This question of secrecy is involved, again, with the implication that something evil was being hidden. There is a question of privacy and a question of secrecy in the sense of privacy in insisting, as we have insisted throughout our democratic process, on the secrecy of the ballot, on a man's right to cast his vote for the party of his choice and for that fact to be known to him and to him alone. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) has been disturbed about certain aspects of this within the union structure. What disturbs me about this whole pattern of political giving and the bill put forward by the hon. member is the question of privacy and the right of privacy in party affiliation—a right which must be guaranteed to the wage earner and to the man who is giving a dollar as well as to the man who is giving $50 or $100. In our democratic society each is entitled to the same basic right of the secrecy of the ballot. What concerns me about contracting out, and what concerns me almost as much with regard to contracting in, is the fact that a man has to stand up among his fellow workers and declare that he is for or against when contributing his particular amount of money to a cause, or refraining from doing so. If we have reached the point where in the hon. member's view we should no longer be concerned about the secrecy of the ballot; if he thinks that everybody who supports a political party must, in effect, wear a label and advertise the fact, then let us discuss that, at least it is a subject for debate. But we must not lose sight of the right of the small giver as well as of the man who contributes larger sums to the privacy of the ballot, and the right to privacy with respect to the support he may care to give regardless of the size of his contribution.

Legislation has been passed in almost every democratic country in the world on this question. Attempts have been made to place ceilings on the amount of contributions; attempts have been made to place limitations on the size of campaigns in relation to the number of voters, and so on. These measures were discussed at length in the committee on privileges and elections the year before last when the Canada Elections Act was revised and I question the statement made by the hon. member earlier in his remarks that the house has never expressed an opinion on this particular matter. Perhaps when the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) who was the distinguished chairman of that committee, rises later in the debate he might recall what decision was reached concerning this particular bill, or whether in fact this particular bill or resolution or amendment was placed before the committee during its hearings. Unfortunately, I was unavoidably absent from one or two of the meetings and the question might have come up during that time, but I do not personally recall this particular proposal which, the hon. member says, was brought before the house on a previous occasion. My impression is, subject to correction, that this was not brought forward at that time though that was the real opportunity to have it considered and decided.

As I was saying, in every democratic country attempts have been made to curtail and control the expenditure and the extent of election campaigns. I wish the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) was in his place today because I should like to ask him: what about the salaries of the union organizers who were brought in from many sections of the province and even from outside the province to assist him in the Peterborough by-election. I should like to ask him whether the salaries paid to those men for work they were not doing in the towns and cities from which they came were declared. Were those salaries listed as part of the expenses? How would one assess factors like these in any scheme of listing election expenses? In my own particular case, for instance, in the latter days of the campaign a number of my friends and supporters who are self-employed spent, perhaps, half an hour a day in their offices and the rest of it on the hustings in support of the campaign we were putting on. Work of this kind obviously has some value attached to it. But how is it to be evaluated and how is one to place a ceiling on the amount? How is it to be calculated?

I might offer a personal observation here. If I had to choose between almost any amount of money and an individual who would be willing to go out on the stump and on the doors I would take the willing individual over many hundreds and, possibly, thousands of dollars any day of the week. My particular interest, then, has moved in the direction of finding some other way out of this dilemma. The failure of the legislative attempts to control the pattern and extent of campaign giving and expenditure prompts me to turn to other more constructive solutions. Some years ago, in 1958 to be exact, an experiment was undertaken in the United States in relation to campaign funds. As the hon. member stated, there is certainly concern about this question across the country and I think perhaps a solution might be found along the lines of broadening the base of political contributions. In 1958 the American heritage foundation launched a campaign whose slogan was "Don't Pass the Buck—Give a Buck to the Party of Your Choice". Some serious mistakes were made but notwithstanding this, important results were achieved. This campaign was carried on with the co-operation of the association of radio, television, magazine and newspaper advertisers. Had the space and time taken in the mass media been purchased in the ordinary way that campaign would have cost $10 million, but the message was carried by all the advertising media as a public service. As I indicated, several mistakes were made and I should like to discuss them briefly because I think that if we decide to undertake a similar campaign in Canada, as we should, we could profit greatly from those errors in approach.

In the initial instance a sample was taken of public opinion in the United States. It was found that some 17 million families would be willing to contribute at least $5 each, a total of $85 million, if someone were to ask and the means were to be provided for making this contribution. The business and professional people who were questioned said they would contribute. One out of three workers and farmers said they would contribute. I believe that this clearly shows a willingness on the part of people generally to contribute to the party or candidate of their choice.

Unfortunately the instructions contained in the advertisements were to the effect that this money should be given to a qualified representative of a party who called at the home of the individual. Naturally, only a small percentage of the individuals were called upon by a qualified and accredited member of a party. Estimates have been made as to the amount which was lost as a result of that particular error, one, incidentally, which I hope to correct in a bill dealing with the same subject which I trust we shall have an opportunity to discuss in greater detail later in the session.

Another difficulty encountered in the experiment is one which caused a great deal of consternation on the part of the American heritage foundation. They could not reach agreement between the political parties as to whether the individual candidates in an area should receive the donations or whether they should go to the city, county, state or national organizations. As hon. members will appreciate this produced many difficulties.

I have approached several national organizations and asked them if they would be interested in promoting this idea so we could have an equivalent program undertaken in Canada before the next election. Of course, there is an additional difficulty in Canada. Because it is known in the United States when elections will be held it is possible to schedule the programming of this type of campaign, but our system being what it is it would be more difficult to organize the type of campaign that would be necessary. I have outlined some of the difficulties that have been or could be encountered but, as I am sure all hon. members have concluded, they are not insurmountable.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks this approach to campaign giving does not entirely solve the existing problem although it does broaden the base of party financial support without producing necessarily a political utopia. I feel it would produce many attendant advantages. For instance, it would lessen the dependence of political organizations and candidates on wealthy contributors and on special interests. It would stimulate men and women of lesser means to run for public office and encourage independent thinking on the part of our public servants. The fact that an individual lacks funds to conduct a campaign in a bid to enter public life is surely an important factor. Above all it would add new vigour to our two party system by encouraging our citizens to take a livelier interest in political activity. It seems to me that this would be the most beneficial aspect of the program. A person who has a stake, however small, in a political party is far more likely to take a sustained interest in its activities.

The continued vitality of our democratic form of government depends upon active participation by citizens in the selection and support of candidates for public office. These fairly small campaign contributions are part of the price we should be willing to pay for the privilege of living in a democracy. I should explain that I have freely drawn during the course of my remarks from an article which appeared in the New York Times magazine in June 1958 when this campaign was initiated.

With the difficulties and failings of the experiment as I have outlined them, the campaign produced approximately $15 million. This was a non-presidential election. During one Easter recess I visited New York and I had several interesting discussions with political figures in that city concerning the details of this matter. The best guess that could be made was that $15 million was collected and the money was contributed in a ratio of $9 million to the Republicans and $6 million to the Democrats. These estimates of course vary, but the American heritage foundation and other persons connected with politics estimate that had the campaign been conducted without the difficulties I cited the resultant contribution would have been $35 million or $40 million.

I return now to my original proposition. Difficulties unquestionably exist but I feel the solution lies not exclusively along the lines the hon. member suggested. We should move into a constructive role, broaden the base of political participation and support and thus produce, I am certain, a healthier democracy.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire what the business will be on Monday and the order of that business if the house leader can give it to us. I also wonder whether he could outline the business for the whole week if that is possible. When that is done I find there is a much better opportunity of making progress with the business of the house. I am sure the house leader will be pleased with what has been accomplished by parliament during the course of this week.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have made good progress this week. The outline of business for Monday is as follows. The first item to be taken will be No. 6 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister respecting the observance of the centennial of confederation in Canada. The second will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Public Works with respect to amendments to the National Housing Act, No. 8 on today's order paper. The third will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance relating to school lands and school land funds in the prairie provinces, No. 9 on today's order paper. The fourth item will be second reading of the bill relating to the Pine Point railway. If those items are completed we will then resume our study of the Civil Service Act, Bill No. C-71, No. 1 on today's order paper.

I have given the order of business for Monday. Depending on the progress made, the business for Tuesday will probably follow in the same order, if the resolutions I mentioned carry. The only other item that might be brought forward on Tuesday would be a resolution concerning amateur sport but I shall leave that open until I see how far we progress on Monday. If we complete the items I have mentioned including finalizing our study of the Civil Service Act, it might well consume two full days.

Again leaving it open for review on Tuesday night, if we have some legislation which could be proceeded with we might continue with it on Wednesday which is a short day. This decision might be made. Otherwise, we would go on with the estimates. With regard to the estimates the hope is that next week we could complete the departments of labour, transport, health and welfare and, if things go well—

Mr. Chevrier: The house leader is doing very well now.

Mr. Churchill: Shall I stop at that point?

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

SUPERINTENDENT'S POSITION, FORT LENNOX, QUE.

Question No. 291—Mr. Dupuis:

1. Is the position of superintendent at the historic site of Fort Lennox, Ile-aux-Noix, Quebec, still vacant?
2. If so, has a competition been held to fill such position?
3. If not, who holds the said position, when was such person appointed, and what salary is he being paid?
4. In the absence of a superintendent, who is in authority on the island; how old is such person, what is his salary, and what are his qualifications?
5. How, by whom, and when was such person so appointed?

Answer by: Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. Yes.

2. The competition was held by the civil service commission during the spring but none of the 21 applicants was considered qualified for the position. A second competition is now in process, but a decision has not been reached.

3. N.A.

4. Mr. Vildac Arteau, as caretaker of the Fort Lennox national historic park, is in authority on the island. He is 55 years old, his wages are $1.50 per hour for a 44 hour week. He is an experienced works foreman and is considered to be carrying out his duties very capably.

5. Mr. Arteau was hired by the department as of November 10, 1960, as a result of the retirement of Mr. Romeo Soutiere, the former custodian of Fort Lennox.

SMALL BOATS—PROPOSALS TO CONFERENCE

Question No. 295—Mr. Benidickson:

1. What proposals, suggestions, etc., on behalf of the federal government were advanced to a recent conference with the provincial authorities and others, to consider new regulations and/or laws relating to small boat operations, and the licensing of small boats, or the licensing of operators thereof?
2. Did representatives of the federal government for such conference prepare and distribute documents and memoranda on the subjects for distribution to those representing non-federal government authorities?
3. If the answer to paragraph (2) is in the affirmative, what is a short title or description of each of such documents, memoranda, etc.?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1. No concrete proposals were advanced by the federal government representatives on this occasion but many problems and possibilities regarding small boat regulation and safety were considered by the conference, including the idea of licensing of small boat operators; the desirability of increasing the scope of licensing of small boats, and restrictions on the operation of small boats in local waters, at the request of local authorities. No attempts were made to achieve a solution at this time since it was felt that this first meeting should be of a purely exploratory nature.

2 and 3. Representatives of the federal government distributed the following material on the subject to those representing non-federal government authorities:

(a) Letter to all provinces, dated June 15, 1961, confirming meeting to be held September 6, 1961, and informing provinces they would receive a further letter outlining problems to be discussed and some proposed solutions.

(b) Letter to all provinces, dated July 31, 1961, and enclosing a draft agenda and brief outline in regard to: (I) licensing of small boats, (II) licensing of operators, (III) restriction of designated areas, (IV) drowning statistics.

(c) A copy of small vessel regulations with amendments.

(d) A copy of the booklet "Safety Afloat" for 1961.

Supply—Items Passed

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Royal Canadian Air Force—

239. Operation and maintenance, $536,666,000.

240. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment, $235,887,000.

Defence research and development—

Defence research board—

241. Operation and maintenance, $24,993,564.

242. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $5,810,813.

243. Development, $14,200,000.

Mutual aid—

244. Contributions to infrastructure and military costs of The North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the transfer of defence equipment and supplies and the provision of services and facilities for defence purposes in accordance with section 3 of The Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, not exceeding a total of $40,798,000 including the present value of defence equipment or supplies or the cost of services made available by the Canadian forces estimated in the amount of $24,848,000 and provided by appropriations for those forces in the current and former years in respect of which, notwithstanding subsection (3) of section 3 of the said act, no amount shall be charged to this appropriation or paid into a special account; provided by this vote, $15,950,000.

National defence general—

245. To authorize, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, and subject to allotment by the treasury board, total commitments of $2,674,046,619 for the purposes of the foregoing votes relating to national defence, regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,123,561,879 will come due for payment in future years), $1.

General services—

246. Grants to military associations, institutes and others as detailed in the estimates, $230,795.

247. Grants to the town of Oromocto, subject to the approval of treasury board, for municipal services including the maintenance and operation of schools and to promote the development of the town, $2,000,000.

248. Grants to provinces and municipalities for civil defence and related purposes, $4,350,000.

Pensions and other benefits—

249. Civil pensions, as detailed in the estimates, $3,406.

250. To authorize in respect of members of the Royal Canadian Air Force on leave without pay and serving as instructors with civilian training organizations operating under the British Commonwealth air training plan who were killed, payments to their dependents of amounts equal to the amounts such dependents would have received under the Pension Act, as amended, had such service as instructors been military service in the armed forces of Canada, less the value of any benefits received by such dependents under insurance contracts which were effected on the lives of such members of the Royal Canadian Air Force by or at the expense of the civilian organization, $2,780.

482. To authorize loans to be made in the current and subsequent fiscal years in respect of housing projects constructed, pursuant to an agreement with the Minister of National Defence, for occupancy by members of the Canadian forces; such loans to be at interest rates and in accordance with such terms and conditions as the governor in council prescribes, $5,000,000.

Defence research and development—

Defence research board—

541. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $1,100,000.

General services—

542. Final instalment on grant to assist in the construction of the soldiers' memorial hospital at Middleton, Nova Scotia (Revote), $33,897.

Pensions and other benefits—

543. To provide that Herbert John Weatherhead be deemed to have been designated by the governor in council pursuant to paragraph (f) of subsection (1) of section 4 of the Public Service Superannuation Act on the 1st day of October, 1960, and that he be deemed for all purposes of the said act to have been a contributor thereunder during the period October 1, 1960, to November 20, 1960, $1.

544. To authorize in respect of members of the Royal Canadian Air Force on leave without pay and serving as instructors with civilian training organizations operating under the British Commonwealth air training plan who were killed, payments to their dependents of amounts equal to the amounts such dependents would have received under the Pension Act, as amended, had such service as instructors been military service in the armed forces of Canada, less the value of any benefits received by such dependents under insurance contracts which were effected on the lives of such members of the Royal Canadian Air Force by or at the expense of the civilian organization—further amount required, $2,590.

545. To authorize the governor in council, in respect of persons that elected to come under part V of the Militia Pension Act or the Defence Services Pension Act, to prescribe the terms and conditions under which a period of service in respect of which such persons, while subject to parts I to IV of either of the said acts, made a payment to the receiver general that purported to be a deduction, shall be deemed to be pensionable service for all purposes of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act (or a former act as defined therein) from the date of such election to come under the said part V, $1.

546. To authorize the treasury board to make regulations respecting the counting as pensionable service, for the purposes of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, of any period not otherwise countable as such, during which a person, before becoming a contributor under the said act, performed on a full-time basis duties of a kind specified in the regulations to be for the benefit of the crown in right of Canada, and providing, except in the case of a person who has ceased to be a member of the regular forces (for which case the regulations may otherwise provide) that the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act shall apply as though such period were a period of service in a portion of the public service of Canada that is countable pursuant to clause (A) of subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (b) of section 5 of that act with effect from a day specified in the regulations, $1.

547. To authorize the governor in council to make regulations prescribing the terms and conditions under which a period of full-time service during time of war or otherwise in an organization or position that, in his opinion, was in support of any of the forces specified in clauses (E) and (F) of subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (b) of section 5 of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act may, for the purposes of that act, be counted by a contributor as if such service were a period of service in the forces specified in the said clauses, $1.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

APPENDIX

NEW BRUNSWICK—EXCHANGE OF CORRESPONDENCE ON TAX COLLECTION ARRANGEMENTS

THE PREMIER

Fredericton

July 19, 1961

My dear Prime Minister:—

It has now been possible for my colleagues and I to consider in detail your letter of June 16th regarding the federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements to prevail after March 31, 1962. We are most disappointed that the federal government's position is rigidly unaltered from that outlined in your proposals at the conference in February. We do recognize that federal concessions have been made on two matters, but it is our firm belief that these are minor in nature and unrelated to the tax-sharing arrangements between our governments. It was also a further disappointment to us to learn that the federal government has seen fit to completely disregard all the proposals made by the provinces, both at the conference itself, and in the ensuing discussions by the committee of officials.

At the conference in February, our main criticism of the new proposals was directed at the provisions with respect to equalization payments generally, and the specific proposal to include the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants within the framework of these provisions. With respect to the equalization provisions, the new proposals remove emphasis from fiscal need, and substitute for it the increased ability to raise personal and corporate income taxes. This has the effect of discriminating against low income provinces like New Brunswick and will result in higher levels of taxation, relative to the rest of Canada, if national average standards of services are to be maintained.

The other aspect of the equalization provisions which we believe to be unrealistic and discriminatory, i.e., the inclusion of natural resource revenues in the formula, remains unchanged despite the many arguments which have been raised against it. In February, it was suggested that this proposal would provide a better measurement of the fiscal needs of the provinces, but we cannot see how this can possibly be the case. Surely, if better means of measurement are required, then a number of other provincial revenue sources must also be included. The choice of this particular revenue source has neither been defended nor explained in this context, and your letter of June 16 merely repeats the federal sentiments expressed in February.

Generally, your proposals with respect to equalization payments will have the effect of reducing our revenues from this source by nearly two and one half million dollars. To offset this loss, it is proposed to increase the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant by three million dollars, which will provide a gain of some $600,000, or approximately one dollar per capita. This addition to revenues does not compare favourably with that of three dollars per capita for Ontario; $2.76 for Nova Scotia; $9.30 for Prince Edward Island; and $4.66 for Newfoundland. These are unalterable facts based on federal projections of revenues for the fiscal year 1962-63.

Furthermore, we strongly resent the inference drawn by the federal Minister of Finance in the House of Commons (see Hansard, July 11, 1961, p. 7928) that New Brunswick's share of the total of equalization payments available would rise substantially under the new proposals. The statement that New Brunswick's share of 6.4 per cent in 1957-58 would rise to 11.9 per cent under the new agreement is not only misleading but represents a rather insidious use of statistical techniques. A more proper comparison would be the last year of the current agreement with the first year of the new agreement. Excluding the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants, New Brunswick's share of the total equalization fund falls from 9.3 per cent to 8.8 per cent, while that for Nova Scotia rises from 10.8 per cent to 11.2 per cent; and that for Prince Edward Island, from 1.8 per cent to 1.9 per cent.

Finally, you have also indicated a complete rejection of our proposal that the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants should stand as a separate and distinct feature of the tax-sharing arrangements, and should not be included in the calculations of guaranteed payments to the provinces. This proposal was made in all sincerity based on the written record that these grants were of a special nature and were to be kept apart from the normal agreements. As such, my suggestion, which was reiterated by my officials at later meetings, received the support of all the provinces of Canada, with the possible exception of one.

To all of us, it is clear that the Atlantic provinces will not get the full benefit of the ten million dollar increase proposed, but will in fact receive only a portion of it. We have consistently objected to this proposed procedure and have raised strong arguments against it. These arguments have not been answered, but have been dismissed with the comment that "this seems a reasonable procedure".

Both my colleagues and myself, along with the great majority of the other provinces, sincerely regret that the special nature and high objectives underlying these adjustment grants are to be destroyed merely to disguise the fact that the equalization formula provides a level of payments inconsistent with the fiscal needs of one entire region of Canada. I must urge you, Mr. Prime Minister, to reconsider whether the interests of the people of this region and the entire country are being best served by this procedure, which involves a saving to the federal treasury of only a few million dollars.

At the February conference, the federal proposals indicated that the provinces must assume the responsibility for levying their own personal and corporation income taxes to the extent of the federal withdrawal from these fields. Although we disagreed with this proposal, we did feel that this would provide the province with certain advantages in the field of provincial fiscal policy. In fact, you yourself suggested that the provinces would then be able "to impose, vary and adjust their levies from time to time as may be necessary in the light of their responsibilities to their provincial taxpayers and without recourse to the federal government".

From the subsequent meetings of officials and from your letter of June 16, we now find that the federal government wishes to restrict the provinces with respect to this type of flexibility in taxation. In other words, the province is not to be permitted the right of adjusting the tax base, or of altering the rate of progression, but has merely the right to determine the percentage of the federal rate which it is to impose.

In addition, there are no provisions to protect the interests of the provinces from the effects of changes in the federal rates which would significantly alter provincial revenues. The federal government, as indicated in your letter, reserves the right to alter its rates, whenever necessary for fiscal or other reasons, but the provincial percentage rates, once fixed, "must be constant throughout the year". These restrictions will inevitably produce a great deal of instability and uncertainty in provincial financing, and may well result in significant reductions in revenues.

My reaction, and that of my colleagues, to these proposals is one of great disappointment and dissatisfaction. If there were available to us a suitable alternative, I am certain that our collective reaction would be a complete rejection of your proposals and a demand for more equitable treatment. However, no reasonable alternatives are available and we feel we must inevitably accept the federal position, no matter how arbitrarily it is taken. In view of this, and the many reasons expressed above, I am certain that many of the provincial premiers will join with me in urging you to call a final fiscal conference immediately, in order to permit further discussion of the proposals reiterated in your letter of June 16.

Having regard for the importance of the matter, and the fact that a precedent for such a conference exists, I am certain that you will agree that not to follow such a course would be a complete departure from the spirit of cooperation and flexibility which has been present in the past.

Yours very truly,
LOUIS J. ROBICHAUD

The Right Honourable John Diefenbaker
Prime Minister of Canada
Ottawa, Canada

Ottawa,
August 30th, 1961.

Honourable Louis J. Robichaud, M.L.A.,
Premier of New Brunswick,
Fredericton, New Brunswick.

My dear Premier,

Your letter of July 19 which requests a further dominion-provincial conference to consider the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements for the five year period commencing April 1st, 1962, has been given consideration.

It is a matter of regret that you have chosen to be so critical of the federal proposals which are in fact the most generous proposals ever offered by a government of Canada to the provinces. You have chosen to ignore the concessions and improvements contained in the proposals made at the dominion-provincial conference of February 23 and 24, and to refer only to what you describe as two minor concessions described in my letter of June 16. In this connection it is well to recall that the federal proposals advanced in my letter of June 16 followed three dominion-provincial conferences. At the conference of July 26 to 28, 1960, the provinces presented their views on the possible arrangements for the period after April 1, 1962. The federal government considered these provincial proposals carefully which in the aggregate have been estimated to amount to over $2 billion per annum—an additional sum far in excess of what the federal government could or should impose on the taxpayers.

As a result of the consideration of the provincial proposals presented at the July conference, it became clear that the tax rental system was unsound and I made certain suggestions at the conference held October 26 and 27, 1960. I suggested that since the federal government was not in a position to finance the additional expenditure which the provinces judged to be necessary for the proper discharge of their responsibilities, the provinces themselves should again assume the task of levying their own taxes. I stated that the federal government was prepared to recommend to parliament that the federal taxes on personal income, corporation income, and estates be reduced by 14-9-50, that is, by the standard rates then in effect. In addition, the government was prepared to recommend that an equalization fund of $220 million per annum be made available to the provinces to be divided as they saw fit provided that the Atlantic provinces each received at least as much under agreed division as they then received from equalization, Atlantic provinces adjustment grants, and the additional grant to Newfoundland.

Apart from the fact that some provinces were not anxious to reassume their constitutional responsibility for levying taxes for the support of their expenditures, provincial criticism of the October suggestions was largely on the grounds that the federal withdrawal should be greater than existing standard rates and that equalization should include a growth factor. The federal government responded to these provincial requests by making very generous concessions in the proposals of February 23 and 24, 1961. The federal withdrawal of 14-9-50 offered at the October conference was increased to 16-9-50 for the first years of the new period and was to rise progressively throughout the period, reaching 20-9-50 in the final year. This was an increase of more than 40 per cent in the federal withdrawal from personal income tax over the present share and over the withdrawal offered at the October conference, and it raised the provincial share of personal income tax to an amount in the final year of double the 10 per cent in effect when this government took office. Second, the federal government proposed a new system of equalization broadened to take account of the most variable of all provincial revenues, namely, revenues from natural resources. However, equalization payments under the system proposed will rise year by year with the growth in standard taxes and revenue from natural resources thus fully meeting the request of the provinces for the inclusion of a growth factor. Third, the federal government offered to recommend to parliament an increase of $10 million per annum in the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants. Fourth, the federal government offered to collect without charge the provincial personal income and corporation income taxes at whatever levels of tax the provinces chose to impose thus restoring to them without adding to their administrative costs a freedom and flexibility they had been so long denied under the tax rental system.

The February proposals constituted considerable additions to and changes of the October suggestions and represented the federal government's willingness and desire to achieve an equitable and harmonious settlement with the provinces within the framework of the constitution. Following the February conference, careful consideration was given to further representations of the provincial premiers. This was done both at the official level in two meetings of the continuing committee on fiscal and economic matters and by further review of the various aspects of the proposals by the federal government itself. As was explained in my letter of June 16, the government took account of the representations which had been made with respect to the sharing of the tax on certain public utility corporations and agreed to extend this sharing for the next five years. In addition, the government offered a substantial concession with respect to taxes on logging income by offering to provide a tax credit if the provinces would take similar action although bearing a smaller part of the cost.

You have disregarded these latter concessions and the considerable adjustments which were made to the original October suggestions for the benefit of the provinces. I am reminded of the aptness of a statement made by the then prime minister, the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, as shown on page 2016 of Hansard of March 12, 1956. In answer to a question as to whether any further concessions were made to the provinces, he replied, "Mr. Speaker, the provinces would not admit that anything that is proposed is a concession".

Your letter raises a number of points which you allege support your request for another dominion-provincial conference. These have already received careful consideration. In my letter of June 16 I dealt at length with the issues raised and the decisions which have been reached with respect to the various aspects of the proposals. The Minister of Finance, in introducing the new federal-provincial fiscal arrangements bill in the House of Commons on July 11, 1961, gave a complete statement of the federal proposals and I note from your letter that you have read this statement. Despite the fact that we have given a full explanation of the federal proposals, I shall now attempt to clarify certain points to which you allude.

You refer at a number of points in your letter to the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants and contend that these grants should be kept separate from the other fiscal arrangements. In fact, the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants will continue to be a separate grant and the increase of $10 million in the total amount will benefit your province to the extent of $3 million per annum, which is the 30 per cent share of the additional grant of $10 million. This grant will be paid separately and is in no way connected with the basic equalization formula which ensures that New Brunswick will receive an equalization payment sufficient to raise revenues from the standard taxes and 50 per cent of the natural resource revenues to the per capita national average yield. This fact is clear from the provisions of Bill C-122 which was introduced into the House of Commons on July 12, 1961. In addition to providing for a basic equalization formula based on the standard taxes plus 50 per cent of natural resource revenue and the separate Atlantic provinces adjustment grants, increased in total by $10 million, the government has embodied in the bill two guarantee provisions which will lead in certain cases to the payment of even higher amounts of equalization. Under these provisions, no province will receive less than it received in the preceding year and no province which is below the national average in the yield of standard taxes and 50 per cent of natural resources revenue will receive less than enough to bring its total return to the amount it would have received under the preceding arrangements. It is in these guarantee provisions only that it was thought reasonable to take account of the increase in the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants in the same way as we would take account of all other payments under the previous arrangements. These guarantees ensured that no province below the national average could be worse off under the new arrangements than under the old arrangements. I should point out to you that this is on the basis of a personal income tax rate of 16 per cent Provision is made for the rate to rise to 20 per cent. If the 20 per cent rate were used instead of the 16 per cent rate, you would find that the over-all gain to New Brunswick would be in excess of $3 million per annum.

You have alleged that the new proposals remove emphasis from fiscal need and substitute for it increased ability to raise personal and corporate income taxes. Nothing could be farther removed from the facts. By instituting the system of Atlantic provinces adjustment grants and by increasing them for the coming period by a further $10 million per annum, by continuing the special payment of $8 million per annum to the province of Newfoundland, and by providing a new equalization formula based on the national average and including 50 per cent of the most variable of all provincial revenues, namely, natural resources, this government has ensured that a large percentage of fiscal aid payments will go to the less well to do provinces. This fact is well illustrated by the comparisons made by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on July 11, 1961, and to which you refer on page 2 of your letter. While the proposals have increased the emphasis on fiscal need, they also permit the provinces to cultivate their tax fields in the way each province deems fit. There is nothing inconsistent in these objectives. I must reaffirm this government's attention to the fiscal problems of the less well to do regions of Canada and repeat that its performance in this regard goes far beyond anything that has ever been done in the past.

I find it difficult to understand your opposition to the inclusion of 50 per cent of natural resources revenue in the equalization formula. As already stated, the natural resource factor was included because variations from province to province in per capita natural resource revenue are far more extreme than variations in any other provincial revenues. Indeed, the inclusion of the natural resource factor directly benefits the province of New Brunswick where the per capita revenue from natural resources is below the national average.

You refer also to the conditions under which the federal government will collect provincial taxes free of charge and cite these as evidence of a lack of flexibility in the federal proposals. The federal government's answer is that it is endeavouring to give the provinces all the freedom that is possible, subject only to the limitations of administrative feasilibity and our concern for the convenience of taxpayers.

It is the earnest desire of the federal government to achieve harmonious and equitable fiscal arrangements with the provinces. In a co-operative spirit we have sought a more equal and equitable partnership with the provinces. I hope that upon reconsideration the financial benefits of the new arrangements and the greater freedom and flexilibity which they afford to your province will commend themselves to you.

Yours sincerely,

John G. Diefenbaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, September 18, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO PRIME MINISTER ON BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to which I think no one will object. It is in order to wish the Prime Minister, on the anniversary of the day on which it all began, many happy returns. When I use the word "returns" I do so in the birthday and not the political sense. There are many things the Prime Minister says and does to which we on this side of the chamber object or have our reservations. However, we have no reservations in wishing him many years of health, happiness and continued service to Canada.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group I wish to join with the leader of the official opposition in wishing the Prime Minister many happy returns of this day. Mr. Speaker, we most sincerely wish the Prime Minister an early, happy and lengthy rest from his political responsibilities and labours.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his very kind words, which are much appreciated. I also thank the hon. member for Kootenay West, and would point out to him that prognostications and prophecies such as he has just indulged in have often been made during my life, but at 66 I am looking forward to continued service in the years to come.

SPORTS

ESTABLISHMENT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL ON PHYSICAL FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the encouragement of physical fitness through amateur sport in Canada; to provide for the making of grants to agencies, organizations or institutions; to provide for entering into an agreement with any province for the payment by Canada to the province of certain contributions in respect of the costs of programs relating to physical fitness and amateur sport; to provide for the establishment of a council to be called the national advisory council on physical fitness and amateur sport; to provide for the payment of the chairman's remuneration and of the travelling and other expenses of the members of the council; and to provide further that the Minister of Finance shall pay out of the consolidated revenue fund each fiscal year such amounts not exceeding in the aggregate five million dollars as may be required for the purposes set forth in the measure.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

POST OFFICE SITE, ST. FERDINAND D'HALIFAX, QUE.

Motion No. 160—Mr. Roberge:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, petitions, and all other documents, since January 1, 1959, concerning the acquisition by the government of Canada of sites for the erection of a public building, namely a post office, in St. Ferdinand d'Halifax, county of Megantic, province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN FISHERIES MINISTER AND NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERMEN'S FEDERATION

Motion No. 161—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of the communication addressed to the Minister of Fisheries by the general secretary treasurer of the Newfoundland federation of fishermen on August 24, 1961, together with the reply thereto of the minister.

Motion agreed to.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of a statement attributed to the premier of British Columbia yesterday, to the effect that he is convinced the federal government will give in to British Columbia and permit the export of power from the Columbia river scheme. My question is, is there any ground for the conviction of the premier of British Columbia in this regard?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the stand taken by this government has been a consistent one, and the use of the words "give in" are scarcely in keeping with the relationship which one would expect to exist between the federal government and the provinces. In so far as the Columbia river scheme is concerned, the policy of the government has been announced on a number of occasions, and there has been no change.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Would he care to comment on Mr. Bennett's further remarks in this widely read speech, to the effect that the Columbia river agreement, while it is not the best, can be made to work?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have no comment to make on observations made by the premier of British Columbia.

UNITED NATIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF DEATH OF SECRETARY GENERAL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement with regard to the tidings that have just been given to me to the effect that the secretary general of the United Nations, Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, is dead.

This is a tragic day in the history of the efforts that are being made for the maintenance of world peace. Mr. Hammarskjold gave of his selfless best to the preservation of peace through the instrumentality of the United Nations. Throughout the ages men, and women too, have given their lives on behalf of the highest things of life. Mr. Hammarskjold's death will take its place among the deaths of others throughout history who gave their all in order to achieve an ideal for which men have searched ever since the earliest days of history. I am sure I express the thoughts of all hon. members when I say that our hearts go out to those of his family who survive him, coupled with the hope that his death at this time of momentous importance in the history of the United Nations will not constitute an irreparable loss to the cause of freedom.

I should mention, too, that I am informed that a young woman employed by the United Nations, a young Canadian woman from the city of Montreal, was aboard the same aircraft. I shall refrain from mentioning her name because I am not certain that her next of kin have been advised. To her family must go, too, the sympathy of the Canadian people in her tragic death in the service of all that is right and good.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): These are heavy and sad tidings which the Prime Minister has announced to us. I should like to join with him in extending our sympathy to the families of Mr. Hammarskjold and of our Canadian colleague who worked in the Secretary General's office —the young lady from Montreal.

Dag Hammarskjold died tragically and prematurely but, as I believe he would have wished, in the service of peace and the United Nations. I had the privilege of knowing him well for many years and the equal privilege of working with him closely at the United Nations during some difficult years in the development of the organization, so I think I am in a good position to appreciate the high character of the man and the great qualities of the statesman. He was indefatigable; he was wise; and he was entirely selfless in his devotion to his work. He was as sure and as resolute in carrying out instructions from the United Nations for international action in the cause of peace as he was skilful and objective in seeking to establish a basis for that action in the charter. As well as being an extremely dedicated servant of peace and the international community he was a most brilliant and cultivated gentleman and a good and loyal friend.

The world can ill afford to lose such a great man, especially at this time. His life was a triumph of service and achievement, and his passing at the very height of his powers is a tragic loss. His death should inspire all of us to do what we can to secure the triumph of the cause for which he died, peace and security in the world through the United Nations.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group I wish to say that our reaction to this shocking and tragic news is one of sadness and of having suffered a great loss. Regardless of party, throughout the years all have recognized Mr. Hammarskjold's services to mankind through his office in the United Nations. We pay tribute to those services. His death is mankind's loss. We extend our sympathy to his loved ones, and also to the loved ones of the young lady mentioned by the Prime Minister.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN AND DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask whether the vacancies on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways which occurred almost a year ago, on September 30, 1960, are going to be filled in the near future and when the new appointments which were to be made as soon as the legislation was passed which was some months ago may be expected.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, the Minister of Transport announced that the appointments would be made known "very soon" when his estimates are before the house.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I trust he does not think it is Machiavellian. In view of a report in the Toronto Telegram, on Saturday, September 16, to the effect that the government has already decided that Mr. Gordon will be removed as chairman of the C.N.R. board of directors and also that he may not be reappointed as president, and in view of the public interest in this very important question, has the Prime Minister any information he can give the house?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Laurier rather forestalled the question of the hon. gentleman, and the same answer applies.

TELEVISION

COVERAGE OF OPENING OF QUEBEC BUILDING IN PARIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, and in his absence to his parliamentary secretary. As the Quebec government, on October 5 in Paris, France, will open a building to promote the natural resources and products of Quebec and other parts of Canada as well, can the minister inform the house what provision the government has made to give television coverage to this historic Canadian event?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into the matter and report to the house.

TRANSPORT

PINE POINT RAILWAY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that today we will be discussing second reading of the Pine Point railway bill, and I am sure it is the hope of the house to get on with it as quickly as possible, will the Minister of Transport table the agreement which was finalized, and I take it signed, by the four parties, so that we may have a proper appreciation of the bill?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the bill contains the condition that an agreement must be signed containing various undertakings on the part of the C.N.R., the company, other interested companies and the government. This draft agreement has been approved in principle by all parties. All have agreed to this draft, which will be made available before the bill is sent to the committee. I think that is the proper place to study the agreement, which will be signed as soon as the bill is passed by both houses of parliament.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it the agreement has not yet been executed by the four parties?

Mr. Balcer: No, Mr. Speaker, but the four parties have indicated their readiness to sign as soon as the legislation is passed.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister make at least one copy of this document available to the opposition for study so that we may debate the bill more intelligently and perhaps make greater progress?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, the bill contains certain conditions. This draft will be available to the committee, where it can be studied in detail. I believe that is the proper place to discuss the matter, when experts and representatives of the various parties are available to answer questions. I do not see any advantage in bringing forward this unsigned draft at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, we are going to be asked to give approval in principle to a bill which is based entirely upon an agreement, and the minister has told us that that agreement, which I assume is not a secret document, has been agreed to by all the parties. Surely it is only reasonable that it should be made available in advance of the debate so that we will not be debating blindly. I can assure the hon. gentleman that we are anxious, as I think we have shown, to get on with the business of the house, and we are merely seeking to expedite the business in this way.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I think this proves that generosity does not always pay. This is the first time any agreement of this kind has been supplied to a committee for study. These agreements have always been kept confidential and have never been produced at this time. We are going to table this agreement for the committee so that it will have a document it never had in the past. Therefore I doubt very much that there is any question of privilege for my hon. friend.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

STONEY CREEK, ONT.—PRESERVATION OF BATTLEFIELD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the minister's assurance last May 31 of the federal government's interest in preserving the Stoney Creek battlesite from despoliation by the erection of a housing subdivision, can the minister now inform the house whether any specific proposals have been made to the historic sites division of his department by the local committee formed to discuss the matter? What action has been taken by his department in response to those proposals and to proposals of hon. members to protect the site from this encroachment?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to assure the hon. member that during the long hot days of the summer we were busy trying to devise some formula which would preserve this important historic site from encroachment. In this connection I wish to thank my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and also the hon. member for Wentworth for their valuable assistance in these matters.

As a result of the negotiations, the government of Canada has offered to make a contribution of $25,000, which is provided for in the current year's appropriations of my department, to be used in the acquisition of adjacent lands, which include a portion of the historic battlefield which was in danger of being subdivided for residential purposes.

We have had fruitful discussions with the municipalities of Stoney Creek and Hamilton and also with the very active local committee, and with the government of Ontario. I have just recently received the assurance of the latter government that steps are being taken by the Niagara parks commission to acquire the entire battlefield area including the present park, which has been maintained by the Wentworth women's historical society for many years, which will also include the historic Gage house and the impressive monument, as well as the adjacent land in question.

I think very shortly, Mr. Speaker, we shall be able to announce that a very happy conclusion has been arrived at for the preservation of this historic site.

[Mr. Balcer.]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN MARCONI COMPANY—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING NON-FRATERNIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, may I reply to a question of the hon. member for Skeena of September 13, when he requested that I table correspondence with the Canadian Marconi Company which was under current discussion at the time of his earlier inquiry of June 26.

I am happy to table a letter from Mr. S. M. Finlayson, president of the Canadian Marconi Company, dated June 7, and my reply to him of June 21. In my reply you will note, Mr. Speaker, that I suggested that the Marconi company review its conditions of employment with regard to relations between its employees and Eskimo women. I assured Mr. Finlayson that my department stands ready to serve him if our advice and experience on inter-ethnic relations can be of assistance.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the correspondence referred to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): As a result of the announcement by the minister, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour—and I can appreciate that without notice it will perhaps take some time to get this information—whether the request by Mr. Whitfield for permission to prosecute under the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act has been granted?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I shall have to take the question as notice and report back.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—PROTEST AGAINST ALLEGED SUPPRESSION OF RELIGIOUS RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister inform the house whether the government has sent or will send a protest to the Cuban government against the suppression of religious rights and freedom, indicated by the dismissal of a number of the clergy?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, according to press reports it would appear that five Canadians were among a number of Roman Catholic priests expelled from Cuba yesterday. There are at this time 25 Canadian priests and 21

Canadian nuns in Cuba. Although the reports are disturbing, we hope that arbitrary action of the kind suggested is not being taken against them.

As to the operative part of the hon. member's question, I might say that the Canadian embassy is investigating the accuracy of these news reports to which I have made reference and which have not yet been confirmed. If they are confirmed, then such action will be taken as is deemed proper and appropriate under the circumstances.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

PROVISION FOR NATIONAL CORPORATION, NATIONAL CONFERENCE, ETC.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the observance of the centennial of confederation in Canada and in relation thereto,—

1. To provide for the constitution of a corporation called the national centennial administration;
2. To provide for the establishment of a national conference on Canada's centennial;
3. To provide for the objects, purposes and powers of the administration and of the conference; and
4. To enact such financial provisions as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Chown in the chair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I think it is only proper that I should make a rather complete statement respecting this matter at this time. The resolution is a prelude to a bill to establish the machinery for undertaking the dominion government's part in the observance of Canada's centennial. Although the centennial itself is nearly six years away, much preliminary work has already been done.

I think it will be agreed that the centennial is more than a holiday or an occasion for festive celebrations. I was reading yesterday some of the debates at the time of confederation and immediately thereafter. In reference to the celebrations, Sir John Macdonald said that a great opportunity was lost in 1867 when the dominion was formed out of the several provinces. This remarkable event in the history of the British empire passed almost without notice.

All during the years there have been references made to the fact that, for some reason or other, there were no celebrations other than desultory ones restricted to a few areas within the confederating provinces of that day. On this occasion, however, we will be celebrating the hundredth anniversary of our country. It should be a time of national stocktaking and of rededication to the future. It will represent a dramatic year in Canadian history and an opportunity for Canadians to develop a fuller understanding of what it means and can mean to be a Canadian. One of the aims of the centennial observance should be to make Canadians aware of their unique heritage and their birth right, and of the contributions to our development that have been made by the peoples of the founding races as well as the many other nationalities who have come to our country.

I think it is not generally known that Canada played a very large part in the history of religious freedom. Indeed, the United Kingdom parliament in 1775 granted religious freedom to what is now Canada long in advance of it being granted in the United Kingdom. Further in that connection, I might mention that it was in Canada, some 25 years in advance of the same rights being attained in the United Kingdom, that those of the Jewish race received equality and the privilege of electing members of that faith to the House of Commons.

It is of interest to think of the beginnings of confederation, the arguments that were advanced by Sir John Macdonald and those associated with him, and the stand taken by those opposed to confederation. Following this there were meetings in Quebec and in Charlottetown. I was in the archives the other day and I found there a most interesting document. This is a report of the resolutions adopted at the conference of delegates from the provinces of Canada. I have a photographic summary of it, and it sets forth the basis of the proposed confederation of the provinces and colonies at a conference held in the city of Quebec in October, 1864. It sets out in detail the changes that were made. This is Macdonald's copy and it is covered with doodling, apparently drawings by Sir John of the various representatives at that conference, indicating a higher degree of art than has been displayed by any of his successors. I cannot place it on Hansard but I can say this, that there were few persons who were not honoured by having their features drawn.

The document sets out the views of that meeting and the various changes which were made, and which brought about a federation that few believed would have been possible. As may be seen through a reading of the document and also through a reading of the debates between 1860 and 1867, as was stated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier at the time of Sir John A. Macdonald's death, the vision of Sir John A. Macdonald and his associates was underlined and emphasized. Indeed, it was the work of Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier that made possible the transformation of colonial North America into the self governing country into which it has grown. Had it not been for their work there would never have been possible the development of the commonwealth concept of today.

There were few in the United Kingdom who believed that it would be possible to bring about confederation. It was Lafontaine who would not accept the views of Lord John Russell and other imperial leaders that self government being granted to the colonies would mean the breaking up of the ties with the United Kingdom. It was Lafontaine who foresaw that if representative self government was granted, the relations between the United Kingdom and the self governing possessions beyond the seas would be strengthened, not weakened. Macdonald and Cartier refused to accept the view of John Stuart Mill that parliamentary institutions could not live in a country that had two or more ethnic stocks.

Of all the countries of the commonwealth today—and this is something we sometimes forget—Canada was the first to attain responsible, representative and parliamentary government and the first, as I said a moment ago, to develop the federal system which in its essence made possible the uniting of areas representing various races, geographic separations and the like. It is a system that is being followed more and more in various parts of the developing commonwealth, and has been the contribution which has made possible the West Indies Federation and which within the next couple of years will make possible the Malayan confederation provided agreement is arrived at among Malaya, Singapore, Borneo, Sarawak and Brunei. These are some of the matters which are of the past which recall some things that are often forgotten.

It was on February 19, 1865 that the "Attorney General West," Sir John A. Macdonald, introduced the resolution which read as follows:

> That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she may be graciously pleased to cause a measure to be submitted to the imperial parliament for the purpose of uniting the colonies of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island into one government with provisions based on certain resolutions, which were adopted at a conference of delegates from the said colonies held at the city of Quebec, on the 10th October 1864.

Speaking to the measure on February 6, 1865, Sir John said this:

> When this union takes place, we will be at the outset no inconsiderable people. We find ourselves with a population approaching four millions of souls. Such a population in Europe would make a second, or at least, a third rate power. And with a rapidly increasing population—for I am satisfied that under this union our population will increase in a still greater ratio than ever before—with increased credit—with a higher position in the eyes of Europe—with the increased security we can offer to immigrants, who would naturally prefer to seek a new home in what is known to them as a great country, than in any one little colony or another—with all this I am satisfied that, great as has been our increase in the last twenty five years since the union between Upper and Lower Canada, our future progress, during the next quarter of a century, will be vastly greater. And when, by means of this rapid increase, we become a nation of eight or nine millions of inhabitants, our alliance will be worthy of being sought by the great nations of the earth.

He pictured the day ahead when there would be greatness on the part of Canada that would assure its recognition by the great countries of the world. So it was with Cartier, McGee and many others who spoke at that time. So we will celebrate an event great in its past and, I believe, greater in its future.

The systematic preparation of plans for the centennial, as I said, is already under way. It began two years ago. In February, 1960 the national committee on the centennial was inaugurated. This committee provides a means of consultation between the federal government and the governments of the provinces in matters relating to the centennial. The federal government is represented on the committee by the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Fisheries, who are joint chairmen, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Minister of Agriculture. Each of the provinces is represented by a minister and one other representative. The national committee has shown a high degree of unanimity on the significance of the centennial and on the general objectives to be sought. At its inaugural meeting the national committee set up four working committees to study the historical, cultural, ceremonial and administrative aspects of the planning.

Canadians everywhere were invited some 16 months ago to send in their suggestions as to how Canada's centennial might best be observed. This invitation provoked a healthy response. Indeed, if the projects that were suggested were adopted it would involve the expenditure of several billions of dollars. I have a list of the suggestions that were made. I think it might be well for me to table it, if the committee will agree, as they are indicative of the comprehensive nature of the representations and may be provocative of other suggestions from those who have given and are giving thought to this matter.

The suggestions range from proposals for pageants of different kinds to the building of a special centennial city; from postage stamp and coin issues to festivals of the arts; and from the eradication of particular diseases to the publication of biographies. It has also been suggested that special recognition should be given to the need for the commemoration of the 1864 conferences in Charlottetown and Quebec which were the precursors of confederation.

I think I should pause for a moment to refer to the work being done by the committee or organization set up for the building of a confederation commemorative building in the city of Charlottetown. The committee is representative of all parts of the country and already has done much toward bringing about the building in question and also festivities to celebrate the conference that took place in that city.

The planning problem is, therefore, not to devise suitable projects but to select the most suitable ones. The federal-provincial working committees have been studying and assessing the various suggestions. The next meeting will take place in Ottawa on October 11.

The federal government has given consideration to the kinds of projects it should undertake. It is particularly impressed by the fact that the centennial will provide the opportunity for the execution of projects of a lasting nature. Last month the Minister of Public Works announced the first major centennial project, when he made it known that the government had decided to authorize the national capital commission to purchase land and buildings on Sussex drive, Ottawa. The project will be a rare opportunity for the preservation of those things that go back to confederation, and will make possible what has been described as "a mile of living history".

A number of non-government organizations have also begun preparations. In May, 1960 the Canadian centenary council was formed by these organizations. Its membership now comprises 125 national organizations and its purposes are to stimulate public interest in the centennial observances and to provide information and planning service to national organizations in this regard.

I realize that I cannot refer in any particular to the bill that will be introduced following the acceptance by the committee of this resolution. However, I would point out that it will have two principal divisions. The first will be the establishment of a national centennial administration which will assume responsibility for the planning and execution of programs of the federal government relating to the centennial. The national centennial administration will consist of a commissioner, a deputy commissioner and not more than eight directors, and to avoid duplication of functions it will work wherever possible through existing departments and agencies of the federal government.

Then, too, a second major provision will be the establishment of a national conference on the centennial. This will not be an administrative body but will be a forum where the centennial can be viewed and discussed as a whole by governmental and non-governmental representatives. Centennial activities will inevitably involve many elements and have various sponsors. Therefore special efforts will be required to give these activities some measure of unity and to guard against a formless jumble of individual projects. This conference will consist of a chairman who will be either the Prime Minister or such other minister as will be designated by the governor in council, and not more than 60 members appointed by the governor in council. Of these, two members will represent each of the provinces and will be appointed on the recommendation of the government of each of the provinces. The other representatives will be chosen from every major segment of Canadian life.

I feel the committee will agree that the observance of the centennial should reflect the whole range of Canada's history and not merely confederation itself. The program should not be designed merely to commemorate a past event, but to stir the imagination of the Canadian people and give to the people as a whole a sense of national progress and national unity. The centennial should be one in which every citizen will have an opportunity to play his or her part. I think the two bodies to be established will help to ensure that the aims and purposes of this one hundredth anniversary can be fully realized thereby. Although Ottawa will be the administrative and focal point, every region of Canada should avail itself of this great occasion.

It will be the role of the federal government, not to erect a giant superstructure but merely to assist and co-ordinate. The true expression of pride and fulfilment will, I hope, come largely from local levels. In each and every community in this country there is a wealth of local flavour and difference which should be emphasized in the national interest. Wherever possible or feasible the bigger national attractions should, I feel, be made portable so that all the provinces of Canada can share in the nation's birthday. I believe that nothing would be more beneficial than for a national train to be set up and travel from one end of Canada to the other, carrying thereon the documents of Canada's historical background, the constitutional documents, as well as those charters of freedom that are ours by reason of our heritage.

As Canada is a country on the threshold of an exciting tomorrow, the centennial should serve as a launching pad for new triumphs in her second century. We should honour history. At the same time a true birthday party should span the three dimensions of time, a national salute in retrospect, an appraisal of the present and a toast to the century to come.

Our history has been inextricably woven into the struggle against geography and climate. Courage in the face of formidable odds is the theme which I believe should run through the celebration that will take place, for this country is a land in which the odysseys of the explorers, the missionaries and the leaders of the past should be made available to all Canadians. As I read yesterday something of the events at the time of confederation and prior thereto it gave me a pride that can only come from a knowledge of what has been wrought by the hand of history. During the year to come I believe we should try to renew our past so that it becomes part of the possession of all Canadians, and at the same time lay the foundations for a greater future.

We are a creditor nation with historic ties to Great Britain and France. We are a creditor nation to most of the nations of men. We should emphasize the international aspect of being Canadian. If we do that, I feel our centennial celebrations will be a magnet to draw visitors from all around the earth. This will be Canada's year to appraise, admire and adjust. It will require a great deal of work and preparation. It will require not imitation but inspiration and imagination to properly reveal the Canada that is ours. I recall the words of Daniel Burnham who, when commenting on the plans for building the capital city of Washington in the United States, said this:

> Make no little plans. They have no magic to stir men's blood, and probably themselves will not be realized. Make big plans, aim high in hope and work, remembering that a noble and logical diagram once recorded will never die but long after we are gone will be a living thing, asserting itself with ever growing insistency. Remember that our sons and grandsons are going to do things that would stagger us. Let your watchword be order and your beacon beauty.

I hope that all governments, federal, provincial and local, will be inspired by this one hundredth anniversary of our country to build for tomorrow, to fuse the functional with the beautiful, the concordant with the useful. The shaping of national destiny is no different from individual destiny, because we are the moulders of the future of our country. Fate itself plays a part, but more so does the work of those who contribute to the building of the kind of country that all of us hope will be wrought.

On January 18, 1904, Sir Wilfrid Laurier replied to the toast to Canada, and in that speech he stated what the hope of the future would be; that the twentieth century would be Canada's. That is what this festival will emphasize, a stirring occasion so that Canadians may hold the nation's sights high upon the horizon.

I trust the committee will give unanimous support to this resolution and that in a spirit of unity all of us, whether in the federal parliament, in provincial legislatures or in the municipalities will join together and bring about an imaginative program so that we may relive our past and rededicate this land to its future, the hopes for which were spoken of so eloquently by those who were present at the birth of its institutions.

Mr. Pearson: I think all members of this committee wherever they may sit would wish to give wholehearted support to this resolution. It is perhaps a happy coincidence that the Prime Minister on his sixty sixth birthday anniversary should be reminding us that our nation will soon be celebrating its one hundredth birthday anniversary. It is appropriate that we should prepare for that celebration.

A centenary is, of course, a momentous occasion in the history of a state. During the years since 1867 we have seen the completion of the geographical boundaries of confederation with the happy and fortunate union only a few years ago of Newfoundland with the rest of our homeland. We have, then, completed our boundaries nationally in that sense. But Canada is a new and developing country, and there is still much to be done. There are new horizons to be enlarged; there are frontiers to be pushed back and there are regions to be developed. In that sense we Canadians still have the excitements and the incentives which are usually attached to a new and developing society. While this is true, the fact that we shall soon be celebrating our hundredth birthday makes us one of the older states in the world.

As the Prime Minister has said, this celebration should encompass the whole range of Canada's history, not merely the achievement of confederation itself. The right hon. gentleman indicated how this could be done. It should certainly be celebrated in a way which is worthy of the occasion, not merely by ceremonies and memorials, which may be exciting but which will be ephemeral, but also in a more permanent way.

It is interesting in this regard to examine the various proposals which have been made for this purpose, and there are a great many of them. The Prime Minister made reference to this. I have before me the first report of the Canadian centennial council. If all these suggestions—and they are very interesting ones indeed—were carried out we should need the whole centennial year in which to implement them. One of the subcommittees of the committee has suggested—and I think it is a wise suggestion and one we should be thinking about even now—that no celebration of our centenary would be complete unless by 1967 we had taken all the necessary legislative actions—and these things, I know, are not easy to do—which would complete, in the words of the recommendation, "our full autonomy as a nation".

The centenary council has also made suggestions which as I have indicated should be of value in establishing a permanent recognition of our centenary, by action which will not be temporary but which will redound over the years ahead to the benefit of all Canadians. In this regard they have put forward some very imaginative proposals. One suggestion is a program to remove from our country underdeveloped or depressed communities; also to ensure that in the future no Canadian in this country will be denied access to higher education because of a lack of funds. Perhaps along these lines we will be able to recognize in an enduring and valuable way some of the benefits we as Canadians have been fortunate enough to receive during our first hundred years. This recognition should be deepened and extended. We should take action in this centenary celebration to emphasize our national dignity and national destiny, to make life better for all of our people.

Also, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, it would be appropriate to re-examine the values of our national society, and to resolve that we will do perhaps more than we have been able to do in the past to strengthen those values, based as they are on the enduring concept of freedom, and based as they are also in a political sense on the foundation of the two cultures, two languages and two traditions of the two founding peoples. Some years before confederation, when Lord Durham came to Canada, hon. members will recall that he said he found in Canada—and I think I am quoting his words correctly—two nations warring in the bosom of a single state. In the years that have passed since that statement was made there has been a change from conflict to co-operation. While in the cultural sense, in the racial sense, in the linguistic sense and indeed in the sense of separate traditions while we have—in that sense—two nations, nevertheless we now have two nations, co-operating in the bosom of a single state.

These two races, two cultures, and two nations in that sense, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, have been enriched in the years that have followed by people of practically every strain, race and culture from all parts of the world. To use the Prime Minister's own phrase we are indeed a creditor nation in that way, as well as a creditor nation in the sense that we have a dual foundation of the two basic races.

As has been pointed out, not very much attention was given to Canada's future, her destiny and potential greatness at the time of confederation. But the men in those days built better than perhaps even they knew. People in the mother countries did not realize then that in North America a strong new state had arisen dedicated to freedom, to human welfare and to the things that make life worth living for man when he bands himself together in a political society. As we approach our centennial year I think we can be proud of our growth, our progress and our achievements, but we can be proud without being smug. We can demonstrate that pride in the way we celebrate our centenary. One means which occurs to me, and there are many, to show our pride in our nation is by making our capital worthy in every way of its position as the heart and core of that nation.

The Prime Minister has outlined some of the organizations which will be set up, and it is appropriate that they should be set up at this time to make this occasion worthy of its historic import. He indicated that there will be a combination of public and private planning in that regard and that, of course, is the way it should be done. We on this side will be glad to support the steps which the government is proposing to this end.

Our nation has a great destiny ahead of it if we wish to make it so, and if man's inhumanity to man makes it possible for any nation to have a good destiny. It is appropriate, then, that as we discuss this resolution we should remind ourselves of our past and look forward with confidence to the future of what Charles Dickens so many years ago called this happy, hopeful land.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of this group I rise to express our wholehearted and complete support for the spirit and purpose of this resolution, which reflects the wishes of the vast majority of Canadians at this time. Throughout the years there have been numerous references to the centennial celebration. I think it is correct to say that the first time it was brought to the attention of any large group was at the Ontario provincial convention of the C.C.F. in 1950. It was raised on that occasion and discussed.

Later on the then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre placed on the order paper a resolution dealing with this subject. It was first introduced, I believe, in 1954 and was reintroduced in 1955, 1956 and 1957. In that latter year there occurred the first debate on that resolution, which I shall now place on the record because it was considered very comprehensive:

> Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:
> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of the establishment of a 100th anniversary committee, with provision for federal and provincial representation, for the purpose of planning the economic and social development of this country on a vast scale, including inter alia housing and slum clearance, conservation, irrigation and power projects, improvements in transportation, highway construction, the elimination of grade crossings, the building of hospitals, assistance to municipal projects and other public works, and also for the purpose of planning ways and means to strengthen the economy of every section of this country; and that consideration should be given to the advisability of such a program being launched immediately and being pursued vigorously year by year so that on July 1, 1967, the people of Canada will be in a position to celebrate this nation's 100th birthday not only with fireworks and speeches but by the achievement of a land of health and abundance for all our people.

During the debate the hon. gentleman received support in principle from all hon. members who participated in the discussion. There was some criticism of the rather comprehensive nature of this resolution. I had the opportunity of participating in the debate. As we saw it at that time this was a resolution to focus attention upon desirable objectives to strive toward and accomplish by 1967. The hon. gentleman moved this resolution and spoke to it at some length, believing it would focus attention on this subject so that our celebration in 1967 would not only be a celebration in the ordinary sense of the word, a happy time, but in the deeper sense of having reality and meaning.

