. Similarly exports of textile machinery to China went from $3,800,000 in 1913 to $14,000,000 in 1921, $14,000,000 in 1922 and $10,000,000 in 1923.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is rather an interesting commentary on the figures I have given in regard to low wages that where low wages exist in one country you will find that they exist in other countries where there is supposed to be a higher standard of living. In other words, the problem has an international aspect. There are certain trades in the United States at the present time where wages are really high, but those are what I would call the more sheltered industries, particularly the building industry and the construction of railroads. You cannot import buildings or railroads; consequently the men engaged in these particular trades have the advantage over those engaged in other occupations who come into competition with industries in other parts of the world. Therefore I ask, what is the condition of the workers in the textile industries, say in the United States—yes even in Canada or Great Britain? We find them in some respects almost as bad as they are in the countries in respect to which I have collected these figures.

I will quote, Mr. Speaker, an article from one of the Canadian labour papers, of date, April 23, 1926, entitled "An Industrial Hell-Hole", contributed by a correspondent in the United States. We will see from that article what is happening in the textile industry in the United States and what protection is doing for the worker in that country; we see that he is not enjoying that prosperity of which we have heard so much in this House during the last week or two. The article reads:

An Industrial Hell-Hole

Sixteen thousand textile workers have concluded their ninth week of strike at Passaic, N.J.

When the unorganized millhands of Passaic strike the outside world can rest assured that conditions are so impossible as to be no longer endurable. When they stay out nine weeks and are ready to stay out nine more, if necessary, the assurance is strengthened that conditions were so bad not even a dog would stand for them without remedy.

The Department of Labour is sponsor for the statement that wages are so low in Passaic that one-third of the wives must seek employment in the factories in order to augment their husband's pay to live at all. In many instances man and wife are employed in the same mill.

The husband works by day and the wife at night. Wages average between $12 and $20 a week. The working hours are from fifty-five to sixty. One can imagine conditions, where no one is home to take care of the household, and where a four-room flat, ill-ventilated and ill-lighted, is occupied by six to as high as sixteen persons.

Recently the mill owners declared a ten per cent cut of even these low wages. That was the straw which broke the camel's back. The workers just piled out of the factories en masse, evidently feeling that it were better to starve out in the open than at the machine.

The other side to the story is furnished by the police authorities.

And this goes on to deal with the way in which the police have been acting in the strike, clubbing the workers in order to try to drive them back to work. What has been the result of these constant troubles in New Jersey, the home of the textile industry of the United States? Has there been a demand for high protection in order that higher wages may be paid? I do not think so. Let us see what this article says:

Thomas F. McMahon, président of the Textile Workers, told of the effect of the tariff on the workers.

"Although the output of workers in cotton mills has increased three and four fold," said he, "and the capitalization of the Amoskeag mills has gone up from $4,000,000 to $44,000,000 in 30 years—without an additional cent being invested in the industry—there was a reduction of about 22½ per cent in the wages of the employees in this cotton mill in 1921, followed in 1922 by an effort to enforce an additional 20 per cent reduction. This brought on a strike and the order had to be withdrawn.

"However, other mills enjoying tariff protection are still prosecuting the wage reduction campaign."

American textile workers, McMahon concluded, are determined to free themselves from this exploitation. If tearing down the tariff walls that sheltered this system will do it, they will lend a hand.

It goes on further:

One million workers in the textile industry in the United States find themselves sinking lower and lower in the economic scale, while their rate of production and the profit taken by their employers go rapidly upward.

McMahon analyzed the record of the cotton goods manufacturers under the high protective tariff, and testified that in certain lines they now can undersell the products of mills in India and Japan. The machinery used in this country is better than that used abroad, and the average wage for American cotton mill operatives is only about $15 a week. Great numbers of children are employed at $7 to $10 a week.

It is not only the men in the unions in the United States who are to-day hammering at the tariff walls of that country. You find them inside the Republican party as well as the Democratic party there, for the very good and simple reason that they find they have had too much protection and that in spite of the protection which the manufacturing industries have had, the workers have had no protection at all. The point I wish to stress to-night is the fact that protection gives no protection to the workers.

This is rather an interesting article dealing with a tender that was going to be let by the United States Naval Department. This is what it says:

> Shall a contract for building the engines and machinery for six American gunboats be let to a British firm in China employing coolie labour?
> This question has been put squarely up to Secretary Wilbur of the Navy department, who comes from California, where the Chinese labour question has been an issue for many years, resulting in the exclusion of Asiatics from entering this country as immigrants.
> The last Congress enacted a measure providing for the construction of six gunboats to be used in patroling Chinese waters and fixed a maximum expenditure of $700,000 for each vessel.
> The Navy department made plans to have the hulls for the gunboats built in China, where they are to be put into service, but to build the Deisel engines to propel them in the Brooklyn navy yard. Later the department decided to install reciprocal engines and have them built in China.
> Engineers of the Navy department claim that a saving of something over a million dollars would be made by giving the contract to a British firm in China employing cheap coolie labor.
> Of course the Navy department will not permit the Chinese to man the gunboats. American citizens will be called upon to do the fighting if there is any to be done.

We find further how the highly protected steel industries of the United States can actually sell their goods in Great Britain at a lower price than they can be manufactured in Great Britain and about $4.50 per ton less than they sell them to the people of the United States, at the same time paying freight rates over to Great Britain. What happened when in the city of Glasgow not long ago this same United States Steel Corporation put in a tender for steel rails? Who was it that protested against the United States Steel Corporation sending their goods over to Great Britain? The Conservatives and some of the Liberal members of the Glasgow city council were anxious to have the goods imported from the United States, but the Labour members of the council rose from their seats and protested against the dumping of goods which were produced under sweatshop conditions and in the end they won out.

I wish to deal with something which has been dealt with by many other speakers, but possibly not from the same angle. I wish to deal with the budget, and to get away for the time being from the question of tariffs. Some hon members have called it a "prosperity" budget; some have called it a "poor man's" budget; some have called it a "people's" budget; others have called it a "rich man's" budget. I do not know which of these fit, but anyone can have his choice.

An hon. MEMBER: A popular budget.

Mr. HEAPS: Some have even called it a "popular" budget. I wonder what the average workingman has to look forward to in this budget. It is said there is going to be reduced postage on letters, a reduction in the income tax and the receipt tax is to be abolished. I do not know how much benefit the workingman is going to get from the abolition of the receipt tax. It is not often that he has to buy stamps to put on a receipt. If his saving by the reduction of the postal rate from three cents to two cents is taken into consideration, he might save five cents a month or possibly sixty cents a year. This is not much of a poor man's budget. When it passes this House the worker will have to work just as hard as he did before; he will have to fight his employers just as hard as he fought them before; he will still have the same struggle to exist as he had in previous years.

Some hon. gentlemen have stated that to increase the tariff will provide more work. I do not think that is sound economics. High tariff does not of necessity mean more work. What the worker wants is not merely work; the worker should not be classified as a kind of horse who has to work whenever he is called upon to do so, be given a certain quantity of fodder for his day's work, and then go back into his stable in the evening. He ought to be given a higher standard of living rather than to be merely a machine and have profits wrung out of him. The workers want a higher standard of living; they want more of the goods they produce, and the only way in which we can have some prosperity in Canada and other parts of the world is by giving the workers a wage by which they can have that higher standard of living.

Let us see what the worker produces and what he gets in return for his labour. In 1917 there were employed in Canada 552,968 persons in industries of all kinds. In 1923 this number decreased to 446,994, the largest percentage of reduction having occurred in the year 1920-21. In 1920 the number of persons employed in industry was 526,571 and in 1921 it took a sudden drop to 391,203. Why did not my hon. friends opposite put up a high tariff in 1921 when they saw work in Canada gradually dwindling? They did not for the very good reason that they knew very well that the tariff at that particular time could not have served to increase the amount of work available in Canada. There were causes altogether apart from anything connected with the tariff, which contributed to that huge drop in the number of workmen in Canada in that period. The principal factor was the deflation that set in, and no government, at any rate no government as governments are constituted at the present time, could possibly have attempted to settle a question of that nature.

What was the volume of goods produced by the workers in that period? In 1917 the total production was worth $2,873,268,183, and that amount of wealth was produced by 552,968 persons. In 1923 the total production amounted to $2,781,165,514. The figures for the years from 1917 to 1923 inclusive are:

Value of products manufactured

	Gross Products
1917	$2,873,268,183
1918	3,289,764,146
1919	3,290,500,585
1920	3,772,250,057
1921	2,576,037,029
1922	2,482,209,130

It will be observed from the figures I have given that the total value of manufactured products was greatest in 1920, but we must not forget to take into consideration the value of the dollar at all times. In 1920 the purchasing power of the dollar was quite low; it increased considerably in 1923. It will be interesting to compare the years 1917 and 1923 from the standpoint of the value of our dollar. In 1923 the dollar stood at 153 as compared with 178 in 1917, so that the index value was 25.5 less in 1923 than in the former year. This means that the total value of manufactured products which I have given for the year 1923 as $2,781,165,514, if based upon the value of the dollar as it stood in 1917, would be in reality $3,244,693,100. On the other hand, if we take into account the fact that the wholesale index figure of prices was 243.5 in the year 1920, when our production was largest in dollars, the total value of our output in those twelve months; based upon the 1923 cost of production, would be $2,370,243,362. Perhaps I may put it in this way: In the year 1923, with 446,994 persons engaged in industry, as against 552,968 employed in 1917, there was a tremendous increase in production over the previous period. And if we exclude all salaried persons working in offices we find that in 1917 the production per individual was $5,196 as compared with $6,222 in the year 1923. Now what wages did the workmen receive in those periods respectively? In 1917 the average worker engaged in industry—exclusive of salaried officials—received $760; in 1918, $878; in 1919, $938; in 1920, $1,109; in 1921, $1,002; in 1922, $939, and in 1923, $959. These figures will give us a good idea of what the workers actually produce and what they actually receive in return for their labour, and in view of these disclosures I claim again that no tariffs, whether they are high or low, can greatly affect the situation.

A good deal has been said about the reduction in automobile duties. I cannot help contributing a word or two to the discussion of this question, having interviewed some members of the very large delegation that visited Ottawa a week ago. It is quite true that most of these workers who came to Ottawa did so at their own expense. This is true with very few exceptions. I did the best I could to understand their problem and to ascertain their grievance. Some hon. members went so far as to look into their eyes. I did not do that but I went right up amongst them and spoke to them, trying to get their point of view. But what interested me was the amount of wages they were getting; I wanted to know what they were paid, seeing how upset they were over the reduction in the automobile duties. I do not think there is an hon. member in this House who knows more about the trials and tribulations of the average workingman than I do. I have lived amongst them all my life and I understand something of their problems. The first question I put to these men therefore was as to the amount of wages they received. I found that in the Oshawa factory the great majority of the employees were getting an average wage of between $80 and $85 per month. Later on, moving amongst others of these workers, I was informed that some of them earned from 70 to 75 cents an hour: that would be in the more highly skilled and more hazardous occupations. Work is fairly steady with these people, as I ascertained, but apparently they do not know what the tariff means. "What do you know about the tariff?" I asked; and the general answer was, "We don't know anything about the tariff, but we know that we have had a dirty deal." I then wanted to know what was the nature of this "dirty deal". The answer I got was that, whereas they had been working overtime before the reduction was made, when they came to work on the morning following the budget they found the gates closed against them. "Who closed the gates?" Well, they held the government responsible for it; they considered that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) was to blame for the gates having been closed against them. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that when an employer shuts out his employees in this way he is exercising a function which in my opinion is far beyond his prerogative; and he is doing something equally unjustifiable in influencing people to action such as they might not otherwise take. I do not personally believe that the reduction in the tariff on automobiles will have any great effect on the industry in Canada, and I say that advisedly.

I have here a clipping from the Montreal Star, which paper I am sure no one will claim is in any way biased in favour of tariff reductions. It appeared in the issue of the Saturday following the announcement of the budget and is as follows:

In conservative quarters where Canadian industrial developments are watched closely, the opinion was expressed that the proposed reduction in the Canadian automobile tariff, if adopted by Parliament, would not necessarily mean the end of the manufacture and assembling of American automobiles in Canada. The only direct result of such a change, according to the opinion, would be to reduce their profits. Assembled United States cars, it is explained, have been sold to the Canadian public plus the tariff, thus adding to the profits of the Canadian subsidiaries of the United States companies.

Recently, Mr. Speaker, I received a letter, and it is quite possible that other members from Winnipeg and vicinity also received a similar communication. I have not yet obtained the sanction of the firm to give its name, and consequently I must withhold it for the present, but I may say that the firm employs about one hundred people. It has threatened to close down if it does not get increased protection for the particular commodity which it manufactures, the tariff protection on which has been reduced by the budget. Let me read this very illuminating portion of the letter:

In addition to the reduction in tariff, we wish to point out to you the handicap we would be working under in endeavoring to meet the United States competition—with the protection on pig lead of one cent per pound as follows:

Canadian pig lead, as you no doubt know, is mined and smelted in Trail, B.C. by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, and they base their price—not on their cost—but take advantage of the one cent per pound duty; and simply base their price on the foreign market, plus one cent per pound, less five cents per hundred pounds f.o.b. Montreal.

Mind you, although the lead is manufactured at Trail, the price is figured at what it would cost to ship the commodity from Trail right to Montreal, which is the port of landing for this class of goods from England and other parts of Europe.

The five cents per hundred pounds is deducted from the imported f.o.b. Montreal price, to assure them the Canadian business.

Further, when we purchase our requirements (as we must do) from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, they charge us the Montreal price, plus the carload rate of freight to Winnipeg— which is fifty five cents per hundred pounds; for example, if the imported f.o b. Montreal price, less five cents per hundred pounds, is eight cents per pound, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company will charge us $8.55 per hundred pounds delivered f.o.b. Winnipeg, although the lead is shipped from Trail, B.C. They will not sell to us at price f.o.b. Trail, B.C. Such price to be the Montreal price, less the carload rate of freight from Trail to Montreal, and then let us pay the freight from Trail to Winnipeg.

Now, if anybody can beat that I should like him to come forward.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There are lots of similar examples, though.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. Before I leave the subject of automobile duties, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to the British automobile industry. When the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) was speaking on the budget I had occasion to ask him a question in regard to this. Now I want to give certain facts which I have taken from the British Hansard, and I do not think there will be any doubt as to the accuracy of what I am about to quote, whether hon. gentlemen agree with it or not. In the course of a debate in the British House of Commons on June 9, 1925, I find at page 1926 the following remarks by Col. Wedgewood:

The motor car industry has flourished extraordinarily under its year of free trade. Just as the financial secretary for the treasury has been informing us how the taxation of patent medicines sent up the production of patent medicines so that the tax when doubled produced four times its original revenue, so we find that free trade, so far as the motor car industry is concerned, has done it a world of good. The production of motor cars in Great Britain has really risen in a most remarkable fashion in the last few years. In 1922, 45,000; 1923, 67,000; 1924, 107,000. That is the account of a flourishing industry, an industry which, according to the tenets of hon. and right hon. gentlemen opposite, should be the last to call for protection. But this is the industry specially selected for protection. There is another remarkable fact. English manufacturers actually increased their share of the whole of the cars sold for the home market from 62 per cent in 1923 to 70 per cent in 1924 in spite of the tariff barriers coming down, so that now they are supplying well on to three quarters of all the cars sold for the English market. Foreign competition does not seem to have damaged the industry but rather to have stimulated it. It is not merely the home market. Take our export of motor cars. You will find that in the eight months since the repeal of the McKenna duties we have exported 9,793, and in the corresponding period of the previous year we only exported 3,970. We have very nearly increased threefold the export of British cars owing to the reduction in the protective duties.

Take the profits of the motor firms. There, too, we can see whether they are a suffering industry. I find from the "Times" that the net profits of all of the principal motor firms have increased in the following manner in the last three years: 1922, £287,000; 1923, £655,000; 1924, £930,000.

Now, in order to be absolutely fair I am going to quote from the same debate extracts from speeches delivered by those who declared themselves in favour of protection. Mr. Winston Churchill cited some advertisements that appeared in certain British newspapers, and these may to a certain extent bear out the theory of some hon. gentlemen opposite, but I want to give both sides of the question if I possibly can. This is the first of the advertisements:

Enabled by the budget to resume a policy of extended manufacture which was interrupted last year by the withdrawal of the McKenna duties, Vauxhall Motors, Limited, announce with pleasure the undermentioned reduced prices.

There was a reduction in the price of automobiles in Great Britain. Then I have another quotation from the speech of Right Hon. Winston Churchill:

The McKenna duties will not raise the prices of British cars to the British public or to our colonies and dominions. On the contrary, I take the view that while now there is some assurance that our motor industry will not be destroyed, they will increase the fierce internal home competition and that will not necessarily benefit the shareholders of any motor car company but it will steady their position and decrease unemployment.

Mr. Snowden, in reply, said:

Let me refer to the motor trade. I am justified in emphasizing this point, because it was the great objection which was urged by hon. gentlemen opposite against the repeal of the duties last year. It was said that the repeal of the duties would increase unemployment.

This is what I am interested in, because it has a bearing on the men working in Canadian automobile factories.

It was suggested that the repeal of the duties would increase unemployment. Take the motor trade. In August, the month of their removal, the percentage of unemployment was 10.2; in December it had dropped to 7.5.

That is a drop of 33⅓ per cent, and unemployment fell with the drop in the duty.

These are facts which are worth all the rhetoric of the right hon. gentleman. I wish he would deal a little more with the facts and give us less of his knowledge of the English dictionary.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) quoted from a paper called The Labour Leader, published in Toronto. I did not know of the existence of such a paper until I received a copy of it, although it is claimed to be a national paper. Knowing nothing about it, and not knowing those who were responsible for its publication, the day after it was read in this House by the hon. member for South Wellington I wrote the vice-president of the Canadian Trades and Labour Congress, Mr. James Simpson. This is his reply, under date of April 16, on the letter head of The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada:

The man W. J. Heavy, part proprietor of The Labour Leader, of Toronto, has no right whatever to speak for organized labour in Canada. By unanimous vote of the Toronto District Labour Council he has been denied a seat in the council, although his name was sent on from the Theatrical Stage Employees' Union, of which he is a member. He has been repudiated several times by the Trades Council—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: He is an actor?

Mr. HEAPS: A bad actor.

—and there is a resolution on the books of the council refusing admission to anyone connected with The Labour Leader.

I do wish some of my hon. friends opposite, before quoting from such newspapers, would find out something about them.

This man Heavy was at one time a member of the Cigarmakers' Union and represented that union in The Trades and Labour Council. The Cigarmakers' Union withdrew him from the council on account of his disloyalty to the Trades Union movement. Through a friend, who was about as bad as himself, he got into the Stage Clearers' Union, which was affiliated with the Theatrical Stage Employees' Union. He was then an advertising solicitor and had no connection with the theatrical business.

So he was not even a bad actor.

It was one of those shady deals sometimes put over in the labour movement, by a bad gang who eventually come to their end. The London Trades and Labour Council has also a resolution on their books refusing to give him admission to meetings of the council, although he was born in London and was a resident of that place. His only connection with the labour movement is his connection with the Theatrical Stage Employees, and that union has been told that under no circumstances will the District Labour Council accept him as a delegate. The Labour Leader has been several times condemned as the enemy of the workers. It is a paper which is run by two private individuals for the money they can get out of it. They supported the Conservative party at the last election and opposed the Labour candidates everywhere. They made their advertising rates prohibitive to Liberal candidates at the last election because the Conservative party had them controlled body and bones.

Miss MACPHAIL: And soul.

Mr. HEAPS: They have none.

The paper is regarded as the friend of the Manufacturers' Association and profits considerably financially because of its support to that association. Heavy is a member of the Conservative party and is regarded by the Tory machine in Toronto as one of its strong supports. He has no influence in the Labour movement, but on the contrary is regarded as one of the worst traitors we ever had in the Labour movement. It is a matter of court record in Toronto that Brigadier-General Gunn and Mr. Roden, ex-president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, appeared before the metal trades employers in Toronto at the time their employees were out on strike to ask them to vote $5,000 to Heavy to assist him in getting out a Labour paper. At that time Heavy was the secretary of the Trades and Labour Council. It was because of this act of treason while in the Labour movement that he was thrown out of the Trades Council and Cigarmakers' Union. John W. Bruce, general organizer of the Plumbers' and Steamfitters' Union, openly charged him with being on the staff of the Milwaukee Detective Agency, while operating in the Labour movement. Heavy started court action against Bruce but dropped the case after it had gone through its preliminary stages. This charge was based upon the fact that while Heavy was in the bar of one of the Toronto hotels some years ago a card dropped out of his pocket, was picked up by one of the men who was with him, and afterwards read. It was a card connecting him with the Milwaukee Detective Agency.

One recent incident will reveal the type of the man. His paper has made a lot of money because of its attacks upon Communists and the Red element, but at the last convention of The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, Tom Moore, the president, was opposed by a Communist. Heavy voted for the Communist. This can only be explained on the ground of Tom Moore's refusal to be used by Heavy and his paper to further their financial gains.

You can tell Hugh Guthrie for me, as vice-president of The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and secretary of the Canadian Labour party, that every time he quotes from The Labour Leader or mentions the name of W. J. Heavy in support of his theories or party he is insulting every decent trades unionist in Canada. Everything I have mentioned in this letter can be supported by documentary evidence.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES SIMPSON.

I also have further references to this man Heavy which appeared in the London, Ontario papers, made by some of the officials of the London Trades and Labour Council. These are very much along the line of what I have already quoted.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley dealt with the question of the income tax, and quoted certain figgures to show what the actual reduction was. I am also interested in the income tax question, although perhaps in not exactly the same way as other hon. members who have already spoken. I have given figures which show that the average worker cannot pay income tax because his wages do not come within the income tax limits. I have here the figures published by the Bureau of Statistics in that connection, and I want to read some of these figures because they show some rather startling facts in connection with the concentration of wealth in Canada. In 1923 there were 1,181 persons who paid income tax, and who might be termed the highly favoured few. I wish I was in that class; I would never complain about the income tax I had to pay. These 1,181 persons paid $12,022,219.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What was the total number?

Mr. HEAPS: I will give you the total number in a minute. What I am saying now is that in 1923, 1,181 persons paid $12 022,219. The balance, numbering 280,000, paid between them $19,845,149. Had I time to work the figures out on a percentage basis I believe it would show that these people—I refer to the 1,181 persons mentioned—paid between thirty-five and forty per cent of the total amount of income tax in Canada. In 1924 we find that 1,898 persons paid income tax totalling $11,357,039, and 237,138 other persons paid $14,476,976. In 1925, 1,804 persons paid $11,559,666, and 223,710 persons paid $13,586 836. In other words less than two thousand people paid approximately—I am speaking now without having given the matter very close thought—forty-five per cent of the total income tax paid in the Dominion. The analysis made by the Bureau of Statistics gives these payments in much greater detail. I do not wish to quote all the figures, however, and I will ask permission to have them placed on Hansard. They are comprised in the following table:

Now, Mr. Speaker, I generally like to limit anything I say to the hour.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. HEAPS: I have already transgressed a self-imposed rule, and I do not wish to go much further into some of the matters upon which I have dwelt. But I wish to say this: We find as a result of the facts which I have given that in the production of wealth the portion which the workers, both men and women, receive out of that which they have produced is extremely small. We find, according to our income tax returns, that the wealth of the country is concentrated practically in few hands. Here in the Dominion of Canada we find a quarter of a million people paying income tax. If that is the case, taking five to a family, it will mean that a million and a quarter people, men, women and children, may have benefited by the reduction of the income tax. But what about the other eight millions of people? What are they getting out of the budget? That is the question that has to be answered, and I do not expect either the Liberal party or the Conservative party to give us much more than they are giving us at the present time.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Why don't you answer your own question?

Mr. HEAPS: I am trying to show my hon. friend, and I hope the points I have made will reach his mind and stick there. I have been showing to-night how little the worker gets for what he produces. I have been showing that wealth has been concentrating in fewer and fewer hands; and if the hon. gentleman wants to know what I think, I have no hesitation in saying that I think labour is entitled to that which it produces. The person who is performing a useful function in society is entitled to something more than a mere pittance in life, and to receive when he reaches the age of seventy a pension of $20 a month. This old age pension should not be necessary in any country. But why is it necessary? Because men and women when they have toiled throughout their lives find themselves in old age without sufficient to live on. I suppose hon. members, like the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted me, would be the first to oppose measures of that character. Let me quote to my hon. friend an authority which, perhaps, even he will accept. Sir Alfred Mond, speaking on April 17th in the city of Birmingham, England, said:

> Our whole industrial system is being challenged, not merely by wild and foolish people, but by serious thinkers and economists.

I will leave the matter there.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Before proceeding to discuss one or two of the questions raised in this debate, I wish to allude to a reference made to myself recently by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird). I submit to the House that in the discussions into which my Progressive friends to the left have entered since the House opened, I have been present upon almost every occasion and been an interested listener—because I have sought and really and sincerely desired to be informed with regard to the views of the gentlemen who compose the Progressive party—and I do not think that in any debate I have gone beyond the bounds of extreme courtesy in dealing with and in referring to these gentlemen. But my hon. friend from Nelson, although I have called his attention to the fact, has not seen fit to revoke a remark which he made in reference to myself the other night, and that was that in the course of the debate I had referred to members of the Progressive party as "ignorant trash." Mr. Speaker, I am quite incapable of using such rude and discourteous language. I certainly have not used any such language in this House. I only wish to say that I called the attention of the hon. member for Nelson to his error, made in the heat of debate, and that he had not yet seen fit to correct it on the record.

Mr. BIRD: Will the hon. gentleman finish the sentence that I used?

Mr. CAHAN: If I remember correctly, you alluded to me as saying that I had referred to the Progressive party as "ignorant trash or something of that kind."

Mr. BIRD: If the hon. gentleman will allow me I will read to the House what particular statement I had reference to.

Mr. CAHAN: You can refer to it afterwards. Certainly I made no statement of that kind, or anything in the nature of such an insinuation.

An hon. MEMBER: Read the statement.

Mr. CAHAN: I called the hon. gentleman's attention to it, and he has not yet seen fit to revoke it.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it.

Mr. BIRD: May I not on a question of privilege refer to the statement which I had in mind?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, read it.

Mr. BIRD: On page 2439 of Hansard, April 14th, in answer to a question put by Mr. Garland, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said:

I should think hon. gentlemen would have known very much better than to have said many of the things which they have said this afternoon, but there is no limit sometimes to ignorance.

That is the statement I had reference to when I said "Ignorant trash or something of that kind," and I had not reference so much to the exact words as to the tone in which they were uttered.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman would have been far more frank and candid to this House if he had referred to the fact that before I made the statement in question, the hon. member for Bow River, referring to another hon. member whose contentions I was disputing said:

I do not think he said that.

Referring to his friend of the Progressive party.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the page?

Mr. CAHAN: Page 2439 of Hansard:

I do not think he said that; he knows much better.

I retorted to the hon. member for Bow River:

I should think hon. gentlemen would have known very much better than to have said many of the things which they have said this afternoon, but there is no limit sometimes to ignorance.

And I still contend that in the discussion there was a great lack of information with regard to banking credit by some members of the Progressive party. But that is an entirely different thing from my referring to the members of that party as "ignorant trash", and if the hon. member for Nelson had the high sense of honour that I thought he had, he would have been quite willing, at my request by letter, to have corrected that statement in Hansard.

The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) the other night made a slighting reference to myself. He seemed to suggest that I was quite ignorant of conditions in Quebec, because I could not answer him as to the general feeling in three of the small parishes of the constituency of Temiscouata. If I had been dealing with him in the way he attempted to deal with me I might well have retorted that I could judge the three parishes at Temiscouata by the character and qualities of the representative they sent to this House, but that would have been utterly unfair to him, because I know enough about the old families of Quebec to know that the hon. member for Temiscouata comes from a very distinguished family in that province. Among his ascendants have been a considerable number of men who have taken a splendid part in the public, the judiciary and the professional life of this country, and I can only wish for him the good fortune to follow in their footsteps and to emulate their example. When he does so, as I hope he will, he will refrain, I am sure, from making such unpleasant remarks to present members of the House, and especially such crude and vulgar remarks with reference to a certain former member of this House as he made the other night. He suggested that I should sit on the opposite side of the House instead of sitting where I am, because I happen to differ, I have no doubt, on some matters of policy from hon. members who sit on this side. The hon. member at this early stage in his public career may need a leader, a guide and a counsellor. I do not think that in public matters I do require the same guidance of which he has need, and I trust that he will follow the guidance of his leaders from Quebec, who have always shown in debate in this House, so far as I am aware, that kindness, consideration and courtesy to hon. members on this side which have characterized not only all their predecessors in the House, but their race as a race.

I wish to refer for a moment or two to the question of the income tax. When the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), entered upon a discussion of the Address to His Excellency, he called the attention of the House to the difference between earned income and unearned income. He suggested that a heavier tax should be placed upon unearned income than is placed on earned income. I understood the Minister of Finance, in introducing the resolution at the commencement of the budget debate, to suggest that he was following some distinction or discrimination between earned income and unearned income. There is a good deal to be said in favour of taxing unearned income at a higher rate in certain circumstances. But I suggest that the hon. minister has not followed out that distinction or made a clear discrimination in the resolution he has placed before the House. The resolution does discriminate between dividends received from Canadian companies and every other source of revenue, but I suggest to the hon. Minister of Finance that when he is placing the heavier tax upon unearned income, he might remember that interest upon money loaned, interest received on debentures and bonds of companies, interest received from mortgages, and income received from a half a dozen other sources which I might name, are unearned income, and should in a properly constituted budget be subjected to the same taxation, if not a greater taxation, than income received as dividends from Canadian companies. In the United States such a discrimination is made in the income tax. But in that country they clearly define income from wages, salaries, professional fees and other amounts received as compensation for services actually rendered, as earned income; all the rest is taxed as unearned income.

Let me put a case to show the discrimination that is made by the income tax as expressed in the resolution before the House. Take the case of an unmarried man, without dependent children, receiving a salary of $10,000. Under the resolution now proposed he would pay a tax of $290. If he has a salary of $5,000, but, by reason of his thrift, he has accumulated a certain fund and invested it in stocks of Canadian companies which yield him $5,000 additional by way of dividends, he will pay, in addition to the $290, as a shareholder of the Canadian company, the $494.50 which is now exacted from the company. But if exemption had been continued in respect to dividends received from Canadian companies, which have already paid the income tax on behalf of their shareholders, he would still have paid the $494.50 and, in addition, he would pay only $40 on his earned income instead of the $290 which he is now called upon to pay. So that in his case the tax is increased and very considerably increased; and a careful examination of the income tax now proposed will show that there is not likely to be any general diminution—that is, any diminution in the total amount of income tax received from all these sources. But the proposed change does favour the man with a small income. It favours also the man with a large income who is more competent to pay, and it places the additional burden upon the large body in between who receive moderate incomes by way of dividends from Canadian companies.

In this country we have found it advantageous for trade, commerce and industry that a man who has an investment in such trade or business or industry should be enabled to associate with him sometimes his workingmen, sometimes his salaried officials, and sometimes his neighbours. I have in mind the case of a man that came before me in respect of the settlement of an estate a few months ago. A friend of mine carrying on a large wholesale business in Canada undertook to bring in with him and give advantages to old employees, to salaried managers, and the business which had been carried on by an individual was incorporated as a joint stock company in order that his associates might be brought in and enabled to purchase an interest in the company. That man, while conducting the business as his own, pays one tax upon the profits of the concern; but under the present proposed resolutions the moment he incorporates himself and his associates not only does he pay a tax and a very heavy tax upon the income of the company, but when that income, after paying income tax to the government, is distributed between him and his associate shareholders in the company, it pays a second tax and a very heavy tax which has not hitherto been imposed upon stockholders or shareholders of a Canadian company. An enormous sum of money will be brought into the treasury under this new provision.

The new resolutions encourage the investment by wealthy men of their money not in Canadian companies—because they now pay a double tax—but in non-productive property which may increase in value from year to year but which yields no taxable revenue, pending, I suppose, proper changes in the income tax laws. Therefore I say that these resolutions with regard to the income tax are on a par with the other legislation submitted by this government to the House during the present session. They are ill-considered; no attempt has been made to spread the taxes on a proper basis, to study out the problem in order to do justice to various classes of men receiving incomes. The proposed change, as I said a moment ago, does not imply any reduction in the aggregate of the tax to be collected. Heavier taxes and in fact double taxes are imposed upon the earnings of Canadian companies. In many cases which now exist where it is convenient for one company to hold the stock of several other companies, which in turn may hold stocks of subsidiary companies in order that different departments of the same business may be kept under different managements and therefore like different departments of the business, if I read these resolutions aright, the holding companies will pay taxes upon dividends received from the subsidiary companies; in turn the subsidiary companies will pay taxes upon their net operating incomes, and then the shareholders by whom dividends are ultimately received will also pay taxes on the dividends received by them. Thus under the existing practice which is pursued in many parts of this country the income tax will be not only doubled, but tripled and in some cases quadrupled before the income of the enterprise reaches the shareholders by way of dividends.

There is also, as I have said, a discrimination against any industry or trade which is carried on by a corporation or company instead of by a private individual, in that the tax on the incorporated company is doubled or otherwise increased. The Canadian investor in shares of a foreign company pays only one tax, but if he invests his money in a Canadian company, as I have said, he pays at least a double tax and possibly a triple tax. The obvious result is to render it more and still more difficult to obtain funds for investment in Canadian companies carrying on corporate enterprises in this country.

I think the taxes as now imposed are prejudicial to a certain extent to the individual. The wage-earner who saves up out of his income a certain amount for the protection of his wife and children when he is gone, or for the protection of himself against old age or other disabilities, finds that by investing the proceeds of his thrift in a Canadian company, perhaps the company by which he is employed or in which he is an official, he thereby seriously impairs the amount of revenue which he, in case of incapacity, or his wife or children after him, would receive from the fund which he has laid up against such possibilities.

There are many anomalies in this income tax as we have it. For instance the rural resident who owns his house or his farm pays no tax whatever upon his investment nor upon the value or user of his house or farm. In the cities where we cannot afford to own houses, but where a man instead of investing $20,000 in a house might invest $20,000 in bonds or shares or other investment, he has to pay an income tax on the income of that $20,000 which he invests, we will say, in bonds of a Canadian company, and in addition he pays for rent or user of his house. Therefore, under the most favourable circumstances to him, he pays a tax on the amount of his rent or for the user of his house, which tax the man who has invested his savings in a house does not pay at all.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Could that man not afford to buy a house?

Mr. CAHAN: I suppose he could, but where we live in cities nine-tenths of us do not own houses.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. CAHAN: We cannot afford to own houses. What I am saying is this, that a man escapes taxation by owning a house. He avoids paying taxes if he invests his $20,000 in purchasing a house and lives in it, whereas if he invests that $20,000 in the stock of a Canadian company and uses the income to pay the rent, he has to pay income tax upon his income, including his rental value, while you gentlemen who live in the country and own your houses pay no tax whatever upon the user of your house.

Miss MACPHAIL: Not $20,000 houses.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, if you put it at $10,000 my position is just the same, or you may put it at $5,000. But I have travelled through the northwest quite a bit and I have seen many houses that could not be purchased for $20,000. Some of those houses may be occupied by hon. members of this House, if not by Progressive members, certainly by hon. gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Is it cheaper to pay rent than to own your own house?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think it is; when I pay rent I pay the whole annual cost of the house.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): In that case you might as well own the house.

Mr. CAHAN: Possibly; it might be just as well for me to own the house. But I say that when I am not in a position to buy the house, or if I do not buy it, the present law discriminates against me. It discriminates against every man who pays rent instead of owning his property, and therefore it discriminates against every leaseholder in large cities where people cannot afford to own the land.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): This law does not prevent a man from owning his own house, and every man is to that extent a better citizen who does own the house he lives in.

Mr. CAHAN: That may be so; I am sure we should be better citizens if we owned our houses. The fact remains, nevertheless, that this income tax is full of anomalies.

Mr. BOURASSA: May I remind the hon. member that that has always been the case.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly it is the case, but I am suggesting that if the Minister of Finance undertook to remove these anomalies under the guise of reducing the income tax his work has resulted in a still further increase in the anomalies and not in any reduction in the amount exacted from the people in income tax. In my opinion—and I have a perfect right to my opinion although it may differ from hon. gentlemen's—a more unfair, prejudicial and discriminatory readjustment of the provisions of the income tax law could hardly be conceived than this presented for the approbation of parliament to-day.

Apart from the income tax, certain reductions in customs duties have been proposed, as for instance in the case of sugar, which I understand are made to comply with the provisions of the West India treaty. I think we are entitled to know why there should be any general reduction under present conditions in sugar duties. If we are to give a preference to the West India producers certainly we are in a position to raise the general tax so as to preserve the income which comes to this country from sugar. The tariff does not affect the export trade because in the export trade there is an almost entire remission of the duties paid. It seems to me that before this budget is considered in committee we should have some further explanation from the Minister of Finance of the particular provisions relating to the West Indies.

With regard to the further provision in the case of automobiles, that there shall be paid from the treasury by way of drawbacks of duty, refunds to the importers of component parts entering Canada for the manufacture, the construction, or the assembling of automobiles here, I would suggest that the whole system of drawbacks is wrong. It is simply a covert way of removing a fair protection from one of the great basic industries of the country. I consider the production of iron and steel in Canada as much a basic industry as the growing of wheat; it is the industry upon which a great number of our large industrial interests are founded and sustained. And since this government came into office, by its preferences in favour of Great Britain, by its preferences in favour of Belgium and France and other countries, by its repayment of drawbacks in favour of the United States —by all this discriminatory legislation it has weakened and impaired the great iron and steel industry of the country. That is entirely borne out by the facts which have been brought down in various government returns. For instance, in the year 1920 we had 1,475 plants engaged in iron and steel production, and in the manufacture of the products of iron and steel. In four years, up to 1924, the last figures available, that number has been reduced to 1,003. That industry in 1920 had a capital of $624,000,000, which in 1924 had been reduced to $535,000,000. It paid salaries and wages to 115,700 workmen and employees in the year 1920 and by 1924 that number had been reduced to 78,000, while the amount paid out to these workmen in the respective years was $158,000,000 and $99,000,000. The industry employed materials to the value of $321,000,000 in 1920. I have not the corresponding figure for 1924, but the selling value of the products, all of Canadian manufacture, produced by Canadian workmen, was $640,000,000 in 1920, reduced in 1924 to $370,000,000. The value added by Canadian workmanship and machinery, exclusive of material, was in 1920, $318,900,000 and in 1924 only $174,000,000. So that in the annual production of wealth in the iron and steel industry there has been a loss of $144,000,000, and this is due to the insidious and deceptive yet complete manner in which the legislation and the government policy of this country is undermining and destroying a great industry.

Mr. EVANS: If the hon. gentleman would permit me—would not the 1920 total be due to the inflated prices of that period?

Mr. CAHAN: They may be to a certain extent, but we have inflation in this country to-day; by the standard of 1914 or 1915, our dollar is only worth 65 cents.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Is it not a fact that in the same time and on the same basis the American figures are very much greater now than in 1920?

Mr. CAHAN: I am prepared to show, if necessary, that this diminution in the productive activities of our own people is made up by the large importations which we are making of the same class of goods. That is the reason why although we were employing 115,760 men in 1920, we are employing in 1924 only 78,000—a very considerable reduction, due to 470 odd plants having been entirely driven out of business by the policy pursued by this government.

Now, I do not wish to enter upon a lengthy discussion of the promises and pledges made to the country by the right hon. leader of the government. The first time that his pronounced views on tariff policy came to my special notice was when he was entering upon his campaign in Nova Scotia in October 1921. There his policy was one of protection to the iron and coal industries of the province. On that pledge of protection to those industries he secured the return of a Liberal member for every constituency of Nova Scotia; the electorate believed him and voted for his candidates. There he said, according to the reports in the press:

> Free trade is not the policy of the Liberal party. If it were, I would oppose it because I believe it would bring disaster to our industries and remove from the farmers the home market, which is practically the only market they have left.

He continued:

> Free trade may be all right for the wealthy grain growers of the west whose wheat goes to the foreign markets and who do not have to worry about selling their products at home, but it would mean paralysis in the Maritime provinces.

Because of that pledge of the right hon. leader of the government he was supported by nearly all the constituencies east of the Ottawa river; they returned an almost solid phalanx behind him in the last parliament. But our anxiety was aroused when we read his address on May 15, 1924, in discussing the budget before the preceding parliament. There he declared that the policy of the Liberal party was:

> No more tariffs based on the principle of protection. That is our policy to-day, the policy of the Liberal party, proceeding step by step towards the goal of greater freedom in matters of trade, never imposing a duty for protection's sake, but always acting on the principle or the basis of a tariff for revenue, and revenue only.

In 1925 there was such a tremendous reaction throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion—I refer particularly to British Columbia, Ontario and the eastern provinces—against that pronouncement that he broached an entirely different policy to the country. We have his own statement of the grounds on which he appealed to the governor general for a dissolution in December last. We have his pronouncement made at Richmond Hill, where he said that his policy was that of appointing a tariff advisory board so that no manufacturer need feel afraid of sudden reductions in duty until he had had a full opportunity to have his case investigated by the proposed board. He declared then:

> I believe the people should be given an opportunity to pronounce upon a policy as far-reaching as that which is involved in this method of dealing with the tariff and other problems of taxation. This is another reason why I feel the time of general election should not be postponed.

You have all read in this House the pronouncement which he made in Oshawa on October 19, when he declared:

> There must be great care and caution used in adjusting the tariff to safeguard the industries of the Dominion. The only way to handle the matter of tariff is that a board of advisers, containing officers of the different departments of government, gather information that will be of service to the government in determining a tariff policy. In our opinion this is the only fair and just way to deal with the question.

We returned to Ottawa last January, convened by His Excellency as members of this House. There was very considerable anxiety on the part of the leader of the government on meeting the House as to whether he would be able to secure the support of a majority of the members, his party representing only 101 votes and the Conservatives representing 116 votes. He again approached His Excellency and through him made an address to this House dealing particularly with tariff issues. He knew, just as well as I and other members of this House know, that there are a number of hon. members representing the same province which I have the honour to represent who in their public and private utterances freely and frankly declare that they are in favour of adequate protection for the industries of this country. While he was angling—if that is the proper term to use—for the support of the Progressives of the west, he was anxious to retain the support of the members on his side of the House representing Quebec constituencies where important industries are employing large numbers of men and need a safeguarding tariff for their protection. Therefore the right hon. leader of the government came to this House and through the address from His Excellency the Governor General made a solemn pledge to the House and to the country that changes in the tariff would only be made after the fullest examination of their bearing upon primary and manufacturing industries. That pledge gave some assurance to those people whose money was invested in industry, and to those who were employed in industry, that their interests would not be suddenly dealt with. But it became necessary, because of my hon. friends to my left and the leader of the Progressive party, who possesses the entire political authority of this country with no political responsibility except to his own constituents, that a blow should be launched at the automobile or motor power industry of this country. The right hon. Prime Minister had no alternative but to bow the knee to Baal and repudiate every solemn pledge he had given to this country through the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. FORKE: Might I be allowed to ask the hon. member what proof he has for his last statement?

Mr. CAHAN: Does my hon. friend deny that he and his friends demanded it?

Mr. FORKE: My hon. friend is like a Scotchman, who tries to answer one question by asking another.

Mr. CAHAN: I have some Scotch blood, and that is the only way I can deal with a Scotsman. I think that condition is pretty well understood in this House and in the country; the actual conditions disclose that the right hon. Prime Minister dare not introduce a single measure that has not first been reviewed by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). Further than that, he dare not introduce a simple resolution until the whip of the Progressive party or some other prominent member has been interrogated as to whether or not the Progressives will support it.

Mr. EVANS: Very good.

Mr. CAHAN: I am glad my hon. friend admits it. It is recognized by the whole country, and by my hon. friends also. But that is destruction, that is an end to responsible self-government in Canada. It is impossible for the leader of a government to give any pledges to the country or to bind his honour with respect to any proposed programme, because he knows that he is utterly unable to carry it out unless those few gentlemen at my left subsequently endorse it.

We have a clear cut distinction between the tariff and fiscal policies of the right hon. Prime Minister and those of the Conservative party. It is discussed by the members of the House, and clearly recognized, that all measures which have been introduced by the government during the present session and all the changes proposed in the tariff or in taxation are for the purpose of binding to the support of the Liberal leader and the Liberal government those who are not fully convinced of the wisdom of his general policy, and those who are not prepared to give him support on general political grounds. The result has been to undermine public confidence in the government from one end of this country to the other. There are many men who are not so closely interested in the tariff as to care, individually, as to whether a protective policy or a free trade policy is best. But they are suddenly discovering that stability of tariff and stability of commercial and industrial conditions affect tens of thousands of men who thought they were not interested in the tariff, and that they were not effected by it.

It must be admitted that our production is decreasing. I have statistics galore which show that during the last five years we have been ceasing to produce those commodities manufactured by the industries of Canada; year by year as we produce less we import from abroad those commodities manufactured elsewhere which are taking the place of commodities formerly manufactured in Canada. If hon. gentlemen will examine the trade returns for last year or for the previous year they will find that of approximately one billion dollars of imports brought into this country, five hundred million dollars represent commodities which could be produced in Canada by Canadian labour, Canadian capital and Canadian machinery. This would and could give employment to at least a quarter of a million people in addition to those already employed, giving sustenance and a livelihood to at least a million more Canadians than we have in this country at present. In other words, if we had what the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) referred to the other evening, a tariff adequate to our needs, we could bring back the half million people who in the last five or six years have gone away, and we could bring into this country and employ at a rate of wages corresponding to that prevailing in the United States and higher than that in England or in continental Europe, workmen and their families numbering five hundred thousand more.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that we never can build up this country; we never can develop it—except for wheat growing—unless we safeguard industry so as to produce in this country those commodities now imported, carrying to the final processes of manufacture the raw materials and other commodities which enter into our factories as raw materials. We must develop all along the line. It is utterly ridiculous to say that you can place this country in a sound and prosperous financial, commercial and industrial condition simply by bringing in farmers from England or somewhere else to grow wheat on the western prairies. Grow wheat? Yes; let us give every possible inducement to the growing of wheat, but let us not forget that if we are to have a general expansion of trade and business; if we are to increase our population to enable us to sustain and pay off our national debt and to reduce the individual burden of taxation, we need a million people, and a million people cannot find places on western farms for at least ten years to come. We now purchase commodities from abroad, thus giving employment to foreign labour. We bring them into this country and pay for them by the raw products of Canada which we send abroad, thus exhausting the natural resources of the Dominion for that purpose. If we reverse that policy and manufacture at home we can place this country in a position of prosperity unequalled by any other country on the face of the globe. Because we have still in Canada the natural resources, at present unexhausted, which are the very foundations of industry and which will enable us, if we decide to manufacture our own commodities in Canada, to bring them, through the highest processes of manufacture, to a completed state.

Now there is a clear distinction to be noted. I have talked to some of my Progressive friends in this House. I have talked to many of my Liberal friends from the province of Saskatchewan. I am attracted by their complete sincerity in dealing with this trade question, and I think that they realize that many of us on this side of the House are equally sincere. But I wish to say to them that our position is this: The policy of this government, which, to use their terms, is to develop primary industries and to export primary or raw products to foreign countries for the purchase abroad of manufacturing commodities, will show, as it has shown last year, an enormous expansion of export and import trade; but every dollar that we send out for the purchase of commodities abroad which we could produce in this country represents one dollar of value which, if put into circulation in Canada to employ labour and to manufacture commodities here, would be worth five times as much or five dollars, in the domestic trade of this country. Now such a policy—

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): How are you going to sell your goods if you are not prepared to buy goods? Will the hon. gentleman explain that to the House?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: The only goods that we want to sell abroad—and it will be a diminishing quantity as the years go by—are the products of the wheat fields in the northwest. For all other products we can, by providing a million more people, find an adequate market in this country.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Why not eat the wheat too?

Mr. CAHAN: Because the wheat is produced in such quantities that we cannot at present consume it in this country. Perhaps it is a fortunate thing that we cannot, because no matter how much we produce in this country we must have a certain amount of foreign trade, and we must be in a position to purchase.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I thought my hon. friend would say that.

Mr. CAHAN: We need the wheat in order to purchase abroad such raw products as we require in Canada which are not produced here. But every dollar that we send abroad unnecessarily—not for the purpose of purchasing cotton, tin, or certain other raw products which we do not find in this country, but to purchase manufactured commodities—is detrimental to the highest well being and welfare of the whole industrial classes of this country.

Mr. EULER: Is the hon. gentleman advocating that we should not export manufactured products?

Mr. CAHAN: Well, after we have supplied our own country to its limit there may be a certain surplus of production which we could possibly afford to send abroad. But the object and purpose of the present government is to neglect, to undermine and to destroy the industrial activities of the eastern provinces of Canada, and to use the surplus products of the west for the purchase of manufactured products abroad, which are being brought in month by month and year by year to take the place of commodities previously manufactured at home, thus driving our own people out of employment and giving work to the people of central Europe and other countries.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): You advocate a tariff sufficiently high to prevent the importation of manufactured goods of a class that we produce in this country?

Mr. CAHAN: I am going to expound my theory in a moment, and I think that exposition will fully answer my hon. friend. If he does not think so and will repeat his question at the close of my speech I will endeavour to answer him. I say we ought to give every encouragement and assistance to the production of wheat and other grains of the middle west. Do not misunderstand me with respect to that. I say that at the same time we ought not to neglect and discourage, we ought not to discriminate against and destroy, the industrial life of these eastern provinces and of the province of British Columbia. We of the Conservative party, I think, should be prepared to co-operate in giving essential assistance and supervision to the incoming immigrants in the west who are now being located chiefly on these western farms. We should be willing to assist in every way in increasing the supply of farm labour until that supply is fully met; we should assist in every reasonable measure to consolidate settlement in the western railway belt, to ensure reasonable freight rates for the transportation of surplus products of grain from the west to the seaboard—either east or west—and even assist it in its transportation overseas. But the farmers of this country are not the only body who contribute by their labour to the productive activities of this country, and my contention is, because it is my sincere belief, that the men who produced $465,000,000 in 1923 and $640,000,000 in 1920 of the products of iron and steel are adding just as much, dollar for dollar, to the wealth, the prosperity and the wellbeing of Canada as the workmen of the west who produced $640,000,000 worth of wheat.

Mr. FORKE: I suppose the hon. gentleman has paid particular attention to the conditions of agriculture in the United States. Has he any explanation to give as to why agriculture in the United States finds itself in the position it is in to-day?

Mr. SPENCER: With a high tariff, too.

Mr. CAHAN: I will tell my hon. friend one reason for the conditions in agriculture in the United States, especially in the grain trade.

Mr. FORKE: My hon. friend is doubtless aware of the Capper Bill.

Mr. CAHAN: I sat the other night by a member of the Senate of the United States, the very able and representative member of one of the western states, and he said, speaking of the relative situation and the condition of the farmers in the western United States as compared with the farmers in our own northwest, that we had conceded to the Canadian farmer reduced freight rates, reduced cost of transportation, which placed him in the most enviable position of any farmers in any country of the world to-day. That was his view; I do not profess personally to know sufficient about it.

I quoted the other day the sworn evidence given before the railway commission as to the cost of carrying wheat. I will not repeat, but I am waiting, as my hon. friend doubtless is, with considerable anxiety the production in this Houses of the actual figures to show whether or not that wheat is bearing the cost of its transportation to Atlantic ports.

I am convinced also that my Progressive friends from Alberta and Saskatchewan must and do recognize that their position is exceptional in this country. Theirs is a branch of farming carried on under special conditions, requiring special encouragement, to be made prosperous by special forms of legislation and co-operation in government administration. So far as I am concerned, and so far as most intelligent people whom I represent in the city of Montreal are concerned, I believe they are prepared in every reasonable and effective way to give what assistance they possibly can. I know that some hon. gentlemen have referred to me as representing St. James street. Now St. James street is not in my constituency.

Mr. EVANS: Will the hon. member explain what special legislation and what special encouragement the western farmer from Saskatchewan and Alberta has received?

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. member will look at the legislative programme of this government he will find that it is designed for that purpose. Whether or not it will be effective in achieving that purpose I cannot say.

Mr. EVANS: Will the hon. member tell us what it is?

Mr. CAHAN: In the first place, it is proposed that we should reduce, to the extent—suggested by those who have made a careful estimate—of $50,000,000, the mortgages outstanding on a certain body of farmers in the west called the soldier settlers.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the soldier settler not also located in the east?

Mr. CAHAN: Very few indeed.

Mr. SPENCER: Are they not a federal responsibility?

Mr. CAHAN: No, I do not understand so. However, I am getting off my subject. The large appropriation which has been made for soldier settlers was not directly and ostensibly for the purpose of settling them because they were soldiers. I understand the country was taking advantage of the fact that a large number of Canadians were willing to go on the land, and some preference was given to them rather than to foreign settlers.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Is the hon. member objecting to that?

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. CAHAN: I told the hon. member I would answer his question when I got to the end of my discourse. I am convinced that, as they enter more and more upon diversified farming in the west—

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Do not tell us how to farm.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not telling my hon. friends how to farm; I am not even suggesting it. But all the wisdom of the world is not concentrated in western constituencies. I have great respect for the hon. member who interrupted me, because I realize that he knows more about farming than I can ever hope to know. But I can state the grounds of the faith and the confidence that is in me, and I say that when the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) will undertake, in a duly protected market, to raise wool, for instance—

Mr. FORKE: I do raise wool.

Mr. CAHAN: And sheep and lambs—

Mr. FORKE: I raise them.

Mr. CAHAN: And sell them in the market

Mr. FORKE: Yes, I do that right along.

Mr. CAHAN: When my hon. friend undertakes to raise these products in a properly safeguarded market he will increase his income ten times what it is to-day, and that trade would be far more profitable to him than all the wheat and grain grown on his farm.

Mr. ROBB: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, and I know what it is before the hon. minister asks it.

Mr. ROBB: Would you put a duty on wool?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, certainly I would put a duty on wool. My hon. friend has asked that question time and again in this House, as if he were questioning some ignorant class of scholars who did not understand the basis of that industry, and trying to make them think they dare not place a duty on wool. I would put a duty on wool and assist every farmer who is raising sheep and lambs. I would produce wool in this country as far as it could be consumed by our factories, and make Canada deal independently of every foreign country as far as possible. I think this country in its wisdom will soon find it is unprofitable to send out its wool in car loads for manufacture in other countries into clothing, to be shipped back in bales and parcels in finished form to keep us warm in winter. The sooner we produce within our own boundaries every commodity which is natural to the country, and manufacture it here in all its processes, the sooner we shall enjoy industrial activity and commercial prosperity such as has not been known in this country during the last twenty-five or thirty years.

For my part I say—and I say it clearly—that I do not believe the industrial prosperity of Canada can be maintained by a government which is not prepared to challenge every hostile tariff which it finds opposed to the admission of its own products. It is absolutely necessary that we should pursue a policy of tariff stability so that Canadian industry will know exactly where it stands and not be subject to these interminable changes of tariff such as hon. gentlemen opposite have introduced within the last five years, changes which have only one result, namely to destroy our manufacturing industries, send people out of the country, and, as I said before, undermine the entire confidence of those who have money to invest in our own undertakings.

Situated as we are in close proximity to the United States, it is absolutely necessary that we should take conditions which prevail there into consideration in dealing with the question of tariffs. I do not wish to discuss at length this automobile question. I have read every document which I have received through the mail from those who advocate a lowering of the duty and also from those who advocate the retention of the duty I have read the addresses of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House dealing with the matter. I am accustomed to deal with facts and figures; I am accustomed to deal with statements of account, and I say that I am not yet able to form an opinion as to whether there is any just cause for reducing the tariff on automobiles a single one per cent. I do not believe there is a gentleman on the opposite side of the House who really knows all the facts.

I find that located within the limits of the city of Montreal, a place where I did not imagine any person was interested in the production of automobiles—I thought that was confined to Ontario and to a few towns in Ontario—there are twenty-eight establishments which have put before me their claim that the automobile industry should not be prejudiced or destroyed because a large proportion of the products of these various concerns find their way ultimately into finished automobiles. The matter has equally broad ramifications throughout the entire length and breadth of the country, and I repeat, hon. gentlemen are pledged, before they make such a reduction, to have a thorough public investigation before their tariff commission.

I quite agree that any industry which is protected and safe-guarded by public legislation of any kind, by tariff legislation or otherwise, becomes to that extent quasi-public in its nature and it assumes special obligations to the public as long as it enjoys that safeguarding provision or protection. It continues in many cases to be privately-owned and privately-managed, but it becomes subject to certain limitations arising from the equally fundamental rights of those to whose well-being its products contribute. It exists and it must exist as a profit-making enterprise; otherwise it cannot exist under our modern industrial conditions because unless it yields a profit it will not continue to function in this country. But the public has the essential right to receive from that enterprise or industry the most effective service possible at prices which, providing a stable and certain profit for the investor, will nevertheless stimulate home consumption and tend to improve the general standards of living in this country in which its products find their market. Such an industry should be in a position and should be required by the public and the government to take advantage of all improvements in art and science in order to extend its operations as reasonably required and in order to produce commodities of the best quality at prices commensurate with those which are paid in other countries operating under similar conditions.

All this requires ample funds and credits and that no industry can obtain if it is to be the victim of rapidly changing tariffs and values which are the bane of all manufacturing industries. Therefore this country owes, I think, due protection to its industries, but no industry has the right to use the public protection which it receives through the tariff or otherwise for the purpose of profiteering at the expense of our domestic consumers.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): What did Mr. Ford have to say on that very thing the other day?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Hon. members do not like to hear that.

Mr. CAHAN: I will deal with Mr. Ford in a moment, but I want to lay down the general conditions as they appear to me. I am speaking simply for myself and giving my own view. Therefore it has been admitted by successive leaders of successive governments of this country that if the stability of an industry is threatened it has paramount right to a full inquiry before some independent or semi-independent tribunal before final judgment and condemnation is passed upon it. Such full inquiry, such independent investigation has never been accorded to the automobile industry of this country.

The tariff changes which have been proposed are admitted by the Minister of Finance to be due to public sentiment and not to a public inquiry into the fundamental conditions surrounding the industry. If public sentiment is to prevail in a country such as this in preference to a judicial or quasi-judicial inquiry, there is no innocent man who would be kept out of the penitentiary. There is no place in Canada for public sentiment which is another word for individual or general prejudice. You must deal fairly with these men whom you have invited to come into this country, and establish factories here.

In case profiteering is established, I wish to repeat what I stated the other day that in my opinion a reduction in the tariff is not the efficient and advantageous way of dealing with the problem. The removal of the protective principle, whether that principle is embodied in a tariff or other legislation, serves only to destroy the domestic industry and to transfer to foreign competing countries the employment and the profits which should be retained by Canadian labour and Canadian investment. It sends our expert workmen out of the country to obtain employment. It ruthlessly destroys the capital invested in those industries. It paralyzes the home industry, renders thousands of our people homeless, causes the abandonment of our towns and villages, and the destruction of civic life and property. It is burning down the house to cook the pig. It is absolutely essential for the well-being of this country that the government should devise other ways and means for preventing profiteering. I am convinced that on the part of 90 per cent of our industrial establishments there is no profiteering, and if there is profiteering among the other 10 per cent, then it is the duty of the government to devise other ways and means of defeating the profiteer than by destroying the town and village life in the places where such industry is conducted.

Mr. POWER: What means would the hon. gentleman take?

Mr. CAHAN: I made a suggestion to the House the other day, that where a company was found upon examination to be profiteering there should be immediately imposed upon it an excise or a business tax which would render it impossible for that company to make a larger profit than might be considered reasonable.

Mr. POWER: That is a matter of appreciation, is it not?

Mr. CAHAN: It always is a matter of appreciation. Now hon. gentlemen refer to the case of Mr. Ford. They say that from an original investment of $125,000 or thereabouts his company has now a capital of some $6,000,000 representing assets of between $8,000,000 and $9,000 000, bringing in a profit of $6,000,000 annually. I think that, in round figures, that is their contention.

What disadvantage would it be to Mr. Ford to remove the tariff on automobiles? Why, the removal of the tariff is the very thing which Mr. Ford and his associates are anxious to obtain, for tariff removal would enable them, by increasing their production in the American factories by five per cent, to supply all the requirements of Canada for Ford automobiles annually at any price that Mr. Ford might be prepared to fix. There may be a reduction in the price of automobiles, because a number of dealers have automobiles on hand, which, as a matter of fact, they are advertising at lower rates in order to get rid of them. But while I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet I venture to suggest that within a year American factories will be supplying these same automobiles to the Canadian consumer at relatively higher prices than they are now supplied by Canadian factories. Furthermore, I have not seen any statistics—although I have tried to read them all and examine them fairly—which indicate that any other factory than the Ford has been making an undue profit out of the automobile industry in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: That is due to organization.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, but it is due as well to patents and a thousand other things. It is due chiefly to the fact that Mr. Ford controls a market in the United States of 110,000,000 which he is supplying with 2,000,000 cars of a standard size every year. In addition to that he has the advantages of mass production, so that he can undersell any competitor or raise or lower his price as he sees fit. But if the Canadian government were to impose a proper excise tax upon the Ford company in this country it would stop the profiteering complained of. I would impose such a tax as would prevent that $6,000 000 from reaching the pockets of Henry Ford. I would put on such a business tax as would make it unprofitable for him to charge the consumers of this country a price higher than would yield him a reasonable profit.

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. member wish to return to the business profits tax?

Mr. CAHAN: We have a business profits tax in this country at present. Whether we might amend that provision or levy a special excise tax I am not suggesting at the moment.

Mr. POWER: A tax based on profits.

Mr. CAHAN: Based on undue profits. I would take away the extravagant profits from industrial concerns which make use of the Canadian tariff for the purposes of profiteering. I would discharge my public duty to the consumers of Canada by thus dealing with the ten per cent or five per cent of the factories that make that improper use of our tariff. We are, I believe, sufficiently intelligent in this country to devise ways and means of preventing profiteering to any undue extent, and certainly we can devise means of limiting the profits of a company such as the Ford.

Mr. POWER: The moment we applied any such excise tax, does the hon. member not think that we should hear a wail from certain towns and villages in which these concerns were situated to the effect that we were putting them out of business?

Mr. CAHAN: Possibly, but I am not dealing with wails of that kind.

Mr. POWER: What have you been doing all evening?

Mr. CAHAN: That is a fair retort, although I think it is a discourteous one. However, I accept it as courteous.

Mr. POWER: I am sorry if the hon. member thinks it was otherwise.

Mr. CAHAN: We are living in proximity to the United States and for years we have been endeavouring, Liberal governments as well as Conservative, to induce large producing manufacturing industries across the border to come into Canada and establish branch factories here. They have come in and given employment to thousands and tens of thousands of our people; new towns have been built up; new municipalities and cities have been established with all the various forms of municipal and civic life. Now we find one man profiteering unduly, and the only remedy that the Minister of Finance can suggest is to reduce quite materially the tariff which safeguards that industry. If carried to its logical conclusion that tariff reduction will result in the destruction of the automobile industry in this country, enabling the parent Ford industry in the United States to supply all its products to this country at prices which Mr. Ford may choose to fix.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am interested to know how my hon. friend arrives at the conclusion that interference with the tariff here will affect the fixation of prices in the United States.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with the Ford Company, which is charged with undue profiteering. Mr. Henry Ford can fix prices in Canada just as he sees fit if the tariff is removed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Why should the tariff have any influence on the fixation of his prices either up or down on the American side? I am referring to the American prices.

Mr. CAHAN: Hon. gentlemen have said that allowing for the extra sales tax and for the fact that every man in this country pays 25 per cent of his entire income from productive activities to the federal, provincial and municipal governments by way of taxation—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I take issue with the hon. member on that point. However, that is not what I am getting at. How does my hon. friend argue that our interference with the tariff can affect prices in the United States?

Mr. CAHAN: Hon. gentlemen are saying that, making allowance for everything in his favour, Mr. Ford is profiteering and charging an unreasonable price for his automobiles manufactured in Canada. You meet that by reducing the tariff. I say that has certain disadvantages to this country which I have enumerated, such as lack of employment and the transferring to the United States of the manufacture of the Ford car. Hon. gentlemen may laugh—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am laughing because that is not an answer to the question I asked my hon. friend. I am interested in his argument that the lowering of the tariff would permit Henry Ford and other American motor manufacturers to fix whatever prices suited them. I want to know what particular effect the tariff would have on the price of the car manufactured in the United States.

Mr. CAHAN: Either I am very stupid or the hon. minister is not stating his case very clearly. I do not say that it has any effect upon the price at which the car can be manufactured in the United States; but Henry Ford can fix any price he likes, either in the United States or Canada, his company will manufacture the car in the future in the United States, possibly assembling the parts in Canada, and he will fix the price in Canada within any reasonable limit that he sees fit.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the Canadian price will be greater than the American price? If so, why?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know, but I say Henry Ford has it entirely in his hands to fix the price.

Mr. KAISER: What did the Belgians do in the matter of glass?

Mr. CAHAN: I have a dozen such cases before me if it were necessary to go into them, but I will take only one. Before the war Germany was producing dyes and selling them in the United States at certain prices per pound. The United States put up a tariff and thereby encouraged the domestic manufacture of dyes. The Germans thereupon lowered their price to such a level that it enabled them to overcome the American tariff and destroy the American dye factories. As soon as that was done they not only raised their price to the old level but added a fraction to make up for the profits they had lost while the American factories were functioning. Take any similar case and you will find it so.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the American manufacturers would demand a greater price from Canadians than from their own people?

Mr. CAHAN: I have not the facts, but I have from as trustworthy authority as that of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to many of the statements they made about the Ford car that the Ford company does discriminate sometimes as between different cities and districts. Naturally, you say, cost of transportation may account for this, but I believe there is that discrimination. And if you take down the tariff I can see no reason why, so far as the Ford car is concerned, the price should not be fixed in Canada at any figure Henry Ford sees fit to demand.

Mr. POWER: Cannot we apply the hon. gentleman's business tax in that case?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not see how you could.

Mr. POWER: Apply the sales tax here.

Mr. CLARK: Then you would pay it.

Mr. POWER: You would pay it, anyway.

Mr. CAHAN: Now, my suggestion is that we should not admit we are so wanting in intelligence as not to be able to devise ways and means for putting an end to profiteering without burning down our industrial establishments.

As it is nearing eleven o'clock and I wish to conclude, let me say I regard it as absolutely necessary for the proper development of our industrial life that we should have a wise and vigorous government policy that persists in the single aim, year in and year out, through one administration after the other, no matter what political party may command a majority in this House—the single aim of maintaining a stable tariff which is not subject to sudden change for the purpose of helping the friends of one political party or of injuring the friends of another political party; a policy which is not subject to change except after due inquiry and careful consideration and a report to the government and to this House in justification of the change proposed. The changes which have been made under present conditions have unsettled the whole country. Gentlemen opposite may smile and think they are proposing something which is accepted generally from one end of the country to the other. That is not so. The cheerful smile which pervaded their countenances on the day the Minister of Finance announced his budget has entirely disappeared—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): When?

Mr. CAHAN: From the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.
An hon. MEMBER: Not from these faces.

Mr. CAHAN: Furthermore, it has created throughout the country such lack of faith in the pledged word of honour of hon. gentlemen opposite, that if they went to the country tomorrow or a week hence, so long as the memory of that breach of faith is in the minds of the electorate, they could not succeed in retaining two-thirds of the support which they now have in this House.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the various speeches on the budget it would almost appear that there was nothing further to be said, but every hon. member seems to be able to raise something new. I intend for a few minutes to speak in the hope that I may be able to disabuse the minds of some hon. gentlemen of the wrong impressions that have been conveyed to them.

Let me say, though, that I have no doubt hon. members on both sides of the House are anxious only to assist in legislation that will be in the interests of Canada as a whole. We cannot all see things alike, and we are all prone to take a different view of the same set of facts. But we do hope that a thorough discussion of any subject may enable us to arrive at a conclusion that will give us a proper solution of our difficulties. We are somewhat prone to stress the importance of our own constituency or our own province, but I think we all realize that no matter what part of Canada we come from we all belong to this great Dominion and must assist in legislation which is in the interests of the country as a whole.

It must be a matter of congratulation to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb)—indeed, to everyone—to see that we are at last emerging to some degree from the clouds of debt with which we have been surrounded. We know the Great war entailed a tremendous expense, and that we had to assume tremendous obligations after the war during the period of reconstruction. An enormous debt was then piled up, and it is now our duty to see that debt liquidated. Our favourable position, as announced by the Minister of Finance in his budget address, is to no small extent resultant from the bounteous crops with which we have been favoured for the past two years, but our bounteous harvests are not sufficient without other means by which use can be made of them. The Minister of Finance was able to announce that Canada's favourable financial position is due in part to the trade treaties into which Canada has entered. Those treaties, together with the wonderful harvests, have enabled us to bring forward the budget which was presented the other day.

Since this session opened I have at times been alarmed by the statements made from opposition benches as to the dire straits in which Canada found itself. During the early days of the session particularly, we were almost convinced that we were on the verge of bankruptcy; from what various hon. members opposite said we might almost have thought our own conclusions wrong. We had been led to believe that Canada was in a fairly prosperous position, judging from newspaper reports, statements of financial institutions, market reports of various kinds and agricultural conditions generally. Imagine then, how we looked on the situation when we heard what hon. members had to say in this House. We were also surprised to learn, coming from a province which has been developing its dairy industry, that the dairy and poultry industries were being destroyed by the Australian treaty; we could scarcely believe it. I believe that suggestion has been dissipated by the speeches since made in this House, and I do not intend to deal with that question. We were also surprised to learn, from the speeches of hon. members opposite, that there was no legislative programme in favour of the farmers of Canada; now we hear that the legislative programme is all in favour of the farmers of western Canada.

The Speech from the Throne held out hopes of a legislative programme in the interests of Canada from shore to shore. It is true that Maritime conditions were such as to make it a difficult matter for any government to bring down legislation which would satisfy the people of the Maritimes. I have listened to the speeches in this House dealing with Maritime rights, and I must confess that I do not yet know definitely just what Maritime rights are, nor do I know what legislation the Maritime righters require in order to have their claims satisfied. We are told of promises made when the Maritime provinces entered confederation; those promises, so far as I know, have been fulfilled. Then we are told of understandings reached between various parts of Canada at that time, and judging from some of the speeches there were some such understandings. If it is possible for the people of Canada to carry out not only those promises but the understandings as well, that should be done, but I believe we will know what those understandings and rights are through the commission appointed to inquire into this question. Surely that commission can bring recommendations to this House which will result in legislation to relieve, to some extent at all events, the people of the Maritimes.

It is claimed that immediate steps should be taken to encourage and foster the coal industry in the Maritimes. We expect the commission to go into that question and make recommendations, but I do not know whether the claims made for the Maritimes would be permanent solution of those difficulties. I hardly know whether sufficient stress has been placed on the condition of the coal industry, not only in the Maritimes but throughout the world.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Would the hon. gentleman allow a question? Would he, as one of the representatives of western Canada, be in favour of giving the Maritime provinces freight rates on a parity with those fixed under the Crowsnest pass agreement and subsequent legislation?

Mr. BOTHWELL: If the Maritime provinces were placed in the same position as western Canada in connection with their shipments, I would be quite willing to concede them the same freight rates. I believe, however, that there is possibly a considerable difference, so far as shipments are concerned, between the Maritimes and western Canada. I think it would be the duty of this commission to inquire into this very matter.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would like to ask what difference there is. Is it not a question of getting the products to the markets?

Mr. BOTHWELL: There is a difference, as I see it. In spite of the quotations and citations made in this House to show that the rates on shipments of western grain to the east occasion a loss to the railways, I believe—and in fact we know—that when great shipments of grain are moving east the railways are making their big profits, and I believe the grain coming from western Canada pays its way and leaves a reasonable return to the railways. If that commission finds, in studying Maritime conditions, that the freight rates from the Maritimes to central Canada should be reduced, I would say they should be reduced, and I believe there are two commissions inquiring into that matter at present.

I was speaking of the coal industry in Nova Scotia and the changing world conditions so far as coal is concerned. From the Daily Mail Year Book of 1926 I take the following statement, made by F. H. Rose, member of parliament for Aberdeen. He says:

> It is difficult to conceive a more serious and thought-compelling prospect for a great industrial nation, than the chronic decline in one of its major activities and this we have to face and deal with. The facts are clear enough. Before the war, unemployment in the sense that it now exists was an unknown element in colliery work. Men were temporarily out of work through defects in their working places, odd individuals were employed for various personal reasons, but a mass of colliers without employers and without jobs was unknown. To-day there must be at least as many chronically unemployed as shown in the table appended.

I will not read the table. He goes on to say:

> It is not without serious thought that I submit the proposition that the coal trade is declining, and it will continue to decline as years go on, until it ceases to be major industry—here and elsewhere in the world. For the phenomena of a current transition are apparent all over the world. The rapid development of the motorship and the motor tractor are not entirely accountable for the conditions. The use of hydro-electricity by Italy and the Scandinavian nations has closed or is closing our middle coal markets (our distant markets were never very important). Our iron and steel manufactures are steadily passing from coke to electricity and their processes. Every effort of the modern scientist and inventor is directed now to economizing coal and the production of cheaper and cleaner and vastly more effective agencies for raising power, light and heat.
> The effect of these innovations bears so heavily upon the industrial and social life of our people that an industrial writer may well be excused for emphasizing it. No reflective person can avoid the inevitable implications which arise from its consideration and the simple fact is that the world is using less coal to-day than it used yesterday and will be using less to-morrow than to-day. It is superfluous to stress the importance to our nation of a declining industry or its bearing upon the questions of unemployment and our social life.

Now, just what the situation is in the Maritimes so far as the coal industry is concerned, having regard to that portion of Mr. Rose's address which I have read, I do not know, but I am prepared to say,—and I believe I am speaking for western members generally when I make the statement—that when a commission brings in a report setting out the remedies, as they see them, for the situation in the Maritimes, I believe that every western member will be prepared to support legislation that will ameliorate those conditions.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: May I ask the hon. gentleman this question: If a commission investigating, for example, the coal industry in Nova Scotia should report back that the thing needed is increased protection, would the hon. gentleman be prepared to support that recommendation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I would not want to answer that question just in the bald way in which it was put, but I would say this: So far as we in the west are concerned the protection on coal that is asked for by the Besco Bulletin will not affect us. There is no reason that I can see why I would not support protection of that kind if it was going to benefit the Maritimes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear. Will the hon. gentleman permit another question? He said he would support the finding of the commission as respects Maritime railway rates. He also said that the matter was before two commissions. If the two commissions report differently, which one will he support?

Mr. BOTHWELL: If my information is correct, the Board of Railway Commissioners are studying the question of freight rates. That will be a matter, as I understand it, of finding out whether the rates should be lowered or increased. That is the purpose so far as the railways are concerned. The other commission appointed to inquire into Maritime rights will be supposed to bring in some recommendation that will provide a solution of the difficulties in the Maritimes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Including railway rates. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman this question: If they differ in their reports, which one will he support?

Mr. BOTHWELL: I think my right hon. friend is a lawyer. He must know that I am not able to say, before reading the report, which one I should be prepared to follow. You cannot come to a conclusion until you have before you the facts to base a conclusion upon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member told us he would follow the commission. I just wanted to know which one he referred to.

[Mr. Bothwell.]

Mr. BOTHWELL: I think the right hon. gentleman is mistaken when he states I said I would follow the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On railway rates, yes.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I stated—at least I intended so to state—and if I made a misstatement I will correct it now—that when that commission brings in a report—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Which one?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Either one—any commission which will give us a statement as to what should be done in order to remedy the conditions in the Maritimes—I believe the members from western Canada will be prepared to support legislation that will be in the interests of the Maritimes as shown by the report.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the question.

Mr. BOTHWELL: In addition to the coal industry there is the iron and steel industry in the Maritime provinces, and in this connection I have been much interested in reading the publication known as the Besco Bulletin. I have endeavoured by a study of that publication to find out, to some extent, what the trouble is in the Maritimes. I find from the issue of April 24th that they have four serious disappointments in the budget. They are as follows:

No. 1. Failure to adjust the specific duties on the basic forms of iron and steel so as to bring their ad valorem effect up to the general level of duties on other materials.

No. 2. Failure to correct the mistake made last year when the duty on bituminous coal was lowered three cents instead of being raised, and failure to make anthracite screenings dutiable at the same rate as soft coal with which it competes.

No. 3. Failure to take up the matter of dealing effectively with the importation of materials produced in countries whose currency is greatly depreciated, which was dropped in a moment of weakness last session, and which is now of greater urgency than it was a year ago.

No. 4. Persistent adherence to the pernicious policy of encouraging the importation of finished goods by lowering the duties, and of partly finished materials by refunding the duties specified in the customs tariff.

"Disappointment No. 2," dealing with the duty on bituminous coal, has to do with the very question which was raised by my hon. friend opposite a short time ago. That is one of the "disappointments", apparently, in so far as Besco is concerned, that we hope to have remedied through the commission on Maritime rights.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is omitting No. 1.

Mr. BOTHWELL: No, I have not omitted it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the commission recommends a higher duty on basic iron and steel, will the hon. member support it?

Mr. BOTHWELL: It may be necessary to have lower duties instead of higher.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to answer whether he will be prepared to support them if the report is in favour of higher duties?

Mr. BOTHWELL: I think I will answer my right hon. friend when I have seen the report made by the commission. Now so far as "disappointments" No. 1 and No. 4 are concerned, they can be dealt with in a general way together. They both refer, to some extent, to the same subject.

The other night the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) spent some time in quoting figures in connection with the iron and steel industry and endeavoured to show that we are importing a tremendous amount of goods that we should produce at home. From the manner in which he quoted these statistics he left the impression on the House that in the year 1925 we had imported a good deal more of these particular commodities than in any previous year which he mentioned. Now, I read from the same document that the hon. member for East Algoma quoted from. This is the summary of the trade of Canada for the twelve months' periods ending December 1923, 1924 and 1925. I am taking the figures in the order in which he gave them. He gave the figures for the year 1925, and started with plate glass. Our imports of plate glass in 1925 were just as he stated. The figures are:

Year	Importation	Amount
1923	Plate glass	$4,274,509
1924	Plate glass	3,318,790
1925	Plate glass	3,990,613

The next item was hats and caps. We did increase our importations there a little between 1923 and 1925—from $2,899,627 to $2,951,753. Then in boots and shoes we increased our importations from $1,472,407 in 1923 to $1,670,054 in 1925. Then pigs, ingots, and so on—coming down to our iron—we imported $2,450,605 worth in 1923 and $1,551,783 in 1925. Rolling mill products, 1923, $50,866,-319; 1925, $38,006,810. Then tubes, pipes and fittings, a reduction from $4,146,738 to $3,142,-701. Then in wires there was a reduction from $4,061,777 in 1923 to $2,648,403 in 1925. I might go through all these items which the hon. member mentioned. The figures are given on page 4 of the publication from which my hon. friend read, I refer only to those I have cited in order to show that while the hon. member endeavoured to convince us that our importations were increasing tremendously from year to year, the fact is that the importation of the particular commodities which he mentioned has been decreasing from year to year. Now that does not appear as if the reduction in the tariff has had the effect of ruining the iron and steel industry, or as if it were necessary for the government in its budget this year to bring in any legislation in order to meet what they call "disappointments" Nos. 1 and 4. We find the same result in the case of the importations and exportations of farm implements and other commodities, the figures in respect to which are all set out in that pamphlet prepared by the Bureau of Statistics.

Then "disappointment No. 3" was the alleged "failure to take up the matter of dealing effectively with the importation of materials produced in countries whose currency is greatly depreciated, which was dropped in a moment of weakness last session, and which is now of greater urgency than it was a year ago." In the same publication you can find what the importations were from these countries whose currency is depreciated; both imports and exports are given on page 2. The figures are as follows:

	Imports	Exports
Belgium—
1923..	$5,449,962	$13,328,248
1925..	6,502,702	22,219,453
Germany—
1923..	4,962,180	13,773,291
1925..	9,028,936	31,087,709

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): We did not have a treaty with Germany.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I am speaking in reference to "disappointment No. 3," as got out by Besco, dealing with a country with depreciated currency. If it is alleged that our trade with any country with depreciated currency has been affected by reason of a trade treaty, some one else can deal with that. The table continues:

	Imports	Exports
Russia—
1923..	$338,907	$ 132,909
1925..	2,730	14,316,002

In respect to other foreign countries—and some of the other countries must also have depreciated currency—we find the following figures:

Other foreign countries—	Imports	Exports
1923..	$24,679,703	$20,615,486
1925..	20,777,442	28,734,025

From these figures, in connection with both imports and exports, it does not appear that the depreciated currency of those countries has had any bad effect on the trade of Canada, or that we need any legislation to protect ourselves against the product of countries which have a depreciated currency.

I want to touch for a moment or two on the question of the tariff on automobiles. I think every member who has spoken on the budget has dealt with this subject. We have had deputations appear here and the matter has been presented in various ways from both sides of the House. The same question was before the House last year, and I notice that after the debate in the House a year ago the resolution was defeated by only nineteen votes. That would appear to me to be a pretty fair intimation to the automobile manufacturers in Canada that some legislation would be passed this session. Further than that, I think practically every newspaper in Canada has carried requests for months past in connection with the reduction in the tariff on automobiles. During the early days of this session a resolution by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) was placed on the order paper, showing that he intended to ask for a reduction of the duty on automobiles. We know too that a good deal of lobbying was being done around this House by the automobile interests and speeches of various kinds were made in this House in the interest of the automobile industry. It strikes me as most peculiar that if it is necessary that the automobile tariff should remain where it was, no single individual either in this House or in the lobby or anywhere else seems to be able to give us a concrete instance of any industry that would suffer by a reduction in the tariff if it were made. So far as I have been able to find out, no single concrete case has been put on record to show that any factory, whether having to do with parts or automobiles, would have to close its doors by reason of a change in the tariff. Surely if the experts that have been able to get out books such as we have received from the automobile industry knew that a reduction in the tariff was going to ruin their industry, they would have been able to give us manufacturing costs and facts showing that such a reduction could not safely be made.

But it has been left for Mr. Ford to make his statement that it is quite in order to bring about the reduction, and that statement has not been met by any other manufacturer in Canada so far as I have been able to gather. I presume every hon. member has received a copy of the book that has been got out by the Ford interests, because we have had it quoted at different times. It would appear from that book that the people of Canada have given the automobile manufacturers fairly good protection. Mr. Ford in the interview that was put on Hansard by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) stated that in his plant in Canada they use at least 85 per cent of Canadian material. He says in this book of his, and also in the interview that was read by the hon. member for Assiniboia, that the cost of manufacture is about equally divided between wages and material; that is, that wages and material cost about the same. This book of his says that wages paid out in 1925 amounted to $10,138,927. Eighty-five per cent of his product is procured in Canada. If he takes the 15 per cent from the United States, that would mean on his own figures that he would bring in approximately $1,520,838. His production cost, according to the same book on page 6, is given as $19,329,745, being spent for production material, building construction, machinery equipment, supplies, insurance, advertising and other services. He has the money bags appear at the bottom of the picture showing that the company pay to the government $2,962,234.

Mr. GOTT: Whom does my hon. friend mean by "he?"

Mr. BOTHWELL: I should have said the Ford Company instead of "he."

Mr. GOTT: I thought the hon. member meant Henry Ford.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That $2,962,334 is used to pay Dominion income tax, customs duties, sales tax on purchases, provincial and municipal taxes, Canadian Government Merchant Marine and Canadian National Railways—as shown in his own publication.

Mr. SPENCER: Would it not be more correct to say that the purchaser of the automobile pays those taxes?

Mr. BOTHWELL: I am coming to that. Those figures show that the cost of manufacturing in the Ford plant at Ford, Ontario, last year amounted to $33,951,844. He says that 47 per cent is exported. The sales amount to $25,714,166. The value of his product would be approximately $48,517,294, showing a surplus there of $14,565,450. How much of that goes in paying commissions and one thing or another I do not know, but from their own book there is apparently that amount of profit on an investment of $31,275,530.

The hon. member for Assiniboia read an interview with Henry Ford in connection with this matter. There is a little more of that conversation that I want to put on record. The interviewer continues:

"Mr. Ford," I began, "you have made two admissions that are very interesting. I wonder if you really wish them to be published?"

"You may write anything I have said," he answered. What are the things I've said?"

"You've admitted that tariff protection encourages indolence in manufacturing and that tariff reduction must produce greater efficiency and economy in your Canadian plant?" "That is true," he said. "What's the other?"

"You've admitted that Ford cars have been getting a higher price than necessary in Canada." "As part of the general tariff situation in Canada—Yes. It works that way with every commodity and under every tariff. Free trade and free competition are the only healthy conditions," he repeated.

"I would like to ask you about another point which disturbs us in Canada." "Go ahead," said Mr. Ford.

"There is some belief that tariff reduction may mean withdrawal of American branches in Canada and that all this business will now be placed in United States factories." "I don't know anything about the other fellows," said Mr. Ford briskly. "I only know about our business. It is not that way with us."

How Canadian Company Started

"Did you establish your plant in Canada because of the tariff?" "No, I didn't establish it at all. It happened this way. Mr. McGregor (referring to the late vice-president and general manager of the Ford Company of Canada) was running a buggy works over at Windsor. He came across the river to me one day, about twenty years or so ago, and said: 'Look here, my buggy business is going to pass. I'd like to make your cars in Canada.'

"I'd never seen him before but I liked his looks and said: 'All right, I'm interested in that sort of thing. Three months later McGregor opened the plant. I remember that conversation. We were standing in the alley back of our first plant over on Mack avenue. That's how the Canadian company started. I never thought anything about the tariff. I never have in starting a plant."

"What about Manchester?" I asked. "I started the plant in Manchester," said Mr. Ford, "to put industry into the country. Tariff had nothing to do with it. All our plants have been located to serve different localities, like the twenty or more we have in the United States. I would want to manufacture in Canada for the same reason,"

"And you believe the tariff is not a factor in locating in Canada" "It is not with me," replied Mr. Ford.

Mr. Ford was silent for a moment, thinking. "The stockholder," he said at last, "is the only person who may lose in the tariff reduction, and he's had enough anyway. We shouldn't worry about stockholders. They don't deserve profits; they don't earn."

Mr. GOTT: Is the hon. gentleman aware of the fact that in the same edition of the Border Cities Star from which he has just quoted, Mr. Henry Ford denied being president of the Ford Motor Works of Canada?

Mr. BOTHWELL: I do not care whether he is president of the Ford Motor Works or not. We know Ford is a manufacturer of automobiles; that he has been in this business since the Ford plants were started, and that he has an interest in the Ford plant in Ontario. I presume he can speak with authority as to how the plant there was established.

Mr. GOTT: It is remarkable that he should be president of an institution of this size and at the same time not be aware of the fact. I would discount his whole interview.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That is the second interview with Mr. Ford. If my hon. friend wants the name of the writer of the article I will give it to him.