In listening to the Prime Minister I was very interested in his historical review of past developments and in certain statements he made respecting the approach and attitude of prominent people in Canadian history. I am one who always enjoys reading history. I find that history of the past is an antidote to the irritations of the present. I was interested also in his explanation of the proposed procedures which provide for federal and provincial co-operation and also co-operation with local communities. I am one who believes, as I am sure all members of this group firmly believe, that for an event of this type to be a success you must have co-operation among all communities in Canada; that success is dependent upon co-operation from the local level up no matter how small the community.

I cannot help but recall that I spent the fiftieth anniversary of confederation in a military hospital. You know, Mr. Chairman, some people have suggested that I might celebrate the one hundredth anniversary as a member of the government, but I might explain they have been very few in number to date. However, with a common pride in our history, in our achievements, in our hopes and in our aspirations, we can all look forward to this centennial as an opportunity to recognize the work of the pioneers and people of the past, to express our thanks for what they have done to provide the circumstances under which we live.

I often think there is insufficient understanding of the labours of people of the past in all groups of society who have given us so many of the things we enjoy today, the freedoms, the privileges and the material things of life. We can give thanks and celebrate in the knowledge that all Canadians are proud of the fact that by that time we shall have evolved national and provincial policies that will make certain that we are going to conserve and develop our natural resources, having in mind the welfare of the generations to come; because regardless of legislation, parties and theories, unless we conserve our natural resources we shall have nothing to build on in the future and no wealth to distribute.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, I trust that by 1967 we shall be able to celebrate the fact that every child in Canada will have the opportunity to obtain all the education he is capable of taking advantage of; that every person in Canada willing and able to work will have employment; that all Canadians will be provided with satisfactory health services; that all the disabled and those ill in Canada, suffering from disabilities of various kinds, from whatever source they may arise, will be provided with a measure of comfort and security at the expense of us all, and that our senior citizens will continue to live in security with a measure of comfort. We believe these are objectives that we should work toward so that we can celebrate in 1967 with the knowledge that these are accomplishments.

The members of this group are glad to co-operate with all who are working to that end. We believe that with purpose, with determination, with energy and imagination we can succeed in reaching those objectives by 1967. To those objectives we must all march if we are going to succeed, and those objectives must be reached, in our opinion, if we are to celebrate our one hundredth anniversary in every sense of the word as an event that Canadians are proud of.

(Translation):

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of my French speaking fellow citizens, I should like to express, in my mother tongue, what we feel at the announcement of the celebrations which will, in a few years from now, mark the centenary of the Canadian constitution.

These celebrations will take on a distinctive character for all Canadians, more particularly because we realize that it is thanks to the pact of confederation that we developed as a nation and that we succeeded in burying the quarrels which, unfortunately, in 1867 threatened to plunge this nation into civil war.

When we consider the great country Canada is today, we cannot but think of the tremendous sacrifices made by our forefathers to found this country which now holds such an important place in the world.

When we consider the tremendous efforts which those pioneers from European countries had to make and the severity of the weather they had to endure in clearing this foreign land to set up their homes, we are filled with wonder and admiration. Indeed, those men deserve the tribute we want to pay them in the coming celebrations. And we want to pay a particular tribute to those men of genius who established this confederation pact which is the very basis, the strength of the nation.

We salute those men of character, Lafontaine and Baldwin, who were able to establish the rule of justice in the houses of parliament.

We salute the genius of Macdonald and Cartier to whom we owe this confederation which is the cornerstone of the greatness of Canada.

It is actually due to confederation that peace has existed in this country since 1867. It is because of this pact that the respective rights and privileges of both great races which form our nation have been respected.

It is also through the confederative pact that the bi-ethnic and bi-cultural character of the nation has been preserved.

Finally, thanks to this agreement this country has achieved a national unity which is strengthening and enables us to live today not in a divided Canada but in a united Canada, a large and a strong Canada, where the future can be faced with confidence.

Since 1867, long strides have been made in every field of endeavour.

Canadian industry has reached gigantic proportions, trade is in the process of considerably expanding and increasing from day to day, and in the intellectual field we now have distinctive Canadian culture and art and a definite Canadian way of thinking. So it can be stated that since confederation gigantic steps have been accomplished towards the achievement and development of national life and thought. This is only a beginning.

Today the whole world's attention is focused on our country; other nations realize that we have in Canada, a tremendous potential and that there is a future for all who wish to settle here and associate themselves with those who have done so much already so that Canada could become what it is today. Canadians have achieved all these things because the highest principles of human ideals were guiding them. Canadians believe in freedom and every time the freedom of humankind was threatened, Canadians were among the first who wanted to protect that ideal against the barbarian onslaught threatening civilization.

During those two great wars, our soldiers fought with unrivalled courage. They fought on the battlefields of Europe and other continents not only to protect themselves but also in order that the ideals of kindness and justice they believed in could survive in this world. Those soldiers were the defenders of right, justice and truth.

We bow to those who have laid down their lives for those principles, to those who suffered on the battlefields and who, still bear today the scars of their glorious wounds. Moreover, we bow to the courage of all these men who, without exception, were the ambassadors of Canadian feeling, by defending in foreign lands the most beautiful and greatest thing of all: human freedom.

Our country, Mr. Chairman, is in full bloom, and the eyes of all men are turned in this direction. One only has to go abroad to realize that other countries sometimes view with envy what is being done in Canada. However, it is very easy to notice admiration everywhere for our accomplishments.

I believe it is our duty to thank Providence for having given so much to us Canadians. In fact, poverty is the lot of many countries which have been torn by terrible strife and which, even today, are threatened by revolutions.

I believe that it is necessary to repeat, whenever possible, Mr. Chairman, that there exists, here, in Canada, beauty, greatness, order, wealth, and belief in those principles of life: freedom and respect for human rights.

I believe that it is absolutely essential to prepare with care the celebration of our centennial, to prepare it in such a way that it will attract millions of tourists who will be able to see for themselves the excellence of our democratic way of life. Those tourists may return home with a strong desire to imitate what is being done in our country, and they may even know the happiness which is ours.

If there is one reproach that could be made to the Canadian people, it is that they do not fully realize how lucky they are, and that they fail to appreciate their blessings in their own country. We too often hear politicians and others criticize everything that happens here, exaggerate certain social or economic problems that are serious, I agree, but that are, after all, not as serious as some events happening in other countries where the danger of revolution and communism is always present. Instead of readily criticizing what is happening in our country, instead of taking pleasure in blaming our leaders constantly, regardless of their political affiliation and of the field of their activities, it seems to me it would be better for every Canadian citizen to help with his advice those who are called upon to administer the country. In my opinion, they will always be glad to accept advice from right-minded people who have public interest at heart.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that it is essential to act in that way because prophets of doom and gloom will be pleased to sow doubt and anxiety in the minds of men, thus making it possible for communism, that horrible ideology which dominates so many countries, to get a foothold in Canada.

I hope that all French Canadian organizations, without exception, will join in the preparations for the centennial. Whether on the cultural, intellectual and social levels or in the industrial field, all Canadians who love their country must take an interest in this historic event.

Our country is in full progress and development. By taking an active part in the preparations for the centennial celebrations, the citizens will, in the years to come, work efficiently for Canada. I know that all French Canadians love Canada like I do. Perhaps some people love our country as much as I do, but certainly no one loves it more. I invite them to join with us who are entrusted with public affairs and who are anxious to make of the centennial celebrations of our confederation, the greatest event in our history.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I wish to join with the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) and say that we agree that the statesmen of 1867 and previous years had to make great sacrifices in order to implement confederation. All the politicians put aside party feelings to bring forth the fullest national unity possible and thus bring into being an institution that neither the years nor difficulties could overcome.

Since then, as the Associate Minister of National Defence has said, we have been enjoying domestic peace, and we wonder whether such a thing would have been possible without confederation, because at that moment there was no friendship to spare between the Quebec Catholic group and the Ontario Anglo-Protestant group, and it was feared that one or the other would try to gain domination of the country by force.

But when the fathers of confederation paved the way to a federation of the existing provinces and of other provinces which could be formed later on, they found the right formula for two different races to live together and to co-operate for the good of Canada.

The rights and privileges of both races have been respected and I can say that almost every leader of the country has since recognized the necessity of maintaining that duality which is beneficial and profitable to the country. I hope that it will be maintained.

I readily recognize that here and there people have been found who did not understand the objectives of the fathers of confederation; that was to be expected because there will always be groups not sufficiently mature to realize what a great achievement it was and how essential has been the participation of two races and two ethnic groups.

It is agreed that since confederation, Canada has made gigantic progress. The small colony of that time has grown into an independent country and a member of the British commonwealth, as well as a nation in control of its own destiny. Canada has made tremendous progress in the fields of trade and industry and is well known the world over for her contribution to the welfare of the peoples of the world. In the field of diplomacy, we have had Canadians who have acquired wide recognition and who will continue to stand out.

In the fields of arts and culture, there has been remarkable improvement. True, we have not yet reached the quality of the masterpieces found in European countries because we lack the atmosphere conducive to the production of truly Canadian works. As far as literature is concerned, we have finally gone ahead in recent years and developed a truly Canadian literature. And with the help of the Canada Council and the continuing assistance of the various governments in office, we shall soon see the arts and literature flourish in Canada, as they should.

As the Associate Minister of National Defence said, Canada, twice at least, came to the rescue of European nations that needed support to preserve their freedoms and welfare. It did so with pleasure, and the sacrifices made have been recognized.

However, I would suggest to the Prime Minister that the time has come perhaps, since we are to celebrate the centenary of confederation, when Canada might give its armies, spread out across the world, a really distinctive, personal and specific flag, showing no sign whatever of interdependence, in order to prove that Canada has reached its maturity. I think such a project would be accepted by the great majority of the Canadian people, and even if some did object to that, they would be in a small minority that would eventually bow before the majority, as it has always happened since 1867.

Mr. Deschatelets: Very well.

Mr. Caron: I should now like to close my remarks with these few words taken from a Canadian song:

Foreigners see with an envious eye the majestic flow of the St. Lawrence.

Well, foreigners not only see the St. Lawrence with an envious eye, they also see our way of life, our working methods and our democratic spirit. In fact I do not think there is a country in the world where democracy is better understood than in Canada.

I hope we shall be able to celebrate in a grand and glorious way the centenary of confederation, and that our successors will be able to say that Canada is constantly making gigantic steps forward.

(Text):

Mr. Pitman: This measure is obviously one that will receive the support of all parties in this house. It therefore needs little debate. No matter where we sit, I think we are all aware of and appreciate the sense of history of our Prime Minister. We hope this measure will receive his constant personal interest. In our attempts to crystallize our thinking about our nation in its centennial, I hope we shall make some attempt to indicate just how Canada has added to the history of the world.

I can remember one professor who often said that Canada gave a pattern by which more people have received freedom than by any other pattern that has been established in this world. He, of course, meant the pattern of the commonwealth; for Canada led all other nations in finding a method by which a colony could become a nation. It perhaps seems strange that when we heard the announcement of the death of the Secretary General of the United Nations this morning, he should have been dealing with this very problem, namely the attempt to find a method by which undeveloped people who have lived in a colonial state may find freedom within a nation state. I think it brings home to us the extent to which Canada can show the pattern by means of which this may be done. I hope this will be one of the things emphasized in our centenary year. I hope we shall not look inward as much as we shall look outward and show others what we have learned.

I think the second great contribution we have made in our history as a nation is to show the world that two different cultures or, as some would have it, two different nations can live within the bosom of a single nation, can co-operate and can find a single consciousness and a single sense of identity within a nation state. Here again, in a world of bloodshed and trouble, I think this is the means by which we can present to the people of the world another area in which Canada has made such great strides. For indeed as we look at other nations, such as South Africa and others too numerous to mention, where the whole problem of national identity is going through a valiant decision, I think Canadian experience can have some real relevance.

In the year of the centennial of confederation I hope we shall do something to dramatize and even to romanticize the great figures in our past history. Perhaps it has been the lot of the prime ministers of our nation to bring forward the contributions of certain men in our past. I am thinking, of course, of men like William Lyon Mackenzie King, who I think gave us a greater realization of the contribution of his famous forebearer, William Lyon Mackenzie. I also think of the efforts of our present Prime Minister to bring about a recognition of the great work of Sir John A. Macdonald. But there are others, such as Lafontaine, Robert Baldwin and D'Arcy McGee, who virtually gave his life for this nation, who have not been sufficiently dramatized and who are not sufficiently known by the young people of our nation. I think it is to the young people that our efforts should be directed in connection with this centennial, because as yet they have not a sufficient sense of history in spite of what has been done by various branches of government at the federal and provincial levels.

We are heartened by this advance information in connection with the celebration. Perhaps some people may think it strange that it took but three years to create this nation while it has taken seven years to prepare for the celebration of its centenary. However, we live in an age when people are interested in history, and the various facets of Canadian life must be expressed. I can assure the Prime Minister and this government that they can expect the support of all parties in preparing this opportunity to show the world the contributions which Canada has made to the history of mankind.

Miss Aitken: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a very few words on this resolution of the right hon. Prime Minister because I am in such wholehearted support of it. The Prime Minister has said that we must plan for much more than just a holiday. He has told us that our founding day as a confederation passed almost without notice, and that John A. Macdonald always regretted this. It may be that if there had been some women in the House of Commons in those days it would not have passed unnoticed, because I think we are much more conscious of anniversaries and celebrations than our male colleagues.

I believe the key word in our centennial celebration should be participation; participation by service clubs, by business organizations, by labour unions, by individuals and by women's clubs. I think one form could be the granting of scholarships, because what an honour it would be for any Canadian to win a centennial scholarship. It certainly would be a once in a lifetime event. There could also be essay contests in Canadian history and in local histories. In Saskatchewan for their jubilee they held an essay contest in local histories. I understand there are now about 3,000 local histories in the Saskatchewan archives. Labour unions might build centennial trade schools, perhaps one in each province. There could be slum clearance contributions by construction companies; literary prizes for books and poems about Canada, perhaps given by press clubs and authors' associations. There are also unlimited opportunities for business organizations.

The Prime Minister has said that the centenary committee has received many suggestions which might cost billions of dollars. Governments alone should not take on these projects or these celebration plans; every Canadian should participate in order to meet the objective voiced by the Prime Minister, which was to stir the imagination of the Canadian people toward national purpose and national unity. I know there will be much pomp and ceremony, parades and gaiety, but let us also celebrate with permanent monuments that will benefit future generations, just as we have benefited from our pioneering forefathers in the spirit and building of Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister very correctly asked for unanimous consent when he presented the motion for this resolution. As far as my limited power is concerned, I am happy to grant him such unanimous approval for the resolution. I think that is generally the wish of the committee of the whole and of the country.

The Prime Minister took advantage of the occasion, very properly again, to make some remarks as to the history of our confederation and the propriety and objectives in celebrating its one hundredth anniversary. I have very few remarks to make. I will have one or two questions later arising out of the resolution itself, but they are purely of a practical nature and arise out of the wording of the resolution itself. This occasion however also provides the opportunity for expressing ideas, and indeed ideals, concerning the celebration of our centennial of confederation. At the same time it is couched in very practical language and in its main provision sets up the corporation that will have administrative responsibility for making the practical arrangements for the occasion and co-ordinating the efforts of others throughout the whole of the country. Therefore at one and the same time we have in this resolution the opportunity to debate the very large, somewhat idealistic question, and also to discuss some of the practical plans for the occasion.

The Associate Minister of National Defence made some remarks which unfortunately I had to listen to after translation. I regret that I was not able to follow them with that precision of understanding that I believe some of them deserve, particularly the latter part of his remarks. I refer to the ideals he was very properly seeking to express, and expressing well.

I wish the associate minister were here, because the earlier part of his remarks was translated in a way that seemed to indicate that a couple of persons only were responsible for confederation. That idea was quite inconsistent with the main part of the speech and I think may probably be due to the loss of meaning in translation. I merely mention this because it is my understanding of history that confederation was brought about by a great many men of that period who had a wide vision of the future of this country. It was the collective effort of all of them that brought about this great event in our history.

I think we should be very careful not to say or do anything that would in any way detract from that concept of these men, because my whole understanding of history is that had it not been for the co-ordination of effort and the co-operation of all of them, confederation itself would not have been brought about.

I have some further remarks, Mr. Chairman, so perhaps I could call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. McIlraith: When the committee rose for the luncheon adjournment I had not completed my remarks, but since this resolution will, I hope, be unanimously approved I think perhaps it would be as well not to extend my observations unduly or expand them at any great length for fear they might detract somewhat from the unanimity which is certainly desirable.

The development of the proper type of celebration for this occasion will require the participation of great numbers of Canadians, a point which was well taken by the hon. member for York-Humber. It will require the co-ordination of the work of a great many groups and committees throughout the country. Indeed, the more one thinks about it the more one is convinced that it will require a genius to head this organization and guide it in the way it should go, because of necessity there will have to be very close co-operation among provincial groups, provincial committees, local groups and municipal committees. The different points of view which will be put forward will also require co-ordination. The wholly artistic and creative approach will need to be reconciled with a more practical viewpoint in the light of what it is possible to do in a practical way.

I must say that today I extend to the Prime Minister not only good wishes on his birthday, but the hope that he may be blessed with the great skill and wisdom necessary for the wise selection of the personnel he will be appointing in connection with this celebration. This is a task which will require the greatest skill and wisdom. The occasion must be commemorative of the past. That is, of course, elementary. But we must be careful throughout to see that it is inspirational for the future, and that the whole of the celebration throughout the land is ordered in such a way that it will serve as a source of inspiration to those who come long after. This is why it is going to require such wisdom in the appointment of persons able to reconcile the two viewpoints I have mentioned and arrange the functions in a way that is both imaginative and practical.

Some reference has been made by previous speakers to the need for making Canadians aware of Canada; I think this was one of the phrases used. I am in complete accord. As a matter of fact there has been a good deal of discussion of history during the hour or so in which this resolution has been under consideration, and it occurs to me that at this point in our national progress, after making allowance for the economic condition of Canadians as individuals compared with a hundred years ago and after making allowance for the increased travel facilities available, it is probably true to say that we individual Canadians move about our country much less than we should, and know and understand less about other Canadians than we should. I hope that as the work of preparing for this centennial celebration proceeds, a new impetus may be given to the desirability of Canadians moving about Canada a great deal more. Increased importance should be attached to Canadians studying the history and geography of Canada a great deal more so that all of us will have an appreciation of the problems and aspirations of those in other parts of Canada. All Canadians should have a better understanding of the culture, aspirations, habits of life and methods of approaching the problem of living in a civilized society of Canadians in all areas of Canada.

As Canadians we seem in general to be given to travelling to other countries when family units take trips. While that is an excellent thing in itself, I am sometimes appalled at how little Canadians in one part of the country know about the culture, problems and aspirations of those in other parts of the country. I would hope that in the intervening six years as we prepare for the centenary a great deal of added impetus will be given to the study of Canadian history by Canadians, not only in an academic sense through textbooks and cultural programs but in a very real sense through personal contact by moving about the country.

Much has been said about the ethnic groups that form this country, and I am in hearty accord with those remarks. When one analyses it, it seems to me we are really a race of minorities; of great numbers of ethnic groups each with distinctive characteristics and diversified and outstanding cultural attributes. When these centennial programs are initiated across the country, with all Canadians participating, I hope that background will be acknowledged and the programs arranged accordingly. I also hope, however, that running through them we will have the theme that we are now Canadians, and that while we are cherishing and keeping alive the various rich traditions and cultures that have contributed to this nation, we are doing so because they have contributed to our Canadianism, that we are now Canadians one and all, that it is Canada's centenary we are celebrating.

To accomplish this will require infinite tact, discretion and judgement. One adds to the other, as I view the question. In other words the richness of these cultural backgrounds enhances our Canadianism. It is only if these diverse backgrounds are mispresented at public functions that they become separate and detract from our Canadianism. I hope the kind of good judgment required to derive the maximum value from our rich assortment of backgrounds will be used, as I am sure it will be.

As our planning proceeds there will be need to focus the theme of this centennial occasion, and to keep it in focus. I have been reading with a great deal of interest the report of the first annual meeting of the Canadian centenary council in Ottawa on May 12, 1961. I do not know how to adequately describe the material contained in this publication, but perhaps I should draw attention to the reports of program research it contains. They contain an abundance of ideas, most of them excellent. What we must watch in the six years ahead in preparing for the centennial is that these excellent ideas are focused on one great theme.

I hope that in the legislation to be presented some provision will be made to bring this subject matter forward in the House of Commons each year so that hon. members may have an opportunity to express themselves on the direction of the organization, making sure it is focusing on a theme that is worthy of the occasion and is not allowed to become diffused and spread into preparations for a gigantic party celebration for the sake of having a party.

Perhaps the Prime Minister will have something to say on that point, and I hope something can be done in that respect. There are various ways by which this could be accomplished, including an annual vote by parliament to provide funds, but it is not necessary to elaborate on the means at this time.

I shall now conclude this portion of my remarks. I have one or two questions I wish to direct to the Prime Minister, but I shall reserve them until those who wish to make general remarks on the subject have had an opportunity to do so.

(Translation):

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, as a member for Manitoba and especially fo rthe city of St. Boniface, which is the cultural centre of French speaking Canada west of the Ottawa river, it is my duty to say a few words on this resolution. I commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) for having taken this step six years before the hundredth anniversary of confederation.

Since we will soon be celebrating that centennial, I feel that we should do the same thing as a person who would have lived in the same house for a long time. We should call in architects and engineers to look over the building and see whether chinks have not formed in the structure over the years.

We know that the constitution of 1867 provided for the harmonious coexistence of two great cultures on a basis of unity. I regret to say that since then, especially since 1890, more than one chink has made its appearance in the province I represent.

We will need a lot of concrete to repair the damage caused since then.

The province of Manitoba was the first one to join confederation in 1870; at that time it had a population which was mostly Catholic and French speaking and which felt that the constitution was supposed to protect minority rights for the future. Yet, a few years afterwards, all guarantees were swept aside.

In the city I represent, we have schools which we must build at our own expense and teachers whom we must also pay ourselves. Why do we do that? It is because we wish to keep our French culture. What do we learn in those schools? We follow the curriculum of the province of Manitoba to acquire also the English culture. I am proud to have had the privilege of acquiring the two greatest cultures of the world, the French and English cultures. However, it is unfortunate that we should have to bleed ourselves white, in Manitoba, to have teachers who help us preserve our culture, and that we should also have—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his remarks are not related to the resolution before the committee. I would ask him to relate his comments to the subject of the Canadian centennial before the committee. The subject he is dealing with now is not within the jurisdictional authority of the federal government. Therefore I would ask him to come back to the resolution, if he will, please.

Mr. Regnier: With great respect, Mr. Chairman, I am suggesting that some work should be done by the committee. I am implying that after living for 94 years in one house, this house needs inspection. We should get an architect and engineer to look at the state of the foundation of our building. I say there are cracks in this building. I say that in the province that I come from there is a huge crack that has been existing for more than three quarters of a century. I say that the committee should direct its attention to all the governments of the English speaking provinces and give justice and fair play to all.

We are talking now of repatriating the British North America Act from London. Most of the things that we have received in this country have come from London. We received the Quebec Act. We had a governor in 1846 who said that in Canada the French and English languages were on the same footing. Unless all the provinces, including my own, are prepared to live up to the British North America Act and to the Manitoba Act of 1870, it might be a good idea to leave the British North America Act where it is today.

I read in the press recently that the province of Manitoba is paying for three school teachers to go to Asia to teach. This is happening at the same time I have to pay so much every Sunday to try to maintain my own culture and my own schools in the city of St. Boniface. What do we teach in those schools? We teach the curriculum of Manitoba—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry I have to interrupt the hon. member again to advise him that the matter being discussed by him is a provincial issue which I cannot relate in any way to the resolution before the committee. I suggest to the hon. member that there will be other occasions and opportunities for him to discuss this matter. As I read the resolution, it does not embrace the matters the hon. member is now discussing, therefore I would ask him to relate his remarks strictly to the resolution, or he will have to resume his seat.

Mr. Regnier: With great deference, Mr. Chairman, I believe it is in order to speak about what the committee that we are about to appoint should do when we celebrate the centennial of our constitution. We should work toward the greatest aim in our nation, namely Canadian unity.

I respect my English fellow Canadians. I know that most of them are quite broad-minded and tolerant. They acknowledge the fact that this nation is composed of more than one ethnic group. I know the fault is not with the people; sometimes it is with governments. If we wish to celebrate another anniversary in 200 years from 1867 we shall have to learn how to get along. The greatest monument that could be erected in 1967 would be to have the greatest concord that is possible in this country. We should endeavour to promote such a program by having study groups, by having those who are going to take part in the celebration prepare briefs and make recommendations so that all the people of the country will see that what is best for Canada is best for every citizen of Canada, along with our neighbours.

I do not want my English speaking fellow Canadians to learn French or to adopt the French culture. All we want is that those who desire to become acquainted with the French culture be given full freedom and opportunity to do so.

Mr. Herridge: Although I have spoken previously on this resolution I should like to say a word before the Prime Minister closes the debate. I should like to make a comment and ask a question which I should like him to deal with when he replies. I am quite sure we all realize that to assure the success of our Canadian centennial celebrations we must have co-operation—that is essential—among all levels of governments and all interested groups. In my opinion, to a great extent that success will depend on the information given to those various groups and the continuous contact among various groups, from national organizations down to village societies and small community groups.

When the Prime Minister replies will he inform the committee what are the proposals for continuous information being given to interested groups, particularly the voluntary organizations, and the arrangements for continuous contact in order to focus public attention on the work of the committee and the program and continually to develop and promote interest in this proposal.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have an opportunity to say a word about this important and very happy matter which has come to us on this day which is marked by unhappiness and indeed by tragedy. Perhaps it would be inappropriate for this resolution to pass without a word from a member from the maritimes where, after all, confederation began.

Canadian Centennial

We Canadians are not an historically minded people. It is altogether fortunate for us that we have a Prime Minister who is historically minded. I was much impressed with the thoughts he gave us today and with the plans he outlined. I have also been very much impressed with the suggestions made from various parts of the chamber with respect to the celebration of our great centennial. I think it altogether fitting that the Prime Minister laid the emphasis he did on the great questions of tolerance, mutual understanding and the great freedoms.

Our country began with the union of more than one ethnic group. It has now broadened and developed and contains many strands. I am one who has little support or sympathy for those who would think we have any other way but the united way. We in Canada find it difficult at times to reach back in history and discover that great blinding moment of truth. It is said that when the republic of Argentina turned over to Canada a square in the capital city of Buenos Aires they expected that on that square this country would erect a statue to our liberator, because in Latin America the equestrian liberator is the great figure of history. I would hate to be called upon to state what mounted figure should represent Canada in any square in any part of the world. We do not have a great revolution to which we can refer. As the Prime Minister says, the 1867 episode occurred without a great deal of fanfare, without a great deal of fuss, and with not too many of these excited utterances that appeal to public opinion and to which other countries point when they look down the historic passages of time.

We have not had much bloodshed although, as the Associate Minister of National Defence said, when it came to shedding blood for great issues Canadians were in the forefront. Indeed we can say, Mr. Chairman, that our anthem of nationalism has been played in a minor key. In fact sometimes we have not even been aware of the great things which were accomplished. The achievement of 1867 is as remarkable an achievement as ever occurred anywhere in the world, requiring continuing statesmanship to hold together a collection of communities when great factors were there which would contribute to their disunity and perhaps even their disintegration.

I often think it is typical of our lack of appreciation of these things when I go to that beautiful village of Grand Pré in Nova Scotia, where for many years everyone knew about Evangeline national park and the monument there to a mythical figure created by a United States poet, while a stone's throw away was the birthplace of one of our great Canadian statesmen, Sir Robert Borden, unmarked and unknown except to a very few people. I believe our Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is correcting this situation. We have missed the jingoism, and I think it is well that we have; but as hon. members have said, it is time for a greater awareness of what Canada is and what Canadians have done.

I like the emphasis put by the hon. member for York-Humber on the fact that this must be an opportunity for the young people of our land to inform themselves, to interest themselves, and indeed to be inspired by what this great country is all about. As we go forward with the centennial plans, Mr. Chairman, hon. members will have an opportunity to see a preview of the great celebrations to come in the celebrations for the Charlottetown conference of 1864. As the hon. member for Peterborough said, it took three years to effect confederation. We look upon the opening event as the one which took place in 1864.

Here the historians and publicists have done us a great disservice. You will read that the islanders were busy at a circus when the delegates came and did not properly greet the visitors. This is not altogether true. The delegates stayed there for eight or nine days and were well entertained at Government House, that historic and beautiful building which still stands. How could visitors be treated more kindly than by the maritime delegates agreeing to set aside their own subjects of discussion in order to hear the distinguished representatives of the old provinces of Canada? This surely was hospitality.

Perhaps that unsung feeling of mutual understanding was expressed by a little incident which took place in Charlottetown in September of 1864. The orator, the great speaker of the visiting group undoubtedly was Thomas D'Arcy McGee, the ancestor of my colleague the hon. member for York-Scarborough. On the night they held the ball at Government House in Charlottetown where was McGee? He was in the city lecturing, and on what? He was lecturing on Robert Burns, and delivered one of the finest talks ever given on that finest of poets.

In 1964 there will be events which will celebrate this preliminary and essential step in the confederation development. The province of Prince Edward Island has invited the area conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association to meet in Charlottetown. This will be a direct repetition of the event of 1864, namely a gathering of the political leaders of all parties from all over Canada, (now a much enlarged Canada, a much greater Canada), in the birthplace of confederation. I think the inscription on the wall of the confederation chamber is one, and I say this unashamedly, which we should not forget in these difficult times. These men went there from what might be said by some to be primitive legislatures; and small communities and sat down to build a great nation. The inscription which is on the memorial erected to them states simply, "Providence being their guide, they builded better than they knew." Perhaps never before have we had a greater need for the guidance of Providence.

So, Mr. Chairman, I am filled with great pride and pleasure at the steps which are being taken to celebrate our nation's birthday. It is appropriate that these steps are being taken on the birthday of the Prime Minister. I tender him my good wishes on this happy day for him. I know that we will all, irrespective of our place in Canada, our place in society or our place in this chamber, unite in a great effort to make this centennial worthy of our great country.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member for Ottawa West some questions which he wishes to ask?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The questions arise out of the resolution itself and the remarks of the Prime Minister. I wonder if at this stage the Prime Minister would mind elaborating a bit more as to just how he proposes the relationship between the national conference and the centennial administration will work out. I would ask him to develop that a bit further. Then, I have no criticism whatever of this, but the Prime Minister did not make any remarks about the financial side of the resolution, and how the money would be provided for this purpose. Presumably the resolution is being brought before the committee in order for the committee to pass on whether or not money should be provided for this purpose.

Is it the government's intention that the funds required should be provided directly through votes of other departments, or is it intended that the money will be provided directly to the corporation to be set up? I have in mind such things as the national capital commission, possible grants to provinces, and so on. Will the financing be done through this corporation or directly by the government? If the Prime Minister is in the position to do so, although I would not expect he would be at the moment, could he give us any idea as to what the cost will be, whether this involves a large expenditure of money or whether the resolution envisages something in the nature of planning and organization rather than the expenditure of money?

Then there was one other matter upon which the Prime Minister may wish to express himself, but I do not propose to press it. Would he describe the set-up of the national conference and the work of this organization? As I understand, he set out in part the composition of that very large conference, which will include representatives of the federal government and representatives of the provincial governments. Since 11 governments are involved, and as governments change, was it his intention that this should be made an all party type of conference in all the 11 jurisdictions, or does he envisage it being a government conference as such? I am drawing the distinction between governments as such and all the parties. I hope it will be an all party set-up as I think that is the way in which this subject must be approached if for no other reason than the practicality of the situation. It is inevitable that governments will change within the six years. I refer to some of the 11 governments. In order to get the kind of continuity that is desirable, thought should be given to the wisdom of making the representation on that conference, whose duties as I understand it will be largely advisory, on a larger basis than merely that of the government in office in any given jurisdiction at any given moment. If the Prime Minister could clarify those points it would perhaps be helpful to the committee. I certainly should be grateful if he would do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: First, Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank hon. members in all parts of the chamber for the contribution each has made in placing before the committee ideas and suggestions, all of which will receive full and complete consideration.

Possibly I should begin by answering the questions asked by the hon. member for Ottawa West. While I am not at liberty to refer particularly to the bill, may I say this. The national centennial administration tc which I made reference will have the right to expend any moneys appropriated by parliament for the work of the administration or received by the administration through the conduct of its operations or by gift, donation, bequest or otherwise.

As to the second question asked by him, may I say this. It is the purpose and object of this legislation when brought before the house to assure that the celebration to take place in 1967 shall be a national celebration representative, as I said earlier, of all the people of Canada, and naturally representative of all the political thinking of Canada. To that end provision will be made in the legislation so that each province will appoint two members to the organization to be set up in that connection known as the national conference on Canada's centennial.

I think that covers the two questions the hon. member brought before the committee, although earlier he made reference to an opportunity being given to the House of Commons each year during the next six years to express its views with regard to matters which, in the opinion of members, it might be necessary to discuss in order to improve and to expand the work of the conference or of the administration. While there is no definite plan in that connection I should think it would be considered the course of reason to give the house from time to time the opportunity to place its collective views before the government and, through the government, before the conference and the committee.

It has been a worth-while occasion as we forget for a moment those things that ordinarily separate us and as we deal with a matter of national importance, see the degree of unanimity that has been apparent here during the course of the discussion. There have been many plans. Someone has asked what the total expenditure will be. That, of course, is a matter of conjecture. It will depend upon the nature and extent of the celebration to take place. It will depend as well on the extent to which the provinces co-operate and make their contributions. I would also hope there would be many private organizations which would feel the urge to make a contribution to the objective we all have in mind, namely a declaration to all the world of Canada's attainment of its centennial and also of our plans for the future.

Indeed, I should not be surprised that the time is not too far removed when the Canada of today will have additional provinces. Confederation was greatly strengthened when Newfoundland became a member of it. That was a step which it had been hoped would be achieved in 1867 or shortly thereafter but which, by reason of circumstances, was postponed for some 80 years. There are other northern areas that are developing. As Canada spreads northward and as national development carries on still further in the direction of the pole—I refer to the developing population of those areas—we may yet see one province and possibly two added to the existing 10 within the lifetime of numbers of hon. members sitting in this chamber.

As I listened to the hon. member for St. Boniface I recalled the words of Sir George Etienne Cartier in 1867, at the time the nation had its beginning. His words were these:

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

> The time has arrived to form a great nation, and I maintain that, as far as we are concerned, confederation has become necessary to our commerce, our prosperity, and our protection . . .
> The government is of the opinion that confederation is necessary, but it is ready to hear the honourable members on the other side who apparently intend to oppose it. I am aware that members of this House and a number of people in Upper Canada and the maritime provinces believe that a legislative union would be more advantageous than a confederation. As far as I am concerned, I believe that a single government could not deal properly with the private and local interests of the various sections or the various provinces. No other system is practicable but a federal system. It is pretended that it will be impossible to carry out confederation on account of differences of race and of religion. Those who hold that opinion are in error. It is precisely on account of the difference in races and local interests that the federal system should be established and that it will work well. We have often read in the newspapers—and there are public men who hold likewise—that it is a great evil to have such different races, such distinctions between French Canadians and English Canadians. I desire in this connection to vindicate the rights and merits of the French race in Canada. It will suffice to recall the efforts which the French Canadians made to uphold British power on this continent, and to show their attachment for the British crown in a time of trial . . .
> Objection is made to our project, because of the words "a new nationality". But if we unite, we will form a political nationality independent of the national origin and religion of individuals. Some have regretted that we have a distinction of races, and have expressed the hope that, in time, this diversity will disappear. The idea of a fusion of all races is utopian; it is an impossibility. Distinctions of this character will always exist; diversity is the order of the physical, moral and political world. As to the objection that we cannot form a great nation because lower Canada is French and Catholic, upper Canada English and Protestant, and the maritime provinces mixed, it is futile. Take, for example, the United Kingdom, inhabited as it is by three great races. Has the diversity of races been an obstacle to the progress and welfare of Great Britain? Have not the three races united by their combined qualities, their energy and their courage, contributed to the glory of the empire, to its laws so wise, to its success on land, on sea and in commerce? In our confederation there will be catholics and protestants, English, French, Irish, Scotch, and each by its efforts and success will add to the prosperity of the dominion, to the glory of the new confederation. We are of different races, not to quarrel, but to work together for the common welfare. We cannot by law make the differences of race disappear, but I am convinced that the Anglo Canadians and the French Canadians will appreciate the advantages of their position. Set side by side, like a great family, their contact will produce a happy spirit of emulation. The diversity of races will in fact, believe me, contribute to the common prosperity.

That was the spirit of 1867, and that is the spirit of today. Indeed, when people tell me there are no developments taking place within our country toward the formation of a national purpose, I speak as one who on this day naturally looks back on his own lifetime. Who would have thought it possible that the day would come when a person of other than entirely British or French origin would be prime minister of this country? That would have been a utopian dream; that would have been a figment of the imagination, but that is what has been brought about within this land. The divergencies of race and religion, while maintained constitutionally, none the less do not deny anyone within this land, whatever his origin, making his contribution to the country and having the support of all the people in endeavouring to do so.

That is the kind of Canada we are building. We are maintaining the rights under the constitution which must be inviolate and unchangeable, while at the same time bringing to this nation those of every race and religion, building a Canadianism. As I look back over my lifetime I see the tremendous change that has taken place. There is a new spirit of tolerance. There are some who say "Oh, we are divided east and west on the basis of race, origin and religion". I have not found that. I have found in my lifetime, and in particular since holding the responsible office that I hold today, that every part of this country, whatever its divergencies and differences may be, is united in a Canadianism and in a desire to build a strong, virile, vibrant and vital Canada.

I return now to the question of some of the things that might be done. While there will have to be diversification in the preparations —I am thinking of the capital city of Ottawa —we must keep other factors in mind. What are some of the things that have been suggested? In mentioning these I do not of course indicate that each and all of them will be accepted, but here are some of the suggestions that have been made.

One is the acceleration of the national capital plan. The next is the preservation of our historical monuments. I have dealt with this matter on previous occasions. One of our aims and purposes should be to preserve those places that are indeed the citadels of our freedom, that too often are removed or destroyed in order to meet the exigencies of modern life. One of those places is Earnscliffe, today the home of the British high commissioner in Canada. There indeed is one of those monuments that I hope in the years ahead will become part of the Canadian tradition and the property of the dominion. As one walks about in that place and sees the history of our country, one cannot help but have that feeling. One who has given strong support to that suggestion is the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I refer to the necessity for the preservation of these things that, after all, show the greatness of a nation.

Then there has been suggested the establishment of a museum of Canadian history. Mention has been made of the greatness of our historical background. I await the day when a history will be written which is acceptable to all Canadians, representative of the greatness of our past, compiled by representatives of the two basic races and the other races to the end that no portion of the majesty of our past will be lost to the present and to the future. There has been the suggestion of a concert hall to make the nation's capital the artistic centre of Canada, to be taken in conjunction with the art gallery and those other institutions of art that we have within our city. The national library and the development of Sussex drive, along the lines that have been sketched and outlined by the Minister of Public Works, is a step in this direction. These are some of the things that will give substance to our national centennial and will also provide for Canadians yet unborn worthy and helpful institutions for the future. I return to one thing I have advocated throughout the years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would permit me to ask him one question before he goes on to this other point. I notice the Prime Minister did not mention a national auditorium. It seems to me—and recent events in Ottawa have made this very clear—that nothing is more needed than proper surroundings in which a national assembly could be held. This has been demonstrated by their lack in the last two or three years here in Ottawa.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to know that idea has just developed within the last two or three years. It is one of those things the need for which has become very apparent. It was not one of the matters that were brought to our direct attention as a result of the suggestions made, although there was a reference to a national convention headquarters. Certainly it would be possible I should think, for one of the institutions already mentioned to be used for the purposes the hon. member has in mind. I was about to mention once more the portable institution of the Canadian freedom train. The United States tried out this plan, I think some 15 years ago, and to every part of the union went a freedom train in which were kept the various charters of American freedom. The youth of the United States was thus privileged to see something of the greatness of its past and some of the foundations of American liberty. I hope that we in Canada may be able to secure from the United Kingdom some of the great charters of freedom that are ours, and that from France we may secure those declarations of the latter part of the eighteenth century—the declaration of the rights of man—and then the various other statutes of our own country which are part and parcel of our constitutional development, beginning with the Quebec Act which, as I said earlier today, provided for the first time in the history of what is today the commonwealth, for freedom of religion, in addition to the Constitutional Act, the Act of Union, the British North America Act, the Statute of Westminster and any other statutes and constitutional documents, including the bill of rights, habeas corpus and magna carta which are part of our heritage. Hon. members may realize that there is no copy of the British North America Act in an official form—that it was just a statute in the normal manner of the passage of statutes through the United Kingdom parliament. Our foundation instrument is not an attractive one in the sense of its decorative or artistic qualities but it does represent something and there is a copy available which would be of great interest to the people of our country.

I do not think there is anything further I wish to say at this time except once again to bespeak the co-operation of hon. members and of the people of Canada as a whole so that when the organization is set up it may be said of us, in the words quoted by the hon. member for Queens which appear in the room in which the fathers of confederation met in Charlottetown, as it was said of them: "They builded better than they knew".

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Diefenbaker thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-127 respecting the observance of the centennial of confederation in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: I am informed that in committee the Prime Minister offered for tabling suggestions received from various sources concerning possible projects for Canada's centennial celebrations. Does the house agree to the tabling of this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING AMOUNTS AVAILABLE FOR LOANS AND RESEARCH

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1954:

1. To increase from one billion five hundred million dollars to two billion dollars the maximum charge on the consolidated revenue fund for direct loaning by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation;

2. To increase from five million dollars to ten million dollars the maximum charge on the consolidated revenue fund for housing research and community planning;

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

3. To increase from fifty million dollars to one hundred million dollars the maximum charge on the consolidated revenue fund for loans for university housing projects;

4. To increase from one hundred million dollars to two hundred million dollars the maximum charge on the consolidated revenue fund for loans for municipal sewage treatment projects.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Chown in the chair.

Mr. Walker: Because of the sincere and continuing interest of all hon. members in the question of housing, I propose at this time to make what might otherwise be considered as a somewhat comprehensive statement to the best of my ability so that I may anticipate some of the questions which must be in the minds of many of us after the summer recess.

Housing is a subject which has in a great measure been above party politics during the time I have been minister. All members of the house, in accordance with their own points of view, have made efforts to contribute toward the provision of better housing for our people and I know that everyone, regardless of where he sits, will be happy to know that since June, 1957, a new dwelling unit—a house or apartment—has been completed virtually every minute of every working day during the four year period.

The provision of new housing at this spectacular and unprecedented rate is, I respectfully suggest, an accomplishment in which each of us can take just pride. It is an accomplishment which we can better appreciate when we measure it in terms of human beings—hundreds of thousands of Canadian families obtaining new homes, many for the first time, or at least moving to a new and better environment in which to live and nurture their children. It is an accomplishment, too, which clearly indicates the forthright, considered and, if I may say so, successful approach by this government to a vital social and economic problem of national proportions. It is also interesting to know that there are today two million Canadians living in new homes—homes which were not built when this government took office four years ago.

Of the housing accommodation built since 1957, 42.6 per cent, or very close to one-half, was financed under the National Housing Act and, in turn, approximately one-half of the N.H.A. total was constructed with direct federal government assistance. To put it in another way, more than 595,000 new dwelling units have been built during the past four and a half years, of which some 252,000 were financed under the National Housing Act; and of the N.H.A. content, more than 132,000 units were made possible through the medium of public mortgage funds aggregating $1,264.9 million.

This, of course, is only a part of the story and I shall, if I may, deal with some of the other aspects a little later in my remarks. I shall be very happy to answer any questions asked by hon. members and to receive their suggestions as to how we can better go forward to build what we hope will be a magnificent program in housing. Meanwhile, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I may be permitted to review very briefly the situation that faced us in 1960, the positive actions taken by the government and the reflection of these actions in the results attained.

Hon. members may recall that on November 22, 1960—it seems so long ago when this session began; on that occasion I believe I had the privilege of introducing the first measure of the session—in introducing another measure to amend the National Housing Act, I said:

> For the first time since the war demand for housing has become a limiting factor.

There were good reasons for the pause. The pressures of population and income growth had abated and the sustained rate of building in the post-war years had greatly improved general housing conditions. But it was a pause and I believe I was careful to stress that we considered it to be nothing more than that, a rest for revaluation, a time to take stock ourselves.

Our assessment, which events are already showing to be a valid one, was based on general acceptance of the fact that a very real need for good housing still exists, especially for the lower income groups, and will continue to exist for many years to come. But as 1960 advanced, it became increasingly apparent that we were undergoing a transition, a transition from 15 years of active, unbroken demand to an anticipated period of marked improvement throughout most of this decade when the children born in the years following the war will reach maturity and enter the housing market.

There were of course many problems accompanying the transition, problems that required a hard day to day scrutiny of our housing policies. As a result new measures geared to meet changing conditions were enacted from time to time by parliament and our administrative arrangements which are designed for a maximum of flexibility were also revised as required.

During last fall several other measures were introduced to stimulate winter construction and to encourage the highest possible level of employment in the building trades. These included a reduced rate of interest on loans to limited dividend companies providing rental accommodation for lower income families and for elderly persons; and extension of home improvement loans to rental properties including apartment houses. I need hardly say that these measures have had a tremendous influence on the house building industry in this past year.

The importance of housing to the economy was given further emphasis in December, 1960, when a major rejuvenation of the National Housing Act was effected. Parliament passed a number of amendments which gave the act new purpose and which today are having far reaching consequences for the nation as well as for the housing industry. As a matter of fact we are very pleased to have noted that as Canada worked its way out of the recession it was the housing industry directed by the government which led the way.

Hon. members will recall, for instance, that the ratio of loan to lending value was increased to provide higher loans and lower down payments; the maximum National Housing Act loan by regulation was raised; the permissive repayment period was extended to 35 years; funds available by statute for redevelopment of the blighted areas of our cities were doubled to $50 million; the federal-provincial partnership arrangements were widened to permit the acquisition and renovation of existing lands for public housing.

In addition, of course, two completely new concepts were introduced into the National Housing Act, federal assistance to municipalities to finance the construction of sewage treatment projects and to universities to provide living accommodation for resident students.

What have been the results of these perceptive, imaginative actions? What has happened as a result of the government's determination to stand by every bona fide home owner applicant and any builder who has a purchaser?

I can tell the committee that while the value of contract awards in the business, industrial and engineering fields declined by about 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 25 per cent respectively during the first seven months of 1961, residential contract awards jumped by some 30 per cent. These are remarkable figures to contemplate, but it is patent that new house construction and, in turn, new employment opportunities would also have suffered materially had activity not been spearheaded by an effective, up to date National Housing Act in the passing of which measure all hon. members of this committee shared.

Why have I stated that new employment opportunities and new house construction would have suffered materially? Because conventional mortgage loans were down sharply in the early months of 1961 with declines ranging up to 50 per cent. I need not explain what is meant by conventional loans; these are loans made outside of the National Housing Act. In May, with loans down by only 15 per cent there were signs of a levelling off but the improvement did not continue into June when loans were 32 per cent lower. It is therefore readily apparent that the volume of residential construction was able to show a substantial increase only because of the proven potential of the N.H.A.

At the half-way point of 1961, 71,648 dwelling units were under construction, compared with 65,694 at the end of June, 1960. Urban dwelling starts in the first eight months of the year exceeded those for the same period of 1960 by 29 per cent. However, because of the upturn in new housing starts in the late months of 1960, we cannot expect gains of this magnitude to continue throughout the balance of 1961. Nevertheless, there will certainly be an appreciable increase for the year as a whole.

National Housing Act lending activity in the field of residential construction has registered important gains over 1960. In August, N.H.A. loans were approved for 5,832 dwelling units. This represents an increase of 86 per cent over the same month of 1960 when the total was 3,131 units.

Total N.H.A. lending activity for the first eight months of this year climbed to 45,150 dwelling units, compared with 16,584 units for the same period of 1960. It is most encouraging to note that approved lenders operating under the act accounted for 26,702 dwelling units in this period, compared with last year's 10,449 units.

There has been an even greater increase in the amount of public funds invested in new house construction. Loan approvals by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the first eight months of the year were for 18,448 dwelling units, as compared with 6,135 units in the eight months of last year.

If each new dwelling unit financed under the National Housing Act involves 2½ man-years of employment on and off site, the N.H.A. mortgage lending for eight months of this year has contributed to more than 112,000, man-years of employment and, of these, direct federal lending has been responsible for 46,000 man-years. Therefore, when you see unemployment figures falling and employment figures rising so rapidly you can appreciate that in the first eight months of this year the activity of the National Housing Act has contributed to more than 112,000 man-years of employment.

What has this increased activity meant in terms of the market for new housing? The answer is that there is a nice balance between production and consumption. We have been attacked in some newspapers because of alleged overproduction, but in spite of the volume of new housing, output has kept pace with demand but has not been allowed to leap ahead of it. The market has, in fact, showed continued improvement since February of this year when there were 4,913 dwellings completed and unoccupied in metropolitan and major urban centres. At the end of August, this inventory of new housing had dropped by more than a thousand units to 3,903, the lowest since September of last year, notwithstanding the very substantial number of completions from March to August, inclusive. Therefore, the facts belie the suggestion that this great housing program has caused overproduction when in fact in a six-month period there are more than one thousand units of housing now occupied which was not occupied before. In other words, we have the number of unoccupied units reduced to 3,903. Of course, as the committee can appreciate, this is about a two weeks' supply of housing in Canada.

The committee may be interested at this point in a brief comparison of our experience in Canada with that of the United States. Starts in the United States from January to July, 1961 were 1 per cent below those of the previous year. I ask the committee to note these figures. Starts in the United States were 1 per cent below those of the previous year. This was in contrast with an increase of 26 per cent in Canada. For the full year, 1961, the United States department of commerce has forecast an increase in starts over 1960 of 3 per cent. In Canada we predict the comparable increase will be more than 10 per cent.

The federal housing act and veterans act loan applications for the first seven months of 1961 were 3 per cent higher than in the year before. In Canada there was an increase of 194 per cent in N.H.A. loan applications for the same period. I ask the committee to note that the federal housing act in the United States and the veterans act loan applications in the first seven months were 3 per cent higher. In Canada the National Housing Act loans were 194 per cent higher.

Both in the United States and in Canada, demand has been recognized as the limiting factor on housing starts. In both countries legislative changes have been made to widen the band of prospective home owners. These changes were made in Canada last December when the house was good enough to adopt the amendments to the National Housing Act and in the United States our lead was followed last June. In both cases down payment requirements were reduced and permissive repayment periods were extended.

The maximum interest rate on F.H.A loans in the United States was lowered by one-quarter of 1 per cent in February of this year and by another quarter of 1 per cent in May. However and this is very significant—the widening of discounts since the last reduction has brought the effective F.H.A. rate, as far as lenders are concerned, above the maximum and, in fact, has offset much of the May reduction. Furthermore, the Wall Street Journal reported:

> F.H.A.'s role in the housing market has been declining in recent months, indicating more mortgage lenders are shunning the agency's insurance programs.

In other words, they are shunning the approved lenders program similar to that in Canada. This is being shunned in the United States and has been caused by an artificial reduction of the interest rate in that country.

That the actions taken in the United States in reducing the F.H.A. interest rate on two occasions within four months is being regretted is apparent from speculation today that the Kennedy administration is considering whether it should restore the maximum interest rate permitted.

The continuing and very substantial federal participation in residential mortgage financing in Canada brings me to the first of the amendments to the National Housing Act that we are proposing at this time. All hon. members have the resolution in front of them. Simply stated, it is recommended that the amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for direct lending be increased by a $500 million to $2 billion by an amendment to section 22 of the act.

The committee will appreciate that section 22 presently authorizes the corporation to borrow up to $1.5 billion for this purpose. At September 8, 1961, commitments aggregating more than $1.26 billion had been made to borrowers. Loans are, as I have already indicated, continuing to be approved at a higher rate than anticipated and, if the pace is maintained, the entire statutory authority will have been virtually committed by December 31, 1961. Thus it is necessary to come to parliament at this time.

I might point out that the annual commitments by the corporation during the past few years have been as follows: 1957, $233 million; 1958, $373 million; 1959, $343 million; 1960, $161 million; 1961, estimated $300 million.

A few moments ago I referred to another aspect of the National Housing Act operations that is particularly noteworthy at this time, namely loans for municipal sewage treatment projects. These loans are playing, as the committee knows—and I hear it from hon. members on both sides of the house and from all groups in the house—a major part in new construction across the nation and our second proposed amendment relates to the funds required to continue this assistance.

For many years water and soil polution have been on the increase; they have become a national problem. When this government took office it was alarmed to find that less than one sixth of our urban municipalities had adequate sewage treatment plants in operation. Almost two thirds of our urban population were living in regions where seriously polluted surface waters were found.

To help municipalities overcome these unsatisfactory and unhealthy conditions, the federal government has been making loans for the construction of trunk sewage collector systems and for central treatment plants. The loans are also made for expansion of existing trunk collector sewers or plants.

I wish to thank hon. members for the great assistance I have had from them in making this information available to the municipalities with which they are so closely in touch.

I might remind hon. members that, under the National Housing Act, the loan is limited to two thirds of the cost of the project and is repayable over a period of not more than 50 years at a rate of interest close to the federal borrowing rate. To encourage municipalities to attack the problem immediately—of course, this was one of our incentives to get out of the recession—one quarter of the loan and one quarter of the interest paid or accrued will be forgiven if the project is completed on or before March 31, 1963. Where the construction program is started but not completed by March 31, 1963, one quarter of the loan and interest for warrantable construction may be forgiven.

The response by municipalities has pointed up the urgent need for the legislation. I have been very proud of the thoughtfulness and wisdom of the town councillors across Canada in their appreciation of the tremendous opportunity which this government has provided for them. Not only have requests come from all provinces in Canada, but they have come from municipalities of every size. Sixty one communities of less than 5,000 population have been granted loans and, of these, 47 have less than 2,000 population and 37 less than 1,000. In most of these smaller communities, sewage systems are being provided where they did not exist before. Furthermore, construction of sewage systems in the smaller localities has, in many instances, encouraged the installation of public water systems to replace individual wells.

Now, federal sewage loans have also enabled many major centres to extend their trunk sewage systems and either enlarge or, where none existed, establish sewage treatment plants. Sewage disposal and treatment have as one of their objectives the prevention of damage to receiving waters. The damage that may be done includes contamination or pollution of water supplies, bathing places and fishing grounds. This all-out effort by municipalities, in conjunction with the other levels of government, will do much to free our rivers, streams, lakes and coastal waters of the pollution problem. I should like, at this point, to commend the city of Ottawa for its foresight and for the promptness with which it acted to avail itself of the opportunities under the National Housing Act to go ahead immediately with its tremendous sewage disposal plant. The mayor of Ottawa deserves a great deal of credit for her leadership in this regard.

Since the legislation received royal assent on December 2, 1960, we have already approved 106 loans to municipalities in every province in Canada. In addition, 14 other formal applications are being processed which will mean more than $44 million of the $100 million provided by statute for this purpose will have been allocated. There are also 203 preliminary inquiries, representing a loan potential of $70 million, on hand so that by early next year the entire $100 million should be committed.

The amendment the committee is being asked to consider would have the effect of increasing the statutory vote for funds for municipal sewage treatment project loans to $200 million from $100 million.

I now come to loans to universities to assist in the construction of accommodation for full-time students in the form of either new residences or the conversion of existing buildings into dormitories. This is the subject of another amendment to the National Housing Act now being recommended. To qualify under the N.H.A., as hon. members are aware, this type of accommodation must consist primarily of bedrooms and sanitary facilities, although dining halls and lounges will be considered in the over-all picture. Other facilities necessary to operate the project, such as self contained family housing units for the senior supervisor of resident students and a caretaker, may also be provided. Loan amounts are based on 90 per cent of the cost of the project, subject to a maximum of $7,000 for each student accommodated. Loans may be for a term of up to 50 years and their interest at a rate prescribed by the governor in council, as low a rate as is possible.

The provision of dormitories for universities was a problem of national concern. The increasing number of scholarships, bursaries and grants has lowered many of the economic barriers to a university education and has contributed to an unprecedented rise in enrolment. All hon. members are interested in seeing that children, if they are properly qualified, have an opportunity for university education. Let us look at these figures: 63,500 enrolled in universities in 1952, 114,000 are enrolled at the present time and the estimate for our centenary year, 1967, is 185,000. This enrolment is increasing at a tremendous rate. The national conference of Canadian universities reported in 1958 that 60 per cent of all full-time students were domiciled 15 or more miles away from the university. Resident accommodation was limited to 25 per cent of the student body. Those of you who have attended university and have been unable to gain admittance to one of the university residences can appreciate the problems students are having at the present time.

Construction of adequate dormitories on university campuses will accomplish two purposes: First, those who travel many miles each day to obtain an education will be able to move to the university grounds, with its attendant benefits; and those living in small towns who heretofore have been denied an education because of lack of accommodation will now be able to attend university.

Response by the universities to these long term, low interest loans has been most gratifying and the program is achieving unqualified success. To date, applications for loans have been received from 30 universities and colleges and an additional 23 have made preliminary inquiries. Sixteen loans in the amount of $18 million have already been approved. Approvals and applications on hand will result in loans totalling more than $35 million. These would provide accommodation for in excess of 7,800 resident students.

Now, to avoid the possibility of running out of commitment authority—you will recall that when I became minister in the summer of 1959 we were either running out or had run out of commitment authority as the hon. member for Nipissing will recall—it is recommended that this statutory vote be increased to $100 million from $50 million.

The fourth and final proposed amendment, Mr. Chairman, relates to part V of the National Housing Act. Under part V, a responsibility is imposed upon Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to provide leadership in the search for a house of more beauty, a house of greater utility for Canadians at a lower cost; in other words, a better home for less money. This is what we all want, a better home for less money. Sections 32 and 33 of the National Housing Act enumerate 15 items of a general nature to which the corporation is to give its attention. It is under this part of the act, for example, that provision is made for scholarships, bursaries and urban renewal studies. As minister, I have been amazed at the great interest manifested in better housing as the result of the encouragement of these scholarships and bursaries and the urban renewal studies provided by the government.

Section 35 of the National Housing Act contains a statutory vote of $5 million for these purposes. This amount has been almost fully committed. It is now recommended that the statutory vote of $5 million should be increased to $10 million. This will restore the commitment authority to the amount originally provided by the act.

That briefly is the scope of the new housing legislation we are seeking at this time and the reasons additional commitment authority is required on these four counts. May I just summarize: First, an increase of $500 million in the statutory appropriation provided by section 22 of the National Housing Act to $2 billion; second, an increase of $100 million in the statutory vote under section 36H(3) to $200 million; third, an increase of $50 million in the statutory vote under section 36G(2) to $100 million; and fourth, an increase of $5 million in the statutory vote under section 35 to $10 million.

In concluding my remarks, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the indulgence of hon. members for a few minutes more in order to review one or two other considerations which the committee may want me to touch upon at this time.