Mr. GOTT: I have them all.

Mr. BOTHWELL: He can verify it if he likes. It is an article compiled by Charles Vining. It is probably only fair to state in connection with this Ford industry that it may be an exceptional kind of automobile plant. But the other plants that are manufacturing in Canada are making automobiles with wheels, rubber tires and equipment to some extent similar to that used in the making of Ford cars. There is of course a difference. There are a number of different cars made in Canada, and other plants may have to import certain parts. But if Henry Ford is correct, as we believe he is, in the statement that wages in Canada are no higher than they are in the United States, and we have the raw material in this country just as they have across the line, then if the other manufacturing concerns in Canada are not able to produce at a profit with the protection that is still afforded them after the reduction has been made, they must be poorly organized or poorly managed. There must be inefficiency somewhere. If the Ford manufacturing concern, getting at least 85 per cent of its raw material in Canada, is able to compete with the Ford companies in the United States, then the other automobile factories here should be able to do the same with a protective tariff of 20 per cent.

Mr. GOTT: Do you call the Ford an automobile?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Well, my hon. friend may live so near the border that he has some slang expression descriptive of it.

Now I want to touch for a moment on the reduction in income tax, and in dealing with this question I desire to read just a brief extract from an address delivered in England by the Right Hon. Lord Decies, D.S.O., director of the Income Taxpayers' Society. The address is reported in the Daily Mail Yearbook at page 20, and reads in part:

The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, in his biography of his father, Lord Randolph Churchill (also a Chancellor of the Exchequer) says: "He (Lord Randolph) desired especially to diminish those taxes which fell upon the lower middle class. He laboured to transfer the burdens, so far as possible, from comforts to luxuries, and from necessaries to pleasures. He applied much more closely than his predecessors that fundamental principle of democratic finance—the adjusting of taxation to the citzen's ability to pay." There can be no sort of doubt that at the moment the citizen is taxed beyond his ability to pay, and the most unfortunate of all and the most in need of urgent and substantial relief is the income tax payer.

It will be seen that Lord Decies refers in the first place to the extremely high income tax levied in England. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) is under the impression that the change in the income tax provisions is not in the interests of the Canadian people. He does not yet see why the man who derives his income from investments should be taxed. It is all right for the man who works for his living to pay taxes out of the money he earns but the man who gets his income from investments should not be taxed at all. That, I gather, is the view the hon. gentleman takes. Under the income tax law as it stood before, the man with an income of $10,000 would pay only $110, whereas he will have to pay now $290; and the man who worked for his $10,000 paid formerly $480 while under the present arrangement he will pay $290 also. In other words, they are both on the same basis. Surely that is fair. The man with an income derived from investments may have inherited it from his grandfather; he may never have helped to earn any part of it himself. With Canada requiring taxes in order to meet the tremendous burden of debt which we have to discharge it is therefore only right that such a man should contribute his fair share of taxation. He ought to be taxed to the same extent as the man who has to work for his living. It would appear to me that the change in income tax is placing the burden where it belongs, and it should meet with the approval of the great majority of the people.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said that the change would have the effect of stifling business inasmuch as people would not want to invest their money in corporations. Well, we might as well say that during the war Canadians should not have been patriotic enough to enlist but should all have gone over to the United States. We realize that we are Canadians and we must be patriotic to the country we live in, and I believe that the people who have investments in Canada are as loyal as those who have to work for wages or salary and are quite as willing to pay their fair share of taxation to keep the country going.

I intended to touch upon the railways, but as the hour is getting late I will refrain from doing so. However, I would point out that, in order now to take advantage of the British preference, shipments must be made through Canadian ports, and that should help to solve in part the difficulties of the Maritime provinces, and operate at the same time to the advantage of the railways. It is proposed that after January 1, 1927, the benefits of the British preferential tariff shall apply only to goods conveyed direct, without transhipment, into any sea or river port of Canada.

We have heard a good deal in this House as to the amount of Canadian grain going through American ports, and we hope that we shall be able to evolve some system whereby that grain may be shipped direct from Canada. But no one has referred to the amount of American grain that goes through Canadian ports. I have here Doings in Grain in Milwaukee, the official publication of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, showing the amount of American grain from Milwaukee that has gone through Canadian ports, and I find that last year the shipments totalled 3,712,066 bushels of wheat, corn, oats, barley and rye. I also obtained from the Statistical branch the amount of the United States grain generally going through our ports, with approximately the amount of money realized by the Dominion in handling that grain. In 1924-25 we handled 88,641,161 bushels of United States grain. From the handling of that grain we derived a revenue of approximately $7,761,636. Those figures are not exact, but they are as near as could be compiled without taking into account some short branch railway lines. Now we are deriving that revenue from American grain, and although our grain has gone through United States ports in different years, in 1924-25 111,000,000 bushels, approximately, 88,000,000 bushels of American grain has gone through our ports.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of the House the way in which the budget has been received by some of our newspapers. I have not dealt with the reduction in the rate of postage, the abolition of the receipt tax, and various other matters mentioned by the Minister of Finance, but these are incidentally referred to in some of the quotations that I now propose to place before the House. The Vancouver Province contained the following:

> The budget is a good one, businesslike, cheering and hopeful, and—what is not unimportant to the government—politically valuable. Mr. Robb is to be congratulated both upon the circumstances which have enabled him to make so satisfactory a statement and upon his courage in taking advantage of them.

I quote from the Vancouver Sun:

> Having proved to the people of Canada that its conception of government is the creation of prosperity among the people rather than the filling of government coffers, the Mackenzie King administration stands in a position to-day to embark on a programme of development that will raise this country to a new peak of affluence among the nations of the world.

The Regina Leader contained this comment:

Taken by and large, the budget of this year is very satisfactory. It appears to be well received both in the east and in the west. Comment of the British press bears out the claims of Hon. Mr. Robb, Minister of Finance, that Canada has entered upon a period of marked prosperity. It is evident that the minister's statement is contributing to a better feeling regarding Canada abroad as well as proving a stimulant to trade and industry at home.

The Swift Current Herald, an independent paper published in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, announced:

One can be reasonably assured that the budget speech by Hon. J. A. Robb announcing wholesale tax reductions will be hailed with general satisfaction throughout the length and breadth of Canada. Although the politically-steeped man on the street is apt to sniff and sagely inform the stove-league that the entire business is a political dodge and lifebelt for the government, the public can well afford to discount any thought of ulterior motives which might lurk in connection with the budget, and accept it for what it is worth.

A careful perusal of Hon. J. A. Robb's budget speech indicates that Canada is definitely on the upgrade of prosperity and beginning to experience a degree of financial stability paramountly welcome after the lean and trying years of reconstruction following the upheaval of business and general economic conditions brought about not only in Canada, but throughout the world, due to the Great war which shattered and wrecked both social and business structures.

The Herald winds up with these words:

While all countries of the world are groaning and writhing with the heavy burden of taxation, Canada now finds itself in the happy position of being enabled to make a wholesale reduction, one which tends to renew confidence in all classes of people comprising its population, and creates a business condition which is certain to reflect in a prosperity, which at one time seemed beyond hope and like searching for the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have concluded the remarks I intended to make, except those dealing with the railway situation. This subject however has already been covered to some extent by other speakers and will no doubt be considered by those who will follow me, and the hour is too late for me to enter upon it now. I thank you, Sir, and the House for the patient hearing you have given me.

On motion of Mr. Rogers the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Robb, the House adjourned at 11.58 p.m.

Tuesday, May 4, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 95, to incorporate the Red Lake and Northwestern Railway Company.—Mr. Heenan.

PEACE RIVER ELECTION

PETITION ASKING THAT RETURN OF MR. KENNEDY BE DECLARED VOID

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to ask whether the petition presented by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) with respect to the return of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) has been examined; I should like to draw attention to the fact that the matters to which it refers are before the courts under the Controverted Elections Act. This being the case I desire to raise a point of order as to whether the petition can properly be received.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed by the Clerk of the House that the report of the examiner of petitions in reference to this matter is in to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then, Mr. Speaker, I would raise the point of order to which I have already alluded, namely, whether under the existing circumstances the petition can properly be received by the House. In raising the point of order, I have no desire to express any view one way or the other with respect to the matters referred to in the petition, but I simply draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that when resort has been had to a similar proceeding in the past, the House has more than once declined to receive a petition relating exclusively to a matter before the court and pertaining to the Controverted Elections Act.

Mr. BENNETT: We might as well have the petition read.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend in presenting the petition to the House indicated very clearly the nature of it. The statement of the hon. member for West Calgary was as follows:

Hon. R. B. Bennett (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the petition of James Arthur Collins, of Chisholm, in the province of Alberta, lumberman, praying that the House of Commons of Canada may determine and declare that Donald Macbeth Kennedy was not duly elected and returned at the election held on the 29th day of October, 1925, and that the said return was and is void, and that it may be declared that the petitioner was duly elected at the said election and is entitled to be returned as the member elected to represent the electoral district of Peace River in the House of Commons of Canada.

The remarks of my hon. friend indicate clearly that the petition relates to a controverted election, one which he and the House know is before the courts at the present time.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that there are four acts under which methods are provided by law for correcting election wrongdoing or punishing offenders in connection with such wrong doing; first, the Dominion Election Act; second, the Controverted Elections Act; third, the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act, and fourth the House of Commons Act. The purpose of the enactment of the Controverted Elections Act was to remove from the jurisdiction of parliament to the courts matters relating to the election of members. I would in that connection point out the difference between a matter relating to the election of a member and a matter relating to the qualification of a member on grounds other than those pertaining to his election. Under the House of Commons Act, the House reserves to itself full power to deal with any matter referring to a member's right to sit in the House other than the right as affected by the elections; matters arising out of an election, parliament has, in its wisdom, expressly removed from the arena of decision or discussion here to the courts, having recognized long ago that it is difficult if not impossible for a question of the kind, which may give rise to so much party feeling and partisan discussion, to be satisfactorily dealt with by the House.

May I remind the House, Mr. Speaker, that the Controverted Elections Act was passed in 1873. The statute will be found to-day as chapter 7 of the Revised Statutes of 1906. At the time of the enactment it was referred to as "an act to make better provision for the trial of controverted elections of members of the House of Commons and respecting matters connected therewith." Section 91 of the act reads:

> All elections shall be subject to the provisions of this act, and shall not be questioned otherwise than in accordance herewith.

This would appear to make clear the intention of the Controverted Elections Act to remove from the House of Commons questions with respect to election of members otherwise than in accordance with the act's provisions.

The act as I have just stated was passed in 1873. In 1874 a case in point came before the House. It is reported in the Journals of the House of Commons for 1874, April 20, at page 82. I shall read from the Journals:

> A motion being made and seconded, that the petition of Horatio Le Boutillier, of Gaspé Basin, province of Quebec, presented on Thursday last, praying that the return for the last election for the electoral district of Gaspé be completed and amended, as a matter of privilege, by substituting the name of the petitioner for that of Louis George Harper, be now received:
> And objection being taken to the reception of this petition on the ground that the subject is one which could only come under the cognizance of the courts of law as provided by statute:

> Mr. Speaker said: "I cannot find any rule or precedent to guide me in coming to a conclusion on this question. I think it would be well for the House to consider this matter, and lay down a rule with respect to similar petitions in the future. I am of the opinion that it is an election petition. Looking over the late English Journals, I cannot find any cases of petitions of this nature having been ruled out. After considering all the circumstances, I think that the petition ought not to be received.

Mr. BENNETT: That was Mr. Speaker Anglin.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Hon. T. A. Anglin was Speaker of the House at the time. I would draw Your Honour's attention to these words:

> Looking over the late English Journals, I cannot find any cases of petitions of this nature having been ruled out.

It will be inferred, I think, from that language that no petitions of that character had been presented to the House of Commons in England, the House having recognized the desirability of following the method, which indeed we in Canada copied from the British legislation, of having all matters of the kind dealt with by the courts. I would further direct special attention to the ruling of his honour the Speaker in these words:

> After considering all the circumstances, I think that the petition ought not to be received.

The petition was one relating to the election of an hon. member of this House and in that particular was similar, if not indeed in many respects identical, to the one which we are discussing at the moment.

May I now cite another case in point. On January 17, 1881, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then Mr. Laurier, moved in the House of Commons:

> That the petition of Edmund Ritter, and others, of Sorel, representing that there has been a failure of justice in the matter of the trial of the election petition, complaining of an undue return for the electoral division of Richelieu; and praying to be allowed to make proof before the House, be now read.

The motion was agreed to on February 3, and the petition read. The words first quoted will be found in Hansard of 1881, Vol. 1, page 485. A debate followed as to whether the petition should be received by the House, and on February 14, Mr. Speaker J. G. Blanchet decided that the petition could not be received by the House. The discussion will be found in Hansard of 1881, Volume 2, page 961 and Mr. Speaker's ruling will be found in the Journals of the House of that year at page 199. Mr. Speaker Blanchet went very carefully and fully into the subject under review and I should like to read to Your Honour the ruling which was given by Mr.

Speaker at that time. In the Hansard debates at page 823 under "Controverted Election of Richelieu" the following appears:

Mr. Laurier moved that the first order of the day be the resumption of the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Laurier, for the reception of the petition of Edmund Ritter and others, complaining of a certain failure of justice in connection with the controverted election of Richelieu.

I refer to that particular introduction to draw attention to the fact that the matter under consideration at the time was whether the petition could be received or not, which is the only point that I am raising just now. As I have already said, I have nothing to say about the merits or the representations of the petitioner. Mr. Speaker's ruling will be found on page 961 as follows:

Mr. Speaker said: After having given a most careful consideration to the petition of Edmund Ritter, and others of Sorel, representing that there has been a failure of justice in the matter of the trial of the election petition complaining of an undue return for the electoral division of Richelieu, and praying to be allowed to make proof before this House of the allegation therein made, I am of opinion that the same cannot be properly received, for reasons which I now propose to state.

I shall not quote all the reasons, but I shall give the House the pertinent parts. He continued:

Now the only question that this House has to consider is, whether this petition is not in effect a petition, questioning the return of a member, which, as it has been admitted on both sides, cannot be properly received by the House, in view of the fact that it has divested itself of its right of trying such matters by referring them to the jurisdiction of an independent judicial tribunal. In handing over this power to the courts, the House still reserved to itself the right of taking notice of any legal disabilities affecting its members, and issuing writs in the room of members judged to be incapable of sitting—but the petition now under consideration, both in its terms and scope, is a petition questioning the return of a member, and not within the purview of this House. By the act 37 Victoria, chapter 10, the House of Commons divested itself of its original jurisdiction for the trial of all matters growing out of the election and return of members having the right to sit therein, including the withdrawal and abatement of any election petition in consequence of alleged corrupt agreement between the parties concerned. That power now belongs to the courts of justice, which try all election cases in conformity with the statutes in that behalf provided. The 63rd section of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, expressly provides that all elections held after the passing of the said act shall be subject to the provisions thereof, and shall not be questioned otherwise than in accordance therewith, showing clearly that the determination of the judicial body to whom that power has been delegated is final to all intents and purposes. Now the petition in question declares in express terms that the sitting member "has no right to the seat he occupies"; and were the prayer of the petitioners granted, the logical result would be the virtual resumption by the House of the jurisdiction which it has in its wisdom handed over to the courts. It asks the House to sit as a court of appeal upon a judgment rendered by a court of justice, though such judgment ought to be final according to the law. If the petition should be received it would then be competent for any member to move that it be referred to a committee; and if such a motion were agreed to, the various allegations in the petition would constitute the order of reference by which the committee would be governed in its proceedings. In this way a door would be opened to the indiscriminate reception of petitions attacking generally the return of members, though not governed by any of those formalities necessary even in those times when the House possessed full jurisdiction over controverted elections. To grant the prayer of the petition, would be to violate the general principle which lies at the basis of all the legislation adopted by the English parliament since 1868, and by the Canadian parliament since 1873, that the courts should alone adjudicate on matters on controverted elections.

In conclusion Mr. Speaker said:

In view, then, of the fact that the petition is in conflict with the letter and spirit of the law which governs the House in such cases, and does in effect question the right of an hon. member to his seat; I have to decide that the objection raised by the hon. member for Bagot is well taken, that the petition cannot be received.

The petition which my hon. friend presented the other day is, I submit, both in its terms and scope a petition questioning the return of a member and as such identical in its essential features with the one which Mr. Speaker Blanchet refused to allow to be received at the time to which I have just referred.

On April 28, 1887, the papers relating to the election in the electoral district of Queen's, N.B., having been brought up, an hon. member Mr. Skinner, moved that on the facts recited in his resolution a wrong return having been made, the return should be amended by inserting another name therein. In reference thereto the Minister of Justice, the Hon. J. S. D. Thompson, said that since the Controverted Elections Act——by which parliament has renounced its rights to deal with the matter of controverted elections, there has been fully recognized in the various discussions that have taken place in the Imperial House of Commons this principle, that everything has been transferred to the judiciary in connection with controverted elections excepting the one question of the qualification of persons who have been returned to parliament. . . . the conduct of the returning officer or the number of votes which were received, the conduct of the candidates, and every other question connected with the election. . . . has been relegated to the judiciary, and the House has always declined to exercise its functions and its power to interfere.

Sir John Thompson accordingly moved that instead of adopting Mr. Skinner's resolution the House should refer the papers in relation to the election to the committee on Privileges and Elections for report. After a considerable debate this amendment was carried on the same date, April 28. The references in question will be found in Hansard of April 28, 1887, at page 154 et seq. On May 6 the committee on Privileges and Elections reported that in its opinion the case should be disposed of under the Controverted Elections Act, since all questions as to the validity of the election of members should be decided by the ordinary legal tribunals and not by the House of Commons.

In that case, there was, I think, doubt as to whether the petition did not go further than simply refer to the matters appertaining immediately to the election of the candidate. For that reason apparently the petition was received by the House and referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections, but the committee took care to draw the attention of the House at once to the fact that the petition was really one which should have been construed as coming under the Controverted Elections Act. It accordingly advised that the House should not entertain the request in any particular.

That brings me to one other case to which I should like to refer. Many hon. members present will recall that in 1913 certain charges were made against the Hon. Mr. Coderre when that gentleman occupied the position of Secretary of State. A motion was made to refer to the committee on Privileges and Elections certain matters relating to the election of the member, and certain facts and circumstances appertaining thereto. The point I desire to make clear in reference to that particular matter is that something more than the mere question of the hon. member's right to his seat in parliament was involved; his right to sit in the House was but one of the matters in question. The opposition of the day took the view that inasmuch as the petition related to matters going considerably beyond the question of the right of the member to his seat in the House, it should be referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections. The matter was debated at length.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was the petition received?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand the matter was raised on a question of privilege.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But as a matter of fact the petition was received.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not in a position to say whether there was or was not a petition, but I am able to quote my right hon. friend's opinion then expressed with reference to petitions of the kind being received by parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know what it was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I desire to quote my right hon. friend as he is reported in Hansard on March 17, 1913, at page 6140. He said in the course of his remarks:

> Undoubtedly, until the passing of the Controverted Elections Act in this country in 1874 and the Elections Petitions Act in Great Britain in 1868, both parliaments had jurisdiction through their privileges and elections committees to try all matters connected with the election of their members. These committees were appointed primarily for that purpose, and petitions had to be presented to them and money deposited for security, and the committees tried the cases in the usual way. But since these acts were passed in these two parliaments—and I will ask the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe to contradict me if I am wrong—there has never been a case where such a charge as that made here has been referred to the Privileges and Elections committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Elsewhere the right hon. gentleman is reported as follows:

> What was the opinion of Sir John Thompson? It was that, since the passing of that act in England in 1868 and since the passing of a parallel act in Canada in 1874, these Houses had divested themselves of all authority to inquire into matters connected with elections, save only the question as to the qualifications of the member selected—as to whether or not that member was a minor, felon or convict.

The right hon. gentleman then mentions that Sir John Thompson's opinion was approved by the committee on Privileges and Elections, and further on he says:

> So far as the public are not affected, and so far as the charges relate to elections, we have divested ourselves of such authority and vested it in the courts; and so we must exclude all such cases from the jurisdiction of the Privileges and Elections committee.

In the division which took place on the motion I observe that my right hon. friend in opposing its reference, notwithstanding its scope, to the committee on Privileges and Elections, was consistent in the view he took, and was supported at the time by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) who has now presented the petition claiming the Peace River seat for Mr. Collins.

I need not any longer occupy the time of the House by citing authorities. Perhaps, however, I should make this concluding observation. Following the constitutional practice adopted in England there can be no question as to the duty of the House to decline to receive a petition of the nature of that which has been presented. Inasmuch as our practice and our legislation are modelled on the British procedure and acts and has been followed heretofore in accordance therewith we should here seek to maintain the precedents that have been established and which for good and sufficient reasons have been so resolutely upheld in recent years. May I again say that my purpose in raising this point of order at the moment is not in any way to discuss the merits of the petition, to question the motives of the hon. member who has presented it, nor to inquire at whose instance it has been submitted to the House, but simply to ask that before this House receives the petition or takes any action upon it, there shall be a ruling from Your Honour as to whether or not it may properly do so.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I had no notice until the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) rose that this was to be a matter of discussion this afternoon. The point apparently taken is that the House has not only divested itself of power to try the merits of elections so far as their conduct is concerned but has also relinquished the right to receive a petition from anyone who may question a return.

I want to thank my right hon. friend for the compliment of including my humble self among the list of high authorities whom he has quoted dating back over a considerable number of years. Did those authorities appertain to the point raised by my right hon. friend the compliment would be greater; but in the main, as was evident from the Prime Minister's own words, they had no reference at all to that point. Let me again emphasize the fact that I have not had an opportunity to review the cases referred to but, as I gathered from the Prime Minister's remarks, he cited four authorities, one in 1874, one in 1881, another in 1887 and the Coderre case in 1913. As respects the first two, and the first two only, did the question as to the right of the House to receive the petition even so much as come up. Whether the state of the law on that occasion was the same as it is to-day may be a matter for dispute. I raise it not now. But I say this, certainly as respects the second—and there was not sufficient data given as respects the first—it was not the same case at all as is being tried here. That was a case where the courts had already dealt with the subject and where the petitioners sought to make the House of Commons a court of appeal from a court of justice.

I come now to the third and the fourth. Those cases are distinctly against the Prime Minister's contention. Those were cases where the petitions were received, and comments of members of the House as to what ought to be done with them, whether by reference to the committee on Privileges and Elections or otherwise as to how the discretion of parliament should be exercised, have no place at all. The fact is the petitions were received, and this House thereby set precedents which we are asking the House to follow now. We are not to-day at the stage where we discuss what should be done with the petition after it is received. When we come to that stage I will deal with the authorities quoted by the right hon. Prime Minister from the debates of 1887 and 1913.

I want to emphasize this. A most serious step is to be taken if this petition is not to be received. This is not a petition that questions the conduct of an election at all. If such conduct is to be held in question, then I quite agree we have decided that the courts of justice are the proper tribunals for decision as to the merits. That is what was called in question in the Coderre case—whether or not Mr. Coderre personally or those acting as his agents had so conducted the contest as to entitle them to the verdict that was given. What is in question in this case is not whether the hon. member for Peace River conducted his contest honestly or not, not whether the votes cast in his favour or cast against him were rightly or were corruptly so cast. The only question at issue is: Were the votes cast in his favour or were the votes not; was he elected on the votes so cast, whether honestly cast or not? Surely this House has not divested itself of jurisdiction to say whether after the ballot box was closed the facts show that this man was elected or was not.

The men who take charge of the ballots and who declare the verdict are officers of this House, they are the deputy returning officers and the general returning officer for Canada. These men have nothing to do at all with the righteousness or the wrongness of the conduct of the election; but they have everything to do with the rightness of a declaration as to who got the most votes. I repeat, the general returning officer is an officer of this House. Are we to sit here and say that we have not the right even to receive a petition which questions the conduct of an officer amenable to this House, and to this House alone? We do not ask and do not suggest that parliament go behind the closing of the ballot box and say whether or not there was a breach of the law. All we ask to-day is this: Is the return made by an officer of this House in accordance with the votes of the electors, however those votes were obtained?

Now the Prime Minister rises at this stage and says to you, Mr. Speaker: You must not allow the first step to be taken to enable parliament to become cognizant of the conduct of its own officer; you must not even receive a petition which would bring the matter before this House. I repeat, if we are to take that step it is a very serious one. It is a step which puts the officers of this House beyond the jurisdiction of the House itself. I suggest that the right course to pursue is to permit the petition to come to this House for debate, and then if this House decides in the exercise of its well known jurisdiction over its own officer that it should not refer the petition to a committee, very well, let the House so decide. But do not let us establish the precedent of having Mr. Speaker declare that the House has no right even to consider what should be done with a petition affecting the conduct of an officer amenable to the House alone.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, if the House will permit me, I should like to make one word of explanation to my right hon. friend, and particularly to my hon. friend from West Calgary. I had assumed that my right hon. friend was aware that this matter was likely to come up to-day, because the hon. member for West Calgary yesterday was kind enough to inform me that he intended to raise this question at the opening of the House to-day, and would ask that the petition be referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BENNETT: Not to raise this question, but to move that the petition be received and referred to the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct; my hon. friend would move when the petition had been received that it be referred to the committee. I was informed that when the report of the Examiner of Petitions was made, unless I took exception the petition would be received in a technical sense and I feared it might be thought I would thereby be precluded after its receipt by the House from raising the point of its being proper for the House to receive it. Had my hon. friend from West Calgary been in his seat before I rose to my feet, I would have told him at once of my intention. I had no desire of being discourteous to any hon. member opposite.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, from time immemorial parliament has always exercised control over its own privileges and over the question of whether its members were properly elected. Down until 1874 that was the practice in Canada, but in that year there was passed by this parliament the Controverted Elections Act, by which parliament divested itself of the right to inquire into the methods by which members were elected to this House. Since that time the uniform practice, no matter what party was in power, has been to recognize the validity of that act and the wisdom of that practice.

There is only one question, it seems to me, in regard to this point of order—as to whether or not this petition which my hon. friend for West Calgary has sought to present to the House is a matter pertaining to an election which comes within the purview of the Controverted Election Act. If the assertions which he makes relate to matters which under that act have been committed by this parliament to the courts, then he has no right to present this petition and ask parliament to interfere in a question with which for the time being it has nothing to do.

My hon. friend in presenting the petition stated that it was a petition:

> Praying that the House of Commons of Canada may determine and declare that Donald Macbeth Kennedy was not duly elected and returned at the election held on the 29th day of October, 1925, and that the said return was and is void, and that it may be declared that the petitioner was duly elected at the said election and is entitled to be returned as the member elected to represent the electoral district of Peace River in the House of Commons of Canada.

Now I assert beyond all question that the facts alleged and the relief sought are matters that wholly come within the purview of the Controverted Elections Act. They were committed absolutely to the courts in 1874, and no one up to date has seriously questioned this in this House. My right hon. friend the leader of the House in making his objection to you, Mr. Speaker, cites two cases in which petitions of this character have been presented and ruled out by Mr. Speaker of the day. Reference has been made to what is known as the Coderre case, which arose in parliament in 1913. This matter did not come to parliament by way of petition, but by way of a question of privilege which was raised by the then hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, Mr. Gauthier. He came to parliament, presented certain affidavits and asked parliament to refer the matter to the Privileges and Elections committee. That is, what appears by the record of the day; I remember being in the House at the time. The position taken was that this being a matter which involved questions that could be determined by the courts on election petitions, the House should not deal with the question or refer it to the committee on Privileges and Elections. The then Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, took that position, as did the then Minister of Justice, Right Hon. Mr. Doherty. On the other side it was urged that the matters contained in the affidavits submitted went beyond and were not part of those questions committed under the Controverted Elections Act to the courts. It was conceded by almost every hon. gentleman who took part in the argument that if the questions raised on the matter of privilege related solely to those matters which had been committed to the courts, no action could be taken. My right hon. friend took that position; he quoted from Sir John Thompson and asserted with emphasis that at no time had parliament ventured to assert its right to deal with or inquire into matters committed to the courts by that act.

I submit the only thing Your Honour need consider is the point of order. If this petition relates to a question which has been committed to the courts for consideration I submit that under the precedents, as a matter of law and a matter of procedure, Your Honour should rule that the petition be not received. What purpose would be served in receiving it if parliament could not deal with the question in any way? What would be the use of reading a document here in relation to a subject with which we have no power to deal? The precedents which have been cited are, I submit, quite ample to justify such a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I wish to suggest briefly, Mr. Speaker, that the arguments presented by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) clearly indicate that this petition must be received in order that the House may be in a position to decide as to whether or not its contents are such as to exclude it from the jurisdiction of this House, and to place it under the jurisdiction of the courts. We have not yet seen the petition; hon. members have not had an opportunity to read it; we do not know its contents, except by some general words of description which were used when notice of the petition was presented. I therefore submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary for Your Honour to decide that this petition may be received in order that the House may be fully cognizant of its contents, and be in a position to decide as to whether it is within the sole jurisdiction of the courts or whether it contains allegations solely with respect to the conduct of an officer of the House, who is always responsible to, and whose conduct must be passed upon by, the House. If an error has been made in addition or in any other way Your Honour must decide whether we have jurisdiction to rectify that error. In an ordinary case I am prepared to accept the word of the right hon. Prime Minister as to the contents of a petition, but he has not read this petition and does not know its contents except by mere hearsay. I might accept the word of the Minister of National Defence but he has not read the petition; he has no more right to read it beforehand than have we on this side of the House. We have had no opportunity to read it and therefore, until it is received, the objection raised by the Prime Minister is premature and I suggest cannot be decided in his favour without depriving this House of the opportunity of knowing the contents of the petition. We must decide whether this matter should be referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections for their consideration.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): I do not know that I can add very much to what has already been said, Mr. Speaker. The question before the House is a point of order. It questions the right of a citizen of Canada to petition parliament; whether or not a free citizen of this Dominion has a right to petition parliament. That, shortly put, is the question that must be considered. It is said that this free citizen may not petition parliament because there is pending in the courts of the country a suit or action under the Controverted Elections Act.

Let us first of all examine the petition itself; I propose to read it. The petition which it is said this parliament may not receive is as follows:

To the Honourable the Members of the House of Commons

In Parliament Assembled

The petition of the undersigned, James Arthur Collins of Chisholm, in the province of Alberta, lumberman—

Humbly Sheweth:

1. That an election was held on the 29th day of October, A.D. 1925, for the electoral district of Peace River, to elect a member to represent the said electoral district in the House of Commons of Canada.

2. That the candidates at the said election were: Donald Macbeth Kennedy, William Archibald Rae and your petitioner, James Arthur Collins.

3. That Edward Henry Sheppard was the returning officer at said election, and on the 26th day of November, A.D. 1925, declared the said Donald Macbeth Kennedy duly elected to represent the said electoral district in the fifteenth parliament of Canada.

4. That pursuant to the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, in that behalf, a recount of the votes cast at the said election was held from the first until the eighteenth days of December, 1925, at the city of Edmonton, By His Honour Judge Mahaffy, and at the conclusion of said recount the said judge certified that 3986 votes had been cast in favour of Donald Macbeth Kennedy; 3944 votes had been cast in favour of William Archibald Rae and 3969 votes had been cast in favour of your petitioner, James Arthur Collins, and directed that the said Donald Macbeth Kennedy be declared elected to represent the said electoral district in the fifteenth parliament of Canada, by a majority of seventeen votes over your petitioner.

5. That on the 2nd day of January, the said Donald Macbeth Kennedy was gazetted as the member returned for the electoral district of Peace River to serve in the House of Commons of Canada, and he has taken his seat in such House of Commons.

Before I read the next paragraph I desire to point out that this petition makes known to this House the fact that proceedings are pending under the Controverted Elections Act, and gives the character of those proceedings.

6. That on or about the 26th day of February, A.D. 1926, proceedings under the Controverted Elections Act were taken by one John B. Page against the said Donald Macbeth Kennedy, but no such proceedings have been taken by your petitioner, or by anyone on his behalf.

7. That at the said election, the said electoral district of Peace River was subdivided into 298 polling divisions, No. 4 of such divisions being known as Brule Mines poll.

8. That the final recount by His Honour Judge Mahaffy, as aforesaid, showed that at Brule Mines poll, being poll No. 4 as aforesaid, twelve votes were cast in favour of Donald Macbeth Kennedy and 127 votes in favour of William Archibald Rae and twenty-one votes in favour of your petitioner.

9. That at least 111 electors voted for your petitioner at Brule Mines poll, No. 4, aforesaid, but through the action of the deputy returning officer, one Peter A. Robb, and other persons, to your petitioner unknown, ballots were fraudulently manipulated to produce the result mentioned in the next preceding paragraph of this petition.

10. That on or about the 18th day of January, 1926, the said Peter A. Robb, deputy returning officer, aforesaid, was charged before the Honourable Chief Justice Simmons of the Trial Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta.

"For that he, the said Peter A. Robb on or about the 29th day of October, A.D. 1925, at polling division No. 4, at Brule Mines in the province of Alberta, at an election held under and by virtue of the Dominion Elections Act for the election of a person to serve in the House of Commons of Canada in and for the electoral district of Peace River, in the province aforesaid did fraudulently destroy a number of ballot papers used by voters at the time and place aforesaid.

And also for that he, the said Peter A. Robb, on or about the 29th day of October, A.D. 1925, at polling division No. 4, at Brule Mines, aforesaid, at an election held under and by virtue of the Dominion Elections Act for the election of a person to serve in the House of Commons of Canada in, and for the electoral district of Peace River, did fraudulently put into the ballot box used in connection with the said poll papers other than the ballot papers which he, the said Peter A. Robb, was authorized by law to put in the said ballot box.

And also for that he, the said Peter A. Robb, on or about the 29th day of October, A.D. 1925, at polling division No. 4, at Brule Mines in the province of Alberta at an election under and by virtue of the Dominion Elections Act for the election of a person to serve in the House of Commons of Canada in and for the electoral district of Peace River in the province of Alberta and being a deputy returning officer at said polling division, No. 4, did fraudulently put otherwise than as authorized by the said Dominion Elections Act, his initials on the back of papers purporting to be, or capable of being used as ballot papers for the said election," to which said charges, the said Peter A. Robb pleaded "Not guilty."

11. That the trial of the said Peter A. Robb commenced at Edmonton, Alberta, on Monday the 29th day of March, 1926, before the Honourable Mr. Justice Walsh of the Trial Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta and a jury, and at the conclusion of the said trial on the first day of April, 1926, the said Peter A. Robb, was found guilty by the said jury on all the three charges aforesaid (as amended at the said trial) and was sentenced by the Honourable Mr. Justice Walsh to imprisonment for five years in the penitentiary at Prince Albert with hard labour, for each of the said offences, such sentences to run concurrently. A certified copy of the proceedings at the said trial accompanies this petition.

12. That at the election held on the 29th day of October, 1925, in the said electoral district of Peace River aforesaid, more ballots were cast for your petitioner than for either the said Donald Macbeth Kennedy or William Archibald Rae.

That, Sir, is a relevant allegation in this petition, that at that election more ballots were cast for James Arthur Collins than for any other candidate.

Wherefore your petitioner prays that the House of Commons of Canada may determine and declare that the said Donald Macbeth Kennedy was not duly elected and returned at the said election, held on the 29th day of October, 1925, and that his said return was and is void, and that it may be declared that your petitioner was duly elected at the said election and is entitled to be returned as the member elected to represent the electoral district of Peace River in the House of Commons of Canada.

And your petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Mr. Speaker, that petition was presented to this House by a member of the House of Commons of Canada and was referred to the clerk who deals with such petitions. That clerk has reported this petition back to this House. The Prime Minister of this country now asserts that this House of Commons of Canada should not receive that petition. In due course that petition would, on motion by one of the members of this House, have been referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections. That would have been the motion, to refer this petition which alleges that more ballots were cast for a man who is out of this House than were cast for a man who is in it, to the committee on Privileges and Elections. We are now met with the point of order that this House should not consider such petition. Four precedents have been referred to. Two of them are the expressions of opinion by the Speaker, but I venture to say, Sir, that if you will be good enough to traverse the whole debate that took place in the Coderre case in 1912-1913, you will find there a careful analysis of all the authorities, and it will be observed that my friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) was then very strong in the opinion which he now condemns.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to accept my hon. friend's statement as to his state of mind, but the evidence of his state of mind is indicated by the vote. It is a very regrettable fact that a matter of this kind should become the subject of acrimonious discussion in this House at this time. I, Sir, venture to think that nothing can be worse for the dignity of this parliament, nothing can reflect more on our sense of fairness or of justice, nothing can better reflect the state of mind of men who are no longer ready to award justice to their fellows and be impartial in their consideration of public questions, than to say we are unwilling to refer this petition to the committee set up by parliament to consider these matters.

The crux of our case, and I do commend it to my friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), is found in the language which was used by my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) a few moments ago: Parliament has not been asked, and is not being asked, to enter into a discussion nor an inquiry with respect to matters other than one: Were more votes cast for Collins in that election than for Kennedy? If there were, will any man dare to assert that the man who received the minority of the votes should retain the seat? No one has yet said that a receiver of stolen goods should be better than the man who owned the goods; no one has ever suggested that.

Let us see what they said in England. Two great law officers of the crown, one the late Lord Coleridge, the other the late Earl of Selborne, one Lord Chief Justice and the other Lord Chancellor, had occasion to deal with these matters, and in dealing with the jurisdiction of parliament as affected by the enactment of legislation respecting elections, they saw fit to direct attention to questions upon which the jurisdiction of parliament must be maintained as distinguished from the jurisdiction that had been parted with by virtue of the statute. If you will turn, Sir, to the debate that took place in the House of Commons in 1912-1913, you will find the quotation there from those observations, in the speech that was made upon that occasion by the now right hon. leader of the opposition. You will find the citations at the top of column 6142, in volume III of the debates of that session.

Mr. SPEAKER: Column 6142?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, my lord.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: It is true that titles have been dispensed with in this country, but one cannot do more respect to the Speaker than to address him as one would address a judge in a court of last resort, and I am sure he will discharge his duties with the same eminent impartiality as would be shown by a judge in a court of last resort dealing with a matter of this kind.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend who has just spoken discharges his duties with such eminent impartiality that I am sure he will be with me. My right hon. leader at the bottom of the page to which I have referred, was dealing with this matter and discussing the question of the jurisdiction of parliament as distinct from that of the courts. Now that parliament has divested itself of some of its jurisdiction in the matter need not be discussed. The question is, to what extent has parliament divested itself of this jurisdiction? If parliament still retains its power over its own officials, as was pointed out by Sir Louis Davies, then this petition must be in order. What is the complaint here? The complaint is against an official of this House, a deputy returning officer, who fraudulently, in violation of his obligations, in dereliction of his duty, saw fit in the opinion of six of his countrymen to manipulate ballots so fraudulently as to steal the election from Collins.

Mr. CANNON: That is one of the allegations of the petition, but what is the real conclusion of the petition? That is the question.

Mr. BENNETT: The conclusion of the petition is that the seat should be given to the man who had the most votes. It is amusing that my friend the Solicitor General should ask what the conclusion of the petition is. The conclusion is that the committee on Privileges and Elections may hear and determine whether or not the facts alleged in the petition are true. If it be true that 111 men, who went into the witness box at Edmonton and swore they had voted for Collins, have been deprived of their franchise, because only 127 ballots came out of the ballot box marked for Mr. Rae, and Mr. Kennedy was thereby given a seat which he had no more right to than a stranger on the street, then what is the conclusion? The conclusion is that parliament should inquire as to whether or not these officials discharged their duty, and if they did not, this parliament should see why they did not so discharge their duty, and should give the seat to the man who had the most votes. These are the words of the two law officers of the crown Lord Selborne and Lord Coleridge:

> It is true we have divested ourselves of our jurisdiction over all election matters, but it does not follow that we have not the right to say that our writs shall be obeyed. The writ issued by this House calls upon the people of a certain county to elect a certain qualified representative, and we still reserve authority and jurisdiction to inquire as to whether or not they have returned duly qualified men.

This House still has the authority to inquire as to whether or not Peter Robb, deputy returning officer, appointed by the Chief Electoral Officer, an officer of this House—and the House will recognize the jurisdiction which we vested in him—discharged his duty or whether or not he became a party to the opening of the ballot boxes, taking out ballots and marking them for another man, sealing up the ballot boxes and counting those ballots so marked, so as to deprive the successful candidate of a seat in this House. That is the question which has to be met and it has to be considered. This House still has jurisdiction—to do what? To see that its writ is obeyed, the writ of election that was issued by the Chief Electoral Officer, the servant of this parliament, to the electors of Peace River, and if it is proven to the satisfaction of a committee of the House that the deputy returning officer or one of his officials saw fit, in dereliction of his duty, in fraud upon the people of Alberta, to deprive them of their right as citizens, to whom do they look but this House? Whom are they to look to but to this House, or to a committee of this House, which reports back these facts, and gives the seat to the man who is entitled to it but who has been illegally deprived of it.

Let me go a step further. I will not content myself with quoting the language of so eminent an authority as Lord Selborne or Lord Coleridge I will go further and quote the authority of the late chief justice of this Dominion, who in 1900, in dealing with the West Huron election case, had occasion to deal with this very matter. Sir Louis Davies put the case on the strongest ground on which it could be put. He said:

> It is true we have divested ourselves of the jurisdiction over election matters—

These were the words:

> But we have retained jurisdiction over own officers—our returning officers and deputy returning officers, and over none others.

These were the words of Sir Louis Davies in 1900. What did Sir Wilfrid Laurier say in the debate of 1913? What was his declaration as to what the position was? He agreed with the observations made by Mr. Doherty, then Minister of Justice, now Right Hon. Mr. Doherty, who for two hours or more reviewed all the authorities and placed the matter before the House in every detail. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then leader of the opposition, dealt with the matter you will observe that he was very careful to say that this parliament had not divested itself of all its jurisdiction, but had retained jurisdiction over its own officers, over its own deputy returning officers.

This petition is here, Sir, from a citizen of this Dominion, in order that this house of parliament may refer it to the committee on Privileges and Elections. For what purpose? To see whether or not our officers, our servants, the men to whom we delegated certain rights, to ascertain whether the electors of Peace River desired to elect number one, number two or number three to sit in this House, had been guilty of fraud or otherwise. If they had taken out the ballot boxes, extracted ballots therefrom and substituted other ballots, then this tribunal of parliament should deal with the matter. If it can be proven not before the courts of the country, not by a trial, but by the production of the men who so testified before the court, that although they, to the number of 111, had voted for Collins and that notwithstanding when the ballots were taken out of the box only 27 were found to be marked for Collins, do you mean to tell me, Sir, that the free people of this country are not entitled to petition parliament and to ask that this great wrong shall be undone? Why, Sir, the very mention of it to the people of this country, the very idea that a man may retain a seat in this parliament when an election petition cannot be tried while parliament is sitting, that the receiver of stolen goods can flaunt his crime before the people and say, "I am going to be tried some time two or three months hence, but in the meantime I am going to enjoy the fruits of my wrongdoing."—the very idea, I say, is enough to shock the sensibilities of all who venerate the principles of right and justice and who believe in representative institutions. In this case no one charges Mr. Kennedy with wrongdoing, and no one alleges that he had anything to do with it, and he had not, except in this one respect that having received the stolen goods, he is holding on to them. That is all. I am amazed, Sir, that there can be in the mind of honest men the thought that you would permit this House to deny to the man who has been wronged the right to come to this tribunal, the highest court in the land to present his case. It is unthinkable. I could not believe my ears when I heard the Prime Minister rise in his place and raise the point of order. I thought, Sir, it would be time enough to raise such a point when it went to the committee on Privileges and Elections, and I suggest to my right hon. friend that on reconsideration he should let the matter go to that committee, just as Sir John Thompson, when presenting his argument in the Queens election case in 1887 said, "That is my view of the law". He was one of the most eminent lawyers who ever sat in this House. He presented his case and said, "This matter can go to the committee on Privileges and Elections." When it came back the committee reported that in their judgment they had no jurisdiction.

Now, I do ask my hon. friend the Solicitor-General, before he argues the matter, to pause and think where this will lead him. I ask my hon. friends opposite to pause and think what would be their attitude if they were in the same position as the hon. member for Peace River. I have here the authority of a Lord Chancellor, of a Lord Chief Justice, of one of the greatest and most eminent jurists this country ever knew, Sir John Thompson, and the authority of Sir Wilfrid Laurier the great leader of the Liberal party. I give you these authorities and I give you the authority of the Chief Justice of Canada before it is too late. Oh, Sir, I implore you to remember what this means. This is by all odds the most serious and important matter that parliament has to consider, because it must be known to every member of the House that when the Speaker decides that he has no jurisdiction, that this petition is out of order, an appeal will be taken to the House and the House will be divided sharply on party lines in a matter which hon. members should consider as judges. You ask them as partisans to decide whether Mr. Kennedy should retain the seat which Mr. Collins won. I put it to you, Sir, and I ask you if that is your conception, or the conception of hon. members of the proper function of the House of Commons. It may well be, if this goes to the committee on Privileges and Elections that a majority may conclude that it should not be considered by parliament, but should be referred to the courts, but at the moment you are asked to say that this parliament shall not receive the petition of the injured man. Surely that cannot be the law. Have I made myself clear? The distinction I submit is very narrow but it is very apparent. A petition that deals with matters that have to be considered by courts and a petition that asserts that officers of this House have not done their duty are entirely different. It is perfectly clear from the petition that has been read that the allegation is founded upon a breach of his duty by one who is now in penitentiary, who is now reposing quietly and calmly incarcerated in that prison because he has deprived some ninety people of their votes, 111 having voted for a candidate and only twenty-seven votes coming out of the ballot box.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is my hon. friend correct? Is the man not out on bail?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Robb?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not so advised.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): For a retrial.

Mr. BENNETT: I was advised that he was in penitentiary, but my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, who resides in Edmonton, knows better than I.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The case has been taken to appeal.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not suggested that he has been granted pardon, is it? I am bound to say that politics in western Canada sometimes are corrupt. I am now asking the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), recently first minister of Saskatchewan, to carry his mind back to 1906 and 1907 and I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to recall the Prince Albert case of 1906. I have before me the Journals of Saskatchewan for 1907.

Mr. DUNNING: What has this to do with the point of order before the House?

Mr. BENNETT: I assure my hon. friend if he will only wait one moment that it will indicate that the legislature of Saskatchewan unanimously decided to put into his seat Mr. Donaldson who had been deprived of that seat by the robbing of ballot boxes by his opponent.

Mr. DUNNING: Unanimously?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. A spirit of fairness was shown that I trust will now be indicated by hon. gentlemen opposite. May I now venture to recite the facts? Mark you, Sir, again this was a deputy returning officer, an officer of the legislature. Mr. Donaldson petitioned the legislature to retain his seat. A Mr. Tyerman was returned by a majority vote and it was alleged that at one of the polling divisions there had been interference with the ballots by the deputy returning officer. According to the Journals of the Saskatchewan legislature for 1907 Mr. Haultain presented a petition reciting the facts which are set out at pages

82 and 83. The petition was referred without question, without debate, to the committee on Privileges and Elections. The matter was greatly argued, counsel presenting the case, and inasmuch as it was decided the case is different from this—

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Not very different. It indicates that what happened in 1907 was a prelude to what happened in 1925, because in that election when the ballots came out of the box there were 318 cast in favour of Donaldson and 260 in favour of Tyerman whereas 411 were returned as having been cast in favour of Tyerman. In other words the same sort of thing happened in northern Saskatchewan in 1907 as happened in northern Alberta in 1925. They had transferred their operations a little further west. Let me go a step further. The matter was much debated and the deputy returning officer was prosecuted. He pleaded guilty and he was sentenced to imprisonment. Then proceeds the further matter, the review of the authorities, and at page 85 Mr. Haultain, now Chief Justice Haultain, and Mr. Lamont, now Mr. Justice Lamont of the Court of Appeal, reviewed the authorities in these words:

> The committee have looked into the practice and procedure, as well as the law applicable to the hearing of election petitions presented to parliament and have found that during the early period of parliamentary history in England the power of trying election petitions was repeatedly exercised by the House of Commons in England but it was found that on nearly every question of the kind which came before the Commons the decisions were arrived at by strictly party vote, and that so fully was it recognized as being a party question that on one occasion the ministry went out of office because it had failed to carry the vote of the House in the disposition of a controverted election petition, and in order to prevent so notorious a perversion of justice, the House consented to submit the exercise of this privilege to a tribunal constituted by law, which, though composed of its own members, should be appointed so as to secure impartiality and the administration of justice according to the laws of the land and under the sanction of oaths.
> The principle of the Grenville Act—

That is the English act of 1868 passed by Disraeli in his short term of office as Prime Minister.

> The principle of the Grenville Act, and of others which were passed at different times since the year 1770, was the selection by lot of committees for the trial of election petitions. Partiality and incompetence were very generally complained of in the constitution of committees appointed in this manner, and in the year 1839 an act was passed establishing a new system upon a different basis increasing the responsibility of the individual members and leaving but little to the operation of chance.

I should withdraw my observation as to Mr. Disraeli's act. It was passed in 1868. The Grenville act was prior to 1867.

> This principle was maintained with partial alteration of the means by which it was carried on till 1868, when the jurisdiction of the House in the trial of controverted elections was transferred by statute to the courts of law. As a result of the act of 1868 doubts were expressed whether these provisions would not supersede the jurisdiction of the House in determining questions affecting seats of its own members not arising out of controverted elections, but it was decided that the act applied to the questioning of returns by election petitions only, and that under the procedure in force before that act when returns were questioned by petition the matter was determined by the tribunal, and before such tribunal was established the House uniformly exercised its constitutional jurisdiction.
> In places where acts providing for the trial by courts of controverted election petitions are in force the legislature has on more than one occasion refused to deal with the question of the right to the seat as between two contending parties, and have limited the jurisdiction of the House to questions such as the personal disqualification of a person returned as member, but the supreme court of the Northwest Territories having no jurisdiction to hear and determine questions relating to controverted elections there would appear to be no doubt but that the legislature has what is called "constitutional jurisdiction" and has a right, and in fact is bound to hear and determine through its properly constituted committee petitions asking for the voidance of an election and claims to seats.
> The commitee is of the opinion that they should deal with the matter in dispute upon proper principles of law and for that reason have asked counsel appearing for and against the petition to cite cases which might be of assistance to the committee and the House in determining the question arising in the petition and out of the facts proved, and the committee have also endeavoured by every means to find precedents which would be of similar assistance.
> No case has been cited or has been found by your committee similar in all respects to the case disclosed by the facts above set out. Cases have been cited wherein the courts have in exercising the jurisdiction delegated to them by parliament voided elections but have refused the claims of petitioners to seats and have directed new elections, but these are cases in which certain electors who had the right to vote were disfranchised by reason of the acts and conduct of deputy returning officers in placing marks upon ballots which had the effect of making it possible to identify the voters, and thereby under the law making the votes ineffective. The principle which the courts have applied to such cases is that there being no real electing at all, they could not give the seat to the petitioning candidate for the reason that the persons who were entitled and had the right to vote had not had an opportunity of expressing their will in regard to the election.
> In the present case, however, there would appear to your committee to have been a valid election at which the will of the duly qualified electorate was expressed, the result of such expression of will being that Mr. Donaldson obtained the majority of the votes polled at the election, which majority could not, as appears from the facts above recited, be affected by permitting the duly qualified electorate of polls Nos. 24, 25 and 26 (if any) to vote.
> The committee are therefore of the opinion that on the facts and in view of the principle of law already stated, the petitioner Samuel J. Donaldson is entitled to be returned as the member elected to represent the electoral division of Prince Albert in the legislative assembly of Saskatchewan.
> Ordered, That the report be now concurred in.

On motion of Mr. Lamont, seconded by Mr. Haultain,

Ordered, That the Clerk of the Executive Council be summoned by Mr. Speaker to attend the bar of the House and amend his certificate relating to the return of the member elected to represent the electoral division, of Prince Albert at the election held on the 13th December, 1905, by inserting the name of Samuel James Donaldson in lieu of the name of Peter David Tyerman.

And so the legislature of Saskatchewan, having inquired into the facts through a committee, unanimously decided that the action I have taken should be taken and that Mr. Donaldson should be given the seat, Mr. Tyerman having already filled one term in the legislature. It will be observed that it is of first-rate importance that an opportunity should be afforded in a case of this kind for counsel to appear to present the precedents, to examine the authorities, and to make such legal arguments as the facts and necessities of the case warrant. If therefore this petition is now decided to be out of order, it follows that no opportunity will be afforded for any committee to examine into this matter and determine wherein the jurisdiction of parliament ends and the jurisdiction of the courts begins.

I do not for a moment allege that it may not be determined by that committee ultimately that the petition is one that should not be considered; but I do assert emphatically that we should be doing violence to every notion we have of justice and of fair play, to every precedent that has come to us down through the centuries in relation to the jurisdiction of parliament over its own officers, if we decided that the petition of a free citizen of this Dominion to this parliament, citing certain facts which affect a seat that he believes to have been improperly deprived him through the fraudulent conduct of the officers of the House, should not be inquired into by a parliamentary committee. That and that only is our case.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Does the hon. member assert that the matters that are alleged in this petition do not come within the purview of the petition which will be dealt with by the judges of Alberta under the Controverted Elections Act?

Mr. BENNETT: I say that the case under that act may proceed and never touch the point at all.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): That will be the petitioner's fault.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) is the defendant in an action in the courts under the Controverted Elections Act in which Mr. Collins, the aggrieved person, is not the plaintiff.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): He may appear under the law.

Mr. BENNETT: But he is not in charge of the proceedings, and the question might be decided without this point being touched upon. I am sure that in the heart of every member of this House there is a sense of justice, and justice requires that the petition shall be received. Mr. Collins claims that he should have the seat which is now occupied by Mr. Kennedy; that Mr. Kennedy should resign it and, if he so desires, endeavour to regain it by proceedings under the Controverted Elections Act. The justice of the case demands that at that bar our Chief Electoral Officer should stand and that, because of the fraudulent conduct of an officer of this House, the return should be amended by inserting the name of Collins in place of that of Kennedy.

We are all weak and are inclined to be influenced by our personal feelings and our political views. But when it comes down to a case of real, essential justice, observe what was done in Saskatchewan. There you find the attorney general, a Liberal, moving, and the leader of an opposition small in numbers seconding, a report to have the clerk of the executive council brought to the bar of the legislature, strike out the name of Mr. Tyerman and substitute therefore the name of Mr. Donaldson, the circumstances having warranted this. That was justice. I do not say that this House is prepared to take a similiar course, but I do urge, Mr. Speaker, that we do not lightly dispose of a matter that so vitally affects the honour of this assembly. If this petition is rejected, think what a premium we put upon dishonesty. It would mean that in every election held in Canada, if you could only get enough dishonest deputy returning officers to manipulate ballots so as to return for the moment a required number of members, you would deprive parliament of its authority and frustrate the will of the people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is not the hon. member entirely ignoring the fact that parliament has provided that the courts of the country shall take into consideration all these matters to which he is referring? Has not the court the right, after it has heard all sides of the case, to inform Mr. Speaker of the matters which it thinks ought to come before the House? The intention is not to deprive the House of Commons of the right of remedying any wrong; it is to prevent the kind of discussion we are having now, before the matter is settled by the proper tribunal.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad my right hon. friend has said that, for it is one argument why the matter should be referred to the committee. I am sure the Prime Minister will realize the seriousness of it. Let me give a concrete illustration. Suppose as the result of an election we had a House of 240 members, 125 supporting the government and 115 in opposition. That would leave the government with a majority of ten. The House is called and it is ascertained that, say, fifteen members owe their seats entirely to the manipulation of ballots. A petition comes before parliament. What happens then? The courts cannot touch it while the House is in session, and nothing will be done in the meantime. What will that lead to? Why, Mr. Speaker, it simply puts a premium upon dishonesty and it means that you have invited every deputy returning officer in Canada to become a crook. Not only that, but you have put the stamp of approval of the House of Commons on such conduct. Let us carefully weigh the matter before we decide it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish) Why should we have the Controverted Elections Act at all?

Mr. BENNETT: To deal with the conduct of elections.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): And of returning officers as well.

Mr. BENNETT: As Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in his speech in 1913, this parliament has never divested itself of the authority to inquire into the right of a member to sit in the House.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon friend is arguing that because parliament is in session and the case cannot be heard, therefore Mr. Collins is being deprived of a privilege that rightfully belongs to him. Will that privilege be denied him when the time comes for the trial? So far as the deputy returning officer in question is concerned, he has been convicted and has therefore paid his penalty. But how is Mr. Collins deprived of his privilege, seeing that the case must come before the courts?

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry I have not made clear to the Minister of the Interior the gravity of the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite appreciate the seriousness of it.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact of Mr. Collins having been deprived of his seat in the House is only incidental. But the fact that a gentleman should sit in parliament without, as it is alleged, a mandate from the people of the constituency which he purports to represent, is something that affects not only that particular constituency but every constituency in the country.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): At several of the other polls allegations were made which, while it is true they were not proven, were so nearly established that they would indicate that Mr. Collins had support which perhaps should have gone elsewhere.

Mr. BENNETT: I am surprised that my hon. friend—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That happened at McLellan.

Mr. BENNETT: You can never count upon what juries may do, and if the jury chose to acquit Mr. Griggs, one of the deputy returning officers—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was not thinking of Mr. Griggs; I was thinking of the poll at McLellan.

Mr. BENNETT: In the case of Mr. Griggs a jury of his countrymen thought that he had not violated the law. But here we have a case the effect of which is to deprive the people of Peace River of representation according to their will and, what is more, to undermine the authority of parliament. What becomes of representative government if parliament refuses to accept this petition?

Mr. CANNON: What about 1917?

Mr. BENNETT: But that was a question in which parliament had enacted legislation as to who should vote. That is not the question now before us. In this instance—and I do ask my hon. friends to consider it seriously—let us make it personal with respect to this House.

Mr. CANNON: The incident of 1917 was so serious that it was tragic.

Mr. BENNETT: I am perfectly willing to engage in a discussion with my hon. friend with respect to that, but it is not relevant to this point of order; what he is referring to was a question of the franchise. After listening to the account of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Doucet) of the purposes that legislation served in Quebec during the last election, I say it was indeed tragic.

Mr. JACOBS: The party to which it belongs is now paying the penalty, in the same way as Robb is.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Might I ask hon. members to deal with the point of order?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I am always delighted to endeavour to answer any questions that may be asked, and my hon. friend so seldom asks any that I should like to answer this one. He says Mr. Robb is paying the penalty. It is true. But the country is being deprived of the services of Mr. Collins, who obtained a majority of the votes cast. That is an entirely different matter.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): If my hon. friend would permit me—supposing his contention is right that parliament should receive this petition, and that upon its reception it was referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections, which decided that the statements contained therein were correct. You would also have the trial of the petition proceeding in the courts, and if it was there decided that Mr. Collins was not entitled to the seat, we would have the anomalous condition of parliament deciding one way and the court the other. Parliament therefore should not divest the court of its jurisdiction.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I am the more surprised at the minister making an observation of that character because he must know that the trial of the petition could not proceed in that event for Mr. Kennedy would no longer be the sitting member. I assume if Mr. Collins is returned a protest might then be lodged against him, and it might proceed. But let us take this very House, let us deal with actualities. What happened? On the first vote taken in this House this session there was a majority of three. Mr. Speaker, just think what this means.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: One opponent of the government was absent. Had he been present the majority would have been two.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He had not taken his seat.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): That is not a point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: It is, for it illustrates the effects of this. Had Mr. Collins been in his seat, as the electors of Peace River decided by a majority of seventy or eighty he should, the result of that first division would have been a tie. Now, are we here to-day to ask the Speaker of this House to decide that a petition that directs the attention of parliament to malfeasance in office of its own officials shall not be heard?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): What has that to do with the point of order?

Mr. BENNETT: The point of order is that this petition cannot be heard, although a Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of England and the Chief Justice of Canada, have all expressed the opinion that parliament has complete jurisdiction over its own officials. That is the point that we must not get away from. We must all keep in mind this one essential thing, that when the officials of this House violate their duty and fail to discharge the obligation placed upon them, this House can call them to account at that bar. If we fail, if we put a premium on rascality, we have dishonoured our finest traditions, we have made this House a participant in that which has deprived one of our citizens of the highest rights he can enjoy under the constitution, and we have decided that fraudulent manipulation of ballots, which may change the personnel of the government and thus change the policies of the country, are to meet with the approval of this House. Until I see that done, Sir, I cannot believe it possible for it to happen.

Hon. G. H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs and Excise): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to wander quite so far away from the point of order as the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bennett). I may be obliged, however,—and I crave your indulgence if I should do so—to stray from the straight and narrow path in order to answer some of the arguments adduced by my hon. friend. I was not surprised to hear him say that there is a sense of justice in the heart of every man. There are exceptions to confirm all rules, and I am sorry to see that the hon. member himself is to-day the exception. A sense of justice in the heart of every man! And still he stands in his place in this House and accuses one of his fellow members of keeping and retaining stolen goods—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOIVIN: —when he well knows that his fellow member, owing to the provisions of section 8 of the House of Commons Act, could not resign his seat if he so desired.

Mr. BENNETT: It is clear he could not resign, but it is equally clear that he should not participate in the deliberations of this House.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend has an afterthought and presents the argument used in the House by his right hon. leader a few days ago. He contends—I do not pretend that he is right—that an hon. member can occupy his seat in this House, that he is even obliged to be here but that he has no right to exercise his prerogatives as a member of parliament. That is almost as erroneous as the other argument used by my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend will permit me—under what obligation is a man to sit in this House who knows he did not get the majority of votes?

Mr. BOIVIN: My right hon. friend says that someone knows that the hon. member for Peace River did not get the majority of votes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He knows it himself.

Mr. BOIVIN: And my right hon. friend pretends he knows it too?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly; we all know it.

Mr. BOIVIN: We all know it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. BOIVIN: Who said so?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The judge and the jury.

Mr. BOIVIN: The judge and the jury decided according to the evidence of certain men that a certain number of votes which should have been given to Mr. Collins in that election had been counted for Mr. Ray. The judge and the jury did not decide that—

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was decided by our officers.

Mr. BOIVIN: Still that is not what the judge and jury decided.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BOIVIN: The judge and jury were not called upon to decide whether the hon. member was or was not elected.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what they decided. The judge and jury—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The judge and jury had to decide that in order to decide the case presented to them.

Mr. BOIVIN: Is it because the judge and jury decided something they were not called upon to decide that we are to ask a fellow member to resign? That is something the judge and jury had no right to deal with.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They had the right.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. BOIVIN: Will my right hon. friend tell me under what law Mr. Kennedy can resign his seat to-day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not say anything of the kind. I say he is under no obligation to sit as the hon. member said he was.

Mr. BOIVIN: Under no obligation to sit?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BOIVIN: The hon. member is doubly obligated. He took his oath of office to do his duty as a member of the House of Commons, and the law says he must do that duty and cannot resign.

Even if the argument so ably built up by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) were true in every respect, he has proven almost instinctively, clever advocate that he is, that he is not making his argument in the right place. In addressing the Speaker of the House of Commons as "My Lord," he has shown that he well knows that the argument should be made before a court of justice.

Mr. SPEAKER: I assure the House I am not a lord.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend revealed himself as a very able parliamentarian. He realizes, I think, after hearing the arguments pro and con that you, Mr. Speaker, will undoubtedly disallow the petition and decide that it cannot be received by the House.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure my hon friend will not object if I draw attention to rule 69:

> If anything shall come in question touching the return or election of any member, he is to withdraw during the time the matter is in debate; and all members returned upon double returns are to withdraw until their returns are determined.

That is an answer to the question brought up a moment ago, as to what a member should do.

Mr. BOIVIN: Does my hon. friend contend that if the hon. member whose election is under debate at present withdrew from the chamber it would alter his argument or mine? Would it alter the decision of Mr. Speaker on the point of order? If not, why does my hon. friend cite the rule?

Mr. BENNETT: Because it was suggested that there was no provision under which he could retire from the House.

Mr. BOIVIN: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) claimed that one of the reasons why the petition should be allowed was that the House of Commons did not know the contents of that petition. The hon. member for West Calgary has remedied that; in case the petition should not be received he has proceeded in advance to read the petition into Hansard and to deliver the address that would have been delivered on the motion to refer it to the committee. He has attained his object, and I hope will no longer dispute the point of order. He claims that the House of Commons, through the committee on Privileges and Elections, should be called upon to decide this question. In that case, what becomes of the authority of our courts; what becomes of the Controverted Elections Act; and why was that act enacted by this parliament? It was enacted for the precise purpose of removing from the heat and passion of party politics and partisan warfare just such questions as the hon. member desires to have decided to-day.

Before the year 1770 controverted elections in Great Britain were tried and determined by the whole House of Commons as party questions, in which the strength of contending factions might be tested. May, in his tenth edition, states very clearly:

> In order to prevent so notorious a perversion of justice, the House consented to submit the exercise of its privilege to a tribunal constituted by law, which, though composed of its own members, should be appointed so as to secure impartiality, and the administration of justice according to the laws of the land and under the sanction of oaths. The principle of the Grenville Act and of others which were passed at different times since 1770, was the selection by lot of committees for the trial of election petitions. Partiality and incompetence were, however, generally complained of in the constitution of committees appointed in this manner; and in 1839, an act was passed establishing a new system, upon different principles, increasing the responsibility of individual members, and leaving but little to the operation of chance.
> This principle was maintained, with partial alterations of the means by which it was carried out, until 1868, when the jurisdiction of the House, in the trial of controverted elections, was transferred by statute to the courts of law. . . . . The House has no cognizance of these proceedings until their termination: when the judges certify their determinations, in writing, to the Speaker, which is final to all intents and purposes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? Will he tell me when parliament surrendered the right to review the conduct of its own officers?

Mr. BOIVIN: Parliament never surrendered the right to review the conduct of its own officers, but the petition before parliament to-day is not a request to review the conduct of an officer. It is a request for Mr. Kennedy to vacate his seat and give it to Mr. Collins.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because of the conduct of an officer of this House.

Mr. BOIVIN: Because of the conduct of an officer of this House, which conduct will be taken into consideration at the trial of the controverted election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Maybe.

Mr. BOIVIN: It must be, if anyone desires to adduce the evidence before the court. It is provided in section 61 of the Controverted Elections Act:

> The trial judges may, at the same time, make a special report to the Speaker as to any matters arising in the course of the trial, an account of which ought, in their judgment, to be submitted to the House of Commons.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. member permit me to put the question again? Even assuming the court has jurisdiction over the conduct of this officer, when did parliament surrender the right to review the conduct of the same officer?

Mr. BOIVIN: Parliament did not surrender the right to review the conduct of its officers, and if the petition presented was a petition to review the conduct of an officer of the House, it would be in order and would possibly be received and considered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is just what it is.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is all very well for my right hon. friend to argue that it is, but the conclusions of the petition show that it is not. The conclusions are to the effect that one hon. member be asked to vacate his seat in order that his opponent may take it. In one particular polling subdivision of that constituency some irregularities were revealed. There were some subdivisions where no polls were opened, and other subdivisions where there were other irregularities. Does my right hon. friend say that it would be fair to judge the merits of that election by what took place in one particular polling subdivision?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say nothing of the sort, but I am asking my hon. friend, if parliament has the right to review the conduct of its own officers, has it not the right to correct a wrong resulting from that misconduct?

Mr. BOIVIN: It certainly has the right to correct a wrong which may have resulted from that misconduct.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am glad my hon. friends applaud. Parliament has the right to correct that wrong, but it must be brought to the attention of parliament in the manner provided by law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask when parliament surrendered the right to correct that wrong sooner?

Mr. BOIVIN: To correct the wrong sooner than it is legally ascertained?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To correct the wrong earlier than the report of the court.

Mr. BOIVIN: Does my right hon. friend attempt to argue; does he want this House to decide, or does he want you, Mr. Speaker, to decide by your ruling that it is possible to have two trials of the same case going on at the same time, one in the courts legally constituted by this parliament, and the other in a committee constituted by this parliament?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me? If this is to be tried by a committee, it is tried during this session. Will he explain to me how the other trial can take place during this session?

Mr. BOIVIN: I shall not attempt to explain to my right hon. friend what he already knows.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He cannot.

Mr. BOIVIN: My right hon. friend knows very well that the other trial will not proceed during the session. He also knows very well that if this matter was referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections, the hearing would be dragged out there for political purposes. Witnesses would be brought here from northern Alberta and the whole trial would be repeated before the committee of parliament, and the inquiry would not be over until the dying days of the session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did the government decide on that conduct before the committee?

Mr. BOIVIN: Will the right hon. gentleman repeat his question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman says that the trial will be dragged out. There is no reason certainly why we should drag it out. When did the government decide to adopt these tactics before the committee?

Mr. BOIVIN: If there is no reason for my right hon. friend and his supporters to drag it out, there is no political reason for the government supporters to do so. We do not ask to have it brought here. Why did they?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To correct a wrong.

Mr. BOIVIN: To correct a wrong which my right hon. friend himself admits cannot be corrected until it is too late, until the end of the session.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: It can if the government will do their duty.

Mr. BOIVIN: And further, it would be to correct a wrong which is yet imaginary. It has not yet been proven—a wrong must be proven in the court before the hon. member for Peace River can be asked to resign.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where do you find that?

Mr. BOIVIN: The law is clear that a wrong must be established before he can be asked to resign. Even if he so desired, he could not resign now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Give us a chance to prove it.

Mr. BOIVIN: The leader of the opposition wants parliament, with all its power and might, to take a member and expel him from the House, to decide that he has no right to occupy a seat here, when as a matter of fact the hon. member could not resign if he so desired. That is the position in which the right hon. gentleman attempts to place parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is nonsense.

Mr. BOIVIN: In 1913 the right hon. leader of the opposition, speaking in this House, said that this House has divested itself of all authority to inquire into matters connected with elections save only those questions relating to the qualifications of the members elected. Every other matter concerning elections, the House had divested itself of its right and authority to inquire into.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right, but will the hon. gentleman permit me?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen are very, very timid about their cause. They think it can best be defended by noise. This matter is not an attempt to inquire into an election. It is to inquire into an election return.

Mr. BOIVIN: If my right hon. friend desires to propound the argument that he wants to unseat a member without inquiring into his election, he is welcome to such an argument. He admits it is an attempt to unseat a member, and yet he says it is not an inquiry into an election. How he can combine the two with that spirit of justice that is to be found in the heart of every man, is something which surpasses my humble understanding.

I do not want to argue further, Mr. Speaker. The point of order, which, after all, is really the only matter before Your Honour at the present time, was clearly raised and explained by my right hon. leader early this afternoon. There are two precedents, in respect to which the law has not been changed, despite what the leader of the opposition may say. Two questions, absolutely identical, have been decided by two of your illustrious predecessors, Sir, and I am sure that this parliament, with its customs, rules and usages based upon precedent, will not reverse those precedents today.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: May I ask a question, merely for information? What is the date of the petition which has been lodged in the courts, and by whom has it been presented?

Mr. BOIVIN: According to the information that I received when the hon. member for West Calgary read the petition, it was lodged in the courts on the 26th day of February, which I think was quite within the time limit provided in the Controverted Elections Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who was the petitioner?

Mr. BOIVIN: I have no knowledge of his name.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Page.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He was a Liberal, was he not?

Mr. BOIVIN: I think he was. When Liberals attempt to contest an election they always proceed in the regular way. They do not attempt to bring before parliament things which should go before the courts, and it would not be a great surprise to us if it was discovered that the petitioner was a Liberal. But in any event, if my hon. friend desires to insinuate that he may not proceed with his petition after the session has ended, let me remind him that any other person, including Mr. Collins himself or any of his friends, can intervene and take up the action and continue it before the courts. The trial should be held before the court and not before parliament. If this petition is received, it will mean that every time an election is contested, every time the right of a member to his seat is brought into question, it can be done by petition to parliament. It will mean that every time a returning officer or a deputy returning officer makes a mistake, it can be brought here for consideration.

5 p.m.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A mistake?

Mr. BOIVIN: Mistakes are sometimes made inadvertently, and sometimes maliciously, and it is pretty hard for us to say, until the courts have decided and given judgment, whether mistakes were made maliciously or not. I know of elections that have been lost because the deputy returning officer neglected to initial the ballots. Nobody could say that it was done maliciously, or that it was done for the purpose of robbing any member of his seat.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does the hon. member contend it is a mistake when the man is convicted and sent to the penitentiary for his offence?

Mr. BOIVIN: That sentence has been appealed from. The man is entitled to be called innocent until—

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the ground of the appeal? The wildest technicality ever known.

Mr. JACOBS: The ground was that he was not satisfied with the verdict.

Mr. BOIVIN: My right hon. friend contends that this parliament should substitute itself for the courts, and that in all cases election petitions should come here—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not ask that at all; never suggested it.

Mr. BOIVIN: Owing to an irregularity in this election—

Mr. BENNETT: No irregularity at all—a crime.

Mr. BOIVIN: Owing to a criminal irregularity, if you like—

Mr. MEIGHEN: By our officer.

Mr. BOIVIN: By our officer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: An officer of parliament.

Mr. BOIVIN: The officer of my right hon. friend as well as of myself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But appointed by the government.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am glad to hear him say that only for that reason this petition must be received. But if all other officers made mistakes, would all the petitions have to be received here? If, for instance, a political party desired to exercise partisanship to the highest degree in a house where the government majority would be forty or fifty over the party on the other side, and if all petitions came to the House instead of being heard by the legally constituted tribunals of the land, would it not be possible for a partisan majority to oblige almost all of the members in the minority to vacate their seats? That certainly would happen. It sometimes did happen many years ago, and that is why parliament in its wisdom decided that these questions should not be dealt with here, but should be decided by judicial and independent tribunals. If those legally constituted courts find any irregularity or any criminal act on the part of any officer, it is the duty of the judge hearing the matter to report to Mr. Speaker, who reads the report to the House at the opening of the next session. Then is the time for parliament to judge the act of that officer. The petition before you, Sir, is worded in plain English. It is a request that the hon. member for Peace River leave his seat and give it to his defeated opponent in his last election. Before he is asked to do that, we should not look at what took place in one particular polling subdivision, but the court legally empowered to do so should consider what took place in every polling subdivision, and when that has been determined it will be time for parliament to decide what punishment should be meted out to any guilty officer and consider any amendment that should be made to the election act. There is one amendment which never should be made. That is an amendment which would take out of the hands of an impartial judge or tribunal and refer to party politicians all matters connected with the election of members to this House.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): May I be permitted to say a word on the point of order? I will endeavour to discuss the point raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) without wandering as far afield as the hon. Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Boivin) has done in the remarks he has addressed to the House.

The question in a way is a simple but very interesting one. It is at the same time a most important question and involves the right of a British subject to petition this parliament, a right which is laid down by all constitutional writers as an inherent right in our citizenship. A British subject has lodged a petition before this parliament, and the question is whether or not his petition should be received. That, I understand, Mr. Speaker, is the sole question raised this afternoon by the Prime Minister. I am not going to discuss the merits of the case as presented by my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), but will content myself briefly and solely with a discussion of the right of Mr. Collins to lay a petition on the table of this House and have it received by the House. If our constitutional rights are to be brushed aside with the indifference which has been displayed this afternoon by hon. members opposite, I think the time has come when we should lay down some definite rule upon the matter. That the right exists there can be no question. A citizen of this country desires to exercise that right; the question is should parliament refuse him that right.

The Prime Minister has cited certain precedents to the House. In the two earlier precedents, that of 1874 and of 1881, it would appear that the Speakers of those days ruled that the petition should not be received. These were early cases, but I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the earlier decisions have been superseded by what took place in this House in connection with the Queen's election case, I think, in 1887 or 1888, followed by another decision in the year 1900 known as the West Huron election case. I am leaving out for the moment the Coderre case, because I understand that no petition was presented in that case. I take my information on that point from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald). Let us turn to the two more recent cases in which petitions were presented and received, notably the Queen's case in 1887 and the West Huron case in 1900. If in the earlier cases the petitions were not received by the House should we be bound by them in the face of what was done in the two more recent cases? Surely the earlier cases have been overruled and superseded, and the law and custom of this parliament at this moment has been settled by the course adopted in both the Queen's and Huron cases, where the petitions were received by this House.

I do not say anything as to the ultimate fate of the petition. I say nothing whatever as to what may or may not be done, or what may be the fate of any motion which may be made hereafter in respect of this petition. But what is our duty at the present moment? I can only repeat what has been said by the hon. member for West Calgary in support of the precedents which have been cited. These precedents were supported by parliament. Objection was taken in the Queen's election case that the petition should not be received. The Minister of Justice of that day was inclined to think there was great force in the argument, but he informed the House that, having regard to the whole situation, he believed the petition should be received. It was received and was referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections. Is there any reason, Mr. Speaker, for departing from that decision in the present instance?

Then in the West Huron case in 1900 the petition was likewise received by the House. Subsequently it was thrown out or turned down, but it had been received by the House.

Is there a reason for departing from the established practice of the House on these two occasions? These are the two most recent cases. This petition does deal both directly and indirectly with an officer of this House; there can be no question of that. I am not referring to the prayer of the petition, in which the petitioner claims the seat, but I am referring to the allegations which are made on the face of the petition, the statements of fact that appear upon it. Nothing is more clear than the fact that the conduct of an officer of this House is very gravely brought into question, and I do not think anyone would argue for a moment that this House has not the sole supervision and control of its own officers. That gives us jurisdiction and the right to receive the petition, on the ground, if on no other, that the conduct of one of the officers of this House is impugned. Rule 80 is a very definite rule on that point and reads:

> If it shall appear that any person hath been elected and returned a member of this House, or endeavoured so to be, by bribery, or any other corrupt practices, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against all such persons as shall have been wilfully concerned in such bribery or other corrupt practices.

What is the first clause of the rule? It provides that if it shall appear that any person has been connected with bribery or other corrupt practice this House shall speedily inquire into the matter. We have the right to inquire in regard to our own officers; we have the right to discipline, to punish our own officers. Notwithstanding that the courts of the land have punished an officer of this House for a criminal offence, we still have the right to summon him to the bar of the House or before the committee and to deal with him as we see fit. Rule 80 is in our rule book expressly to deal with a case such as that which is now before Your Honour.

I submit that on the point of order there is little to be urged in support of it and much that can be urged against it. I am not going to attempt any discussion of the merits or demerits of the question in connection with the election contest in Peace River. I know nothing of the facts save what I have read in the newspapers or heard from the language of the petition. The petitioner has made it appear, in the spirit of rule 80, that a certain condition existed during that contest rendering it the duty of this parliament to make an inquiry. I submit that on the question of order Your Honour should have no hesitation in deciding that the last two precedents, the cases of Queen's and Huron, are now the established practice of this House and should be followed in this instance.

If the petition is received the next step is of course a motion. I do not know what might be said on the motion, whether it should be referred to a committee or not. The argument will no doubt take place upon that motion; but surely we are not going to deny a British subject the right which is inherent in his citizenship, namely, that of lodging a petition before this parliament and of having that petition received. That is all we ask.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor-General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has just said, the question which is now before the House is not that of the merits or demerits of the respective contesting parties before the courts in the Peace River constituency, but simply the point of deciding whether the petition presented by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) should or should not be received.

This afternoon, as in all matters of this nature, we have had abundant evidence of the wisdom of those who in 1874 decided that election matters should be taken away from the competency of parliament. We have listened to very learned lawyers on both sides and not to my surprise I have noticed that instinctively political feeling has crept into the arguments which we have heard. What conclusion must we draw, what inference must we arrive at, other than that if Your Honour comes to the conclusion that the petition has anything to do with the election itself, Your Honour should follow the rule laid down by your predecessors and decide that the petition should not be allowed to be received by the House?

Any lawyer conversant with parliamentary law or constitutional precedent must reach the conclusion, first, that parliament decided years ago—and that decision has been confirmed and ratified under many circumstances —not to interfere any longer in matters merely electoral. And why so? Because when parliament decided controverted elections, either when the House was sitting as a whole or when the House delegated its powers to a select committee, parliament ceased to exercise purely legislative powers or functions and exercised judicial powers. There is one great underlying principle of the British constitution, and its greatest safeguard—this the hon. member for West Calgary will not deny —namely, that executive, legislative and judicial powers should not interfere with one another. I say with pride that the judiciary of Canada can be compared favourably with the judiciary of any other country. Why should we, especially in view of the most peculiar and special conditions under which this parliament has met, take away from judges, take away from duly constituted and established courts, a question which belongs to a judicial tribunal, a court presided over by a judge, merely for the purpose of having witnesses bring before a committee, evidence which in all probability cannot be judged by the members of that committee without their being biased by political feeling? There is no doubt that parliament has divested itself of the function of judging cases of controverted elections. The only reason for the receiving of this petition would be that advanced by the hon. member for West Calgary, namely, that it deals not with the election itself but with the conduct or behaviour of an officer of this House. If my hon. friend is right in that contention the petition should be received. If Your Honour comes to the conclusion that his contention is not right, the petition should not be received.

What is the petition? The hon. member for West Calgary has read it; he has read not only the allegations which are the basis for the conclusion, but the conclusion itself of the petitioner Collins. The petition, therefore, is divided into two parts which must not be confused. The first part consists of allegations of fraud committed by certain electoral officers. There is no doubt that parliament has absolute authority to deal with those officers. We can deal with them either directly by calling them before a committee or before the House, or indirectly under the provisions of the Elections Act or the Controverted Elections Act, when a report is sent in to Your Honour giving Your Honour the facts and knowledge of any fraud committed by those officers. But that petition does not ask that any officer in that constituency who might have committed fraud be punished by this House or by the committee. The conclusion of the petition is the essential section, and an examination of it will lead Your Honour to a decision on this point of order. The conclusion is, not that Robb or any other officer should be punished or reprimanded, but that the sitting member be removed and that the petitioner himself be given his seat. The conclusion is, therefore, that we as a House of Commons, either ourselves or through a committee, shall supersede the judicial tribunals of the country in deciding who shall be the member to represent in parliament the constituency of Peace River. I do not think that a single hon. member in this House this afternoon, no matter on which side he sits, will deny that the petition presented by the hon. member for West Calgary, if accepted, would have that effect. We are to decide who shall represent Peace River in the House of Commons, according to the petition. Well, in 1874 parliament decided once for all that these matters should no longer be within its competency.

I come now to the last point. Hon. gentlemen opposite ask, why should we not receive the petition? Well, Mr. Speaker, the receipt of the petition would be followed by a motion for its reference to the committee. There is another principle of parliamentary law which cannot be contradicted by any lawyer in this House, and that principle is that the House, under the direction of its Speaker, shall take no action and follow no line of procedure without having a practical object in view. We are not here to waste time. We are not here to lose or waste the money of the Canadian people who sent us to parliament. Every resolution that comes before the House, every petition that is presented for the consideration of parliament, must have a definite object in view. That principle is well established. But what would be the practical object of this petition even if it were received?

Mr. CHABOT: Justice.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend from Ottawa says, justice. I am also of his opinion, and I will show before I get through how justice coincides with my contention. What, I ask, would be the practical outcome of the acceptance of this petition? The hon. member for West Calgary would move that it be referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections and the House would decide one way or the other. If the House decided to refer it to the committee, the committee, unless we ignored all precedents that have been established during the past fifty years, could not possibly decide who the sitting member should be, because that is a matter for the courts.

In conclusion let me say that this is not a matter of politics; it is a matter purely of law. In the first place I say that the petition should not be received, for its conclusion is a request that this House decide a controverted election; and, secondly, I am opposed to its reception for the reason that even if it were referred to the committee the committee could not take any practical action upon it. Now, as to the justice of the matter. Here we have a fellow member who enjoys the esteem of every hon. gentleman in this House, and as opposed to him there is the petitioner, against whom I have nothing to say but who claims the seat. I understand that there was also a third candidate. Are we then, if we have any feeling of justice and fair play, to constitute ourselves a tribunal, setting aside all precedents governing cases of this kind, and decide this matter in the interests of one party or another? The hon. member for West Calgary observed, indeed, that it was important that Collins should be here, because if he were the government might be out. I do not care whether the government remains in power or goes out, but I stand for the principles of fairness and justice, principles which were written into our statute books in 1874 and which have been observed ever since. What was good enough for Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir John Thompson, what was good enough for Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden, is good enough for the smaller men who sit now in the House in their stead.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I have sat this afternoon nearly three hours listening to this debate, which has been largely between lawyers; for apart from the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) no one so far has spoken who was not of the legal profession. As an ordinary member of the House who has had no legal training, but who trusts that he has an appreciable sense of fair play, I wish to add a few words to what has been said.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) in his concluding remarks declared that this was entirely a matter of law. I do not share that view, Mr. Speaker. I contend that it is absolutely a question affecting the honour of parliament and the rights of the people of Canada, in relation to the composition of this House. The action of the Prime Minister in raising the point of order as to whether or not the petition should be received may be briefly summed up. The motion, shorn of all its ornamentation, will in effect allow the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) to retain his seat in the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to take exception to the remarks of the hon. gentleman. I did feel that when he rose it would be impossible for him to proceed without making insinuations which he had no right to make.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask hon. members to keep silence. I cannot hear what the Prime Minister is saying.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that I resent strongly the attempt of the hon. member to misrepresent my motives in raising the point of order. I object to the interpretation he places upon the motion. I have a duty as leader of the government to help to see that the laws which parliament has enacted for specific purposes shall be carried out.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am discussing a point of order. I say it is my duty to see that the laws which have been enacted to maintain the independence of members of parliament shall be respected, and my purpose in raising the point of order this afternoon is to see that nothing shall be done which may tend to impair the independence and the freedom of speech or action of members of parliament.

Mr. MANION: I hardly see the necessity for the heated remarks of the Prime Minister. Let me say at once that I did not intend to cast any reflection whatever upon him, though I see he did not hesitate to reflect upon myself. I did not seek to imply at all that there was any base motive underlying his procedure this afternoon. The point I am trying to make is that the logical conclusion of his motion will be to enable the hon. member for Peace River to retain the seat which he now holds and to which, as some of us contend, he is not entitled. That is the sum and substance of what I was saying. I did not intend at all to reflect in any way upon the Prime Minister. As a matter of fact, if I cared to do so, I might point out many instances in which he has reflected on me. I have no hesitation in meeting the Prime Minister here or elsewhere. However, I wish to deal with this matter now from the standpoint of an ordinary member of the House, and I will not be deflected from that by the heated and unnecessary remarks of the Prime Minister.

I was pointing out the actual effect of the action of the Prime Minister in trying to keep this petition from the House on a point of order. In regard to points of order I have heard the Prime Minister himself and my good friends to my left composing the Progressive party—of which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) is a member—many times in this House submit this argument: In the name of fair play and fair dealing we should not pay too much attention to points of order, but should direct ourselves to the practical issues before parliament. Practically the whole afternoon we have heard argument as to the absolute necessity of living up to the rules of the House. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in giving your ruling—and that is the point I am dealing with for the moment—you will be governed not only by the precedents of the past, but I have no doubt that you will also be governed by your long parliamentary experience and your respect for the honour and high standing of this House. I believe it is not always the duty of a Speaker —if I may say so—to give a ruling which adheres strictly to precedents, especially after a debate such as this; he should also consider what is fair and just. In this case I submit there is such an opportunity for the Speaker to show his high-mindedness by not allowing himself to be controlled absolutely by precedents one way or the other.

The Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) pointed out that this was not a question for parliament to decide at all, but for the courts. I repeat, Sir, that to my mind this is a question for parliament to decide. It surely is one of the duties of members of this House to decide as to the character of those who shall sit here to legislate, and if it is their opinion that some member is illegally sitting in the House, then it seems to me it is their duty to say so. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) a few moments ago stated that this petition was for the purpose of unseating Mr. Kennedy and seating Mr. Collins, but that is only if the committee to which this petition would properly be referred so decided.

The reason, Sir, why I have taken part in this debate is not because I felt I could add anything to the legal argument regarding the point of order, but because last evening after the House rose I happened to be reading a book published many years ago which dealt with a case so much like the one now before us that I thought it was worth while quoting from the volume, and I shall do so with all the greatest pleasure because my good friend the Solicitor General has often been in the habit of citing Charles James Fox. Fox, you will remember, was a brilliant Whig, and in the election of 1784 he ran for the constituency of Middlesex. It was a two-seated constituency and there were three candidates. The bailiff, who acted as returning officer and who was a political partisan, took the attitude of refusing to make a return of the election of Fox to the House. The younger Pitt was the then prime minister of England and he supported the bailiff, contending that the bailiff was correct and need not make a return in this case. One of Fox's friends moved a motion, which I shall not read, to the effect that the bailiff must be forced to bring in the return of that election which he had so far failed to do. Fox had run for another seat and was a member of the House although not for the county of Middlesex. The motion was debated, and the words of Fox are so apropos to the question now before us that I propose to read them for the benefit of hon. members. Addressing the House, Fox turned to Mr. Pitt and uttered this warning:

To the right hon. gentleman over against me I will beg leave to offer a little advice.

Perhaps I might offer this advice to the Prime Minister at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend will take his own.

Mr. MANION: I am sure the right hon. gentleman will never take my advice, and I am just as sure I will never take his.

If he condemns this measure, let him not stoop to be the instrument of its success. Let him well weigh the consequences of what he is about, and look to the future effect of it upon the nation at large.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: The Prime Minister says, "hear, hear." He is going to take the advice after all. I sincerely hope he sees the importance of dealing with it from the national standpoint as Fox advised.

Let him take care that when they see all the powers of his administration employed to overwhelm an individual, men's eyes may not open sooner than they would if he conducted himself within some bounds of decent discretion, and not thus openly violate the sacred principles of the Constitution. A moderate use of his power might the longer keep people from reflecting upon the extraordinary means by which he acquired it. But if the right hon. gentleman neglects his duty, I shall not forget mine. Though he may exert all the influence of his situation to harass and persecute, he shall find that we are incapable of unbecoming submissions. There is a principle of resistance in mankind which will not brook such injuries, and a good cause and a good heart will animate men to struggle in proportion to the size of their wrongs and the grossness of their oppressors. If the House rejects this motion and establishes the fatal precedent that follows that rejection, I confess I shall begin to think there is little to be expected from such a House of Commons.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask, did the House accept the advice of Mr. Fox?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is too impatient. The motion being put was rejected by the House of Commons by 195 to 117.

Mr. NEILL: And the advice?

Mr. MANION: And the advice. But I would counsel my hon. friend not to laugh too soon, because a few days later Pitt, on the same question being brought up again, moved as an amendment that the House should adjourn, and was defeated by 162 to 124. Fox was thereupon seated for the county of Middlesex.

Now, the point I wish to make is that one hundred and forty-two years ago—in 1784—the members of the British House of Commons of that time took the high-minded stand which I particularly commend to hon. members of this House, for they voted against their leader because they felt an injustice had been done to Fox, and they also felt that they should have something to say in deciding whether he should be accepted as the member for the county of Middlesex. I believe to-day it is the duty of this House of Commons to take a similar stand, and —if I may respectfully suggest so—I believe it is the duty of the Speaker of this House to rule on the same exalted plane in this regard, so that this House of Commons shall live up to the high traditions that the British House of Commons established one hundred and forty-two years ago.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will excuse me for the presumption of intruding into a debate which is usually reserved only for the legal lights, but I will be very brief, and as we have wasted so much time already it will not matter if we waste a little more. I say "wasted" advisedly, because the greater part of this afternoon has been consumed, not in debating a point of order, not in hon. members addressing themselves to argument to guide you in your decision, Sir—that was done in twenty minutes; nearly all the argument was devoted to emotional appeals to this House, and possibly beyond this House to the country, but principally to the ordinary lay members, to influence them, in case your decision should be appealed from, not to decide strictly on the rights of the question at all but to regard it from a sentimental and sympathetic point of view.

If the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) will allow me to make a suggestion for his future guidance and for the benefit of those at this end of the chamber, I noticed that while speaking of the legal aspect of the question he expressed himself to hon. gentlemen opposite in a tone quite inaudible to those at any distance from him, but when he came to the sentimental appeal, we could all hear him. I would suggest that we are not so unintelligent as to not be able to understand an argument founded on law, as well as an appeal of a sentimental character.

A great deal has been said about the—I could almost use the word—iniquity of a member sitting in this House, who may possibly be found at some future time not to be entitled to his seat. I think it is generally admitted that the hon. member could not resign now if he wanted to; that is the law, enacted by this parliament. The procedure or law which prevents his resignation is not a mere technicality to be taken advantage of by the hon. member; it is a deliberate enactment, that a member whose seat is being contested cannot resign. The inference, I suggest, is that it was thought more important in the interests of any particular district that it should have representation in the House, even by a member afterwards found not to be entitled to the seat. At any rate that is a suggestion which appeals to me as a reason for the enactment which prevents a man from resigning while his seat is in dispute.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) said that this House should regullate or have control of who should sit in it, with which statement I differ. In support of his contention he went back to 1784 for a precedent with which he asks you, Mr. Speaker, to comply, in marked contrast to his remarks of a few moments earlier when he asked you to cast precedents behind and decide in favour of the views he put forward.

Mr. MANION: The Speaker did not decide at all on that occasion; the House of Commons decided. It was not a precedent for the Speaker.

Mr. NEILL: What was the purpose of parliament in passing the Corrupt Practices Act and similar legislation? Was it not that we might be removed from any temptation to tyrannize by a political majority over the minority? It was felt that it was unbecoming, unwise, and not calculated to be in the best interests of our institutions that we should have an opportunity of deciding who shall be a member of the House, owing to the obvious temptations of political partisanship. Therefore, as one hon. member said, we divested ourselves of the right to deal with those questions and put them entirely in the hands of the courts.

I recall a precedent; I do not go back 184 years for it, but it is within my own recollection. There was an election in British Columbia in 1898, and the House met early in 1899. They did not have party lines in those days, so I am not attacking the sincerity or integrity of any party in this House, but it was a close House, such as we have here. A couple of votes might have defeated the government, and there were two members against whose election petitions had been presented. There were some irregularities, the exact details of which I cannot at the moment recall. The House took up the question of the right of these members to occupy their seats; the question was referred to a committee and the government brought in what was called an enabling bill, declaring that these two members were legally elected, thus validating whatever irregularities had occurred. I well recall the opposition of the day, whose legal spokesman was the late Justice Eberts. I was young and innocent in those days, believing everything I heard in parliament, and I was particularly impressed with the language he used in regard to this enabling bill. The opposition fought it tooth and nail; "Nailing hon. members into their seats by the corrupt government majority" was one of the mildest epithets applied. I remember the late Justice Eberts, standing with the bill in his hand, beginning his remarks with the words, "Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand one of the most, if not the most, corrupt pieces of legislation ever presented to this or any other legislature in the civilized world." That was the attitude taken by the opposition, and they talked for days and weeks about the impropriety and unbecoming action of the government. They said, "Why not leave it to the courts, where a fair and just decision would be made?" Other precedents were pointed to where men had sat in the House, although later unseated, and there was nothing to prevent that course being followed in this case. That was the attitude taken at that time, whatever its faults of logic or whatever partisanship may have been involved. I have always since been convinced that it is highly desirable that no political party should be enabled to exercise control which would certainly be partisan in the matter of who should or should not occupy seats in this House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I had not intended to speak on this point of order, Mr. Speaker, but there are one or two things which I think have not been made quite clear. I am going to address my remarks first to the very peculiar circumstances in which we find ourselves, and how these circumstances arose, with the idea of seeing that we quite appreciate the situation.

Let us clear away a little brushwood first. I do not think there is very much doubt as to the crimes committed. It is quite true, as the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Boivin) has pointed out, in making a strong argument in favour of Mr. Kennedy, that there is an appeal pending. But the minister did not go on to tell us that that appeal was taken on an absolute technicality; that no answer whatever is attempted to the charge that ballots had been switched, and that the facts are exactly as represented in the petition. I understand that there is no dispute as to that; so far I have heard of none in this debate. We can apparently take it for granted, therefore, that the facts are as represented, and that the crimes were committed as alleged in the petition.

Then let us move a little further. Is it a good thing that cognizance should be taken of these crimes; is it a good thing that the wrong should be righted? I suppose if we ask that question we put ourselves at once in the position of answering it; and the answer is in the affirmative. Here is an admitted case so far as the facts are concerned. I know nothing of what is going on or of what has gone on except what I have learned this afternoon. I asked my hon. friend the Minister of Customs on what date the petition which is making all the trouble here, this petition which is preventing Mr. Kennedy from doing the proper thing, this petition which is tying his hands and leaving him still with the stolen goods, was filed, and I have learned that it was filed on the 26th of February. I take it that my hon. friend's information is correct. I also learned that the petition was filed, not by Mr. Collins claiming his seat, not by any Conservative, not by anybody who was desirous of showing up these wrongs and having them remedied, but by the very party on whose behalf these crimes were committed. It is a petition launched in the Liberal interests. It is a petition brought by those who were the beneficiaries of the frauds committed and of the crimes that have been proven—the Liberal party. Why does the Liberal party take this stand?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend? I do not think he wishes to misrepresent my attitude. I have already stated to the House that the only motive I have had in asking the Speaker's ruling on this matter is that not only as leader of the government, but as leader of the House, I have a certain obligation placed upon me in regard to matters that pertain to the orderly method of carrying on business in the House, and to see that the independence and freedom of members of parliament are protected and respected. I have felt that by asking Mr. Speaker to give his ruling on the point in question before we get into a general discussion, which it was the evident intention of the Controverted Elections Act to avoid, I was taking the course that would attain that end with the most dignity and decorum. That is the only reason I have had for bringing the matter up in this way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend is not following me. I am not referring to his point of order to-day at all. I am leading up to the situation here, and I am pointing out that the petition which has been lodged against Mr. Kennedy was, according to the information I gathered from the Minister of Customs, lodged in the Liberal interests. I was merely trying to get the House seized of the real situation. I was next going to refer to Mr. Kennedy's importance to the Liberal party.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Under cover of points of order this afternoon we have had a direct attack made upon a member of this House who is placed in the position where he cannot defend himself. I do not think it is fair, and I cannot see that the present speaker is in order in beginning to show how this might affect the Liberal party or how it might affect Mr. Kennedy. It seems to me to be quite outside the point of order with which we originally started.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: At six o'clock a point of order was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) with reference to some remark made in regard to the member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). I would ask the hon. member for West York to confine his remarks to the point of order, as I do not think the question of the personality of a member of the House of Commons should be considered in the discussion of a question such as the one now before the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I entirely agree with your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but so far I have not contravened it. I have made no reference whatever to the personal character of the hon. member. I am, however, referring to the exact situation which Your Honour in the first instance has to deal with, having regard to the point which you are asked to decide and what may happen as a result of the ruling on that point of order. Parenthetically I would like to point out to my hon. friend who raised the point of order (Mr. Woodsworth) that I am rejoiced to see his change of heart. Earlier during this session precedent was something which was absolutely to be forgotten, not only by the hon. member himself but by the rest of the cohorts to your right. Precedent, according to their argument, was something to be overlooked; parliament was all-strong and all-powerful and could do what it liked. Sometimes people change their minds and sometimes they do not.

I was pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that we have at the moment an admitted case of wrongdoing by an officer of this House. In the first instance, to make my point perfectly clear, I am not for one moment saying that, assuming Mr. Kennedy had been guilty of an offence under the Elections act, this House could, in view of the statute as to corrupt practices, take any action. I do not think the House could, and the only point here made —and it has not yet been answered—is that this House has the right to review the action of its officers. We have here an admitted case of a serious offence by an officer of this House. The hon. Minister of Customs and Excise reasons closely; I think he has probably stated the point more effectively for Mr. Kennedy than anybody else could. But with his closeness of reasoning he has admitted two things. He has admitted that this House has the right to review the action of its officers. In the next instance he has admitted it has the right to remedy the wrongs done by its officers. I need not go further than to take the two statements made by the hon. Minister of Customs and Excise. Let me repeat, so that there will be no doubt about it, that in the first instance this House has the right to review the action of its officers, and in the second instance this House has the right to remedy wrong arising from the improper conduct of its officers. The hon. member qualified those two statements by saying that their wrongs could not be righted; that the actions of the officer could not be considered until the proper time arrived; that they could not be considered now. Why? Simply because be have a petition pending. Is there any doubt as to either of those statements or as to the ground upon which the hon. gentleman based his real argument?

Let me refer to one or two more of the hon. gentleman's arguments and I think, Sir, you will agree with me that the real gist of his contention was what I have just stated. He referred in the first instance to the mistake made by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) when he referred to you, Sir, as my Lord, instead of Mr. Speaker. He seemed to regard that as a clear and unmistakable indication that in his heart of hearts the hon. member knew he was making his argument in the wrong place. I do not suppose I need stress the absurdity of that argument, but it seemed to be taken very seriously by hon. gentlemen across the way. I do not blame them for taking it seriously; in the absence of all real argument it would do; but I need not to say, Sir, that it is impossible that this petition should be thrown out because of a slip of the tongue.

His second point was that if this petition be received we shall have two trials proceeding at the same time. I think the hon. gentleman himself subsequently abandoned that point. We all know that the trial cannot go on, unfortunately—that is, unfortunately if the hands of this House be tied—while the House is in session. There is therefore nothing in that point.

His third point was that even if the petition were received Collins would not benefit by our receiving it because there would be obstruction in the committee and the like. I wonder whether it occurs to you, Sir, that a threat of improper action on the part of a committee is a reason for refusing the just rights of a petitioner. If it be not, there is nothing in the third point.

His fourth point was that if the House received the petition in this case, petitions to parliament would be in order every time a deputy returning officer was mistaken. This petitioner is not here on the ground of any mistake. My hon. friend stressed the question of mistakes; he sought to point out how mistakes could be easily made, honestly made. I wonder why? It is useless to talk about mistakes in the presence of absolute crime, admitted and proved. Why do I say "admitted"? I say admitted, because as I understand the matter—and I have made the same statement before without contradiction—the appeal relied upon by the Minister of Customs and Excise is taken merely upon a trifling technicality and not upon the merits of the case, not upon the facts that have been proved. Therefore I am well within the mark when I say that the real argument made by the Minister of Customs and Excise is that at the present time this House can do nothing. We must remember that that statement is made after his answer to my right hon. leader that parliament has the right to review the action of its officer and that parliament has the right to remedy wrongs committed by that officer.

I was referring to the question of the time not being ripe for dealing with this matter. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out that the hon. member whose seat is called in question could not take any part in these proceedings. I think he is enjoying them. He was enjoying them this afternoon; he was in the House at the time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre interfered in his behalf. He is present now. When I was interrupted I was pointing out what is the vital thing having regard to the one point really made by the Minister of Customs and Excise, namely, that the time is not ripe for action on the part of this House to rectify the wrong. Why not? We have this petition filed on the 26th day of February against the return of the hon. gentleman. It was filed not by the petitioner or by a supporter of the petitioner, but by the petitioner's political opponent. The petitioner had nothing to do with it. It was filed on behalf of those who were interested in the crimes committed by Robb. We have this anomaly, that the reason why no action can be taken is because the real beneficiaries of Robb's crimes have lodged that petition! I wonder if it is possible for anyone to consider seriously the suggestion that nothing can be done now because the beneficiaries of this man's crimes have lodged a petition? If they are to be kept in charge of the proceedings in this way, it is a sorry day for justice.

I am aware of the provisions in the Elections Act as to other interests coming in and taking part in the proceedings. I am also aware how absolutely unworkable those things are. I have had to do with election petitions, and I know it is hard enough to fight election petitions when one has the right of way let alone having to carry on a three-cornered fight with a plaintiff in the position of sticking you in the back whenever he gets the chance.

How far have we got? We have reached the point that a political opponent has become useful to the government; that he has supported the government on every single vote prior to the 26th of February; that he was appointed on February 5 to the Customs inquiry committee on which this government's future depends; that he is being looked after by the government, while at the same time, on paper, supporters of this government are attacking the seat. Why? So that the hands of this House may be stayed, so that effect may be given to the argument made by the Minister of Customs and Excise. We have the right to correct wrongs committed by our servants; we have the right to discipline our officers. But, forsooth, we cannot do so as long as that petition stands. The government will hold the support of the hon. member for the session.

You, Mr. Speaker, are familiar with the election law, just as, I am sure, members of the government are. I have not had occasion for some time now to consult the statute, but if, as I fancy, my recollection is correct, it used to be the law at one time at any rate, that any man could be sworn and put into the box and compelled to say how he had voted. My impression is that this is still the law, and I have no doubt that the government is equally aware of the fact. But they know also that those people who were witnesses in the criminal trial could not be called and compelled to give evidence on an election petition.

Now, what is the situation to-day? Here we have an ostensibly proper return, and if anything is wrong with it how shall we get around the difficulty? On a criminal trial electors can be called and sworn and compelled to give evidence, but this cannot be done in the case of an ordinary election petition. In view of that fact is there any reason why, in a matter in which right and justice are at stake, a petition of this kind should be refused? The argument that we are here attempting to set aside the Controverted Elections Act is without point; it falls entirely by the way. No one is suggesting that anything is to be said against the hon. member, apart from the fact that knowing of this fraud, knowing that the seat was stolen from Collins by an officer of the House, he stands pat and exercises his functions as if he were indeed the representative of the electors of the constituency from which he comes, while as a matter of fact his election has been the result of the machinations of this officer. Apart from that knowledge on the hon. member's part, nothing can be said against him. So far as the petition itself is concerned there is nothing in its language in the slightest degree derogatory of the hon. gentleman.

What are the various circumstances that usually attend an action under the Controverted Elections Act? They are acts on the part of the candidate, the acts of his agents, the purchase of votes, and allegations of that nature. Your Honour is familiar with them all. But not one of these circumstances enters into the question at present under review, the only point at issue being the conduct of an officer of this House whom we seek to bring before parliament. I shall close by again pointing out what has been said by that hon. gentleman who, I think, has probably looked into the matter as closely as any one of us and who has spoken on behalf of the government. Certainly no hon. gentleman is more interested than he in seeing that in respect of himself he should present the strongest possible case. I refer to the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin). What did he say? This House, he declared, has the right to inquire into the acts of its servants and to redress their wrongs; but it would appear the House cannot exercise that right so long as the other petition is there. Is parliament to be so gagged and stifled?

Mr. HENRY BOURASSA (Labelle): May an ordinary member venture to participate in a scientific debate? If I may be allowed a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, I should like to state with the utmost candour my humble opinion on this whole question. It seems to me that we must distinguish clearly between, on the one hand, the right of any Canadian citizen to petition parliament upon any question which he believes it is the duty of parliament to consider, and on the other hand the object of that petition. In my opinion the government would have done the right thing in receiving the petition which has now been presented to parliament, just as I think parliament should receive any other petition that might be submitted by a Canadian citizen in respect of any other question. Then, upon ascertaining the object of the petition, it would be for parliament, or some committee of parliament to consider whether the petition was one that might properly be dealt with by the House and adjudicated upon.

With due deference to the decision which you may give, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that until a petition is received by parliament it can be decided whether its object is such as to require consideration. I am not very much versed in the history of precedents and decisions in relation to cases of this kind, but as a Canadian citizen and a British subject I would seriously hesitate before denying to any Canadian the right to petition parliament touching any grievance which he may think he has, and concerning which he seeks redress.

On the other hand, as regards the qualification of members of the House to sit in parliament, and respecting the circumstances connected with their election to the House of Commons, I think it was a wise decision which was arrived at some fifty years ago, to constitute a regular legal procedure through which anyone who desires to do so may contest the election of any member of parliament and ask that all the circumstances under which he was returned be probed. In this case, the simplest procedure would have been to receive the petition and submit it to the committee on Privileges and Elections, and on its being proven there that legal proceedings were being taken to find out whether the election of the member for Peace River is valid or void, that thereupon this House should await the decision of the tribunal to ascertain whether or not the present representative is entitled to his seat.

As a parliament I do not think we have the moral right to refuse any petition that is presented to us from any citizen. On the other hand, I think it is a matter for the committee on Privileges and Elections to decide whether that petition is sustained by facts and should be received. I quite appreciate the argument of the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Boivin) that it would be ridiculous to have two trials, one before a court sitting in Alberta, the other before a committee of the House, to decide whether or not the constituency of Peace River is properly represented by the present member or should be represented by another gentleman. On the other hand, I think the procedure followed in some other cases of a similar nature which have been quoted this afternoon was proper.

It seems to me that we should receive the petition, and that it should be referred to the appropriate committee. At the same time not only the friends of the government sitting upon that committee but all the other members of it should bear in mind that parliament having put upon the statute books a law under which all matters relating to the election of members to the House of Commons must be dealt with by an impartial tribunal, before which witnesses can be summoned to give their testimony and the parties interested can present their argument, that tribunal is the proper authority to deal with the whole matter and not the committee. I realize that from a certain point of view it is an absurd situation, and I quite appreciate the attitude taken by the Prime Minister, who in effect said: What is the use of receiving a petition which parliament under the present law must leave to the proper tribunal for final decision? I admit the soundness of his reasoning. But on the other hand I cannot forget the basic fact that if we deny to any citizen the right to petition this House upon any grievance, whether well or ill founded, that he may have, it would mean renouncing one of the fundamental principles of our parliamentary system of government and of British liberty, and so far as I am concerned I am not prepared to vote for such a renunciation. As I have already said, I recognize that it brings us to the absurd situation that we should receive the petition because as a matter of right every citizen is entitled to present his grievances to this House, but at the same time we should take proper care that the committee to which that petition is referred, or the House itself pronouncing after that committee has reported, should not annul the position it has taken with regard to controverted elections.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BOURASSA: Certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is a fact that witnesses at an election trial cannot be compelled to give evidence as to how they voted, then would it be possible to have the question raised in this petition adjudicated upon at an election trial?

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not quite catch the point made by the right hon. gentleman. As I understand it, parliament thought fit, a good many years ago,—and rightly so, I think—not to divest itself of the right to inquire into the doings of its officials with respect to elections, but to empower tribunals clothed with the necessary authority to look into such questions, to summon witnesses, to hear argument, and to decide whether or not wrongful acts have been committed by sub-returning officers or returning officers, or whether either of the candidates has been guilty of bribery or corruption or of any other wrongdoing which would justify those tribunals, acting in the name and under the authority of the parliament of Canada, to determine whether or not Mr. so-and-so is entitled to a seat in the House of Commons or should be excluded therefrom. Rightly or wrongly, parliament has decided, not to divest itself of its authority in these matters, but to delegate that authority to impartial tribunals, instead of leaving it to the will of a partisan majority in the House to decide whether or not a friend or an opponent of the dominant party should sit in the House. This I think, was a wise provision. If we deem it to be contrary to the privileges of parliament, let us repeal or amend that law, but as long as that statute stands as the expression of the will of parliament and the people let us respect it.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it would be a most improper procedure on our part and not calculated to maintain in the minds of the people any respect for our parliamentary institutions, to say: Because we are in a hurry to take a seat from one party and give it to the other, we will take the case out of the hands of the tribunal which is now considering it and ourselves decide whether this man instead of the other man shall take his seat in this House, and so increase or diminish the majority of one party or the other.

Therefore, so far as the merits of the question are concerned, I could not for one moment entertain the idea of having this petition considered on its merits, and say that the hon. member who was here a moment ago—and who I think should be out of this House while we are discussing his case—should have the question decided in his favour or against him, and that we should establish the right of his constituency to be represented in this House by Mr. Joe or Mr. John or Mr. Dick because of the action of one deputy returning officer out of two hundred, more or less.

On the other hand I do not think we should lay down the principle that any Canadian citizen should be denied access to this House with a petition for the redress of any grievance he may consider he has, whether he is right or wrong. I will admit there is not much logic in that statement, but if we examine the development of parliamentary government we must admit that there are many nonsenses connected with it which we must tolerate and accept as being among the guarantees of the liberty of the subject. Therefore, Sir, I am prepared to vote for the reception of this petition, just as I am prepared to vote for throwing it out of the purview of this parliament, because at present there is a judicial tribunal constituted under the laws of Canada to consider all the circumstances of the election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BOURASSA: Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but I have seen many cases in which both parties were interested, in which the same spirit evinced to-day has shown itself in one way or another. Precedents are in vogue; principles are laid down, but it is certain that either through a judicial tribunal or through this House, any party looks after its own interests. It is just as well to admit that fact frankly as to conceal it hypocritically. But there are a few principles of law and government stronger and more enduring than the small and passing interests of any party or group of men. One of such, to which I have adhered all my life and to which I will always be true, is the principle that any citizen has a right to appeal to the parliament of Canada for the redress of any grievance. I will never go back on that. I have imbibed it in my study of parliamentary institutions, and no concern of friendship or of personal or collective advantage will make me depart from it.

On the other hand, considering the political conditions of our time and country, I think parliament was right in deciding that all matters connected with electoral contests should be left to the decision of tribunals made up of supposedly impartial judges. When it comes to the merits of the question at issue, therefore, I consider that we have no moral right to decide upon the proper representative for this or any other constituency which may find itself in similar circumstances, because we have charged tribunals in every province of Canada to deal with these matters. These tribunals exercise the authority of parliament, under an act of parliament, which authority was, as a matter of fact, exercised by the old parliaments of Canada and England for many years. When it was found that such abuses of power, of partisanship and of passing majorities were occurring, parliament unanimously decided to leave to impartial tribunals the decision in matters of law as well as in matters of fact connected with the election of members of parliament. Upon these two principles I have acted, thought and fought during the twenty-five years I have been in the active public life of my country, and to them I remain true to-day.

To sum up these somewhat rambling remarks, I stand for the reception of this petition, because I would not deny to any fellow-citizen the right to petition this parliament. On the other hand, since the whole of this question has been debated in this House—quite improperly, I think—I stand for its reference to the proper tribunal instituted by this parliament to deal with all matters of this kind.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I have listened most carefully to the speeches in connection with this most important subject, Mr. Speaker, and I must say that in my opinion the debate has shown that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a mistake in the way he brought this subject before the House.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): He did not bring it before the House.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: He brought in a motion this afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made no motion, but merely rose to a point of order to avoid discussion until the proper moment.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The Prime Minister made a mistake in raising this point of order at this time. My reason for that statement is that the speeches have nearly all been on the merits of the case, and it seems to me that the remarks of the Prime Minister should have been made before the committee, where they would have been heard and received with proper attention. I agree with the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) in regard to the reception of this petition; it seems to me this petitioner ought not to be refused access to parliament.

What is the point at issue? The point is whether Your Honour shall rule this petition may be received, or that the point of order raised by the Prime Minister is sound. Last fall writs were issued for an election; the chief electoral officer was instructed to carry out an election under the act, and the returning officer for Peace River was appointed. What was he told? He was instructed to return the writs to Ottawa on a certain date, and to state what candidate received the greatest number of votes. In this case the deputy returning officer made a false statement of the result of the voting at his poll. There is no dispute about that; he has been convicted of changing ballots, and sentenced for the offence. Under these circumstances the writ was never returned to Ottawa in accordance with the act; in other words the writ did not properly state who had received the greatest number of votes. To say that this House has no authority over its own servants when misconduct of this kind has occurred is, it seems to me, going much further than anyone should care to go.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have referred to a case back in 1874 and a later case, but there were two still later occasions on which matters of this kind came before the House. I do not know so much about the case in 1887, but I remember very well the Huron case, which came into this House, I think, in the year 1900. It was referred to a committee of the House, and was argued before that committee for weeks before a report was brought into the House. Therefore I claim that Your Honour has a specific precedent for allowing this petition to be received by the House and dealt with afterwards in such way as the House may see fit. In other words, I claim that the Huron precedent of 1900 is a perfect precedent from the point of view of Your Honour in deciding the question before us.

I was very much struck with one of the arguments put forward by my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton), when he stated that under the Controverted Elections Act no power rested in the judge to compel any witness to say how he voted. In other words, the secrecy of the ballot has been guarded as strictly as it was possible to do it in our legislation, and as I understand it, no voter can be compelled in an election trial in the courts to say how he voted. That being the case, I put it to my hon. friends opposite that there is no way in which a case of this kind can properly be tried under the Controverted Elections Act. If the voters cannot be compelled to say for whom they voted, how is it possible to bring home this scandal in connection with the action of the deputy returning officer in Peace River? What happened there was this. As I understand it, in general terms, the deputy returning officer having the ballot box in his charge and under his authority, opened or got someone else to open it, took out the ballots that were in it, and substituted for them a lot of other ballots marked in a different way. At the criminal trial of the deputy returning officer, certain electors appeared and volunteered the evidence that they had voted in a certain way. They satisfied the judge and jury that this officer had committed a very serious crime, and thereupon the judge sentenced him, and not only sentenced him but made the statement that Collins was the man who should have been sitting as member. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit that on the merits of this case this petition ought to be received and referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections, where all these arguments as to why the case should be sent to the courts instead of being tried by a committee of this House could be submitted in a better way than they can possibly be argued here.

I am not a lawyer, and I am treading on dangerous ground when I deal with matters which lawyers have been discussing all afternoon. But if I am right in my understanding that under the Controverted Elections Act no voter can be forced to say how he voted, I would say that when parliament undertook to divest itself of jurisdiction in ordinary election trials for corruption and improper practices in an election as we understand them, it certainly did not undertake to divest itself of jurisdiction in a matter of this sort, where an officer of this House has committed the crime of changing the ballots and has wrongly declared the result of the poll, knowing that he was telling a falsehood. I do not believe the law passed in 1874 was intended to cover a case of that kind, particularly when this is the only place where a voter can be compelled to say how he voted. I submit to Your Honour, therefore, that as, at the election last fall, the returning officers were instructed to declare to this House the candidate receiving the greatest number of votes, and as this deputy returning officer in Peace River criminally changed the ballots and made a false return from his own poll, knowing it to be false, and as, in consequence, a false return of the result of the election in that constituency came into the office of the Chief Electoral Officer, Your Honour should declare that this is a petition which ought to be received by this House, and be dealt with by this House as it thinks proper.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention after the very exhaustive manner in which this subject has been treated by hon. members on both sides of the House to go at great length into a citation of cases in support of the point of order raised by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King).

May I first of all refer to the fact that a great deal of the argument adduced by hon. members on the other side of the House was, I think, argument which could properly come before the House only after 9 p.m. the petition had been received. The question referred to by my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) as to whether or not it was practically admitted that certain violations of the Elections Act had taken place—the same suggestion raised by my hon. friend who has just sat down (Sir George Perley)—has, I submit, no place in this argument.

The question that this House is asked to consider now is whether or not under the law as it stands this petition should be presented to the House. If the other question were opened, hon. gentlemen might very well recall the appeal which has been taken and the fact that a number of the witnesses who gave evidence in support of the charges have since had criminal prosecutions instituted against them, some of them now, I believe, being under arrest. The matter is by no means settled, but I submit that in referring to that I am clearly out of order, and I do so only in reply to what has been said by my hon. friends opposite.

May I also in answer to my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), who referred to the Donaldson case in the province of Saskatchewan, refer to something to which he, quite inadvertently, I have no doubt, did not refer? In reading from the petition in the Saskatchewan case my hon. friend did not read what is to my mind a very important paragraph.

Mr. BENNETT: I read it very particularly with respect to the court not having jurisdiction, and said that that differentiated the case. I pointed that out very distinctly.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am referring to clause (g), which says:

> Mr. Donaldson entered a petition in the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories contesting the election of Mr. Tyerman, which petition was outstanding and pending until the twelfth day of December, 1906, when the same was dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

The province of Saskatchewan was a new province at that time. Then I refer to the succeeding page where the matter is discussed --page 85:

> In places where acts providing for the trial by courts of controverted election petitions are in force, the legislature have on more than one occasion refused to deal with the question of the right to the seat as between two contending parties, and have limited the jurisdiction of the House to questions such as the personal disqualification of a person returned as member.

It is limited to the personal disqualification of the person returned as a member and not the question whether or not he should have been returned. But the Supreme court of the Northwest Territory having no jurisdiction to hear and determine questions relating to controverted elections, there would be no doubt that the legislature has what is called constitutional jurisdiction and has a right, in fact is bound, to hear and determine, through its properly constituted committees, matters in regard to the election of members. The only reason that case was ever allowed to be considered was because at that time no properly constituted courts existed in that province to try controverted election petitions. They were supposed, as is stated here, to have what is called "constitutional jurisdiction", on the plea that they, being provinces or territories, the jurisdiction must be vested somewhere.

Taking that into account, and having in mind the argument of my hon. friend when he cited that case, may I just refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the conclusion which I submit that inevitably leads to? Jurisdiction to try cases of this kind is placed somewhere in the wisdom of the parliament of Canada. I desire to congratulate hon. members on both sides of the House on the manner in which this debate has been conducted this afternoon. I suppose no debate of this kind was ever conducted in a more dispassionate, in a more judicial and perhaps more absolutely fair manner than the present debate But you have before you, Sir, a number of hon. gentlemen on one side of the House taking one view, and an equal number on the other side of the House taking exactly the opposite view. Apparently that is what has taken place in this House on various occasions when matters of this kind came before parliament. I appeal, to you, Mr. Speaker, and to every member in this House, if that is not the best evidence of the wisdom of those legislators who, back in 1874 or prior to that date, decided that in matters of this kind the man who was certified as being the man elected should take the seat. There is always more or less contest in every election, but whether it was a close election or one in which there was a large majority for one party, the man who was certified to this House by the returning officer, after the recount and all other proceedings had been concluded, as being the man elected, could take his seat, and the question of his right to that seat was not to be inquired into by a possible adverse majority in the House.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the hon. gentleman explain why it was that in 1900 the Huron case was referred to the committee on Privilege and Elections and discussed for weeks? It was brought up in connection with the election case, although it was years after the 1874 law was passed.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am going to refer to the decision, and I am going to read the review made by the right hon. leader of the opposition of the decisions as they stood in this House on the 17th March, 1913. In order to clear the right hon. gentleman's mind as to what actually took place, may I, even at the risk of trespassing on the time of the House, read what my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition said, at page 6142 of Hansard of 1913? After stating what the Minister of Customs and Excise has already read, the right hon. member said:

> It was that, since the passing of that act in England in 1868 and since the passing of a parallel act in Canada in 1873 these Houses—

That is the British House of Commons and the Canadian House of Commons—> —had divested themselves of all authority to inquire into matters connected with elections, save only the question as to the qualifications of the members elected —as to whether or not that member was a minor, felon or convict. That was the limit of its power; that was the contention of Sir John Thompson, and that contention was quoted with approval by the right hon. leader of the government. Sir John Thompson quoted as authority for his position the opinions of Lord Selborne and Lord Coleridge expressed in 1870 in the British House of Commons, on which occasion those two eminent judicial authorities said:

> "It is true we have divested ourselves of our jurisdiction over all election matters, but it does not follow that we have not the right to say that our writs shall be obeyed. The writ issued by this House calls upon the people of a certain county to elect a certain qualified representative, and we still reserve authority and jurisdiction to inquire as to whether or not they have returned duly qualified men."
> That was argued by Lord Coleridge and Lord Selborne.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Then he refers to Sir Louis Davies and he says:

> I apprehend that he would not now be adorning a bench of the Supreme Court of Canada if he had affirmed views of that nature. Sir Louis Davies argued this and this only.
> "It is true we have divested ourselves of jurisdiction over election matters, but we have retained jurisdiction over our own officers—our returning officers and deputy returning officers and over none other."

Mr. BENNETT: If parliament has no jurisdiction over the returning officer or deputy returning officer, then it follows that, if proceedings were instituted in the election court collusively by a member's own friends, for the first session the absolute control of this House of Commons would rest with the man who had robbed the ballot boxes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I see the point.

Mr. BENNETT: I read that this afternoon.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The hon. member is asking a question now in good faith, but if he had followed closely what I was reading he would not have asked that question, for this reason: I have stated the argument made by my right hon. friend that this House had jurisdiction over returning officers and deputy returning officers and over none other. I have used this argument, and I think when my hon. friend from West Calgary considers the matter, he will be satisfied that what the right hon. leader of the opposition contended, and what those who have supported this point of order have contended, is that the House has jurisdiction over its officers—returning officers and deputy returning officers —and none other. If that be right—and it is as clear as the English language will permit even my right hon. friend to put it—then parliament did not have jurisdiction at the time and it has not jurisdiction now over any of those over whom it divested itself of jurisdiction by the Controverted Elections Act. I refer to the candidate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to question the argument which I presented in 1913; in fact I stand by it, but I want to put a question to my hon. friend based upon this assertion. The matter now raised in the petition is not within the meaning of those words an "election matter" and therefore has never been relegated to the courts. The question is this: If the courts are forbidden to compel witnesses to state how they voted, how can the courts try on its merits the question raised in this petition?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to answer. I was rather surprised at my right hon. friend asking it when he asked it before. Is he serious when he suggests that men who have already gone into the box and sworn a certain way about how they voted, are not going to do so again?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that even if they can go into the box and swear how they voted any candidate should have to depend on their willingness to do so?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I took my right hon. friend's words down and the question he asked was: If a witness cannot be compelled to testify in an election trial, how are you going to find out how he voted? My answer to that is this, and I have not any doubt, but I am not giving an opinion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is perfectly clear that the Controverted Elections Act was framed to deal with the question which my right hon. friend said in 1913, and I say now this House cannot deal with, namely, the trial of a member of parliament. What my right hon. friend stated then was that the jurisdiction of this House was over returning officers and deputy returning officers and none other. It is as clear as the noonday sun that that must exclude jurisdiction to inquire into the rights of a member to retain his seat. That is a question of election. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, if my right hon. friend has forgotten what he said in 1913 or has changed his views, let me read further on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will stand by it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: (Reading):

Sir Louis Davis argued that at considerable length in this House; he reaffirmed it in 1900 in the West Huron case—

That is the case to which the last speaker referred.

—and in doing so he was careful to say that beyond these two cases—

That is, the returning officer and the deputy returning officer.

—parliament undoubtedly had no jurisdiction. That was the position of Sir Louis Davies, and that was unanimously followed by hon. gentlemen opposite. That was the argument presented; that was the limitation, and that alone. There was in those days no member of the Liberal party who had the temerity to stand in his place in this House and over that we still had jurisdiction over all election matters.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear. Will the hon. gentleman permit me again? I appreciate a great increase in the authority of my speech of 1913. It did not seem to have much effect then. I want to put the question again.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think it had perhaps as much effect as my right hon. friend's speech of to-day will have.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It should have had more. I want my hon. friend to answer me as a lawyer, aside from any circumstances of this case: If it is the law that a judge cannot compel a witness to say how he voted—I use the word "compel" again—how is it possible for a judge to try the merits of such a question as is raised in this petition?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It certainly is if the witness comes forward voluntarily and gives his answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Supposing he does not?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is not the point that we are arguing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But it is essential.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This parliament was under the disability of not having my right hon. friend in the House when that act was framed, but the men who were in parliament then framed that act with a view to meeting the requirements of the people of this country in connection with trials on election petitions. My right hon. friend need have no fear that it is not the best act that they were able to frame. If it is not complete it should have been amended before now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member try to answer my question now?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am considering only this question and the decisions. I must apologize to the House for speaking at this length, but it is necessary for me not only to convince other members but apparently to convince some members who have changed their views in the last few years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What about the point of order whether this petition should be received or not?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is the point of order, and the decisions are absolutely clear. I am surprised that lawyers of the calibre of hon. gentlemen on the other side who have argued this afternoon should, in view of those decisions, seriously argue that the petition can be received. If there ever were clear decisions upon the question of receiving or not receiving those petitions, the decisions referred to and quoted by my right hon. friend in 1913 make it as clear as it is possible for the English language to make it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There was no decision in that case.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But in all the cases in which petitions were considered. My hon. friend forgets, or he has not read this case to know, that all cases in which petitions were refused were cited in that case and cited by my right hon. friend. That is the difficulty. What would be the object of receiving the petition—unless an object which I do not for a moment suggest is what my hon. friends have in mind in opposing this point of order this afternoon—if after you have received it you cannot do anything with it? That is exactly the position my hon. friends would be in if a petition were received and this House has no jurisdiction over it. Why? Will any hon. member say that it would be a good thing for the conduct of elections, for parliamentary practice in Canada, to have the right of any member to sit in this House depend upon and be subject to a trial in which part of the tribunal would be an adverse majority in the House? I say that without meaning in the slightest degree to reflect upon the character of any member of any house of parliament.

That was the reason why parliament divested itself of jurisdiction. It was a good reason in 1874; it is a good reason to-day, and in spite of all the solemn warnings that have been given this afternoon against making the great mistake of again refusing a petition, I ask in the name of everything that points to good parliamentary procedure: What would be the reason for receiving the petition if you could not act upon it and try it out after you had received it? I submit, with great respect to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), that it is useless to receive a petition if after you have it and look into it you find no further facts than those which you already know, namely that it has been already submitted to a court of justice, and you can only return it and say you cannot act upon it. For that reason I represent most strongly that it would be establishing a most dangerous precedent and going back upon the rules of this House if we now departed from the established practice of over fifty years and received this petition. Far from impinging upon the rights of a Canadian petitioner by refusing to receive this petition. Your Honour would in my opinion be taking a dangerous step in admitting it. To receive the petition would be, I respectfully submit, Sir, a procedure contrary to all the decisions which have been given by your illustrious predecessors through all these years.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. BENNETT: Does my hon. friend not realize that the foundation of the petition is the fact that a court composed of a judge and jury has found a man guilty of having manipulated 111 ballots which were cast for one candidate and counted for another? That verdict, mark you, was given, not by this parliament, but by a duly constituted court.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Having so high a regard for my hon. friend's legal ability, I am rather surprised that he should refer to what occurred in connection with one poll out of a whole constituency and contend that, because the ballots there had been examined and had revealed the fact that a certain candidate had suffered, we should therefore come to the conclusion that an examination of other polls would not disclose, in favour of the man whose seat is now attacked, advantages that might more than offset the loss of the petitioner. There is the weakness of the hon. gentleman's argument.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not even suggested.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is suggested. More than that, it was stated by the hon. member for Peace River in the declaration he made to the House.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is under a misapprehension. What the hon. member for Peace River said was that polls were not opened where polls should have been, and that had those polls been opened the result would be thus and so. If my hon. friend will look at the election returns as tabled he will observe that in many constituencies polls were not opened where there might have been polls, but no suggestion has been made that there occurred elsewhere proceedings similar to those under review. The House will note further that in doing what he did Mr. Robb was acting for the Liberal candidate and not for Collins.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought up that point, as otherwise I might have overlooked it and the comment that naturally suggests itself. The finding to which my hon. friend refers is against a man named Robb. Now, I ask him again, what possible bearing could that finding in regard to Robb's having done something wrong have upon the right of this House to try the right of the hon. member for Peace River to the seat he holds?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is all right for my hon. friends to laugh, but they must not forget that the trial that took place was a trial with regard to a man named Robb who has been convicted.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): He robbed Collins of the seat.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Say that again so that we may all hear it Now the charge is not against Robb. There would be something to be said in favour of my hon. friend's argument if he were asking the House to enter into an inquiry in connection with something which Robb or some other official of the House had done. That, however, is not his case. I listened with care to the petition as he read it and I did not observe, as one might have expected, any reference in it to an investigation into the conduct of officials. There is no suggestion to that effect.