My remarks have indicated that house building has not been impeded in 1961 by any over-all shortage of mortgage funds for National Housing Act lending. It must be remembered, however, that this year 40 per cent of all National Housing Act loans have been made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—and I know the hon. member for Nipissing particularly will want to know this—with funds provided by the government and that private funds for National Housing Act lending have been quite inadequate to meet the total demand for National Housing Act loans. Hon. members of the House of Commons have heard me say over and over again how anxious we are to have more and more private funds finance this great program of national building in order to relieve the government of the necessity of doing so in as great an amount as we are doing at the present time. But this year, in order to meet the commitments the government, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has made contributions up to 40 per cent of all the National Housing Act loans made this year so that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in its role as residual lender will likely make loans up to $300 million.

This does not mean that the National Housing Act interest rate cannot be reduced as long as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is engaged in the lending business. This question about the interest rate is asked very often. No one is more interested in it than am I. On the other hand, there would be little point in lowering the National Housing Act interest rate—and I ask all hon. members to note this point—if the principal effect of such a change were to replace private funds with government funds in the National Housing Act market, particularly since the government already is committed to 40 per cent of National Housing Act lending this year.

It has always been the policy of this government to maintain the lowest possible National Housing Act interest rate that would attract a substantial flow of mortgage funds for housing. Hon. members will recall that the National Housing Act provides for a ceiling N.H.A. interest rate 2¼ per cent higher than the interest rate on long term federal government bonds. This government has been able to encourage a substantial flow of mortgage funds from the private lenders at a rate significantly lower than the maximum provided in the National Housing Act. If a new National Housing Act interest rate were prescribed today, the formula contained in the National Housing Act would permit—and I ask the hon. member for Nipissing to note this point—a maximum rate of 7¼ per cent but, notwithstanding the attractiveness of alternative investments, such as corporate bonds and provincial and municipal bonds, the government has been able to hold the National Housing Act rate at 6¾ per cent. The government will continue its efforts to maintain the National Housing Act interest rate at the lowest possible level. This matter is subject to continuous review, and the National Housing Act rate will be reduced as soon as the relative attractiveness of this rate as compared with other investment yields will permit the action to be taken, without impeding the flow of mortgage funds for housing purposes. Even with a rate of 6¾ per cent we are only able to get this year from private lenders a 60 per cent participation in National Housing Act lending.

I therefore ask hon. members not to worry about my attention to the interest rate. I think about it every month and indeed every week. We have had our review. We have many reviews. I am always saying, "When can we reduce the interest rate?" However, until long term government bond—and my hon. friends know what I mean—yields are reduced, this cannot be done. As hon. members can appreciate, if the bonds go up in price, the interest rate gets correspondingly less. As soon as we reduce those bonds, just so soon will we be able to reduce the N.H.A. interest rate on loans for houses.

May I now say a word about assistance to lower income families. This is a matter close to my heart because, as all hon. members know, I am interested in this subject inasmuch as in my riding of Rosedale we have the first huge federal-provincial development located in Regent park. I am therefore vitally interested in lower income families. In the first place, the more generous N.H.A. terms afforded by statute in December last have a direct bearing on the amount of mortgage loan available, the amount of down payments required and the length of time over which the loan may be repaid. The easier terms are there, of course, for any prospective borrower who is eligible, but it must be obvious that the greatest advantage is to families of modest means and it was this group we had very much in mind when we sought from parliament last year authority to make these important statutory revisions.

I would point out also, that this year so far 36.3 per cent of National Housing Act borrowers have had annual incomes of $5,000 or less.

Second, I must point to the very heavy volume of lending under the limited dividend provisions of the act to assist in financing rental accommodation for families who come from the lower third income group in their community and also limited dividend projects built for elderly persons. Again, as I do every time I make a speech to these wonderful charitable and service clubs across Canada, I commend the taking of cognizance of the opportunity for service in their communities by building in their communities under their aegis, direction and control, limited dividend projects. They will not lose any money in the long run. The government will put up 90 per cent of the funds; they put up 10 per cent of them. The cost is amortized over a period of 40 years at a low interest rate. They can be of great benefit to the people in the lower income bracket and to the elderly people in their community by doing a service of this kind.

To September 8 of this year loans have been approved for nearly 3,000 units of this kind, a figure that compares with 510 units for the same period of 1960. Just think about that. It is almost six times as many and it is almost double the total for all of that year. The value of limited dividend loans approved this year to date is $22.9 million, against $3 million a year ago.

Third, since this government took office in 1957 more than 3,000 units of federal-provincial housing have been approved under section 36 of the National Housing Act to a value of $34 million. This is equivalent to one half of all federal-provincial housing approved by the previous government since the measure was introduced in 1949. Again, federal-provincial housing is intended for lower income families. Indeed, in September, 1960 the average tenant had an income of $3,288 per year.

Finally, grants in an estimated amount of $13.5 million have been made by the federal government for slum clearance purposes since 1957, a little more than double the amount made available by the previous government, and there can be no doubt that this assistance ultimately is of the greatest possible help to families of lesser means.

All these beneficial provisions of the National Housing Act, together with the many helpful services afforded by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the public and to prospective home owners, suggest on the part of the government, I think hon. members will agree, a very high degree of interest in and of assistance to the lower income family. But I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that no assistance which we can render can be great enough.

I wish to say something about the 35-year repayment period. Hon. members will recall that we extended the period, but we only do this where it is a case of necessity and where we ascertain that the person who receives such an extension is readily qualified and otherwise would not be able to obtain a loan.

I now wish to refer to the mortgage insurance fund. I expect to hear some remarks from the hon. member for Nipissing about this. It is one of his favourite subjects and I am always glad to hear from him on it.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): I regret to advise the minister that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Does the committee give unanimous consent to the minister continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Walker: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and through you hon. members of the committee. I have almost completed my remarks. As of July 31, 1961 the assets of the mortgage insurance fund totalled $79.1 million against mortgage loans outstanding of more than $3,428 million. The assets included $793,760 in mortgages, $4,062,625 in real estate, close to $1 million in accrued interest and the balance in cash or government securities. From March, 1954, when mortgage insurance was introduced, to September 13, 1961, 835 claims were made against the fund and the value of claims paid was in excess of $7.8 million.

Thus, although our loss experience to date has not been unduly severe, he would be a very rash man indeed who would seriously counsel against maintaining, and continuing to increase, our insurance against losses of public funds that are outstanding in such large amounts.

I wish to say just a word about the secondary mortgage market. Again, I stress that we are not talking about second mortgages, but about the secondary mortgage market. As hon. members know, a second successful offering of National Housing Act insured loans was made in August. The auction resulted in a wider list of successful bidders, together with first use of the 60-day option arrangement.

As announced on August 30, total bids and requests for options in the amount of $21 million were received for the $17.5 million offering, of which not more than $15 million was to be sold. The value of accepted tenders was $9.75 million, bringing to $22.25 million aggregate sales for the June and August auctions. In addition, there were accepted requests for options in August for $3.75 million.

The average accepted tender price was 101.35, compared with 101.17 for the initial offering made in June. Bids were again received from chartered banks, life insurance and trust companies and investment dealers.

We are very much encouraged by results of the offerings for two reasons. First, their success indicates a growing interest on the part of those whom we would expect to develop a secondary market in mortgages, and we now know that a number of loans purchased in June have since been resold to Canadian pension funds, some of which had not previously invested in mortgages. On the basis of our experience to date we expect a third offering will be made during the next few months. We are criticized at times for not offering a larger amount at these auctions. After all, we want to test the market and we want to develop this secondary mortgage market in an orderly and sensible way.

Mr. Chairman, those are my remarks on this resolution. I should be very happy to hear not only advice from hon. members of the committee, but also any constructive criticism. There is no one more anxious than I, as the minister in charge of the department and responsible for reporting to parliament in connection with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, to find ways and means of developing our concept of having every Canadian properly housed.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, before dealing directly with the resolution I should like to take this opportunity to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that national home week began last Saturday. I know that builders and the many others engaged in the house building industry will be putting forth extra efforts during this national home week. New models and new ideas for better living will be on display, in many cases for the first time, in an effort to reach today's home buyer, who is becoming more and more selective. The prospective buyer today is doing more shopping than ever before in his search for better value for his money.

I should like to pay tribute to those many Canadians engaged in the house building industry, to the people concerned in construction and selling, and in fact to all who are connected with this industry. I believe the great majority of the people engaged in this important industry are continually searching for ways and means of improving their particular field and in so doing are making a worthwhile contribution to the never ending job of providing better housing for Canadians.

I should like first of all to thank the minister for his very comprehensive and, if I may say so—I do not want him to misunderstand me—lengthy statement. He has covered the field very thoroughly. In fact, he has covered the actions of his government for the past four years since they took office. My remarks today, on the contrary, will be rather brief as we on this side of the chamber await the bill itself and the examination of it which will be made later.

I believe the outstanding aspect of the legislation which will follow today's resolution will be found in the timing of the legislation and the tremendous sums involved, especially in the light of the statements of the Prime Minister, that the next election will be fought on the basis of free enterprise v. socialism.

This legislation—at least that portion of it that increases the amount of $1,500 million to $2,000 million for direct lending—shows the degree to which this government has become involved in financing home construction. Despite their many statements that they intend to resume a residual role in this field, this legislation, necessary though it may be at this time, points up the degree to which this government has taken over from the private sector. I intend to say more on this subject a little later on.

The other outstanding feature of the proposed legislation is the fact that it ignores completely the real problem that faces the prospective home buyer today. I refer to the high cost of housing resulting from the high interest rates which have been made necessary and which are being maintained, apparently, under this government despite their protests to the contrary. We, as members of this committee, must satisfy ourselves that the amount envisaged in the first section of this proposed legislation is justified at this time. We must ask ourselves: does this government really intend to lend this money in the near future or are they simply seeking to provide election insurance? I was hoping the minister would have been more specific—that he would have taken this house and the country into his confidence to a greater extent concerning the government's intentions for the next year or more. Perhaps there will be an opportunity for the minister to do that later on.

The legislation envisaged in this resolution, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, falls into four distinct categories. While we are in basic agreement with the principle of the resolution just as we were in December when somewhat similar legislation was before us, and while we do not intend to offer any obstacle to its passage, we do believe that the first item—the increase from $1.5 billion to $2 billion—is worthy of some examination. However, before dealing with the first section may I say we warmly support sections 2, 3 and 4. That more research and community planning is required there will be no argument in this house. With respect to the third and fourth items dealing with loans for university housing projects and municipal sewage treatment projects, I may say that we are in full accord, as we were last December. However, as we said then, and especially in the case of the sewage treatment section, we did not feel the government's proposals went far enough. We believe there is a great need by our hard pressed municipalities for a much larger degree of assistance such as could be provided by a municipal loan fund along the lines we have been recommending since 1958.

We hope the increase in the ceiling from $1.5 billion to $2 billion will assure that in the future the government will not make the same mistake as it did between October 1959 and April 1960—the mistake of not making needed funds available, with the consequent disastrous impact on housing staffs during the first half of 1960 and the resulting substantial loss of employment opportunities at a time when they were needed most. The low level of starts last year—108,858, the lowest since 1953—provides the statistical basis for government claims of an increase in 1961 as compared with last year's starts. I would also point out that the low carry-over of houses under construction has resulted in completions between January and July, 1961, being 18.4 per cent less than in the same period of 1960. In these circumstances over-all activity in residential construction has shown, really, only marginal improvement. We are perhaps justified in pointing out in passing that in respect to the legislation approved only last December the fact that the government is now asking for further increases raises some doubt as to the ability of this administration to plan ahead.

The first increase—the increase from $1.5 billion to $2 billion—is interesting in view of the government's oft-professed role as the only champions of free enterprise. It is of interest to note that during the last three full years of Liberal administration—1954, 1955 and 1956—approximately 380,000 homes were started as opposed to the 415,000 during the three full years of Tory administration, 1958, 1959 and 1960. The Liberal administration of those days found it necessary to lend only $65 million, while direct loans from 1958 to 1960 amounted to $924 million. In other words, in order to build less than 10 per cent more houses this government had to increase its lending by approximately 1,400 per cent; to start 35,000 more houses in three full years they had to supply $860 million more from the public sector. This is some example of free enterprise.

I should like to say just a few words with respect to the outlook of the future. Despite the fact that in July housing starts were below those of July last year—8,682 as against 8,966—and that on a seasonally adjusted basis starts have been tending downward since March, I believe there is every indication that during the next 12 months housing starts could recover substantially from last year's low level. Demand for housing, in the sense that there are still many Canadians who are ill housed, continues to be very great. However, there must always be the fear that as general economic conditions improve, as the recovery from recession broadens and, in particular, if a mild expansion should take place during the next 12 months that the government may once again lose interest in the housing industry or, conversely, in an election year, overstimulate that industry. Wise policy and planning is required. Often in the past over-emphasis of the anti-cyclical aspect of house building or over-stimulation of the industry has resulted in feast or famine situations, with an obvious upward pressure on the cost of housing. On previous occasions we have dealt in some detail with the increase in costs and the fact that in consequence builders are unable to carry out any long term planning. It is not my intention to review those points today.

I should like, now, to say a few words about demand. Interest rates are one of the major factors because, as hon. members know, home owners are the largest users of long term credit. High interest rates have added and are adding substantially to the resistance of prospective buyers. Yet, as has been shown during the past few years, governments do have a tremendous influence on interest rates through both fiscal and monetary policies. We all recognize the control that any federal government has over interest rates by its power to adjust National Housing Act interest rates. It is my view, expressed at every opportunity and perhaps, in the minds of some, too often, that the main deterrent to the development of a more vigorous housing industry during these past many months have been this government's stubborn insistence on maintaining high interest rates. The rate of 6¾ per cent represents the highest ever during the life of the National Housing Act. I should like to cite one example, that of chartered banks. They have played a very important role during most of the time since they were introduced into the housing business in the time of the previous administration. It should be recalled that as recently as 1958 the chartered banks lent over $300 million. Well, this government maintained a high interest rate of 6¾ per cent, keeping the banks out of lending for housing during these past two years. I can think of few investments more attractive to the bank than these gilt-edged government backed mortgages at 6 per cent, yet this government keeps the banks out of approved lending by maintaining an N.H.A. rate of 6¾ per cent.

Finally, I should like to make a brief comment on the secondary mortgage market, which has been recommended from this side of the house for the past three years. We believe the government should be giving some consideration to the establishment of a federal agency which would purchase N.H.A. guaranteed mortgages and use them as collateral against the issuance of certificates in small denominations which would be made available to small investors.

During the last decade innumerable innovations have been perfected by those competing for the nation's savings. One has but to recall the gimmicks incorporated in the conversion loan to show to what lengths efforts have gone to create new instruments to attract funds. Such developments have not taken place in the housing field.

From the point of view of the home owner a mortgage is a very convenient credit instrument but from that of the investor it is cumbersome. Anything that can be done to improve its liquidity, to knock it down into smaller units will undoubtedly attract public funds to housing and allow the government to revert to a more residual role in the field of mortgage loans.

It is true that the government, and I might add after some years of urging from this side, did take its first timorous step in the direction of assisting in the establishment of a secondary mortgage market, but it was timorous indeed as witness these two small token offerings, one in June and the second when the house was recessed, in relation to the over-all picture. An effective secondary mortgage market of the kind we envisage could have channelled hundreds of millions of dollars into housing and could have reduced the present dependence on government funds for new lending as outlined in the resolution before us.

Naturally we wish to analyse the legislation when it is available to us in bill form. However, as I said at the beginning of my remarks we are in basic agreement with the principle of the resolution. We stand ready, of course, to support any legislation that will have the effect of providing a better housing for our people especially those in the medium and low income groups.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, on March 11, 1960 the minister first had occasion in his present capacity to make his first presentation to the house. On that occasion I recall that many hon. members on the government side of the chamber rose in succession and complemented the minister on the job he had done. At that time I stated, as will be found at page 2002 of Hansard of that date that I wished to defer my compliments for a year in order to see what the minister might accomplish. Whether or not that had anything to do with it, I feel better able to compliment the minister today than I felt at that time. As I recall it the figures at that time had indicated a drop of 75 per cent from the peak achieved under the minister's predecessor in that department. While no comparison was made with the previous high achieved under the former minister I was pleased that the minister today was able to report a marked increase in the 18 months that have elapsed since he last presented figures to us.

Perhaps one reason for the improvement is this. The minister has always been known as a firm believer in the good old free enterprise system. He was always willing to depend on that system to solve problems without, to use the popular phrase, too much interference from the government. Once the minister rid himself of that idea and undertook constructive action, despite its being considered as government interference in some quarters, he was able to accomplish significant results and present a brighter picture to us today. If the minister in the next 18 months continues to show an improvement such as he has shown in the last 18 months I shall possibly be able to compliment him completely without reservations, although I usually attach slight reservations to my compliments.

The minister may have overwhelmed us today in presenting his case in that he tended to drown us in a sea of statistics. At this stage after listening to the minister it is difficult to have a clear, comprehensive picture of the situation. He took the best possible view of the situation, but he looked at it from the top, the bottom, lengthwise, cornerwise and from all points of the compass. The minister is well known as an optimist and perhaps he has given us an optimistic view of an optimistic situation. One is led to wonder, if the situation is as good as it has been painted, why we should be faced with more amendments in this field. Surely, if the situation is as good as the minister suggests we would have reached the ultimate and not require additional amendments.

Despite references to surpluses in the housing field, we are still faced with a desperate shortage of housing for the people who really need it, those in the medium and lower income groups. I know the minister must realize that slums continue to grow in our major cities. Aggressive action will be required to hold our own in this field, let alone to enable us to solve the problem.

I trust the minister has learned that beyond a shadow of doubt free enterprise cannot solve the problems of his department despite the great pronouncement made by the Prime Minister about private enterprise versus socialism. Private enterprise has had 94 years in which to come to grips with our problems and increasingly over the years its inability to cope has been demonstrated. I hope the minister will continue to apply good socialist principles and as a result will be in a position to continue to present an improving picture in the department for which he is responsible.

It is not my intention to prolong the debate. We will be able to deal with the measure in greater detail when we have the amendments before us. In the meantime I urge the minister to cast his eye among his colleagues and suggest that in their respective fields they should begin to apply some of the fine socialist principles he has been so successful in applying. We await the legislation with interest and in the interim wish the minister well in his department.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, we have heard a most encouraging and comprehensive report this afternoon from the Minister of Public Works for which we are all grateful. We heard some most unusual comments from the opposition. The hon. member for Nipissing came down squarely on both sides of the argument as is perhaps typical of the attitude of hon. members of the Liberal party in these matters. To my great astonishment the hon. member for Timmins handed across a bouquet and, lo and behold, it did not contain the brick which is customarily contained in complimentary tributes which emanate from hon. gentlemen in that corner of the chamber.

Another interesting surprise derives from the fact that the hon. member for Timmins did not resort to use of the stock phrase that invariably graces the speeches of hon. members of that group: "This is a good idea but it does not go far enough and in any event we thought of it 20 years ago." We heard that tiresome phrase from that corner of the chamber this morning when the spokesman of that group was discussing the Prime Minister's resolution concerning the setting up of a Canadian centennial organization.

As I said, the hon. member for Nipissing was on both sides of the question at the same time. He cast his suspicious eye at the timing and the tremendous amount of money involved in the proposed resolution before us. He argued on the one hand that the previous government had encouraged a high level of participation on the part of the private sector of the economy and on the other hand argued that this particular legislation is very necessary.

He criticized the government for the lack of planning and the fact that they were short of funds at one particular time in the past few years. On the other hand, he criticized the government for having the foresight and the intelligence to plan ahead against the day when those funds may not be available in the future. Again he suggested that election insurance rather than intelligent planning was clearly involved in this legislation.

Mr. Garland: Will the hon. member tell us how many times his government has run out of funds since it assumed office?

Mr. McGee: I would not be prepared to do that offhand. I have not the figures nor the documents to reply to that question specifically. I would simply state that if this is part of his criticism, how does he square it with the other remarks criticizing the government for asking at this time for what he describes as a tremendous amount of money? In the first place I suggest that the hon. member cannot have it both ways. He has to be on one side of this free enterprise versus socialism argument or the other; he cannot be on both sides at the same time.

However, when he concluded his remarks I was happy to hear him say that he was clearly in favour of and would support better housing for lower income groups. Perhaps that was the most impressive part of the minister's statement, along with his description of the statistics which he gave, indicating that the lower income groups have been helped in an unprecedented way. That is something that we can all be proud of.

The figure that particularly impressed me was the figure of $13.5 million expended in the slum clearance programs. In the few years since I have been in the House of Commons and working closely with the present Minister of Public Works and his predecessor, I have seen various projects go through the planning stage and the building stage and increasing numbers of them being occupied. It was my privilege and pleasure recently in my own constituency to attend the opening of a senior citizens dwelling unit, one of the finest in the country, if not on the continent. The minister's attendance there and the fact that he again underlined the program and the increased activity in this sphere served to emphasize a most auspicious event.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether it is putting you on the spot, by reason of your recent appointment as deputy chairman of this committee, but I am sure your interest will continue in this field regardless of that impediment. Some mention should be made of the contribution in this field of the person whom I shall describe as the hon. member from Winnipeg South.

The increase from $5 million to $10 million for housing research and community planning is one which is of particular interest and significance. This government's participation in research and intelligent planning in this field, exemplified by the grant which the government made to the royal architectural institute of Canada to survey and report on the urban environment in Canada was one of its more significant acts. That report has been studied since its presentation last year. Within the institute a committee has been established to explore ways and means of implementing the recommendations of that report. I am happy to see that according to the minister's statement today the amount of bursaries and scholarships, both from that organization and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been increased.

It is very easy to deplore the mistakes in planning made in various municipalities during the hectic post-war housing period, but I think that one should pay tribute to the fact that this government has instigated an aggressive program to make sure that the mistakes of the past do not occur again. There is the fact that in the immediate post-war years and before any really intelligent work was done what I like to describe as the cookie cutter design was established. As I say, before any intelligent work was done on that design it was duplicated a hundred thousand times across the country. Part of the survey which I mentioned a moment ago was an attempt to determine the degree of dissatisfaction that exists in this country with housing design.

There is one particular scholarship and one particular bursary, either from C.M.H.C. or R.A.I.C., that I should like to see established, with a substantial award attached to it. It would have to do with a successful design of a three-bedroom unit which could be converted reasonably cheaply to a four-bedroom house at some future time. Some consideration would have to be given to the necessity arising for that fourth bedroom. This has become something of a fetish with me.

During election time I have had occasion to visit many thousands of suburban dwellings, and in almost every case the design is such that if a fourth living area is desired on the ground floor it requires in effect turning an existing bedroom into a hallway to reach it. This is one of the fundamental challenges to the architectural profession and leads, of course, to planning the lot, the design and other factors. I think this would be high on the list and I put forward the suggestion that scholarships and bursaries be focused on trying to find a solution to that problem.

There are other obvious requirements, particularly concerning senior citizen housing which I mentioned before. In my view the ideal would be the erection of smaller units sprinkled among the suburban population rather than the large and in most cases more efficient units in institutions which have a tendency sometimes to identify the area and preclude the kind of social intercourse that is desired between the senior citizen and the younger people with younger families in those growing communities. Co-operative effort is clearly required here among Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and provincial and municipal planning boards. It is necessary that they be consulted on the necessity and requirement of this type of establishment.

The increase in the aid to the universities is another important matter. I was particularly impressed with the minister's description and the emphasis which had not occurred to me in the earlier discussions of this matter, that this indirectly is going to have a profound effect on making a university education available to more young men and women of modest means.

The question of the extension of the loans for sewer projects in Canada is so patently obvious and has been for so many years that it requires almost no comment at all except to register my own reaction to the response which has been forthcoming. It was certainly beyond my expectation at the time of the original legislation. I am sure that opinion was shared by many hon. members.

I was interested also, Mr. Chairman, recently to read remarks attributed to Mr. David Mansur and Mr. Fred Gardiner chairman of metro Toronto. In both instances the statements which I saw indicated that a greater degree of success is being encountered in clearing away some of the problems of red tape and delay in approving at various stages public housing projects in that city. These problems have been created in part, I suppose, as a result of the nature of the structure of metro. The most encouraging thing I have heard in recent times, however, is the fact that these difficulties are being surmounted and we can look forward to faster development of the many needed projects which are in the planning stage in metropolitan Toronto.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to go back to the sort of criticism we heard from both the hon. member for Timmins and the hon. member for Nipissing concerning the government's actions in the public and private sector, free enterprise, socialism and so on. It seems to me that this a quibbling sort of argument. Clearly, this government has demonstrated it stands ready to face its responsibilities in the housing field. The most encouraging factor is that the government has indicated again, by its actions, it is not prepared to stand idly by and watch slums fester and spread, as well as the other unfortunate aspects of housing, private and public, that have plagued this country for many years. This government has indicated by its actions that it is willing to step in and do the job that needs to be done.

Mr. Carter: I should like to take a minute to make an observation on the housing program with particular reference to the low rental housing. I understand that low rental housing is made available to people within a certain range of income and that in computing the family income the family allowance payments are included. This was brought to my attention this summer when a number of veterans exceeded the income bracket for two reasons. In one case the pension plus the earnings had put him over the ceiling and, in the other case, the ceiling had been exceeded by reason of the inclusion of the family allowance payment.

It seems to me that there is a principle here at which we would do well to take another look. It does not seem right to me that family allowance payments should be counted as income for the purposes of this act. Family allowance payments, as I understand them, are paid to the parents to insure the well being of the children; they are not meant to be used for housing or for general expenditures and should not be counted as part of the general family income. There is another side to this question because such action penalizes the large family. In other words, if there are two or three children in the family, the family can probably stay within the prescribed income bracket, but if the family consists of a large number of children then receipt of family allowance payments puts that family beyond the ceiling and they have to look for another home. Making eligibility dependent upon the number of children is a principle, I think, that deserves to be reconsidered and I would ask the minister to reconsider this policy of including family allowance payments in computing income under the National Housing Act.

Mr. Pugh: My only reason for rising this afternoon is the question asked by the hon. member for Nipissing of the hon. member for York-Scarborough. The question was, how many times has this government run out of national housing funds. In my opinion, that is a rather laughable question, in view of the whole history of National Housing Act operations. The hon. member for Nipissing has a very good background and a very good knowledge of housing. I am rather surprised that he should ask this question. Certainly, last year this government ran out of funds but only after having put forward $300 million for housing last year. Then, the government brought forward further funds and made it $500 million.

All I am asking hon. members to do is to compare this amount with the rather puny start made by the Liberal government in 1954 under this act. They made available a total of $150 million. As I say, last year we put forward $300 million, then added $500 million and now we are putting forward another $500 million. In my opinion, the laughable part of the whole situation is the fact that although the Liberals put forward $150 million in 1954, by 1957 only $100 million of these funds had been put into housing. The ridiculous part of this whole argument is that in 1957 the building of homes in Canada was at a standstill. What was the reason for this situation? The Liberal government brought in a true tight money policy. In other words, they upped the reserve from 8 per cent to 15 per cent and they stopped loans under the National Housing Act. This is the truth.

Look at your own constituency. In my constituency there were only one or two houses being built under the National Housing Act at that time. Ever since this party came into power we have been building more and more houses throughout the constituency. Under the present Conservative government policy, money has been made available, and that is all there is to it. Let us look at those figures again. Under the Liberals, $150 million were made available and only $100 million were allocated. Compare those figures with the figures for the present day. I believe about $2 billion—I may be wrong and it may be more—have been made available for housing.

The implication in my friend's question about running out is that this government could not look far enough ahead. We have looked ahead and we have provided funds at a time when they have been required for housing in Canada. We started the ball rolling in 1957 when we made money available, yet my friend would quibble with that. He says, why not leave it to private enterprise? Private enterprise was not willing to put up the money at the interest rate at which money was available under the National Housing Act. He said, where else could we have obtained the funds—

Mr. Garland: I wonder if I might rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman? I know the hon. member does not want to attribute to me something I did not say. I never said at any time, leave it to the private sector.

Mr. Pugh: I am only taking the inference which is so obvious from the words that have been spoken by my hon. friend so many times. It is not a question of leaving it to private interests. He says, "Why not let private interests do it?" However, in actual fact, as we all know, private interests were not willing to put up money at this rate. Even so, suppose they were willing to put it up at 6 per cent, 5½ per cent, 5 per cent, or even 6½ per cent, would not that money then have been used rather than recourse being had to C.M.H.C.? The answer to that question is that of course it would. But money from private interests was not available and now it is available.

One other remark made by my friend the hon. member for Nipissing was to the effect that we had no secondary mortgage funds available and that the government was not willing to step in. He says that this is a belated but good step. Of course it is. However, I might point out to my hon. friend that this is a Conservative government step. At the time after 1954 when things became a little bit rough in national housing, why in the world did not he and his government do what we have been doing, namely make funds available.

I do not want to prolong my speech by going into the many benefits that were provided since last year in the drawing up and the broadening of the act, making it available for so many other things such as sewerage. I wish to reiterate one thing which the hon. member for York-Scarborough mentioned, namely that under this act we are making funds available for university students. We are broadening the whole field there. Under this building program more university students will be able to attend university, as has been pointed out, at a lower rate. That is all to the good.

May I close with one small point. In Okanagan and elsewhere in my riding we have had a great many requests for loans to be made for the boarding house type of senior citizens housing. To my mind this is one form of loan which the C.M.H.C. could go into readily. I have in mind the fact that in the town of Oliver and in the municipality of Summerland two very successful projects were started and that with respect to them the federal government had not put up any funds, simply because they are of the boarding house type of senior citizens housing. I have had today from the city of Kelowna a request that the matter be taken up again—I would ask the minister, perhaps when the bill is before the house, to comment on this matter—and asking that the act be opened up so that funds will be available for this type of housing. As I said, in my own riding I have seen well built, well run and certainly satisfactory houses of the boarding house type. I suggest to the minister that this type is perhaps better in Canada in many instances than is the single dwelling type or double dwelling type for which funds are available. I ask myself why funds are not available for senior citizens housing of the boarding house type. The answer, of course, is perfectly obvious. When funds are being put up on mortgage, those who put up the funds wish to be sure that in the event payments of principal and interest are not kept up, the housing will be available for another purpose or, to put it more bluntly, will be readily saleable. In other words you do not want to take over a dud. But in the case of senior citizens housing which, to all intents and purposes, is backed by local and provincial governments—where it is supported by the municipality and the funds are put up by these other two bodies—I would suggest that the federal government could go along with this type of housing and that a great deal of benefit could flow therefrom.

Mr. Matheson: As the most junior member of the opposition may I join in the cordial felicitations to the Prime Minister on this happy occasion of his birthday. I sincerely wish him a long and happy life crowded with pleasure and leisure.

I will not congratulate the minister on any particular phase of his program because such congratulations would tend to be repetitive of what he himself has said so enthusiastically. The hon. member for York-Scarborough has repeated almost each word of praise. However, I would say this to the minister. Even in the short time I have been in the house, I have become cognizant of the fact that he has been willing to redress little matters of grievance. I should therefore like to mention briefly, if I may, with respect it this legislation some matters to which I think it would be helpful for him to address himself.

Both the minister and the hon. member for York-Scarborough, as I understand it, live in Toronto. The type of riding I represent is very different from those which they represent. This summer I took some time to fly over my riding of Leeds and study it from the air. I could not fail to be impressed by the comparative congestion of the town of Brockville and the town of Gananoque with the relatively uncrowded villages. A village like Elgin, for example, which has an extremely fine school, could grow and develop with some sort of assistance. Lansdowne and Athens are two other places that could easily develop with adequate assistance. The town of Smiths Falls which spills into the riding of Leeds to the south must grow in that direction. These places are in my opinion, of the type that could be given some interested scrutiny by the minister.

A riding such as Leeds, which is half urban and half rural, compels certain comparisons. I have been made aware of the fact that our farm population has been declining for approximately 20 years. Not only is that the fact, but these very attractive villages which were to a certain extent the centre of culture some years ago and which were happy places in which to live, have declined in importance rather than grown. I would ask the minister to consider the extent to which this legislation could be made applicable to some of these areas on the fringe of our towns or even in the smaller areas.

My constituents have made me cognizant of the fact that federal housing assistance appears to be available to the town dweller but not to the country dweller and of the fact that in this regard there is marked disparity. It would be improper within the confines of this debate to spill over into the responsibilities, for example, of the Minister of Agriculture under the Farm Credit Act. However, I think it would be fair to say this. So much red tape is attendant upon getting farm loans that we must perhaps look to our Minister of Public Works for as liberal, broad and generous interpretation as is possible of the provisions of this act.

By people interested in housing and in construction, particularly in the Brockville area, it has been brought to my attention that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was at first brought into being to promote home building in areas that were unserviced and therefore not acceptable to insurance companies. It was for the purpose of issuing loans to individuals who perhaps could not qualify for insurance company loans. If I am in error in understanding the origins of this act, I am sure I will be corrected. However, in 1961 in the Kingston area we have seen a sharp change with respect to this approach. Now we find rulings which provide that no lot, unless it has services or is in a C.M.H.C. approved subdivision, is acceptable for a C.M.H.C. loan. This, to the thinking of some people very much interested in construction today, would appear to place C.M.H.C. in direct competition with the insurance companies, leaving the former field in which we understand C.M.H.C. was originally particularly interested with no one to look after it.

It seems almost as though in the C.M.H.C. Kingston area a circle has been drawn around a certain point in each town and at various distances out from the limits anyone beyond the perimeter is able to build on his land—for example, with septic systems, septic tanks and tank installations—but beyond that point this is not possible. I of course understand how the minister, whose program involves so many millions of dollars, is urgently concerned about orderly urban development. I can quite appreciate that lack of discipline and lack of orderly growth in this regard could be harmful and damaging. On the other hand I suggest to the minister that there are, particularly in a riding such as mine—which is on the river and extends to the north—many areas which have not been developed at all.

There are places such as Lyndhurst, Elgin, Morton, Delta, and so on, where the persons who live in those villages are for the most part employed in the towns. Many people work in Smiths Falls, Kingston or Brockville and there is not much difference between our countryfolk and our townsfolk. These are not farmers; they are people enjoying a sort of suburban life. Before the minister simply rejects this suggestion I ask him to consider the possibility of liberalizing to some extent the conditions and requirements of these loans. Every area of ground is different, as we know. There is the problem of sewerage. They are working toward improvement in Gananoque at the present time. I must speak appreciatively of this aspect of assistance to our urban areas.

The Minister of Finance has visited our area. On one occasion in Athens he spoke on behalf of the late Hayden Stanton regarding the requirement of municipalities for greater assistance. This extremely well attended meeting was held in 1957 and his promise of municipal assistance was well received by people who knew something about the burden of municipal financing in our county. I think our municipalities are in a somewhat worse condition today than they were when the Minister of Finance made those suggestions in respect of the assistance to be provided.

The matter of assistance with respect to sewage disposal is of vital importance to an area such as Gananoque. We have there a community of 5,000 people who at the present moment are embarking upon a sewerage plan which will probably cost them in the order of $605,000. Without assistance it will be quite impossible for them to carry out this project. It will mean an expense of $121 for every man, woman and child in that small town, which has suffered its share of unemployment in the past two years. I think federal assistance for sewerage development is vitally important.

I also put forward this other point which I hope the minister will appreciate. There are areas beyond and outside these congested areas of, say 5,000—areas with populations of 1,000 or 1,500—where it is quite possible that independent septic systems with sufficient acreage could be installed which would meet the support and approval of the minister with respect to development.

I know many people have bought lots hoping to build under N.H.A. plans. One may now find that his lot is one that is circumscribed by the mystical line that has been drawn by the representative in Kingston, and that he will be unable to receive the assistance for which he applies.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I feel it would only be fair to make one comment with respect to the remarks of the last speaker, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. I am sure he would not ask this committee to believe, after the recent careful scrutiny that was made of the Bank of Canada, and particularly the annual reports thereof for the years 1956 and 1957 that the liquid reserve ratio was raised from 8 per cent to 15 per cent by the former administration. I know this matter is irrelevant to the subject we are discussing, but I earnestly ask that the record be put right in this respect. There was no such policy on the part of the previous government, nor indeed was there at any time any enforced direction from the Bank of Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Parizeau: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to commend this government and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) for the resolution he just now introduced in the house. I was pleased to hear his explanations and, when the official critic of the opposition rose, I noticed that he was not as fiery and vigorous as in the past. He mentioned the fact that the further $500 million we wanted to put at the disposal of the Canadian people were added in view of an election. At that rate, Mr. Chairman, we have been on the eve of an election since 1957, because at that time, we set up a consolidated fund of about $250 million, which was later raised to $1,200,000,000; and today the minister asks us to increase it to $2 billion to promote housing projects in this country.

It is true that we rarely assess ourselves accurately, but, in the past, the former administration introduced some favourable legislation on the eve of an election, and you may be assured, Mr. Chairman, that this is not the case as far as we are concerned and that we shall continue this good policy to help the Canadian people and more particularly promote the building of homes.

Mr. Chairman, I am not an expert in the building field, but mere common sense makes me say that legislation introduced by the Conservative government for the welfare of the Canadian people certainly did have beneficial results in my riding. That is why I now want to compare a few figures, more particularly since 1958, to those of 1954-57. I could tell you for instance, Mr. Chairman, that from January to September of this year, 95 housing units went up at Alma, which has a population of 14,000, this means over $1,400,000 for housing, thanks to the beneficial policy of this government. This has, of course, some impact on the employment situation.

Last year, I heard some politicians claim that they would settle the unemployment problem by all sorts of means. But we, of the Conservative government, have each year taken steps to help the population and create increased employment opportunities.

Therefore, from 1957 to 1961, in the town of Alma alone, 346 dwelling units have been built through funds put at the disposal of the workers of my area. Considering the fact that the municipalities of Naudville and Isle Maligne have built more than 168 houses, I notice that for a population of about 22,000, more than 500 houses have been built with funds put at the disposal of the Canadian people.

And yet, from 1954 to 1957, merely 50 houses had been built under N.H.A. in my area.

Mr. Chairman, housing in my area has been increasing at a remarkable rate and I am proud to say that in Alma, 58 per cent of the citizens own their own homes today. I am of the opinion that this is an efficient means of fighting socialism, because when a man owns a house, he wants to protect what he has and is not likely to be taken in by all kinds of promises that he will be given this and that if he votes for such and such a party.

However, I bring to the minister's attention the fact that we need, in lake St. John, a branch of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, or, if it is impossible to obtain a branch, we should at least get an inspector for the period from May to October, because, as I said a moment ago, housing construction increases each year in the municipalities of Naudville, Isle Maligne, Alma and all around lake St. John. The absence of an inspector delays construction considerably, and the contractors are not always very happy about it.

I therefore, call the minister's attention to the fact that it is necessary to name an inspector or establish a subsidiary of the corporation at lake St. John for the period from May to October, so as to give satisfaction to our contractors and the new owners.

Mr. Chairman, I heartily support this resolution which seeks to increase the maximum set apart for direct loans by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

I also support the additional funds for housing research and community planning.

Each one of us wishes to improve his lot, and I am satisfied that with these monies, plans will be worked out for prettier and more comfortable houses in which our Canadian people will be happy to live, especially under a good government which promotes private enterprise and housing construction, thus creating employment.

As for the additional $100 million in loans for municipal sewage treatment projects, I am satisfied that the Department of Public Works will soon receive several requests from my area, and that this additional sum of a hundred million dollars will be very much appreciated.

(Text):

Mr. Speakman: I think the fact that the minister has brought in this resolution to amend the National Housing Act so as to make more funds available is in itself an indication that a need still exists. Certainly, no member of this committee would quarrel with the fact that, within a period of less than a year since last December when this legislation was previously amended so as to provide for university housing projects, it should be necessary to double the amount of money available. This only emphasizes the great need which existed in that area. When we find that the legislation brought in last December providing for assistance to municipalities in respect to sewerage projects has now to be amended so as to double the amount available, I think that sufficiently answers the question whether or not there was a need in that direction.

I wish to compliment the Department of Public Works and its minister on the fact that they have so greatly enlarged the degree of assistance given to communities whose population is less than 5,000. In my own community this assistance has led to its virtually doubling in size. Leduc, which is outside the international airport, has built this year nearly 100 homes, which represent about 25 per cent of its previous size. My own city of Wetaskiwin has had the largest percentage increase in building of any city in Alberta—an increase of 186 per cent. This, of course, is due in part to the fact that our population has increased as a result of a new Carnation milk plant coming into the city and also because of the fact that we shall be an alternate headquarters for the military establishment in Edmonton, as the Minister of National Defence announced the other day. Both in Ponoka and Rimbey there have been substantial increases in housing accommodation, and all this has happened just in the last couple of years since the act was broadened to include the smaller centres.

One thing I would urge on the minister and his department: I suggest they should seriously consider reserving a greater portion of these funds which are now being made available for the provision of smaller homes at lower cost. This would provide the lower income groups with more opportunities of buying homes than they have at the present time. These people, too, need houses but they cannot afford to buy the larger houses which now cost in the neighbourhood of $15,000. The family groups which can only afford the smaller houses need them very much, and I commend action on these lines to the minister and to the national housing authorities.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Walker thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-128, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATURAL RESOURCES

LEGISLATION RESPECTING ADMINISTRATION OF WESTERN SCHOOL LANDS

Hon. D. J. Walker (for the Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confirm certain agreements entered into between the government of Canada and the governments of the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, dated 13th July, 1961, 13th July, 1961, and 14th July, 1961, respectively, respecting the administration and control of natural resources in those provinces in order to vest those provinces with full power to administer and dispose of the school lands and the school land funds referred to in the said agreements.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Chown in the chair.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): The purpose of the bill to be founded upon this resolution is to secure parliamentary approval of agreements which have been entered into between the government of Canada and the governments of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. These agreements were laid on the table of the house on the 15th of this month by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Halpenny) and they appear as schedules to the bill. If approved by parliament and by the legislatures of the respective provinces, these agreements will have the effect of terminating the legislative control of the parliament of Canada over the school lands and school lands funds of the three prairie provinces and placing the administration and disposal of those lands and funds within the sole competence of the respective legislatures of those provinces.

The committee may wish to have recalled some of the historical background of the school lands and school lands funds. Under the Dominion Lands Act of 1872, the parliament of Canada set aside two sections of land in each township in Manitoba and the then Northwest Territories as an endowment for education and in the consolidated Dominion Lands Act of 1879 set forth the manner in which this endowment was to be administered by the department of the interior. All sales were to be made by public auction after due advertisement, and at an upset price based upon the fair value of other unoccupied lands in the township. The terms of sale, which have subsequently been changed from time to time, were fixed in 1879 at one fifth in cash and the remainder in nine annual instalments with interest at 6 per cent. The principal arising from the sales was to be invested in dominion securities and the interest arising therefrom as well as the annual revenue from leases, hay permits, etc., on school lands were, after deducting the cost of management of the lands, to be paid annually to the governments of the province or territory within which such lands were situated. The moneys so paid were to be used by the province or territory to support public schools in such manner as the province or territory deemed expedient. In conformity with the above requirements, the government of Canada from 1883, the date of the first sale of school lands, until 1930, when the school lands and school lands funds were transferred to the jurisdiction of the provinces in the natural resources settlement of that year, administered the school lands and school lands funds.

In the agreements which constituted the 1930 natural resources settlement, the three provinces undertook to administer the school lands and the school lands fund they acquired in the settlement, according to the provisions of sections 37 to 40 of the Dominion Lands Act, being chapter 113 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. This provision of the natural resources agreements meant that while the provinces had assumed the administration of their school lands and associated funds, the principles on which those lands and funds were to be administered were not to change. The provinces were required to invest the principal from the sale of school lands in a school lands fund and invest the moneys of the fund in securities of Canada.

There have over the years been various representations from one or more of the prairie provinces to have the provisions of the natural resources transfer agreements of 1930 dealing with school lands and the school lands funds amended. As the result of such representations the natural resources transfer agreement with Saskatchewan was amended in 1948 and in 1951 the transfer agreements with each of the three provinces was amended. The 1948 amendment allowed Saskatchewan to sell school lands to veterans under provisions of the Veterans' Land Act without conforming to the requirement that school lands must only be sold at public auction. The 1951 amendment gave the provinces more latitude as to the securities in which the school lands funds might be invested. The definition of acceptable securities was broadened to include, in addition to securities of Canada, securities of any province, or securities of a municipal corporation or school districts within the province together with securities guaranteed by Canada or a province.

There have been since that time various representations from the prairie provinces that all federal legislative control over their school lands and school lands funds should be removed and the legislatures of the provinces given sole jurisdiction as to the manner of administration or disposal of the lands and the funds. It has been argued that the revenues provided from the school lands are now small in relation to total expenditures on education so that it can scarcely be contended that the maintenance of the funds assures adequate revenues for education.

I have in my hand a brief table relating to school lands funds setting forth the size of funds, expressed in thousands of dollars, the unsold lands, expressed in millions of acres, and the revenues from school lands and school lands funds expressed in thousands of dollars. I seek the unanimous consent of the committee to have this inserted in Hansard at this point.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the parliamentary secretary leave of the committee to have the table printed at this point in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editors note: The table above referred to is as follows:]

SCHOOL LANDS FUNDS

Size of Funds
(in thousands of dollars)

	Manitoba	Saskatchewan	Alberta
1930-31	$5,920	$17,809	$ 9,565
1945-46	6,146	23,696	11,836
1959-60	7,412	35,743	16,937

Unsold Lands
(in millions of acres)

	Manitoba	Saskatchewan	Alberta
1930-31	7.6	5.9	6.6
1959-60	7.4	2.3	6.2

Revenues from School Lands and School Lands Funds
(in thousands of dollars)

	Manitoba	Saskatchewan	Alberta
1945-46	$293	$1,369	$ 740
1950-60	$600 (est.)	$2,214	$5,660[1]

[1] Includes

Interest on investments		$ 366,468.10
Fees and rentals	$2,126,506.60
Royalties	1,980,750.93
Sale of Crown reserve leases	1,181,349.17
Miscellaneous	5,412.04	$5,294,018.74

The situation today is this. The revenues from school lands as a percentage of provincial expenditure on education declined in Manitoba from 9.5 per cent in 1945-46 to 3.5 per cent in 1957-58. In Saskatchewan, the revenues from school lands were 21.9 per cent of educational expenditures in 1945-46 and 14.2 per cent in 1958-59. In Alberta, the school lands revenues constituted 12.9 per cent of educational expenditures in 1945-46 and 8.8 per cent in 1958-59.

The provinces have also contended that the retention of federal control over the use of the school lands and school lands funds in the three prairie provinces infringes upon their autonomy and that the existence of this legislative control involves unnecessary administrative work and impairs the financial flexibility of the provinces concerned. In the belief that the arguments advanced by the provinces were reasonable and in the desire to co-operate with the prairie provinces in this matter, the Prime Minister at the dominion-provincial conference of February 1961, suggested that the governments of Canada, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta should enter into an agreement to confer on those provinces complete authority over their school lands and their school lands funds. The provinces were agreeable to such an arrangement and agreements to this effect have been entered into by the governments concerned. The house will be asked by the bill to be founded upon this resolution to approve on behalf of Canada the agreements entered into with the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The agreements as I said will become effective when they have also been approved by the legislatures of the provinces concerned.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, as the parliamentary secretary has indicated we are discussing an amendment to section 7 of the basic agreement between the federal government and the three prairie provinces entered into in 1930, removing any suggestion that these funds are to be regarded as trust funds and specially segregated and under special rules in so far as income therefrom is concerned in the hands of the provincial governments.

I do not think the amendment to the original agreement that will likely appear in the bill will prove to be nearly as controversial or delaying in debate as was the original amendment introduced by the Mackenzie King government in 1930.

At that time the opposition of the day suggested that, notwithstanding that the agreement seemed to eliminate a long standing controversy and sense of grievance that existed in the prairie provinces because they did not appear to be on a similar basis as were the other provinces of Canada with respect to their natural resources under section 109, I believe, of the original British North America Act of 1867, and quite apart from any infringement of autonomy with respect to school lands, there were none the less other infringements of autonomy unlike the conditions that applied with respect to the natural resources of the older provinces. It was suggested that the federal government retained certain rights with respect to lands in which it had made investments for national parks, including mineral rights with respect thereto. Certain suggestions were made to the effect that there were also some restrictions on the prairie provinces with respect to water development unlike the situation in the older provinces. There was also the suggestion that by the retention of some federal rights with respect to lands that had already been designated as Indian reserves, the amendment of 1930 was unsatisfactory.

I wonder whether, as a result of the recent negotiations with these provinces which result in the present amendments to the 1930 agreement, the prairie provinces have indicated that they seek changes in the areas I have outlined and in the area of control of national parks. Of course, if control were to be released they might also seek control with respect to expenditures in relation to those territories designated as parks. Perhaps this control would fall to the provinces ipso facto. I wonder whether a request was made for control of mineral rights in the parks and whether there were negotiations with respect to lands designated as Indian reserves. In any event, we on this side have no quarrel with the proposed bill. It will leave the provinces unfettered. I take it that at the moment the control is largely in the segregation of revenues from those sources and certain stipulations as to the form of investment of those revenues. We have no quarrel with that. The requirements of the long standing Dominion Lands Act will no longer prevail. I think the parliamentary secretary indicated that the pertinent sections of the Dominion Lands Act which will no longer prevail are sections 34 to 40. As I read the agreement, which was tabled last Friday, I take it that it involves section 37.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Sections 37 to 40.

Mr. Benidickson: Inclusive.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, one can be in this house for a number of years and yet always learn something. This afternoon I listened with interest to the historical background of those school lands of the three prairie provinces concerned, of their administration, of the sales and of the amendments to the original legislation to date given by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance.

We support this legislation. It seems to us that these agreements are the result of negotiation. They are a sensible arrangement; they are in accord with the spirit of the times and of the wishes of the provinces concerned.

Mr. Regnier: I should like to know whether this transfer of school lands would be subject to the performance by the province of Manitoba of its obligations under the Manitoba Act of 1870 or under the British North America Act of 1871. Section 6 of the latter act says:

> Except as provided by the third section of this act, it shall not be competent for the parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the last mentioned act of the said parliament, in so far as it relates to the province of Manitoba, or of any other act hereafter establishing new provinces in the said dominion, (e) subject always to the right of a legislature of the province of Manitoba to alter from time to time the provisions of any law respecting the qualification of electors and members of the legislative assembly, and to make laws respecting elections in the said province.

This shows that under the British North America Act of 1871 the province of Manitoba has no right to deal with school matters in that province in connection with the rights reserved by the act except subject to what is mentioned in the section I have just read. I take it that if there is any transfer of school lands to the province of Manitoba it should be made clear and understood that they are transferred subject to the performance by the province of its obligations under the British North America Act and the Manitoba Act of 1870.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Hon. Leon Balcer (for the Acting Minister of Finance) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-129, to amend certain agreements respecting the administration and control of natural resources in the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Since there is nothing controversial in the bill, I think we on this side would be disposed to proceed with the second reading at 7.30 o'clock, if copies of the bill were made available in the meantime so we could have a look at it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I would have to check with the law clerk. The bill has been printed but I am not certain as to its availability.

Mr. Pickersgill: If copies could be made available a few minutes before 7.30 o'clock we on our part would not object to going ahead with it.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house prepared to say that the bill be read a second time later this day or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Mr. Chevrier: Later this day.

Mr. Speaker: Later this day or at the next sitting of the house, depending on the state of the printing of the bill.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Hon. Leon Balcer (for the Acting Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-129, to amend certain agreements respecting the administration and control of natural resources in the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): As indicated earlier today at the resolution stage, this does not appear to be a controversial bill. It amends only one section of an act that was very important in 1930, as I know because I was a resident of Manitoba in 1930. This act was introduced, then, by the Mackenzie King government. I recall that at that time one of the sections of the bill before us was objected to at great length, and the objections covered many pages of Hansard, by some of the most eminent lawyers we had at that time including the Hon. C. H. Cahan and the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. I refer to the argument to the effect that parliament should not be presented with a bill after an agreement which more or less tied its hands had been signed.

However, in this case the tying of hands does not appear to me to be any more important today than it was at that time. It was the essence of the agreement that was important then, as it is now. I quite agree with the presentation of the parliamentary secretary to the effect that the provinces should be unfettered with respect to jurisdiction over revenues that might derive from crown lands that were transferred to them, so that they would be on an equivalent basis with the older provinces of Canada which form the confederation about which we were talking this afternoon when we were thinking about our centenary year.

I do notice, however, Mr. Speaker, that the schedules to the bill, if you will permit me to refer to them now rather than later, are signed on behalf of the government in all instances I think by one who identifies himself as Walt. Dinsdale. I might ask, why not Wally? I might perhaps indicate that another eminent gentlemen who used the term "Walt", and I refer to Mr. Whitman, said at one time, "My rendezvous is certain; it is appointed." I think the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Dinsdale) might think there was some significance in that. However, I am sure that he would not agree with another quotation from one who was ultimately known as "Walt" when he said, "And nothing, not God, is greater to one than oneself."

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Chown in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Schedules A, B and C agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time; now?

Mr. Pickersgill: Now, by leave.

Mr. Balcer moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CONSTRUCTION OF LINE TO GREAT SLAVE LAKE

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-126, respecting the construction of a line of railway in the province of Alberta and in the Northwest Territories by Canadian National Railway Company from a point at or near Grimshaw, in the province of Alberta, in a northerly direction to Great Slave lake, in the northwest territories.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which we now have before us is an important and long awaited step in the development of the north, but more particularly in that portion of the Northwest Territories tributary to Great Slave lake.

Authority is being sought to enable the Canadian National Railways to build a branch line from Grimshaw, Alberta, to Great Slave lake, Northwest Territories, a distance of approximately 438 miles, under which the government will advance to the company the funds required for the construction of the line but not exceeding $86,250,000. This sum represents a preliminary estimate of the cost of construction of $75 million plus 15 per cent for contingencies.

As hon. members know, a survey of the route is in progress and is expected to be completed by the end of the year. Only then will it be possible to make a detailed and realistic estimate of costs. If it should develop that unforeseen construction difficulties should increase the costs beyond those presently estimated, then additional funds would have to be provided.

It is over 30 years since the settlers north of Grimshaw were promised an immediate extension of the Northern Alberta Railway to the northern boundary of Alberta. However, little serious interest was shown in the matter until 1954, when the existence of a major zinc-lead ore body at Pine Point was confirmed.

Following this development there were repeated intermittent discussions between the federal government and Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company regarding the need for a railway to Great Slave lake. The royal commission on Canada's economic prospects also received representations in 1955 and 1956 on behalf of the Northwest Territories which emphasized the need for such a railway, but the commission dealt with the matter in a general and indefinite way.

The throne speech of May 1958, included the statement that in order to promote national development on the frontier in the north, parliament would be asked to authorize the construction of a railway to Great Slave lake. A wide divergence of opinion immediately developed as to the route which should be followed by the proposed railway and a royal commission was appointed in June 1959, to inquire into the matter and to report to parliament. The report of the commission became available in July 1960, with the majority opinion favouring the western route from Grimshaw. In keeping with this opinion it was announced in November 1960, in the speech from the throne, that a detailed survey of the western route would be undertaken; and in December 1960, when $250,000 was appropriated to start the survey, I stated in the house that a railway would be built on this route after the completion of the survey. In February 1961, I further stated that, because of the distance involved, the proposed line could not be self supporting from the start so that some form of governmental subvention would be necessary.

The proposed railway extension from Grimshaw will follow a route paralleling the Mackenzie highway and terminating at the port of Hay River. A spur line from the vicinity of Alexander Falls, some 25 miles south of Hay River, will serve the needs of Pine Point mine. Some might ask "Why build a railway when a highway is available", the suggestion being that the Pine Point mine might be brought into production on the basis of trucking. That possibility has been explored and we are satisfied that rail transport offers the more economical means of bringing the property into production as well as furthering the development of the north.

Construction of the railway line will bring about major new construction projects, namely a $21 million mining camp at Pine Point; a $16 million expansion of the plant of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company at Trail, B.C; a $2 million community development at Pine Point; and some $5 million for new railway equipment and rehabilitation of existing railways. The total capital expenditure involved, including the $75 million estimated cost for the new line, will thus total about $120 million.

The operation of Pine Point mines will result in the annual production and shipment of some 215,000 tons of lead and zinc concentrates. As I indicated at the resolution stage, if the Pine Point operation was not undertaken, the Canadian economy would be adversely affected not only by the substantial loss in employment but by the necessity of importing foreign concentrates at a cost of about $13 million annually to maintain the output of the Trail plants. Moreover, under these circumstances, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company would not expand its plant at Trail so that additional export business from the sale of metal amounting to about $6 million per year would not be obtained.

While the Pine Point mining operations would be the most important immediate development resulting from the construction of the proposed railway, other important benefits would also be realized. I outlined some of them at the resolution stage, namely provision of service to some 8,000 people living north of Grimshaw; provision of service to existing industries such as commercial fishing on Great Slave lake and gold mining at Yellowknife; stimulation of agricultural expansion in some 6 million acres of arable land adjacent to the railway; stimulation of forest industries based on some 13 million acres of adjacent forest lands; and stimulation of mineral exploration. In other words, the proposed railway would be somewhat different from most branch lines constructed in recent years which were designed to service one mine or a group of mines. Its purpose, in fact, is to open up a whole new region.

The Great Slave lake railway will therefore be for the general development of the north. A substantial freight movement will immediately be generated by the operation of Pine Point Mines Limited. It is estimated that this movement will result in total revenues of some $5 million annually from the shipment of concentrates southward from Pine Point and the shipment of supplies north to Pine Point. The portion of this revenue accruing to the new section of the line would be about $1,700,000 annually. In addition, the report of the royal commission on the Great Slave lake railway estimates that existing business in the area would provide a further $1,200,000 annually. Total revenues available to the new section of the line would thus approximate $2,900,000 per year.

Thus a considerable traffic will be carried over the line although not all of this can be expected to accrue immediately. For this reason we felt that some financial assistance from the mining company was required in view of the indispensability of the railway to the new mining development at Pine Point.

I am happy to state that it has been possible to reach an agreement with the companies concerned, namely Consolidated Mining and Smelting and its subsidiary, Pine Point Mines, respecting the amount of assistance to be extended by the companies and the conditions under which it is to be payable.

I should like to review the principal terms briefly. To provide sufficient flexibility in the discharging of the agreement provision has been made for varying rates of production at the mine and for varying levels of earnings of the railway, and the over-all results are averaged out over the period of the agreement.

The basic terms are:

(1) The railway is to be completed on or before December 31, 1966.

Mr. Benidickson: Nineteen sixty six?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, 1966.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, my.

Mr. Balcer: Continuing the basic terms, they are:

(2) The mine is to be in production on or before the same date.

(3) The mining company is to pay a rate of $7.75 per ton on all ores or concentrates shipped up to 215,000 tons annually for the first 10 years of operation. Normal rates which are less than $7.75 per ton will be paid on traffic in excess of 215,000 tons in any year provided the cumulative shipments in previous years have averaged 215,000 tons or more annually.

(4) In addition, the mining company will pay a special transportation charge, based on the value of the concentrates shipped, starting three years after the commencement of production and extending for 10 years. This will not exceed $2 million in any year and $20 million over the whole 10-year period. At the anticipated rate of production and at the average lead and zinc prices prevailing during the period 1951 to 1960 this contribution would aggregate $12,500,000 over the 10 years. This amount is to be payable to the railway, which will in turn pay it to the government. It constitutes a capital contribution of the mining company toward the building of the railway.

(5) There are additional terms in the agreement which provide for the handling of current deficiencies or surpluses in the level of railway revenues during the 10-year period and safeguard the position of Canadian National Railways so that any reduction in the volume of mine traffic will not result in an operating deficit to be borne by the railway. The railway undertakes that no other producers of ores or concentrates on its line will receive any more favourable terms than those accorded Pine Point Mines.

The agreement also provides for the routing of the ores and concentrates traffic between Pine Point Mines and Tadanac, British Columbia, and the west coast so that each of the participating carriers will receive an equitable share of the traffic.

In summary, the advantages of constructing the proposed railway are very great:

(1) It will implement an essential element of the government's announced program of northern development.

(2) It will have a pronounced stimulating effect in all parts of the Mackenzie area.

(3) It will avoid the importation of zinc concentrates and effect a substantial saving in foreign exchange.

(4) It will bring about substantial employment, both in construction of the railway and in construction of the new mine at Pine Point, including the new community there, and expanded facilities at Trail, B.C. These projects will require about four years to complete and over that period employment for several hundred men will be provided.

In the light of all considerations the government believes the proposal is a sound one and I trust it will commend itself to all hon. members. When the bill has been given second reading I propose to move that it be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the interesting statement made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) in connection with the construction of this Pine Point line from Grimshaw to Great Slave lake. We on this side of the house support this bill, as I stated during the discussion at the resolution stage. We support it for many reasons. First, because—and I need not repeat what I said at that time, except in a very general way—it was the former administration that recommended the construction of this line together with a whole program for the development of the northern part of Canada to the royal commission on economic prospects in November, 1955. I dealt with some of the details of the brief which was presented to the commission on that date by Mr. R. J. Robertson, the commissioner of the Northwest Territories as he then was.

I think I also indicated at the time that we favoured the construction of this, a developmental line, because not only would it assist in moving strategic material from the area in the Great Slave lake, but it would also assist intermediate traffic between that point and Grimshaw and Edmonton.

In the course of his statement a moment ago the minister added a number of very important reasons why parliament should approve the construction of this line. However, I hope the minister will not feel that the criticism I intend to make now is criticism againt the principle of this measure. Rather it is criticism of the manner in which the government has proceeded.

We think, sir, the government has put the cart before the horse in this case and that this is an example of another Columbia river project. In other words, that long before the agreement among the four parties, namely Her Majesty, Canadian National Railways, Consolidated Mining and Smelting and Pine Point Mines was signed, executed and completed, parliament was asked to deal with this measure first by way of resolution and then by way of a bill.

On July 1 I put the following question to the Prime Minister:

> Could I ask the Prime Minister whether the agreement referred to in the resolution which appeared on the order paper yesterday among the Canadian National Railways, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada and the Pine Point Mines Limited has been negotiated and signed by the parties involved in this bill?

There was no answer from the Prime Minister although he was in his seat. Then I put this additional question:

> Surely the Prime Minister ought to be in a position to know whether the agreement has been negotiated, because I presume the bill was based on the agreement.

Then the Speaker intervened and I was not allowed to proceed further. On July 3 I put the following question to the minister:

> May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Has the agreement between Canadian National Railways, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and the Pine Point Mines Limited been completed? I refer to the agreement upon which the resolution which the minister introduced the other day was based. Are the negotiations concerning this agreement completed?

In reply to which the minister said:

> No, Mr. Speaker, negotiations are not completed. Discussions have been going on for a long time. All the major points have been cleared. There is only one minor matter that has still to be agreed on but it has nothing to do with the main principle of the agreement; it is only a detail and should be dealt with very shortly.

The record continues:

> Mr. Chevrier: I shall ask a supplementary question if I may. Does the minister intend to introduce the bill in the house for discussion and consideration even though the agreement is not completed?
> Mr. Balcer: The bill will be introduced when the government places it on the order paper.

Well, the bill was never placed on the order paper, as the minister knows. It was announced that second reading would take place and then when I asked the minister this morning whether or not an agreement had been executed and signed he said that it had not but he hoped it would be by the time the measure was referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

I say that this is not the proper way to proceed with a bill of this importance where the expenditure of a sum of $86 million or more may well be in contemplation—that will depend upon the survey which the minister said would be reported upon by the end of this year. It only goes to show that in matters of this importance there is confusion and disorder on the part of the members of the government.

An hon. Member: Only in your mind.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Edmonton West interrupted me by saying it is only in my mind. Well, in fact I have put on record the point that the agreement has not been signed even until this day, though we have had a resolution passed by the committee and now the house is being asked to pass this bill—another Columbia river project where the government is so anxious to be able to announce to the world that a great developmental project for natural resources has been executed but agreement with the province of British Columbia, the one concerned, has not been brought forward. Today the case is the same.

I want to say a word or two about the route. After four years the government has decided to follow the Grimshaw-Great Slave lake route. The minister himself told the sad story. Here is what he said: In 1958 here is what the government said in the speech from the throne: "Parliament will be asked to authorize the construction of the Pine Point railway". In 1959 a royal commission was established to select a route, to decide whether it should be the eastern route by way of Waterways or the western route through Grimshaw. In 1960 the report of the royal commission was available favouring the Grimshaw route. In 1961, the minister announced that the line would be self supporting.

The question I put to the minister is this: did not the officials of his department—I shall not accuse him, of course, because he was not the minister then—did not the officials of his department know that this was the best route to follow long before the speech from the throne of 1958 was prepared? Is there no evidence in the files of the department to indicate that the Grimshaw route was the one favoured by the authorities in the department? I think parliament is entitled to know that. If that is the case, why did the government wait four years before bringing about this legislation when it had in its files a recommendation, so I understand—if I am wrong the minister will correct me—to the effect that the Grimshaw route was more suitable from the point of view of terrain and should be followed? None the less there has been all this delay because, we are informed, the government favoured the Waterways route and hoped and expected that the royal commission would report unanimously or at least in the majority in favour of the Waterways route. I think the house is entitled to get some clarification on that point from the minister.

Then I think we should hear something about the cost. Is there anything in the files of the department to indicate what the cost of this project was going to be when the government took office in 1957? I think we should be told. The information which has been brought to my attention is that the line would have cost between $50 million and $55 million. If this is the case, the house is entitled to an explanation of why there has been an increase to $86 million.

Then we are entitled to know whether the taxpayers of Canada will get their capital back. Is this line going to be economic in the light of the traffic which will move from the mines and the intermediate points? Then again, where will the traffic go after it reaches Edmonton; how will it be divided between the railways?

Of course, the minister has outlined in some detail what is contained in the agreement but does he not think we should be shown the agreement before we dispose of a matter of this importance? After all, I am sure the minister is anxious to get this legislation through. This is good legislation in principle. He should give the house all the information available so that the opposition may be in possession of the same information as he has in order to be able to pass judgment on whether the agreement is one which is beneficial to the crown interests and those of the taxpayer. The only way in which we can decide this is by perusal of the agreement. How will this payment of $20 million to which the minister referred work out? How much of the traffic represented by the payment of $20 million will go towards operating costs and the maintenance of the line? I am informed that this is a matter of some consequence in the bill. I think the only manner in which these questions can be disposed of satisfactorily is by production of the agreement now, not in a week's time, so that we may be able to discuss this matter intelligently when it is referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

I do not wish to delay the house. Because of what is contained in the representations made by the Northwest Territories council to the royal commission on economic prospects in 1955 it is the position of the opposition that a railway from Grimshaw to Pine Point is essential if the base metal deposits in the Great Slave lake area are to be developed. Also, a railway constructed to serve the Pine Point area would extend transportation benefits to the whole of the Mackenzie river basin and would bring rail service to an area in that part of the country capable of agricultural development. What that agricultural development is, I am not in a position to say at this time. I know, however, that repeatedly that development has been discussed in the house every time there was a question raised concerning construction of a railway in that part of the country.

I conclude simply by saying that as on the resolution so also on this bill we favour the construction of this line. We hope it will be possible for the minister to produce the agreement so we can decide for ourselves whether the capital invested will be for the general good of Canada and for the good of the taxpayer as well. I trust that the minister will find it possible not only to answer the objections I raised earlier but also to produce the agreement.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as I said when speaking to the resolution we support the principle of the bill because it provides for transportation that will serve the settlers in this area as well as meet the needs of the present development there. Without doubt it will also promote further development. However, it is quite obvious that the possibility of the construction of the railroad is based almost entirely upon the Pine Point development and its stability and future.

Before proceeding with my remarks in that connection I wish to bring to the attention of the house the fact that we have here another instance of the Canadian Pacific Railway failing to assume its responsibility. It refuses to build a railroad to its own mine. That is a matter of fact. Pine Point Mines Limited is owned by Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited and the C.P.R. is the major owner of Consolidated Mining and Smelting.

Like the previous speaker I express regret at the fact that the house is being asked to deal with this legislation without a copy of a completed and signed agreement. We are dealing with it with the feeling that there are uncertainties of which we would not have knowledge at this time with respect to this agreement.

I have followed this development with a great deal of interest because I represent a constituency in which Consolidated Mining and Smelting is the largest industrial operation. I am always interested in their activities both industrial and otherwise. I have had much correspondence with mining engineers and have held conversations with engineers connected with mines in the Kootenays, and so on that account I have amassed a considerable amount of information on the subject. I shall deal with only one aspect of the proposal this evening. The construction of this line is based almost entirely on the stability and future of Pine Point Mines Limited.

I have in my hand an extract from the May 1954 Canadian Mining Journal which I wish to place on the record. I always tend to cock an eye with respect to mining prospects. I have lived in mining country all my life. I have noticed an inclination on the part of those engaged in this industry to be too optimistic with respect to future development. I shall quote a few extracts from various sources to indicate the variation in the estimates of the ore reserves connected with Pine Point Mines Limited.

The journal to which I referred points out:

> Thus the tonnage of indicated ore has been expanded from the 500,000 tons reported in 1930 to several million tons. This testing has been concentrated in the shallower eastern part of the property, and as a result about two thirds of the indicated ore can be mined by open pit methods.

I turn now to the 1960 issue of the Canadian Mines Handbook which refers to the fact that churn drilling at Pine Point Mines Limited has outlined several million tons of ore of which approximately 50 per cent is minable by open pit methods.

I deal now with a report published by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources entitled "Known Mineralized Areas and Mining Development—Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories" prepared by K. J. Christie, B.Sc., P.Eng. head, mining section, resources division, northern administration branch, in which he has the following to say:

> Some of the world's largest deposits of lead and zinc have been found in this type of deposit and it would appear that Pine Point is not an exception. Although the company does not state the amount of ore reserves, the generally accepted figure is in excess of 10 million tons.

He then goes on to deal with the possibilities for the development of this ore.

The Financial Post of April 4, 1960 carried an article entitled "Push Railways to Catch Vote". That is a rather unkind implication, is it not? In this article I read:

> The Pine Point deposit contains 5 million tons of 7.4 per cent zinc ore which could be mined on an open pit basis and milled on the spot for Cominco Trail, B.C., smelter.

I turn now to the report of the annual meeting of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada held on April 28, 1960 at Montreal, in which is contained the address to shareholders of the president, Mr. W. S. Kirkpatrick. Mr. Kirkpatrick had this to say:

> At the annual meeting in 1940 Sir Edward Beatty, then chairman of the company, remarked that ore reserves at the Sullivan were sufficient for well over 20 years of operation at the existing rate of production. The same statement can be made today after 20 years of continuous production at rates between 2 and 3 million tons of ore per year.

He went on to say:

> Therefore, while operation at the present rate of 2½ million tons annually is assured for many years, it would not be sound practice to attempt to satisfy our full smelter capacity by increasing the output from the Sullivan... The most important result has been the Pine Point discovery at Great Slave lake where work completed in 1954 indicates reserves of the same general order as those at the Sullivan.

I come now to the address of Mr. Kirkpatrick to the annual meeting of the shareholders which was held on April 27, 1961, in which he says:

Canadian National Railways

In my address last year I touched on the subject of ore reserves, and I wish to discuss this further today.

This is an interesting point:

It has not been the practice of the company to report ore reserves in terms of tons and grade because we feel that such information is commonly misinterpreted.

While our mining plan sets out our program for the next 25 years, this does not define the extent of Sullivan ore reserves, and I can assure you that the mine is good for many decades at the present rate of output.

Anyway, here is a company indicating that it does not report its ore reserves in terms of tons and grade. I just make that point at the present time.

This is part of an article which appeared in Collier's magazine for August 9, 1952:

Just across the lake at Pine Point, Consolidated Mining and Smelting is sinking an exploratory shaft this year into what is believed to be the world's largest body of lead and zinc. Diamond drilling indicates that the ore is a 200 foot chunk, almost flat, and parallels the surface over an area 20 miles long and two miles wide.

It goes on with further details. In Maclean's magazine of March 31, 1956, we find this article in connection with this subject:

There seems to be no shortage of future Canadian economic milestones. One of the world's largest lead-zinc deposits has been outlined at Pine Point, on the south shore of Great Slave lake. The ore body is reported to be 36 miles long, three miles wide and up to 100 feet thick.

In Maclean's magazine of November 15, 1954, there is an article dealing with the same subject in which the following appears:

The ore bodies run for 36 miles in a three mile strip. The most conservative figure places the potential at 120 million tons.

I come to an address by Mr. R. H. Dean of Nesbitt, Thompson and Company Limited, in which he deals with this question as follows:

Extension of rail some 400 miles north to Great Slave lake has been recommended by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories to hasten mineral development, particularly at Pine Point, said to have in excess of 600 million tons of ore containing lead and zinc, and awaiting early development by private industry.

At the convention of the mining institute of Canada, held at Edmonton in 1958, Mr. R. H. Dean is reported to have told the convention that the deposit was "said to have in excess of 600 million tons". We find that attending the conference was Mr. W. G. Jewett, vice president of Cominco, in charge of mines. According to this report he did not question Mr. Dean's estimate.

I mention these various reports and these articles in periodicals, Mr. Speaker, to indicate what a wide variation there is in the assessment of the reserves at Pine Point. I trust that when this bill goes before the committee the officials of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys will have some accurate information to give the committee so that it will know it has a sound basis on which to support this bill so far as the stability of the future production of Pine Point Mines is concerned.

According to the bill, this could cost the public $86,250,000. Hon. members have to justify that expenditure of public money. This matter should be very carefully considered by the committee. The officers of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys should be heard. They have the information because they have issued reports on this mine. The officers of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, and the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway should be heard. It would be a wise thing for the committee to invite representatives from the Canadian institute of mining, and other witnesses who wish to attend. It is essential that the committee have all the facts available when it is discussing this question.

As the previous speaker said, the committee and the house are entitled to know whether the mine is going to be profitable. If it is not, we should be frank and tell the public that it must expect to lose a certain amount of money each year for a number of years in order to promote this development and in order to relieve the Canadian Pacific Railway of a responsibility which in the first instance is theirs. Then, they should give the final details of this agreement; otherwise, as the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) said, we might be endorsing a sort of second Columbia treaty which we find is not quite what we expected it to be when it was brought to our attention in the house.

Another point the committee should inquire into is how is this $20 million going to be paid by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and the Pine Point Mines Limited. The committee should also be entitled to know whether the companies concerned are permitted to deduct expenditures made in this direction, or to include them as costs of operation and benefit from income tax deductions so that in the final analysis the country would never receive a very large percentage of the $20 million which may seem somewhat attractive in the bill at the present time.

There are numerous other details. This is an important matter. The committee has to give the bill very close study indeed so that when they return to their constituencies the members will be able to justify supporting this subsidy of possibly up to $86,250,000.

I have read some of these agreements with large companies in Canada and I can say quite truthfully that in Canada some large companies have received very large concessions from the government of Canada on information given to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that was proven not to be true, and we can prove it. I think we must have all these details explained in order to understand the situation, the possibilities for expansion and development, the costs involved, the costs of maintenance and the situation the Canadian National Railways is likely to face in the years ahead.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, after being in this house for some years it is still a matter of amazement to me to observe the way in which the opposition parties persist in beating their weary, wounded, bloody heads against the stone wall of facts. I expect this of the party which sits to your immediate left, Mr. Speaker. Politically speaking they have the kind of head which is designed by nature for pushing up against stone walls. I feel sorry for members of the official opposition who really should know better. On several occasions, either in the house or in committee, I have placed before hon. members incontrovertible facts which I suggest are not capable of successful contradiction and which members of the opposition have not attempted to contradict, to explain and set out in words of one syllable, which they should be able to understand, that any delay which has been caused to the bringing about of this great national project can be attributed entirely to their actions.

I was glad to note that the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) during the course of his remarks said he favoured the principle of this bill, but then he made a great number of exceptions. He referred to a four year delay. The memoranda to which he referred and which contained the brief filed by Mr. Robertson, the deputy minister of northern affairs in 1955 before the Gordon commission, did in truth say that they favoured the construction of this railway. The brief went on to make it manifestly clear that the route which was favoured was the western route. Attached to that brief was a map which outlined the route proposed to be followed, and it was similar to the one the present government now proposes.

However, it is my submission, and I have placed the facts on the record from time to time to prove this, that from that time on the feelings of the then government changed for some reason or other. I have never been able to ascertain the reason, but they decided to proceed with the construction, if at all, by the eastern route.

Mr. Benidickson: That is just in your mind, but it might be so.

Mr. Baldwin: I am prepared to show the hon. member at any time that these are the facts and they cannot be controverted. This was the view of the then government. They may have held that view through ignorance or they might have been interested in helping their friends. There might have been many reasons, but that was their intention. This was the situation when the present government came into office. The government, under the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), might have acted in an arbitrary and arrogant way. They might have said, we have certain records here and recommendations; we are going to build this railroad by the eastern or McMurray route. Instead of doing that, when it was brought to the attention of the members of the government that there was a logical and just reason for the construction of the western route, when it was made apparent that there were people who had a claim, in equity, to being considered, when the economics of construction and operation and of the potential traffic which might be generated were made plain, the government appointed a royal commission to consider the matter rather than have it debated in the partisan and heated atmosphere of this chamber.

Evidence was given by the various municipalities, private companies, private individuals and groups, and the hearings of that commission occupied a period of more than a year. Although the commission was set up in June, 1959, it was not until July, 1960 that a report was made. The government, as indicated by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer), then properly saw fit to accept the majority recommendations of that report and at the ensuing session of parliament included in the speech from the throne a statement to the effect that a location survey would be made. I believe effect was given to this intention some time in December. I recall going home to my constituency during the Christmas recess last year and finding that the people and equipment of the Canadian National Railways were then poised and ready, waiting for this house to pass the appropriation. They went to work at once and I believe the survey will be brought to a conclusion some time at the end of this year.

We have a proceeding in our profession known as estoppel. I suggest that the official opposition should be estopped from ever suggesting that any of this delay could be laid at the door of the existing government. They, and they alone must accept the responsibility.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some question has arisen as to the signing of the agreement. I think I can well leave that question to the minister, but I can make this remark. I think it was essential that there be a survey. I believe some consideration must be given to the question of costs, to the question of grades and the operating costs of this railroad. I believe that question will not be completely answered until the survey is completed. However, I am satisfied in my own mind that enough information is now available to permit the parties to have some idea of what those figures will be.

I believe the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) is entirely incorrect when he says that this railroad is being constructed entirely for the Pine Point developers. I will agree it is a fact that the existence of this large ore body at Pine Point ensures, as I have said before, the bread and butter costs of operating the railroad for the first few years. It might well be difficult to justify the immediate construction of the road without this ore body. However, I deny absolutely that it constitutes the entire reason for construction. The minister mentioned something about 8,000 people living north of Grimshaw. I think the census concluded this year will indicate that the number is nearer 18,000 or 20,000. These people are the descendents of those who settled here many, many years ago and who were promised that, in due course, a railroad would be provided for them.

As I have said, it might be difficult to justify the costs which are envisaged by this measure if it were for the convenience of these people alone. However, when we find there is a more cogent reason, when we find that there is another reason economically for the railroad being built, surely under those circumstances it would be improper and unjust to build the railroad without regard to the promise to these people that a railroad would be constructed in due course. I propose, if I have the time, to say something to indicate what the resources are in this area in addition to Pine Point. I am not exaggerating when I say that long after Pine Point is forgotten there will be in the area which is tributary to this railway, settlements consisting of hundreds of thousands of people producing goods, commodities and services bearing no relationship at all to the mining properties at Pine Point.

Pine Point itself, Mr. Speaker, is something of an anomaly. It is found, not in the pre-Cambrian shield where so many of the mining properties in Canada have been discovered, but in a sedimentary basin many miles to the west. Extraordinarily enough, it was discovered in 1898 by prospectors who were travelling into the Yukon. Attempts were made from time to time to delineate the area of this particular ore body, but it was not until the last 10 or 15 years when Consolidated Mining and Smelting, through its subsidiary Pine Point mines, continued studies and undertook the development and exploration work necessary that the ore body was delineated.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) made some reference to a speech made by Mr. Kirkpatrick, the president of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, in dealing with this particular mine. If he had read a little further—and I give him credit that he did not read one of the truly pertinent parts of this speech—I think he would have found there significant facts which answered any questions he asked. This is what Mr. Kirkpatrick said in his speech. It may possibly not be the same speech to which the hon. member referred. The speech I have is one made by Mr. Kirkpatrick before the Alberta and northwest chamber of mines and resources at Edmonton on January 13, 1961. Here is what Mr. Kirkpatrick said at that time:

> The first claims in the Pine Point area were staked in 1898 by miners on their way to the Klondike. This find lay dormant until about 1916 when more exploration work was done. There was renewed activity around 1920, but again nothing came of it. About 1928, interest in the area was revived, and a program of drilling and shaft sinking was undertaken, but when the depression came the project was abandoned. It was not until 1948, 50 years after the original staking, that my company initiated a systematic program of exploration under a three year concession. As a result of this work, new claims were staked, and in 1951, Pine Point Mines Limited was incorporated to continue the development. By the end of 1954, and after the expenditure of some $3 million, the existence of large reserves of zinc-lead ore was established. Grade and other conditions were satisfactory for a mining operation, and tests had demonstrated that high grade concentrates could be produced.
> As I indicated in my address to Cominco shareholders last April,—

That may well be the speech to which the hon. member referred.

> —the Sullivan mine at Kimberley, B.C. now provides about two third of Cominco's lead and zinc, and can continue to produce at this rate for several decades to come. However—

And this is what I want to emphasize to the house.

> —certain physical conditions in the mine limit the rate at which ore can be extracted, and we have been operating at the maximum economic limit for some years. Of course, in times of emergency, as during world war II, higher rates of production can be maintained for limited periods.
> Certain other sources of Cominco metal are becoming depleted, particularly a large stockpile of residue material which will be exhausted in 1962. In order that we may utilize the reserves of our various mines in the most economic manner, new sources of supply are needed both to maintain the present output of our reduction plants and to increase the output as required by expanding market opportunities.
> The initial rate of operation proposed at Pine Point would result in an increase in the output of refined metal from the Trail plants. In our opinion, it will be possible to dispose of this additional output by the time the mine can be brought into operation. For the more distant future, our long-term forecasts indicate that growing world consumption of lead and zinc will create growing opportunities for metal from Canadian mines.

Here may I interject that those who are familiar with the Paley report which is a projection of the material requirements of the North American continent made some years ago and projected to the end of 1975, and who have had the opportunity to study the reports or who have watched the progress made in the light of the Paley report, will agree with the statements which I think can be inferred from Mr. Kirkpatrick's address, namely that in the long term future lead and zinc from our country have a very considerable place in the world commodities market. Then Mr. Kirkpatrick goes on to say this:

However, it should be noted that, in view of the known resources of ore throughout the world, in relation to expected consumption, we do not anticipate a return to the peak metal prices obtained from time to time during the early 1950's . . .

To prepare for the proposed operations at Pine Point, and to extend the Trail plants to treat all resulting concentrates, will require direct investment by Pine Point Mines Limited and Cominco estimated to total in the order of $40 million.

That is very much along the lines mentioned by the minister. As the minister has intimated, by giving the analysis of the agreement, I do not think this large company is prepared to spend some $20 million for the railway and $40 million in development unless it has a fairly good assurance that it has a sufficient ore body there, that it requires the produce from the ore body at its Sullivan mine to make this a sound and economic operation, and not only for the purpose of enhancing to some extent existing operations but certainly to make sure that they are carried on in an economic way.

I personally do not hold any special brief for the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company or for Pine Point Mines nor am I opposed. Large commercial concerns must be expected, I suppose, as one of the by-products of our system but if kept within the bounds of propriety and good management, they must be accepted. But certainly this company, having expended this money, having opened up this property, having indicated its willingness to make these further expenditures, I think it is good business on the part of the government of Canada to make sure this is done by proceeding, as it has done, within the four corners of the bill.

Before I leave this matter there is one other subject I should like to discuss with regard to the Pine Point operation. I recognize the fact that at the present time it is probably essential that the operations of the mine should be limited to mining and the shipment of concentrates to Trail. However, I hope that in the not too distant future, after proper consideration has been given to the economics of transportation as regards the shipment of concentrates as opposed to the shipment of finished product from the smelter, this company itself might well give some consideration to the establishment of a smelter at Pine Point. This could mean a city of some 15,000 to 25,000 people. At a time when unfortunately we have lagged so far behind the Soviet union in its program of northern development, I would think it most desirable, wherever possible, that through a reasonable measure of decentralization we should work towards the establishment of concentrations of population in the north. If we are going to keep this north country of ours we shall have to make sure that it does not go by default. The establishment of such a smelter might have some effect in accelerating and expanding further explorations in the Northwest Territories so that mine operations which might have otherwise been uneconomical because of the necessity for the shipment of concentrates over a great distance, might well come over the borderline and become economic if there is a custom smelter at Pine Point. I make my submission at this time so that it may in the future receive some consideration.

I mention the fact that there were other aspects of this railway in addition to the mining operation at Pine Point. It was my pleasure to be home during the brief summer recess. Owing to the fact that my constituency covers almost a third of the province of Alberta, I was not able to get around as much as I should have liked. However, I made it a point to go to Pine Point, the Mackenzie highway and into Yellowknife, with particular regard to the impact the proposal to build this railroad was having and would have in the future on northern development. I found there a spirit of optimism. We in the north like to think we have more optimism than others. We like to think that we are the country of tomorrow more than is any other part of Canada. I found that spirit more prevalent today not only because of the wonderful crop we have had but because of the fact that the people of my country have now learned that there, at long last, is a government prepared to give effect to their aspirations and their logical and legitimate request, and which has decided firmly and irrevocably to proceed with this great project. I found up and down the Mackenzie highway evidence of new businesses which had come into existence, indications that new communities will spring up. Farmers who have existed for many years faced with the prospect of having to haul their produce hundreds of miles now see a railroad coming close to them. I spoke to one farmer who told me he went up there 35 years ago waiting for this railroad. Today the survey stakes pass within one half mile of his window. He told me that each day he walks out to examine these stakes. To him this is a dream come true, or a pledge redeemed.

This country offers a potential in agriculture far beyond what was ever conceived. I had an opportunity to speak to the management of one of the experimental farms in our area which has been conducting a most interesting innovation in connection with the provision of community pasture. Nobody yet knows what is the true potential acreage of agriculture in the area which will be tributary to this railway. The best figures I have been able to obtain coincide somewhat with those given by the minister, that there are somewhere between 6 million and 8 million acres of arable land, some 4 million to 5 million acres of what is called doubtful arable land, and some 15 million or 16 million acres of what is described as bush or woodland.

If this innovation which has been carried out by the experimental farm proves successful—and I saw evidence to indicate that it will be—then what I saw leads me to the firm conclusion that there is available in this district north of Grimshaw millions of acres of land which could provide summer pasturage for great herds of cattle. We have just passed through a very difficult period of drought in western Canada. In the light of the expanding population, in the light of the requirements of our people and of the peoples of other parts of the world, it is my firm belief that in the future the country which lies north of Grimshaw will, on the basis of the livestock population, provide an area of settlement and development for many, many thousands of farmers.

I suppose I may be accused of being naive and of making arguments which are farfetched, but when we hear talk at this time of many billions of dollars being expended in weapons of destruction I think it is a mark of courage, a mark of significance that our government is prepared at this time to pledge its belief in the future by this comparatively modest contribution. I say that because the contribution is modest in the light of the moneys which are being voted by other governments for purposes of destruction. It is a mark of courage and significance to open up this great area lying between Grimshaw and Great Slave lake so that the agricultural products, the products of the lakes and of the forests will be available to be devoted in the interests of peace when we have learned to adapt and fashion our methods of trade so that the unaligned nations will be the recipients of this produce.

I think it is significant that today when the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) had occasion to speak about the centennial, he made several observations which to me are quite important in relating to this particular bill. The Prime Minister referred to what happened during 1867 and shortly thereafter—the march to the west. I think it would be remarkably significant and related to our centennial observations if, when we come to observe them in 1967, we find we have come to the point where because of the march to the north we have added to Canada the equivalent of another vast empire of productivity. This railroad, I submit—and I think it will be shown—will be the catalyst which will bring it about. This will probably be one of the brightest jewels in the diadem of our centennial observations.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, this is not for me a local issue. It is a national issue because it involves progress on a level comparable to those large national developments which have concerned us in more recent days. I refer to the St. Lawrence seaway, the Cape Breton causeway, the Kitimat development, projects that are to be compared with those that concern Canada today in the Saskatchewan dam, and some other developments to which people in parliament have devoted their attention on a national basis.

I am prompted to make a few remarks tonight upon second reading of this bill because I talked within the last few days to one who had a very personal interest in it. I refer to our esteemed colleague, the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) who unfortunately is not able to be with us. He is one of those who wanted to see an advance of this kind develop post haste, without too much controversy perhaps as to route.

I felt that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) was always capable of making a very good speech. However, I must say I thought he spoke tonight with some embarrassment, and perhaps even humiliation, because I think the arguments of the opposition are valid when he considers the elements that contributed perhaps to his election and to the election of others in Alberta in 1957 and 1958. I say that because there has been delay and confusion in the policy of this government with respect to the development of this very important Canadian National Railways system for national development.

I do not need to refer to the campaign speeches the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Diefenbaker) made in 1957. It was clear then that he was not expecting any help from others in the development of the north. He said, "We will build a railway". As it turns out, after their stomping around the country, four and a half years later, as hon. members on the government side have reminded us, we are only now getting some suggestion through a legislative bill that authority is available for going forward with this railway. If we have any doubt about the forthrightness of this government, irrespective of election campaigns—

An hon. Member: You have no idea.

Mr. Benidickson: —let us look at their sincerity in speaking to parliament. I refer to the speech from the throne of May 12, 1958. This government talked about a royal commission. They were passing the buck. This government, enthused with the vote it had received from the Canadian electorate, said:

> In order to promote our national development on the frontier in the north you will be asked—

That is, we in parliament would be asked:

> —to authorize the construction of a railway to Great Slave lake. My ministers regard this as a major step in the establishment of productive industry on an economic basis in the Northwest Territories.

What was the economic climate at the time of the speech from the throne on May 12, 1958? It was the lowest it had been since the end of the second world war, though we have had it lower since under the Conservative regime. What has happened? After that great statement, after the endorsation which they received, we got, on December 20, another refresher, Oh, there were palliatives and aspirins given with respect to this in the meantime. On December 20, 1960, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) felt that he would emulate the great record of the late minister of trade and commerce, the Right Hon. Mr. Howe by putting forward certain proposals for economic advancement at the right time. And he said as reported on page 1023 of Hansard:

> We are also proposing to commence a number of specific major projects which will lay the groundwork for the resumption and acceleration of the long-term growth of our natural resource industries.

That was on December 20. That was after the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) had said in 1960 that we were just about to give this fillip to the economy. This was after the speech from the throne of 1958, part of which I have recited; and I have no hesitation in saying that this is a government of talkers, not of doers in the economic field. They are expert chiefly at procrastination and indecision with respect to economic matters.

In so far as this bill is concerned I should like to ask a question or two. What was there from the beginning to have prevented this government from asking the Canadian Pacific Railway which, I think, has ultimate ownership of the primary mining entity in the area, to build this line? To what extent did the government pursue that line of investigation? In the second place, I would ask: is this, as so many speakers up to now have described it, a subsidy, or is it a capital investment made on behalf of the people of Canada with the idea that it will be good for Canada and likely to pay off? My third question is: if this is a subsidy in the opinion of the government, why should the government not implement a policy of taking, in partnership with those others who contribute to the advancement of the economy, equity stock in the Pine Point railway? Everybody else who invests in such things aspires ultimately to some share of the capital stock. I should also like to know whether or not this so-called investment by the railroad—or is it the government?—includes concessions for freight rates which will ultimately be assessed against the railroad. I have experience of a natural resource development in my riding, a development of extreme importance, and I refer to Steep Rock Iron Mines. While the company did not, as I understand it, contribute directly to the capital investment involving improvements to the railway line, as a result of the traffic to be produced there was ultimately a moral obligation on the C.N.R. with respect to the rate per ton which would be charged by the government-owned railroad on the iron ore transported to the lakehead for distribution. I understand that arbitrarily the C.N.R. has increased that rate by 25 per cent. Is there anything of that kind involved here? I think the minister should give us some assurance as to the relationship between guaranteed tonnages, if any, and the capital investment which either the government or the C.N.R. are prepared to make with respect to this railway. I think it was significant for the minister to have said that in certain circumstances certain variations might occur in the future.

According to information I have received I believe there is a possible ore tonnage of 120 million tons involved in this development. I do not think the minister said anything to indicate what the economists of either the government or the C.N.R. consider to be a firm estimate. I am well aware that promoters of mining enterprises sometimes get a little excited, a little enthused as to the prospects of the property in which they are interested, and conscientiously enlarge their estimates of what they think the nearby or ultimate production will be. I have heard estimates that the ultimate production of this resource may be as much as $2½ billion. This amounts to between 17 and 20 per cent of our present national debt, so we are talking about something which is of very great importance.

But I come back to the question of timing, judgment and leadership. I say to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) who is not now in his place—

An hon. Member: He is over there.

Mr. Benidickson: I see him. I say to him that he cannot repeat himself too often. He cannot say to his electors that this is imminent and to be done at once when we hear tonight—and I questioned the minister about it—that completion of this enterprise which has been talked about so much on political platforms cannot be expected until 1966. I said "Oh," and the minister confirmed that it would not be completed until 1966. The hon. member for Peace River was interviewed by the Edmonton Journal on December 5, 1960. Of course, he forgot about the delay which had taken place. That statement in the speech from the throne did not suggest for a moment that any royal commission would be intervening. However, he said that we could expect completion of the railway within two years. That was in December, 1960. It is now almost December of the year 1961. While it was not mentioned by the Minister of Transport, before we proceed to pass this bill we and the people in the area concerned must have a more detailed estimate of progress not only in connection with the survey which parliament has already approved but with respect to final completion. The government has information from the company on its files as to its intentions with respect to completion of the mill and its readiness to have available traffic for the railway and the government which apparently, under this bill, is guaranteeing certain losses. That information must be given in committee before the bill is finally passed. This is of great consequence to the people who reside in this area.

The Minister of Transport, as a member of the government, is very respectful of northern mining. In my dealings with the mining fraternity I have found them to be generally very fair, extremely knowledgeable and—if you will permit me Mr. Speaker, —very conservative in their approval of activity in this parliament not only under the former but under the present administration.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

With respect to the Pine Point railway may I quote from an editorial which appeared in The Northern Miner of April 27, 1961:

> Consistency of word and deed is also imperative. We have a government which encourages the people at large to think that there is something shameful about foreigners, like Americans, developing our natural resources, and which has given mild verbal urgings to Canadians to do the developing themselves. Yet when an opportunity to have a big mining project like Pine Point developed 100 per cent with Canadian talent, money, and ownership, where is the government? Is it mired to the knees in the muskeg of indecision?
> Another point: the country could very well do with the extra employment that development of this new mine would provide. Why, then, wait any longer?

This article appeared in April, 1961 after this same publication had pointed out that in 1958, in the speech from the throne the government indicated there was to be no royal commission, no equivocation, that it was going forward just as had been suggested in the election campaigns of 1957 and 1958. Even this evening we are denied answers to the question "How soon will this railway be complete?" except that we might take the answer of the minister, 1966, after another election.

But what about the survey? Parliament has previously taken an attitude with respect to survey expenditures. How far toward completion is the survey? The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said that the idea of delay and confusion existed solely in the mind of the hon. member for Laurier who made an excellent speech. I am sure the people of northern Alberta will not welcome that kind of criticism from the hon. member for Edmonton West in reply to a speech made by the hon. member for Laurier who indicated the desire of this party to get on with this project which means so much to Canada as a whole and is equivalent to some of the projects that were undertaken on timely occasions by the previous government, to which projects I have already referred and which were undertaken at a time when unemployment required that kind of stimulus.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If it is possible for a humble backbencher to be misquoted, may I say that the quotation attributed to me to the effect that I said this railway would be built and completed within two years from December of 1960, is not a correct statement and is one I did not make.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I accept the hon. member's correction but I think both you and he will know that I have in my hand a photostatic copy of the Edmonton Journal of that date.

Mr. W. C. Henderson (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words with respect to the railroad leading to the north country. I did not blow in at the tail end of the storm as did my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who just addressed us. I know something about the north. I have lived there for over 40 years.

Mr. Benidickson: We refer to Kenora as northern Ontario.

Mr. Henderson: Just recently I flew over that part of the country where the proposed railway will be built. This is a part of a country that contains the world's largest deposits of that kind of mineral. These vast reserves await development. The proposed railway will serve the 8,000 people who now live in the area. If the refinery is constructed there will be a city there with a population of between 25,000 to 30,000. We need that type of development in the north.

The part of the country to which I am referring is not like this part of the country. That area is filled with opportunities for people to make fortunes. The same opportunity awaits the railway. It will be of real value. I am surprised that people like the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River should knock and buck a project of this nature which could lead to prosperity that would benefit the whole economy.

The north country is the richest land there is in Canada; there can be no argument about that. The area I referred to is adjacent to the Peace River country. In the Peace River country there exists the richest farmland in Canada. In the southern part there are 8,000 acres of arable land awaiting development by farmers who are not afraid to work.

I believe that the Pine Point railway is the key to the development of this area. The people there are waiting for it and I believe they will see it come into existence. It has taken this government, a government with a vision, to implement this project. The former government was too scared, and it just dreamed. This is a government that gets out and does what is necessary.

I do not intend to speak at further length because I know other hon. members wish to participate. My friend the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) really knows this part of the country and has laid it on the line. He has told the true story about this project and because I know of its value I am all for Pine Point railway. Thank you.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I think I could echo the words of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Indeed, I believe that every hon. member of the house would echo those words. We all are "all for the Pine Point railway", but some of us believe we also ought to consider the Canadian taxpayer.

It is a rather extraordinary thing for the minister to be asking for the approval, even in principle, of a bill when he admits that the survey on which the estimate will be made as to the cost of the railway has not yet been completed, and when it is perfectly obvious that after four years, notwithstanding the hyperbole of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Henderson), this government has no information on whether to jump into the water or keep its clothes on with respect to this railway, although it promised it four years ago. It does seem to me extraordinary that even after those four years of promises there is so little concrete evidence in what is before us. We do not know; the minister does not know what this railway is going to cost or even what the estimate will be if it is built.

The minister says that an agreement has been made with Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and its subsidiary and the Canadian National Railways to build this railway. He used a word which is not normally in my vocabulary. He said that it was finalized. Well, I suppose that means they are all agreed on it but we in parliament are not allowed to know what is in it. I cannot believe that there is any security of the state involved. There may be a good deal of security of the treasury involved in it but I do not think there is any security of the state involved in that sort of thing. Surely if this agreement has been made, if it is a firm agreement, we ought to know about it before we are asked to vote on this bill. If it is not a firm agreement we should not be approving this bill even in principle, because we are approving something that may be something quite different from what we think we are approving, as the government discovered when they rushed down to Washington and signed that treaty in the dying days of the Eisenhower administration when they thought they had the premier of British Columbia on the hook. We now find that someone else is on the hook. Nothing at all is going to happen for a very long time to come because of the bungling and mismanagement. There either has been bungling and mismanagement in this matter or there has not. We do not know because the government will not give us the facts. One cannot help suspecting, sir—and when you do not know all you can do is to suspect—that they do not know themselves, because surely if they did know they would be only too glad to tell the world that they had made a good agreement.

I am from Missouri, sir—

Mr. MacEwan: Moved again, eh.

Mr. Harkness: I thought it was Manitoba.

Mr. Pickersgill: —metaphorically speaking. I am also from Manitoba, where from the time the Tory government was defeated in 1915 until very recently we had the most prudent governments financially in that province, and perhaps that rubbed off a little bit on the rest of us. We who lived in Manitoba wanted to know what things were going to cost and what return we were going to get before we laid out our money.

Mr. Benidickson: That even included Mr. Bracken.

Mr. Pickersgill: One cannot help having the sneaking suspicion which was voiced by my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River that if this railway was really going to be as profitable as the hon. member from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Henderson) hope—and we all hope it will be—the C.P.R. which owns the biggest chunk of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, and therefore the biggest chunk of this new mine and is still in the railway business, would be in there with both feet. It would be in there trying to build the railway itself.

The minister ought to tell us why the C.P.R. is not doing it and why instead the treasury of Canada is going to be doing it, because the C.P.R. is supposed to be a great exponent of private enterprise, adopting the words which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) uses in a rhetorical sense but in no other sense that I have ever been able to discover. The Canadian Pacific is supposed to be a great exponent of private industry and a great opponent of public transportation concerns and very anxious to compete with them and push them aside, as we have seen recently, and the government has co-operated in that kind of effort in recent times.

Here is a great chance for the Canadian Pacific to go in and engage in private enterprise, develop its own resources and get the gravy of carrying this ore. Oh, I suppose it would not be a gravy train but at any rate if this—

Mr. Benidickson: A lead train.

Mr. Pickersgill: One fears that it is a lead train. We ought to know as nearly as one can predict what 20 years from now the balance sheet of this operation is going to look like. I think this is of great importance, sir, because the estimate of the cost that the minister has put in the bill amounts to $86 million and some odd. Well, I remember the greatest explosion that we have had in this parliament since I have observed it over the advancement of $80 million, all of which is going to come back to the treasury—this is as certain as anything in this world—with a very good rate of interest. This was the loan to the pipe line, to build a great enterprise which was going to cost four or five times that much and spread across the whole country. Here we are talking about $86 million of which up to $20 million may be recovered from this mine. Reading the language of the bill I say "May be".

Mr. Benidickson: Based on freight rates.

Mr. Pickersgill: Based on freight rates. We do not know at all what we are talking about in this measure.

Mr. Starr: Sit down, then.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, not so very long ago at a meeting of a committee which has reported, and therefore I think we can quote properly from its proceedings we were told we would know something about this. I refer to the committee on railways, air lines and shipping and the minutes of proceedings and evidence of June 20, I think it was. At any rate I can give the page number. I asked the president of the Canadian National Railways or the gentleman who from day to day continues as the president of the Canadian National Railways and who is treated in that disgraceful way by this government, this question:

> Could I ask Mr. Gordon a question at this point? Is there any provision here for the Pine Point railway?

I was referring to the planned expenditures for new works for this current year. Mr. Gordon replied:

> This is an item on contingent for branch lines. I will complete this later, Mr. Pickersgill, and I will pick it up in a moment.

This appears on page 380. Mr. Gordon went on to discuss something else and then he came back to this subject at page 381. Perhaps I should say I came back to it and said:

> I would like to ask Mr. Gordon with respect to the Pine Point railway. I recognize that has not yet been approved by parliament. Since there has been a $10 million amount put in the capital budget, I would assume that the C.N.R. has some policy about it. There is one point which troubles me very much. I understand that this line will connect with the line which the C.N.R. operates into Edmonton.
> Mr. Gordon: No, it will connect with the Northern Alberta railway. I have just been thinking on what I said about that $10 million. I may have left a mistaken impression. I do not mean by that that the C.N.R. necessarily is going to put up any money for the building of that line.

A little later on I went on to say:

> The point I am on is a quite different one. I understand the principal reason for the building of that line is to carry ore from the mine to the smelter at Trail. When that ore reaches Edmonton there will be a haul between Edmonton and Calgary—and assuming it goes that way—and I am being hypothetical about this, and if I am wrong I would like to be corrected and will not waste the time of the committee—

You will see, sir, that I am always very concerned not to waste time. I continue:

—between Edmonton and Calgary there are two alternative ways for shipping it, one by the old Grand Trunk Pacific line, and the other is by the C.P.R. I think it would be very helpful to us, in considering the legislation in the house, if we knew whether there was any understanding between the railways about how that ore will be shipped.

The Chairman: That resolution is before the house, is it not—the resolution is on the order paper now?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Gordon: I just wanted to confer—

Mr. Harkness: That is the best speech you made during that committee meeting.

Mr. Benidickson: You were not there.

Mr. Pickersgill: I continue quoting:

Mr. Gordon: I just wanted to confer with the minister, because this is a matter which is pending and I did not want to make the mistake of anticipating what may be said with regard to legislation. On the point you have in mind, it will be covered, as I understand it,—

I would ask the minister to recall these words.

—in an agreement which is now being negotiated between the company and the railway.

Mr. Pickersgill: I see.

Mr. Gordon: We hope that by the time the legislation reaches you, you will also be able to see that agreement.

Now, this is what Mr. Gordon said after conferring with the minister. Hon. members who were there will recall that he turned to the minister and they had a whispered conversation before he gave his answer. Then the report continues:

Mr. Pickersgill: I just wanted to be sure the C.N.R. had got a fair deal in this matter.

I think everybody in the house wants to be sure of that. We also want to be sure that the taxpayers of Canada, who not only pay Canadian National deficits but who will be expected to pay the interest on the money that is being used in the building of this line, know where they are going and whether or not there is going to be any real return commensurate with the cost.

Now, everybody agrees that there are times and circumstances when these capital expenditures by the state are necessary for development purposes and that the direct return from the line is not the only way in which there is a return to the taxpayers and to the nation. We all know that. We also know that in the history of this country over the last 125 or 130 years, the taxpayers' money has been put into railways which have returned nothing either to the investors, the taxpayers, or to the nation, comparable with what was put into them. I do think, sir, that in the dying days of this session there is no need to rush this bill through, especially when we do not know what the facts are. If the minister has the answers to all these questions that have been put by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and which I have endeavoured to sum up, and if the answers are clear, precise and certain, not based on a lot of hypotheses, a lot of ifs and buts and not based on the kind of agreement the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) thought they had with the premier of British Columbia before they signed that Columbia treaty, then we would like to have those answers. We would like to save the government from falling on its face again in this matter as it did in that. After all, it is the government of Canada and, although they might be our political opponents, we do not like to see them making themselves ridiculous as they have been recently over the Columbia and as it appears they may very easily do over this measure.

It does not seem to me, sir, that we would be delaying much. Heaven knows, there has been delay enough on this matter already as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River pointed out. No one wants to delay it any further, but we would like to get precise answers. If we cannot get precise answers and if we put through legislation to make a temporary impression upon the public, they are going to be disillusioned again. On the other hand, if we had a deal whereby Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company is going to get a railway company built to carry this ore on which they will make a profit while the taxpayers of Canada incur a steady and continuing loss, we should know about that before we vote on this proposal. It does seem to me there is something to be said for someone raising a voice in this house on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I must say at the start of my remarks that I am certainly surprised to hear this kind of attack from the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

Mr. Benidickson: About delay?

Mr. Balcer: No, about this agreement. During the time that these gentlemen were in power, not once did they produce any agreements between the Canadian National and any mining company or other company for which a branch line was being built. Practically for the first time in the history of this parliament, we are going to give to the committee the full agreement entered into by the Pine Point Mines, the Canadian National and the government of Canada. The committee has got to have everything in detail, the contract, the tables of the various freight rates that are going to be charged, the various undertakings by Pine Point Mines and the Canadian National.

Mr. Benidickson: Will we adjourn so we can read that?

Mr. Balcer: You will have that in the committee because this bill is going to be sent to committee. As I said this afternoon, the agreement will be in the hands of the committee; the experts will be there and all the members of that committee will be able to ask questions and to study the freight rates in edtail. This will be the first time this has detail. This will be the first time this has ever happened in the history of this parliament.

I know the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is trying to bring a cloud of secrecy into this debate, is trying to raise certain doubts about this bill. I believe the bill is absolutely clear. We have stated very clearly, through our officials, what this great undertaking is going to cost. My hon. friend says we should not bring the bill forward at this time, but that we should wait until the next session. He suggests we should wait until the survey is terminated and we know exactly how much it is going to cost. This is what he said a few minutes ago; but ten minutes before that his deskmate was blaming us because we had taken so long. They should get together in their criticisms. I think, Mr. Speaker, that in connection with this great undertaking the government has been acting with logic.

First of all, we made a decision that we should go ahead with the building of this railroad and that decision was announced in the speech from the throne. As I explained earlier we were being subjected to tremendous pressure from people who wanted this railroad to follow a certain route. There were extremely strong arguments being made on behalf of both groups. We even had the Alberta government receiving a report from a commission stating that the eastern route would be better, and so forth. The government did not want to impose anything on the people. We wanted to have a fair inquiry, and for that reason we appointed a royal commission. We had to wait for the royal commission to study the problem and recommend a route. As soon as this was done, the government acted and that is the reason this survey was started. The survey is going extremely well. We are going to have a final report in December. However, the government was not going to sit and wait for these engineers to complete the survey, and for that reason we introduced the bill, which follows the usual practice of setting an estimate for the cost of building this line. Of course this bill is different from the ordinary branch line bill. Of course it is for a different railway, in a different part of the country and for a different purpose. This is the kind of bill which makes provision for the development of the country. As my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate indicated, it might not be an economical undertaking or produce results in the first year or cover all the expenses in the first few years of operation. On the other hand I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will be accompanied by an agreement which will be based on the various stipulations contained in clause 6 which states the principles on which the agreement will be entered into and also the various conditions that will be required of the various parties to this agreement. These conditions are quite clear. The principles are set out. I think it will be a good deal for Canada and also a good deal for the Canadian National Railways.

A few moments ago my hon. friend asked where the traffic is going to be routed. Clause 6 paragraph (c) provides as follows:

> (c) for the routing, in a manner satisfactory to the company, of the railway traffic originating at or from the properties of Pine Point Mines Limited at Pine Point and moving by railway to any place or point beyond the southern terminal of the railway line, for the purpose of ensuring to the company—

That is the Canadian National Railway Company.

> —an equitable share of such traffic.

I can say now—and my hon. friend will see it in the agreement—that the traffic between Edmonton and Calgary will be carried exclusively on the C.N.R. lines. I therefore think it is absolutely unfair to say that this bill is giving certain advantages to the C.P.R. and that the government is giving some unfair advantage to the C.P.R. On the contrary, I can assure the house that the agreement that has been entered into is the result of extremely tough discussions between Cominco, Pine Point, the C.N.R. and ourselves. The committee will also find that the C.N.R. is not going to have one cent of operating deficit out of the whole operation of this undertaking.

I think it is quite an achievement. I think it is fair to the crown company. I also think that the government, by forcing the C.N.R.

to take over the operation of this line, are not at the same time imposing an unfair burden on our crown company. On the contrary, I think it is a tremendously good situation for it. It will be a profitable undertaking for the crown company. It is going to be a profitable undertaking for the long range welfare of that whole area and for the whole of Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Balcer: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: During the course of my remarks I had something to say about the cost and the minister did not deal with that matter. Can the minister indicate why there is a discrepancy between the original amount of $50 million to $55 million which, as I understand it, was estimated by the Canadian National Railways, and the amount of $86 million?

Mr. Balcer: All I can say at the present time is simply this. My officials, after taking into account all the various factors they had at their disposal, came to this conclusion. As I said earlier, the survey is not finished or anything like that. This was the figure that was given to me by my officials after consideration of the various factors at the present time. It is, or course, always rather difficult to make a proper estimate so far in advance on such a major undertaking. However, the estimate at the present time is $75 million with 15 per cent added for contingencies. As to the reason the figure has gone from $60 million to $75 million, I may say that it is simply that my officials have made a more complete study of the matter and have come to the conclusion that we should include in this bill $75 million plus 15 per cent for contingencies in order to make sure that we give parliament a fair estimate of this cost.

Mr. Chevrier: Am I accurate in saying that the amount estimated by the Canadian National Railways in 1957 was $50 million to $55 million?

Mr. Balcer: I was under the impression it was $50 million but I will not disagree with the hon. member. As I remember it, the latest figure was $60 million.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister one question. Will Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and Pine Point Mines Limited be allowed to consider the payment at up to $20 million to the government of Canada in connection with the building of this road when calculating income tax? In other words, will they be allowed to deduct that amount as a cost of operation?

Mr. Balcer: I shall have to check on that matter. I have an opinion of my own but I should not like to give an incorrect answer. If my hon. friend does not mind, I will get the information.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

The house resumed, from Thursday, July 13, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-71 respecting the civil service of Canada—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Chown in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose on July 13 we were considering clause 7 of the bill and the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Ottawa East.

On clause 7—Consultation with staff organizations.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the government has amended Part I of Bill C-71 as proposed so that it may seem a little more attractive to civil servants.

Subsection (1) of section 7 reads as follows:

The Minister of Finance or such members of the public service as he may designate shall from time to time consult with representatives of appropriate organizations and associations of employees—

It is further stated in subsection 2:

The commission and such members of the public service as the Minister of Finance may designate shall from time to time consult with representatives of appropriate organizations and associations of employees—

Then, in subsection 3:

The commission and such members of the public with representatives of appropriate organizations and associations of employees—

I quite agree that it is an improvement over the first bill. On the other hand, that is exactly the opposite of what the civil servants' associations have been asking for. They asked for the right to bargain at any time and not only when the minister would deem it proper to call them in. All the associations agreed on that point; they asked for the right to bargain directly. They insisted on the right for civil servants to open negotiations with any representative of the government whom the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) may care to designate. We raised that point in the committee but that did not seem to please the government's representatives.

It was claimed that this would perhaps deprive parliament of the right to settle problems. In my opinion, the prerogatives of parliament are not involved because even if civil servants were given bargaining rights or arbitration, the funds to pay their salaries would still have to be voted by parliament and if the latter did not approve them, there would be no question of salary increases.

It was also submitted that such a thing could lead to claims for the right to strike on the part of civil servants. Well, we know that, before the committee, representatives from the different civil servant associations clearly indicated that they were opposed to the right to strike, except the Canadian postal employees association which requested that right.

As a matter of fact, I wonder why it is said that there is danger that some day the civil servants will decide to strike, because neither in the existing legislation nor in the former act, chapter 48 in the revised statutes, nor in the present amendments, do I see anything forbidding them to strike now. Well, when something is not forbidden, it follows that it is allowed, but the civil servants have no intention of taking advantage of this situation to go on strike.

Moreover, we know that in Saskatchewan, government employees have the right to bargain, to negotiate directly with the government, and it has been like that for some time now. However, the employees have not made use of the right to put the government in a difficult situation. They simply benefitted by that and the government did not complain. Besides, in most provinces there are some means of forcing the government to negotiate with civil servants and even in the province of Quebec, where there is no special formula, section 5 of the civil service act provides that, when the commission is made up of three members, one of them shall be appointed upon the recommendation of the general council of employees. In this way, the employees have at least a representative on the commission to protect their interests.

Furthermore, in Ontario, under the law, a four member advisory committee has been set up; three of its members are appointed by the lieutenant governor in council according to set rules, and the fourth upon a recommendation made under the provisions of the civil service act. The rules enacted under the civil service act, also provide for the creation of a public service grievance board composed of at least three members appointed by the lieutenant governor in council.

Civil servants' associations may represent an employee who wishes to submit his grievances. Again, this is bound to improve the situation, and much better than what is now provided in the bill, because it now says: "the minister must consult, from time to time"; the minister must consult but when are employees entitled to demand consultations from the department? Never, since the minister alone can decide when civil servants may come and discuss contentious issues. But civil servants may never, according to the bill, even as amended, require that the government undertake discussions with employees of the commission and civil service associations.

In section 45 of Manitoba's civil service act, the maintenance of a joint council is provided. The provincial secretary and two members of the cabinet represent the government; therefore, three ministers represent the government. The association appoints three members who are supposed to represent the civil servants. And, further on, it is noted that a member of the civil service commission and the executive secretary of the association may attend a meeting of the joint council and of the government in an advisory capacity. It is a great improvement on what we have, and on what the Ottawa government is now proposing.

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Caron: Surely.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is not the hon. member dealing entirely with grievance procedures? I believe that what he has read concerning the Ontario and Manitoba procedures deals entirely with grievances and not with processes of consultation and negotiation with which we are concerned at this time.

Mr. Caron: I think it can be said that ultimately everything relates to grievances including salary discussions. There are always grievances between the government and the employees. This has to be taken into consideration. The same body must look after all grievances relating to increases in salary and working conditions. It cannot do otherwise.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): With great respect, Mr. Chairman, I believe my hon. friend is dealing with grievance procedures and not with processes of consultation and negotiation.

Mr. Caron: Does my hon. friend believe that the desire for an increase in salary is not a grievance? Of course it is a grievance. If the employees feel they need more money they wish to submit their views to the government. They have a grievance against the government because they feel they are not receiving an adequate salary. Everything boils down to a grievance. I invite the hon. member to look at the wording.

(Translation):

In Saskatchewan, negotiations are carried out with a staff association certified as a negotiating agent, which has union status under the union act. Those negotiations are conducted on questions of salaries and other working conditions attached to positions in the classified service. Salaries for those positions excluded from the collective agreement, are established by a committee on salaries which reviews representations made by the department involved. There is a right to appeal after rates of salary have been established.

This is similar with what we are asking for. It is similar to what staff associations in our civil service are asking for. It involves the right to initiate negotiations with the government even though the minister is not willing to go into negotiations. And when negotiations are carried out between representatives of the department, selected by the department, and representatives of the various staff associations in the civil service, if they do not come to an agreement, we want some kind of an arbitration board to examine their grievances. And I take as a grievance at the present time, the fact of ascertaining whether the employees are right or wrong in demanding a reasonable salary or normal working conditions.

In Alberta, since 1923, the public service act provides for a joint council composed of three members appointed by the association and three members selected by the provincial government. Such council is the negotiating body on salaries, working conditions and grievances. The provincial secretary treasurer acts as chairman of the joint council. He is the counterpart of the Minister of Finance.

Generally speaking, agreement is achieved first at the level of the joint council whose recommendations are almost always accepted.

In British Columbia, under section 72 of the civil service act of that province, the government has to recognize a civil service association which represents more than half of all the public employees whenever questions relating to the welfare of the civil employees and their working conditions, including their salaries, are raised.

That provision does not exclude the right of appeal or discussion with one particular civil servant or a minority group among the staff.

This is the kind of association, the kind of union that is needed to satisfy the justified complaints of civil service associations, because until now they have been treated rather like second class citizens.

People say: "But how can they make such demands"?