An hon. MEMBER: They are in the penitentiary.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Several of those who voted in certain polling divisions are, I understand, now under arrest or have warrants issued against them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not worrying about that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I suppose not. However, the point is this—and I want to refer to it again so as to make my answer to the hon. gentleman complete. If the petition asked for an investigation into something that Robb or some official of the House had done, then my hon. friend's argument would be right in line with the argument of my right hon. friend. But unfortunately, by the petition he has presented, he has put himself absolutely outside of that argument, and my right hon. friend's words again come to my relief. It is true that we have divested ourselves of jurisdiction over election matters, but we have retained jurisdiction over our own returning officers and deputy returning officers. For that reason I submit that hon. gentlemen have confused this petition with one of a different nature: we are not investigating the conduct of any of those officers.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): As I read the petition which is now before the House, I understand the point to be that in the recent election in Peace River one Robb, a deputy returning officer, did fraudulently destroy a number of ballot papers used by the voters at the time and place of the election and that he subsequently substituted other ballot papers for those which were actually cast and deposited in the ballot boxes. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Elliott) has stated that the point before the House for decision is whether or not, under the law as it stands, this petition should be received by the House. I presume the Minister of Labour will agree that inasmuch as, according to the evidence, the deputy returning officer extracted from the box certain ballots which were cast by the electors, destroyed them and substituted other ballots in their place, there is a civil point which should come before some judicial or supreme body such as the House of Commons. I take it that he will agree with me in that respect.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would agree with the hon. member if what the petition asked for were an inquiry into the conduct of the man who manipulated the ballots in that way. There is, however, no suggestion that the man who is petitioned against did anything of that kind, and that is the difficulty.

Mr. CLARK: I presume my hon. friend will agree that if the deputy returning officer fraudulently extracted from the ballot boxes ballots which were cast by bona fide electors and destroyed them, there would be a case in relation to which a petition could be taken to a judicial body or to parliament. It is now for us to determine whether that should be decided by the courts or by this House. Is that a fair statement of the case?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, it is not, because my hon. friend does not seem to be able to get clearly the distinction between a petition that does not ask this House to inquire into the actions of a returning officer as such—

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My right hon. friend says it does?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Let me ask my right hon. friend a question. By this petition is he seeking to have the acts of the returning officer inquired into, and nothing more? If so, he is within his rights.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. We are asking to have them inquired into, and if found to be wrong to have the only remedy applied that can be applied.

Mr. CLARK: Possibly we may disagree as to the interpretation of this petition, but I want to get a fair statement of the facts upon which my hon. friend and myself can agree as a basis for discussion. Let us set this petition aside for the moment. The facts as disclosed to this House are that ballots cast by bona fide electors and placed in the ballot boxes were extracted by the returning officer, fraudulently destroyed and others substituted therefor. Does that in my hon. friend's opinion constitute a case which can come before the courts or parliament, one or the other?

Mr. ELLIOTT: A case against whom, may I ask?

Mr. CLARK: Naturally it is a petition to determine who is elected. Does my hon. friend suggest that it would be impossible to bring before the courts or this House a petition to determine who is elected under such circumstances?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Absolutely. If my hon. friend had been following me he would have known that that was my argument exactly. If he presents to this House a petition to inquire into the conduct of that returning officer with a view to punishing him, or for such remedy as this House may see fit to apply, then according to the argument of my right hon. friend in 1913,—and I think it is sound—such inquiry could be made. But if he is presenting to this House a petition to inquire into the actions of a returning officer with a view to taking away a seat from one member and giving it to someone else, of course he is clearly without the jurisdiction.

Mr. CLARK: All I want my hon. friend to say is this. If these facts are true, that certain ballots cast in Mr. Collins' favour were extracted by the returning officer, fraudulently destroyed and others substituted therefor, is there any remedy open to him for the wrong done him, assuming that a large majority of ballots were honestly cast for him?

Mr. ELLIOTT: If he appeals to the right tribunal.

Mr. CLARK: What tribunal?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The tribunal that is now being appealed to—the courts.

Mr. CLARK: At last I have got a plain admission from my friend that there is a remedy, that Mr. Collins may petition and ask that the wrong done him should be righted.

Mr. ELLIOTT: He could petition the court.

Mr. CLARK: There is a remedy. Now, as the Minister of Labour has said, we must determine whether or not as the law stands such a petition should be submitted to this House or to the courts. I submit that parliament has placed that question beyond the jurisdiction of any court in the land, and I refer the House to the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, Chapter 6, Section 226:

> No person who has voted at an election shall, in any legal proceeding questioning the election or return, be required to state for whom he voted.

That section effectively withdrew from the jurisdiction of any court in the land the determining of such a question as is now before this House. In order to determine whether or not a returning officer has extracted ballots from the ballot-box which were bona fide cast for Mr. Collins and substituted others, we must call the witnesses who were summoned before the criminal court—we must call the electors who actually cast the ballots which were destroyed by the returning officer. There is no alternative, and under the statute the court in a civil proceeding has not power either to call or hear such witnesses.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is not what it says. There is no power to compel.

Mr. CLARK: I was very much interested to hear my hon. friend the Minister of Labour in answer to my right hon. leader state emphatically that these witnesses have already come before the court and given evidence, and will do so again. Does my hon. friend applaud that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: Yes, they went before the criminal court and were compelled to testify in order that the ends of justice might be met. But in a civil proceeding it is quite different; this parliament has put it beyond the power of a court to determine such a question.

Mr. POWER: Merely as a matter of information, would the hon. gentleman kindly read the section again so that we may see if there is any differentiation between a criminal court and a civil court?

Mr. CLARK: I shall probably have to read it two or three times in citing various cases, but I will oblige my hon. friend now:

> No person who has voted at an election shall, in any legal proceeding questioning the election or return, be required to state for whom he voted.

Mr. POWER: Does that cover the criminal law also?

Mr. CLARK: It does not cover criminal matters, and I will show my hon. friend why it does not. I refer to a case in the Supreme Court of Canada, known as the Haldimand Election case, which will be found in XV Canada Supreme Court Reports at page 515.

In the course of his judgment Mr. Justice Strong said:

Another case is charge No. 6 in the notice of appeal, namely, the charge that the deputy returning officer at polling sub-division No. 2 in the township of Oneida, improperly marked ballots received by him at the said election, from electors before depositing the said ballots in the ballot-box, and thereby prevented the said ballots from being counted at the said election, and the ruling of the learned judge, rejecting the evidence on behalf of the petitioner which was tendered by him at the trial in support of the said charge.

Nothing could be made of this charge without admitting the evidence of voters to show how they voted. This I hold cannot be done. To do so would, in my opinion, be a direct violation of the act which requires secrecy.

Section 7, of the Dominion Elections Act, enacts:

This is the section I just read.

"No person who has voted at an election shall, in any legal proceeding questioning the election or return be required to state for whom he voted."

It is no answer to this to say that secrecy is imposed for the benefit of the voter and that he can waive it, for I hold secrecy to be imposed as an absolute rule of public policy, and that it cannot be waived. The whole purview of the law is different from the English act and from the Ontario act. I am of opinion, therefore, that the learned judge rightly rejected the evidence though I may not be able to agree with the grounds he put it upon.

The Minister of Labour said that facts such as those appearing in this petition should undoubtedly be heard by some court, some judicial or supreme body; they should be ventilated, investigated and a decision rendered. Under this act there is only one body which can deal with such a question. The House of Commons of Canada has reserved to itself the right to determine such a matter It may seem strange that in the recent criminal trial, which took place in Alberta before Mr. Justice Walsh, evidence of voters stating for whom they voted was admitted. There is a very clear distinction between matters which come under the Controverted Elections Act, civil matters, and criminal matters. On that point I refer Your Honour to the case of Regina versus Saunders, 11 Manitoba reports, 1896, at page 563. Mr. Justice Dubuc held:

In the Haldimand election case, 15 S.C.R. 495, it was held that, under the provisions of section 71 of the act, secrecy of the ballot is an absolute rule of public policy, and it cannot be waived.

The court has to give effect to this statutory enactment; but the provision has a restrictive qualification which must not be overlooked. It says that no person shall be required to state for whom he voted in any legal proceeding questioning the election or return and not in any legal proceeding whatsoever. If this point had been raised in the trial of an election petition,—

And I ask you, Mr. Speaker, as well as my hon. friends opposite, to note particularly these words.

—it would have to be held that the evidence was absolutely inadmissible. But in this case the evidence was given in a trial on an indictment charging a criminal offence. When the witness Phillips was asked to state for which of the candidates he marked his ballot paper and voted, objection was raised to the question by the counsel for the defence on the ground that such evidence would be inconsistent with the secrecy of the ballot, and contrary to public policy. The learned Chief Justice, before whom the case was tried, allowed the question to be asked and answered, and it does not appear that the witness was unwilling to answer the question. There is nothing in the Dominion Elections Act, or in any other statute, declaring that, in the trial of a criminal offence, such a question cannot be asked and should not be answered.

I think, therefore, that the evidence was properly received, and that the first question submitted to the court should be answered in the affirmative.

Surely it is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that there is no judicial body in existence in this country which can effectively inquire into the matters presented in this petition, nor is there any body other than parliament itself which can effectively give a remedy to the aggrieved party. That matter has clearly been placed beyond the jurisdiction of any court whatever, and there is only one body that can effectively deal with it.

Mr. POWER: Is that laid down in the petition?

Mr. CLARK: Is what laid down?

Mr. POWER: That there is no judicial body which can effectively deal with the situation?

Mr. CLARK: Certainly not. Matters of law are never alleged in petitions; my hon. friend knows that very well. The whole point involved in this petition is whether or not the returning officer extracted ballots bona fide cast for Collins and substituted others, thereby depriving Collins of his seat in this House. As the Minister of Labour said, there must surely be some body in existence which can give a remedy for such a state of affairs.

Under the authorities, Mr. Speaker, I submit that it is perfectly clear that only one body can apply the remedy in this case.

Mr. SPEAKER: That, I suppose, concludes the debate on the point of order. This question is far too important to be decided this evening, and I ask the House to bear with me for a few days until I have read over the debate and searched through all precedents and statutes cited this afternoon. By Thursday I hope to be in a position to give a ruling

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume, Mr. Speaker, that in the event of the decision which I anticipate, that the petition be received, there will be no notice required for a motion to commit that petition to the committee. That is, it can be moved without notice?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman must not anticipate my decision.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I only say in that event we ask to give notice now, that we may not be required to wait longer.

Mr. SPEAKER: This will serve as a notice.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, May 3, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J Manion.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (South Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, as the representative of an important constituency in the great city of Winnipeg I deem it my duty to say something in this debate with regard to western conditions and western possibilities as well as conditions in general throughout Canada, in view of the fact that we are suffering in all parts of Canada to-day as a result of the lack of responsible government in our country. But what else have we a right to expect when we remember that no country in the civilized world has ever been known to approach anything like sound progressive administration under a compromise government? Who should know better than my right hon. friend opposite (Mr. Mackenzie King) that group government, compromise government, is nothing more than government from hand to mouth, nothing more than government that exists from day to day by way of "pull devil, pull baker?"

I would like to call my right hon. friend the Prime Minister as a living witness to the truth of this statement. During the recent campaign, from all the platforms of this country he made clear at all times that neither group government nor minority government was the kind of government wherewith to achieve great reforms. The Prime Minister went still further and said that neither group government nor minority government was the kind of government to meet Canada's needs to-day. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that every hon. member of this House agrees with that statement made by my right hon. friend upon these various occasions. We must agree because of the very conditions that exist to-day under the direction of my right hon. friend opposite. He must know—and that he does know, it is shown by his own statement—that it is impossible for him in the situation in which he finds himself to-day to do anything calculated to advance the best interests of this country. I appeal to my right hon. friend. Canada, the country in which he lives, has been very kind to him in the past, but now he sits in office here as the clog on the wheel. Why will he not do something in return that will be for the advantage of this country, which has done so much for him?

This is no time, Mr. Speaker, to toy, to barter, to tinker as my right hon. friend is doing in respect of the government of this country. And what has been the effect upon the country? The effect has been to destroy confidence and security in this Dominion. All reasonable Canadians, in my humble judgment, should join in assisting to create that sound public opinion by which alone stability of government can be restored. Party government in the past may have had its difficulties, but we must never overlook the fact that party government has made this Dominion of Canada what it is to-day. In my judgment it is only under that form of government that confidence and security can be restored in this country. Under the administration of my right hon. friend loss of confidence and security has done more than anything else during the past eight or ten years to retard the progress of our Dominion. In proof of that statement I am going to give you just a few brief figures which, to my mind, make it abundantly clear that our country is going back, and going back rapidly, under the administration of my right hon. friend. These figures furnish, in my judgment, a very clear index as to conditions in all parts of Canada. I am going to show how much was collected in income tax when my right hon. friend came into power, and then compare that with the amount that is being collected to-day.

In 1921-22, the year my right hon. friend came into power, 18,840 farmers paid in income tax $1,299,104.54. In 1924-1925 only 3,061 farmers in Canada were able to pay income tax to the amount of $162,944.74; in other words, 15,780 farmers who were able to pay income tax when my right hon. friend came into power are not able to pay a dollar of income tax to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Were there not exemptions made between the two years my hon. friend is comparing?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think there were any exemptions made for the farmers except what are now proposed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There were exemptions made on account of children, which applied to farmers the same as to every one else.

Mr. ROGERS: It would not amount to much. The fact is that there are 15,780 fewer farmers paying income tax to-day than when my right hon. friend came into office.

Mr. DUNNING: Because the exemptions relating to children reached them.

Mr. ROGERS: Let me give a few more figures:

Mr. RYCKMAN: Children do not enter into this matter?

Mr. ROGERS: They do not enter into the corporation tax. These are facts that tell the tale of the condition of our country to-day Not only in respect to the matter of income tax but in respect of everything else we are face to face to-day with domestic problems the like of which we have never before been called upon to meet in Canada, problems that insistently cry for attention and solution, and my right hon. friend is as helpless as a child to do anything to solve them. We have our great problem of taxation, and we have the great problem also of emigration—one of the most serious questions we have to face. We know that we have a stagnant population to-day and we know that this government have utterly failed in their attempt to do anything in the matter of emigration. People are leaving this country in greater numbers than they are coming in. The policy of the present administration is so feeble that it can only be compared with some individual undertaking to suppress a raging forest fire with a syringe.

Then again, Mr. Speaker, we have the great problems of how to handle our grain in order that the producer may get his best price in railway freight rates, and so forth. We have the problem of how to divert our grain so that we can carry it over Canadian rails to Canadian ports. Last but not least, we have the great problem of our inherent right to arrange our fiscal policy along sound lines of confidence and of security. Liberal governments or compromise governments have never yet been able to grapple with these great undertakings. My justification for this statement is to be found in the fact that the Liberal party are unable to show to-day that during the whole life of our Dominion they have one outstanding Dominion-wide measure to their credit. We had a practical illustration the other day of the evil of compromise government. Parliament hill was thronged with thousands of men and women, numbered among the best citizens of our country, who came here to plead with my right hon. friend and with the Minister of Finance for the right to live, to work, and to assist in the upbuilding of this young and promising nation of ours. They were denied that right.

For that reason, Sir, if for none other, I am delighted to join in this debate and to support the amendment of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). I support it because it follows along sound lines of Conservative policy. The policy of the Conservative party is to keep the home fires burning in Canada. The policy of the Conservative party is to keep Canadian capital and Canadian man power working in Canada and not in the United States. The Conservative party believe that the sound development of our home market is one of Canada's greatest national assets; Conservatives do not believe in continental Europe being privileged to dump pauper labour products on our market to the detriment of our own Canadian labour. We do not believe in permitting our American neighbours to the south to dump their surplus misfits and surplus products on our market, to the detriment of the best interests of our Canadian labour. Ample protection of the industries of the United States has saved them from that dumping which has blasted Canada's prosperity under the administration of the country's affairs by the party opposite.

So far as the tariff is concerned, an explanation is due to this parliament from the Prime Minister and from the Minister of Finance as to why the promises made in the budget speech of last year have not been kept. Why did the government not implement its undertaking then made to appoint a tariff commission? The Minister of Finance declared that it was necessary that expert evidence should be available to the government before tariff revision could take place. In that same speech the minister said he was desirous of securing a commission well qualified to advise not only on tariff but on kindred matters as well. Can it be possible, Mr. Speaker, that the commission appointed on April 7 last is intended to serve a double purpose? "Kindred matters" open a wide field of opportunity. The expression may be interpreted to mean a board that is directed to be very sympathetic with the manufacturers when they are making their X-ray examination, and to leave the impression upon the mind of the manufacturer that he was indebted in some personal or other manner to the kindness of the present administration. If the government had any such idea in mind when this board was selected I commend them upon their selection. The chairman, as we all know, is an old tried and trusted politician, recognized for a quarter of a century and more as the guardian of anything and everything that would tend to the benefit of the Liberal party. I am sure the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) is entirely satisfied with the appointment of Mr. McKenzie who, I am sure, he regards as eminently fitted to fill the position of first mate to the chairman of that board.

The Progressive party in the province of Manitoba opened up a wide field for financial operations in the elections of 1921 and 1925. I can quite understand that some explanation will be due from me in respect to this statement. In 1921 a new and novel departure in political finance took place under the Progressive party in the province from which we come, a departure that was marked by the incorporation of a "New National Policy Committee, Limited," a company incorporated under the laws of Manitoba for the purpose of receiving and disbursing money for political purposes. According to the Manitoba Gazette the directors were practically all employees of the Grain Growers' Grain Company. It was a company formed to collect and spend money without falling foul of section 10 of the Dominion Elections Act, which states:

> No unincorporated company or association and no incorporated company or association other than one incorporated for political purposes alone shall, directly or indirectly, contribute, loan, advance, pay, or promise or offer to pay any money or its equivalent to, or for, or in aid of, any candidate at an election, or to, or for or in aid of, any company incorporated for political purposes, or to, or for, or in furtherance of, any political purpose whatever, or for the indemnification or reimbursement of any person for moneys so used.

The press of Winnipeg were very much interested when this notice was given in respect of those companies being formed by the Progressive party. Lawyers were employed to find out the direct meaning of those companies and this is the opinion of one of the most eminent lawyers in that city with respect to section 10 of the Dominion Elections Act. Hon. members must remember that this section is a child of the Liberal party, brought in and incorporated in that act as far back as 1907:

> Section 10 of the Elections Act provides that the only company or association which can legally pay or promise to pay any money, or make any loan or advance, either to a candidate or to a political party is one incorporated for political purposes alone. It would, therefore, follow that under the act a company may be incorporated for political purposes alone and be quite within the law in making payment of money to any candidate or political party. The only persons who would be legally entitled to ascertain the source of these moneys would be the shareholders of the company.
> Supposing such a company were incorporated to advance the fortunes of some one political party, and that some organization either within or without Canada were anxious of advancing the cause of that party for their own financial or industrial profit, it would be quite possible by paying their contribution to a campaign fund through the incorporated company to conceal the origin of the moneys. The successful candidate of that political party in making return of election expenses would show the receipt of so much money from the incorporated company, but there is nothing in the Elections Act which would force the candidate or his agent to divulge to the Chief Electoral Officer where that money was collected from. The incorporated company would be acting within the letter of the law, and no one opposed to that party politically, and to that company, would have any right to insist on any disclosure of the origin of the campaign funds.

I may surprise the House when I state that even in the constituency of Nelson represented by my hon. friend the Rev. Mr. Bird, a company was incorporated under the laws of Manitoba called the National Progressive Political Association of Nelson Constituency, Limited, to collect, receive and disburse moneys for political purposes in that constituency. The names of the directors of that company so incorporated were:

> Mr. James S. Paten, farmer of Benito;
> Mr. Jethro Clarke, farmer of Swan River;
> Mr. Robert T. McVetty, agent of Swan River;
> Mr. William C. Hunt, farmer of Swan River;
> Mr. Thomas C. Silverthorn, farmer of Bowsman.

These were the directors in the constituency of Nelson. Let me return to the hon. member for Brandon, who also was a director of a company and evidently trafficked in campaign funds; for I find that in the election contested by him in 1921 he was a director of a company incorporated under the laws of Manitoba called the Brandon Federal Progressive Association, Limited. The directors of this company were:

Mr. John Crawford, farmer of Brandon;
Mr. Robert Forke, farmer of Brandon;
Mr. George Gordon, farmer of Brandon;
Mr. Wellington Geddes Rathwell, farmer of Brandon;
Mr. Donald Gordon McKenzie, farmer of Brandon;
Mr. James Harris McKee, farmer of Brandon.

I want the House to know that this Mr. Donald Gordon McKenzie, farmer, of Brandon, by the kindness no doubt of my friend the hon. member for Brandon, occupies a place on the tariff board of this country. These are the names selected to manage political funds for the federal constituency represented by my hon. friend through a company that was formed, according to the notice of incorporation, for the purpose of collecting, receiving and disbursing moneys for political purposes. After the election of my hon. friend for the constituency of Brandon in 1921 this incorporated company was apparently bankrupt and had ceased operating. At all events it discontinued. However, previous to the election of 1925 the Brandon Federal Progressive Association was revived and restored to its legal position by order in council No. 43851 with Mr. Donald Gordon McKenzie again to the fore as one of the directors interested in the success of the hon. member (Mr. Forke) whose duty it was to collect, receive and disburse moneys for political purposes.

Mr. WARD: Is that not a much more honourable means of getting campaign funds than accepting contributions from large corporations in the big cities?

Mr. ROGERS: Wherein does my hon. friend find any difference between the two methods? Are not the contributions in the province of Manitoba derived from corporations? Mr. Donald Gordon McKenzie evidently won the warm approval of my hon. friend from Brandon. I refer to him because his name will be known to all Canada from now on as a member of the board appointed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a few days ago to consider tariff matters. Mr. McKenzie, I say, evidently won the warm applause and approval of the Progressive party for his work in connection with the collecting, receiving and disbursing of public moneys for political purposes in the constituency of Brandon, for he was promoted to a directorship on the United Farmers of Manitoba Political Executive Limited, with headquarters at Winnipeg. This association at Winnipeg was a sort of high muckamuck organization or, in other words, a sort of wholesale institution for the collecting, receiving and disbursing of moneys for political purposes in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. MANION: A sort of clearing house.

Mr. FORKE: Will the hon. member permit an explanation? The charter was renewed prior to the last election, the same names, I think, being included in it, but Mr. Donald Gordon McKenzie had nothing whatever to do with the election nor had he anything to do with the collection or distribution of funds. He was not connected at all with the election in Brandon.

Mr. ROGERS: I may tell my hon. friend that I have here the names of the directors, both for the city of Winnipeg and for Brandon.

Mr. BIRD: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? Can he tell the House what kind of organization supplied funds for my political opponent?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not know anything about my hon. friend's political opponent; I had nothing to do with the hon. gentleman's election.

Mr. BIRD: I may tell my hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BIRD:—that he had the blessing of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS: Now Mr. Donald Gordon McKenzie served with my hon. friend from Brandon in 1921 in his election, and he served again in 1925. He was also made a director of the association at the city of Winnipeg. The directors of this province-wide organization were not the same in 1925 as in 1921. They are to-day: William Robertson Wood, Edward Ellsworth Bayne, Peter Wright, Mabel Elizabeth Finch, Donald Gordon McKenzie, Colin Hamlin Burnell.

Mr. FORKE: I must correct the hon. gentleman. That is not the corporation in Brandon; it is the organization for the province of Manitoba.

Mr. ROGERS: I am speaking of the provincial organization.

Mr. FORKE: There is nothing wrong in it.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not suppose it would be possible for you to do anything wrong. Those at any rate are the names, and that is the position which Mr. Donald Gordon McKenzie occupied in the work of the party represented by my hon. friend. I am not surprised, therefore, that Mr. Donald Gordon McKenzie should be the first one whom the hon. gentleman would think of when he had an opportunity to make a recommendation for the position that gentleman now holds. No doubt he will be eminently fitted to fill that position with entire satisfaction to the member for Brandon and those who are anxious to collect, receive and disburse moneys for political purposes in that province.

Mr. BROWN: Is the hon. member attributing to the gentleman to whom he refers the same campaign tactics which he knows characterize his own workers?

Mr. ROGERS: I am just giving you the records as I have them. Let me say that I do not believe that the Liberal party, even with all its faults and sins, has ever organized—and I know absolutely that the Conservative party has never yet done so—a company to conceal contributions or anything else. This party does its business in the open. Now that my hon. friend (Mr. Brown) has seen fit to interrupt, perhaps I may give him some of the records in relation to his own constituency. I have them all here. As regards the Lisgar Progressive Association Limited, Incorporated, I find that the directors in 1925 were: A. S. Budd, druggist; Angus Currie, retired farmer; Harold McKay, student; John Cruise, farmer; Mathew John Shewfelt, farmer, all of the village of Pilot Mound. These were the directors whom my hon. friend from Lisgar had to carry out his work.

Now, I hope I have satisfied the House that whatever else may be said of Mr. Donald Gordon McKenzie's qualifications in respect to technical tariff matters, there would appear to be no doubt as to his qualification in the matter of political finance. It is very evident that the leader of the Progressive party and those associated with him from the province of Manitoba are not so simple minded, when it comes to receiving and disbursing campaign funds for political purposes, as they would like this House and the country to believe. If they had not found it good political business in 1921 to have all these companies organized and operating for the purpose of collecting, receiving and disbursing moneys for political purposes, why then in 1925 did they go to the great expense of reorganizing these companies with the object of again collecting, receiving and disbursing moneys for political purposes in the various constituencies of the province?

That is the record of the financial efforts of my hon. friends the Progressives from the province of Manitoba. I do not suppose that the Progressives in any other province of Canada are as far advanced in the iniquities of campaign funds as are the Progressives in that province.

Mr. BROWN: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member has referred to section 10 of the Elections Act. Is section 10 of that act the same as section 10 of the Elections Act as it came from the Liberal party? I say it is not.

Mr. ROGERS: I have given you the opinions of lawyers and I am satisfied to rely upon them. Conditions in the western provinces, I may say, have been very much disturbed as the result of the actions of the Progressive party during these two elections, and, I deem it my duty to let this House and the country know the manner in which they have been carrying on their elections in the past.

Now they talk about the tariff and about the seriousness of the taxation placed upon the farmers of western Canada. I want to say to them: Give the farmers in Manitoba and in western Canada generally a market for that which they produce, and they will neither ask for nor accept remedies born of political fright such as we had introduced the other day by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. The progress of the farmers of western Canada has been retarded by my friend from Brandon and by my friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) in the matter of their getting what is coming to them in transportation costs. This is a serious matter to the farmers of the west, and it is an equally serious matter to the people of the east, because I want them to understand that they are just as much interested in the condition of western Canada as are those who live there. The people of eastern Canada must never overlook the fact that railways and their workers, manufacturers and their employees, banks and their staffs can only preserve their positions and their property so long as the farmers of western Canada are assured of a fair living wage for that which they produce. The greatest enemies that the farmers of the west have had to contend against in securing that fair living wage are my hon. friend from Brandon and my hon. friend from Regina. They are two of the greatest sinners in this House in retarding the progress of the farmers of western Canada.

Now, in 1900 the government of Manitoba of which I was a member felt that it owed a duty to the farming community of that province. The people were demanding lower transportation costs, and we undertook to meet that demand. After much consideration we decided to acquire the Northern Pacific railway system, which had splendid terminals in the city of Winnipeg and about four hundred miles of railway very well located. The owners were willing to sell the property because at that time the railway was not in very good circumstances. I was honoured by my colleagues in being selected to go to St. Paul to discuss the purchase of the system in order that we might remedy the conditions complained of by the farmers of Manitoba. I succeeded in my mission and the contract is incorporated in the Dominion statutes. That contract was signed by myself on behalf of the government of Manitoba and by the president of the company on behalf of the Northern Pacific Railway on January 15, 1901.

Seven days later the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway came to Winnipeg by special train and offered the provincial government $7,000,000 for the contract. In this proposal, which I am sure the House will be interested to hear, he said:

> The company will lease for nine hundred and ninety-nine years from the government the Northern Pacific lines, including equipment and terminals, paying therefor an annual rental of $220,000 for the first ten years, $245,000 for the second ten years, and $300,000 thereafter.

Those were the exact amounts provided for in our contract with the Northern Pacific.

> The company will make the following specific reductions in its rates;—
> September 1st, 1901 grain and flour 1-1/2 cents per hundred pounds.
> September 1st, 1902 grain and flour 1/2 cent per hundred pounds.
> September 1st, 1903 grain and flour 1/2 cent per hundred pounds,
> September 1st, 1904 grain and flour 1/2 cent per hundred pounds,
> September 1st, 1905 grain and flour 1/2 cent per hundred pounds,
> September 1st, 1906 grain and flour 1/2 cent per hundred pounds,
> thus making a reduction within that period of four cents per hundred pounds from all points within the province.
> The rate on salt will be reduced forthwith to fifteen cents per hundred pounds from Fort William to Winnipeg, and to all other points in proportion, according to existing tariffs.
> The rate on coal Fort William to Winnipeg will be reduced to $2.50, to Portage la Prairie $3 and to Brandon $3.35 per ton of 2,000 pounds.

At that time the Canadian Northern Railway Company had quite a mileage in Manitoba, and the owners offered to take over the Northern Pacific system and give us a reduction of four cents per hundred pounds on grain and of fifteen per cent on general merchandise from all points in Manitoba to Fort William and from Fort William to all points in Manitoba.

Mr. PARENT: May I ask my hon. friend if all the documents he is referring to have ever been made public?

Mr. ROGERS: They are in the Dominion statutes. Now then, we felt that competition was very desirable and we accepted that offer. We entered into a contract with the Canadian Northern Railway Company under which they agreed that for thirty years they would continue the reduced rates on wheat and general merchandise. The arrangement was that the first year they would reduce the rate on wheat by two cents per hundred pounds and the merchandise rate by fifteen per cent. The Canadian Pacific paid no attention to the altered conditions of affairs. The Canadian Northern extended their lines very rapidly and with the acquisition of the Northern Pacific system they were able to get into Brandon, Portage la Prairie and various other large shipping centres, with the result that when in the following year the further reduction of two cents per hundred pounds went into effect the Canadian Pacific Railway management came to us and said: Now, you are getting the rate a little too low; we want to come in, but we cannot afford to compete with such a low rate. They said to us, "If you will raise your rate on grain by one cent per hundred pounds we will reduce our rate by three cents per hundred pounds and extend that rate to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta as well."

Mr. DUNNING: Those provinces were not then in existence.

Mr. ROGERS: The Northwest Territories were there; it is the same thing. Your neighbours and friends got the benefit of that rate which went into force on October 7, 1903. Let me say that that rate brought a return of over $200,000,000 to the farmers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta during the period it was in force. That was something for the people of this country, and this is the rate which the hon. member for Brandon and the hon. member for Regina have done everything in their power to destroy. They have temporarily succeeded in their attempt, to the disadvantage of the farmers of western Canada. Not only was that done, but it was done in such a way as to show, in my opinion, not very good judgment on their part.

A committee on transportation costs was appointed by parliament in 1922, with which

I will deal a little later. When Manitoba made that contract we had all the power necessary; there was no power this parliament could give to our province which we did not already possess. But we were making contracts with railway corporations, the Northern Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern Railway, which were operating under Dominion charters and which had to get from the parliament of Canada their power to enter into a contract. In view of that, the two companies and the provincial government joined in asking this parliament to give to the railway companies power to make the contract which it was proposed should be made. It was unnecessary for our government to ask for any further power; we did not require any assistance from this parliament, but joined in a request in the following manner:

That his honour the Lieutenant Governor be requested to forward officially a certified copy of the following act, passed by the Legislative Assembly of the province of Manitoba, on the twentieth day of March, one thousand, nine hundred and one, and intituled, "An act confirming a certain agreement respecting certain railways and respecting freight and passenger rates," to the honourable the Secretary of State for Canada, with the request on behalf of the government of Manitoba, that the government of Canada will introduce into the parliament of Canada at its present session, a similar measure and legislation confirming the identure in the said act referred to, and to enable and require the parties to carry out the same, in order that the true intent and meaning of the parties may be properly and fully accomplished.

That is the request we made to this parliament, to give the railway companies the necessary power. Parliament answered that petition by an act assented to on May 23, 1901, of which the preamble is indicated in the following:

His Majesty, represented by the executive government of the province of Manitoba, of the first part, and the Canadian Northern Railway Company, of the second part, have executed a certain indenture bearing date the eleventh day of February, nineteen hundred and one, and set forth in schedule B to this act; and whereas the parties to the said indenture of the eleventh day of February, nineteen hundred and one, have, by their petitions, prayed that it be enacted as hereinafter set forth, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petitions: Therefore His Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

Let the House observe closely that "His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada," enacted what followed. Now let me turn to the Dominion act of 1901, and I have here the legislation brought down. First there is the contract made with the Northern Pacific Railway, signed by your humble servant, and then the contract made with the Canadian Northern Railway; and under this act parliament went on to say:

1. Whereas by indenture of lease, dated the fifteenth day of January, nineteen hundred and one, and set forth in schedule A to this act, the lessors named in the said indenture did demise and lease to Her Majesty, represented therein by the executive government of the province of Manitoba, certain lines of railway therein mentioned, upon terms and conditions set forth in the said indenture; and whereas His Majesty, represented by the executive government of the province of Manitoba, of the first part, and the Canadian Northern Railway Company, of the second part, have executed a certain indenture bearing date the eleventh day of February, nineteen hundred and one, and set forth in schedule B to this act; and whereas the parties to the said indenture of the eleventh day of February, nineteen hundred and one, have, by their petitions, prayed that it be enacted as hereinafter set forth, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petitions: therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. The Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company, the Winnipeg Transfer Railway Company (Limited), the Portage and Northwestern Railway Company and the Waskada and Northeastern Railway Company have, and shall be deemed to have had at the time of the execution of the said indenture of the fifteenth day of January, nineteen hundred and one, full power to demise and lease the lines of railway and other premises included in the said indenture on the terms therein contained; and the said indenture of lease and the assignment thereof by the said indenture of the eleventh day of February, nineteen hundred and one, are hereby confirmed.

They confirmed both contracts. The act went on to say:

2. The Canadian Northern Railway Company has, and shall be deemed to have had at the time of the execution of the said indenture of the eleventh day of February, nineteen hundred and one, full power—

(a) to accept the assignment of the said lease;

(b) to make the covenants and agreements in the said indenture contained—

(i) relating to the said lease and to the payments thereunder and to the terms thereof;

(ii) relating to the bonds mentioned in clauses 5 and 6 of the said indenture;

(iii) relating to the rates to be charged or demanded by the said company for the carriage of freight and passengers;

(iv) relating to the payments to be paid by the said company notwithstanding exemption from taxation;

(c) and to make the grant contained in clause 20 of the said indenture.

3. Nothing in this act or in the indentures contained in the schedules hereto, or done in pursuance of this act or of the said indentures, shall—

(a) divest or limit, temporarily or otherwise, the rights or powers (under existing or future legislation of the parliament of Canada) of the Governor in Council, or of the railway committee of the Privy Council, or of any commission or other authority, respecting any matter or thing, obligation or duty;

(b) place the government of Canada, directly or indirectly, under any liability, obligation or duty with respect to any bonds, debentures, stocks or securities of any kind, or any interest thereon or any payment, matter or thing in the said indentures provided for or referred to, or in any way arising therefrom;

(c) authorize the Canadian Northern Railway Company, contrary to the meaning of the Railway Act, to charge or demanded any discriminating rate for the carriage of freight or passengers, or to allow or make any secret or special tolls, rebate, drawbacks or concession, or any higher rates for the carriage of freight or passengers than those heretofore or hereafter fixed, under the authority of existing or future legislation of the parliament of Canada, by the Governor in Council, or by the railway committee of the Privy Council, or by any commission or other authority.

You will note by that last clause that we were prohibited only in the matter of raising rates in Manitoba. The question came up at that time that it might be possible under that contract for Manitoba to raise the rates on that portion of the line running from the boundary of Manitoba to Fort William, a distance of something over 290 miles. This is what Mr. Blair anticipated at that time might be a danger in making that contract. He said:

I do not hesitate to say that I feared, and I fear at this moment, that there may be such a reduction of rates forced by the action of the Manitoba government upon the Canadian Northern Railway as to lead the Canadian Northern, even with the approval, if it were necessary, of the government of Manitoba, to impose higher rates on traffic on portions of their line outside of the province of Manitoba, so as thereby to reduce the loss which will result from operations within that province.

They thought we were going to make a loss on that contract, and that we would raise the rate in Ontario to help make up our deficits. That is the reason why the clause which I have just read was placed in the contract, in order that we should not charge any higher rates. My hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa)—I saw him in the chamber a few minutes ago—was in the House at that time, and he made a similar reference, as follows:

I understand that the Attorney General of Manitoba indicated that there could be no discriminating rate fixed by the government of Manitoba, because it would be favourable to the whole people of Manitoba; but the point that I have been making does not refer to the case of discrimination between classes of shippers, but to the case of discrimination between one province and another. In such a case the Manitoba government would fix a rate lower for the people of Manitoba and higher for the people of Ontario and the Northwest Territories—

In view of these statements the clause I have just read was incorporated in that legislation. The hon. member for Labelle later moved the following amendment—he was still anxious to raise the rates in Ontario:

—in favour of or against either (1) any individual or corporation, or (2) the people or shippers of or from any particular place, section, district or province.

This was answered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as follows:

I would say to my hon. friend from Labelle that if this bill were before the railway commission I do not think I would have any serious objection to his amendment; in fact, I would have none at all, because in my judgment it adds nothing to or detracts nothing from the sense of the clause we have before us. The clause now reads as follows:

"Nothing in this act or in this indenture contained in the schedule hereto, or done in pursuance of this act or of the said indentures shall.....authorize the Canadian Northern Railway Company to charge or demand any higher rates—"

Mr. Blair followed and said:

I desire to say only one word. The hon. member for Labelle has attributed to me statements and purposes which I did not make or entertain when this bill was under consideration before the railway committee. I did not suggest the inclusion of that section in this bill in any way, shape or form; it did not emanate from me. The gentlemen who were promoting this bill introduced a special clause for the purpose of affording some assurance to, I presume, some persons on the committee who had doubts as to whether the action of parliament in passing this bill would in some degree impair its power and authority in the premises, that it would have no such effect.

All that I suggested in the committee was that inasmuch as the object of the amendment which had emanated from the promoters of the bill, and by which it was proposed to say that nothing in the act should interfere with the power of the railway committee in respect to rates; that is to say, that the rates could not be made any higher than the rates fixed by the Governor in Council under the Railway Act, and that inasmuch as the clause only referred to the question of the raising of rates, I thought it would be reasonable to also add a clause having reference to discrimination, or to the making of secret rebates or other arrangements which are clearly declared against by the provisions of the Railway Act.

Mr. Sifton, then Minister of the Interior, dealt with the matter in the following language:

As I understand the argument which is advanced by the hon. member for Labelle, it is to the effect that the saving clause in section 3 of the act which provides that the power of the parliament of Canada and the Dominion government shall remain unimpaired in regard to this bill, takes away the power of the local authority to reduce rates.

Mr. Bourassa: I did not say that this clause took away from the Manitoba government the power to reduce rates.

Sir Clifford Sifton: My hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) has made the argument, that because of the supposed change in the contract, Manitoba has been beaten out of the control of rates for which she bargained. That was his argument, and if that was not his argument, it was not anything. There is nothing in it; it is wholly and entirely foundationless.

Mr. Blair later went on to say:

If a company agrees—I do not care if they only agree with a city; I do not care if they only agree with individuals—if they agree with an individual to make the rate so much, and it becomes a matter of public knowledge that these rates are lower than should obtain, then the commission will be justified in saying: You are bound by these rates, because you have yourselves declared that you will be prepared to carry traffic at these rates, and you cannot complain if we fix them.

Now I want to deal with the security held by the province of Manitoba in respect to this contract. First of all let me point out that when the province of Manitoba made that contract they secured from the railway corporation a mortgage as complete as any mortgage could possibly be made as security for the contract into which we then entered. I should like to quote to the House a clause of the Manitoba statute which was confirmed by the parliament of Canada in respect to this matter. Section 6 of the Manitoba Act provides:

In case the Canadian Northern Railway Company, its successors and assigns, makes default in abiding by or carrying out any of the terms of the said indenture set out in the schedule to this act, or any of the terms of the said indenture of lease, or of the mortgage referred to in clause five of said indenture, the Court of King's Bench for Manitoba shall have and is hereby vested with full power and jurisdiction, at the instance of the Attorney General of the province on behalf of the government, to decree specific performance and observance of the said terms and every of them and to enforce said decree.

That clause in the act passed by Manitoba was confirmed by the parliament of Canada. Now let me quote from the act passed by the parliament of Canada with respect to the provisions of the mortgage to which I have just referred. I would like the House to take note of this particular clause in the Dominion Act which provides:

That wherever in this indenture the government or the company is mentioned or referred to, such mention or reference shall extend to, include and be binding upon the successors and assigns of the government or the company as the case may be.

Here is a clause that binds the successors of the Canadian Northern railway; it makes clear that the National railways, to the extent that the company is named, are responsible for the fulfilment of that mortgage. That clause is still in force and effect.

Now further on in this act it is made clear that:

In consideration of the guarantee of the said bonds and the assignment of said lease and option, the company hereby agrees that up to the 30th day of June, A.D. 1930, the Lieutenant Governor in Council shall from time to time fix the rates to be charged or demanded by the company for the carriage of all freight from all points on the company's lines in Manitoba to Port Arthur, and from Port Arthur to all points on the company's lines in Manitoba, and from all points on the company's lines in Manitoba to all other points on said lines in Manitoba. Provided always that before any rates are so fixed, the company shall be heard and their interests taken into consideration.

Clause 9 reads:

The company hereby consents to the passing of such legislation by the legislature of Manitoba as may be necessary to confer upon the Court of King's Bench for Manitoba full jurisdiction at the instance of the Attorney General of the province on behalf of the government, to decree specific performance and observance by the company of each and every of the terms of this agreement and of the said lease and option, and the company hereby consents to and submits to the jurisdiction of the said court in that behalf.

[Mr. Rogers.]

That clause is full and complete. I hold in my hand a copy of the mortgage as held by the province of Manitoba. It was made on the 30th September, 1901, signed by the Canadian Northern Railway Company, the Canadian National Trust Company, and the Manitoba government. The names which appear on this mortgage are:

Frederick Nicholls, President; J. M. Smith, Secretary; R. P. Roblin, Railway Commissioner; National Trust Company, Limited; E. R. Wood, Vice-President, and W. T. White, Manager.

I will read the clauses that are of interest to this House and to the country. First, clause 22:

The terms of the several mortgages and the agreement below mentioned are hereby made subject to the terms of this mortgage and of said indenture of 11th February, 1901, with respect to the rights and positions of the government and the company as between each other, and wherever inconsistent the terms of this mortgage and of said indenture shall as between the government and the company prevail; but wherever not inconsistent the terms of said mortgages and agreement and the rights and positions of the government and the company thereunder shall continue in force.

Paragraph (g) of clause 21 reads as follows:

The government shall be entitled to take proceedings by way of injunction to prevent the infringement of any of the terms or provisions of this mortgage and in the event of the company failing to fully and completely perform all such terms and provisions, the government shall be entitled to enforce such performance.

Then we have another important provision, clause 28 of the mortgage, which reads:

In consideration of the guarantee of the said bonds and the assignment of said lease and option the company hereby agrees that up to the thirtieth day of June, A.D. 1930, the Lieutenant Governor in Council shall from time to time fix the rates to be charged or demanded by the company for the carriage of all freight from all points on the company's lines in Manitoba to Port Arthur and from Port Arthur to all points on the company's lines in Manitoba, and from all points on the company's lines in Manitoba to all other points on said lines in Manitoba. Provided always that before any rates are so fixed the company shall be heard and their interests taken into consideration. The company agrees that it will not at any time after the said rates have been so fixed charge or demand for the carriage of freight between the points aforesaid greater rates than those so fixed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. And the said company covenants to carry the freight at rates not higher than those so fixed and not to dispute the rates when so fixed, and it is agreed that no appeal or application for leave to appeal shall be made or permitted from any decision of the Court of King's Bench for Manitoba upon any question howsoever arising in any action or proceeding brought by the Attorney General of the province on behalf of the government for the performance, observance or enforcement of the company's covenants in this paragraph contained either to the King in Council or to the Supreme Court of Canada or to any other court outside of Manitoba and that any application for leave to appeal or any proceeding in appeal contrary to the provisions of this clause shal be deemed to be made or taken against good faith.

That is why we have had trouble in connection with this contract: the present government of Manitoba took the course they did against the good faith of the security they hold in their own treasury to provide for the fulfilment of this contract. Every time the lawyers representing the government of Manitoba came down here to argue the question of Manitoba's contract, they were coming here in bad faith, having regard to the contract and to the mortgage held by Manitoba, under which it can decree specific performance any time. Why the Norris government or the government of the Progressive party of the province did not present Manitoba's case as it should have been presented under the contract as made is a matter for them to answer, and not for me.

I wish to point out that when the Railway Act was going through this parliament the Attorney General of our province came down to see to it that nothing should be provided in that act that would be detrimental or injurious to the fulfilment of our contract. A special clause was therefore introduced as follows:

> Unless otherwise expressly provided in this act, where the provisions of this act and of any special act, passed by the parliament of Canada relate to the same subject matter, the provisions of the special act shall be taken to over-ride the provisions of this act in so far as is necessary to give effect to such special act.

In determining the meaning of this paragraph the first question is, what is meant by the words "special act"? The expression is among those defined in the interpretation section 2 (w), and the definition is as follows:

> (2) (w) The expression "special act" means any act under which the company has authority to construct or operate a railway, or which is enacted with special reference to such railway, and includes all such acts.

The next chapter in our difficulty was when the appointment was made in 1922, under the government of the right hon. member who leads the present administration, of a committee on transportation costs, and it was the set purpose of Liberals, both here and in the western provinces, to try to find some form by which and through which they could discredit or destroy Manitoba's railway contract. That commission was appointed, and I remember that my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) was on it. I am sure it would be difficult for him or anybody else to understand the exact conditions without knowing something about the contract arrangement. When that committee first assembled Mr. Hudson, Mr. Crerar, and Mr. Forke, the present member for Brandon, were members of it, and it will be sufficient for me to say at the moment that they did everything in their power to destroy the contract before that committee. They were asked by their fellow members of the committee to have the contract incorporated as part of their proceedings, but they failed to appear. They brought down schedules of rates covering the railways of western Canada for years previously and during that period of time they entirely overlooked Manitoba's rates and gave the Crowsnest pass rate credit, if you please, for reductions made by the Manitoba government under their contract.

The hon. member for Regina was the leading sinner in this task of trying to destroy our railway rates for the benefit of the corporations and to the detriment of the people even of his own province. The rates given to Saskatchewan, or to the Northwest Territories as it was at that time, brought his province a large return. Before this committee was appointed the Minister of Railways, speaking at Regina—and I have a copy of his speech in my hand—made the following statement, speaking of the Crowsnest pass agreement:

> An examination of the freight rates on grain particularly will reveal that fact—that while the agreement covered main line and branches as they existed in 1897 it did set the basis for the whole of the west with respect to the commodities covered by the agreement.

My hon. friend was Minister of Railways in Saskatchewan when he made that speech and he ought to have known something about rates, but evidently he did not, because the Manitoba rate contract was in force from October 7, 1903 until 1918. Not one pound of freight of any kind or description was carried during that time over any line in the prairie provinces save and excepting under rates different from Crowsnest pass rates. For twenty-five years or more they were carried under rates fixed by the Manitoba government, and the province which my hon. friend represented so long secured great advantages as a result of those rates.

Mr. MANION: Were they lower rates?

Mr. ROGERS: Lower by two cents a hundred pounds at every station in Saskatchewan and Alberta. Therefore Manitoba has just cause to complain of unfair treatment such as this in respect of her rate contract. The day is not far distant when Manitoba will find relief, because within the next few months we are going to have a new government in that province with Mr. Fawcett Taylor as Premier and leader of the Conservative party. When that day comes we shall see to it that the amount of Manitoba's mortgage, covering all Canadian Northern lines between Fort William and the western boundary of our province, and now forming part of the National railway system, is collected, and the Minister of Railways will be forced to provide a sum far beyond $100,000,000 to liquidate liabilities under that mortgage. I want him to understand that, because Manitoba will expect him to be ready to liquidate that mortgage when they follow out the procedure set out in the agreement and mortgage.

Mr. DUNNING: $100,000,000?

Mr. ROGERS: It will take a good deal more than that and we will collect every cent of it, because it is coming to us. Let my hon. friend not make any mistake about that. Some people say we have no power to fix our rates lower than the maximum rates fixed by the railway commission or by the government. From the day we made our contract in 1901 down to the present day the railway companies have every day and every hour followed our rate contract in its form, and they are to-day as it suits them from time to time, making rates lower than the maximum rate. The Progressive party, for example, get a half rate for all the delegates they bring in, and for their wives and families, when they hold their conventions at Winnipeg. I have before me an advertisement which the railways published only yesterday offering rates below the maximum rate. Our contract was based upon the same arrangement, and it stands good to-day. The only honourable mention of Manitoba's rate came when the report of that committee was presented to the House and the Hon. Mr. Maclean, now Judge Maclean, who was then chairman of that committee, brought out the point that the rates applied in Manitoba had its effect upon freight rates upon grain throughout the whole of the prairie country and the rates in effect during all the period of time I have cited, were rates resulting from the Manitoba contract.

I wish to bring out this other point. The liability of the province of Manitoba in respect of its guarantee is in no way altered or changed by the ownership of the common stock of the company. The company retains its corporate identity, it can be sued in the courts and it has all the responsibilities of a private company. Manitoba has a mortgage which is as binding as any mortgage that ever existed. The parliament of Great Britain for centuries has been the guardian of sacred contracts and their covenants. The parliament of Canada during its existence at all times and under all conditions preserved and maintained sacred contracts and their covenants, save and until a compromise government led by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister undertook in 1922 to attempt Prussian methods against that contract, a contract which, I repeat, neither his government nor the railway commission had any more right to interfere with than the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa. If the government of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister had any such power, then it would have to be understood that in future no contracts entered into in good faith by two contracting parties who give each other mutual considerations shall have any force or effect.

This contract was first interfered with in 1919 under subsection 5 of section 325. Sir Robert Borden, knowing as he did the force and effect of this contract—because he was in parliament when the contract was made in 1901—made this statement when introducing that clause. I want the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) to listen carefully to this:

> We thought it desirable that that clause should continue in operation only for three years and that in the meantime the question of compensation to the province, or city or municipality ought to be taken into consideration.

That is the question which my hon. friend will have to take into consideration. He will have to consider in the very near future providing some part of the $100,000,000 to compensate the province of Manitoba in this matter.

Mr. DUNNING: Why did not Sir Robert's government deal with it in that manner?

Mr. ROGERS: They dealt with it for three years but there was a change of government. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like very much to continue, for there is a good deal that I want to discuss, but as the hour is late I shall not detain the House much longer. I was anxious to explain to the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) how little he knew about railway freight rates when he attempted to discuss them. However, I will reserve that pleasure for a later day when I shall endeavour to enlighten the hon. member on the subject and if possible to enlarge his knowledge of freight rates. I will point out to him that any rate in respect to which Saskatoon has derived any benefit was the Manitoba rate and not the Crowsnest or any other.

I regret that I have had to consider as hurriedly as I have done the various points I have touched upon, but inasmuch as I was anxious to get through I have had to omit a good deal of what I intended to say. At some later day I shall deal more fully with certain questions for the information of the Minister of Railways who, I hope, will consider providing something of that $100,000,000, pending the return to power of the Conservative government in Manitoba.

On motion of Mr. McIntosh the debate was adjourned.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Before we adjourn, Mr. Speaker, I should like with the unanimous consent of the House to move that we go into committee of Supply to put through an interim supply bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no objection if it is clearly understood that the position will be as it was before. It might be contended, of course, that if we once moved into committee of Ways and Means the present debate would end. If it is fully understood that such will not be the effect of the present motion, or that the fact of the House going into committee at this stage will not be made use of as an argument for interference with the budget debate, I offer no objection.

Mr. ROBB: That is understood. The Senate is now in session and I am anxious to have the bill put through.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will one-twelfth of the amount be provided to meet the request made by my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers)?

Mr. DUNNING: The item is not in the estimates.

Mr. ROBB: I want this interim supply put through for the public service before the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) grabs it all.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $15,934,291.06 being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is understood, again, that the resolution is agreed to on the terms already stipulated: nothing is consented to, no rights are waived and the present procedure may not be used for the purpose of authorizing any new expenditures.

Mr. ROBB: Quite so.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Robb moved that the House go into committee of Ways and Means.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The motion is subject to precisely the same conditions.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is only for the purpose of putting through interim supply and does not affect the debate on the budget?

Mr. ROBB: That is the understanding.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, the sum of $15,934,291.06 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On the same terms?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 96, for granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1927.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This motion is agreed to on the terms and conditions already indicated?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Robb, the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Wednesday, May 5, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

So far as is known—none.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CENTRAL VERMONT RAILWAY

Mr. CAHAN:

For a copy of the annual report, for the year ending December 31st, 1925, of the Central Vermont Railway, whose capital stock is largely owned by the Canadian National Railways.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD

Mr. BROWN:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Soldier Settlement Board and any of its officials or employees, with reference to land purchased by the board through the firm of Kennedy and Kennedy, and for all orders and instructions issued by the board with reference to any further transactions with that firm.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winipeg North Centre): I should like to ask whether in the reorganization of the Civil Service Commission the government proposes to carry out declared Liberal principles and appoint at least one member from the body of civil servants.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think I can assure my hon. friend that the government will act on Liberal principles in its appointments but the question of who will be appointed has not yet been determined. The matter is under consideration.

AUTOMOBILE DUTIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Last week when the Prime Minister was telling us from whom the government had sought expert advice before deciding on the reduction of duties on automobiles I asked whether the papers and documents connected with such consultation and advice would be brought down. The Prime Minister as reported on page 2917 of Hansard, in replying to this question, stated that he would leave to the Minister of Finance the decision on that point. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he would bring down these papers and lay them on the table of the House.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): No person knows better than my hon. friend, who himself once held a position as a responsible minister, that from time to time the government receives information which it must necessarily consider confidential. It is right, I think, that this should be so because it is not fair to reveal all that we have. There would be no objection to bringing down any information that is not of a confidential nature. The question raised by my hon. friend is a fair one and opens out a rather wide field. If I may be permitted I would observe that during the debate I have been accused of making certain changes because of sentiment in the country. May I remind my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) and the House that the sentiment has not been confined to one side. Last year there was a debate in this House and a vote on the question of automobile duties, and I see from Hansard—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the budget debate on?

Mr. ROBB: No, but I am answering the question that has been asked.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What the minister says has no relation to the question.

Mr. ROBB: I am within the ruling of the Chair. I observe, I say, that six members supporting my right hon. friend, voted for a reduction in these duties. Among the six was one gentleman who is now premier of his province, New Brunswick. The others were the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Doucet), the hon. member for York, the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Jones).

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Which York is the minister referring to?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister in order in making his budget speech on this occasion? The question asked was whether the government would lay on the table the expert opinions and data with which it said it was armed.

Mr. ROBB: I was proceeding to say that I should have no objection to laying upon the table such information as might properly be brought down. I notice, too, that the chief whip of the Conservative party (Mr. Boys), who is not in his seat at the moment, speaking at Barrie, is reported:

> Protected manufacturers do not raise prices to correspond with foreign-made goods which pay duty. He quoted wholesale prices of auto tires in Canada and the United States, showing certain tires to be somewhat cheaper in Canada. . . . He believed the tariff had been abused by motor car manufacturers and declared himself in favour of lowering the duty on autos.

I am willing to put this information on the table.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Did my vote last year influence the minister? If it did, I was going to say that it was his speech at that time that caused me to change my opinion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are to take it from the government, I assume, that the Minister of Finance has now given us all the expert data that he had.

Mr. ROBB: I made it clear that there would be no objection to bringing down such information as was not confidential, but certain information given to the government from time to time must be regarded as confidential.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are we to take it that everything that is not confidential is down?

Mr. A. J. DOUCET (Kent, N.B.): I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), inasmuch as he has made a second budget speech in which he mentions my name,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DOUCET: —whether at the time the discussion to which he refers took place last year, a tariff board had been appointed?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

FOREST AIR PATROL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I desire to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton), to the fact that I have received from High River, Alberta, numerous telegrams asking whether the aerial force patrol of Bow River and Crowsnest forest reserves is to be discontinued. Can the minister give some assurance that this service will be carried on this year?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Yes. Perhaps it was unfortunate that any intimation should have been given that the service was to be withdrawn. Arrangements will be made for this service at High River and, in order to satisfy other gentlemen who may be perturbed, at Le Pas. In fact, wherever any service was carried on it will be continued this year.

OCEAN RATES FOR CATTLE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): May I ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) whether any action is being taken by the government to secure a reduction of ocean freight rates with a view to helping the cattle feeders of Canada to get to the markets of the world.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways): The question my hon. friend asks can more properly be answered another time.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 4, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. C. R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, last night during the course of his speech on the budget, the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) declared that in the election campaign which culminated on October 29 last, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other members of the government went through the Dominion and opposed the system of group government, and he added that after the election was over and the matter had to be settled in parliament, the ministerial party of the day took advantage of group co-operation in order to retain power. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether the time has come in Canada when the leader of a government or the member of a cabinet or the member of any political party may not on the hustings take a stand in support of such public opinion as he may see fit to advocate? Surely the Prime Minister was quite right in the stand he took. He felt that in doing so he was acting in the interests of the Dominion. Prior to the election he endeavoured to mould public opinion in the manner he considered conducive to the welfare of Canada, and after the people had given their verdict on October 29 he simply implemented the will of the electorate as they had expressed it. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that the course which the Prime Minister and the government have taken is in accordance with the principles of democratic government.

The hon. member for South Winnipeg said that the income tax returns for 1924-25 showed a decrease from those of 1921-22, thereby arguing that under the present Liberal administration the credit of Canada was going to pieces. He evidently took the view that the prosperity of the Dominion was at stake. In considering an argument of that sort we must bear in mind that if the income taxpayers of Canada cannot pay their tax one year they will certainly pay in another.

Now the most important characteristic of any people is the ability to carry on, and this Dominion must go ahead in spite of odds. In 1924 by reason of the crop failure in western Canada trade conditions from coast to coast were not what they should have been. Consequently the income tax that was not paid that year would be paid in a subsequent year, and therefore the argument falls to the ground.

At the outset of his address following the presentation of the budget by the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said:

> We realize quite as fully as does the government that this country has within the past season been blessed by Providence much more abundantly than in former years; yes, most marvellously blessed have we been in the abundance of crop which this country has yielded. I believe I am within the mark when I say that Providence has blessed Canada during the past season with a wheat yield in the western provinces unsurpassed both in quality and quantity, a yield which is to-day commanding a good price in the markets of the world and this fact constitutes the most important feature of our commercial success.

The hon. member in his subsequent remarks attributed to Providence an even greater share of credit for the splendid crop in western Canada. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is altogether the correct position to take. I believe in depending upon Providence—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. In justice to the hon. gentleman who has the floor, I must ask hon. members on both sides of the House to preserve silence.

Mr. McINTOSH: I believe it is well, Mr. Speaker, to express our thankfulness to Providence for the bountiful harvest, but to give Providence the entire credit for it is, I think, a new kind of theology. I have always understood that Providence helps those who help themselves, and that we should look upon Providence as working in and through personality in order to bring about a better condition of affairs. So in respect to the splendid crop of last year I believe that Providence co-operated with the tillers of the soil. It is important always to know that we are on the side of Providence, and I think the excellent crop was due entirely to the co-operation of the farmers of Canada with Providence and of Providence with them.

Now, if we use the same line of argument with regard to the government of the day, we must conclude that since we met here on January 7 Providence has been good to us in preserving the government intact, and we believe Providence is going to be still better to us by co-operating with us in getting through this House a crop of legislation that will be of special benefit to the people of Canada. I believe, Sir, the fact that Providence has not annihilated it is proof that Providence is working hand in hand with the government of the day.

Miss MACPHAIL: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Might it not prove that Providence is merciful?

Mr. McINTOSH: Providence is not only merciful; Providence shows mercy by the spirit of true co-operation. Consequently we have not only been able to keep together, but we have had new accessions of strength to our ranks since January 7.

An hon. MEMBER: From where?

Mr. McINTOSH: I am just coming to that. The first accession of strength to our ministerial ranks was in the return to this House of the right hon. Prime Minister, which means that the electorate of a part of Canada has made a favourable pronouncement upon the policies of this government. The name of the right hon. leader of this party brings to one's remembrance some of the eminent Liberal leaders of the past. Our first leader after confederation was the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, and his integrity, his honour and his reputation as one of the leading statesmen of this Dominion will not soon be forgotten by the people. During his leadership he was loyally supported by the members of the party from coast to coast. His mantle fell upon the Hon. Edward Blake, and he in his intellectual attainments and statesmanlike qualities was easily superior to any of his contemporaries. His followers gave him unfaltering support. He was succeeded by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who after winning the respect and support of his native province, impressed his personality upon the whole Dominion. He was Prime Minister for fifteen years, and during that time won the admiration of the empire. He brought to the leadership of the Liberal party and to the direction of the affairs of this nation a vision and a statesmanship that will enshrine his memory in the esteem and affection of Canadians for generations to come. After Sir Wilfrid's death the mantle of liberalism fell upon the present Prime Minister and leader of the Liberal party. I need only add, Mr. Speaker, that just as the Liberals of the past stood firmly and loyally behind the eminent leaders of the party to whom I have referred, so the Liberals of to-day are going to stand enthusiastically behind our present leader. We are going to do so because we realize that he is eminent not only as a scholar and as an author, but also as a statesman, and his sympathy for and co-operation with labour has won him the respect and support of Liberals from one end of the Dominion to the other. He has given the Liberal party the highest kind of leadership, and we are only too willing to accord him our loyal and hearty support. It seems to me that the sooner our opponents realize the intentions of the Liberal party in the House and out of it in this regard the better it will be for the public life of the Dominion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, another accession to our strength has been the return to this House of a new Minister of Railways and Canals in the person of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Dunning). Before dealing with that point more fully I would like to refer to a statement placed on Hansard by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). It is perhaps not necessary for me to read the statement, but it was to the effect that the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Dunning) had given expression to a denial of what was given under oath in Saskatchewan during the grain investigation of 1924. There was also another point in connection with a certain political yarn which, although not true, had been repeated both inside and out of the House of Commons. In connection with the hon. member for Regina I must say that the argument of the hon. member for North Oxford was very superficial and undignified; when we are criticizing and judging public men we should be more careful. In that argument the hon. member took away from the context one or two lines or sentences, and formed judgment upon that dislocated statement. That argument is not worth anything, and consequently the foundation upon which it was based is too superficial to warrant attention. I would ask the House to remember the statement of Thomas Carlyle, when considering public men. In his Life of Burns appears this statement:

> The world often, yea too often, is unjust in its judgment of men—"It decides like a court of law, by dead statutes; and not positively but negatively, less on what is done right, than on what is or is not done wrong. Not the few inches of deflection from the mathematical orbit which are so easily measured but the ratio of these to the whole diameter constitutes the real aberration". . . .

Instead of measuring a public man by a few lines in a superficial way, the hon. member for North Oxford should take the whole statement made by the hon. member for Regina in order to arrive at a conclusion. The Minister of Railways, who now represents the constituency of Regina, is well known in Saskatchewan; he rose from a poor British immigrant to the position which he holds to-day. He was first secretary of a grain growers' local; from there he went to the vice presidency of the provincial grain growers' organization and then to the general managership of the largest grain-handling concern in the world, the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator system. From that position he was called to the office of treasurer of Saskatchewan, and from there to the position of premier of that province. A man who can make such progress in his own adopted province certainly has a message and an influence for Canada at large, and I believe that as the hon. member for Regina continues in his present position he will give not only direction, but support and co-operation as well, to the railway systems of the country and that support and co-operation will be reflected favourably throughout the whole country in the near future.

We have had another acquisition to the strength of this government in the person of the new Minister of Health, Minister of Labour and Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment (Mr. Elliott). I think I am right in saying that if he continues the success already attained he will go far. The hon. member has won success in his legal profession, and also as a member of the provincial legislature; he will be a source of strength to the government of which he is now a member and will give to the departments under his control not only the best leadership but the best ideals as well.

Then we come to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), who has brought down the present budget. This budget takes one back to some of the other ministers of finance of Canada. The first finance minister was Hon. A. T. Galt, who was noted for one outstanding qualification. When a new tariff was brought into existence in 1858 and 1859, before confederation, the Colonial Secretary of the day said the tariff could not be accepted. Mr. Galt said, "That is the tariff made by the legislatures of Upper and Lower Canada; that is where we stand on fiscal matters, and on questions of taxation and tariff." So Mr. Galt stood his ground, with the result that Canada won what might be termed fiscal independence, and from that day to this the Minister of Finance, in co-operation with the cabinet and those in this House supporting that cabinet, has taken the responsibility of bringing in a budget from year to year, deciding on questions of tariff and taxation.

After Hon. Mr. Galt came Hon. Mr. Tilley, and perhaps the outstanding point about Mr. Tilley was that although he supported the national policy, he considered that if it could not show a favourable balance of trade from year to year it would not be successful. We find him taking that stand continually, but although he took that stand his contention did not work out, because from 1878 to 1896, during a period of eighteen years, in only one year was there a balance of trade in favour of Canada. That was in 1880, when the favourable trade balance amounted to about $1,500,000, but in that year the national debt was increased by roughly $9,000,000.

Following Hon. Mr. Tilley came Hon. Sir George E. Foster, and he also took the stand that from year to year there should be amendments to the tariff, proving conclusively that even under the National Policy it was impossible to have what we might call an exact tariff; it had to move up or down in accordance with the conditions of business in the country. Those who stand for a high protective policy to-day should listen to the pronouncements made by Sir George Foster in 1894. He said:

> If there is to be a protective system at all, everybody knows that it must be higher in its inception than as the years gradually pass, when industries have become established and when the industrial development of the country grows apace.

Again he said:

> The time for revision has come, the time for a complete examination of the whole matter of our tariff arrangements in order that the anomalies existing might be done away with and that the tariff might be brought down to the existing circumstances and changed conditions not only in Canada but in foreign countries at the present time.

There we have two pronouncements made by Sir George Foster when Finance minister of Canada, to the effect that the one idea of the National Policy at its inception in 1878 was that when industries were being established there should be a higher tariff, and as those industries got started and gained strength, the tariff should be lowered, because they would be able to compete with other industries beyond the shores of Canada. In his last pronouncement he makes the statement that from time to time downward revisions of the tariff should take place if the industrial establishments of the country were doing what they should in solidifying their business, making themselves strong, and getting ready for national and international competition.

The next Minister of Finance was the Hon. Mr. Fielding. There is one prominent fact we have to note in connection with his administration, and that is that he introduced the British preference in the year 1897. Conservatives had been mooting that question in the eighties but they did not take any action, but when the Liberals were returned to power in 1896, they immediately took action and introduced the British preference. Today that British preference is still in existence, having been broadened out from year to year to link up the different portions of the empire.

After the Hon. Mr. Fielding, we come to the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), and all we need to do in order to size up his ability as a Finance minister is to look at this year's budget. When we do that, we must come to the conclusion that we have in the Hon. Mr. Robb a man who can honourably and successfully follow the splendid Finance ministers that I have mentioned this afternoon. I am not discussing this question merely from a political standpoint. I am simply relating Mr. Robb to those who have gone before, Conservative Finance ministers and Liberal Finance ministers, because I think by doing that we put the budget discussion on a higher plane, and we give to men who have done nobly by the country in days gone by the honour that is their due.

The present budget has a few outstanding attributes. One of those outstanding attributes is that there is a surplus. This budget is a surplus or plus budget, not a deficit or minus financial statement. That is a very important thing, because if we wind up the year on the wrong side of the ledger it certainly proves that as a country and as a people we are not prospering. The surplus is $33,910,000 on government services, and there is a debt reduction of $22,353,000. Our public debt was $2,417,437,685.59 in the year 1925. In 1926 we reduced that debt by $22,000,000, and our national debt now stands at $2,395,084,685.59. The Canadian National Railways statement of earnings for the year shows $30,000,000 in excess of all operating and income charges exclusive of interest.

Another outstanding feature is that we have a favourable balance of trade. This is important because, as I showed before only once under the National Policy and Conservative administration from 1878 to 1896 was there a favourable balance of trade for the year. This year we have a favourable balance of trade amounting to $402,000,000. The total trade of Canada last year was $2,258,000,000. It is greater than the previous year by approximately $380,000,000. The total imports are greater by $130,000,000 than for the year 1924, and the total exports are greater than the preceding year by $249,000,000. Our empire trade in cattle has increased from approximately $3,000,000 in 1923 to over $11,000,000 in 1926. That is, although we have, as we heard in the House the other day some wonderful beef eaters in the city of Hamilton, we have been able to send over 100,000 cattle to the British market in the past year. There has been an increase of over 300 per cent in our empire shipment of cattle during the last four years.

Penny postage will be introduced on July 1st. That date is the sixtieth anniversary of Canadian confederation, and I think it is a favourable time to reduce the postage in this country from three to two cents. Not only did a Liberal government introduce penny postage, but cheap postage is an important factor in linking up one portion of the empire with another.

This budget also wipes out the receipt tax and reduces the sales tax in well defined directions. There have been certain reductions made in other duties, and certain drawbacks.

Perhaps one of the most important features of this budget, relatively speaking, is that since confederation we have had only eleven budgets where the national debt has been reduced. Seven of those budgets were presented by Liberal finance ministers and four by Conservative finance ministers. The debt reductions have been in round numbers as follows:

Under Liberal Administration

Year	Amount of Debt Reduction
1926	$22,000,000
1925	345,000
1924	36,000,000
1907	3,250,000
1904	750,000
1903	10,000,000
1900	750,000

Now what about Conservative administrations, during the time that has elapsed since confederation?

Under Conservative Administration

Year	Amount of Debt Reduction
1871	$ 500,000
1882	1,750,000
1912	125,000
1913	25,000,000

In other words, the total reductions under Conservative administration since confederation amount to $27,000,000 as compared with a total reduction of over $73,000,000 under Liberal administration, so from the standpoint of comparison with previous budgets, this one is certainly a success.

Now looking at it from another point of view there is in this budget a real touch of nationality, and that touch of nationality is found, so far as I am concerned, in the statement of the Finance minister that the British preference in the years to come shall be applied only in cases where the goods are shipped direct to Canada, where they are carried from one portion of the empire to another without any transhipment; that is when the goods are landed at any ocean, lake or river port of Canada. That is an important thing, Mr. Speaker, for the building up of inter-imperial trade, and also for giving a chance to our Maritime ports on the east and on the west. I have here a book edited by Watson Griffin. It is an epitome of industrial Canada, and I am sure my protectionist friends will not quarrel with what I read from it. I shall quote an important line or two from an article headed "Patronize Canadian Ports." This is an important question to-day for Canada, and I believe that the feeling of hon. members, no matter on what side of the House they may sit, is that as a people we ought to face and solve this question as fairly as possible; and if there are economic grievances and other difficulties before us, let us do our best as a people to meet and solve them in the interests of a greater Dominion. This writer says:

A considerable part of the export and import business of Canada comes through United States ports in winter. This is not because Canada lacks good winter harbours of its own. It is chiefly due to the fact that the railway systems of Ontario and Quebec made connection with United States ports before the ports of the Maritime provinces were connected with central Canada by the Intercolonial railway and because old established ports with numerous steamship lines attract business for the same reasons that the well established industries of an old manufacturing country have an advantage over the young industries of a new country.

It is as desirable that Canadian business should be done through Canadian ports as that goods for Canadian consumption should be made in Canadian factories. The business that goes through Montreal and Quebec in summer should pass through St. John and Halifax in winter. The government commission which has been appointed to study the transportation question should devote special attention to this problem. Canada cannot be commercially independent so long as our business is done through United States ports.

And then the book says further:

The best way to put an end to such threats is to do all our foreign business through Canadian ports in winter as well as in summer.

Another way would be to make the Canadian preferential tariff apply only to goods imported direct through Canadian ports and ask the British government, in case of a preference being given to colonial products to make it apply only to goods shipped direct from colonial ports to Britain.

And then later on:

Owing to the fact that so much Canadian business goes through United States ports in winter the impression prevails in both the United Kingdom and the United States that Canada has no ice-free Atlantic ports.

And then it goes on to name ports of the Maritime provinces, such as Louisburg, Liverpool, Yarmouth, Halifax, St. John, and St. Andrews. I think the pronouncement in the budget on that subject is an important one.

Mr. CAHAN: Does my hon. friend approve of the statement he has just read with respect to doing business through Canadian ports?

Mr. McINTOSH: So far as it is possible, and still do justice to all other portions of Canada, we ought to send every ounce of grain we possibly can through these Maritime ports.

Another important announcement in the budget was the one with respect to the duty on automobiles. That matter had been discussed previously in this House, and when the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) moved his resolution in favour of a reduction of the duty no amendment was brought forward in opposition to it. This would lead one to believe that since parliament is supposed to be the mirror of the country, since parliament is the nation writ small, so to speak, then the government of the day certainly had the right to take the stand that it did and reduce the duty on automobiles.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Did the resolution carry?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, it was carried.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, it was not.

Mr. McINTOSH: It did not come to a vote, but that was tantamount, in my way of thinking, to carrying it.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, oh.

Mr. McINTOSH: If hon. gentlemen opposite were sincere in the stand they are now taking with reference to the duty on automobiles they would certainly have moved an amendment to the resolution. Then we would have had a vote, the resolution would have been passed, and it would have strengthened the hands of the government.

Mr. CAHAN: We did not get a chance to vote on it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A resolution can be proposed without your moving an amendment or voting against it.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, a resolution can be proposed without moving an amendment or voting against it; but if hon. gentlemen opposite are sincere and very much in earnest in regard to a certain line of public policy we would naturally expect them to stand by that idea of public policy when a question of importance with respect to it is brought up in the House.

Mr. CAHAN: I certainly would have voted against the resolution if I had had the opportunity.

Mr. McINTOSH: All I can say to hon. gentlemen opposite is this: If that is your stand at the present time it is a pity you did not show your sincerity and earnestness when the question was being discussed.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to say as a matter of privilege that I expressed myself in the strongest possible way at the time?

Mr. McINTOSH: I should like to have seen my hon. friend go one step further; I should like him to have moved an amendment to the resolution and then hon. members generally could have shown exactly where they stood.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman will allow me to make an explanation I will say this: I have never seen the propriety of moving an amendment to a resolution to which I am directly opposed, and which I am prepared to oppose by my vote when it comes to a vote.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does the hon. gentleman know that the Minister of Finance voted against that resolution in this House?

Mr. McINTOSH: When, a year ago?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is not applicable to the question at the present time because any government has to adjust itself to the conditions which arise from year to year. A government that does not do so is not truly carrying out the idea of responsible government as we should have it in Canada. I believe the government did right by cutting the duty on automobiles, and that the country from coast to coast will support it in that action. I do not think there is going to be any doubt about that at all. By taking the stand it did the government of the day is showing the people that it is absolutely responsible to the popular voice having regard to the revenue to be derived from taxation. May I be permitted at this stage to read a pronouncement made by the Prime Minister during the last election. Referring to the fiscal policy of the Liberal party he said:

4 p.m.

> In this the Liberals will hold themselves responsible, not dividing or reducing the party's responsibility on the tariff or taxation.

I believe that view will be accepted by the country. There is no doubt, in my mind, that reduction in the automobile duty will be regarded as a step in the direction of a true national policy in the interest of the country at large.

In connection with the tariff on automobiles the question of the duties of a tariff advisory board naturally arises. A lot has been said in this House during the last week or so on this question, and reference has been made to it to-day. I desire to point out that in the appointment of a tariff advisory board the government has been influenced by the ideas prevalent in other nations. There is no question of national significance in any country which has not its roots sunk deep in the annals of the past. The idea of a tariff advisory board, or a tariff board, or a tariff commission of any kind is not an innovation of the present day. We find that in 1906 Germany, in the organization of a tariff board, appointed a special committee, for a period of five years, composed of thirty-two experts representing the agricultural, the industrial, and the financial interests of the country. Not only that but the German parliament availed itself of the services of two thousand technical and trade experts in coming to a conclusion on the tariff question, and when the investigation was completed there were about a thousand items in the tariff list instead of three or four hundred. Action along the same line was taken by the United States; and the Canadian government has followed suit in the appointment of the Tariff Advisory Board. The Tariff Advisory Board of Canada is not purely a tariff commission. It is a fact-finding board. It will investigate all the available facts, and then present those facts to the Minister for the information of the Minister of Finance who will do his best to provide a stable tariff for the country.

There are certain requirements to which the Tariff Advisory Board should pay attention. Among these I may enumerate the following: There should be precision as to schedules, classification and rates. A tariff revision in Canada should be one that will unite the east and the west and do away with sectionalism in the Dominion. There should be amplification of industry, and that is where we need expert knowledge. Some members ask: What is the use of appointing a tariff board? We cannot get this expert knowledge. I think we can say that investigation is the basis of knowledge and the basis of progress. We can investigate, systemize and present these facts; we can interpret them, and then we can apply them to the formation of a new policy. An important feature of this new Tariff Advisory Board, then, is that it will be a fact-finding board; it will get the facts and give them to the Minister of Finance and the government of the day, and in taking action on these facts we ought to be more certain of our ground and more actively identified in the work of framing a tariff that will be satisfactory to the country.

We shall have to arrive at new classifications and specialized rates because to-day industry and the processes and products of industry are very complicated in order to meet the discriminating tastes of the buying public. The investigation of customs laws and their effect upon tariff and industry is important and this fact-finding board will investigate questions of that kind. Tariff relations between Canada and foreign countries will have to be investigated because that is an important question in connection with our foreign policy. The tariff board will have to investigate preferential tariffs, commercial treaties, economic alliances and other tariff relations between Canada and countries with which we are trading. It will also have to co-operate with the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Finance and other important departments of the crown, and through this co-operation with these departments, surely the facts of any important case can be brought to light, placed before the Minister of Finance and acted upon.

An important fact in Canadian history is that since 1878 we have had varying tariffs in this country. We have had tariff amendment after tariff amendment. We had tariff amendments in 1871, 1872, 1873; we had them in the eighties; we had them in the nineties, and this policy of "hit and miss" is not good for the country. Consequently, I believe the appointment of a Tariff Advisory Board is a step in the right direction and it is justified when one considers the innumerable tariff changes that have taken place in Canada during the last twenty-five or thirty years. When tariff changes become too numerous they upset business, demoralize trade, and consequently are not giving the industrialists and producers of the country the oportunities they should have.

Mr. CAHAN: What justification does the hon. member give for not bringing the matter of the automobile industry before the Tariff Advisory Board?

Mr. McINTOSH: I thought I had dealt with that question. I will say, just in reply to the question, that I do not think there was any doubt in the minds of any member of the ministry as to what ought to be done in connection with the tariff on automobiles. I believe the reason the question was not referred to the Tariff Advisory Board was because the consensus of opinion within the ministry was absolutely and unqualifiedly in favour of reducing the tariff instead of referring the question to a tariff board and thus wasting time and mulcting the people of the country of millions of dollars.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The reason it should have been referred is because the Prime Minister made a pledge that it would be, and officially confirmed that pledge in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. McINTOSH: I did not understand that he did, but if he made a pledge he would certainly be man enough to carry it out.

Mr. CAHAN: If he could.

Mr. McINTOSH: I believe the tariff cut on automobiles had to be done at once. It should have been done a year ago. The feeling of the ministry was that it was useless to waste another year; why not tackle the problem at once and have it settled? If this tariff cut is not fair, if it is against the true interests of the automobile industry of Canada, the facts in relation to that industry can be investigated later on and if the results are going to be as our hon. friends say, namely, the ruination of the industry, it will be possible to take action in that connection. I do not however think it will be necessary to do so.

Mr. CAHAN: Has the hon. gentleman ever learned the reasons why the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and their colleagues have changed their minds since last year?

Mr. McINTOSH: I would like the hon. member to inform me on that question. I am always ready to learn.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know. I have been waiting to find out some reason why they have changed their minds. I am asking if my hon. friend knows.

Mr. McINTOSH: It is not very important in any case. The important thing is that the tariff is cut and the people are going to reap the benefit. I believe the Tariff Advisory Board will be an important department. I do not say it is going to be the saviour commercially of the people of this country, but I believe it is worth while experimenting with it. The success of the tariff board will to a large extent depend upon the way in which its members will carry out their duties. If they go at their work with a will, investigate in a national way every question that comes before them and do their best by the industry and the people of this country, they will do a great deal of good and will justify the establishment of the board from year to year.

I have in my hand an article which I am not going to read, but which I would like to place on Hansard. It is from the pen of Mr. Alexander Smith, Barrister at Law, Ottawa. This opinion is taken from a publication entitled "A period of New Beginnings for Liberalism." It was written in 1921 and the statements which follow are important because they are in line with the pronouncements of the present government and because they contain facts which are important to the customs tariff and other methods of public taxation. The article is in accordance with the appointment of a tariff board and in line with any government taking action toward the adoption of new methods of meeting public questions and meeting them successfully.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Does the hon. gentleman understand that the article is prepared by a man who was the chief organizer of the Liberal party for many years?

Mr. McINTOSH: I understand that fully. I was looking at the question from the standpoint not of any particular organization but of the product the man brought out. I was looking upon it from the standpoint not of what party he belonged to or of what he had done for any party, but of a pronouncement of a citizen of Canada. The article is as follows:

> As far as possible taxation should be direct and unconcealed so that each taxpayer may know what he is doing and may be able, by his style and scale of living to dictate the measure and ratio of his taxation:
> The customs tariff, the largest source of revenue, should, before being submitted to the judgment of parliament, be immediately and searchingly revised line by line, word by word, and rate by rate by fair and open-minded men (not by a partisan minister and officials coached by special cliques and interests) with a full and clear understanding of all essential facts pertaining to each industry, so that in the framing of the new rates the interests of the revenue should be paramount, and that incidentally all round justice be rendered, in a spirit of compromise, which is the true basis of wise legislation where there are conflicting interests.
> Immediate efforts should be made to reconcile any divergent views of the east and the west, and thereby improve the path to united national effort.
> The day is gone when any sect, clique, interest, class or body of men, east or west, can be permitted to impose their uncompromising will on the rest of the people.
> In the framing of measures for securing revenue special attention should be given to the wealth created for individuals by the involuntary co-operative methods of communities, and not by the efforts of the individuals themselves.

The Ottawa Citizen makes the following comment on this opinion:

> The publication of this pamphlet and the discussions which took place generally on the matter of a tariff board have helped the government to gauge public opinion and appoint a board such as anticipated.

In conclusion I would like to deal with the question of the British preferential tariff. The British preferential tariff was introduced in 1897; in 1898 it was increased from ⅛ to 25 per cent and in 1900 it was increased to 33⅓ per cent. That tariff to-day is wrapped up with the fiscal policy of Canada, the motherland and other parts of the empire. The Liberal party of the day in making a move in the direction of a preferential tariff took an important step forward in the history of Canada or the British Empire. Not only did it link up Canada more successfully with the United Kingdom and other portions of the empire, but it developed in this country a greater power not only in productivity but in introducing a competition that benefited the people of Canada by millions of dollars, made us a great exporting nation, and gave us a new viewpoint in the way of trade between ourselves, other portions of the empire and foreign countries.

I said before that the Conservative party had mooted the question time and again but that they did not take action upon it. The Liberal party took action and I believe this preferential tariff which has been a great means of regulating prices in this country, has helped to place Canada since 1913 in the position of making the greatest gain of any country in the world in the way of trade. This success has been based upon three factors: first, the continuance of the British preference; secondly, the fact that the Conservative government after the war did not dare to raise the tariff; and, in the third place, the fact that the Liberal administration since 1921 has been moving in the direction of a fair tariff for all Canada. These are the three factors which have contributed to the upbuilding of our foreign trade and the development of our industry, and to reinforce this argument I should like to place on Hansard the following series of figures. The first table, taken from the trade returns, shows the imports from and exports to Great Britain, including the period since the adoption of the British preference:

Great Britain

Year	Imports	Exports
1868..	$ 37,617,325	$ 17,905,808
1878..	37,252,769	45,917,693
1883..	51,679,762	47,011,180
1896..	32,824,505	66,689,253
1911..	109,934,753	136,962,971
1922..	117,135,343	300,363,193
1925..	151,083,946	397,168,048

It will be noted that the imports in 1868 and 1878 are almost the same there being a decrease for the latter year approximating half a million dollars. Exports show an increase of $28,000,000 odd.

The following table shows the percentages of increase or decrease in imports and exports from 1878 to 1925:

Imports

1878-1883 show increase approximately 46 per cent.
1883-1896 show decrease approximately 36 per cent.
1878-1896 show decrease approximately 10 per cent in 18 years.
1896-1911 show increase 240 per cent.
1922-1925 (3 years) show increase 33 per cent.

Exports

1878-1883 show increase 46 per cent.
1896-1911 show increase approximately 100 per cent.
1922-1925 show increase 33⅓ per cent.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

The following table shows the total imports and exports, all countries, for different fiscal years between 1878 and 1926:

I am placing these figures on Hansard to prove that Canada, far from being commercially decadent, is developing more and more into a great exporting nation, and that under the benign influence of the preferential tariff and the wise policy of the Liberal government she will attain to still greater proportions commercially as the years go on.

Before I conclude I feel it my duty to discuss for a moment the vital question of Canadian unity, and in this connection I want to offer this opinion to the House and to the country, that there should be neither east nor west in Canada. I am reminded of a story once told by Abraham Lincoln. He said that he had heard of a certain bridge committee having been appointed to construct a bridge across a deep, wide and dangerous river. Contractors and architects were heard before the committee and after a certain number of meetings of the committee one member named Brown expressed the opinion that they had not made very much progress. He suggested that a certain friend of his, one Jones, be consulted, for Jones, he said, could build a bridge over any river. Jones was called upon and asked whether he could build the bridge across this particular river, and he replied with assurance that if necessary he could not only build the bridge in question but could also build one from there to the infernal regions. Upon his withdrawal from the meeting, Brown, on being interrogated by one of the members of the committee, expressed the view that if Jones said he could build a bridge to the infernal regions he could no doubt carry out the undertaking, but he, Brown, was doubtful about the abutment on the infernal side. Abraham Lincoln, applying the story to the subject he was discussing, said that he had been in touch with public men from all parts of the country and had tried to get their views upon the great question of securing the union of the northern and southern wings of American democracy. He said he was of the opinion that it could be done, but he was rather doubtful about the abutment on the southern side. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that is pretty much the way it is in Canada. The people of the east feel that unity is quite feasible but for the difficulty of the abutment on the western side. Similarly the people of the west are doubtful about the abutment in the east. Now we must get together and devise some means of bridging east and west, and before this can be done we must banish all sectionalism. Only in this way can we build up a great and united Dominion.