I recall that before 1890, when workers in industry or other employees made such demands, i.e. the right to negotiate directly with their employers—they were considered as revolutionaries, or even communists and jailed. I know many labour leaders who had to spend several weeks in jail because they had simply demanded what we are claiming now for civil servants.

But today, try and say in the labour world or elsewhere and say that the one who is claiming direct bargaining rights is revolutionary minded or a communist. No one will believe you because every human being has the right of discussion with his employer. It is a bounden right and you cannot take him to task or refuse him that right. Whether he is a factory worker or a government employee, he has that same right to try and protect through the power of an association his natural rights, and to protect himself against anyone who infringes his rights.

That is what the civil servants, members of every association, have come to ask for. They insisted. But the government does not seem prepared to grant their request. However, it is very simple, for our amendment reads as follows:

7 (1) The commission, and such members of the public service as the Minister of Finance may designate, shall negotiate directly with representatives of appropriate organizations and associations of employees of the crown, with respect to pay and other terms and conditions of employment, at the request of such representatives, or wherever in the opinion of the commission or the Minister of Finance, as the case may be, such negotiation and consultation is necessary or desirable in the interests of the civil service or the government. Such direct negotiation and consultation shall be initiated by either the governor in council, its appointees, or the appropriate staff associations and organizations noted above.

(2) Where negotiation does not result in agreement, the matter under dispute shall be taken to an arbitration tribunal by either party.

(3) The results of such negotiation and/or arbitration shall be proclaimed by a suitable instrument, where necessary subject to the approval of parliament.

Now, there is a reservation made that parliament approval is needed on all those matters of arbitration or bargaining, which means that parliament is not ignored and that its prerogatives are respected.

So, I hope the government will reconsider and understand that civil servants must be treated on the same basis as employees in all other parts of Canada and indeed the whole world. Public servants must be regarded as first class citizens like all other citizens of this country; that is all we are asking in the amendment we moved when we considered this bill at the end of June or early in July.

So, I hope the government will reconsider its stand and accept the proposed amendment in order that federal civil servants be considered as first class employees.

[Mr. Caron.]

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, there is hardly time before 10.30 to deal exhaustively with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa East. That amendment is identical in terms with one which was moved in the special committee and which after careful and detailed consideration was rejected by that committee.

The hon. member for Hull I think has just been proceeding on a misapprehension. Most of what he read from procedures in the various provinces dealt with grievance procedure rather than procedures of consultation or negotiation. I want to put my position clearly in only two or three minutes so that if it wishes the committee may vote before 10.30.

Mr. McIlraith: That comes from the hon. member who took all the time on the earlier vote.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member is complaining about time taken on the earlier vote.

Mr. McIlraith: After the opposition had indicated its approval of second reading.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman who is principally responsible for the vote being taken earlier did not even bother to remain in the house while the vote was taken. If the hon. gentleman from Ottawa West wishes to deflect me from my particular subject I will say to him that I will be only too glad to enter into a debate with him on any controversial subject that may arise. I was trying to deal in a logical and rapid way with the principle here. I want to say there is no major difference in objective or principle between the hon. gentleman from Ottawa East and myself. Such differences as do exist relate to the methods and techniques of achieving the objective. My considered opinion is that to endeavour to spell out in the act the procedures, and processes of consultation between the treasury and the staff associations may very well delay rather than expedite the achievement of mutually satisfactory processes of consultation.

I would prefer, as I said on second reading, that the processes, the techniques, like freedom, should broaden down from precedent to precedent. To be explicit in the act, to set forth the detailed provisions relating to consultation and the results which are to flow from consultation may very well create an unsatisfactory legislative straitjacket within which satisfactory consultations might not develop.

This new experiment, this new adventure, in employer-employee relations might very well prove to be abortive before it really got started. It is on those grounds that I would ask the committee to take the same action that the special committee took, to reject the amendment of the hon. member for Ottawa East and to proceed ahead with the very satisfactory amendment to section 7 which was proposed by the Minister of Finance.

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I wonder whether the hon. member for Carleton will hold it against me but I should like to say a few words on this amendment. Would you call it 10.30 p.m. Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the acting house leader what the business will be for tomorrow and perhaps there will be some indication of what we will be doing on Wednesday.

Mr. Balcer: First of all tomorrow we will take second reading of the bill respecting the centennial observance of the birthday of Canada. The second item will be second reading of the bill to amend the National Housing Act. The third item will be Bill No. C-71, respecting the civil service of Canada, and the fourth item will be the resolution respecting physical fitness through amateur sport.

As far as Wednesday is concerned, I am afraid the house will have to wait until tomorrow night for an indication of the business for that day.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the house have available for its consideration the centennial bill which I understand has not yet been distributed?

Mr. McIlraith: It has not been printed and will not be available.

Mr. Balcer: Yes, it will be available.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the acting house leader give any indication of the business for Wednesday?

Mr. Balcer: It will depend on the progress made tomorrow and I am afraid I am not in a position to give any indication just now.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

I.J.C. ORDERS RESPECTING WATER LEVELS

Question No. 293—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Has a supplementary order of the international joint commission, dated the 2nd of July, 1956, dealing with criteria for a method of regulation of the level of water on lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence river, been amended?
2. If so, how often, on what dates, and in what orders of the commission?
3. Have any of these orders or amendments been put into effect by the international joint commission either on lake Ontario or the St. Lawrence river?
4. Which method of regulation is now in operation?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. No.
2. Not applicable.
3. Not applicable.
4. Plan of regulation 1958-A. However, the international St. Lawrence river board of control, under the supervision of the international joint commission, has exercised certain discretionary authority granted to it by the commission by accumulating storage on lake Ontario this summer in temporary deviation from the plan of regulation. The additional storage has been built up for use in helping to alleviate any problem of low flows which may arise this autumn in Montreal harbour. In his appearance before the external affairs standing committee on June 14, 1961 General McNaughton stated that the board of control had been asked to keep a close watch on the river with a view to conserving water on lake Ontario in order to meet this problem of low flows. General McNaughton also announced on that occasion that the board of control was conducting a review of plan of regulation 1958-A.

SKILLED WORKERS LEAVING CANADA, 1961

Question No. 296—Mr. Matheson:

Does the government have any information as to the number of skilled workers who left Canada during the first six months of 1961?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

Statistics on the emigration of Canadians to the United States only by occupation are obtained from the immigration and naturalization service of the United States department of justice in the form of a semi-annual report which is available to the Department of Labour. The latest period for which these statistics are available is for the last six months of 1960. Data for the first six months of 1961 will be available late in November or early December 1961. No statistics are available on the emigration of Canadian workers to countries other than the United States.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, September 19, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

TRADE

ACCRA—TABLING OF COMMONWEALTH ECONOMIC CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL COMMUNIQUE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the communique issued at the close of the commonwealth economic consultative council meeting held in Accra, in both English and French.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ACCRA—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED STATEMENTS BY CANADIAN MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has now received the texts of the speeches made at the commonwealth meeting in Accra by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have received a copy of the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I have not yet received those of the Minister of Finance. I think it would be most appropriate that as soon as they return an opportunity should be given for them to place before the house what they said.

I may say in this connection, having tabled the full text of the communique, that reading the communique will, I think, put in proper perspective the statements that were made. The strongest guarantee of the future of the commonwealth is its capacity to face the facts in a straightforward manner and to do something about them. The various commonwealth members spoke very freely about the situation. Indeed, the frank views put forward by Canada and the other members of the commonwealth did not in any way seem to have been considered out of place by the United Kingdom.

I might point out in this connection that Mr. Maudling is reported to have implied in London on his return from Accra that after the preliminary discussions had taken place, or words to this effect, then consideration would be given to the convening of a prime ministers' conference. I want to get the exact words of the press report:

> The meeting had shown considerable support for a meeting of commonwealth prime ministers.

And Mr. Maudling is quoted as saying:

> I think it is very likely that there will be one.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a supplementary question. While I thank the Prime Minister for tabling the communique, is the Prime Minister aware that the chancellor of the exchequer, who was the head of the U.K. delegation at Accra, said the other day that he did not feel the communique itself fully represented the tenor of the discussions at that meeting; and is that not an additional reason why the texts of the speeches in so far as we are able to secure them should be tabled?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can only say that in the communique—and communiques are always accepted by all those who participate—these words appear, and I think they are the answer to the Leader of the Opposition:

> Paragraph 7: Representatives of the United Kingdom reviewed the various reasons that had led them to make the application.
> Paragraph 8: All other commonwealth representatives expressed grave apprehension and concern regarding the possible results of the initiative taken by the United Kingdom. They reaffirmed the value and importance they attach to traditional commonwealth trading arrangements under which most foodstuffs, raw materials and manufactures enter the United Kingdom free of duty from commonwealth countries with, in most cases, preferential advantages; and other commonwealth countries make reciprocal tariff concessions. The benefits of these arrangements accrue to the United Kingdom as well as to other commonwealth countries.

Then comes paragraph 9:

> Most commonwealth countries questioned whether the United Kingdom with its other international and domestic obligations could possibly secure in the proposed negotiations an agreement which would protect commonwealth interests adequately and effectively.

I think a general reading of the communique—I have not picked out selected portions—would indicate that there was a high degree of unanimity among the countries represented at this conference, pointing out the serious difficulties which entry into the common market might have not only on the economics of the commonwealth but also on its political constitution.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. In view of the great importance of this subject, will an opportunity be provided the house to hear the government's views in detail and to discuss the same?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, consideration will be given to the suggestion of the hon. member.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if in the statements made by the two ministers representing Canada at Accra either hon. gentleman referred to the statement made by the Prime Minister himself, following the latter's return from the prime ministers' conference in the summer of 1957, when he gave his blessing to the common market?

[Later:]

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the news story appearing in the Times of London on Monday, September 18, 1951. One sentence therein reads as follows:

> Canada, Mr. Fleming says, wants no change in the existing pattern of trade. It suits him just the way it is.

May I ask the Prime Minister whether this statement attributed to the Minister of Finance represents the policy of the government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that apparently was not a statement by the minister. That was a press comment on a statement allegedly made by the Minister of Finance.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOR U.S. PLANES TO USE CANADIAN BASES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister say whether he has received a personal communication from President Kennedy requesting permission for United States strategic air command planes to land and refuel at Canadian air bases?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no such communication has been received.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the Prime Minister in recent weeks receive a personal letter from President Kennedy in respect to nuclear policy for Canada?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, personal letters are not revealed, and my answer to the previous question is not to be taken in any way as an approbation of the suggestion inherent in the question.

Mr. Hellyer: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister indicate what the policy of the Canadian government is in respect to these matters?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. gentleman who asked the question knows that matters of policy of that kind are not customarily declared in answer to oral questions before the orders of the day.

NORAD—APPEARANCE OF DEPUTY COMMANDER ON TELEVISION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether he is in a position to answer the question I asked some days ago referring to the participation of Air Marshal Slemon in a television program, I think in New York, with General Kuter?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As the Leader of the Opposition knows, senior officers who accept public speaking engagements in which they deal with general defence policy are requested to submit the text of their speech to me prior to delivery.

Air Marshal Slemon appeared with General Kuter, the commander of NORAD, on an A.B.C. television network program entitled "Issues and Answers" on September 10. The program was one of a series of public affairs presentations by the American Broadcasting Company and dealt with the functioning of the NORAD combat operation centre.

The questions addressed to Air Marshal Slemon were in general factual and the answers given contained material previously approved and in no way dealt with our defence policy as a whole. Air Marshal Slemon did comment on the recent tracking of the Russian space shot containing Major Titof and stated the fact that the astronaut crossed over Canada a number of times in his earth orbits. Air Marshal Slemon stressed the fact that it was of the utmost importance that we should be able to keep track of such flights, and he stated the opinion that this required a maximum effort on the part of NORAD.

I am entirely satisfied that it was quite unnecessary in this case to obtain my prior approval and permission.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question. Will the minister say whether this is a change in policy, to allow Canadian serving officers to submit to questioning with respect to defence matters? If so, are members of this house to be afforded the same privilege?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, in many instances when press men or in some instances businessmen interested in defence construction or manufacturing and other members of the general public visit defence installations at various times they are given briefings in regard to the operations carried on, and they ask questions which are answered by responsible officers there for that purpose.

Mr. Hellyer: Everywhere except in the House of Commons.

FN RIFLE—INQUIRY AS TO REASON FOR MODIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. The minister will recall that last week when going over his departmental estimates a question was asked about the withdrawal of FN rifles for a $1 million modification. He advised the committee, as reported at page 8384 of Hansard—

Some hon. Members: Question?

Miss LaMarsh: —that the modification was required because of some difficulty with foreign ammunition. As found on that page, on two occasions he said that with the ammunition made in Canada there has been no difficulty whatsoever. Would the minister care to comment on a news report which appeared in Friday's edition of the Winnipeg Free Press and which contained the following statements—

Some hon. Members: Question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. lady resume her seat until order is restored? There seems to be a certain amount of protest about the question, and I have been asking myself whether the hon. member has been asking simply for a verification of the press report. It sounded at first as though she were reopening a debate which had occurred earlier. However, if the hon. member has a question, perhaps she would put it.

Miss LaMarsh: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the minister to comment on the report which indicates that the trouble is not with foreign ammunition, which has only been used in the rifles by Canadians in Germany, but rather with Canadian ammunition which is the only ammunition used here in Canada, as reported in the press.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to comment on a report which I have not seen. I made a statement in connection with this modification when the estimates were being considered, and that statement stands.

Miss LaMarsh: I wish to ask a question supplementary to the one I directed to the Minister of National Defence. Does the minister care to comment on the further report that the army said the trouble could be solved by matching rifles with their breechblocks, thus sacrificing the most important point of the FN rifle, namely interchangeability of parts?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, first of all I think I should point out that this business of reading long extracts from newspapers and asking ministers to comment on them is out of order, as you have already pointed out on numerous occasions to hon. members on the opposite side of the house. In the second place, these various comments by newspaper writers in connection with this matter in most cases are not based on any real knowledge of the matter.

In order to put an end to this sort of thing I propose, as a matter of fact, to take a party of newspapermen down to the arsenals branch which makes the modifications and which made the rifle, and also out on the range in order to show them exactly what the situation is and how the rifle works. Following that I hope there will be no more misapprehensions about the rifle.

Mr. Ricard: You had better take the Grits.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the minister take a few members of parliament along with him so they may listen with interest to the minister's observations to the press?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I should be delighted to take the hon. member along, because he needs information more than anyone else.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO SECOND VOLUME OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him what progress is being made by the royal commission on transportation, and when we might expect the second volume of the report and recommendations of the commission. The Prime Minister will remember that when he spoke during the debate on this matter some time ago he indicated that the second volume was awaited. I should like to know what progress is being made.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only say that I have no information at the moment. In view of the question I shall ascertain the facts.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer an earlier question asked by the hon. gentleman. The information asked for was when volume II of the report of the royal commission will be available. Since the question was asked I have had placed before me a letter directed to the clerk of the privy council, in which the commission advises that volume II of its report will be available in the fall and volume III, which will consist of special studies that the commission has conducted or caused to be conducted in order to assist the investigation, will follow shortly thereafter.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED EXPERIMENTAL USE OF CONCRETE TIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Edgar Fournier (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he is aware that the Canadian National Railways are now experimenting with imported concrete railroad ties?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to get in touch with the management of the railway. I shall answer this question tomorrow.

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS TO BOARD OF DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Yesterday I asked him when the house and the country might expect the appointment of directors of the Canadian National Railways to fill the vacancies which have occurred and the new appointments which are to be made. The Prime Minister was good enough to say that would be made known in accordance with the statements made by the Minister of Transport when his estimates were brought before the house.

I should like to point out to the Prime Minister that the Minister of Transport indicated that they would be made known when the legislation authorizing these appointments received royal assent. The question I put to the Prime Minister now is this. The estimates of the Department of Transport have been before the house on several occasions. I was wondering whether there was any other date at which the Prime Minister would indicate these appointments would be made.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I made it clear yesterday that when consideration of the estimates is resumed there will be an answer to that question.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED IRREGULARITIES RESPECTING ELECTION OF SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Has the minister any comment to make regarding the statements made by Messrs. C. A. Faucher and Roger Perri, former members of the Quebec liquor board police, who stated in court recently that they performed political work in the constituency of Bellechasse during the federal election of 1958?

Mr. Paul: They worked for Bruneau also.

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, even though I think this question is out of order, I am glad that it was put to me. This is how the presiding judge, Mr. Justice Pettigrew, cleared up the matter yesterday morning, September 18, 1961:

The court: during the week end, my attention was drawn to a Montreal newspaper report concerning the testimony of a former Quebec liquor board police member, C. R. Faucher, of Rimouski. That was at the sitting of Friday, September 15, during the Lemire investigation.

Sunday morning, after mass, I got a copy of that newspaper and I asked the stenographer to transcribe Faucher's testimony for me. Here is one of the questions the crown attorney, Mr. Bienvenu, asked him: "While you were a member of the liquor board police force and especially since 1951 and 1952, did you ever participate in election campaigns?"

Answer: Participated—that is in 1957—

The court: I insist on this date, 1957, and the witness continued: "In 1957, that is before the federal elections, I was sent on a trip in Bellechasse. Mr. Côte called me in and told me: You will meet doctor Poirier in St. Damien. Put yourself at his disposal. He said that you were to meet him there. Pick up a certain nurse by the name of Normandin in front of the Chateau Frontenac and go to the hotel where the doctor lives in St. Damien de Bellechasse. The next morning, the doctor told me that the only thing I had to do was to drive the nurse who was with me. She was going to the health units run by the nuns—

The court: Other questions by Mr. Bienvenu. Question: If it was not an election campaign. Answer: She went to give some medical aid. She told me, when the trip was over, that she had gone to see the sisters to get their vote for Mr. Dorion. I just say what she told me. I did not go in with her. End of the answer.

The judge continues and I am still quoting from the shorthand notes:

"And I, as judge, immediately stated, as it was my duty to do, that such evidence was only hearsay, that such proof was illegal, and I added that the nurse had to come herself to give evidence in that connection.

Now this newspaper states the following, and the judge quotes:

"A witness gave evidence in the court of the sessions of the peace yesterday according to Saturday's newspaper during an investigation with regard to the former liquor police chief Rosario Lemire in the 1958 election."

By the court: That fact is not correct.

And the judge continues the quotation:

"And the reverend sisters of the religious orders of Bellechasse had been solicited to vote for the Progressive Conservative candidate, Mr. Noel Dorion."

By the court: What is inaccurate, it is the year 1958. You are aware of the fact that a question of justice is involved, as I have said, and as I say again: the judge is not a partisan for one side or the other. I am here simply to discharge my duty, to see that justice is done, and that my inquiry is carried on in a legal manner.

Now I blame this newspaper for having mentioned 1958. Was it deliberate? Was it done by inadvertance? The witness did not say 1958, he said 1957. Now, in 1957, Mr. Dorion was not a candidate in the Bellechasse riding. I mention here, and it is public knowledge, that when he was elected it was the first time and it was in 1958.

And the newspaper printed a large enough heading for its report.

And the judge quotes:

"Nuns urged to vote for Mr. Dorion". This, despite the fact that I have declared that such evidence was illegal and only hearsay. The newspaper could have mentioned the evidence given by the witness but it should have added that such evidence was of such a nature that the judge could not take it into account. And you know that when someone occupies a position such as Mr. Dorion's who is a federal minister, such statements are liable to cause him rather considerable prejudice ...I thought I had to make a rectification, I don't know if we can call it that, but this goes to show you that we want justice for everyone and if, by any chance, it happens that something is reported inadvertently that is not quite in order, and would be of such a nature as to cause prejudice to a private individual, I should make the same remarks I just made in connection with Mr. Dorion. I would do the same for a labourer and for a tradesman.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Secretary of State for the trouble he took in answering my question and for the statement he just made. All things considered, I am sure that he will have no objection to answering a supplementary question.

Is he in a position to tell the house that he had no personal knowledge of the participation of some Quebec liquor police officers, including Messrs. René Mercier, C.A. Faucher and Roger Perri, in the 1958 election campaign in Bellechasse?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the minister replies, may I say that the question which the hon. member asked the other day and the question today, as I understand them, relate to matters outside the administrative responsibility of the minister. They are rather in the nature of a question of privilege, or an accusation against a member of the house in his personal conduct, rather than the sort of thing which should be dealt with on the orders of the day. I think hon. members perhaps recognize that. As the matter was raised, it was only proper that the minister, who was involved by the report to which the hon. member for Laurier referred, should have the opportunity to make a personal explanation, but I do express the opinion that this is not a subject to be pursued on the orders of the day because it is not a matter of administrative responsibility.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the object of the question is not to pursue the matter on the orders of the day, but I would have thought as the minister himself—

Mr. Grafftey: Mud slinging.

An hon. Member: Smear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think hon. members would like to have this matter cleared up, and the way to do it is to give attention.

Mr. Chevrier: I would have thought the minister would be the first one to want to clear it up, as he has attempted to do on two occasions. He has made a lengthy statement, for which I thank the minister, and as he has done that my supplementary question—

Mr. Walker: More smearing.

Mr. Ricard: He wants to throw more mud.

Mr. Chevrier: —was along the same line. I simply asked the minister to comment on a statement. Your Honour has indicated by your statement a moment ago that these matters are extraneous to the proceedings of the house; but they are not in this sense, that the whole of the elections act and all the duties and responsibilities under that act fall within the jurisdiction of the minister. The question I put to the minister was a simple one, and I should hope that Your Honour would allow the minister to reply since he was about to do so when Your Honour interrupted.

Mr. Speaker: As the matter has gone this far, I do not wish to prevent the minister from answering the question if he wishes to do so. However, I express the opinion that this question is not properly raised as a question before the orders of the day. It might be raised on a matter of privilege if any charge is to be made against a member, and it can be dealt with in the usual way. As a question addressed to the minister in his ministerial responsibility, it seems to me that it is out of order.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN MARCONI COMPANY—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO PROSECUTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Skeena asked me whether the request by Mr. Whitfield for permission to prosecute under the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act has been granted. In reply may I say this. Mr. Whitfield wrote to me in May. No formal request was made for permission to prosecute in the manner prescribed in the act. Nevertheless the matter was referred to the officials of the Department of Labour. They subsequently referred it to the Department of Justice for an opinion on several aspects of the case. An opinion has now been received, and this in turn is being considered.

There are a number of ways in which Mr. Whitfield's rights in this matter can be determined. One method would be by recourse to the courts. There is also provision for a preliminary investigation by an officer appointed by the department, depending on whether the matter is considered to be one arising out of the Fair Employment Practices Act or one arising under the fair wages and hours of work legislation.

These matters are now in the course of study by my officials and when a determination is reached, appropriate action will be taken.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to ask a supplementary question. Will Mr. Whitfield be kept advised of the progress of that study within the department, in connection with this matter?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Whitfield will be advised of the decision.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—STATEMENT ON ALLEGED SUPPRESSION OF RELIGIOUS RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont asked me a question, as follows:

[Mr. Speaker.]

Will the Prime Minister inform the house whether the government has sent or will send a protest to the Cuban government against the suppression of religious rights and freedom, indicated by the dismissal of a number of the clergy?

The Canadian embassy in Cuba has now confirmed that nine Canadians were among the Roman Catholic priests expelled from Cuba, who sailed on Sunday night for Spain on board a Spanish vessel. Neither the Canadian ambassador nor the Canadian consul was able to obtain permission to visit the Canadian missionaries before their forced departure. The Canadian ambassador secured an interview with the acting minister of foreign affairs yesterday, in the course of which he expressed the Canadian government's concern over the arbitrary deportation of Canadian citizens to a third country without any notification or explanation, in a manner so precipitate as to deny them an opportunity to make even a minimum of personal arrangements or to communicate with the embassy.

A further report on these representations is expected today, and when this is received I shall inform the house of any further developments in this very regrettable incident.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING TAX COLLECTING ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, at the end of last week I asked the Prime Minister whether he could make available, so they could be printed as an appendix to Hansard, any additional letters that had passed between him or other members of the government and members of the provincial governments with respect to the tax-sharing legislation. I wonder whether the Prime Minister is yet in a position to make that correspondence available.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have to frankly say that I have not looked into that matter since the question was asked. However, I shall at once ascertain whether further communications have passed between the provinces in question and the government, and will advise the house later.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

PROVISION FOR NATIONAL CORPORATION, NATIONAL CONFERENCE, ETC.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-127, respecting the observance of the centennial of confederation in Canada.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is adopted I wonder whether the Prime Minister proposes to say anything further at this stage.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish these remarks to be considered as reopening the debate. In view of the discussion yesterday I do not think it is necessary for anything more to be said at this time. Yesterday there was a general review and a very full and comprehensive discussion of the subject. Many hon. members have views they would like to express, and naturally the house would be glad to hear them, but I feel that no particular purpose would be served by a further discussion at this time.

When the house is in committee the bill can be discussed item by item and we can consider points raised by hon. members that deserve attention. The general purport of the bill has been placed before the house, and further questions can be asked at the committee stage. The hon. gentleman assisted considerably in that connection yesterday.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, yesterday when the resolution preceding this bill was before the committee of the whole there was evidence of a remarkable degree of unanimity on the part of hon. members of the committee as to the subject matter dealt with in this legislation. I think that is a wholly desirable situation, and I hope it continues throughout the six years until the observance of the centennial of confederation in Canada is celebrated. It is a matter of some regret to me that the bill itself was not made available in the distribution office until approximately ten o'clock—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I find it difficult to hear and I am sure other hon. members have the same difficulty. Would those who have independent conversations to carry on please do so more moderately or retire to the lobby.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: I was remarking, Mr. Speaker, that it is a matter of regret that the bill itself was not available for distribution until this morning. I believe it came into the distribution office at about ten o'clock. I myself was able to obtain a copy when the bell rang summoning the house to meet.

In any event, I do not propose to obstruct the bill on that account. I do wish to express the thought that this legislation is of such a nature, since the subject matter is not controversial, that possibly it would have been improved had the bill been able to stand on the order paper for some considerable number of days so it could have been circulated to interested organizations across the country. The Canadian centenary council, whose minutes were referred to yesterday, is a remarkable collection of organizations throughout Canada. I am sure they would have been interested in this bill and in its form. Had it been possible, in relation to the business of the house, to have presented the resolution in time so the bill could have been circulated throughout the country, we might then have had the benefit of the views of these interested bodies.

Since that is now not possible or practicable in view of the stage we have reached in the session, I hope the bill will be viewed as one to which amendments can be readily brought forward by the government if, in the light of the months that lie ahead and the experience as it develops, it is thought that such amendments are desirable. As a matter of fact yesterday, when we were celebrating what was to the Prime Minister, I hope, a very happy occasion, his birthday, I had hoped he might have learned the art of handling legislation in such a way and acquired such genius in handling the house that he would have thought about these techniques and reformed. I hope that from his birthday of yesterday he will reform with regard to his technique in presenting bills to the house for consideration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought the degree of agreement yesterday was most attractive.

Mr. McIlraith: So did I, and I hope we will preserve it in this matter. However, I hope the Prime Minister will reform himself in his method of presenting legislation, because this legislation is of such a nature that the views of the various bodies comprising membership in the Canadian centenary council would have been helpful, I think, to the government and to all of us.

In any event, I do not propose to do other than concur in the second reading of the bill. I must confess that my reading has been rather rapid and my study of it, therefore, very superficial. As I understand the principle involved it is the setting up of an administration to carry out this important function, and that principle is one that surely must commend itself to all hon. members of the house. Perhaps I could leave the matter there. There may be some questions to be asked at the committee stage. However, I think on second reading the principle, as I discern it from a hasty reading of the bill, is one that will commend itself to the house.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we expressed our views on the resolution yesterday. As far as I am concerned I have nothing further to say with respect to second reading of the bill, except that we support the spirit and purpose of the bill and will have a few questions to ask when it is being considered in committee.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Now that we are discussing this bill on second reading I have two ideas which I should like to put forward. It seems to me that this centennial celebration will provide us with an opportunity which we have not had for a hundred years, and which we may not have again for another hundred years, to take a great leap forward in building national unity. Unity is the strength of every nation, and should be the prime goal of our national development. If we are to achieve complete national unity it seems to me that we must learn to appreciate one another, and learn to appreciate the contributions which the various provinces have made to Canada as a nation in addition to the contributions which the various racial groups have made to our culture and our economy.

Yesterday the Prime Minister put forward the idea of a train which could travel from one part of Canada to another carrying visible tokens of our heritage. I think that is an excellent idea, and I should like to see it developed to the point where the Prime Minister or those responsible for organizing that train would see to it that prominently displayed were exhibits making it clear what have been the contributions of each province and each ethnic group.

> As Canada is a country on the threshold of an exciting tomorrow, the centenary should serve as a launching pad for new triumphs in our second century.

Earlier in the debate he recalled that this should also be a time of national stocktaking and of rededication to the future. In this connection I should like to put forward the idea that it also affords a splendid opportunity for establishing minimum standards of public service for all Canadians. This would probably mean setting up another committee to determine suitable standards. I do not think the task of such a committee would be an impossible one. We have, for example, already agreed on certain standards of health, so many hospital beds for each thousand people, and I think if we started from there and worked out, say, miles of paved roads, per thousand people, standards of education—so many classrooms per thousand students—and so on we should have the minimum standards which we could make our goal for all Canadians during the next hundred years.

This does not mean that everyone would have to be pulled down to the common level, but I think if those standards were determined Canadians would be shocked to see what wide variations exist as between one part of Canada and another, and even between different parts of the same province. I think this is something we would want to eradicate in the course of the next hundred years, and I hope the Prime Minister will consider setting up a committee under this legislation to determine suitable minimum standards of public service which might be made common for all Canada, and which might be the goals toward which we can work in the future.

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Speaking very briefly on Bill No. C-127, may I respectfully offer the suggestion that one centennial project in particular would be useful to Canadians and to our friends all over the world. I have in mind an ambitious production on the part of the national film board.

A few days ago I was in Toronto, and there I saw a motion picture called "Windjammer" which recorded a cruise of the Norwegian training ship Christian Raadich. I was impressed by the fact that after watching that film for two hours one almost wished to be Norwegian. The Prime Minister has frequently referred to the richness of the ethnic groups we find in this country, and I think he prides himself on the leadership he has taken in bringing this heritage to the fore. Certainly our former governor general did a great deal in this direction.

It seems to me that if the national film board could plan ahead and produce a great motion picture accompanied by original Canadian music by some of our finest composers, a picture which would introduce our Eskimo population, our native Indians and all the other ethnic groups we have in this country, a significant contribution would have been made toward the celebration. Such a film would include our old pioneer stock as well as the people who have come recently from Europe bringing with them so many colourful traditions and customs. It would also include passages illustrating our varied scenery; I have in mind the thousand islands region, the Rockies and other Canadian scenes. A picture of this kind would present Canada to every country in the world, and we could afford to export copies free for distribution abroad.

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): May I speak briefly with respect to a view which has been expressed by many individuals in my riding. It is a view which is shared not only by many who were born in my riding but by others who have since come there to live. As is known to most hon. members, Niagara Falls is one of the most popular tourist areas of the country. Not so well known, however, is the fact that this area has rich historical associations. In and about the area from Niagara Falls to Fort Erie were fought battles as significant in their way as the battle of the plains of Abraham.

I think no Canadian who has visited Quebec City can fail to be stirred by the magnificent monuments there to the two fine peoples who were the founders of this country. The peace, the dignity and the beauty of the surroundings, wedded to the recollection of all we have been taught about the battle which there took place, cannot fail to be impressive. Anyone visiting that spot would feel the beginnings of Canada.

I suggest that the same should be true in Niagara, where there was a struggle between forces from the south who sought to have that part of Canada made part of the United States, and the British troops, Canadian militiamen, the Canadian people who had settled in that area and the Indians of our country who remained loyal to the crown. Unhappily some of the great battles which were fought there, such as the battle of Lundy's lane, have never been properly commemorated by a national park. In fact, in Niagara Falls there are only a small monument and some poignant graves of the fallen on both sides. Each year there has been a commemorative service. Until recently it was held only by Canadians but two years ago, for the first time, Americans were asked to participate. Last year, for the first time in 157 years, an American was asked to give the address.

This is, historians agree, one of the bloodiest battlegrounds on the North American continent. It has been said by historians that more blood was shed on that land, proportionate to the size of the population and the number engaged in the struggle, than was shed at Gettysburg. Most hon. members have visited Gettysburg and will know the feeling that comes to one when visiting there, a sense of seeing the roots of that country's struggle for existence.

It is unhappily the fact that the area which comprises the Lundy's lane battle ground is largely built over with commercial establishments and two fine churches. There is virtually nothing to remind either the residents of the area or the millions of visitors who come to that part of the country that here a stand was made for freedom, and that that part of Canada was held for what later became this great dominion.

I urge upon those who are to serve on this commission the need to commemorate in a tangible way some of the great battles that have significance to Canadians in our emergence as a nation, with a view to paying a tribute in this way to those who went before us, and reminding all who come after us of the beginnings of our nation when we celebrate its hundredth birthday a few years hence.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I wish to follow along the same line as what was said by the hon. member for Niagara Falls, and to bring to the attention of the house some historical facts pertaining to the area I represent.

I heartily support the Prime Minister's bill to establish a commission to ensure that Canada's centennial will be properly celebrated. As we look to the future toward a greater Canada for those who will follow us, it is important that we pause to look at our past and examine what has been done in days gone by which laid the foundation for the greatness Canada has achieved as a nation today.

In my riding there is the old town of Niagara-on-the-Lake, where the first government of Upper Canada was established many years ago. It also played an important role in the defence of Upper Canada during the war of 1812. In that town today we have several fine churches, some of them dating back to those early days. We also have Fort Mississagi and a number of other old, historic buildings. We have in that area the makings of a splendid old colonial town similar to Jamestown in the United States if it were properly preserved, which I think it should be.

As recently as Sunday last I attended a ceremony at Niagara-on-the-Lake to unveil a plaque in memory of Colonel John Butler, who formed Butler Rangers who played a great part in the preservation of the Niagara peninsula as part of Canada. They also did outstanding work at the time of the American revolution in piloting refugees from the United States to Canada. We therefore have in the Niagara peninsula an historic town and many fine old buildings. As part of our centennial preparations across Canada leading to our celebration we should give serious thought to preserving for posterity what is left of those early, trying times.

It is true that the Ontario government through the Niagara parks commission has done a great deal to preserve places of historic importance in the Niagara peninsula, but there is a great deal more to be done. At the Niagara camp training grounds there are approximately 900 acres of land much of which is going to waste at this time. With that amount of land and the buildings I mentioned the remains of a colonial town could be preserved to commemorate those stirring days in Canada's early history. I urge the Prime Minister and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to give serious consideration to preserving what remains of the historic colonial days in the Niagara peninsula.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether it is proposed that the Canadian centenary council will be continued in the form indicated in the report of its first annual meeting and, if so, how it will be related to the administration created by this measure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the Canadian centenary council is, of course, a group of private institutions that have joined together for the laudable purpose of ensuring that the fullest possible representations will be made in connection with the celebration of the centennial. There will be nothing in this legislation to in any way circumscribe the activities of that organization. It will naturally be expected to give its views and make its recommendations, as I know it will be desirous of doing.

Mr. McIlraith: I thank the Prime Minister for his answer. I think it is highly desirable that the activities of this council be continued and that it be permitted to make as valuable a contribution as it can.

I take it that it is the intention under this legislation to have the national conference on Canada's centennial co-ordinate all the activities, or is it envisaged that the two bodies, the council and the conference, will each deal directly with the administration?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the hon. gentleman knows, the conference will be representative of all parts of Canada. Two representatives each will be named by the several provinces, and in addition representatives will be appointed from all the interested segments of the Canadian population. I should think that in the choice of membership of this conference regard would be had to a liaison with the institution through which it has been voluntarily set up and which has done very excellent work in laying the foundations for the centennial. I would hope that this work will continue and that there will be representation on the conference and also that degree of co-operation which would assure that the work that has already been done will be made available to the national conference and to the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I did not make myself clear in the second question. What I was seeking to find out was whether the Canadian centenary council would be brought into direct liaison with the administration set up in the bill before us, or whether its relationship would be through the national conference. That was really the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact they have been included in the relationship, and these organizations have been working together and exchanging their points of view.

Mr. McIlraith: As I understand it, the conference as such has not been created yet. The national conference provided for by the legislation has not been created.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is true enough. The officials of the privy council have been in constant consultation and have exchanged views with the organization in question to which the hon. member referred, as well as with Canadians as a whole, which brings me to the point he raised on second reading. He asked whether every opportunity had been given for representations to be made. I might point out that on October 4, 1959, at Assumption University in Windsor, I referred to the one hundredth anniversary and said this:

> It is the intention of the government of Canada to communicate with the provinces shortly to secure their views and ideas. My hope is that each province will set up an organization, out of which a national committee will be formed—with representatives of all the provinces of Canada, of church and religious bodies, of cultural organizations, of business, labour and agriculture, and all the elements of Canadian life—to make and co-ordinate appropriate plans for national celebration. His Excellency the Governor General has graciously agreed to lend his patronage to this tremendous undertaking. I am asking my fellow Canadians everywhere to contribute suggestions for an overall plan.

I asked at that time also that Canadians in all parts of our country make available their representations. Then again, on May 19, 1960, I invited Canadian citizens to send in their suggestions as to how Canada's centennial might best be celebrated. This invitation brought about a healthy response and, as I said in introducing the resolution, I have been very encouraged by the degree to which interest in laying the foundations for a successful centennial is being shown by our people everywhere.

As the hon. gentleman knows, representatives of the privy council who are working on this matter have been in communication not only with the organization to which he referred, which is a voluntary one, but also in general with the provinces and various municipalities across the country, many of whom are taking a new interest in the sense of history and are making their contribution in their several communities to preserving those things which are of historic importance and a part of the warp and woof and the traditions of Canadian history.

Mr. McIlraith: In referring to his speeches the Prime Minister omitted his announcement to the House of Commons which was along exactly the same lines, and which was made on February 4, 1960, as reported at page 713 of Hansard. At the conclusion of the announcement he spoke about meeting with the representatives and premiers of the several provinces. He said:

> Following this meeting the government hopes that working arrangements and groups can be formed to carry on the initial plans.

My question has to do with the staff devoted to this purpose. Has the government been able as yet to gather together the nucleus of staff for this administration, or is that something yet to be done?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That has yet to be done. Members of the privy council have been acting on it. Dr. Hodgson has taken a particular interest in the matter, but there has been no acquisition of staff directly for the purpose.

Mr. McIlraith: I have another question which perhaps I can pursue at this time. A question was asked in the House of Commons on April 17, 1961, concerning some announcement in the press. I want to make reference to it because there seems to be confusion on this point, and I think it important that it be clarified now. The reference is in Hansard of April 17, at page 3706. The Prime Minister will see that the question was asked by the hon. member for Timiskaming and was based on a newspaper report concerning the appointment of the well-known publicist, John Fisher, to the staff of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister went on to say that Mr. Fisher would "commence his duties as a special assistant with particular reference to preparations that are to be made in connection with the centennial to which we are all looking forward." Then he added this:

> While I am on my feet may I say that when the formal appointment is made, the suggestion that he will receive more than $10,000 a year is completely unwarranted.

I assume this has reference to something in the press release that I did not see. Then on June 7 a question was asked, as appears at page 5968 of Hansard. It was a formal question on the order paper, and reads as follows:

> Have any persons been brought into the government service for the purposes of preparing for Canada's centennial?
> If so, who are these persons, and what are their specific duties?

These questions were asked by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. The Prime Minister answered as follows:

> The answer to both parts of this question is no, not yet.

There was a further reference to the subject some time later to which the answer was no. The point I want to clear up is this. The Prime Minister will see that the answers are capable of being partially in conflict, or at least confusing. What I am seeking to point out is that Mr. Fisher was brought here for this purpose. Is it intended to appoint him, or has he been appointed for this work up to this time? What is the situation? Can the Prime Minister enlighten us, if he feels free to do so?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Fisher was appointed a special assistant in the office of the Prime Minister in succession to an earlier appointee who retired. In view of the responsibility which rests upon the Prime Minister in connection with the centennial one of the things which are necessary in the Prime Minister's office is to have available the best equipment and the best equipped persons in the various fields of responsibility. I think the house and the country as a whole recognize that Mr. John Fisher has a knowledge of Canadian history and its traditions unexcelled by anyone else who comes to mind at the moment. That recognition is generally accepted, and among his duties as a member of the Prime Minister's staff is to make available his ideas in connection with the centennial, and to assist the Prime Minister in his relations with the various organizations that have been set up in connection with the centennial.

Mr. McIlraith: Is it envisaged that this work will be done in the Prime Minister's office outside of the administration?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. McIlraith: There is one more point I want to raise. Prior to the election of June, 1957 some steps had been taken in this regard, including the meeting of a committee. I have not been able to get any report of its proceedings this morning, though I have talked with some who attended the meeting. I have had some conversations with regard to what took place at the meeting, but I do not think it would be desirable to put them on record. The meeting was held between certain ministers and the leader of the opposition at that time. I also have not been able to fix the date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Could the hon. gentleman fix the year?

Mr. McIlraith: I can fix who was leader of the opposition. It was the former leader of the opposition, before the present Prime Minister was leader of the opposition. In any event, this is my question. I take it that any work that was done is being gathered together and will be made available to the present administration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the information I have is that there is no record of any such meeting having taken place. I know the hon. gentleman is circumscribed by the considerations he has in mind, but possibly he could tell me privately who were present on the occasion. Whatever was done apparently is not known to the departmental officials at the present time.

Mr. McIlraith: I will be glad to give the Prime Minister any information I have as to that meeting. A start was made at that time, and I think his predecessor in the office of leader of the opposition may be able to enlighten him on the matter to some extent.

I have one more question regarding the method of appointment under the bill. All appointments are in essence to be governor in council or Prime Minister's appointments. I made some reference to this point yesterday, and I want to ask the Prime Minister a direct question. Is it his intention to make these appointments on an all-party basis, as obviously was the intention of the previous government at the time the first meeting was held on the subject?

Mr. Jones: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Saskatoon laughs.

Mr. Jones: I am laughing about your suggestion that there was in fact any meeting that took place while your party was in power.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Saskatoon has a great habit of interjecting improperly. If he has anything to say, he should do so with skill and dexterity.

Mr. Walker: Like you do.

Mr. McIlraith: As the Prime Minister has indicated in his remarks, the fact is that this is a subject matter of great interest to many people throughout the country and in and around the capital city, and has been over a period of years. I would hope that the perfection of the arrangements for this occasion will be such that they will be worthy of the commemoration of our hundredth anniversary and will serve for the next 100 years as a source of inspiration that will be remembered by all Canadian citizens. I would hope that the approach will be a little better than that which the hon. member for Saskatoon and the Minister of Public Works have indicated by their interjections.

I am asking the Prime Minister what I regard as a proper question, but which he may or may not regard as proper. That is his privilege. Is it his intention in making these appointments to seek to make the celebration of this great occasion a non-party matter, as confederation was, or is it the intention that any other method will be followed? I think the Prime Minister will be the first to appreciate the point of that question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can assure the hon. member that the purpose is to bring together all Canadians. We do not try to write history on the basis of partisan considerations, and an endeavour to bring about Canadian unity on the basis of party is something I have always tried to avoid. With respect to the setting up of the organization in general, I might say to the hon. member that in order to ensure that all political parties will have representation, the appointments are to be made by the governor in council on the recommendation of the provinces. In all the appointments that are made I will follow the course that has been followed generally in connection with the Glassco commission, of assuring that, without regard to party considerations, the best men will be made available. That is the course I have in mind. That is the course I want to see followed. It is the only one that can be followed by any government with a sense of its responsibility for an event which is not a party but a national event, one which will give to Canada, I hope, an even larger place in the world internationally than she has today.

Mr. McIlraith: I thank the Prime Minister for his statement. I think he has indicated what is needed in this organization. In my opinion his statement points up what is needed in better form than I was able to put it in the remarks I made in asking my question. I am glad it was the Prime Minister who made the statement. I hope that the minister who interjected earlier was listening carefully, because I think the Prime Minister has approached this matter in the proper way in making that kind of statement. To me at least it appears that this occasion will be a much greater one than many of here seem to realize at this moment.

As I said yesterday, the Prime Minister quite properly asked for unanimous support for the resolution. I should like to express my appreciation of the general tenor of the remarks made yesterday, and I conclude by expressing my appreciation to the Prime Minister for his remarks in answer to my question.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 6—Staff.

Mr. McIlraith: This clause deals with the appointment of officers and employees. Can the Prime Minister indicate when he expects to be able to appoint the commission and have it in operation as a working administration?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That has not been determined yet. However, having regard to the vastness of the problems that will be faced I am most anxious to have it under way as soon as possible.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Administration agent of Her Majesty.

Mr. Herridge: Paragraph 1 of this clause provides as follows:

(1) The administration is, for all purposes of this act, an agent of Her Majesty, and its powers under this act may be exercised only as an agent of Her Majesty.

Then paragraph 2 provides as follows:

(2) Subject to the approval of the governor in council, the administration may, on behalf of Her Majesty, enter into contracts in the name of Her Majesty or in the name of the administration.

This being in effect a crown corporation, can the Prime Minister explain why it is necessary to have included these words "or in the name of the administration"? I thought all contracts were held in the name of Her Majesty under those circumstances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think this is a clause or section that is found in other statutes. It makes possible a greater degree of expedition. While the contract would be in the name of the administration, it makes possible the signing by the administration without the formalities that otherwise would be necessary.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

On clause 9—Objects of administration.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to make an observation or two on this clause, which provides for the objects and powers of the administration, inasmuch as I am keen on this aspect of the matter. As I said yesterday, co-operation is essential for success in the development of these plans to the satisfaction of all parties and all groups concerned. That co-operation will depend upon information, continuous contact and the maintenance of constant interest by all groups, no matter how small.

In essence, the administration will have to develop unusually good public relations to a type somewhat different from those that are required for business, political parties or other types of organization. Without a doubt this bill lays the foundation for the building of plans for the centennial celebration, a great deal of which we will learn as the administration proceeds with its plans and so on. Ideas will flow from many quarters, many groups, many areas and so on. However, I start with the question of information. Contact with even the smallest group is essential to success. To give information will promote inspiration which will in turn develop the necessary co-operation.

I trust that the public will be kept informed by press releases or by other means of developments from day to day so they will not feel that this is only something that is being originated in Ottawa and that this is a bureaucracy administered in Ottawa—and of course that term is used most unfairly in connection with many of our government bodies—but that every organization of persons, as I said before, no matter how humble and no matter how small, will feel that they are taking part in these arrangements. I suggest that we should also interest our university students and our school teachers, and that teachers should be informed of developments and be provided with information which they can give even once a month or once a quarter in order to inform their classes of what is being done, of course, in a way that is satisfactory when you are dealing with young people.

On clause 10—National centennial fund.

Mr. Pickersgill: While clause 10 makes provision as to the custody of the funds and so on, I notice that it does not actually appropriate any funds. I thought the Prime Minister might tell us whether it was contemplated that at the present session a special supplementary appropriation would be brought in so the work of the commission and the administration could be started at once.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I appreciate the solicitude of the hon. gentleman in that connection. However, my information is that there is no intention to bring in a supplementary estimate at the present session. I understand that the organization as it is will not require it, and that we shall have it brought in in the regular way in a subsequent session.

Mr. Pickersgill: It would then not be possible, unless there was a warrant, for a salary to be paid to the commissioner—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: —until money was appropriated by parliament?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: From what the Prime Minister has said, I understand that unless a commissioner was appointed who was a member of the public service and in receipt of a salary in some other context, it would not be possible to start this administration until an appropriation of funds has been made in the next fiscal year, or subsequently in this fiscal year at the next session of parliament. Is that correct?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 14—Administration deemed charitable organization.

Mr. McIlraith: Clause 14 is quite important if it is envisaged that private persons will make contributions to the administration for this purpose. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would elaborate on the degree to which he intends the administration to make an appeal to members of the public to contribute by way of gift or bequest for this purpose.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This provision, of course, as the hon. gentleman knows, is inserted for the purpose of assuring that if bequests particularly are made for the laudable purpose of the centennial, normal provisions with regard thereto will apply. I hope that businesses and organizations across the country will interest themselves in this matter, for after all it is for the benefit of all Canadians, and that they will feel constrained to make contributions. I can think of nothing more beneficial to Canada than for companies, corporations and the like to make available their contributions not only to the building and the strengthening of the centennial but more particularly, arising therefrom, to a greater sense of unity and a greater realization on the part of the Canadian people of the destiny to which all of us look forward for Canada. This provision is made in order to enable such assistance to be given, as well as to provide the opportunity for philanthropically minded individuals in their wills and testaments to make provision for this purpose.

Mr. McIlraith: May I ask this question in connection with persons making bequests in their wills for this purpose. Has the Prime Minister had the provincial succession duty acts looked at in order to ascertain whether the provincial tax legislation is of such a nature as to exempt such bequests? I think he will appreciate the fact that quite often there is a real problem in drafting wills where you have a situation in which a gift or bequest may be exempt from tax under federal legislation but not exempt under provincial legislation. Such a circumstance could throw the balance of the will out in such a way as to mean that the intended bequest is never in fact made; it is never put in the will.

Has the Prime Minister pursued that point, and if he has not, would he have one of the officers of the appropriate department do so?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, that matter has not been looked into. It is a matter of importance, as the hon. gentleman indicates, and it is one of those matters that I know will be looked into earnestly by the provinces where they agree on the necessity of making their succession duty acts conform with the provisions of this clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 15 and 16 agreed to.

On clause 17—National conference on Canada's centennial.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a question on clause 17, Mr. Chairman. I am interested in this in what perhaps the Prime Minister may regard as a rather pedantic way. This is the first time I recall a provision ever having been made for appointments to be made by a minister—I think it is a very good idea myself—rather than by the governor in council. I am not criticizing this provision in any way whatsoever; I wish to make that quite clear. However, I am just wondering what kind of instrument the Prime Minister will use for the purpose. We know that when appointments are made by the governor in council there is an order in council. I wonder what the legal instrument of appointments would be; whether these appointments would be gazetted or what other method, apart from publicity in the press, would be used to give them validity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman was not being pedantic. That was an exhibition of a searching examination based upon his experience as clerk of the privy council and his knowledge of constitutional matters. I have not given thought to this matter. I imagine that when appointments were made there would have to be confirmation by an order in council. I think that would be the proper course.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would hope the Prime Minister's ingenuity or the ingenuity of the clerk of the privy council would be such that this would not be necessary. The Prime Minister had a passion at one time for not having too many orders in council, a passion that I share, I might say. When I was clerk of the privy council I found an unnecessary number of orders were passed, and the number was very substantially reduced. I think this is a good precedent. I hope it will be continued because it does seem to me that, particularly if the Prime Minister is the minister designated, it should be possible to devise some instrument which would make it easier to do these things and cut out some of the red tape.

I suggest that the Prime Minister ask the staff of the privy council office to see if they cannot devise some instrument which will make passing purely formal orders in council quite unnecessary. Of course the Prime Minister will be aware that in the case of the appointment of ministers, such an instrument was devised some years ago because it was considered inappropriate to appoint ministers by order in council.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 18 agreed to.

On clause 19—Objects of conference.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I have one very brief observation to make in connection with clause 19. I understand the Prime Minister is anxious to complete this matter, so I will make it as brief as I can. The conference referred to is the national conference on Canada's centennial, and clause 19 purports to set out the objects of the conference. I must say that clause 19 does not express those objects in as nice a way as they might have been expressed.

I hope the Prime Minister will take a look at the clause in the period before the next session and see if he cannot find a more adequate way of expressing the objects of the conference, because they are going to serve as the guide for the work of the conference. As far as I am concerned, I do not think the importance of the conference can be overstressed in making this occasion a great success. I think this clause does something less than adequately express the objects of the conference. Perhaps the Prime Minister would look at it and bring in an amendment if he sees fit. I should be very grateful if he would do that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall do so, Mr. Chairman. Of course the clause was drafted by the legal officers of the crown after consultation. There are occasions when we who belong to the legal profession are blamed, condemned or even worse for creating sections that are difficult of understanding, that are replete with a multiplicity of words, exceptions and provisos. This clause 19 is a model of simplicity.

Mr McIlraith: It is not very inspirational.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It may not be ensconced in the beauty of language that the hon. gentleman would like to have, but it has clarity.

Mr. McIlraith: Put some inspiration into it.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 20 to 25 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 26—Expenditures.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have a question on clause 26 when it is read in conjunction with clause 10. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could tell us if what is contemplated is a separate vote for the purposes of the conference, or whether the moneys will be—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, it is a separate vote.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a separate vote distinct from the vote for the administration?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 27 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank hon. members of the committee for the expedition with which this bill has been passed and the care and attention given to it by those who have participated.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Now, by leave.

Mr. Speaker: By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING AMOUNTS AVAILABLE FOR LOANS AND RESEARCH

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-128, to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): This amendment to the housing act has to do with the advancing of money from the consolidated revenue for the purpose of building houses, for housing research and for community planning. It also provides for sewage projects.

I am sorry the government has not seen fit or has not been able to cut the interest rate on mortgage loans. The rate still stands at 6¾ per cent. Yesterday, speaking at the resolution stage of the bill, the minister asked for suggestions, and I suggest that the first thing to be done should be to cut interest rates.

Ministers of the crown have often stated in this house different steps they have taken in order to help our economy, and they have said on various occasions that these particular steps had been followed by the government of the United States. I have in mind what the Minister of Labour said in connection with the winter works program, and I think I have heard the Prime Minister refer to various steps which the United States government has taken akin to action taken here in Canada.

Well, the United States has taken steps to lower the interest rate on mortgage loans. It has been brought down in two stages from 5¾ per cent to 5¼ per cent. It was reduced first to 5½ per cent and then to 5¼ per cent. This was one of the earliest actions of the new President.

We have had no intimation in this country that the government intends to bring down mortgage interest rates on similar lines. However, I think they might do something about it, and if they did they would be doing something to the real benefit of the people of Canada. For years before 1958 the differential between long term interest rates in the United States and Canada was one half of 1 per cent. It has been three times that amount ever since the government's promotion of high interest rates. The day they decided to bring about the conversion loan, when they paid healthy bonuses to people who took 50 per cent extra interest, was an evil day for the home buyers, who have been paying for our misguided fiscal policy ever since and who will go on paying for it for practically the rest of their lives.

In a recent issue of the New York Times I read that one municipality in the Boston area was raising funds to build a new $3 million school. They had bids on their debenture bonds, as they called them, and those bids were priced to return between 3.71 per cent and 3.73 per cent. This is much lower than the rate at which the Canadian government itself can borrow money, and this is one reason our government cannot lend money to the home buyer at reasonable rates of interest.

Our government, as has been admitted by the Minister of Finance, is in and out of the short end of the market. This costs a lot of money—around $70 million at the time of the conversion loan—and the minister has been in and out of the market many times since. Somebody has to find this extra money which, in interest alone and in extra expenditure in financing our debt, already amounts to an additional sum of $800 million. The home buyer soaks up some of this extra cost, and most of the rest is taken up by the taxpayer. Even he does not take it all up, because the balance is carried forward in deficits to another day.

If interest rates were down by 1 per cent, or better still by 1½ per cent to 5¼ per cent, as they were some years ago under the previous administration, the home owner would not have to pay nearly as much for his house over the years. The saving consequent upon this reduction of 1 per cent or 1½ per cent would be tremendous, and there would also be considerable saving in the case of municipal services because the annual amortization payments would be less. I saw it worked out that the saving of 1 per cent in interest on a $13,000 mortgage over a period of 25 years would be around $2,500, and if it were 1½ per cent the saving would be in the neighbourhood of $4,000. That is a lot of extra money for a home owner to be paying over the years, and in the case of a 35 year mortgage the amount would be much greater still.

These are the years in which the home owner has to pay out more taxes to all three levels of government, and those taxes are increasing year by year. These are the years when he raises and educates a family. The high interest rates promoted by the government are siphoning off from his pay cheque money which could otherwise be spent on the education of his family.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock I was saying that one of the first results of the fiscal policy of this government was to increase interest rates. The government should now try to reduce them, particularly for housing. If and when the government takes such action there will be, of course, thousands of Canadian home buyers left holding the bag with blanket mortgages on their homes bearing an interest rate of 6¾ per cent. Their homes will not be readily saleable because cheaper mortgages will be available at such a time.

Yesterday the Minister of Public Works praised the 6¾ per cent 35 year mortgage. He said that not too many of them had been taken. Just imagine what a 35 year mortgage means to a man who takes it when he is a little over 30 years of age. If he is fortunate enough not to fall ill or encounter other misfortunes he may be lucky enough to have it paid off before he reaches the allotted span of three score years and ten. The old age pension might be used to finish paying it off, but if he does not live some member of his family will have to pick up the tab and continue the payments. If the owner of one of these houses bothers to add up the amount of money he has paid over the years he will find that he has paid about twice its original value. He then owns an old house by the time the mortgage is discharged. This problem is brought about by the high interest rate of 6¾ per cent. The point is that interest rates should not be so high as to require a 35 year mortgage on any house.

Recently I saw an advertisement in a Montreal newspaper which offered for sale a nine year old house with a mortgage that bore an interest rate of only 5¼ per cent. The 5¼ per cent interest rate caught my eye, because I can recall some years ago in this house the Minister of Finance and other hon. members of the Conservative party berating the former government on the ground that 5¼ per cent was an unjustifiably high interest rate for housing.

The Minister of Public Works always seems happy to announce a large number of housing starts. This means that a great many more buyers are caught in the trap of paying high interest rates over the years. Certainly long after this government has been gone—but not easily forgotten—many thousands of Canadians will continue to pay monthly tribute to its memory, and the home purchasers will be in the vanguard of that throng.

Another feature of high interest rates on mortgages is this. After a man has put his name on the dotted line and purchased a home this tends to keep him put, to render him immobile. He is frozen in one position, and in all likelihood will continue to live in the same house on the same street in the same town for the rest of his life, unless he is willing to sell at a financial loss. That is not so true in the early years when he only has the down payment as an equity, but as the equity builds up it is more difficult to dispose of the house, to find a buyer with a sufficient amount of money to enable the original purchaser to recover his down payment and his equity in the building. As I have said, this equity is difficult to finance under the present system. The trouble is that at the present time buyers do not have sufficient money to finance this equity, so they are forced to buy a new house under a mortgage bearing an interest rate of 6¾ per cent.

Another problem is that some areas are overbuilt. I know of some areas containing empty homes that would be suitable for anyone who wished to buy, yet other homes are being built under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation financing and these entail mortgages bearing an interest rate of 6¾ per cent, all because of the lower down payment.

The question of financing the equity in older homes should be given consideration by the government. Under the present system of financing we do not make the best use of existing houses. I have known several people who have been required to move, sometimes to another town some distance away, because of a job transfer. I have known people who required a larger house because of an increase in the size of their family. These people have been unable to derive from their homes a sufficient equity to purchase new homes. The government should give consideration to this and other related problems. I am in favour of the government advancing money for housing, but it should be made available at lower interest rates.

The hon. member for Nipissing said yesterday that during the last year of office of the previous administration there were 380,000 housing starts, and that only $65 million was taken from the public sector, the rest being taken from the private sector. I have heard the Prime Minister say that his party was for free enterprise. Well, the public sector of the economy has put up $924 million in order to finance only 30,000 more starts. The private sector of the economy has been treated well by the Minister of Finance. Government securities reached a high price and this lessened the interest of investors in housing mortgages. In order to provide our people with enough money to build houses the government was forced to put a great deal of money into these projects. They now provide those long term mortgage loans by borrowing on the short side of the market. Most of the money required for the long term mortgages is constantly being churned about in the short term market, and this costs a lot of money. This is the main reason mortgage money is at 6¾ per cent today.

When he replies the minister might give us some figures on the repossession of houses by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and by any other agency holding mortgages guaranteed by the government. It would be interesting to have those figures, particularly in respect of the length of occupancy on the part of the house owners.

Yesterday the minister referred to the money advanced in connection with sewage treatment projects on the part of the municipalities. I know some of those projects have gone ahead. I agree that we should clean up our lakes and rivers; I think it is a very good thing. At that time the minister said that money would be advanced to the municipalities at a price very little above the cost to the government. I ask the minister now how much money has been advanced to the municipalities, and what interest rate is being charged.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I find the first clause of the bill before us very interesting, and this applies particularly to the residents of northern Manitoba, the area which I have the honour to represent. There are one or two things that I should like to point out. However, at the outset I should like to say that congratulations to the minister and to this government are certainly in order for the tremendous interest they have shown in housing requirements over the last four years. Each year we have seen increases in the amount of money available for house building, and I think I would be quite safe in saying that new records in house building in Canada have been set in three of the last four years.

However, there are one or two problems remaining in regard to money available from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under the National Housing Act. In this respect I should like to bring two matters to the attention of the minister. First of all, I am quite interested in clause 1 of the bill, the purpose of which is to increase from $1.5 billion to $2 billion the maximum charge on the consolidated revenue fund for direct lending by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I know from experience that one area of Canada is handicapped to a great extent in its desire to get approval of those loans by individual home owners. I refer particularly to the new area in Manitoba known as Thompson, which is the site of the new International Nickel development. I am sure the minister is aware of this situation because I brought it to his attention previously.

When house construction started at Thompson, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation lent money to individual applicants provided, of course, that the International Nickel Company guaranteed those loans. Until recent months this worked out fairly satisfactorily, because most of the people going into that area were employed by International Nickel, and the mining company was not at all reluctant to guarantee those loans. However, since then the town has developed rapidly and people are moving in to supply the goods and services which are necessary in a town of this size. They are anxious to build houses, but they are not on the payroll of the mining company. The mining company is now reluctant to guarantee loans for anyone other than its own employees.

As I say, I am sure the minister is aware of this, but owing to the tremendous development in Thompson and other places in the north I think a special look should be taken at this problem and special consideration should be given to those areas. At Thompson there is every reason why we should have faith in the future of the development. When you see an individual company go into an area and invest possibly up to $200 million of its own money to build the first fully integrated nickel producing plant in the world and supply the services for a well planned town, schools and things of that sort; when you see this followed up by private enterprise in the form of small industry, shopping centres and all the requirements for a well planned town go in, I think there is every assurance that this industry will be located in that area for a long period of time. I can recall the president of the company, Mr. Gordon of New York, saying at the opening that as far as they were concerned they intended to remain in that area forever. The establishments which have been put up certainly bear out the fact that they intend to stay for a long time.

If we are to fully justify our faith in the north and our plans to develop the north, special consideration should be given to places such as this and to the private individual who wishes to go in and build a home for himself and his family. I also believe that when you see a town of 400 to 500 houses built in the last year and a half, with another 200 or 300 houses under construction at the present time and something in the neighbourhood of 500 to 600 new lots opening up next year, this certainly warrants greater consideration from the department and from Central Mortgage and Housing than is now being shown.

I realize, of course, that some sad experiences have developed in the past in certain one industry towns. However, as I said before, if we are going to justify our faith in the north I think special consideration should be given. I say this because not only this government but governments of the past have more or less gone on record as having faith in the north and have recognized the need to show special consideration through the northern allowances which they have paid to government employees stationed in the north.

Many people who go there find that building costs are greater than in any other part of Canada. I might say at this time that I understand Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has experienced some difficulty in these areas because of permafrost. I know that at the present time officials of the national research council are looking into this factor to see what other types of buildings might be more desirable in these localities. However, in the case of Thompson I understand that only eight or nine out of the 450 to 500 houses that have been built are more or less coming apart at the seams as the result of permafrost. In only eight or nine cases has the sad misfortune occurred of running into trouble because of permafrost.

There are other such places in the north in each of our provinces, and there are localities in my area other than Thompson which are having difficulty in getting loans from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation simply because I believe it is considered that a one industry community is perhaps not the best place to invest too much money. However, in listening to the hon. member for Welland I noticed he said that in his area houses were very difficult to sell from the point of view of the owner getting his equity out of the sale. I think the situation not only applies to the north but possibly applies to many other parts of Canada. Some of these other parts of Canada are not experiencing difficulty in getting loans. Therefore I respectfully request the minister to ask the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to take a further look at these communities in the north and give the fullest possible consideration to a loosening of their policy to allow the individual home owner to secure a loan through these facilities.

Mr. John Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member will have to speak from his own seat in accordance with our practice, except by unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the house is agreeable to hearing the hon. member.

Mr. Matheson: I thank hon. members. In spite of the kind indulgence of the house, Mr. Speaker, I will return to my own seat.

We have been interested in hearing the extent to which the government has engaged in housing, and in my opinion the question that confronts us at the present time is, what is the future of this development if it continues in the direction and to the extent that it has in the past months and years? Often the question is asked, if I bought a home for $15,000 what would it be worth five years from now? There is a very useful study of housing contained in the Globe and Mail of Saturday, September 16 last under the title "Renting or Buying? How Costs Compare". I should like to read one short paragraph from the article:

> An $800 down payment is needed under the National Housing Act to purchase that $15,000 house. Your monthly mortgage payments, including mortgage insurance fee, will amount to $97.97. Add $700 a year ($58.33) for taxes and maintenance costs. This makes your total monthly payments $156.30. By 1986 these payments have amounted to $46,890 to pay for and maintain that $15,000 bungalow.

The writer of the article indicates that the house buyer at the present time would be paying more by buying a home than he would by renting, projected over a 25 year period. At the end of that period, of course, he has the house. In the other case he has not risked the investment of $15,000 and he has nothing but the next month's rent to pay. It is also indicated in an article on the same page that on the average a house constructed under the National Housing Act today costs the buyer $1,012 more than the $13,366 it cost in 1956. The conclusion appears to be evident from the study that home prices are remaining stable but the value of money is changing.

I simply leave this word of caution with the house. We know that in our smaller towns and cities it is extremely difficult to sell real estate today even if it is very highly mortgaged and requires only a small equity to transfer a property. While there is much reason, of course, to assist people who need homes, I hope that the minister, with his wise and broad knowledge of the law to which he sometimes refers, will bear in mind the implications of this projection. Certainly this does not sound like private enterprise to me.

Mr. Speakman: Before the hon. member resumes his seat, would he tell the house in what area taxes and upkeep require this rather unbelievable amount?

Mr. Matheson: I have read from the Globe and Mail, which is published in Toronto. I am not familiar with the tax rates in that city but I can assure the hon. member that even in the smaller towns in Ontario, in places such as the one in which I reside, taxes and maintenance of this amount are not unusual.

Mr. Speakman: Thank goodness I live in western Canada.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have very few remarks to make, but I do want to express my support for this measure, which increases the funds available for housing in general, university buildings, assistance to municipalities in connection with sewage disposal and for research. I am sure that the measure has the support of all members of the house.

However, I wish to make one or two suggestions. First of all I wish to support the representations of the hon. member for Welland with respect to the necessity of a reduction in interest rates. If one reads the history of housing in most western countries throughout the years, one will find that in relation to the interest rates in many other countries, ours is an extremely high rate of interest. If it is not feasible at the present time, I would ask the minister when he replies later to tell us whether consideration is being given to the provision of better homes for persons below a certain income by applying some bonus or write-off system, such as that which has been so successful under the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act. Good housing is essential in order to build good communities and a strong nation. I think we would be fully justified in extending a write-off provision, similar to that under the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act, to those building houses for their families below a certain income level and below a certain house cost level.

I should like the minister to say whether any consideration is being given to that matter. I think the state is fully justified in subsidizing that type of housing in order to meet that type of need. We subsidize a good many other things which I believe are not as essential or as urgent as housing.

In view of the response we have had from municipalities in my constituency, and conversations which I have had with others, I suggest that the present regulations with respect to loans for the building of sewage disposal facilities are rather stringent, in that they apply only to main trunk line sewers and things of that sort. Those regulations might be quite satisfactory for the cities or the towns and larger municipalities. However, owing to the nature of the installations, I have been informed that the regulations are somewhat too restrictive to allow smaller municipalities, especially incorporated villages to take full advantage of the act. I would ask the minister when he replies to tell us whether consideration is being given to changing the regulations, in view of the representations made by various municipalities and organizations.

Then I just wish to say a word or two about the promotion of more building in the smaller communities. There has been more of it in recent years. At this point I might say that I have no criticism to offer of the senior officials or local officials. As far as the local officials in my constituency are concerned, I know they are doing a very good job. I repeatedly hear extremely favourable comments.

Another thing that assists a local official in doing a good job is taking part in local activities. That factor accounts in part for the success of the local official of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, who is at the present time stationed at Trail. He has shown an interest in the community. He is active in several worth-while community organizations. That activity and that interest are of great assistance in his public relations and in the good will he builds up in the community. He is doing an excellent job, and I take this opportunity to say so.

I do not think we have taken advantage of the smaller communities to the fullest extent possible. I am not blaming the officials. I think the situation arises largely from lack of information or lack of understanding, especially with regard to the provision of houses for persons who are retired or who particularly want to live in these smaller places. I suggest that some further consideration be given to promoting more building in smaller communities. When I say "smaller" I mean villages with a population of 1,000 and up, in some cases unincorporated. I am thinking now of several in my own constituency which are unincorporated, having a population from 500 to 1,000, a good little fire department, their own water system and everything else. They are very frugal people and they do not become incorporated because by not doing so taxes are kept down. Their insurance rates are normal. They provide splendid opportunities in the way of sites, living space and things of that sort, for persons who wish to retire and for those who like that type of life.

In order to overcome that lack of information, I suggest it would be a good idea if officials located at various centres made themselves available, when it was possible to do so, to visit those smaller communities and have a talk with a representative organization such as a chamber of commerce, a trade union, a Rotary club or a women's institute. I may say that there is nothing like talking to women to get action, as well as inaction. I have found that to be so from my experience in life. I make those suggestions as I think more should be done to utilize the facilities of our smaller communities, which offer such splendid opportunities for certain types of persons wishing to build.

I am very glad to see this increase in the amount available for research, as this is a continuing development. Circumstances change. I think in particular more research should be directed to the possibilities, the opportunities, and the needs of the smaller communities throughout this country. This is all I have to say at this time. The other matters I wish to mention I shall take up in correspondence with the genial minister.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly on one clause on this bill, namely the clause which provides for loans to build dormitories for students at universities. I think this is an extremely important addition to the National Housing Act regulations, which was brought into effect last year and which apparently is going over very well.

At the time the regulations were brought into effect last year I raised the matter of loans for the building of dormitories for student nurses, graduate nurses, hospital aides and interns in hospitals. I have been associated with the board of governors of our hospital for a good many years, and I am well aware of all the problems in connection with getting funds to provide these facilities. Perhaps the minister has had no call for that kind of assistance; however, I feel that it is an extremely important matter.

It is true that both the federal government and the provincial government make available grants for building dormitories for student nurses. However, there is nothing in the way of loans for accommodation for graduate nurses, and the grants for accommodation for student nurses fall far short of the money that is required. In the newspapers the other day I noticed a statement to the effect that graduate nurses stood about lowest, in the matter of average income, of most professional people. That is a very unfortunate situation, because they also require good accommodation adjacent to the hospital. In order for a hospital to keep graduate nurses, interns and nurses' aides, it is important that they have housing facilities with which to take care of them. I strongly recommend to the minister that he give particular consideration to this financing. I think it is just as important as it is to help finance dormitories for students in universities.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I rise to indicate general support for the general principle of this bill, and in particular for those clauses which provide for programs of sewage disposal and dormitories for universities. I am prompted to reply at this time to some remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. The hon. member took great pride in the amount of public funds the government is making available for housing. It seems to me this is a very strange position for a member or a party to take which prides itself on its support of private enterprise. The success of our housing program surely does not depend upon the amount of public funds invested in it. The success of any housing program must necessarily depend upon the number of houses built and whether the houses that are built are of a type that meets the needs of the people.

My hon. colleague from Nipissing yesterday, and the hon. member for Welland again today, put on record the fact that in the last three years of the Liberal regime approximately 380,000 houses were built for an expenditure of $65 million of public funds, while the last three years of the present government 415,000 houses have been built for an expenditure of $900 million of public funds. It seems to me that this tremendous increase should be a cause of disquietude. No doubt the government would not invest the money if it did not have to do so, particularly at a time when we are running into heavy deficits. The fact that this money for residential housing is of necessity taken from the public sector raises the question whether free enterprise is really alive to its responsibility to the people of Canada in this regard.

The success of the program depends not only upon the number of houses built, but also upon whether they are the right kind of houses. I was interested in a comment made over the radio this morning by a commentator, I believe it was Mr. Campbell, in which he pointed out that the number of houses being built is far in excess of new family formations. If this is a fact, then one must conclude that the extra houses are being built to replace old houses. I am sure anybody would agree there is a place for public funds in our housing program, but I believe the proper use of public funds is to provide houses for people in the low income brackets, or for those people who will perhaps have to live all their lives in rented accommodation. For them we should be supplying low rental housing.

When the minister replies I should like him to tell us what kind of houses have been built in the last few years with the $900 million that has been spent. Are they expensive houses in the $15,000 to $25,000 bracket, or are they cheaper houses for people with smaller incomes? In my own province we are particularly interested in houses for people in the low income group. I had a special interest in a housing program for fishermen which was announced some time ago but which I believe did not prove to be very successful.

I do think we should take a good look at where our present housing policy is leading us. It is all right, of course, to provide houses when they are needed, but if our housing program is determined by the necessity to create jobs, then a make work housing program in my view is not compatible with a proper policy for housing. I do hope the minister will give us some indication as to the type of houses which have been built in the main out of the public funds that have so far been expended.

Many hon. members have referred to the high interest rates and the effect these rates have on a person who is taking out a mortgage on a new home. We all hope it will be possible to reduce these interest rates. However, I do not think anybody who looks at the situation realistically can feel that this is going to happen in the very near future, because these high interest rates are a product of our present system. If we are really going to do anything about it we will have to do something about the system that produces these high interest rates. To my mind there is something radically wrong when a person who buys a $15,000 house has to pay $30,000 or $35,000 before he actually owns it. Housing is a necessity, and we should be ingenious enough to work out some system to provide housing for people without imposing upon them this tremendous financial burden.

I ask the minister to see to it that when this new commission that is going to inquire into our financial system is set up they take a good look at this problem and see what changes can be brought about in our whole financial system to correct the present situation.

Mr. Jack Wratten (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take just a moment to support very strongly the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Lincoln that some funds for nurses' homes should be made available from the funds we are now talking about. Those of us who are connected with hospitals know what a difficult job it is to finance nurses' homes today. While the provincial and federal governments make very generous grants, the balance of this money has to come from the municipalities. In Ontario today we have the hospital services act, and a person can enter any hospital. Where the municipality keeps up a modern hospital with every facility it has a tendency to draw patients from other municipalities. This means that the burden of the expenditure to put up these nurses' residences has to fall upon the municipality.

The way things are today, with taxes and so on, it would be a great boon to the municipalities if we could finance the balance and have it paid through the differential the hospitals receive as between private and semi-private rooms, because the only income of a hospital in Ontario today is the difference in cost between private and semi-private rooms. I know that in our own case it would be a great help to us if we could have a loan to put up our nurses' residence and pay it off on a 20 or 30 year basis under the National Housing Act.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I regret that unfortunately I had to miss the introductory remarks which were made with regard to the bill now before the house. However, I should like to bring one matter to the attention of the minister who sponsors this measure. It comes to my mind partly because on looking at the Ottawa Journal today I find that one of the main headlines says "Walker Predicts Boost in House Construction".

The policy endorsed by this group has already been expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay West, namely that any money is good money that goes into the construction of homes for ownership by the citizens of Canada. However, I should like to ask the minister if, when asking for additional money for home construction—a request which we are going to support—any thought has been given to the existing regulations under which the affairs of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are administered. I refer in particular to cases where homes have been built with money invested on behalf of the people of Canada, and the property has been returned. I think it would be a waste of the taxpayers' money to authorize additional funds, whether under the National Housing Act or under the veterans legislation, if homes already built under subsidy with the taxpayers' money are to be left vacant.

I think there is need for the minister to take a close look at the situation which exists in the city of Vancouver, for instance. It was only because of circumstances over which I had no control that I was not able to leave the city of Vancouver until yesterday, but I can tell the minister that in all the time I was there, whether in home or in hospital, hardly a day passed when I did not receive a telephone call or a letter asking whether I, as a member of the House of Commons, knew where there was a house to rent for $55, $60 or $70. I had to say no. At the same time not three dozen blocks away from where I live—not in my constituency but in the adjoining constituency—there are homes financed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which have been vacant month after month. I checked directly on this matter. They are for sale. Why should we be asked now to authorize additional funds when the taxpayers' money has been spent on homes in the city of Vancouver which are lying vacant, although people are crying for a place to rent at a rent they can afford to pay? I know the answer. The answer is, because of the regulations under which those particular homes were built.

I raise this point at a time when we are being asked to vote another $500 million for home construction. If homes are being held by C.M.H.C. for sale which cannot be sold, then surely in the name of heaven we could rent them to our people at rents they could afford. To me it was heartbreaking to have to say "No" day after day when I knew that only a few blocks away from my own home there were these houses, owned by the government of Canada, which had been vacant for months. It made me, if I may put it this way, almost as heartbroken as I was coming from Vancouver to Ottawa yesterday in a government owned plane when I was told that some of the most wonderful food in this world was going to be thrown into the garbage pail when we arrived in Montreal, because that was the regulation. Cheese cake not cut, the finest cheese and everything else was to be thrown away because that was the regulation.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Winch: I only want to say that this is similar to government owned homes being held for sale and not rented. They too are being wasted. I know the minister cannot do anything about that waste of food, but perhaps he could do something about the waste of housing. If he cannot sell these homes then surely he could make them available to the people who want to rent them. We shall vote him all the money he likes for housing, but let us have the homes occupied when they are completed, not standing vacant.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to say a very few words at this time. We have had several opportunities this session to discuss the subject of housing, so it is not my intention to speak for any undue length of time today. Yesterday I tried to outline the situation as I saw it. As I said at that time, we are in agreement with the principle of the bill.

However, I was very disappointed to notice that government spokesmen were again trying to create the myth that nothing was done in the housing field under Liberal administration, and that a housing utopia has been created under the present administration. I quoted figures again yesterday showing that in the last three years we were in office slightly fewer than 400,000 homes were built. In the first three full years of this government's administration, 1958, 1959 and 1960, slightly over 400,000 homes were built. I also pointed out that we were required to put in government funds to the extent of $65 million, while this government for comparable results had to put in $924 million. I observed yesterday that this was a strange example of free enterprise. Spokesmen for this government are always happy to suggest that they are the champions of free enterprise. I know that some hon. gentleman opposite perhaps misunderstood what I said yesterday. I simply wanted to point out that this was indeed a strange example of free enterprise.

I also wish to refer to a statement which was made yesterday by the minister. He tried to get some mileage out of the fact that in the United States this year housing starts are up by only 3 per cent, while in Canada they will be up to a greater degree. We are, of course, all very glad that housing construction will be up in Canada but, as is so often the case, a comparison between Canadian and United States figures is misleading. Housing in the United States had not been depressed in 1960 to the extent that it was depressed here in the same year.

We also regret that there was nothing in the minister's statement which leads us to be encouraged to hope for or expect any early reduction in National Housing Act interest rates. Apparently no government action in this direction is envisaged in the near future. It is known that we on this side have always deplored the increases in costs that are a direct result of high interest rates. This subject was dealt with very ably by my friend the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) and I need not repeat the points he made. I wish to point out, however, that a reduction of 1 per cent in the interest rate on a $12,000 30 year mortgage would mean a saving of approximately $2,300 in the cost of a home. Surely this is deserving of serious attention on the part of this government.

We regret too that the legislation contains nothing that will reduce the high cost of housing. As hon. members know the legislation merely seeks to raise the ceiling on loaning under the existing legislation. It is also a source of regret that there has been no liberalization of the legislation to bring in any new groups of Canadians and particularly those in the lower income bracket who are denied the benefits of this act.

In that vein I should point out that in 1960, 92 per cent of the borrowers under the N.H.A. had an annual income of $4,000 or more. It can be seen that the action taken by the government scarcely meets the requirements. Certainly it fails to meet the objectives initially established by the act which was designed to assist Canadians in the lower income groups purchase their own homes. As I said, the present measure deals only with increasing the permissive ceiling.

I close as I began by saying that while we have some reservations about giving the government this much elbow room in what might well be a year preceding an election, we are in agreement with the basic principle of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank hon. members of the house for the constructive criticism they have offered as well as for their praise of the terms of the bill. I wish to assure hon. members that the suggestions they have advanced, with the best of good will I know, will be given careful and thorough consideration.

To the hon. member for Vancouver East who through no fault of his own was unable to be here yesterday may I say this with respect to the Vancouver figures about which he received telephone calls while in hospital. I shall deal first with N.H.A. approved loans, that is loans under the act where the loan is made by an approved lender and guaranteed by the government. As at the end of July, there were 20 unoccupied homes; under N.H.A. direct lending, there were 60. In other words 80 N.H.A. homes in Vancouver. That is not a large number when one considers that in the city of Vancouver alone 3,011 homes were started in the first six months of this year.

Mr. Winch: Why are you keeping them vacant?

Mr. Walker: I would not suggest that a total of 80 homes out of the thousands of houses in Vancouver represents a large percentage.

Mr. Winch: It means a great deal to 80 people.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Walker: If my hon. friend wishes to ask a question I invite him to do so at the conclusion of my remarks and urge him not to engage in a running commentary. It must be obvious even to the hon. gentleman that a total of 80 out of the vast number of homes in Vancouver represents a very small percentage to have vacant at any one time. I assure my hon. friend that these homes will be and are being filled up. Not everyone is as efficient as the hon. gentleman wishes them to be. I know my hon. friend wishes to have the facts. The existing homes will be occupied and as homes become vacant they will be filled. In the light of all the facts I think the situation in Vancouver is remarkable.

The hon. member for Welland for whom I have the greatest respect appeared to complain that there have been made available mortgages extending over periods as long as 35 years. The point I sought to make with respect to 35 year mortgages is that if Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in its wisdom feels there is need for a mortgage of that kind one is extended. I might point out that very few have been extended. I understand that less than 100 have been made available.

With respect to the ordinary mortgage, mortgages extending over periods of 25 or 30 years, there is no restriction on the home owner. He does not have to maintain that mortgage for the full period and is free to pay it off at any time, after holding it for a three year period, simply by paying a bonus of three months' interest. Where could one find anything more conducive to saving than an N.H.A. mortgage? If a mortgage is not paid off it is because the owner does not wish to pay if off or cannot afford to. How much better it is that these people with mortgages which they can pay off over a period of 25 years should be living their years in comfort in beautiful, modern, utilitarian homes rather than living the way they used to at that period when the hon. member first became a member of parliament at which time, in many instances, they lived in degradation in hovels.

We have a new concept of housing. It is the little man this government seeks to assist. It is the little man who interests the Prime Minister—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Ahem.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member for Essex East subscribes to what I am saying, I know.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member has a cold.

Mr. Walker: We are interested in seeing the little man live his life in comfort and if possible in happiness. To that end we are—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Walker: At the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question which is very relevant to what he has said?

Mr. Walker: At the end of my speech, yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was going to ask the minister if he was discriminating against the hon. member for Nipissing in talking about the little man?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I never engage in personal remarks. I have great admiration for the hon. member for Nipissing. I do not feel that remarks such as those are appropriate even though I know the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has wide latitude in this house.

I beg the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to forgive me for not permitting him to ask his question initially. Had I been aware it was such a brilliant question I would have immediately yielded the floor.

The hon. member for Welland stated that in the United States the interest rate has been dropped twice within recent months. I hasten to point out that the result has been that private funds are drying up in the United States, creating a serious situation. A demand for housing is now building up in that country and cannot be satisfied because private funds have dried up. With the reduction in the interest rate this field is no longer attractive as an investment for private funds.

In the United States mortgages can be sold at a discount. Some of these mortgages which have been reduced by one half of 1 per cent are now selling at 94, 95 and 96 cents on the dollar, the latter figure being the average.

The original cut in the interest rate has been more than overcome by the fact that the mortgage is now being sold at a discount and in the final analysis the interest rate is now higher than it was before.

The hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) asked about foreclosures. I know the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) is also interested in this. As of September 2, 1961, the claims on the fund which would result from over-all completion of a foreclosure, on the approved loans have numbered only 428. On the direct loans through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation 262 claims have been paid. In other words, a total of 690 claims have been paid under this insurance fund although, as I have indicated, close to a quarter of a million loans have been made. Therefore, when the hon. member for Welland cries aloud at the havoc being wrought on the poor unfortunate person who has bought our houses, being induced to do so by the blandishments of the Minister of Public Works, may I say that they are not doing too badly when out of that number only 690 claims have been paid.

I should like to say a word also about the point made by the hon. member for Welland who I thought was here yesterday. He claimed that there were too many vacant houses. In this assertion he was joined by many other hon. members. The fact remains that in February of this year there were 4,913 vacant dwellings, whereas in August of this year—and these are the latest figures we have been able to collect—there were 3,902 vacant dwellings. In other words, in a period of six months there was a drop of a thousand in the number of vacant dwellings in spite of the fact this tremendous building program has been carried on in the meantime. This all indicates that there is no overproduction in houses at the present time owing to the policy of the government which refused to have Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation make any loan to any builder for speculative purposes. No house can be built by a builder with a loan from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation unless that builder has a buyer who has signed a contract to occupy and pay for the house.

Many other points were made; perhaps they might be referred to when we take up the questions in some detail in committee. May I say a word about the remarks of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland). I say he has retreated from the stand he took yesterday. If he has not, let him explain it. Is he saying now that we should not continue to make loans in the way that we are making them; that we should cut down on making direct loans for the building of public housing? I will take my seat if the hon. member would like to answer those questions.

Mr. Garland: The minister can easily find out what I said if he will read Hansard. The report is very clear.

Mr. Walker: I have read Hansard. It seems abundantly clear that the hon. member who represents the official opposition has indicated that in the opinion of the official opposition this government is making too many direct loans to enable Canadians to own their own houses.

Mr. Garland: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, this is a completely false statement.

Mr. Walker: If the hon. member can read to me any part of his remarks which indicates that my statement is false I shall be glad to hear it. Here are the horns of the dilemma on which the hon. member for Nipissing, the spokesman of the official opposition, finds himself. He says, let us have a lower interest rate, which means that if we have a lower interest rate we will have less private lending for housing and therefore fewer housing units unless, when private lending drops out as it did in 1959, the government steps in even further than it has up to the present time. This year, with an interest rate of 6¾ per cent, the government will be lending $300 million, or 40 per cent of all N.H.A. direct loans.

The moment the interest rate is cut private lending dries up. There is not enough private lending even at 6¾ per cent. You cut the interest rate, you cut the private lending and the government has to participate to the extent of more than the $300 million it anticipates it will be participating in this year. Therefore, if the hon. member for Nipissing is correct and we should have lower interest rates the result must be greater participation. On the other hand, and out of the other side of his mouth but with absolute sincerity and with a certain amount of good nature, the hon. member says that the government should have less participation. There is no question about that. He said it.

Mr. Garland: That is not correct; that is not what I said.

Mr. Walker: I have read it twice. The hon. member can correct me if I am wrong. How are you going to get more private lending unless you raise the interest rate even higher than it is at the present time. Or this may be the solution of my hon. friend: he may feel there should be a real shortage of government funds and a real shortage of private lending so that we would not have enough mortgage lending to supply the very real demand of the Canadian public for new houses. Take your pick. What does the hon. member mean?

Mr. Garland: Will the minister permit a question. Does not his government even at this late date accept any responsibility for fiscal and monetary policy and does he not agree that it is entirely responsible for the high interest rates in this country.

Mr. Walker: I know my hon. friend would like to drag a red herring across the trail of this housing debate but nevertheless let us just keep to the subject.

Mr. Garland: Why not answer the question.

Mr. Walker: Ask Mr. Coyne; he will answer the question.

If, as my hon. friend from Nipissing suggests, there should be lower government participation, then there must be more private lending. If there is to be more private lending—and up to the present time private lenders have lent only 60 per cent of the public demand for N.H.A. loans—then we shall have to raise the interest rate above 6¾ per cent; in order to get more lending we must raise the rate. Surely even my hon. friend does not want us to raise the rate above 6¾ per cent. On the other hand, if he wants less mortgage funds then, of course, fewer houses are going to be built. You cannot have it both ways. Either you lower the interest rate, with less private lending resulting and more government lending taking place or in the alternative, and my hon. friend suggested this, with less government lending you must have more private lending plus a higher interest rate or the final result is less housing.

We have had a very remarkable year this year for this reason. All construction except in the field of housing—and the figures went in yesterday—was down very materially. Housing has led the way in all construction, we suggest, for the benefit of the Canadian public, for the benefit of the little man who wants a house, and at the same time it has afforded employment in N.H.A. fields of 120,000 man years of work.

If we obey the suggestion of most hon. members of the opposition that we should lower interest rates, what is the situation going to be? I recall it as a nightmare. When I became the minister in August of 1959 the interest rate had been set at 6 per cent and the rate had become unrealistic because the interest rate on bonds had gone up, as my hon. friend knows, with the result that a rate of 6 per cent was unattractive. So far had the interest rates on bonds gone up that even the banks withdrew. They would not lend any money at 6 per cent and loans by private lenders just dribbled out.

One of the things that I am perhaps responsible for was the government offering to take the place of private lenders in 1959 in order to keep housing going and afloat. We disliked raising the interest very much so we kept it at 6 per cent. As a result the government had to enter the field of direct lending that year to the extent of $343 million until, as the hon. member said the other day, we finally exhausted the amount allocated by parliament and were not able to get a new bill before parliament in time.

That is the kind of situation that I dread seeing happen again. I should certainly like to reduce the interest rate and just as soon as I can get advice from the experts which makes it appear to me to be feasible we will reduce the interest rate. We are very anxious to reduce the interest rate. However, with the experience in 1959 involving an unrealistic rate which I have related and with the experience of the Kennedy administration at the present time, which arbitrarily reduced the interest rate by half of 1 per cent with ensuing tragic results, I say to the hon. member for Nipissing and all other hon. members that, much as we would all like to reduce interest rates, it is not possible to do so at this time. If we can bring down the interest rate on long term federal bonds and on other securities of a like nature, we will reduce the interest rate on mortgages just as soon as that happens. Let me say to the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) that if in the meantime people do not want to pay for 25 years and they are industrious, as I know the hon. member for Welland has been all his life, they can pay off the whole or any part of the capital sum at any time after a period of three years by paying a bonus of only three months' interest.

The clauses in the bill are four in number and they are very simple. I will be most happy to attempt to answer any questions that arise when we are in committee. I do not want anything I have said today to be taken as an attempt to try to show up anyone. I am simply trying to explain the very difficult problem of housing which occupies more of my time than public works and the national capital commission put together.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1—Advances out of C.R.F.

Mr. Garland: I should like to ask the minister two or three questions at this time. Can he say what is the largest number of houses financed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in any one subdivision in the last 12 months?

Mr. Walker: I have no idea, but we will be glad to get that information and send it to the hon. member.

Mr. Garland: The minister has his officials in front of him now and perhaps he could tell me whether there would be any instances where more than 50 loans were made in one subdivision in the last 12 months?

Mr. Walker: Yes, there would be.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister say how many projects would have benefited to the extent of more than 50 loans and where they are?

Mr. Walker: We will put a staff together to find that information and give it to the hon. member.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister tell us the value of the mortgages that have been sold to the chartered banks this year by C.M.H.C.? I think the minister referred yesterday to a total of approximately $22 million in mortgages that were sold in the two offerings that were made, one in June and the other in August?

Mr. Walker: I would think there were very few, though I understand there were some. The banks have the opportunity to lend money at 6 per cent at any time. They do not have to charge 6¾ per cent, but even with that privilege they have not seen fit to make very many loans because it is not an attractive rate to them.

Mr. Garland: Perhaps the minister misunderstood me. How many mortgages did the banks buy, if any, in the offerings that were made in July and August?

Mr. Walker: We do not have that information and it would be very difficult to obtain because, as my hon. friend knows, some firm, institution or lending company could buy them and then sell them to a bank. We do not know exactly where some of these mortgages end up.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister tell us how many mortgages with a 35-year amortization period have been taken out since the legislation was changed last November?

Mr. Walker: Could the hon. member ask another question while we are looking that up?

Mr. Garland: I will be glad to defer to someone else.

Mr. Carter: Has C.M.H.C. a regulation which states that in a subdivision at least half of the lots must be 50 feet in width? If this is so, in view of the fact that in metropolitan areas the price of land is from $100 to $110 a foot, can this regulation not be modified? While the minister is replying, will he also reply to the question I asked yesterday about including family allowances in income with respect to low rental housing?

Mr. Walker: I understand that of necessity C.M.H.C. is forced to include family allowances as income because in a great many of our subsidized dwellings we have people in the lower income brackets who are unable to afford the normal rent for the accommodation they are receiving and a great deal of their income is made up of receipts from various welfare sources. It is therefore deemed expedient to include family allowances as well. Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. Carter: Yes. The other question I asked was about the regulation with respect to 50 feet frontage.

Mr. Walker: Oh, yes. There is no minimum of 50 feet frontage. Also, as the hon. member who is interested in the situation in Newfoundland knows, the $5,000 house which we had and which we thought might have some success, has not caught on at all.

Mr. Howard: In closing the debate on second reading, I guess as ministers are wont to do from time to time, the minister held out the prospect of a possible decrease in interest rates if interest rates in other fields could be lowered. I wonder whether at this stage he could give the committee any indication of what advice he might have in this regard with respect to a lowering of interest rates. Is it considered to be a possibility in the near future or is it perhaps wishful thinking more than anything else?

Mr. Walker: I find it a bit difficult to forecast that matter. That is more a question for the Minister of Finance. The treasury bill rate, for example, went down for a short time and we thought this situation was going to be all right or that it was a good indication. Then it flattened out again. It is difficult to say what will happen this late fall. I would hate to prognosticate. However, we are certainly keeping a sharp lookout.

Mr. Howard: I know that the Liberal party has advocated the lowering of interest rates on home building loans and has attached great blame to the ministers and the government for having raised them a while ago to 6¾ per cent. It is an admirable thing to advocate the lowering of interest rates. However, it seems strange to me, coming as it does from a party which, when it was in office and when Mr. Harris was minister of finance, did exactly the same thing with regard to interest rates on N.H.A. loans by raising them up to 6 per cent. I believe that that was done in 1956 or 1957. I am not sure of the time. They used precisely the same argument that the minister used for raising interest rates to 6¾ per cent, notably that maintaining it at the level at which it was prior to its being raised to 6 per cent—I forget what it was then; I think it was 5¼ per cent or 5 per cent or something of that nature—it was in fact drying up money from private sources for investment in the home building program.

That is precisely the argument the Minister of Public Works has used for raising the interest rate to 6¾ per cent. If I read his words correctly, he said that if private funds declined even more than they have declined at the moment, the possibility exists of raising interest rates again in order to make it more lucrative for private investors to invest their money in home building loans. It therefore seems to me that when the Liberal party, with the political philosophy or economic philosophy it has, talks about lowering interest rates and how it is going to do it, I think it is talking through its hat if it maintains the economic philosophy it has.

The Minister of Public Works is more direct and open in this matter. At least he says, now that he is in office, that he or his government has relatively little to do with interest rates, that they are influenced by private organizations and institutions outside of the regulation of government itself, and that therefore it is those factors and those forces in the financial field outside of government and outside of parliament which are really forcing interest rates up and that the government can do relatively little about the matter.

I just make that passing comment in order to say that if either of those two parties, namely the government or the official opposition, are advocating lower interest rates, they have in effect, defeated their own argument by attaching themselves to the economic ideology which they have adopted.

Mr. Walker: May I say that it is better than having no ideology at all. The New Democratic party obviously had no statement on housing at their convention.

Mr. Howard: That is not right, Mr. Chairman. If the minister had had that intense interest which he should have had in political events in this country, he would have found out that the statement he just made a while ago is incorrect, as are many other statements in this field.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to add a brief comment. The N.D.P. starts off with a clean slate in just about every field. I hope that God will let me live long enough to see its members try and get some achievements, other than the sort of speeches they have been making since they came here and since the new party was founded.

(Text):

Mr. McMillan: I should just like to ask the minister about the secondary mortgage market. What is the amount that has been sold and what is the price obtained? For instance, what was the yield to the buyer?

Mr. Walker: I will look the matter up in my speech yesterday and give my hon. friend the page number and line number. I just cannot lay my hand on it at the moment. However, I referred to the matter yesterday.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Simpson: Before the clause passes I wonder whether the minister can give some indication whether further consideration will be given to the question I raised about the unavailability of loans in the northern communities.

Mr. Walker: I want to thank the hon. member for Churchill for raising this question. It is a great problem. Thompson is being developed by the International Nickel Company. After all, when a company wants to gamble on developing a mine in the north country, one can naturally expect that the company and not the Canadian people should bear the risk involved in building houses. Hence, after our experience in Elliot Lake where some of the houses were guaranteed by the companies and some were not guaranteed by the companies, we are now seeing to it that any houses that are built in that area are guaranteed by the International Nickel Company, if they are for their employees.

Their attitude has been that International Nickel is interested in building up a townsite there and if any houses are to be built they should guarantee them, because if they are so certain of the future of the town they should have enough faith in the venture to guarantee any houses that are being built. If they have not enough faith in it, certainly the Canadian people should not be asked to bear the risk, because after all, all this money we are lending comes from the Canadian people.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the minister how the government makes the distinction between building houses in an International Nickel development in Manitoba and building a railway for the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company in northern Alberta?

Surely the minister would admit that the same consideration for the taxpayers should apply in the case of the railways as applies in the case of providing the first necessity of people, namely housing. That concern for the little man, whatever he is, that the minister was sobbing about a little while ago does not seem to be very well borne out by this contrast between the huge amount of money the taxpayers were asked to risk in the bill before us last night—

Mr. Fulton: Why were you not here to vote on that bill?

Mr. Pickersgill: —and this hard-fisted attitude with regard to people's housing.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I noted that the members of the official opposition and in fact all hon. members of the house were in favour of the Pine Point railway except the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

An hon. Member: He was behind the curtain.

Mr. Walker: Yes, we saw his head protruding from behind the curtain. He did not take any part in the vote. Now he is able to get up like a big, brave man in the House of Commons and make this suggestion. Nevertheless, we are getting along very well in Thompson and the International Nickel Company has so far stood behind every house that has been built up there.

Does that please my hon. friend, or is he displeased? Does he feel we should not insist that International Nickel should guarantee these houses and that the Canadian taxpayer should guarantee them instead?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is very good, of course, because he has had a great deal of experience, in putting words into other people's mouths. We heard the words the minister put in his mouth—

Mr. Walker: You put your foot in your mouth.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and we put the correct interpretation upon them and realized that he had also put his foot in it.

Mr. Fulton: You are a little late.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister chose to make an unnecessary and gratuitous personal reference to the fact that I was not present for the vote last night. I am very glad he did because I think another reference was made in an oblique way by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. I am only too happy to tell the minister that I did not bother staying for that vote. I was not behind the curtain. I was at home before that vote was completed watching the splendid film on Newfoundland which was shown by the C.B.C. for an hour, and which I think was worth a lot more than a totally unnecessary vote taking up the time of this house when everyone in the house had indicated that they were in favour of the bill. But this is characteristic of the way in which this government has wasted the time of parliament ever since we met last November.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Chairman, just before this clause obtains the approval of the committee I should like again to ask the minister to take a further look at the situation which I have brought to his attention. I think it is all very well to say that the International Nickel Company should have faith in their development, but I am not here pleading for the International Nickel Company; I am pleading for the people who are going into that area to make their homes. A good portion of these people are not going to be employees of the International Nickel Company.

I think we must adopt a policy not only for Thompson but for other places in the north. I can see the logic in Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation feeling that some of these places are to their mind not too good a risk, but the north must be developed and as the years go on these new developments are going to come into being. We must find a policy which will allow people going into these areas to take advantage of the facilities of corporations such as Central Mortgage and Housing.

Many of the people who are going in there are staking their future on it. They want houses, and I think they should be given the opportunity to make application and have their applications approved, whether they are guaranteed by the mining companies concerned or not.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to look into this matter further. The hon. member for Churchill is a very conscientious person.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Would the minister tell us if he has received projects of urban redevelopment from the authorities of the city of Montreal? Would the minister give us the information now?

Mr. Walker: Yes, we have received two of them.

Mr. Valade: Would the minister say if those projects are part of an over-all program for the city of Montreal or separate projects not included in an over-all plan for the city?

Mr. Walker: We have not yet received an over-all plan; these are separate projects.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Garland: I wonder whether the minister is now in a position to say how many instances there have been where more than 50 loans have been made in one particular subdivision in the last year.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, we will have to dig through our files right across Canada for that information, and we shall be happy to do so.

Mr. Garland: That will not be necessary, Mr. Chairman. I wonder whether the minister could say how many mortgages have been sold in 1961 in the United States by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Walker: None, Mr. Chairman.

[Mr. Simpson.]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, because of the eloquent reply in French of the Minister of Public Works I wish to congratulate him. I should like him to specify whether the projects asked for by the city of Montreal were in the east end or in other parts of the Montreal region. Was this specified in the plan?

Mr. Walker: The southwest part of Montreal.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, could the minister say what percentage of mortgages has been placed to date in 1961 with borrowers earning more than $4,000 a year. What is the information to the latest date that the minister might have available?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, as reported at page 8488 of Hansard for yesterday, the second paragraph, I pointed out that this year so far 36.3 per cent of National Housing Act borrowers have had annual incomes of $5,000 or less. The hon. member wishes the figure in relation to an income of $4,000?

Mr. Garland: Yes, my question had reference to an income of $4,000 and over. I wanted to see the trend. Last year, according to the minister's own figures, 92 per cent of all the mortgages placed were placed with borrowers earning more than $4,000 a year.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member fails to point out that people with incomes of less than $4,000 are fitted into federal-provincial projects or subsidized housing when we can do so, but even there they are in apartments. People with such incomes feel they cannot afford to buy dwellings in urban municipalities. They prefer to live in apartments.

Mr. Garland: Is it not a fact that they simply cannot comply with the regulations of C.M.H.C. as far as income is concerned?

Mr. Walker: If they can get a house small enough and a lot cheap enough, they can comply. The hon. member knows the regulations in connection with that.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Limits on payments out of C.R.F.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will recall that we had some discussion on the last occasion he introduced an amendment to the housing act early this session when provision was first made for loans for university residences. I wonder if he could tell us now how many of these loans have been made and how many students will be accommodated as a result of them. Could he also place on record in Hansard—if he has not got the information now a later date would be satisfactory—a list of the institutions to which loans have already been made and also a list of all the institutions which are eligible for these loans?

Mr. Walker: Yesterday I gave all this information and put it on record with the exception of the institutions to which loans were actually made. I think the hon. gentleman also asked for a list of the institutions which have applied.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will recall, perhaps, that last year we had a good deal of discussion on this point. There was some misunderstanding about which institutions were eligible. I am sure that has all been cleared up in the meantime. I do not want the minister to read the names out, but if he would indicate either today or at the first opportunity which institutions qualify and place on record in Hansard a list of those institutions which are eligible, and also a list of those to which loans have already been made, I should be grateful.

Mr. Walker: I shall be glad to do that.

On clause 4.

Mr. McMillan: I had an inquiry from two municipalities and they want to know what interest rate would be charged on these loans for sewerage projects. The minister did not give the amount yesterday—he said it would be very little more than the government paid. I wonder if he could tell us now what interest rate is being collected on money paid out already in respect to sewerage projects.

Mr. Walker: It is 5⅜ per cent.

Mr. Garland: The minister will recall that there was provision in the legislation which was the subject matter of this clause for 25 per cent of the capital and interest to be forgiven if the project was completed by the end of March, 1963. Did the government give consideration to the extension of this date when they were considering this amending legislation?

Mr. Walker: No, Mr. Chairman, because this incentive was given in order to alert the Canadian people, the municipalities and the town councillors to the urgency of this great problem of pollution and sewage of disposal; it was intended as an incentive to get them into the plan and, in addition, to improve the employment situation. The provision has been very successful and a great deal of employment is being created.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Pickersgill: By leave, now.

Mr. Walker moved the third reading of the bill.

Bill read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

The house resumed from Monday, September 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-71 respecting the Civil Service of Canada—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Chown in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose last night we were considering clause 7 of the bill and an amendment proposed thereto by the hon. member for Ottawa East.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I have promised the parliamentary secretary not to take too much time to express the ideas I might have on this matter.

First of all, I must say that I support wholeheartedly the amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard). I think it would not be too difficult for the government to grant civil servants the right to negotiate, for we have already granted the same right to the employees of certain crown corporations, such as the C.N.R., the C.B.C., and some provinces have even done the same.

The Quebec government, for instance, recently granted, in the case of the Quebec hydro commission, the right to hold direct negotiations between the commission's representatives and those of the employees association. I cannot see why the people who are directly engaged in government service, in the various departments of the federal administration, are treated in a different manner from those who work for crown corporations. Employees in various government departments serve their country and their fellow citizens just like those who are with the commissions and crown corporations, either federal or provincial.

Some people oppose recognition of this right which is fundamental in my opinion for government employees, on the grounds that this would open the door to possible strikes.

It is true that a strike of public service employees or civil servants could cause considerable prejudice to the general public and, in some areas, could even deal a hard blow to the country's economy.

However, I do not feel that civil servants want to strike and this is not only my personal opinion, because my statement is based on a brief submitted to the special House of Commons committee by the civil service association of Canada. I would simply like to quote paragraph 69, 21 of that brief:

(Text):

Another dissenting opinion is based largely on the premise that a strike could not be tolerated in the government service. We strongly emphasize that the strike is not now, nor ever has been an issue. Government employees, with some very minor exceptions, do not wish to strike. Rather we prefer impartial arbitration as a method of resolving differences.

(Translation):

I would also like to quote in that regard a paragraph from a study by Mr. S. J. Frankel, entitled: "Arbitration in the British Civil Service", on page 211 which reads as follows:

(Text):

Looking back over 35 years it is clear that arbitration has made a decisive contribution to the development of reasonable and harmonious staff relations. In a society that accepts the full implication of trade unionism it is extremely important that no large body of employees should feel that it is in an inferior position merely because its employer happens to be the state. In a sphere of public activity where the strike would be regarded as disproportionately disruptive, if not intolerable, arbitration seems to offer a fair and reasonable alternative.

(Translation):

There is another objection some people have against the right to negotiate. They say that it would infringe on parliament's authority and supremacy. Here again, the civil service association made a very specific suggestion as shown at page 22 of the brief I mentioned a moment ago, and I should like to read paragraph 73 on the same page, it reads:

(Text):

In the light of the long established and zealously guarded traditions of parliamentary supremacy under the British system, any fears that negotiation and arbitration would in any way invade or lessen parliament's right are completely unfounded. As a safeguard against any possible threat to the supremacy of parliament, the British long ago settled any question of constitutional concern through the acceptance by all concerned of the following formal agreement:

"The establishment of Whitley Councils (i.e. direct negotiation) cannot relieve the government of any part of its responsibility to parliament and ministers, and heads of departments, acting under the general or specific authority of ministers, must take such action as may be required in any case in the public interest. This condition is inherent in the constitutional doctrines of parliamentary government and ministerial responsibility, and ministers can neither waive nor escape it".

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the rights and the authority of parliament and of the representatives duly elected by the people, are well protected.

As I just said, the United Kingdom found a solution to this problem a long time ago, and I feel that we cannot accuse the mother of parliaments of being unconcerned with the rights of the representatives of the people. New Zealand and Australia have followed its example.

If a disagreement arises between the employer, who is the government, and the employees of the government, this is what happens: in most cases, the employer, having considered the requests made by the employees, establishes himself as judge in the dispute which has arisen between the two parties. While he is the employer, he sets himself up as judge, and I am of the opinion that this situation is completely abnormal.

I believe that the right to direct negotiations should be granted to the association of employees. A conciliation board, independent from the civil service commission, should be set up and, if a conciliation board is not desired, a standing committee of the house could hear the representations following the negotiations, the whole matter being submitted for the approval of parliament, should it be deemed necessary.

It is an honour and a privilege, it is true, to work for one's country. These civil servants of Canada, as many foreigners have stated again and again on various occasions, are second to no other civil service groups in other countries of the world. However, this honour and privilege of dedicating one's life and efforts to the service of one's country should not put the civil servants in an inferior position in relation to their fellow citizens who have taken up employment in private industry.

The government of Canada is one of the largest employers in the country. Hence, it is its duty to set an example for private enterprise not only by maintaining its already cordial relations with its employees, but also by granting them the right to direct negotiations with their employer, and the right of appeal before a conciliation board.

I know that this cannot be accomplished overnight, but I ask the government to reconsider its stand on this problem, so that, at the next session, employees of the federal government can be placed on an equal footing with employees in private enterprise.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, we naturally support the amendment placed before the committee. As is well known the C.C.F. has consistently advocated bargaining rights for employees not only in the public service of Canada but of the provinces as well. In previous sessions and again this session I have placed on the order paper bills designed to give employees in the public service the right to bargain collectively and to have to a degree a say in the determination of their destiny, in bargaining and in reaching collective agreements with their employers.

It may be that the ideas we proposed are not acceptable in detail and as expressed in previous debates there may exist some disagreement concerning methods and concepts. However, I shall concern myself solely with the principle of the right of employees in the public service to have, as far as possible and practical, the same rights granted to employees in industry and in crown corporations.

We welcome the support latterly given to this concept by the Liberal party. We wish hon. members of that party well in their endeavour and hope that jointly we can convince the government that collective bargaining for employees in the public service should be established.

We should be concerned with equality of treatment among Canadians. I do not think that we can or should differentiate between employees engaged in different types of endeavours. All should have equal rights. A great deal of dissatisfaction develops in the public service of Canada and of various provinces because there is a relatively narrow channel through which those employees can find relief with respect to their particular grievances or to their concepts and ideas of what should be their wages, hours of work and working conditions. I suppose it is possible, and it has been done, to refer to what has occurred in other countries and what has been the experience in another part of Canada with respect to this matter, but I do not know whether that would buttress the argument any more than it has been reinforced at the moment. If we retain the concepts of equality of treatment and attempt to work toward that end we shall be accomplishing far more than we shall accomplish by quoting statistics, figures and systems which may exist in some other parts of the world.

Some years ago the parliament of Canada decided by the enactment of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act that employees working in industry and in crown corporations would have certain rights and freedoms, one of which was the right to band together for their mutual protection within a trade union of their choice. This we think should extend and apply to the employees in the public service of Canada, and it does. There is that right of forming associations, organizations or unions of employees within the public service, and they have the advantage of that.

The Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act also states that if the employees can show to the labour relations board that a majority of them are members of a particular union, that union is entitled to receive a certificate of bargaining authority. We think this should be the law applicable to the employees in the public service also and there should be equal treatment there.

In industry and in crown corporations the employees have the right, through their bargaining agent, to sit down with their employer and bargain collectively for a collective agreement. We think that in this regard there should be equality of treatment, and there should be freedom of opportunity of individual groups within the public service to do the same thing and have their employer, the crown, sit down and bargain with them.

We think the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act says that an employee shall not be subject to pressures and manipulation by his employer. We think that should be the approach to the problem of the employees in the public service; that they should not be subject to having to go with cap in hand and consult with the Minister of Finance or with anybody else on what should be their just, fair and equitable wages, hours of work and working conditions. We think these things and agreement on them can be reached by the process of open, sincere and honourable collective bargaining between organizations representing employees in the public service and the government itself, or a representative group of the government, just the same as exists in industry and in corporations, and this is the thing that we should like to see.

In so far as strike action is concerned, we feel that this is one field—perhaps it is the only field—in which there should be a difference of attitude and policy in existence, and that in the public service of Canada there should not be the right to strike. Perhaps this is the attitude of the vast majority of people in the public service of Canada. We think there should not be that right to strike, to use the withdrawal of their ability to work as a final means of obtaining a collective agreement such as exists and takes place from time to time in industry and in crown corporations. We think that in substitution therefor there should be the right of arbitration, the right of employees concerned, through their respective organizations, to present their statistics, their arguments, their reasonings and their briefs to a tribunal and the right on the part of the crown to present arguments, statistics, and so forth on behalf of its proposals and the right of the employees of the public service of Canada to receive a decision by arbitration if necessary as to what should be contained within a collective agreement and what should be their wages, their hours of work and their working conditions.

We think it is unfair and certainly neither in keeping with the spirit which we had when we enacted the bill of rights, nor in keeping with the spirit which is contained within the words of the bill of rights, to have upwards of 130,000 employees in the public service of Canada placed in a category of being in fact second class citizens as compared with the rest of the people of this country.

If this government believes in what it believed when it enacted the bill of rights I think it is time to extend that degree of decency and equality to people in the public service of Canada.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question? The question is on the amendment.

(Translation):

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add but a few words to what previous speakers have already said about this amendment.

In reading over again the proposed amendment, which is found on page 8023 of Hansard of July 13, 1961, I note that it contains important elements, which are in keeping with the development of rights and freedoms in Canada, particularly in regard to employees.

I have already had the opportunity of taking a stand on that matter, at a civil servants' meeting held in Sherbrooke last year, and I should like to repeat today my attitude towards that problem. I consider that, in the field of rights and freedoms, there has sprung up, as from a valve, a quite natural and logical explosion, a bill of rights, introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), which, actually, has given substance to everyone's needs before the law, and to the prerogatives of all Canadians, regardless of class—but I see in this amendment, as I said, absolutely essential elements which are in keeping with the development of our labour code, and with our social evolution within the present Canadian context.

I have already taken a stand publicly on the matter, in Sherbrooke, and I do so today in the House of Commons, in favour of collective bargaining for civil servants, in order that they may be on the same footing as other workers in private enterprise.

However, I find that in the amendment, as introduced, one reservation is lacking, and that is why I find it incomplete.

[Mr. Howard.]

Therefore, I should like to point out, as I did in Sherbrooke at that meeting of government employees, that personally—right or wrong?—I am firmly opposed to any kind of strike. Of course, I am in favour of negotiations, I am in favour of arbitration, but I am opposed to the right to strike for government employees, because I want to ensure efficiency in government operations and security for all.

In the last decade, we have but too often heard of groups of government employees calling a strike at some crucial moment, in certain countries, thereby placing their government in a very dangerous position economically and even threatening public security.

That is why I would have liked a more complete amendment whatever the machinery that would make government employees give up the right to strike. Having met over 400 government employees with whom I discussed the matter in the eastern townships, last winter, I can tell you, Mr. Chairman, that all were in agreement and energetically demanded the right to negotiate and to arbitration; but they all felt also that the right to strike should be given up.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, just a word to reassure the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) who just sat down. He said that he discussed the matter with government employees in his district. I can tell him that we, in the committee, met the spokesmen of all the civil service employees and that they do not want the right to strike. The only group which asked for that right was that of the postmen, whereas, the others were flatly opposed to striking.

I entirely agree with the hon. member for Sherbrooke, and the same situation exists in the province of Quebec, where civil service employees are not given the right to strike. I think civil servants should not be given this right. But, if arbitration is granted, they will never be tempted to call a strike, because we must keep in mind that those employees are in a class different from that of industrial workers, and their problems can always be settled to better advantage by discussions in the House of Commons. I therefore think that they would be satisfied if they did not obtain the right to strike. Indeed, they have no intention of availing themselves of this right, even if it is not prohibited by law.

(Text):

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two. More than once in this debate the words "second-class citizen" have been used. I want to comment on that for a minute. I point out first of all that civil servants of their own motion have indicated that they do not wish the right to strike. For that I applaud them. Second, may I say that I have had a fair amount to do with civil servants through working with them and I have always enjoyed our association. I have always felt that we were working together in the public interest and that there was something in the quality of their employment which did not exist in any other kind of employment that I knew. While I am not going to say more about the use of the phrase "second-class citizen", I regret its use very much. I feel exactly the opposite about civil servants, and I say with deference that I hope that those who have been using that phrase will abandon it.

Mr. Howard: I should like to comment with respect to that matter. I am one of those who have used the phrase "second-class citizen". I think the hon. member for Greenwood perhaps misunderstood my application of it. I hope he did. At no time have I considered that employees in the public service are second-class or any other than first-class citizens, together with all other people in this country. What I said was that by virtue of denying these people the opportunities and the rights that exist for other employees, as other clauses in the bill will also indicate, we are in fact treating them as second-class citizens by saying that they do not have equal rights, privileges and responsibilities with other citizens of our country. My use of the phrase was not for the purpose of designating civil servants as second-class citizens but I say that this is in fact what happens when we deny them the rights that other people have. These words have been used on a number of occasions during discussions I have had with employees in the public service who consider they are treated in this way by the government, but I am not applying these words to civil servants as a class of people.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: I should like to add a few words to what the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) said earlier to the effect that the group of civil servants which asked for the right to strike was the postal workers group. I take the liberty of pointing out that if the postal workers associations have come to that conclusion, it is because of all civil servants, postal workers are about the worst treated at the present time.

When the Post Office Department's estimates were under consideration, I mentioned a great many reasons why postal workers were complaining, criticizing and asking for better working conditions.

When an association or a group of citizens is desperate, it is not surprising that at one point they should ask for the right to strike. I shall come back to this matter when we discuss the provisions relating to leave.

I should just like to give you an example to illustrate what the situation is. What should we think of the fact that postal employees lost their statutory leave because it fell on a Saturday or a Sunday, or that seasonal and part-time postal employees were compelled to pass examinations even though they were working only two, three or four hours a day? What should we think of the explanation which was given at the time, namely that since they were getting the same pay boost as regular employees, it was only fair that they should pass examinations?

Under the circumstances, they asked—and rightly so, in my opinion—for annual leave just like regular employees. That request was also turned down on the grounds that leave with pay is not calculated according to the salary earned.

Those are only a few of the reasons I put forth when we were examining the Postmaster General's estimates, to show that if there is a group of civil servants which is being unfairly treated by the present government, it is definitely that of postal employees.

(Text):

Amendment (Mr. Richard, Ottawa East) negatived: Yeas, 10; nays, 42.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could raise a point of order. I do not do so to be objectionable about the matter but because the same thing has happened before. I do not wish to mention any hon. members by name but I noticed, as I am sure other hon. members did, that during the time the vote was in progress at least four members entered the chamber. It is my understanding that this is contrary to the rule and I think the rule should be observed.