Perhaps I might venture to put in the form of a parable the position in which any government of the country would find itself under conditions such as prevail at present. Suppose any hon. member in this House had sold all his earthly possessions and had committed the gold he got in return to the care of some man, who, having it upon his person, was given the task of crossing the Niagara gorge on a tight-wire. While that man was balancing himself on the wire would we proceed to badger him, to rock the wire and advise him to bow a little to the east this time, then a little to the west, next a little to the north, and then a little to the south, to stand up straight, to go a little slower or a little faster? I do not think so. We would do our best to encourage him until he had reached the other side in safety. That, Mr. Speaker, is somewhat like our position politically to-day. We have got practically to bridge a political gorge, we have to do that wisely and well, and I believe we shall do so if we remember the substance of the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when standing by the bier of Sir John A. Macdonald, the greatest father of confederation:

> Let not our grief be anxious grief. Let us rather give to confederation, the instrument which Macdonald brought into existence, our love, our admiration and our solid support. If we do that Canada shall and will live forever.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if we can unite in such a way as to do our best for the national welfare we will bridge the gorge between the east and the west, and by doing that we will ensure a still greater future for this Dominion, we will make it a still more splendid part of the British crown, and in the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, we can rest assured that Canada shall and will live forever.

Mr. J. L. STANSELL (Norfolk-Elgin): Mr. Speaker, the opening part of the speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. McIntosh) reminds me of the practice of promoters of certain wildcat companies in seeking to use the name of an eminently respectable man as an honorary director so that his reputation may inspire confidence in the public to buy the worthless stock placed on the market by those wily gentlemen. The desperate effort of the hon. member to couple the name of Providence with the acts of this government, however much it might, under certain circumstances, increase the use of would not tend to increase the reverence in which that name is held.

While I cannot congratulate the Minister of Finance upon all the provisions of his budget, I can offer him my sincere congratulations on the practical and brief form of its presentation. I go further, Mr. Speaker, I would welcome a change in the rules of this House to limit the speeches of private members to thirty minutes except by unanimous consent. The result would be beneficial in every way, it would expedite the sessional work, and would increase the respect in which this House is held by our people from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and last, but not least, such a rule would be of distinct benefit to the member himself whenever he had occasion to state his views. If the ideas contained in most of our speeches were compressed into thirty or forty minutes instead of being stretched out over two or more hours—

An hon. MEMBER: Sometimes five hours.

Mr. STANSELL: —those speeches would not so much remind us of the proverbial needle in a haystack.

Before touching on the budget proper, Sir, I desire to review briefly the general situation in this House. I do not propose to enumerate the platform pledges of the government and its supporters when the last parliament was dissolved; they are common knowledge. We were told that problems which pressed for solution could only be dealt with by a government commanding a strong majority in the House. We all know after the new parliament was convened why changes were made in the Speech from the Throne. We may take it for granted that the results of the election were a distinct disappointment to the Prime Minister, who selected his own time for appealing to the country, and who named the issues which made the election necessary. He himself was defeated as were most of his ministers. With the calling of the members together to decide which party should be given the responsibility of government, I have no fault whatever to find, but I do criticize the methods adopted to secure that deciding vote. We well know that in the speech which was put into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General certain issues were included that were not before the country in October, but it was believed that they might be acceptable to certain groups in this House, and they were incorporated in the hope that a sufficient number of votes would be secured to enable the defeated party to carry on. Even that was not considered sufficient to ensure support; we were told by the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Boivin) that voting for the Address itself would not be construed by the government as a vote of confidence! Under those conditions a small majority was secured by the government which now occupies the treasury benches.

It is possible to make water run up hill only in limited quantities, and by paying the price.

I submit to you, Sir, that under the conditions which prevailed when we were called together early in January there was only one precedent that this House should have established—that the group having the largest number of members should be given an opportunity to form a government. I know it was frequently stated by members and supporters of the present government that there was no way of harmonizing the views of the Conservative party with those entertained by other parties in the House. Well, the only proof was to make the effort. I assert without hesitation that, regardless of party considerations, when there are a number of groups in the House, the only sound and logical course to pursue is to give to the largest group the first opportunity to form a government. Then if that largest group in the Speech from the Throne enunciated a policy that failed to secure the approval of a sufficient number of hon. members, the second largest group should be given an opportunity to see what they could do, and in case of their failure we might appeal to the country again. But in giving the second largest group control we are attempting to make water run up hill, and for this unnatural action we must pay the price.

A part of the price in this instance will be the practical annihilation of the Progressive or Independent party. Like myself, Mr. Speaker, you were here during the sessions of the last parliament; we well know how often and how ably members of the Independent group to my left contributed to the work of the House and frequently offered constructive criticism. But let me point out to you, Sir, that during this session the proverbial oyster is a shrieking siren as compared to the silence in that corner of the House. The charge has frequently been made in the past that the Independent or Progressive party are nothing more than camouflaged Liberals. I was never inclined to adopt that view, but rather gave them some credit for being an independent party. From one end of Canada to the other to-day, however, you would have difficulty in making people believe that that is not so, and that is a part of the price the Progressive party will pay for the mistake made early in January. But, Sir, what concerns me most is the price the people of Canada must pay for the lack of business administration, the disturbance of industry and the general uncertainty prevailing at present, which will continue to obtain while this government, with its present policy, retains power.

It is impossible to speak in this budget debate without referring to protection. I am always interested in the arguments adduced on both sides of the House, and it is sometimes wondered why this argument never ends, and why someone does not establish which side is right. I think the reason is self-evident. When a man, for various reasons, has grown up imbued with free trade or protective ideas, he approaches all arguments of this kind looking only for proof in support of his own belief, and for that reason we are never enabled to come to a sound conclusion. I think, however, that we can well afford to look at a few essential facts which do not admit of argument. Let me say at the outset that I believe protection is the settled policy of Canada, and in spite of arguments made in this House, in spite of the personal beliefs of other hon. members, I believe Canada will continue to maintain protection as a settled policy. The time has arrived when it is vitally necessary to announce that policy to the world in general, in order that everyone may know what is our policy. We have only to look at some of the highly protected countries to realize that in those countries there is very little unemployment, wages are comparatively high and goods are cheap. We have only to consider our nearest neighbour for proof of those statements, and when we accept those essential facts we must surely realize the futility of advocating free trade for a country such as Canada. As proof of that we have, I submit, the determined requests and repeated arguments on the part of those who profess to believe in free trade for a lowering of our tariff barriers, in order to permit cheap goods produced under high wage conditions to enter from the United States. That shows, I submit, how foolish is the argument that protection increases prices. I admit that that is so under certain circumstances, but it is not always the case. Those countries which have consistently pursued a policy of protection find themselves to-day almost without exception with very little unemployment, with a satisfactory scale of wages and the ability to produce cheap goods in large quantities. So much is that the case with our neighbour to the south that we look upon her with jealous eyes, and some of us advocate a reduction of duties in order that we may purchase these cheap goods, produced in a highly protected country.

Having declared that protection is the settled policy of Canada, or that such should be the case, our main concern must be to see that, so far as it is humanly possible, it is equally and fairly distributed. This has not always been the case in the past, but let me say that the policy of the Conservative party, as I conceive it, is not one applying to individuals or separate interests but one which considers rather the protection of Canada as a whole, and we should approach discussion of this subject in that spirit only.

Why should we have a protective policy at all? Let me remind hon. members of this well known fact, that there are certain expenses incidental to all methods and forms of government. We pay certain municipal taxes, school taxes, direct or indirect provincial taxes, as well as federal taxes. These comprise our contribution to the expense of government, to the overhead necessary to run the business of this Dominion. The man who comes to Canada and invests his capital in Canadian enterprise or industry, whether in a farm, a factory or a mine, assumes his share of that overhead and pays without complaint his share of the expenses of the country. In return for that payment he receives, or should receive, the privilege of supplying goods to the home market. The producer of similar goods in any other country who gains possession of our market pays nothing in taxation and does not carry one ounce of the load of taxation; that market to him is a free gift. I say without hesitation that the average protection Canada should have, the very least under which she can exist, is a protection sufficiently high in favour of the home worker and producer to enable him to carry that burden. Then and then only, is he placed on a parity with his competitor from outside.

It has been calculated that the total amount of our overhead, including all forms of government, is about 17 per cent of our production, and therefore the least possible protection Canada should have must average about 17 per cent. As a matter of fact we do not have more than that at present. When we consider the question in this light we realize that all through the past years Conservative and Liberal governments, no matter what their policies or professions were, when faced with the responsibilities of office have kept the measure of protection at about that level. That explains why the Laurier-Fielding government, which was largely elected on a policy of free trade, not only kept the average at that level, but in certain particulars raised it, so in the general result the average during that period was fully as high as, if not higher than under the Macdonald tariff.

I venture to assert that if the Progressive party or my friends from Saskatchewan who profess to believe in the merits of free trade were suddenly faced with the responsibility of government, knowing all the facts of the case they would not have the courage to reduce the tariff very much below its present level. As I said before, there may be certain cases where the tariff is a little too high, but there are many other cases, and these apply particularly to farm products, where the level is too low. I believe that a measure of protection should be extended fairly to every industry and every class of production in this Dominion. Until we realize and announce to ourselves—it may be necessary for some of us first to convert ourselves—that protection is necessary, and until we announce to the world that protection fairly distributed is the settled policy of this country, Canada will never enjoy the prosperity and progress to which she is entitled.

I know that very frequently we are met with the argument, in support of reductions in taxation, that we must have trade, that we cannot sell unless we buy. I want to ask my friends from the west this: Is not trade between Saskatchewan and Ontario or between Manitoba and Quebec just as valuable to the provinces concerned as trade between those western provinces and any states in the American union? And is not this inter-provincial trade of infinitely greater benefit to Canada as a whole? These are questions that I think should be considered; these are facts that I think cannot be disputed. If Canada is made prosperous by a protective policy such as that, if we announce to the world once for all that Canada is a protective country and will look after the interests of the men and women whom we hope to attract to our shores, if we assure those who have capital to invest that they will be fairly treated and their interests safeguarded if they invest in this country, our problem of immigration will be largely solved. We can spend millions trying to induce people to come to this country, but so long as we have a government that from the ambush of cabinet secrecy snipes here and there at the various industries of this country, and with none knowing where the blow will next fall, there will always be an element of uncertainty and distrust which will drive Canadians to seek employment elsewhere and be disastrous to us in our national progress. If this prosperity and progress comes to Canada as a result of a protective policy, let me say to my friends from the west who have not the same faith in the protective policy that some of us have, they can rest assured that a certain measure of that prosperity will accrue to them. They have since coming to this House, particularly the members from Saskatchewan, shown that they do not lack in aggressiveness, and that quality I am sure will enable them to get their share of the prosperity that will come to Canada by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy.

This budget has been proclaimed by some sections of the press as a "poor man's budget." It has been said that it is a popular budget. Of course it is a popular budget; it was intended to be. A government that had to attain power by methods such as were resorted to by this government, and knowing the danger in which they stand from hour to hour, realizing the necessity, perhaps I should say the advisability, of an early election, has skilfully prepared this budget with the idea of securing votes and popular support in the country. This explains why many provisions of this budget which were strongly opposed and voted against by members on the other side of the House, including cabinet ministers, last year and in previous years are now being strongly supported by them. The hope is that this budget will be so popular that in the event of the necessity for an election, it will enable them to get back on the treasury benches once more.

Now what are the provisions that make this budget popular? Reduction of taxation is always popular. The methods pursued by this government remind me of those followed by a municipal council, which in a desperate effort to make itself popular will strike a lower tax rate than it should in the hope that prosperity may come in some degree next year and thus prevent an unfavourable showing. There is just one sound reason, Mr. Speaker, for a reduction in taxation, and that is a corresponding reduction in expenditure.

One thing that is designed to make this budget popular and a poor man's budget is the reduction in the income tax, but I would point out that there are a lot of poor men who did not have to pay any income tax, and whom this reduction will not affect. There will be the feeling in the back of their heads that the necessary taxation to make up for this reduction will have to be provided by someone somewhere, and if the man who is wealthy enough to pay income tax is to have his load lightened, somebody somewhere must make up the deficit.

We have been told that this budget is popular because the receipt tax has been abolished. I wonder who put that receipt tax on. This government itself is responsible for that annoying tax, and surely credit is not to be given them now because they are taking away an injustice that they themselves put upon the Canadian people.

We are also to have a reduction in postage. The Post Office Department is one government department that is shown to be in a fairly healthy condition. But the postage is one form of taxation that people were not complaining loudly about. I wonder who is going to profit by this reduction in postage. Is it the poor man who writes a couple of letters a week, or is it the wealthy man or the business man who buys his postage by the hundreds or by the thousands of dollars? If this reduction is for the benefit of the wealthy, and it certainly is, someone somewhere must make up the deficit. Would it not have been wiser to have kept the postage, which people were not complaining about, as it was, and then use any surplus that might have accumulated to extend rural mail delivery to the outlying sections where farmers are denied that privilege to-day? There is nothing that does more to make life pleasant on the farm in isolated surroundings than the boon of rural mail delivery which enables the farmer to have his daily paper delivered at his door to keep himself and his family informed in regard to all the great questions of the day. Many parts of Canada are still suffering from lack of this convenience.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Is the hon. member opposed to the reduction of postage?

Mr. STANSELL: I was stating my views very plainly. I know there are a few members in that corner of the House who are anxious to make records for themselves as champion questioners, but I do not see why I should assist them in that respect. I said that the reduction in postage was of the greatest benefit to the wealthy man and wealthy corporation, and was not of such great advantage to the poor man. I stand by that statement. I said that if the postage had been left as it was any surplus that accumulated might well have been used to extend rural mail delivery to the outlying sections which have not this privilege to-day, and any excess might be used to lower taxation in other directions.

These are some of the features that are supposed to make this a popular budget and "a poor man's budget". But as I have pointed out in not one instance can it be shown that it is favourable or beneficial to the poor man. On the other hand there are some distinct failures in the budget. For years past, as I stated in my introductory remarks, the farmers have suffered under a disability, and this applies particularly to the dairy and fruit farmers as I have them in my constituency; they have suffered from a lack of adequate protection. They have not had the measure of protection afforded them that has been accorded to other industries. Since the present government came into power it has taken away the greater part of the protection that these farmers enjoyed, particularly by the negotiations of certain treaties. The results are already manifest, and will become more serious as the months go by. Supporters of the government argue that dairy products, eggs, fruit, vegetables, and so on are admitted to Canada when we do not have a surplus of these commodities ourselves, but that is not the real difficulty encountered. The difficulty consists in this: Because of an earlier season our farmer competitors on the other side of the line are enabled to take the cream of our market. That is they get the benefit of high prices, while the Canadian producer of fruits, vegetables, eggs, and dairy products, and so on, receives the low prices which rule when the market has been demoralized by the importation of products raised where earlier seasons prevail. How can you expect the farmers to be contented under such conditions? How can you expect men to invest money in farms in Ontario or elsewhere in Canada? They know that the government that taxes them for the privilege they enjoy is going to admit products of the kind referred to from another country exported by competitors who pay no taxes to this country and are free, or comparatively free, from payment of duty. That competition is unfair and unjust and should not be allowed to continue. But instead of providing a remedy the present government has actually made the situation worse.

Let me also say that if the government had been anxious to reduce annoying taxes they might very well have turned their attention to the tax now in force on notes and cheques. The tax on notes particularly is an unjust form of taxation. There are many farmers throughout the length and breadth of this country, many of them in the province of Ontario, who find it necessary to get assistance from the banks because they have insufficient capital. So far as my observation goes this assistance has been extended fairly freely and at a fair rate or at least not an excessive rate, of interest. But when a farmer thus situated, or for that matter a business man, secures an advance from the bank for a short time, he must plaster the note with stamps, and if he follows business methods and pays by cheque, the cheque also must be similarly plastered to the extent of two cents for every $50. This is an annoying and exasperating form of taxation in the case of men of small means who are obliged to conduct their business on borrowed capital. If the government were anxious to bring down a "poor man's budget" that is one matter to which they would have devoted their attention.

Another serious criticism I have to make of the budget is this: Canada is possessed of wonderful natural resources, sufficient, if they were properly developed and manufactured and the products sold in a finished form, to go a long way towards reducing the national debt if not actually wiping it out. Nothing whatever is done to carry out a policy of that kind, in fact the opposite course is pursued. Encouragement is given to the export of our raw material, and supporters of the government then claim credit for the extent of that exportation, consisting as it does largely of raw materials that should be manufactured and sold in a finished form in Canada.

Now I come to the reduction of the duty on automobiles. We are all familiar with what the government has done; we are all familiar with certain incidents that have happened in recent weeks. Surely the first thing that should have been considered was whether we as Canadians desired to have an automobile industry in this country. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat referred to what he though was a desirable form of protection; that protection, he considered, should be high in the case of a new industry, and be gradually lessened as that industry established itself. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that the automobile industry is one of the newest industries we have. Such being the case why should it be singled out for persecution when other industries that have enjoyed the same measure of protection for years have not been touched? I notice the Minister of Finance was careful to see that nothing was done to injure the milling industry in the budget. The Minister of Justice, too, was careful to see that boots and shoes were not touched, although that industry enjoys an equally high protective tariff. Furthermore, one of the prospective ministers has been careful to see, or at least someone took the necessary steps in his behalf, that nothing was done to prejudice the furniture industry. And only the other night the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard), who criticized the protection formerly enjoyed by automobiles, said the tariff was all right as far as the industries in his own town were concerned. The industries I have enumerated have been left alone, but one of our newest industries has been singled out for persecution, if not annihilation, without being granted a hearing in its own behalf. Are we as a Canadian people to return to the dark ages when things of this sort could be done, when an individual, a city or an industry could be condemned and sentenced, without any opportunity to make a defence? Now, it seems, we have a Tariff Advisory Board. The creation of this board is one of the few promises fulfilled by the government during the last four or five years out of the number which it made. That board has been in existence for some time, but it has not been given anything to do. Why was not the case of the automobile industry referred to this board for investigation, instead of bringing down suddenly a reduction of duty in the budget? Why did the government not make use of the machinery which it had created itself?

The question is whether we want an automobile industry in Canada or not. Will any hon. gentleman admit that we cannot have such an industry in view of the wealth of our natural resources, many of which could be utilized in connection with this industry, and the extent and population of this country? There can be only one answer to that question. Having admitted that we should produce automobiles for our own people, is it not reasonable that we should grant protection to the men engaged in that industry and the money invested in it? After all, what is it the Canadian buyer really wants? Is it a reduction of duty or the opportunity of being able to purchase the articles which he needs at a reasonable price? Surely if we can produce automobiles in Canada at a reasonable price there is no justification for a reduction of duty. These are questions that should have been duly weighed and considered. The manufacturers of automobiles have been deprived of the opportunity of presenting their case. Personally I am not concerned with the question of whether the protection is thirty-five, forty-five or fifty per cent. I am willing to afford the manufacturer of any legitimate industry in this country a protection sufficient to ensure him the Canadian market provided that in return he does not charge the people of Canada an unfair price on the goods which he produces.

Someone on the other side of the House will immediately say: That cannot be done. A short time ago we were told that this government in the exercise of its power could go out upon the high seas and control international shipping rates. A government able to undertake a task such as that should surely be able to control the price of an automobile in this country. I have reason to believe that if the automobile manufacturers had been approached in a reasonable spirit, if they had been given the Canadian market for a standard make of car, they would have been willing in return to reduce the price substantially this year and to follow that up by further reductions. The real essence and need of protection is that we protect the home market. All we want in return is a fair price and it can be given in some other manner than that adopted by the government of the day. If we are going to build automobiles, let us build them in Canada. We may not be able to build them as cheaply as they can be built in other countries; but let us build them as cheaply as we can and build them in our own country. The same thing applies to any other legitimate industry which is or could be established in Canada.

We have a Tariff Advisory Board. I am reminded that a short time ago a deputation came to Ottawa protesting against a reduction in the duties on automobiles without having the question referred to the board. I listened carefully to the presentation of their statements; I observed the able manner in which they presented their case to the cabinet, and I heard an eloquent speaker on behalf of the veterans, many of whom were employed in that industry, say to the Prime Minister: "Mr. Prime Minister, when you were in Oshawa shortly before the election I, as a supporter, was invited to your platform. I heard you say that no act of yours would be injurious to any industry in Oshawa; I heard you say that before any reduction in duties would be made there would be a reference to the new tariff board that would be created, the fullest right would be given to them to present their case and a decision would be made on the merits of the case. All I am asking to-day, Mr. Prime Minister, is not that you restore the duties to their former level but that you refer this question to the board that you have appointed; in other words, that you keep the promise you made to the electors of Oshawa before the election." Was that not a reasonable request? It was presented in a most fair and gentlemanly manner.

Has public life in this country reached such a level that a deputation of 3,000 people must come here to ask the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada to keep a promise that he made a few days before the election? Yesterday we had a debate on the merits of which I do not intend to touch in any way; but it was a simple request on the part of a citizen of Canada, who claimed that he had suffered an injustice, to present his case to the House. A point of order was raised by the Prime Minister and an attempt was made to prevent that petition from being received. Have things come to such a pass that a citizen of this free country, complaining of an injustice done him by one of the officers of this House is not to be allowed to present his case? The only defence, or substance of a defence, was summed up by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) who said in effect that this petition should be rejected because the government before they received it had decided that they did not intend to grant it. Those were not the words but that was the effect of his explanation.

If there is anything that we should cherish in our parliamentary institutions, it is the pledges and promises that we as public men make when we appeal to our electors for support. Time after time during the past four or five years have mushroom promises been made to be almost immediately and callously broken. So we have the spectacle of almost daily occurrences such as I have cited and the government, guilty of this, appealing to the House and the country for continued support on a policy of expediency instead of on a sound, business policy in the best interests of this Dominion.

We have the admission of the government when the duties were reduced on automobiles, that this was done in response to sentiment. We have the further admission to-day from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that that sentiment was supported by newspaper clippings that he had before him on his desk. This fully substantiates—I do not need to look for anything further—the charge I have made that this is a government of expediency, determined to cling to office by any method at its disposal instead of on sound, business principles. When the automobile deputation were told that sentiment was of no value; that the only requisite was argument and solid facts a principle was laid down, but when the government wants to take action, sentiment or newspaper clippings or prospective votes, or anything in the world will suffice. What this country needs most of all is change of government and an announcement to the world that we intend to think and act as Canadians; that we intend to safeguard and protect our citizens and our industries; in a word, a true National Policy. This and this only will restore confidence and hasten national progress and prosperity in Canada.

Mr. WILFRID GIROUARD (Drummond-Arthabaska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Norfolk-Elgin (Mr. Stansell), and previous to him, a number of members of the opposition spoke of the interest and friendship they have for the farming class. It is always somewhat shocking to hear them express feelings which are grossly in contradiction with the deeds and the past policy of their party. In order to judge of their lack of sincerity we have but to verify the attitude taken by the Conservative party, between 1911 and 1921, towards the farming class of this country. What benefits did the farmers derive during the ten years of their administration? You are aware, Sir, that the paramount question at the general election in 1911, was the reciprocity treaty that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had succeeded in concluding with the United States, and for which the farming class had been clamouring for years. This treaty so highly advantageous to the farming community was rejected. However the Conservatives will not readily forget that the crisis they went through was principally due to the fact that the American market was closed to them. As early as 1912, the farmers bitterly clamoured for new markets for their products. We are aware that the Conservative government of that date did nothing to help them, not only did they do nothing, but they attempted to cripple the development of the dairy industry, by allowing margarine to be imported. I must say, Sir, that the farmers of my riding are very thankful to the King government for having prohibited the imports of this product. A further instance, which establishes well the lack of sincerity of the members of the opposition, is the following: At the time the King government cut down the duty on farming implements; when they wished to help the farmers so as to allow them to purchase at lower prices the articles of first necessity of which they were in need to work their farms, we witnessed the opposition having recourse to every possible means in order to prevent the farming class from benefiting by legislation which was all in its favour, and even more, we saw the hon. leader of the opposition state in this House that should he be returned to power, he would re-establish the high protective tariff. That is, the Conservative party, through the mouthpiece of its leader, undertook to abolish the advantages and favours which the King government was granting to the farming class.

Another very important feature for the farmers, the importance of which the Conservative government of the day did not understand or did not care to understand, was the necessity for the farming class to get new markets, in order to sell its products at profitable prices. The King government immediately dealt with this necessity endeavouring especially to revive the prosperity which the farmers enjoyed previous to the Tory government of 1911. Moreover, Sir, we have as an instance of the government's desire to help the farming class, we have as an instance, I say, the last treaty they have just concluded. I mean the West Indies treaty which the King government presents to the farming class with the firm belief that this treaty will benefit them, because it guarantees to the farming class an almost absolute monopoly on the products of the farm, such as butter, cheese, potatoes and other products. Behold then, Sir, these same gentlemen who, when they were in power, could have done something to help the farming class, yet they stirred not, and they come, to-day, in this House, shamming a friendship and an interest which their deeds belie.

The budget speech, Sir, was, especially this year, anxiously awaited. There is no question, I think, which interests so much the public as the discussion of the various measures which appear in the budget. We have the satisfaction and joy to note, in reading this speech, that our financial situation has considerably improved. There is one thing which nobody can deny and which I may be allowed to emphasize: it is that the budget speech has had on the Canadian people a great and beneficial effect which has in some way brought sunshine and hope where hon. members of the opposition would, perhaps, like to see but despondency and misery. This budget is a proof that our country, after struggling courageously, has finally emerged from the difficult situation caused by the economic disturbance brought on by the Tories from 1911 to 1921.

From the outset of the Liberal administration, we were made aware of what would be the policy followed. In order to better appreciate the various measures announced in the budget speech, it is well to glance rapidly over the past, for it is necessary that the people of this country should everlastingly remember what was the financial and economic conditions existing when the King administration came into power in 1921.

The Conservatives contend that our debt is enormous. They never miss an occasion of proclaiming that the taxes are heavy; but why, Sir, do they not also proclaim that they are responsible for such a state, and that if we have taxes, these have become necessary because of their administration. Do they expect to make us forget that they needed but ten years to increase our debt to more than two billion dollars. I think that, if the opposition wished to be sincere, they would admit that when they assumed power in 1911, the country was prosperous and when they retired, we were on the verge of ruin. It seems to me that this has some weight. However this is not all. After being returned to power, the Conservatives began to spend, without the slightest thought of economy, and one fact shows us clearly in what manner we were governed. During the fifteen years of the Liberal rule, under Laurier, the government had only increased our debt by about $40,000,000. The Conservatives possessing, no doubt, a great aptitude for lavishly spending money, increased, in the first three years of their administration, this debt by more than $80,000,000, and I want you, Sir, to note that this was but an inkling of what was threatening the country. A crisis, often referred to in this House, succeeded to happy days. This was so evident that the government of the day, at the outset of the session of 1914, put the following words in the mouth of His Excellency, the Governor General, in the Speech from the Throne: "that business is at a standstill owing to a financial crisis." The Conservatives acknowledging, at the time they were in power, that business was at a standstill, we can easily conceive in what difficult situation the country found itself at that time, we can without fear of being in error, state that bad times were coming. In the midst of this, war broke out.

It was, Sir, as you know a period of extravagant expenditure. We then were ruled by a government that seemed to have lost its head, an administration that seemed to do its utmost to bring ruin upon us. The ratepayers of this country had hoped at least, that once the war over, this orgy would cease. But nothing of the sort happened. The debt unceasingly increased, and the people, who in 1917 were unable to give free vent to their opinions took their revenge in 1921.

The King government assumed power, becoming heir to a much involved estate. In 1911, the country's debt amounted to about $335,000,000. Under the Tory regime it had increased two billion dollars. What the people expected from the King government, in 1921, was the balancing of our finances, and this we have succeeded in doing to-day. The budget speech clearly shows that we have at last emerged from the difficult situation created by the Tory government. And, by the way, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that, if there is one thing which should command our sympathy, it is the anxious desire shown by our ministers to realize, for the people of this country, the hopes which they put in them. This trust was well placed. Thanks to a strict economy, foresight and a business knowledge which had been found wanting during ten years, thanks also to the honest desire to give to all citizens legislation which suited them best, Canada has risen from its ruins and our administrators, after having met the heavy obligations which were an aftermath of the war, after having provided for the other needs of Canada, present, to-day, to the people of this country a budget which shows a substantial decrease in the public debt and a cutting down in the taxes, relieves the ratepayer and tends to increase among all the hope and confidence which a few years of Liberal rule have imparted. That hope, Sir, each year since 1921, the ratepayer feels, is growing in him. No doubt everybody understood that under these circumstances, the task was a difficult one for the government, and everyone equally saw, each year, that there was an improvement. The ratepayer understood that it was easier to demolish than to rebuild, that it was impossible for the King government, in so short a time, to rebuild and restore what the Conservatives had taken ten years to destroy; yet, our leaders immediately tackled the task, with the result that after but a few years, the government had succeeded beyond the hopes of our people: they had realized the dream which all cherished, that is of at last seeing the balance of our finances re-established.

Most of the hon. members who have spoken on the budget have discussed at length the duty on automobiles. I have no intention to broach that subject, however, I shall remind them that the budget also discloses a great number of measures which are equally beneficial to the public. Why do hon. members of the opposition oppose the budget? The member for Norfolk-Elgin (Mr. Stansell), a few moments ago, admitted that it was a popular budget; yet we shall see that he will be one of the first to vote against it. They, who are responsible for our financial difficulties, should be the first to applaud at the relief it brings to the ratepayers of this country.

I intend, Sir, to enumerate a few only of the measures which have been disclosed by the budget speech. First, we note a decrease of $25,000,000 in the taxes, and at the same time the public debt is reduced by $22,353,000. What a difference, Sir, there is with that of the Tory administration! To cut down the taxes, decrease the public debt and obtain at the same time a substantial increase in our revenues, that seems to me what may be called good financing, a thing, perhaps, that the hon. members of the opposition cannot grasp. The sales tax, which weighs so heavily on the mass has disappeared on a great number of articles, and this added to other exemptions, and abolishment in connection with the sales tax of previous years, will be very beneficial to the consumers. Then we note in the budget, the disappearance of the receipt tax and the return to the penny postage rate. I think, Sir, that the mails are an easy way of communicating with one another and that service should be given at the lowest possible rate in order that it may be at the disposal of everybody even of the poorest person. These two latter measures meet with the approval of the whole country and I think that the Minister of Finance had a happy thought in introducing them. I have been in a position to satisfy myself as regards the unanimous endorsation of these proposals by the electors in the riding that I have the honour to represent, when these reductions took place following the budget speech. The cutting down of the income tax was an agreeable surprise, inasmuch as the reductions were substantial, therefore this measure is certainly a welcome one.

One may judge of its far-reaching effects from the following facts: Married people having no dependents enjoy an exemption to the extent of $3,000; the exemption per child remains at $500. Those who, under the old act, paid $20 and $40 of income tax, will have no payments to make now. Those who previously paid $60, $80 and even $100, will now pay according to the new proposed rates but $10, $20 or $30. We can readily understand that the reduction proposed is substantial and to the benefit of the tax payer. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) deserves our congratulations for the shrewdness shown in negotiating our loans in order to meet our war debts which matured during the last fiscal year. To meet these obligations, the government paid out of its revenues a sum of $19,347,833, thus reducing our consolidated debt and saving to the country a sum of $819,058, on the yearly interest.

The budget speech gives us an excellent idea of the enormous expansion of our trade. We recall that in 1921, the balance of trade was against us. Our imports overlapped our exports by an amount of $29,730,763. At that time our dollar had depreciated by almost 15 per cent. To-day everything has changed: our dollar is at a premium on the American exchange and the balance of trade is in our favour.

For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923, our exports overlapped our imports by an amount of $142,716,593; in 1924, by $165,396,430; in 1925, by $284,429,106, and for the twelve months ending March 31, 1926, they overlapped to the extent of $402,000,000. We are therefore justified, Sir, in saying that the years of stringency have passed and that the country is entering upon an era of prosperity such as we have not seen for a long time past.

Before closing these few remarks, I think it is wise on our part to inquire as to the course followed by the King government with regard to our foreign affairs. I state, without hesitation, that our interests were first considered. For instance, at the time of the Anglo-Turk entanglement, the Tory party, true to its principles, was ready to throw us into a new conflict, while the King government took up a truly Canadian attitude. As early as 1921, the King ministry put into practice an entirely Canadian policy, strongly opposed to the evil influences of imperialism, equally opposed to all foreign policy that clashed with the true Canadian interests. An essentially Canadian policy, it seems to me, cannot but receive the support of all those who truly love their country, and I feel convinced that the present administration will adhere to those sane principles

Mr. A. D. CHAPLIN (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to address the House, and as a new member I hope my fellow-members will bear with me, for I will be as brief as possible. After listening to a great number of speeches I feel like the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) when he said, "Let them take a dose of their own medicine," the only difference between us being that I do not care if the remark is taken ironically or otherwise.

So far in this debate, Sir, I have failed to hear one supporter of the government give the real reason for the tariff being taken out of the hands of the tariff board which was appointed days before the budget was brought down. The Minister of Finance gave as his reason a pronounced sentiment among the people of Canada that the auto manufacturers have too much protection. This puts me in mind of a certain burglary. Those involved were trying to hide their tracks by making it appear that it was an outside job, but it was found that the night watchman was the go-between and that it was really an inside job. Now, Sir, the night watchman in this job is the black knight from Saskatchewan and his crew. I have reason to believe that the Progressives were not so drastic in their demands, but the westerners from that province came to headquarters and said: "There is the dotted line—sign!" And this is the result. The only other member who gave a reason was from British Columbia, who said the reduction was made for political exigencies, which is a rather broad reason. To me it sounds like a very weak political excuse.

While addressing the biggest deputation of working men that ever came to Ottawa, the Prime Minister said that numbers did not count with him, only argument. I think he told the truth. If there had been one hundred thousand men in that throng his answer under the circumstances would have been the same, as his mind had already been made up for him by his few supporters from the west. When the Prime Minister was appealing for votes in the last election he stated from practically every platform that if elected he would take the tariff out of politics by appointing a tariff board. This was confirmed in the Speech from the Throne. Days after the appointment of this board the budget was brought down, which takes the tariff out of the hands of his own tariff board. Then he tells the deputation that parliament rules! If parliament passes this budget it will in effect tell the Prime Minister that he cannot live up to his pre-election promises. This is a clear intimation that the Prime Minister does not possess the confidence of his own government, and that if he had kept true to his pledges he would not be in office to-day.

But the Prime Minister is not the only member of the cabinet who has offended in this regard. The Minister of Railways the other day had to admit that he had said something in the West Middlesex election that was not so. Then the Minister of "Self" Defence from Pictou, or where he jumped to, also tried to make the House believe that 350,000 bushels of wheat had gone over the Canadian National Railways to the port of Halifax, knowing all the time it was not so. Now, these triplets of truth are very economical with the truth, and if they made such statements in any private business they would not last long.

Coming to the reduction in the automobile tariff, I notice by the new Ford price list—and I use this as an example because it is the car that has been most spoken of in this debate—that the price of the cheapest car has been reduced $15. I have heard a great deal from the government side of the House about the poor man on the street, and how the tariff kept him from buying a car. However, if he could not afford to buy at $410, and is now thinking of buying at $395, my advice to him would be to leave it alone as he is practically in the same position still. If this government had been sincere in its desire to help this poor man there was a way open to do so. They could have removed the luxury tax, which would have made a greater reduction in the price of the car than the decrease in the tariff duty. If a car is a necessity, there is all the more reason why the luxury tax should come off and the tariff duty be left alone to protect that poor man in his job.

Let me direct the attention of the House to the effect which this new tariff has upon the manufacturer engaged in the making of auto bodies. The makers of auto parts in Canada have never taken advantage of the full tariff. Most of them have contracted to deliver goods to the Canadian auto maker at a price of at least 5 per cent under the tariff. The tariff on auto bodies has been reduced from 35 to 20 per cent. This compels the body maker to work upon a basis of 15 per cent, taking into consideration the 5 per cent he surrenders through his contract. Then the clause in the new tariff which gives to the automobile manufacturer a drawback of 25 per cent, provided that 50 per cent of the total cost is of Canadian manufacture, reduces the working basis of the body maker another 5 per cent, leaving him a tariff of only 10 per cent. And that is not all. The body maker is compelled to import certain expensive parts from the United States under the new tariff, the duty on these parts running as high as 35 per cent. The amount of duty they pay on the imported parts is responsible for a still further reduction and probably in some cases entirely wipes out the 10 per cent which was left, which means that the body makers have no protection at all.

Now if it is true, as the government contend, that they have thoroughly investigated this automobile tariff from all angles, then they have knowingly and deliberately put these automobile part factories out of business. If they did not get this information before hand, it is all the more reason why they should have referred the whole matter of the automobile tariff to their new tariff board. I believe that after the business has been disorganized it will eventually be forced into the hands of the board for expert investigation. I feel certain, therefore, that the government would save themselves a lot of trouble and the country a great deal of turmoil by placing this tariff problem before the tariff board who were appointed for the express purpose of dealing with questions of this nature.

The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) said the other day that the automobile industry would not be hurt any more than some of the farmers out west had been hurt by hail. Admitting that they had lost everything, you see by deduction that the automobile companies cannot suffer to any greater extent than being put out of business. Is not that a fine spirit! And this member is the supposed missing link of unity between east and west. I have heard the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) describe the western wheat grower as "the sowless, cowless, chickenless farmer." I am going to add another word of description to these soil robbers—I would call them the soulless, sowless, cowless, chickenless farmers.

Apart from the tragic reduction in automobiles and parts the budget amounts to very little. The reductions made are mostly removals of taxes which were imposed by this government. The government's method of giving relief to the country in this respect reminds me of the story of a man who threw a boy into the river and after jumping ir and saving him coolly demanded a medal for life-saving. The income tax in regard to dividends from stocks and interest bonds will certainly tend to discourage capital from being invested in Canada. But the people of Canada will be delighted to hear of the reduction of one of the ingredients of the insidious cocktail, angostura bitters. Now I am going to show how inconsistent the ministers are and how they blow hot and cold in the same breath. The Minister of Railways while discussing the diversion of grain to American ports instead of to Halifax and St. John said that it was a very delicate thing to discuss this question inasmuch as there had been a royal commission appointed to look into the matter. I think his point was well taken. Now, Sir, when the same argument in regard to the tariff board is brought forward by members of this House, the Minister of Railways has nothing to say and is willing to swallow his own contention and to vote against his own convictions.

Speaking of the tariff board, I believe that the Prime Minister promised to appoint a lady to act on that body. The only member of the board with whom I am acquainted is the Right Hon. George P. Graham, and I am certain he has all the qualifications entitling him to wear male attire, and do not think that either of the other two gentlemen would look well with a permanent wave and a short skirt. I would call the attention of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) to the Prime Minister's promise to the gentler sex, a promise which he has failed to fulfil.

I notice that the budget has little to say about agriculture. This is a most important subject and I want to speak for a few minutes on the sugar beet situation in Kent county.

I am surprised and I regret exceedingly that this government has attacked the sugar beet industry in Canada three times in as many years, thus vitally affecting western Ontario and particularly the county of Kent which I have the honour to represent. In 1922 the government put an excise duty of forty-nine cents per 100 pounds on beet sugar. This tax would be equivalent to a tax of ten cents a bushel on Canadian wheat. The opposition showed that this was a ridiculous tax, and it was reduced to twenty-four or twenty-five cents, and before its effects became felt, the Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, was prevailed upon to wipe it out altogether. Then in 1923, apparently still believing that a tax should be placed against the Canadian beet sugar industry, he came at them in another way by reducing the duty on raw sugar coming into Canada, which meant to the sugar beet growers a reduction of fifty cents per ton on their beet crop, or about $150,000. Let me tell this House something about the size of the beet growing industry and what it means to the farmers of this country. A few years ago, before this government tinkered with the tariff, we had under cultivation 40,000 acres from which the farmers received the sum of $4,000,000, and in the production of sugar from these beets another $2,000,000 was expended in labour, making a total of $6,000,000 distributed to farmers and workmen in Kent county. Since the alterations in the tariff, we find that last year this acreage was reduced to 30,000 acres and I am in a position to know that since last year's crop was by no means a profitable one, the acreage this year will be further reduced to about 20,000 acres, which proves my contention. The farmers of my district are being rapidly squeezed out of a branch of agriculture which at one time was profitable. And as if this were not enough discouragement to the farmer who, in spite of all these setbacks, still wishes to remain in the beet business, we now find this House asked to ratify a treaty with the West Indies which will, to adopt a favourite phrase of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) prove the death knell of the sugar beet industry through the concessions given to the raw sugar industry. It seems to me that the farmers of this country are being discriminated against. They are being compelled to enter into an unfair competition with the cheapest kind of labour in the world. The West Indian labourer buys one pair of overalls perhaps once in three years, and this constitutes all of his clothes outside of a rope thrown over his shoulders to keep them up, and the optimistic ones do not even wear the rope. This is the class of labour our farmers are being compelled to compete with while we are living beside a nation that has the highest standard of living in the world. We are obliged to conform somewhat to that standard, but if our country is allowed to be flooded with the products of cheap foreign labour, then our standard of living will suffer and there will be only one result. Our people will go to a country where their standard of living is protected.

I am reminded of a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) the other day, to the effect that a man on a farm is a greater asset to the country than the factory worker, because the farmer is producing new money. But apparently the Minister of Finance regards the West India farmer as a greater asset to Canada than our own Canadian farmer. This same Finance Minister in discussing the Australian treaty said that if there was anything in the treaty affecting any of his constituents he would not vote for it. So, under the circumstances, it is quite apparent to me that there are no sugar beets grown in his constituency. The Finance Minister in supporting this treaty has stressed the fact that the sugar companies are exporting great quantities of sugar and I would like to ask the Finance Minister to explain just how exports are affected by the duty on raw sugar.

In conclusion I wish once more to impress upon the Minister of Finance the great injustice which is being done the sugar beet producers as a result of the actions of this government. The minister holds to the opinion that sugar made from beets is a small industry compared to the making of sugar by other processes, but he has failed to grasp the possibility of making all our sugar from sugar beets. We read in the press and we hear from every platform, Conservative and Liberal, about our wonderful resources in raw materials and how they should be manufactured into the finished article in our own country, and in connection with the beet growing industry we have the greatest opportunity to put that principle into actual operation. I have shown you that the sugar beet industry is on the decline; thousands of farmers in western Ontario have discontinued this crop, which means a great loss to the country, and this loss is not entirely covered by the lack of production to the country and the actual loss of revenue to the farmer. Anyone acquainted with sugar beet raising knows that special implements are required in their cultivation, implements that cannot be used in connection with any other crop. It is quite within the mark to estimate that every farmer engaged in growing sugar beets is called on to invest probably $400 or $500 in special machinery, and when he is compelled to cease growing beets this machinery represents a total loss. Farmers at present are not making money out of beet raising; thousands have already ceased production and to my mind the West Indies treaty is all that is necessary to enable this government to finish the work of destruction.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.