The Deputy Chairman: I thank the hon. member for Skeena for bringing this to the attention of the committee. This is a true interpretation of the rule and those hon. members who are starting the bad practice of entering the chamber after the vote has been called should desist in the future if they will, please. Shall clause 7 carry?

Mr. Caron: On division.

Clause 7 agreed to.

Private Bills

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, I do now leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of public and private bills pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

On the order:

Second reading of Bills SD-1 to SD-100 inclusive, SD-102 to SD-106 inclusive, SD-108 to SD-264 inclusive, and SD-266 to SD-356 inclusive.—Mr. McCleave.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have detected that there may be some thought in the house that unanimous consent can be secured to proceed with the bill with which we have just been dealing in committee of the whole rather than proceed with those matters to be dealt with in the private members' hour. I do not know whether that is the unanimous view.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps under other circumstances it might be the unanimous view but at this time there are other members of the C.C.F. who have made arrangements, because of the intervention of private members' hour, to be elsewhere and who also have an interest in the bill which we have just been considering. I think perhaps at this time it would not be possible to be unanimous.

Mr. Speaker: The first item stands pursuant to the order made by the house, notice not having been given to print the bills.

Order stands.

DIVORCE

MEASURE TO MODERNIZE DISSOLUTION AND ANNULMENT

The house resumed, from Thursday, December 8, 1960, consideration of the motion of Mr. Peters for the second reading of Bill No. C-7, to provide in Canada for the dissolution and the annulment of marriage.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it seems as though we were perhaps starting on a new session rather than continuing one which started a year ago as normally bills of this nature—or at least, this has been the experience in latter years—have not too often come up for resumed debate. This matter was entered into quite extensively on December 8 of last year and I think a worth-while and fairly full discussion took place by members who were interested in the principle contained within the bill.

[Mr. Caron.]

Naturally, as is the case in discussing bills of this nature which emanate from and are in the hands of private members, there was some degree of difference of opinion with respect to some of the provisions contained in the bill. However, I know that the government is in a very amenable and conciliatory mood these days. After this bill receives its second reading we may perhaps be able to straighten out some of these differences of opinion at the committee stage of the bill and then wind up, on third reading in meeting the wishes of the majority of the members of the house.

The design of the bill itself to me is to bring the law—I should not say the statute law because there is none as such—in circumstances relating to divorce in Canada as a whole into conformity with some social facts of life which exist today and which, in my opinion, have existed for some period of time. At the moment the law of divorce, with the exception of that in the province of Nova Scotia, states that the grounds for divorce are adultery and adultery only. In essence that is the situation that exists. However, I think we are all fairly well agreed that while adultery may be the grounds for divorce, it certainly is not, in the great bulk of cases, in the first instance the cause of a marital breakdown and the reason for people seeking to obtain a divorce. There are other factors which go into breaking up a marital relationship. I refer to such things as lack of a full and complete faith, alcoholism, wars, increased travelling facilities and the like. All of these things have their impingement, in my opinion, upon the marital structure and tend perhaps to make marital relationships a bit strained.

However, adultery is the only reason one can use in order to satisfy a court or parliament that a particular marriage should be dissolved. I am certainly not going to get into an argument with anybody as to the percentage or the degree of perjury that takes place before the courts or before parliament. I think this is an argument which does not lead to any end. However, in some cases, or in some instances, the law itself and the requirements of the law either force a person or a couple into an adulterous relationship which did not exist previously, or into perjury or collusion in order to meet the test demanded by the law, namely, that adultery took place between a couple of people.

I think the maintenance of the fiction that adultery is really the cause for divorce is not too sensible in itself. By making that action the sole and only reason or ground upon which a marriage can be dissolved, I think a tendency is created to say that the marriage relationship rests almost entirely upon the question of intimate relationships between the husband and the wife or, in fact, to say that marriage rests almost exclusively upon the question of amicable sexual intercourse.

We know that is not the case. We know that there are many other factors which go into making up a happy married life and into making and preserving a married relationship and the marriage itself. I think many of these other factors are forgotten in the desire to maintain adultery, as is the situation at the moment, as the only ground and, by reasoning the only cause for divorce.

As it stands now, the law does not take into account, give any relief to, or open the door to those people who find themselves in some circumstances which I intend to relate in a moment or two. For these people who, through no fault of their own in many cases, find themselves in difficulties there is no solution having regard to their marital relationships.

Let us consider an instance of desertion in which, for argument's sake, let us say the husband deserts his wife and family, if there is one. If that husband cannot be found, as is the case in many instances of which I know, the wife is maintained in that position of being married yet single at the same time She has no recourse to the courts in order to have dissolution of that marriage, even though her husband may have vanished and his whereabouts have been unknown to her for many years, and even though she is unable to find him.

I think each of us desires the company of others. In many instances women and men will find themselves attracted to some other person of the opposite sex. They are then placed on the horns of a dilemma. They ask themselves the question: What should my relationship be with this other person? Should it be one of just casual acquaintance or should we become more closely associated with each other? They say to themselves: If we do so, we shall have to do so without the benefit of a marriage being performed as one of us is already married and is unable to obtain any relief. There is no relief either in instances of extreme cruelty, alcoholism coupled with cruelty, or dissipation on the part of the husband of income which should be used for the upkeep and the welfare of his wife and family. There is no relief in sight for that particular woman except perhaps that of suing in the court for maintenance; and in many instances this procedure does not work out too satisfactorily. Others with habitual criminal tendencies and the like bring to mind other instances of one part or one half of the marriage being unable to find any relief whatsoever in the eyes of the law in so far as trying to straighten out their marital relationships is concerned.

Some people might say that this bill, if it were enacted, would in fact tend to make divorce easier and therefore tend to corrupt our present morals and tend to destroy as an institution marriage itself. However, I do not think this is the case. I think, as I said, all this bill is designed to do is bring our present divorce laws into keeping with social facts and what I think should be social conscience in this day and age.

I would refer to the statitistical information which developed in England after the passage of their matrimonial causes act. Reference to this statistical information is not to say that the same thing would apply here, of course, However, if I recall correctly from memory, I think they discovered that after the grounds for divorce were brought into keeping with the social facts which existed at the time, it did not in fact destroy the marriage system. It may have dissolved particular marriages by giving grounds for the dissolution of marriage, but if I recall the figures correctly, over a period of time 75 per cent or 80 per cent of those who were divorced at one time subsequently married again and stayed that way. This tends to show that while a marriage may be dissolved, it does not mean that the parties concerned stay single for the rest of their lives but they do find other partners and the marriage contract is entered into again with somebody else.

The bill does not primarily deal with divorce itself, as has been mentioned by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and other hon. members. It places a certain degree of emphasis upon the question of reconciliation and gives to the judge hearing a particular case the right to adjourn, to refer the parties to marriage counsellors, to clergymen or other people of similar standing, in the hope that divorce action can be forestalled and that the marriage will remain intact. In this way it is hoped to find some mutuality of desire on the part of the parties to continue in their original way in their married life without dissolving the marriage.

I do not intend to enter into the relative grounds of this argument, but it has been mentioned and I am sure we all feel there is a degree of hypocrisy which arises out of our present divorce laws. There is a certain degree of dishonesty and perjury. I am quite sure this is well known to members—at least some—of the legal profession. I am sure it is quite well known and understood to exist in so far as the courts are concerned. This is in no way casting reflections on the courts or members of the legal profession. It is well known by private detectives and I am sure we as legislators have knowledge of it. It does exist to a certain extent. It is also known to the general public, certainly to those who have become involved in divorce actions in a direct way as one of the litigants.

This bill, of course, would not eliminate perjury, collusion or dishonesty in the presentation of cases before the courts. It is not designed to do that. However, I think it would tend to cut it down because it would recognize desertion, cruelty and the like as other grounds for divorce.

Again, if I recall correctly some statistics emanating from Great Britain after the passage of the matrimonial causes act in that country, all but about 3 per cent or 4 per cent of the divorces were granted for either adultery, desertion or cruelty. These are perhaps the three major complaints and grievances that exist at the present time in society. As I say, this bill would not eliminate that; it would only tend to cut it down and bring the law itself more in keeping and on a more equitable footing with what in fact exists in society today.

I was being a little facetious earlier, Mr. Speaker, when I said we could straighten out some of these difficulties in committee of the whole, because I do not think we are going to get that far. I do not think this bill will receive passage this session. I do not think it will come to a vote, although I should certainly like to see it come to a vote. But with our forces disseminated the way they are, we would not even be able to call a vote if we got that far. I can say that at least in this one instance our party is unanimous today.

However, some day I am quite sure that a bill containing the principles contained in the present bill will be passed and endorsed by a parliament of Canada and will be introduced by a government of Canada. We all know that to some degree bills and legislation tend to lag behind public need and public demand. This is not always the case, but it is the case in some instances. Legislation tends to lag behind public demand when it is of such great importance as to create major differences of opinion based on fundamental beliefs and ideals.

That is the case in this instance. I think in this connection we must respect the feelings and desires of everyone in the country and we must come to the conclusion that it will be some time yet before the parliament of Canada does get around to passing a measure such as this. But some day it will occur and I think that when the statute law of Canada reflects the social matters, principles and ideas contained within this particular bill it will be appropriate to pay a very great tribute to the hon. member for Timiskaming who drafted, developed and primarily conceived the ideas and concepts contained in this bill. We should pay a tribute to the hon. member at that time for having the courage to bring forward such a far-reaching measure as this bill.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, in rising briefly to speak on this bill I must say that I appreciate the sincerity of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) who has become more or less an authority on divorce bills. However, I feel there is a great deal that could be discussed in connection with this bill before it is passed.

I am not in any way an authority on divorce laws. Perhaps fortunately I was able to find a spouse who has kept me reasonably well on the straight and narrow path and kept me out of trouble. However, I solemnly believe that divorce is something that is necessary in our way of life. From day to day we hear and read of cases where there has been extreme cruelty, not only to the wife but also to the children. I think in cases of this kind as well as adultery, divorce is the only way to solve the problem. Our stay on this earth is not too long at the best, and I think that in cases where there is extreme cruelty or other causes divorce is certainly something that is needed to relieve mental agony.

I think there is a great deal of merit in this bill and the sponsor deserves some credit for bringing it forward at this time. I am sure he echoes the opinion of many people throughout this land. However, in considering a bill of this kind we must be mindful of the British North America Act. This act gives religious rights and other privileges to the people of this country. While some say that this is an old fashioned act and belongs to the horse and buggy days, I think it has done much to preserve national unity. It also keeps the federal government in line so that things are not done which may adversely affect the provinces. Sometimes I think that if the United States had an act similar to the British North America Act there would be fewer racial problems and less prejudice there than there is at the present time.

Perhaps there are many good things in this bill, but I think time is too short tonight to go into the question very thoroughly and debate it properly. For these reasons I think it should be held over until some other occasion when all members of the house would have an opportunity to express their opinions on it. I do not say that our system at the present time under which divorces have to be handled through the machinery of private bills is the best possible system. Nevertheless, I do not believe there has been too much wrong with it in the past and I feel that for the present, until the provinces which do not have divorce courts have an opportunity to express their opinion as to what should be done, we should continue our regular procedure and see that the divorce bills which are on hand are passed before the house recesses in order that those who have cause to be separated may have that desire satisfied. Again, I think there is a lot of good thought behind this bill and I compliment the hon. member upon bringing it forward. However, I feel we should let it stand over and give it further consideration at some other time.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): First of all I wish to approve of the last sentence expressed by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. I think it would be most reprehensible, having in mind the fact that these people have come to the ultimate seat of justice in this country seeking what they feel is an appropriate remedy, if they were denied that remedy at a time when they may have no other recourse. I do hope that before we conclude our deliberations in this chamber this will be done.

I also wish to associate myself with what the hon. member said with regard to those who participated in this debate on December 8. This was one of the debates which, I think, brought out a very high quality of contribution from the members who spoke. I think there has been great diligence shown in doing research work. I think there was sincerity and honesty displayed by all those who spoke at that time and I think that, like the debate having to do with capital punishment, without in any way disparaging other debates, it was an indication of the heights to which hon. members can rise when there is a deep social problem involved and corrective measures may well be required. As to that, I think there is no doubt.

I can recall many years ago in a northern town included in the district where I practised my profession one week when I participated in three murder trials each of which involved a husband and wife. In each of these cases the situation might well have been cured by the ability to obtain a dissolution of the marriage. I think it is a drastic way to have to get a divorce, to use a shotgun, but this was my experience many years ago and I have never forgotten it. I recall that after the war when I resumed my practice I was shocked by the large number of applications from people seeking dissolution of their marriages. I think it was probably the experience of many members of the bench and of the bar, that these were the result of too hasty marriages. But it does underline the fact that there is a very real and serious problem. Those who read history can establish that when you see the disintegration of our family life you may then see the deterioration of the civilization in which it was produced.

There is a very interesting series of articles appearing in Life magazine—and I think we can take wide latitude in dealing with this particular subject matter. I happened to pick up this magazine last night and I commend the reading of this article to all members. It deals with the entire question of marriage and divorce. Contributions come from trained sociologists and people who have had a great deal of experience in conncetion with this problem. The article I picked up deals with what is probably one of the reasons for the multiplicity of divorces. I think that what the hon. member is trying to strike at in his bill is rather the effect than the cause, but this particular article deals with the question of courtship, which is related to marriage, and I am going to take the liberty of reading a few extracts. This is from Life magazine dated September 15, 1961, and I am reading from page 118. The article says:

> Because there were no sociologists until recently to study and record such matters, the history of courtship is obscure. There is every reason to presume, however, that very few civilized people of bygone eras ever had as much freedom of choice as today's young Americans. To be sure, the people who did not count, like the serfs of the Middle Ages, having no property, no prospects and no real control over their own futures, mated casually and often without benefit of clergy. But the lords in the feudal castles were much more careful—for ever since men first began accumulating property, rank, social prestige and pride of lineage, they have tried to preserve and augment these acquisitions through marriage. The rulers of ancient Rome would never have thought of letting a daughter marry a commoner. The Capulets did not even want their Juliet to fool around with the Montagues' Romeo.

And again, with respect to arranged marriage:

> Thanks to a thousand overromantic novels, plays and movies, it is commonly thought of as an attempt to force a lovely and innocent young girl into the arms of some disgusting old lecher who has slipped her greedy father a couple of thousand dollar bills—a situation calculated to make any good American's blood boil... Yet in weeping for all the poor girls forced into marriage against their will in other countries, Americans may have been wasting their sympathy. Dr. David Mace, executive director of the American Association of Marriage Counselors, says in his "Marriage East and West" that many of these downtrodden victims of the arranged marriage have not seemed to mind at all. Indeed, young women from the Far East, observing western courtship customs for the first time, have often wound up feeling sorry for the American girls who have been feeling so sorry for them. The idea of being forced to go out alone into the open market, and to preen and flirt in the hope of attracting a husband, strikes many Oriental women as terribly undignified and demeaning.

I hasten to add that I am not adopting this particular philosophy. I just offer it to the house as an indication of the problem that is now being considered carefully by many thoughtful people.

I say to the hon. member for Skeena and to the sponsor of this bill that I have grave doubts as to whether the legislation which they propose will do anything other than regularize divorce by opening up more avenues for divorce, a situation which they cannot ever hope to cure.

This bill is difficult to deal with on second reading because I believe it involves a variety of subject matters. There are a number of principles on related matters all brought together within the four corners of the bill. Under those conditions I assume I might be granted some latitude in dealing with the principles of the individual proposals which are incorporated in the proposed measure.

In the first instance it seems to me there is a real jurisdictional question which is thrown out by the principles contained in this bill. The argument was developed in this debate when the bill was first before us for consideration, that the British North America Act divided between the provincial legislatures and the federal government certain aspects of marriage and divorce. Item 26 of section 91 of the British North America Act gives to the federal government jurisdiction over the question of marriage and divorce. Section 92, on the other hand, gives to the provincial legislatures the power to deal with the solemnization of marriage in the province. I have had no opportunity to examine the records and debates at the time the fathers of confederation enacted their agreement and the reason for this division is obscure to me. I do not think any real arguments can be made about it.

I suggest that this government has been diligent under the leadership of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) in securing certain reforms in connection with the constitution, including the repatriation of the British North America Act and including consideration of the question of the delegation of powers and of certain other changes in our constitution. This might well be a subject which could be placed on the agenda at a federal-provincial conference.

When he participated in this debate on a previous occasion the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) gave what I think was his legal opinion when he said that so far as the province of Quebec is concerned the entire jurisdiction might well fall squarely in the lap of that province. I think the hon. gentleman went a little far in making that statement but the questions of marriage, divorce and the solemnization of marriage do appear to be related. It may be that the people in certain areas, districts and provinces, hold certain views about these problems. If a conference were held at which these questions could be discussed freely and openly the conclusion might be reached that the matter is one which could be dealt with by a change in the British North America Act which would have the effect of giving back to the provinces the entire jurisdiction in this field. I do not say I adopt that view but it is something that might well be considered.

The problems concerning jurisdiction are in my opinion underlined when we come to read the bill. We find so many areas where there is likely to be a multiplicity of litigation. If the bill were to be adopted as it stands I can readily see that the courts of this country would be flooded with litigation. Some of it would go to appeal and in many instances two or three years would require to elapse before there could be a final determination by the ultimate court, the Supreme Court of Canada. I throw out that suggestion for consideration by the house.

For example, I shall deal with one of the principles involved in the portion of this bill relating to the question of domicile which creates a genuine problem. The sponsor of this bill suggests that there should be a Canadian domicile. That might be all right but a practical problem would necessarily follow. In the case of a couple living in Ontario, the husband might seek his recourse in the courts of the province of British Columbia. Under such circumstances, what would happen if the parties continued to live in Ontario? What about the question of enforcement of the order of the court? What about the questions of alimony, support for and, maintenance of the children and custody of the children? A definite problem would arise of which we cannot rid ourselves simply by saying we will establish a Canadian domicile in divorce to make it possible for those seeking dissolution to go to the courts of any province. I believe that would create many more problems than it would solve.

Clause 6 of the bill sets out a large number of grounds which would enable a court to dissolve a marriage. Some of those listed are already grounds for dissolution. Contrary to what was said by the hon. member for Skeena, unnatural conduct and bestiality are at present grounds upon which the courts will grant divorce. Did I hear the hon. member object to that statement? Possibly I did not. In any event I can assure the hon. member that that is the case and that the courts have on many occasions granted dissolution of marriage on such grounds.

In the case where a party had been guilty of gross cruelty in the first month after marriage, I think it would be monstrous to suggest that it should be tolerated for longer than a month and it should not be necessary to demand that the marriage persist for a further period of one year before dissolution is granted. I think that is wrong and improper. Some of the other grounds set out in clause 6 might be deserving of consideration but I certainly could not lend my support to legislation which opens up, as this bill seems to, so many avenues for dissolution of the sacred contract of marriage on such flimsy grounds.

We come now to the question of procedural matters under the B.N.A. Act. The provincial legislatures have authority in connection with the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts including the procedure in civil matters in those courts. In reading the bill we find that a conflict arises immediately. This measure suggests there should be attached to the courts a conciliation process and it goes far in outlining in detail precisely how the court should operate, how the judges should act, what procedure should be adopted and so on. At first blush I should be inclined to think that this is an infringement of the powers of the provincial legislatures to deal with the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts.

On the question of evidence, recently several legislatures in western Canada have amended their evidence acts so as to permit certain types of evidence to be given in divorce cases which, under the Russell case in England, had not been permissible before. Clause 11 of this bill which we are considering makes certain evidence permissible. I would have grave doubts whether this clause is not ultra vires, having in mind authority given to the provincial governments.

There are many other aspects of this bill that I could deal with and possibly if at some time the bill gets into committee those matters can be considered in detail.

Before I conclude with this particular aspect of the matter I should like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). They have made themselves masters of this subject. I would think that since after the next election it is most likely they may be seeking other employment they may well put to good use the knowledge they have acquired and might collaborate in writing a book which could well be known among the members of the legal profession as "Peters and Howard on Parliamentary Divorce". I would look forward to the publication of such a book.

Speaking seriously, Mr. Speaker, I think there is a problem here. I do commend those who have participated in the debate. I think this is something with which we will have to come to grips. Anyone who examines statistics with regard to this question of the break-up and dissolution of marriages must feel that remedies must be sought, but I think we will have to go farther than simply attempting to deal with the results, and we might better turn our attention to some of the causes.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the subject before us today, involving as it does the question of statistics of married couples and how the problem of divorce can be resolved, is one on which I should like to speak with extreme diffidence. In my opinion there is nothing that can so arouse the enmity of the ordinary man in the street, so arouse the emotions of such a broad range of people as to consider lightly the processes by which or the reasons for which that state of matrimony may be dissolved. For instance, I should like to quote from page 614 of Hansard, where the remarks of the hon. member who introduced the bill may be found. In the lefthand column we find the following:

> We have received hundreds of letters, and very few of them have been opposed to broadening the grounds upon which divorce is granted. While I would not go so far as to suggest that, in a political sense, this would be dishonest, I do suggest that it might not be politically sound. Surely a member of parliament does not have to listen to every crackpot in his particular riding.

I am sure that on reflection the hon. member will not say that everyone who disagrees with his bill, certainly with the manner in which it is presented, is a crackpot. On reading this over I sometimes wonder whether the hon. member believes that those who are opposed to broadening the grounds for divorce must themselves be crackpots. Certainly the manner in which the bill is presented, the wholesale recommendations contained therein and the extent to which the grounds for divorce have been broadened lead me to believe that the hon. gentleman who introduced the bill is at least most impatient of the views of those he believes hold marriage to be much too sacred. As we know, there are probably represented in this house various opinions on how sacred are the bonds of matrimony and to what extent they may be loosened by any action of this house in easing the manner of getting rid of them.

The hon. member who just preceded me touched on a very valid point when he suggested that perhaps we should be giving greater thought to the grounds of divorce. There was also his point on the ease of entering into the bonds of matrimony. An examination of the laws of various European countries will show that in most instances certainly getting married is not the simple task it is here. In certain countries it involves very definite compliance with the canons of church law and long drawn out legal procedures. It usually ties in the question of property settlement and the ways in which the wife shall share in her property. All this, Mr. Speaker, is merely an illustration of the fact that matrimony is a subject that cannot be taken lightly. The fact that it has perhaps been entered into too lightly in this country leads to the rather more furious search for the means of getting rid of it.

The hon. member who introduced this bill made another remark in his speech that I could not quite agree with. At the top of page 613, in the left hand column, he said:

> We have felt that the House of Commons cannot rule efficiently on divorce petitions, and are concerned about cases of this type and their effect on the work of the house and the other place as well. It seems to me that members of parliament and members of the other place, many of whom were formerly members of parliament or are public spirited citizens, do not have the ability to judge these cases and in most cases they do not have the inclination to act as a judicial body.

I think it would be most unkind to consider passing the bill before us today on the ground that members of the other house do not have the ability or the inclination to deal adequately with the problems presented to them. It is my opinion that most of the members of the Senate committee dealing with divorce are retired or still practising members of the bar. Before they came to that Senate committee most of them had had many years of experience in divorce matters. Certainly, over the last few years, considering the number of divorces that have been handled by that house, any member of fairly long standing on that committee is likely to be one of the most qualified by way of experience in Canada for dealing with divorce. I submit therefore that to suggest they are not qualified is to overlook the facts completely. If we are to take away from the Senate the duty and obligation of looking into and in effect trying these cases, certainly we should not let it be said that we did it on that most unkind ground that they are not capable.

The fact of the experience of the tribunal trying cases of divorce has been brought home to me very forcibly. I believe that if we examine closely the cases tried by the Senate we will not find there any lack of attention to them, any lack of willingness to examine the evidence carefully and closely. What appears to us sometimes to be very hurried dealing with these matters is not actually the case, I suggest, because with their experience, their knowledge of human nature and the number of cases they have handled they are able to see in a much better perspective and much more quickly exactly what is at the heart of any particular case presented to them.

As a lawyer I have handled many divorce cases and I have listened to many being presented. I have learned that experience and an older and wiser head can sometimes save a lot of time or point out some place where either I or the lawyer handling the case has missed a point. I recall having heard a case presented in the supreme court in Edmonton and the judge on the bench ordering that a copy of the transcript be sent to the Queen's proctor. This meant, of course, that the attorney general's department would be asked to look into the matter, to investigate the validity of the evidence given and to find out if perjury had been committed quite apart from the alleged adultery. I was amazed that the judge should so order in that case because to me it had seemed to fit the pattern. In my opinion the witnesses had appeared very honest and yet the judge, with far more years of experience, had detected a false note and had the matter investigated.

It turned out that a charge of perjury was laid and also one of suborning perjury not because adultery had not been committed but because the defendant's husband—this is where human nature and the peculiarities of personality come into the picture—who had been willing to give his wife evidence of his adultery apparently decided that he did not have the nerve to stand up in court and persuaded a friend of his to get up and say that he had been present on this particular evening and had witnessed just enough to satisfy the court. Investigation by the police proved that the friend had not been there at all that evening although it did come out that the act complained of which constituted grounds for the divorce had in fact been committed. Only the peculiarity of the personality of one man caused this divorce to go astray in the courts. I have cited this case merely as an illustration of the manner in which the experience of the tribunal can play such an important part and of how the manner and demeanor of the witnesses and the circumstances related can so often lead the court to discern the true from the spurious testimony.

As to the question of the grounds for divorce, I have had, as I am sure most hon.

members have, requests from people to do something about the grounds for divorce. Certainly I am not one of those who are convinced that no matter what happens a divorce should not be granted. I think it is necessary, and in fact on humanitarian grounds I feel that our present divorce law must be broadened a little. It does not hurt to remind hon. members of the extreme hardship that befalls a woman who has entered into the bonds of matrimony with as much care and forethought as anyone in the community and who has in fact chosen a very good husband when later the man suffers some slight injury which affects his mind and he becomes incurably insane. Certainly it is hard for this or any other body to say that it is right that this woman who has suffered this misfortune must stay married forever to this man.

I can well understand the argument of those who say that you marry for better or for worse, that medical science, good as it is, is still not an exact science, that there is no such thing as a hopeless case and that this is an instance where the woman should have a little more faith and patience. It is a little hard to follow that argument too far if the woman has children to raise. Certainly under today's conditions it is hard enough for a husband and wife both of whom are working to raise, feed, clothe and educate a couple of children. For a woman who is still married to try to run a house and earn a livelihood for her children and to be faced with such a situation with no hope of relief until the children grow up is, I think, being so strict that we should yield to the argument that this at least we must correct.

In my opinion there are many causes for divorce listed in clause 6 of the bill for which strong arguments can also be advanced, but I was struck by one thing. The causes for divorce set out in the bill include nearly all the causes for judicial separation that now exist. I do not know whether it is a case of experience, good planning or just good luck, but if there is one thing which I wholeheartedly support it is that I would much rather see a divorce than a separation. If these grounds are good enough to break up a marriage by means of a separation, they should be sufficient grounds for a divorce. I think that the most unsatisfactory method that we have in this country today for dealing with irreparable differences between husband and wife is to give them a judicial separation. They are neither married nor single and in nearly all cases the financial results are most regrettable.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-71 respecting the civil service of Canada—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Chown in the chair.

Clauses 8, 9 and 10 agreed to.

On clause 11—Governor in Council to fix. (Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I think that section 11 could be greatly improved if it were drafted as follows:

> The governor in council, after consultations, negotiation and agreement with the representatives of appropriate organizations and associations of employees of the crown, shall recommend to parliament to establish rates of pay for each grade and establish the allowances that shall be paid in addition to pay.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out that yesterday, when I dealt with section 7 as amended, I made a mistake. I said that employees did not have the right to recommend on their own that a study of projects be undertaken. Following the remarks made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), I must change the statement I made yesterday. I find that this right is actually included in the proposed amendments. I had taken my information from another source, because I note that section 7 reads as follows:

> The Minister of Finance or such members of the public service as he may designate shall from time to time consult with representatives of appropriate organizations and associations of employees with respect to remuneration, at the request of such representatives—

Therefore, I erred yesterday evening and I feel that to be in conformity with the amendment which was proposed to clause 7, we should amend clause 11 as follows:

> The governor in council, after consultations, negotiation and agreement with the representatives—

Just as it seems to be in clause 7—

> —with the representatives of appropriate organizations and associations of employees of the crown, shall recommend to parliament to establish rates of pay for each grade, and establish the allowances that shall be paid in addition to pay.

This somewhat changes the clause since it would be parliament, and not only the government, which would have the final say in the matter. In my opinion, it is always better that such problems should be passed upon by parliament instead of by the government only. That is why I move the following amendment—

(Text):

In English the amendment would read as follows:

Clause 11 should be replaced by the following:

"The governor in council, after consultations, negotiations and agreement with the representatives of appropriate organizations and associations of employees of the crown, shall recommend to parliament to:

(a) Establish rates of pay for each grade, and
(b) Establish the allowances that shall be paid in addition to pay.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am glad the hon. member for Hull took the occasion to correct the impression he left last evening. It is typical that he did so in such a gracious way tonight. The amendment he has just moved was not one which was raised in the special committee studying this act. Consequently it was not submitted to the detailed study to which so many other amendments were submitted in that committee. I have had only the briefest opportunity of reviewing this amendment but as a result of my review I should like to submit to my hon. friend and to the committee that by the amendment he has just moved he would place the rates of pay for each grade in the civil service and the establishment of allowances in the greatest possible strait-jacket. Desirable perhaps though his objective might be, it would in practice be totally impractical.

The hon. gentleman seeks to have the governor in council in each case recommend to parliament the establishment of rates of pay for each grade; thereby parliament becomes in each case the final arbiter. There can be no salary adjustment, no change in the rates of pay for the various classifications until it has been approved by parliament.

I am sure my hon. friend does not seek to have civil servants suffer, as they would, for a long period of time until parliament could get around to dealing with the matter. May I submit to my hon. friend, whose great concern in this matter I know so well, that the objectives he has in mind are well covered by clause 7 and would perhaps be impeded by the amendment which he now proposes. May I suggest to him that in this amendment he would reach a final objective which I am sure would be undesirable to his constituents, and I am certain it would be to mine. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I have to ask the committee not to adopt the amendment of the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Carleton just said this amendment would bring about delays. I do not know of any longer delays than those brought about by the government when the civil service received the last increases in salary. The consultations started over a year before and it took it over six months to implement the increases.

If the recommendation of the governor in council were brought before parliament I do not think it would mean more delays. I think it might force the government to consider the whole matter in bulk instead of taking one group one month and another group another month. I really believe it would be an advantage, and it was also recommended by the civil service federation on page 6 of their brief.

Amendment (Mr. Caron) negatived: Yeas, 5; nays, 32.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 11 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Caron: On division.

The Deputy Chairman: Carried on division.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Clauses 12 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 19—Establishment review.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: I have here another amendment; it is in conformity with the requests submitted to the committee and the government by civil service staff associations.

Clause 19, as it reads at the present time, provides the following:

The governor in council may from time to time review the establishment of the departments and may, after considering the recommendations or representations of the deputy head, delete positions from or add positions to the establishment of the department.

First of all, I feel that this puts too much power in the hands of the deputy heads and not enough in those of the commission. Now, it is the deputy head who recommends to the department reduction or increase in establishment. I think that this system is not absolutely advantageous since several deputy heads, even with the best dispositions, are often led to make mistakes.

Therefore, that is why, without any further ado, I move the following amendment, that clause 19 be amended as follows:

The governor in council shall request the civil service commission to review the establishment of departments at least every three years and may after considering the recommendations or representations from the deputy head and the civil service commission, delete positions from or add positions to the establishment of the department.

(Text):

The amendment reads in English:

That clause 19 be amended to read as follows:

19. (1) The governor in council shall request the civil service commission to review the establishment of departments at least every three years and may after considering the recommendations for representations from the deputy head and the civil service commission, delete positions from or add positions to the establishment of the department.

That is, at least every three years.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this amendment has two features. The first was considered in relation to another clause of the bill, I think clause 6, namely whether a mandatory injunction should be placed upon the civil service commission to review the establishment of departments every three years. The view which was taken in the special committee was that such a mandatory injunction would probably result in reviews only every three years, whereas in the normal course of events the reviews might well be more frequent. The committee, after giving rather detailed consideration to this matter, decided not to establish such a particular and detailed procedure. I hope this committee of the whole will adopt the same view as that adopted by the special committee.

The second feature of the amendment is that in respect of the recommendations which are to be made for establishments of the departments under clause 19, not only shall the deputy head be responsible but the civil service commission as well. I think the hon. gentleman has overlooked the position which the civil service commission occupies with respect to other clauses of the bill, and in particular clause 16.

I personally am satisfied that the bill has achieved a basic structure where you will have the proper co-operation of the deputy head and of the civil service commission. It must be remembered that under the new structure of the bill it has been sought, in accordance with the principles of the Heeney report, to leave those managerial functions to the deputy head and to leave recruitment and the other functions which are of a special nature and the responsibility of the civil service commission under the commission itself. I hope we will not insert in a clause such as clause 19 an intermingling of the kind I think my hon. friend proposes of the functions of the deputy head and of the civil service commission. I think if we do we will depart from what was the basic intent of the Heeney report, which is basically the text of this bill.

Mr. Caron: I really believe that we should give more power to the commission and less to the deputy heads. This is what I told the committee every time I had the opportunity to state my point of view. They could call upon the deputy head concerned to submit the report, but instead of submitting the report to the governor in council right away it should go through the commission and then the commission should make its report to the governor in council. I do not believe there is enough power in the hands of the commission and I believe there is too much power vested in the deputy heads. That is the reason I brought in this amendment to subclause 1. I shall have another amendment to move to subclause 2.

Mr. Herridge: I have not read this amendment over carefully, but I have listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Hull. I agree in principle with what he is trying to achieve, namely the vesting of greater power in the commission. I do not think we should leave such great power in the hands of the deputy minister and on this account we shall have pleasure in supporting the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Caron) negatived: yeas, 7; nays, 41.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 19 carry?

Mr. Caron: No. There is subclause 2. I shall not discuss the matter at any greater length, because it involves the same principle. I want the commission to have the responsibility instead of the deputy heads, and so I move that the clause be amended to read as follows:

(2) For the purposes of this section, the deputy head shall submit to the civil service commission and the governor in council a plan of organization and such further information or material as the commission or governor in council may require.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have pointed out to the committee that this, really, is covered by clause 6(b) which was carefully discussed in the special committee and upon which the committee took the opinion of the draftsman. I venture respectfully to submit to the hon. member that what he suggests would be contrary to the structure proposed in the Heeney report. I think it might be well if I were to read section 26 of the Heeney report which deals with this subject:

In our view, the present division of responsibility between the commission and treasury board for determining the organizational structure of departments involves unnecessary duplication and inhibits ministers and their deputies in the management of their departments. It is the deputy minister who, subject to the direction of his minister, is and should remain responsible for the efficient performance of the functions allocated to his department. Consequently, in our opinion, the deputy head should have a major responsibility for determining the organizational structure best suited to meet the department's needs. On the other hand, over-all control of the service in this respect must clearly be exercised by the government, and each department must operate within such functional, financial and staff restrictions as the government may set.

May I point out to the hon. member for Hull that it is the commission which has the exclusive right to classify in accordance with clause 16 of the bill. The power to establish and the power to classify must always be considered as co-ordinate—that word is possibly not the exact word for which I am looking, but it expresses the point well enough. Without one, the other cannot operate. The structure set out in this act was very carefully considered by the committee; it is one under which there will be true co-operation between the deputy heads and the commission.

Mr. Caron: That is exactly what I am asking. I am asking that the deputy heads should report to the civil service commission and not to the governor in council, because I think the commission should be in a position to know everything that is going on in the department. The hon. member for Carleton claims this comes under clause 16, but that does not deal with the same thing. This clause deals with the reorganization of the department. The other is concerned with the classification of certain posts. It is not the same, and if it were so similar why did the government place this clause 19 here? That would not have been necessary if it were covered by clause 16. It is none too clear. This is not a literary affair which we are discussing now, and when a thing is not clear, why not repeat it so as to introduce more certainty than there is at the present time.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 8; nays, 45.

Clause 19 agreed to.

Clauses 20 to 23 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 24—Appointment by deputy.

Mr. Caron: Here again I think there is too much power vested in the deputy heads. I think the law would be very effective without this provision. Neither the law of 1918 nor the recommendations of the Heeney report would support such a clause as this.

I therefore move:

That clause 24 of Bill No. C-71 should be deleted from the act.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this suggestion was carefully discussed in the committee. There is a provision in the present act, and a requirement for such emergency powers. I ask the committee to uphold the clause.

The Deputy Chairman: The vote will be on the clause per se. Shall clause 24 carry?

Mr. Caron: On division.

Clause 24 agreed to, on division.

Clause 25 agreed to.

On clause 26—Probation.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I think the present legislation provides that anyone having been promoted may be dismissed during the probationary period. That is a real threat to the security of the civil servants.

I am sure that, in this matter, the civil service associations do not see eye to eye with the government and the majority of the committee. I therefore move that subsections (1) and (2) of clause 26 be renumbered (2) and (3) respectively and that a new subsection (1) be inserted, as follows:

26. (1) Any appointment made under sections 22, 23 and 25 of this act (Bill C-71) shall be subject to an appeal from any civil servant who considers that he was deprived of the opportunity to qualify for the position where the appointment is made.

Rightly or wrongly, some employees sometimes think that they are discriminated against. If they are granted an appeal, then, they can prove why they think they are right. If the appeal is lost, no one can be blamed.

When recommendations come from department heads, they sometimes meet with small difficulties. We have seen it happen in the past and it will happen again because men are sensible to flattery, and that can bring about small problems. That is why I am proposing that amendment.

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I have had a little difficulty in following the purport of my hon. friend's amendment. The actual intent of section 26 is to enable the reduction of the probationary period. I really fail to understand how anything in that section can relate to the appointments made under section 22 which are appointments from within the public service, or to those made under section 23 which are also made within the public service; or to those made under section 25 which relates to appointments made in special cases. With respect I suggest there is much confusion in relation to this proposal.

May I say to the hon. gentleman that generally speaking the attitude I took in the special committee was one of broadening to the greatest possible extent appeals under all circumstances. One of the great virtues of this bill is that it places appeals on a regular basis and in a position they have not enjoyed before. I think the addition of the hon. member's proposal to section 26 would result in virtually a confusion between appeals and the probationary period which I submit have no similarity or affinity.

Mr. Caron: My hon. friend has made reference to the probationary period but I point out that there is a specific reference to the appointments being made within the public service. Let us take an example. A man who is appointed is on probation for six months.

If for any reason the deputy head does not like him he can make a report against him and the employee will not be accepted. The employee should have a right of appeal in such cases against the decision of the deputy head.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What my hon. friend does not seem to understand is that he has been referring to section 23 which deals with appointments from outside the public service and with section 25 which may or may not deal with appointments outside the public service. He is putting in a clause which I venture to suggest confuses the issue and I ask the committee not to support it.

Mr. Caron: I believe it is very clear. A person with a special skill may feel he is being denied an appointment and in that case I feel he should have a right to appeal.

Amendment (Mr. Caron) negatived: Yeas, 10; nays, 47.

Clause 26 agreed to.

Clauses 27 to 38 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 39—Delegation to deputy head.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, according to reports the associations submitted to me, I believe it would be possible to substantially improve section 39 through certain amendments.

In its present form, this section still presents certain dangers. In fact, the deputy head is still the one who exercises the powers delegated to him by the commission, and I feel that the insuperable difficulties we have in the civil service, and that we have had almost from the beginning, have to do with promotions, salary increases, or the holding of a job because of deputy heads who have excessively bad dispositions.

Therefore, I move the following amendment:

(1) That section 39 be changed to subsection 1 and that the following subsections be renumbered (2) and (3) respectively.

(2) The commission shall review the exercise of any power it has delegated every two years, or each time there appears to be any abuse, and indicate to parliament in its annual report the details of such a review.

(3) The commission shall suspend forthwith the delegated authority for exercising or performing its powers or functions upon evidence of abuse of such authority, and it shall not restore such authority until it is satisfied that another offence shall not be committed.

Mr. Chairman, it is precisely in order to avoid such abuses that I move this amendment.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I thought that the amendment had a rather familiar ring to me, and I do find it is one which the hon. gentleman moved in the special committee. It was discussed in some detail as may be found at page 398 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee. If the committee as a whole wishes to pursue the matter it will find a rather learned discussion of the situation by the distinguished chairman of the civil service commission. The result of that discussion was that the special committee decided not to give effect to the particular amendment to which the hon. gentleman refers.

My view at that time, and the view I would take in the committee of the whole tonight, is that the power contemplated by clause 39 is one which would be delegated very rarely and, once delegated, would be reviewed very sensitively by the civil service commission. I think it must be clear—it is an elementary legal principle—that the power to delegate includes as well the power to withdraw the delegation. Therefore, the commission has the power, if they see that the delegation has not been satisfactory, to withdraw it. I am certain that any civil service commission, responsible as it is to parliament through its annual report, would be most sensitive to see that the delegation was properly exercised and, in being so sensitive, would see that there could be no conceivable abuse.

I would hope that the committee of the whole would take exactly the same attitude as that taken by the special committee in the rather lengthy discussion commencing at page 398 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence.

Mr. Herridge: I listened with interest to the parliamentary secretary and his explanations had a familiar ring. I can see some merit in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hull.

This clause provides that:

The commission may authorize a deputy head to exercise and perform any of the powers or functions of the commission under this act in relation to the selection of candidates for a position.

I listened carefully to what the parliamentary secretary had to say to the effect that the commission would extend this power with caution, and would review it. But, in my opinion, even with the best intentions on the part of the commission, injustice could prevail and go on for some time before it was even detected or suspected. On that account I can well understand the hon. member for Hull suggesting some amendment to the clause.

The wording of the suggested amendments is somewhat clumsy. I am not sure that they are put in the best form or that the best phraseology is used to achieve the end the hon. member for Hull has in mind. I must say I think this is rather an overriding clause and makes it possible for injustice to be done without being detected possibly for some time.

People are human, deputy ministers as well as anyone else. Therefore, while I am not certain that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hull is the best type of amendment to meet the situation, because I believe in its spirit and purpose I intend to support it on that account.

Mr. McIlraith: Before the question is put I would point out to the committee of the whole that clause 39 reads:

> The commission may authorize a deputy head to exercise and perform any of the powers or functions of the commission under this act in relation to the selection of candidates for a position.

The language used is the widest language that can be used in describing the powers or functions of the commission in relation to the selection of candidates for a position. Whatever may be said about the amendment, it is certain that the clause as it stands is expressed in overwide language.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 10; Nays, 53.

Clause 39 agreed to.

On clause 40—Order of preferences.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I think that over the years there has been, unintentionally perhaps, discrimination against those who joined the forces to fight overseas but who, for some reason or other, and often because of the requirements of the Department of National Defence, were never able to get there.

Those people, who enlisted with the intention to get into the fighting line, but who remained in Canada—and I know several of them—because of their special abilities and because they were needed here, now are absolutely deprived of all special benefits granted to veterans.

I appreciate that those who went overseas should benefit from the terms of this legislation as they did under the old act, which is identical, but I think we should add some special provision with regard to those who did not get overseas, giving them some privilege over other candidates who were not in the services.

To this end, I thought of an amendment which would probably give us a chance to do justice to those who enlisted to fight overseas but who were detained in Canada against their will and their intent because their services were required here.

I move therefore, that clause 40 be amended to read as follows: After paragraph (b), add subparagraph (i) as it exists now, and which reads:

> (b) those who are veterans and who do not come within the provisions of paragraph (a), or who are widows of veterans, shall be placed, in order of merit, on the list immediately following the candidates, if any, mentioned in paragraph (a);

That subparagraph (i) be added, which is the very provision we are dealing with:

> Those who are veterans but who have served only in Canada shall benefit from an additional 5 per cent on the examination and shall be placed in order of merit.

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this deals with a very difficult and very sensitive problem. As one who is not a veteran I have some trepidation in dealing with it, but I have had many problems with respect to this particular situation. The submission I would make to the committee of the whole is this. In respect of these matters the house has generally taken the opinions and the views of the standing committee on veterans affairs. On different occasions that standing committee has made a study of this question and it has been the view of that committee that the provisions of the existing Civil Service Act should remain. I believe it is because of the respect which the special committee on the Civil Service Act had for the standing committee on veterans affairs that the special committee adopted the same attitude.

When this matter was examined by the government, and it was examined with very great care, the position taken, according to my understanding, was that there should be no change in the existing act until such a change had been recommended by the standing committee on veterans affairs. I believe that is a sound position for the house to take. If there is to be a change at any time in such covenants as have been entered into by parliament with the veterans who served overseas, I would hope that they would be made upon recommendation of the standing committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. Matheson: Is there any reason why veterans in receipt of a pension—I presume it means a disability pension—include only those who have served in world war I or world war II? It seems to me that this provision is going to become progressively out of date. Surely we have veterans from the Korean expedition, perhaps some from Egypt and possibly some from Africa, and maybe there will be others. Is there any rational explanation of this special exception? I am not questioning it; I am simply asking for information.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think that perhaps complexity of draughtsmanship may be the cause of my hon. friend's difficulty in relation to this matter. The situation is covered, I think, by subclause 3 of clause 40 where there is reference to the Veterans Benefit Act. Under the Veterans Benefit Act veterans of the Korean war are covered and therefore are brought within the ambit of this provision. As lawyers my hon. friend and I may think that is complex draughtsmanship but because of the fact that this particular section has stood for so many years it was the view of the draughtsman, I believe, that it should not be changed fundamentally.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I want to comment on the point of view of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. The amendment I have moved does not affect at all the status of veterans who served overseas. It simply gives a slight advantage in the case of those who enlisted with the intention of going overseas but never had the chance to go. The amendment will not affect other veterans at all. It just gives an additional 5 per cent after the examination has been passed to those who remained in Canada, but those who were overseas have the usual green light. They have the preference over everyone else. The amendment does not change the law in that regard. I do not see why the government cannot accept the idea that a little something should be given to those who intended to go overseas but could not do so because the Department of National Defence ordered them to remain in Canada for the duration of the war. I do not understand why this amendment cannot be accepted when it does not change in any way the status of those veterans who served overseas.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to say a word about what the hon. member for Carleton has said. He has been reminding the committee that the special committee has dealt carefully with these things. I should like to add that, having been here for a good many years I know the veterans affairs committee has dealt year after year with the rights and privileges of veterans. In my opinion no committee has taken its duties so seriously and has been so anxious to be sure to do not only what was fair but perhaps more than fair to those concerned. For that reason I am content to vote against the amendment.

Mr. Caron: Is there not a danger that the veterans affairs committee might have forgotten those who enlisted to serve throughout the world but were kept in Canada? They could have forgotten about them because generally speaking when we refer to veterans we have in mind those who served overseas. The others were in the services but we do not think of them in that way. The amendment simply affords a little recognition of the services they rendered by enlisting to go and serve throughout the world. If they pass their examination they may get 90 per cent and the amendment would give them an additional 5 per cent and the chance to be first on the list. It will not affect in any way those who served overseas or the status of anyone else. The purpose is simply to recognize the service of those who enlisted to serve overseas but were kept in Canada against their will, and there are many of them.

Amendment (Mr. Caron) negatived: Yeas, 11; nays, 57.

On clause 45—Appointments from list.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, at the recommendation of the civil service association—and I think they are right in doing this because there is a certain inconsistency in the present wording of the bill—I propose the following amendment:

That clause 45, subclause 2 should be amended by deleting all the words coming after the word "list" in line 9—

(Text):

In English it would read as follows:

That clause 45, subclause 2, should be amended by deleting all the words coming after the word "list" in line 9 to the end of the clause.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 12; nays, 57.

Clause 45 agreed to.

Clause 46 agreed to.

On clause 47—Language.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, this is a most interesting question and a very significant one. Delegations have come to the committee to speak about the advantages of bilingualism. Nobody can deny that those advantages are infinitely important in the federal government service.

I do not think that anything has been proposed which would be likely to promote the study of both official languages of this country. The civil service should try to offer some special encouragement in order to incite those who are now in the civil service and want to be promoted, and even those who want to enter the civil service, to make an effort to improve their knowledge of both languages.

I know that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) suggested that the civil service set up some courses to enable those who are now working in the civil service, and those who want to enter that service, to prepare themselves by a better training in respect of bilingualism.

I shall not go as far as to ask for an absolute preference for bilingual people, though I believe that we should in all fairness, do so, because we need them more than we think.

Of course, in some cases, bilingual employees are asked for, but in others, they are forgotten. I remember that, not very long ago, a superintendent for the post office in Ottawa was not required to be bilingual, though he was responsible for the post offices in the ridings of Pontiac, Gatineau, Hull, Papineau, part of Labelle, Argenteuil, and part of eastern Ontario. Yet, the great majority of the population in those districts is French Canadian.

The needs of bilingualism were disregarded. I am not blaming this government more than any other. This situation has obtained for a long time. But it is high time to correct it.

That is why, in order to have some incitement, I move the following amendment to clause 47. Clause 47 will become section 1 and the following section 2 will be added. It reads as follows:

47. (2) At the time of competition those candidates who can establish that they possess a sufficient knowledge of the two official languages of Canada shall benefit by an added 5 per cent over all other candidates and shall be placed in order of merit.

(Text):

In English the amendment reads as follows:

That clause 47 in the bill become subclause (1) and that the following be added as subclause 2:

47 (2) At the time of competitions, those candidates who can establish that they possess a sufficient knowledge of the two official languages of Canada shall benefit by an added five per cent over all other candidates and shall be placed in order of merit.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to share the views of my friend from Hull about section 47 of the present act.

Past experience has shown that a statute can lend itself to various interpretations. Therefore, if the wording is so flexible as to leave it to a high official to judge the degree of bilingualism of an employee, I think that some categories of employees run the risk of being forgotten or overlooked in favour of others—they are very few, but they might be important—who may be prejudiced against a certain group of citizens.

I must say that the present government has made serious efforts to improve the knowledge of the French language in the civil service.

However, as far as the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hull is concerned, I wonder if the proposed formula is accurate enough for preference to be limited to the candidate who has obtained 5 per cent more marks because he speaks French and English. In my opinion, the knowledge of one of the official languages of the country should represent a higher percentage of the marks.

In my opinion, the government would do well to rewrite this clause so as to give it more teeth, so as to make it more accurate. It should definitely and absolutely provide that preference be given to candidates who are truly bilingual.

As for the degree to which a person is bilingual, that could be the subject matter of another amendment which would recognize the value of bilingualism. The civil service commission could be entrusted with the task of establishing a certain scale.

As far as I am concerned, I approve the principle of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hull, and I commend my hon. friend for his idealism.

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No clause of the act has had more careful and detailed consideration than has this one. It is a difficult and sensitive one. The language of the draftsman has been most carefully chosen in order to try to achieve an objective which will be sensitive to national unity. I should like to point out to the committee that in the first instance the old act, in section 17, required the language only of the majority of the persons in the local office with whom that person was required to do business. In other words we start from the premise that the existing situation is the local office. The new act deals not only with the local office but with the department. In that sense it is a departure from what has been the precedent in the old act.

I wish to submit to the committee that there are two extremely important tests and that these tests have been expressed in carefully chosen language. The first test is:

—sufficient to enable the department or local office to perform its functions adequately—

The second test is this:

—to give effective service to the public.

As I have said, that is language which was most carefully considered and which was designed to meet what is unquestionably a most difficult problem. My submission to the committee is that this is a problem for administrative as opposed to legislative action; that in legislative action it might well be that you create a strait jacket which will not achieve the purpose the hon. member for Hull professes to have in mind. If the purpose can be achieved within the limits of these two tests by administrative procedure, that is something which I am sure would meet the wishes of all hon. gentlemen of the committee. Therefore my suggestion is that those two tests are sufficient and, because of the careful consideration given to this matter, ought to be adopted by the committee.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word or two in support of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hull. I think it is a good amendment; I think it is very sound.

Throughout this country we have a great and growing need for people, not only in the civil service but elsewhere, to be able to speak the two languages. I think anything to encourage this, such as is suggested in the amendment, is very worth while. I see no reason why this should be a drawback in any way, shape or form and I can think of many, many cases in which this would be a decided asset. I think it is a very sound amendment and I support it fully.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I followed very closely the remarks made by the hon. member for Carleton. The amendment which is now proposed does not in any way change what is the law. I think what we have before us at the moment is better than we had before, but it is not quite enough yet because it does not give the incentive to those who would be interested in learning the two languages. The additional 5 per cent on their remuneration would encourage people to learn the secondary language and would not change the bill as it is now.

It would be an incentive to those who may be interested in learning the secondary language if they could earn more by reason of so doing. I do not blame a person who does not need it and who does not learn the secondary language, but if people have an incentive to earn something out of it, they will do so. This is the reason for placing this amendment before the committee.

(Translation):

And I would agree with the hon. member who had the floor a moment ago that what I propose is not momentous, it is but a speck of dust in the universe. But I am convinced that we must not effect changes overnight. We should start from this speck of dust and quietly eliminate that laziness of the mind from which we all suffer, once the necessity of two languages or the intellectual superiority gained through the knowledge of two languages is understood. We learn a second language when we feel the need for it. Such an attitude would encourage civil servants to study a second language more assiduously since this would give them a chance for promotion in the civil service. This is why I moved this amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Caron) negatived: Yeas, 16; nays, 43.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 47 carry?

Clause 47 agreed to.

On clause 48—Probationary period.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the parliamentary secretary whether subclause 2 of clause 48 means an additional year.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Not more than an additional year. It may be for any period up to a year.

Mr. Matheson: May I ask the parliamentary secretary whether it would not be better to simply change the wording to read:

—extend the probationary period of an employee, but the period of the extension shall not exceed one year—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I do not think so. By first answer may have been incorrect because subclause 1 covers a period of one year, or such longer period as the commission may establish. Consequently subclause 2 requires this rather complicated language in order to cover the second eventuality of such longer period in excess of one year.

Perhaps I may express it this way. If under subclause 1 the commission established a period longer than one year, then under subclause 2 the extension could be for such longer period as is covered by subclause 1. I hope that is intelligible to the hon. member for Leeds and to the other hon. members of the committee. I am not sure that it is to the hon. member for Carleton. However, I am advised that I am quite right.

Mr. Matheson: May I ask another question. Is there not a disadvantage in a person being a probationary employee indefinitely? Even if it were for a limited period of perhaps two years, would that not be more desirable than something as vague as this? I am asking the question why something so curiously vague should be in the bill at all?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Because of the really very great variety of positions in the service I think the hon. gentleman will agree that there has to be the type of probation that is provided for here. While in its generality there is what perhaps may be described as vagueness, in relation to the particular employee there is none. That particular employee will know that his period of probation is "x" months and consequently he knows that he must meet the standards of efficiency during that particular period of time.

I think the real test of the clause is to relate it to the individual, and in relation to the individual it has no vagueness.

Clause 48 agreed to.

On clause 49—Rejection.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, it seems that the same question of the extraordinary powers vested in the deputy heads is always at issue. That situation seems to have existed at all times and the great danger of giving too much power to individuals has been demonstrated. This is why I move the following amendment:

That clause 49 be amended by adding the following subclause:

(2) An employee who feels he has been wronged may appeal the decision.

Subclause (2) becomes subclause (3).

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Mr. Caron moves:

That clause 49 be amended by placing subclause (2) as (3) and by adding the following subclause:

"(3) The employee who believes that his rights have been encroached upon can appeal the decision."

Amendment negatived: yeas, 11; nays, 51.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause 49 agreed to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before we proceed any further, I wonder if we could have copies of the bill in both official languages. There are no English copies.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Copies of the bill have been available in both languages for several months. Everybody has had them.

The Deputy Chairman: I am advised by the Clerk that the bill has been widely distributed in both languages and that no other copies are immediately available.

I am glad to see that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has now received a copy.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have received a copy from my member.

[Mr. Matheson.]

On clause 50—Tenure of office.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, clause 50 introduces something which is extremely peculiar. Section 50(1) reads as follows:

The tenure of office of an employee is during the pleasure of Her Majesty, subject to the provisions of this and any other act and the regulations thereunder, and, unless some other period of employment is specified, for an indeterminate period.

Now the peculiar point is in subclause (2):

Nothing in this act shall be construed to limit or affect the right or power of the governor in council to remove or dismiss any employee.

I feel that the government here is assuming powers that are slightly too discretionary. It seems to reserve to ministers or to the governor in council the power to ignore everything else in the act and, at their own discretion to dismiss whoever might be recommended to them for dismissal.

I feel it is not normal to include such a provision in the bill; I therefore move that clause 50 be amended by the deletion of subclause (2).

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Mr. Caron moves:

That clause 50 be amended by deleting subclause (2).

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I shall have only two or three statements to make in connection with this amendment. This particular subclause is merely a preservation of the over-all prerogative of the crown. It is in the existing act and it was never repealed—a provision that nothing should impair the power of the governor in council to remove any deputy head, officer, person or employee. This subclause merely carries on that provision.

I think it is significant that the maintenance in this bill of this particular subclause which the hon. member seeks to delete was approved by all three members of the civil service commission who appeared before the special committee as witnesses. It is also significant that no representations of any kind were made in relation to it by any of the civil service staff associations. I think the hon. member is well aware of how carefully in clause 60 new provisions have been set forth dealing with dismissals and the right of appeal. This particular provision merely preserves the over-all prerogative of the crown, one which I am sure will not at any time be abused. In view of this I shall ask the committee to reject the amendment.

Mr. McIlraith: The subclause as it now stands reads:

2. Nothing in this act shall be construed to limit or affect the right or power of the governor in council to remove or dismiss any employee.

This appears on first reading to be very wide in its language and undoubtedly it is, but I do not see any way of restricting that right—one which I hope will never be abused, though in accordance with the language as it appears in the bill it certainly could be abused. But I do not see any satisfactory way of restricting that right. It seems to me that a government has to be held responsible for the administration and the discharge of its duties and that in line with that responsibility there must be this power of dismissal.

I recall a situation which developed in this country some 15 years ago in which this power was of real value to a government. I am not aware of the provision ever having been abused. It seemed to me as I listened to my colleague moving his amendment that the circumstances in which this provision might be required were not fully understood, and I wonder if he would not consider withdrawing the amendment. I am not altogether happy with the language as it now stands, but I have nothing better to suggest.

Mr. Caron: I have now heard something about the reason why the provision was placed in this bill, and I think I can accept the suggestion of my colleagues not to present this amendment if that is the wish of the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: The amendment is dropped by consent.

Amendment dropped.

Clause 50 agreed to.

Clauses 51 to 54 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 55—Order of laying off.

Mr. Caron: I wish, now, to move an amendment which was suggested by some of those who appeared before the special committee.

Subsection (1) of this section should be reworded as follows:

(1) Where two or more persons employed in positions of the same general grade in any unit of a department are to be laid off, or where one person is to be laid off and there are other persons holding positions of the same general grade in the same unit of the department, the commission shall list the persons holding positions of the same general grade in an order of lay-off according to merit and seniority, and such persons shall be laid off in order beginning with the person lowest on the list.

Subsection (2) remains as it is now in the present bill. I further propose that the following subsections (3) and (4) be added:

(3) The deputy head must give written notice to any person whom he intends to lay off, as soon as possible before the date on which such lay-off is to come into effect and, under any circumstances, no less that thirty (30) days before that date. This notice must also inform the employee of his right to appeal before the commission within fifteen (15) days of receipt of the notice.

(4) In the hearing of an appeal against the selection of those who are to be laid off, the commission can take or require to be taken any steps which it deems appropriate.

(Text):

Amendment (Mr. Caron) negatived: Yeas, 13; nays, 49.

Clause 55 agreed to.

Clauses 56 to 59 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 60—Notice of dismissal recommendation.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Here again, this concerns the extraordinary powers that are delegated.

Because of the extraordinary powers that are always conferred on the deputy head, the person responsible for a branch, we cannot deny that he has certain responsibilities and, accordingly, certain rights, in such cases where this official could cause prejudice through his decisions, I think that a right of appeal should be granted.

Therefore, I move the following amendment to section 60: That subsection (1) be amended by the addition after the word "decision" of the following words:

"and of his right of appeal".

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism of the objective which my hon. friend has in mind. Certainly I think every person who may be dismissed ought to know of his right of appeal. But I have not the slightest doubt that they will in fact know of it. This problem was carefully considered by the special committee. The reason the special committee did not adopt the suggestion, as I recall it, was that it would be necessary for the draughtsman to go through the act completely and in every case where reference was made to a right of appeal insert in the section an indication that notification must be given the employee. Otherwise, by principles of interpretation, where this was not in fact inserted in the section there would be grave difficulties.

If my hon. friend were to press this point the only thing that could happen would be that the clauses would be held up and would require to be referred back to the draughtsmen. I do not think this is a practical problem, quite frankly. I say to the committee that every dismissed civil servant is going to know on his dismissal that he has a right of appeal. Civil servants know that this is a new right of appeal which is being granted and spelled out in the legislation before us. I hope we would not delay the passage of the measure by having to refer back to the draughtsman so that each section might be contemplated in the light of the principles of interpretation of which I have spoken.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary has just given the most eloquent argument that could possibly have been given in favour of the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Hull. This bill is not one of those casual amendments that are made to legislation from time to time. This is a complete review of the Civil Service Act, the first that has been made for many years. If as the parliamentary secretary has stated this amendment commends itself to him in substance and it is merely a matter of taking a little time to see that this important statute which is the charter of the rights and obligations of public servants is properly drafted, it does not seem to me that that kind of delay is the kind to which there should be any objection whatever.

I feel that the parliamentary secretary should consider very carefully accepting this amendment and if consequential changes are necessary they should be brought forward so that the committee could examine them. It is all very well for the parliamentary secretary to say that the employees will know what their rights are in this matter but if it is such a big job for the draftsman to go through this bill in order to ascertain that it is properly drafted—and he is an eminent lawyer—how is a clerk grade I, if they are still called that, or a messenger expected to know precisely what his rights are?

It seems to me there should be no doubt that the employee will know precisely what his rights are when it is proposed to dismiss him. In the most moderate way possible I urge the government to accept in principle at any rate the amendment moved by my hon. friend, and if there are other consequential amendments to bring them forward to the committee so that we may be absolutely sure that these people whose livelihood it is suggested is going to be taken away from them will be told precisely what their rights are.

The parliamentary secretary and I were in the public service at certain stages of our lives. Probably we did know what our rights were although I must confess I was never very sure of mine. I have known of cases in the past where employees did not in fact know what their rights were. They never had it explained to them. In some instances, through the efflux of time they were unable in fact to exercise the right of appeal. If this happens even once in a decade it is too often. It should not happen at all because of the failure on our part as legislators to put a clear obligation on a deputy head to ensure that these rights are adequately safeguarded.

I am not seeking in any way to be contentious about this but I think my hon. friend from Hull has brought forward a logical amendment soundly based in law and common sense and that it would be in the general interest to accept it.

Mr. Herridge: I find myself in complete agreement with the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I do hope the parliamentary secretary will give some consideration to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hull, particularly in view of what I thought was an extremely moderate and constructive approach to this question by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I can only say that the special committee, which was representative of all parties in this house, gave very careful consideration to this particular point. They consulted the draughtsmen of the bill and they took his opinion in relation to it.

My hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate says that I agree with the amendment. Perhaps I would have to say that the attitude I took was that I had no serious disagreement with the amendment at all but I would suggest, first, that it is unnecessary and, second, it would involve serious delay in the passage of the bill and I would ask the committee not to pass it.

Mr. Howard: On this question of whether it is unnecessary, I think the parliamentary secretary is over-simplifying things when he says it is not necessary. I do not want to go over the same ground that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate covered with respect to whether or not individuals within the public service know their rights. But I have had some experience in this, having spent some time in the trade union movement where day after day and week after week it is a question of dealing with a collective agreement that might exist. Even in those circumstances, where there is a continual campaign of attempting to acquaint members with their rights under collective agreements, after months and months of discussions of this sort of thing, there are still many employees in industry covered by collective agreements who do not know what their rights are. Surely in an institution such as the public service of Canada, where this sort of educational program and discussion and policing of a collective agreement do not go on, we can expect there will be a higher percentage of people who will not know what are their rights.

Even an individual who fails to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits receives a notification from the commission, and on the notification which says he is disqualified he is told he has the right to appeal within so many days and he can be represented by a union or anybody else. There is an explanation of what are the rights of an individual even in an unemployment insurance case. Surely it is necessary to have this sort of indication in this clause. If the parliamentary secretary or anyone else says that it would really take up too much time to protect the rights of the individual in this country, I think he is perhaps stretching the reasons for objection a little too much.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word. I was impressed by what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said, but I also feel that the chance of anyone suffering from not knowing what his rights are is so infinitely remote that I am prepared to go along with the decision made by the special committee after serious consideration. This is a day when appeals are in the air and we are all Philadelphia lawyers, and I just do not believe the amendment is necessary.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the amendment is put I should like to make one more appeal to the parliamentary secretary. I recognize that he is not a minister. But I would even go so far as to say that since we have a Conservative government I rather regret that he is not a minister, not in our party interests but in the interests of the country.

As I say, I recognize that he is not a minister and that it would be rather embarrassing for him to make a decision on this point off the bat here in the committee this evening. But it does seem to me the point is of sufficient importance, involving as it does a subject very dear to the heart of his leader, namely human rights, that I would suggest to the parliamentary secretary that he let this clause stand and that we go along with the rest of the bill—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and that we do not seek to rush a matter where human rights may be involved and, in my opinion, are involved, but that we take a few minutes tomorrow after the government has had a chance to look at this and at what the draughting problems are. If they come to the conclusion that, notwithstanding these arguments, they want to go ahead, of course they have a majority and I do not think there will be a filibuster. I am just expressing my personal opinion, but I think that in a matter of this kind, where we want to be non-partisan, where we want to do what is right and fair, the course I am suggesting to the parliamentary secretary is one which I am sure would commend itself to him.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The blandishments of my hon. friend, coupled as they were with a particular type of kiss which he administered, perhaps may be attractive, and perhaps I would succumb had this not been the subject of deep consideration by the special committee. The special committee having considered it, and having discussed it with the draughtsmen, I venture to suggest that the committee as a whole ought to adopt the clause in its present form.

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 14; nays, 52.

Clause 60 agreed to.

On clause 61—Partisan work prohibited.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I have a few comments to make on clause 61 which has to do with political activities. This clause is most objectionable to us. I believe the present section of the act, section 55, deals with the substance of political activity and political partisanship. While section 55 is restrictive, in so far as political activity is concerned, nevertheless it does allow a modicum of political freedom in that in so far as I interpret it—and others have given it the same interpretation—the prohibitions contained therein, in so far as engaging in partisan work is concerned, are confined to the period of an election. I would say that refers to the time between the issuance of a writ and election day. Section 55 does not prohibit an employee in the public service from participating in political activities or from belonging to a political party at times other than during the period of the election. I see the parliamentary secretary looking askance at me. I wonder whether I am talking about the right section.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps it was only a look of disagreement.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Only to indicate that I see very little difference between old section 55 and the present clause 61.

Mr. Howard: Those were the hon. gentleman's remarks in the special committee as I understood them, Mr. Chairman.

To my way of thinking clause 61 is a complete removal and denial of political freedom and political expression except that the right of the individual to proceed to a polling booth on election day to cast his ballot as he sees fit is protected under the Canada Elections Act. Apart from that this clause removes or emasculates any political expression that the individual might have. At one time within the federal public service, and I suppose in the various provinces of Canada as well, there used to be some connection between employment and political affiliation. I gather that was some years ago. Since the advent of employment by merit and appointment by the civil service commission after competition with other candidates, the sphere of political interference with respect to employment in the public service has lessened. Consequently the degree of restriction on the activities of such employees in the political field should also be lessened.

I think this clause of the bill is directly contrary to our concepts with regard to the expansion of political freedom and the extension of political democracy and also directly contrary to the trend which I understand is taking place in other countries in the world toward extending political freedom and the right of political expression and participation to employees in the service of various governments. As I look at the situation, I would say that no employer or individual who pays the wage or salary of such a person should have the right to dictate to the employee what his activities should be outside the period of time for which he is being paid. We would object to this most strenuously in private industry. If industry in paying wages to an individual attempted to tell him how to vote or how not to vote, what meetings to go to, what party to belong to or to prohibit him from belonging to any party, we would object to this as being an unconscionable act on the part of private industry. Yet we are being asked to do substantially the same thing in this clause. We are being asked to say that an employee in the public service of Canada cannot engage in any political activity, period, apart from casting his ballot on election day.

In my opinion this is contrary to what we consider to be the concepts of the bill of rights which refers to the inherent freedom of speech, freedom of association and assembly. As I read this clause, there is no inherent freedom of speech so far as an employee of the public service of Canada is concerned. He cannot express his opinions on behalf of a candidate for election to the House of Commons, the legislative assembly of a province or the council of either one of the territories.

Under paragraph (b) of subclause 1 the employee is also prohibited from receiving or in any way dealing with any money for the funds of any political party and he is liable to be dismissed if he does so. By virtue of this clause in the bill an individual employed in the public service is denied the right to be a member of a political party, simply a card carrying member, and is also prohibited from contributing financially to a party. Regardless of the denial of the rights of freedom of expression, he is denied that right. He is even denied the right to subscribe to a publication of a political party, and the clause can be stretched to the extent that he would be denied the right to purchase books published by or promoted and sold by political party agencies. He is perhaps even denied the right to contribute by tossing 50 cents or a dollar into the hat when it is passed at a political meeting because of the prohibition of contributing to the funds of any political party. He may have the right to think, but there is some doubt about that.

Surely we should not be thinking of placing restrictions of this type upon individuals in this day and age just a year or two after we enacted the bill of rights ensuring and enshrining forever the right of freedom of speech and freedom of expression. We should be moving in the other direction in granting these freedoms, rights and responsibilities instead of moving to deny them and to make these people nothing more than units in the public service of Canada. I think this clause should be amended, and the gist of the amendment I intend to move is such as to indicate that we also think there should be some restrictions on such activities.

We say that a person in the public service should be prohibited from engaging in political activity or working on behalf of the election of a candidate during his hours of duty because he is being paid for the work he is performing. We also think that an employee in the public service should be prevented from using property of Her Majesty or of the crown, such as letters, stamps, automobiles or other facilities that may be available to him as a public servant, to advance the cause of any political party. Apart from that, outside his working hours he should have the same fundamental rights and political freedoms as everyone else has in this country. Therefore I move:

That clause 61 be amended by deleting therefrom subclause 1 and substituting therefor the following:

"1. No deputy head or employee shall during his hours of duty engage in partisan work, or at any time use any money, materials, facilities or other property of Her Majesty

(a) in connection with any election for the election of a member of the House of Commons, a member of the legislature of a province or a member of the council of the Yukon territory or the Northwest Territories, or

(b) in connection with any form of political activity."

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I must indicate at once that I cannot agree with the amendment offered by the hon. member for Skeena. As I read his amendment, it simply provides that a civil servant must devote the time during which he is employed to the work for which he is hired and the second part provides that he must not commit theft.

Surely that is not what the hon. member intended by the amendment, and I am quite sure it is not. If he will look at it again he will notice that it is in the form of preventing a civil servant from using his hours of duty for political party work. Surely he is hired to use his hours of duty for the work of the department and if he is not doing that he is breaking his terms of employment.

As for the second part, which provides that he must not use money, materials or other property of the government in connection with party work, surely he has no right to use government property for his own purposes. That is elementary. It seems to me that the amendment does not express in language the idea that the hon. member was seeking to put forward. As I understood his idea, it was that any prohibition against a civil servant taking part in partisan activity should only apply during his hours of employment. That is my understanding of the position he took.

The old section 55 of the act and the new clause 61 of the bill are, as I read them, in substantially the same language. They are different in form but they are designed for the same purpose. Perhaps it is well that we should read clause 61. It is in these terms:

61. (1) No deputy head or employee shall (a) engage in partisan work in connection with any election for the election of a member of the House of Commons, a member of the legislature of a province or a member of the council of the Yukon territory or the Northwest Territories; or

(b) contribute, receive or in any way deal with any money for the funds for any political party.

(2) Every person who violates subsection (1) is liable to be dismissed.

This clause in the bill and its predecessor in the act have been relied on by the civil servants as a protection to them and indeed they have been a useful protection to them through the years. The subject was dealt with in the special committee. There I expressed the idea that my understanding of the interpretation of the words, "engage in partisan work" was that they did not prevent civil servants from actually attending a public political meeting, although I believe that very few of them do so. However, I see nothing in that language which prevents their doing so.

Then I went on to deal with the matter of paying membership fees to a political party. To me it seems that once a civil servant has paid his membership fee to a political party, he has then taken an active step on his part indicating his partisan interests, and similarly if he is collecting funds for the party. In that case, in my view, he has put himself in a position in which his interest as a dues paying member of a political party may be in conflict with his duty as a civil servant; and I take his duty as a civil servant to be to carry out the administrative processes in his particular class of work according to the policies of the government of the day and enacted by parliament, as the case may be. Surely it is a protection to the civil servant that he is not permitted to be put in a position in which his interest is in direct conflict with his duty. As I read the clause and as I have understood it over the years, my observation has been that it has been reasonably effective and that it has accomplished the objective of protecting the service. I should hate to see anything done that would bring civil servants into a position in which they are either in conflict with the duties which they are expected to perform as civil servants or in which they can be reasonably suspect of being in a position in which their personal interest conflicts with their duties as civil servants. My hope would be that nothing would be done in that connection that would bring about such a situation.

There is one other aspect of this matter that concerns me and it is something new that has arisen since the matter was considered in the special committee. The prohibition in clause 61 is with regard to a civil servant engaging in partisan work in connection with the election of a member of the House of Commons and other legislative bodies enumerated and with respect to contributing, receiving or dealing with money for the funds of any political party. There is no prohibition with respect to a civil servant engaging in partisan work in the civil service in connection with a political party which does not have members seeking election to the House of Commons. It is a strange anomaly that has arisen only once to my knowledge, or in one case that I have ever heard of. If he takes care not to contribute funds to that particular party or not to receive or in any way to deal with funds, he is as free as he can be to advocate in an active way the political philosophy he has in mind and to take part in partisan activities. I do not think that sort of thing was ever intended. I think it is purely a case of its never having been thought of.

As the committee and the parliamentary secretary will appreciate, there was the case to which I am referring, namely the case of the Nazi who was a civil servant and who was actively participating in the work of that party, with its many ramifications. This situation is wholly inconsistent with our ideas with respect to a civil servant taking part in partisan activities. Yet not a thing could be effectively done with him under this section. There may be other remedies. It is a rather interesting case. I want to ask the parliamentary secretary whether any examination has been made of that situation since this clause was before the special committee. If so, what conclusion, if any, was arrived at concerning the matter?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Just to answer the last question of the hon. gentleman may I say this. So far as I understand it, no special examination has been undertaken of the provisions of this act having regard to the particular employee and the particular incident to which he refers. The situation with respect to that particular employee has not been related to this section. I am sorry but I cannot give my hon. friend the particulars. May I simply say to him that, with respect to his other remarks, this is one of those occasions on which I agree wholeheartedly with my neighbour and friend.

Mr. Grafftey: There is just one thing I should like to bring out. The hon. member who immediately preceded me in speaking seems to have a set of facts much more clearly in his mind than I have them in mine—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not unusual.

Mr. Grafftey: —with respect to engaging in partisan work under clause (a) of clause 61. What I mean is this. There are many ramifications in connection with what the hon. member said as he went through what he felt constituted partisan work to elect a member of parliament. However, the fact is this. We all know very well that the constitution of every political party states that the people who are members of an association must abide by the constitution of that party which is dedicated to electing as a member to the House of Commons or the legislature, as the case may be, somebody of the particular political colour represented by that party. Do I understand the situation correctly? I really and sincerely feel that this is something with regard to which we would be performing a useful function if we clarify it right here and now. For instance, in my own particular riding may an immigration officer appear publicly at a political meeting and have his picture appear in the local press, let us say, with the executive of a political organization? Is this procedure contravening this article? If it is doing so, may I say it is something that certainly happens in my riding as it might happen in the ridings of other hon. members.

I must say that I quite agree with the hon. member who preceded me in speaking, that this is something that is not clear in the minds of civil servants in particular, the public in general, and perhaps even members of parliament, although I do not know that. We all know that partisan activity or work is involved when we attend political meetings. After all, what are we doing at a political meeting? Are we just sitting there and passing the time of day? No, Mr. Chairman; we are there organizing to elect candidates of our choice to political office, provincially or federally. I think possibly the hon. member who preceded me has helped to muddy the issue there. We all know very well that is what is involved. May an immigration officer appear publicly at a political meeting, and have his picture in the press supporting a political party? This happened recently in my area. I should like to have an answer to that question. I do not think the hon. member who preceded me has given the answer.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I should like to say only this. As I understand the situation, there is certainly no restriction upon any civil servant with respect to appearing at a political meeting. However, at such a meeting he has no right, under the existing legislation, to express his views in support of or in opposition to those which are being expressed at that particular time. I mentioned in the committee the incident that occurred many years ago in connection with a customs appraiser in Montreal who went to a Liberal meeting. At the Liberal meeting he interrupted and shouted, "Hourra pour les bleus!" He was immediately thrown out, so he went across to a meeting down the street and there shouted, "Hourra pour les rouges"!" He was thrown out of there and ultimately he was thrown out of his job, although subsequently he was reinstated.

I say that in my own riding political meetings could not be held were it not possible for civil servants to attend such meetings. But for servants to take an active, participating, organizing part would in my opinion—

Mr. McIlraith: Or be photographed in the way described by the hon. member.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): —or to permit himself to be photographed in the way described by the hon. gentleman, would be improper under this particular clause.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one comment on the question of being photographed at these political meetings. When one considers the words, "engage in partisan work", I think common sense is a pretty good guide. If a man goes to a meeting and happens to be photographed in the body of the meeting, that is not likely to attract much attention; but if he has himself photographed with the executive of a party, I think in common sense that is getting very near engaging in partisan work. He is really aligning himself with a party.

I thought the hon. member for Ottawa West described extremely well the reason for this prohibition. It seems to me that when we use general words about the bill of rights and say that every man must have his rights, we have to take time off to look at the essentials of the situation. I think all of us realize that when a man is in the civil service, where today he may be working as, say the agent, for want of a better word, of one party one week and a week later he may be the agent of another party, he has to maintain a certain aloofness from both parties.

As I understood it, that was in effect what the hon. member for Ottawa West said, that a man had to maintain an independence which does not apply to any man except one who is engaged in the business of government. When he is engaged in the business of government it seems to me there are certain limitations, which the hon. member for Ottawa West described so well, which inevitably apply to him.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of recapitulating any of the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Skeena. I endorse them wholeheartedly. I should like to add, however, that I do not think you will find one newspaper across this country from coast to coast who does not at one time or another cry out about the apathy of the voting public of this country.

We are now being asked in this committee to legislate or to create apathy by statute. We are the greatest single employer in this country and we are ordering by statute all our employees to be apathetic as far as taking an interest in political affairs is concerned.

I realize the parliamentary secretary illustrated what may have been a humourous incident which happened in Montreal regarding the "bleus" and the "rouges", but I should like to give an example of what happens when there is neither a "bleu" nor a "rouge" government in power. In the province of Saskatchewan at the present time there is a civil servant still employed by that government who is sitting as a Liberal member of the opposition. He is drawing his indemnity as a member and also his pay as a civil servant when he is not sitting in session in the legislature. Apparently this has worked out very well so far, so I do not think this bogey that we have heard about is at all worth while.

I think this is something we have built up in our own minds. I worked for some 11 years as a civic servant, which is very similar to being a civil servant; it is a first cousin to a civil servant. Civic employees are not supposed to have any political beliefs, but they have them. They are not supposed to express them, but I called their bluff. I think if we spend time here legislating that the largest group of employees in this country shall not have the same rights as any other employee in this country, we had better take another look at just how democratic we are.

If they are working on political affairs to the detriment of their job, there is a legitimate complaint and they should be reprimanded or dealt with. But once they have done the job they are being paid for, during whatever time they have left, be it on their evenings off, their days off or their holidays, they should have entirely the same rights as any other Canadian living in this country.

Mr. Milligan: Mr. Chairman, I am rather concerned about this particular clause. For clarification I wondered whether this matter could be dealt with. As the hon. member for Greenwood has said, common sense should be used. I quite agree with that. I quite agree that key civil servants should not be taking an active part in politics.

However, there are many mail couriers throughout Canada who refrain from taking any active part in politics because they are afraid they will lose their positions. Mail couriers are today obtaining the job by low tender; it is not a matter of belonging to a political party, yet they are civil servants.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No, they are not civil servants.

Mr. Milligan: They are afraid of taking any part whatsoever in political meetings because complaints might be made. I wish to ask the parliamentary secretary this question: if they attend a political meeting, can someone complain and are they liable to be removed from that position?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think I should say that a rural mail courier is not a civil servant. He is not governed by this act; he is an independent contractor. As I recollect, a very clear statement was made by the Postmaster General to the house on this subject. He made it clear that when the courier was not engaged in the actual duties of delivering Her Majesty's mail he was not subject in any way to any infringement of his political rights.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary may think that the Postmaster General made a very clear statement, but I remember we asked the Postmaster General why the same rule was not applied to public works contractors who, when they are engaged in building a public building, are still allowed to take any part in politics they like without any interference from the government.

Of course, this matter is quite irrelevant to the bill. As the parliamentary secretary has said, these mail couriers are independent contractors, but this usurpation of power by the Postmaster General, with no statutory authority behind it, is something that, having been raised by the hon. member, I think ought to be condemned.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Ottawa West spoke about the amendment as though it meant a civil servant should not loaf on the job or become a thief on the job. We start from the premise that a person has some rights unless they are taken away from him. In my opinion, if this amendment were adopted it would mean that a man has all the political rights and freedoms except when on the job during working hours, and he ought not to use public property in order to engage in this sort of activity. A man maintains those rights unless they are removed, and to this extent the amendment is clear. In effect it removes those rights during working hours and so far as the use of someone else's property is concerned. I cannot follow the reasoning that employees in the public service must not belong to, or support, or indicate any preference for a political party other than that which happens to be in office. This is the reverse of the coin of the argument as given here. Apparently it is all right to be a Tory when the Tories are in office, or a Liberal when the Liberals are in office, but you cannot be a Liberal when the Tories are in office or vice versa.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Grafftey: Poppycock.

Mr. Howard: "Nonsense" seems to be the favourite word of some hon. members. But let me follow this through. What, in fact, is being said is that the political convictions of the government in office must filtrate through the entire structure of the civil service.

Mr. Grafftey: Irresponsible ballyhoo.

Mr. Howard: That seems to be a favourite expression of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Grafftey: It is the first time I have used it—the first occasion.

Mr. Howard: Well, it properly expresses his general attitude. If the hon. member disagrees with me, I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will confirm what I have to say. The implication here is that the political complexion of the government in office should filter through the entire structure—that everyone should be neutral politically which, in effect, means agreeing with the political convictions of the government in office. This seems odd to me. Apparently it is all right for the wife of a public servant to be a member and supporter of a political party but it is not all right for the civil servant himself to be so. Apparently it is all right for him to have what sympathies he pleases, even though they may be politically contrary to the government in office, but he must not not express them. He can vote, but he cannot join a political party and express views which are contrary to those held by the government in office.

This situation was dealt with in the United Kingdom to some extent through the Whitley council. Though the system which exists over there is not on all fours with the amendment before us tonight, it is in part. In the United Kingdom they have a horizontal division among employees in the public service. Some have complete political freedom—the right to campaign and the like—while others, because of the positions they hold near the top of the administrative ladder, as it were, are prevented from participating in politics in this way because it is felt that their close connection with ministerial activity and authority might create difficulties. Perhaps there would be some sense in our following this line. Let me read a passage from a pamphlet published by the United Kingdom Information Service, Canada, dated January, 1959, called "The British Civil Service". I am reading from page 23 of that publication with respect to the Whitley council as follows:

> The government accepted a scheme under which about 62 per cent of the whole civil service (i.e. industrial and non-industrial, in all about one million people) are completely free from restrictions, about 22 per cent are free, subject to acaceptance of the need for discretion, to take part in all activities except parliamentary candidature, and 16 per cent remain debarred from national political activities. As many as possible of this last group who wish are given permission to take part in local government and political activities in the local field.

There is this further information:

> Any member of the group is completely free of restrictions who intends standing for parliament must resign his appointment before nomination day. If he is not elected to parliament he will, on application within a week of declaration day, be reinstated in his previous capacity. If he is elected, he will be entitled to return to his post provided that: (a) he ceases to be a member after an absence not exceeding five years; (b) he had not less than ten years actual service before his election; and (c) he applies for reinstatement within three months of ceasing to be a member.

This is the system which exists in the United Kingdom, a system under which about 62 per cent of the civil service, presumably those in the less responsible administrative posts, have no restrictions placed upon them and are completely free to engage in political activities and to express their political ideas without fear of dismissal or reprisals. It is immaterial whether or not their political views and activities are agreeable to the government in office. So the Whitley council whose recommendations were accepted by the government, felt that the views expressed by the parliamentary secretary, by the hon. member for Greenwood, the hon. member for Ottawa West and others who have spoken about the need for political neutrality and the need for commonsense and discretion in these matters, applied, as far as the United Kingdom is concerned to only some 38 per cent of the civil service, and even some of those were allowed to have a modicum of political freedom subject to discretion as it is here called.

Surely we could easily follow an arrangement of that kind. If it is not agreeable to give complete freedom of political activity and expression, as is proposed in this amendment—I am not too attached to it—then certainly we could devise a proposal which would give some political freedom to people in the lower groups and, in doing so, really take a step toward granting wider political freedom to some individuals.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 3; nays, 53.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 61 carry?

Mr. Howard: What we are seeking to do here, if I read the clause correctly is, in effect, to prohibit some employees in the civil service from engaging in partisan work in connection with elections to certain offices while allowing them to engage in partisan work in connection with elections to other types of office, notably municipal councils. These are not mentioned here and I assume, therefore, that there is a right to engage in partisan activity on behalf of candidates for municipal office.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or even against them.

Mr. Howard: We know that in some parts of Canada the communist party enters candidates for municipal offices. I am not saying that any member of the civil service would do so, but if he cannot work on behalf of a candidate for a responsible political party is he being put in a position of deciding to work on behalf of a candidate for the communist party in a municipal election? This is precisely what it allows.

(Translation):

In this day of Yom Kippur, when the Jewish religion imposes severe fasting upon its adepts, to expiate their sins, I have agreed to stand in for the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) who is unavoidably absent, and I move in his name the following amendment:

(Text):

That the following proposed amendment be approved by adding to section 61, subsection 1, the following subsection, to be known as (b) immediately after subsection (a), to read as follows:

"be a member directly or indirectly of any political party or group in Canada or elsewhere which is known to directly or indirectly advocate discrimination between people because of their race, colour, creed or religion."

And that the present subsection (b) be altered to be known as subsection (c).

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, we have already added in section 33 for the first time a non-discrimination clause. It is the first that has appeared in the Civil Service Act. This represents a step which I am sure met with the unanimous approval of all hon. members of the committee. I think under the circumstances the hon. member's amendment is unnecessary.

Amendment (Mr. Caron) negatived: Yeas, 10; nays, 43.

Mr. Howard: May I explain that I did not vote on the amendment because a copy was not available to me and I could not follow the rapid reading of it. Section 61 says that no employee should engage in partisan activity. Let us determine the exemptions to this. What people employed in the Canadian public service are free to engage in partisan activity and therefore contribute to political parties and so on even during working hours?

An employee is defined as a person employed in the civil service. In the definition of the words "civil service" it is explained that the reference is to positions in the public service, and certain exceptions are set out. A member of the civil service commission, for instance, can engage in partisan political activities, contribute financially and do whatever he likes. The Clerk of the House of Commons, the Clerk of the Privy Council and of the Senate and the secretary to the Governor General are not to be prohibited from engaging in this type of activity.

Mr. Pickersgill: They are all deputy heads.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Therefore the first part applies.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate that. I am throwing in everyone I can.

Mr. Pickersgill: Including many who are not there.

Mr. Howard: Reference is made to prevailing rate positions. I am sure these are not deputy heads. The annual report of the commission for 1960 indicates that as of September 30 there were 24,172 prevailing rate employees. I assume these are the people referred to in the definition section as holding prevailing rate positions. If that is the case it means there are that many people in the public service who can participate in this type of activity in or out of working hours. I wish to know in what class are salaried employees not under the Civil Service Act? I refer to page 34 of the annual report for 1960 where reference is made to this.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That would refer to the national research council, the defence research board and several other organs of the public service as opposed to the civil service.

Mr. Howard: They would be free to engage in political activity, I take it?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am not passing an opinion on that. We are dealing only with the act relating to the civil service. While doing so I do not wish to give an interpretation in relation to others who are not within the civil service.

Mr. Howard: Presumably they are not prohibited by virtue of the provisions of this statute from engaging in political activities.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is correct to say they are not prohibited from doing so by virtue of this bill.

Mr. Howard: They may be prohibited by some other measure, but that is another matter. Certainly prevailing rate employees are not. Reference is made to some 3,000-odd persons described as ship officers and crews who are classed with government railway and ship employees. There are approximately 25,000 people employed in the public service who in my estimation may engage in political activities because they are exempt from the prohibiting clause.

Clause 61 agreed to.

Clause 62 agreed to.

On clause 63—Annual leave.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to move an amendment but I should like to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that there are thousands of employees who are part time employees and who may work three or four hours a day, for instance, in the Post Office Department. These people never have a leave of absence or a holiday. This has been complained about in the house more than once and each time the ministers in question said they would inquire and see if the situation could be remedied.

I referred to a girl who worked for four years in the unemployment insurance office in Montreal without a holiday. She was denied it because it was said she was not a civil servant. There is something wrong somewhere over there, and the parliamentary secretary to the minister should look into the matter to see what can be done. In the big offices in Montreal and Toronto there are thousands of employees working under like conditions who never benefit from any holidays whatsoever in the year. This situation should be corrected. It could be corrected easily if the government would look into the matter.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I understand the Secretary of State is inquiring into the matter, and I will make a special note to speak to him about it.

Mr. McIntosh: I believe there is a clause in the existing act which states in effect that every employee will be granted one and a quarter days leave for every month worked, not to exceed a certain number of days in any one fiscal year. I think the clause is quite clear and there are no exceptions to it in the act. However, when it was put into practice it was found on several occasions I know of that there are regulations or treasury board minutes which supersede the intent of the act. In subclauses 2 and 4 of clause 63 there are these two phrases "as may be prescribed by the regulations" and "subject to the regulations".

I was very interested in what the hon. member for Greenwood said about common sense governing these acts. Unfortunately, apparently the hon. member has not come up against cases such as the rest of us have where common sense is not taken into consideration by officials of those departments. They go by the written rule. The point I am objecting to is that when the regulation becomes more powerful than the act itself a second look should be taken at the regulations, or certain restrictions should be put in them. I would ask the parliamentary secretary to advise us whether under this new clause a civil servant, if he were employed for 11 or 12 months, would be entitled to the full three weeks vacation in any one year, or whether, as it is at the present time, he would be entitled to leave for only six months. Is this the intention of the clause?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I wonder whether my hon. friend's point is not covered by subclause 3 which reads:

> No employee shall be granted vacation leave unless he has been employed in the civil service for at least six months.

I do not know that I can give my hon. friend a detailed answer in relation to any particular civil servant or say that the civil servant who has been employed for 10 months and three days is going to have three weeks leave. I think there has to be some type of apportioning of it. I am personally not familiar with the regulations which have existed. I shall be glad to look into it. If my hon. friend has any complaints in relation to it I shall certainly see that they are drawn to the attention of the commission and of the governor in council when the regulations are being studied and promulgated.

Mr. McIntosh: If the employee were employed for seven months would he be entitled to half a year's leave or any leave at all?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I of course cannot speak of what the situation may be in the future. Perhaps I can get some advice as to what the situation would be at the present time. My understanding is that he does not earn leave in respect of the first six months of service. He starts to earn leave after he has completed the six months of service and it accumulates from that period on.

Mr. McIntosh: In the face of what it says in the existing act, I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could give us the authority for his not getting leave during the first six months.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): My understanding is that there is a treasury board minute based on the recommendation of the civil service commission to that effect. I confess I have not myself seen that document and I would not wish to give any opinion in the House of Commons in respect to it until I had an opportunity personally to study it.

Mr. McIntosh: The parliamentary secretary would not give an opinion as to which is the more powerful, the act or the treasury board minute?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I would have no doubt of that. As far as the act is concerned it will always govern and the treasury board minute will prevail only if it fails within the four corners of the act.

Clause 63 agreed to.

Clauses 64 to 67, inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 68—Regulations.

Mr. Howard: I shall skim through clause 68 quickly. Paragraph (o) provides that regulations may be made for the selection, appointment, conditions of employment and remuneration of employees performing duties of a casual, part-time or seasonal nature, notwithstanding anything in the act. Are these employees within the meaning of the definition of employees in the definition section persons employed in the civil service?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes; my understanding is they are employed within the terms of the act but because of the very special nature of the employment, whether it be casual or seasonal, those special regulations do have to be set up, regulations of a type which would not be applicable to the year-round civil servant.

Mr. Howard: May I have the distinction that is drawn, if there is one, between a casual, part-time or seasonal employee and a prevailing rate employee? Is there a difference in that regard between a casual, part-time or seasonal employee and an employee on a prevailing rate?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, I am advised that there is a technical difference between a casual, part-time and seasonal employee that has been a well recognized one. I would be glad to send my hon. friend a memorandum setting forth in detail the distinctions that there are.

Mr. Howard: Are there distinctions between those people and prevailing rate people, or are they prevailing rate positions? I refer to the casual, part-time and seasonal employees.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What we are speaking of here are positions which are established pursuant to the Civil Service Act for casual, part-time and seasonal workers. They have nothing to do with the prevailing rate establishment which, as my hon. friend, knows, is something which is under section 2(1)(b), which is entirely outside the terms of the act. This is for the casual, seasonal or part-time classifications established under the act itself.

Clause 68 agreed to.

Clauses 69 and 70 agreed to.

On clause 71—Ministerial staffs.

Mr. McIlraith: This clause deals with ministerial staffs and the part about which I have some remarks to make has to do with the appointment of executive assistants or private secretaries to a minister to the regular civil service after they have served three years as an executive assistant or private secretary to the minister. The provisions now governing this situation are found in section 61 of the present act and I will read part of section 61. Subsection 1 deals with ministers appointing private secretaries. Subsection 2 reads in part as follows:

> ...in the event of the minister or other member of the government, or leader of the opposition for whom he is acting as secretary, ceasing to be a minister or member of the government or to be the leader of the opposition, as the case may be, the said secretary shall thereupon be appointed to a permanent position—

And so on. The new clause corrects certain difficulties that were found to exist in the act as it now stands but it made one change with which I want to concern myself at the moment. There is no longer any requirement that the secretary or executive assistant can only secure this right to be appointed to the regular civil service when the minister ceases to be a minister. It seems to me that provision should be continued in the new legislation. In my view the dropping of that limitation on the right of appointment was an error and can lead to a situation that will be demoralizing to the service without achieving any real purpose in meeting the needs of executive assistants and private secretaries. For that reason I want to put forward an amendment that will have effect of retaining the limitations in that respect in the new clause. I therefore move:

That paragraph 3 of clause 71 of the bill be amended by adding after the word "minister" in line 27 thereof the following:

"if the minister for whom he is acting as executive assistant or private secretary ceases to be a minister or becomes a minister of another portfolio."

It will be seen that this preserves the former limitation in that respect.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In view of the hour I should like to say very briefly that I do not think there is anything I can add to what I said in the special committee and on second reading, and I hope that the committee will not adopt the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. McIlraith) negatived: Yeas, 10; nays, 46.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

(Translation):

Mr. Parizeau: I have noticed that nothing in the bill before us gives the French Canadians the assurance of a proportionate representation at the higher level of the civil service.

It would have been desirable to insert a clause to this effect in the bill.

I therefore ask the parliamentary secretary (Mr. Bell) whether he could not take this opportunity to put into concrete form the sense of justice that has always been shown by the government, by writing a clause to that effect into an appropriate section of the bill.

(Text):

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now by leave.

Mr. Howard: Next sitting of the house.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Howard: I have been asked to request that it should be next sitting.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Because of the importance of the bill I would hope that the hon. member would permit third reading tonight.

Mr. Howard: I promised some of my confreres that I would attempt to ensure that third reading would be on another day.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house. It being 10.30—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before you recognize the clock, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare—it is rather hard to find a minister in the house—what the government proposes we should go ahead with tomorrow and the rest of the week.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, despite what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate says, there seem to be several ministers in the house. The business for tomorrow will be estimates, the Department of Labour, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of National Revenue, privy council and legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the estimates continue in that order for the rest of the week?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): That is the intention as of now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it intended to call the Civil Service Act for third reading as the first item tomorrow?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I would expect so. I really cannot commit the government but I would expect that third reading would be the first item called tomorrow.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 20, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

FURTHER STATEMENT ON FALL-OUT RESULTING FROM RECENT TESTS

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, last week I gave the house first preliminary reports on the impact of Soviet nuclear tests as recorded by my department's network of air sampling stations. Final values have now been derived for the week ending September 10, and I would ask permission of the house to table a summary of these readings. I might mention that the highest level recorded in that period was 20 disintegrations per minute per cubic metre of air for Vancouver on September 9.

Yesterday afternoon we obtained first preliminary results on samples collected over last week end. These were from five of our air sampling stations in eastern Canada and show very sharp increases in fall-out levels. These results are as follows:

September 16-17:
Fredericton	140 units
Ottawa	90 units
Montreal	80 units
Toronto	470 units
Windsor	200 units
September 17-18
Fredericton	90 units
Windsor	260 units
Montreal	100 units
Toronto	215 units
Ottawa	75 units
Toronto	460 units

In commenting on these figures I might point out that the reading of 470 units for Toronto on September 16-17 is the highest ever recorded by my department since the beginning of our air sampling program in August, 1959. The fact that these readings have been observed within a very short time following the reported testing indicates that the measured activity is largely composed of short-lived fission products. This will be determined in subsequent analyses.

In my previous statement on fall-out levels I referred to the maximum permissible level derived from the recommendations of the international commission on radiological protection. I would again like to emphasize that such figures are based on continued exposure at that level throughout a lifetime. Furthermore, the basic data provided refer to the long-lived component of a fission product mixture. As yet knowledge is incomplete concerning the significance of high levels of short-lived fission products. Such levels if maintained for a sufficient period of time might constitute a health hazard.

I would remind the house that the chief purpose of our air sampling program has always been to provide a method for the early detection of changes in the fall-out contamination of air all across Canada. We feel that more reliable information on the significance to health of fall-out can be obtained from other parts of my department's activities, such as the milk powder and bone sampling programs. In these programs we are concerned with the measurement of the specific components of fall-out which are likely to be of concern from the health viewpoint.

Such analyses are considerably more complex and are necessarily made on samples collected less frequently. It is too early yet to anticipate the levels which may be observed in this respect.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I think the house will agree that these reports of the Minister of National Health and Welfare are most important. It is desirable that he should make them and keep the Canadian people fully informed as to the readings of those various sampling stations which we now have in Canada.

It is clear that the increases are due to the recent Soviet union explosions. They cannot arise out of the tests made by the United States, because these latter explosions were in the laboratory and underground. It is therefore a matter of concern that the minister should report sharp increases in eastern stations. In one instance the testing showed the highest reading yet in the Canadian experience. The minister did not say whether these readings cover all the 13 explosions made by the Soviet union. Perhaps he will indicate at some time whether all the explosions of the Soviet union are covered by these recent tests.

The minister did not say so this morning in express terms, but in his statement last week he did say that while the explosions do show increased radioactive levels they do not indicate any appreciable increase in the danger to human health. That may be so, but I think more and more we are becoming concerned as a result of the division of opinion among scientists particularly as to the genetic danger to human beings. Some of them say that it will not be possible to determine the danger to human health for many years to come. This should put all nations on notice with respect to the undesirability of continuing these tests, particularly in the form in which they are now being carried out by the Soviet union.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, speaking for this party I wish to thank the minister for giving the house this essential, sobering information and report. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it should impress us all with the need to work harder than ever for the abolition of testing by agreement pending the abolition of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the document referred to.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the statement just made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the Canadian initiative taken, I think it was at the assembly of the United Nations two years ago, for international measures and mechanisms to register radioactivity and fall-out, measures with which I believe all members of the United Nations have not yet co-operated, will the Prime Minister take steps to ensure that full publicity is given at the United Nations assembly to the information we received this morning, in the hope that this kind of publicity might be of assistance in bringing about measures to stop tests of the kind which are responsible for these alarming figures?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the normal course of events I would expect that the important statement made by the minister this morning will receive widespread dissemination. However, the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that it should be brought directly to the attention of the United Nations is one that has a strong appeal, and I shall immediately communicate with the Secretary of State for External Affairs in that regard. Certainly the continuance of testing in the atmosphere shows on the part of the U.S.S.R. such a flagrant disregard for humanity and its welfare that this information could be supporting evidence in that regard.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to either the Prime Minister or the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is either hon. gentleman in a position to say whether or not all nations in the United Nations are now co-operating in the world wide attempt to provide an adequate and accurate system of sampling radioactivity as a result of these explosions?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that question is one of detail, of course, and I shall have to secure the necessary information.

STARRED QUESTIONS

GAS, OIL AND GREASE PURCHASES BY R.C.M.P., KITIMAT, B.C.

Question No. 468—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1960, was any change made in the system of purchasing gasoline, oils, greases, etc., by the R.C.M.P. for its automobiles in Kitimat, B.C.; and, if such changes have taken place, could the Minister of Justice indicate what those changes are, and the reasons for so making them?
2. Is the Minister of Justice aware that I phoned his office about this matter on April 21, 1961, and was promised a report on the situation; and that I again phoned his office on June 5, 1961, and was again promised a report; and that I again phoned his office on June 13, 1961, with the same result?
3. Could the Minister of Justice indicate when I might expect a reply to my letter to him of June 22, 1961, wherein this question was dealt with?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is that the only change in the R.C.M. Police system since January 1, 1960, at Kitimat was that garages were added to the original list sometime between January 1, 1960 and January 5, 1961. Subsequently, after sufficient experience with the various garages, we retained the services of those which best met our requirements.

The answer to part 2 is that if there are reports that were to be made and have not been made I can only express regret, but it will be appreciated that such phone calls are routine administrative matters of which I have no personal knowledge.

The answer to part 3 is that I shall be glad to have a reply sent immediately. The reply, of course, will be to the effect of my answer to part 1.

MORICETOWN INDIAN RESERVE, B.C.—PAYMENT FOR LAND

Question No. 469—Mr. Howard:

Did the Indian affairs branch receive any money from the British Columbia government for land in the Moricetown Indian reserve which was used for highway No. 16; and, if so, what was the (a) total amount of money so received; (b) names of each individual member of the band, the amounts so received by them, and the area of the land for which such payments were made?

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the questions are as follows:

Payment was received from the British Columbia department of highways for land required for highway No. 16 through Moricetown Indian reserve No. 1 and Coryatsaqua (Moricetown) Indian reserve No. 2.

(a) Total amount of money received, $1,250.50.

(b) No payments have been made to individual members of the band pending confirmation of individual entitlement.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP, 175TH ANNIVERSARY OF COLLEGE FOUNDING

Question No. 470—Mr. Carter:

1. Have representations been made concerning the issuance of a special stamp commemorating, in 1964, the 175th anniversary of the founding of what is claimed to be the oldest established college where instruction is given in the English language in the British commonwealth and outside the British isles?
2. If so, what action, if any, has been taken?
3. Will the post office department accept suggestions as to the design of such a stamp?
4. If the stamp is issued, what denominations will be printed?
5. What would be the total number of stamps issued to commemorate such an occasion?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the above questions are as follows:

1. No.
2. Not applicable.
3. We are, of course, always happy to receive suggestions.
4. Commemorative stamps are issued normally in the 5 cent denomination.
5. Commemorative stamps are normally issued in quantities of 30 to 40 million.

PURCHASE OF SIRENS, ATTACK WARNING SYSTEM

Question No. 471—Mr. Pitman:

1. How much money has already been allotted to the purchase of sirens as a part of the national survival attack warning system?
2. How much money has been allotted to the purchase of sirens to the end of 1962?
3. How many cities have been provided with sirens?
4. In how many cities have the sirens been tested and found inadequate in the year 1961?
5. Have any tests been devised for testing the audibility of sirens inside various types of buildings at particular distances?
6. Have these tests been used? If so, when?

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the several parts of this question are as follows:

1 and 2. A total of $950,500 has been allotted for the purchase of sirens to the end of 1962.

3. 88.
4. 4.
5. No.
6. Not applicable.

UNITED NATIONS

KATANGA—REPORTED ATTACK BY ORIENTAL PROVINCE FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of a radio report to the effect that Jean Gizenga, the communist trained leader of Oriental province, is leading an armed force against the province of Katanga, will the Prime Minister study the situation and, if warranted, make an appeal to the United Nations to protect the people of Katanga from violence and aggression?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the moment there is no indication that a force under Gizenga is being led against the province of Katanga. The United Nations has undertaken negotiations with Premier Tshombe with a view to a possible peaceful settlement. These discussions are going on in the war-torn Congo at the moment.

RED CHINA—CANADIAN ATTITUDE RESPECTING RECOGNITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of New Zealand's request that the United Nations general assembly now in session debate the question of Chinese representation, and in view of the very general interest in this question on the part of a good number of Canadians, is the Prime Minister in a position to inform the house as to Canada's attitude to this question?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had rather anticipated that such a question would come from someone, and I might very well have thought of the hon. gentleman in that regard. At the present session of the United Nations general assembly there will be included on the agenda for the first time an item on Chinese representation. The traditional "moratorium" resolution will not be proposed, and this means that there will be more thorough consideration given to the China issue than at any previous session. The change in approach to this question has come about as a result of the desire of a steadily growing number of member states for full consideration and examination of the substance of this problem.

The Canadian government regards this as an important matter which is not susceptible, however, to hasty solution. We attach particular importance to the right of the people of Taiwan to decide their own future, and the right of the government of Taiwan to be represented at the United Nations. These considerations will in part determine the attitude of the Canadian delegation during the discussion of this issue.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In view of the Prime Minister's reply I should like to ask a supplementary question. Has the position of the government of Canada changed from that stated by the Minister of Agriculture on May 16, when he is reported to have said "It would seem that the proper thing would have been to recognize the communist Chinese right after the revolution"?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not going back to the month of May to review what was said. If I started to review the past I would review some of the statements made by the hon. gentleman on this question, and I would not want to do that on this very agreeable morning.

CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING APPOINTMENT OF SECRETARY GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister a question. Is he in a position now, on the occasion of the opening of the general assembly, to indicate what proposal the Canadian government has in mind and will make through its delegation at the United Nations regarding the office of secretary general?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to inform my office in advance that he would ask this question. As he knows, the filling of the vacancy is provided for in article 97 of the United Nations charter, which reads in part as follows:

> The secretariat shall comprise a secretary general... The secretary general shall be appointed by the general assembly upon the recommendation of the security council.

The procedure for filling the position either on an interim or permanent basis will be taken on the basis of that article. Talks are now going on among the delegations to find a solution. I think it would not be very helpful to go further than that at this time, except to say that the triple headed secretariat proposed by the Soviet union, which would be a self-cancelling body, is not acceptable to Canada. To set up such an organization in the form suggested by Mr. Gromyko yesterday would mean that nothing of a controversial nature or unacceptable to the U.S.S.R. would ever be decided.

This matter raised by the hon. gentleman is one that all of us hope will permit of agreement, because until this matter is decided the future of the United Nations will always be uncertain. I know that people all over the world are hoping that a solution will be found that is reasonable, just, fair and equitable.

TELEVISION

COVERAGE OF OPENING OF QUEBEC BUILDING IN PARIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont asked a question about the opening of "la maison du Québec à Paris". He asked whether the government has made provision to give television coverage to this historic Canadian event. I think the hon. member will agree that the government has not and does not control programming on television, but I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that radio and television coverage will be given in news programs of the three days of the opening celebrations. In addition, extended coverage will be given in the television program "Camera 61" on Saturday, October 7.

HOUSING

N.H.A.—REPORTED ENDING OF LOANS IN MINING TOWNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Public Works tell the house whether it is true that housing loans for new mining towns are ended, as is suggested in a heading in today's Globe and Mail?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the heading in the Globe and Mail is misleading, but I am sure it was inadvertent on the part of the caption writer. As a matter of fact housing loans have not been ended for new mining towns. Rather, more and more N.H.A. loans are being approved all the time. In the case of Thompson, which was inquired about yesterday, the government is approving literally hundreds of approved loans for housing for miners. Each project in any mining town, of course, must be judged on its merits. This government believes in the development of the north and the faster the better, but we do not wish it to be at the expense of the miners. If the mining company wishes to build a townsite at its mine—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the minister will appreciate that his answer to the question is taking on the character of an address to the house.

Mr. Walker: Yes. I am glad to hear that, Mr. Speaker. However, I simply want to say that instead of the employee alone being on the covenant we want the mining company to guarantee the loan so that if there is any default and the mine does go out of business, it will not be the employee who will suffer but the mining company which employs him.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

TRINIDAD—REPORTED REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT AID IN HOUSING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): A recent press release across the country indicates that the government of Trinidad is seeking to obtain long term mortgage money in Canada to assist in easing the housing shortage in that country. Can the minister say whether the government is giving any assistance or considering giving any assistance to the government of Trinidad in this respect?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Because of the applause for the last remarks, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. Garland: I wondered if the government is giving any assistance or considering giving any assistance to the government of Trinidad in this regard.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I have conferred with the minister of housing for Trinidad, a very cultured and enlightened gentleman with a great knowledge of housing, and the Prime Minister saw him this morning. We are doing everything we can by way of advice and co-operation, but any participation or financing in connection with the government of Trinidad would, of course, be a matter of government policy and would if it ever eventuated, be announced by the Prime Minister.

WEST INDIES—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN PRESERVING FEDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this would be an opportune moment for me to ask a question I should like to put to the Prime Minister. In view of the vote yesterday in Jamaica, which I think all of us regret, would the government consider making its good offices available in any way possible with a view to preserving the rest of the West Indies federation; because I think it would be a disaster to the free world and particularly to Canada, with our close economic ties with that area, if this experiment in federation should fail.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had rather anticipated, on the basis of the information I had and conversations during my visit to Jamaica in January, that the vote might have been otherwise. The suggestion on the part of the hon. gentleman is one that deserves to be examined rather closely. I have found that when people unrelated, except in a commonwealth way, take a course of action which might be construed as interference, even though it might be indirect and by way of suggestion, it is not always agreeably accepted. However, I will take note of the hon. gentleman's view.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps the Prime Minister misapprehended my question. I was not suggesting for one moment that we should interfere with the desire of the people of Jamaica to govern themselves as they please, but I think it will pose a problem for the rest of the federation. What I was suggesting was that our government should, in any way it could, extend its good offices for the preservation of the rest of the federation; because, notwithstanding Jamaica's withdrawal, it should be possible to preserve the rest of the federation and it would be in the interests of Canada, the commonwealth and the free world to do so if possible.

CIVIL DEFENCE

ALLEGED DISSATISFACTION OF ARMED FORCES WITH TRAINING PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. Speakman (Wetaskiwin): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he would care to comment on an article which appeared in this morning's Gazette. I should like, with permission, to read the first line:

> Reliable sources say the Canadian army is unhappy about the government's plan to train 100,000 militiamen this winter on six weeks civil defence courses.

I hope the minister's sources of information might be perhaps a little more reliable than those available to the writer.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this a question?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the allegation contained in the heading of this article, "The Army Unhappy over C.D. Training" is false. The contrary is the situation. The army is extremely anxious to secure the 100,000 trained men for use in the survival columns, and the militia part of the army is extremely glad to have this training going forward. I do not know what the "reliable sources" are, of course, but they are certainly very unreliable as far as some of the details given today are concerned, and indicate anything but a complete knowledge of what is projected and what is the situation.

In that connection there are one or two things in particular that I think I should set straight so there will be no misapprehension in connection with them. The most important of these is this statement that recruits will be enlisted with the lowest known army medical ratings. The article says:

> For instance recruits with hearing H-4 (fourth class—unable to hear the telephone) will be admitted. The army contends such men will be difficult to train.

This indicates a complete lack of knowledge of what the physical requirements are for this special militia training, and is completely wrong. Particularly, H-4 is not what is required, it is H-3. The pulhems profile which is required in this connection is 2-2-2-3-4-1-3. As far as recruitment in the regular army is concerned for people on base duties and for people employed with corps troops, the pulhems profile is lower than that, as a matter of fact, and a very large number of people in world war II and the Korean war enlisted with lower pulhems profiles than are required as far as the special militia training is concerned. For example, a gunner in the armoured corps in corps troops requires a pulhems profile, instead of the 2-2-2-3-4-1-3 I have mentioned, of 3-3-3-2-3-1-3. An armoured corps gunner employed on base duties requires a pulhems profile of 4-3-4-2-3-1-4.

As I say, this statement shows a lack of knowledge of what is required as far as physical standards are concerned, and also a lack of knowledge as far as requirements under the pulhems profile for regular enlistment are concerned, because the statement that the militia—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure all hon. members are interested in what the minister has to say, but perhaps he might find a more appropriate time to deal with this matter in detail.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister say whether it is anticipated that the unemployment insurance fund will be relieved of the payment of approximately $20 million as a result of the recruitment program for this survival course?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, that is a nonsensical question.

An hon. Member: Consider the source.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister says it is nonsensical. Perhaps he could give the house an indication of what the anticipated relief in the unemployment insurance fund will be, because this figure is used in an article in a responsible newspaper.

An hon. Member: The hon. member sounds like an H-4.

PRODUCTIVITY COUNCIL

INQUIRY AS TO NUMBER OF MEETINGS SINCE APPOINTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce may I direct this question to the Minister of Labour. How many times has the productivity council met since its appointment on February 28, 1961? Has the government received any recommendations from the council? If so—

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member is not as familiar with our rules as some hon. members who have been interrupting, but I think he should have sufficient opportunity to put his question, at least until the Chair interrupts him and has formed an opinion whether the question is in order or not. Will the hon. member proceed with his question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the question is important because today we are going to discuss the estimates of the Department of Labour—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is using his advocacy unnecessarily, because I have asked that the question be repeated.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, the first part of my question was, how many times has the productivity council met since its appointment on February 28, 1961?

An hon. Member: Order for return.

Mr. Pearson: And get it next year.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—FURTHER STATEMENT ON ALLEGED SUPPRESSION OF RELIGIOUS RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister say whether he has any further report to make to the house with respect to the plight of Canadian priests and nuns in communist Cuba?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian ambassador has received an expression of formal regret from the Cuban government regarding this incident. The ambassador has further reported that the Cuban authorities are disposed to take all appropriate measures to facilitate the return to Cuba as soon as possible, and at the expense of the Cuban government, of the nine Canadian missionaries deported in error to Spain. Formal assurances have been given regarding their safety and the protection of their personal property.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question. On this subject can the Prime Minister state whether any property owned by Canadian religious orders in Cuba has been confiscated? I think this matter was inquired into some time ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have received no recent information.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

STATEMENT ON REPORTED EXPERIMENTAL USE OF CONCRETE TIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska inquired regarding the reported experimental use of concrete ties by the Canadian National Railways. I have made inquiries of the management, who advise that limited tests are being made with concrete railway ties of a type made in Canada, and another type not produced in Canada. The test period will last from 5 to 10 years.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

RAILWAY ACT—AMENDMENT RESPECTING MOVING EXPENSES OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Transport. Does the minister contemplate introducing at this session any changes to the Railway Act in order to clarify the meaning of section 182, requiring a railway in certain circumstances to compensate employees for expenses involved in moving their residence?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): The government has been dealing with the legislative committee of the brotherhood on this matter. The committee did not ask for a change in the act this session, but we discussed the possibility of the standing committee studying the question at the next session of parliament. The government intends to recommend to the committee a study of this matter.

BRIDGES

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL—CONSTRUCTION OF APPROACHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question.

Could the minister inform the house about further developments concerning additional approaches to the Champlain bridge?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As reported in the press this morning, it has been decided to lay out a six-lane road for the approaches to the Champlain bridge. On the north side, that road will lead into St. Anthony and St. James streets. That way, I think we will be giving better service to the population of the metropolis and of the area, because it has been established by exhaustive surveys that at least 85 per cent of the cars and motor vehicles crossing Champlain bridge will be heading downtown.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I have a further question. Could the minister tell us whether the road plan recently given in the press is now official?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR WEAPONS—DISCUSSION BY PARLIAMENT OF USE BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of reports of recent exchanges between Washington and Ottawa on the subject of the use by Canadian forces of nuclear weapons. Will the Prime Minister give the house an assurance that no decision will be taken regarding the acquisition or use of nuclear weapons by Canadian forces without parliament first having an opportunity to discuss such a decision?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I noticed the news reports in question. I do not intend to refer to any personal correspondence because, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, there is continuing communication of a personal nature between heads of government; each corresponds with the other on a confidential basis, knowing that his confidence will be respected.

Discussions with the United States on defence subjects are going on at all times and at various levels. I reiterate what has been made clear on a number of occasions, except to those who will not understand. No agreement has been arrived at between our countries with regard to nuclear weapons, and any rumour to the contrary has no foundation in fact.

The government has undertaken to increase Canada's conventional forces to assist in meeting the more serious international situation which now confronts us. As was made clear during the discussion of the defence estimates we have also equipment which will enable the use of defensive nuclear weapons should the government decide that these are required in the interests of the national security. I might add that in February, 1959, and on subsequent occasions in the house I discussed the principles of our policy in that regard.

The government does not wish any decision that it may take in this matter to impede in any way any substantial progress which may be possible in disarmament or limitation on the spread of nuclear weapons to the independent control of countries not already having them.

I might also add that in the next couple of days important proposals may be put before the United Nations by the United States, following discussions with the United Kingdom, Canada and other nations, which we hope will bring about a new attitude in the field of disarmament. This is something in which this government has taken a commanding lead, and progress in this direction still remains our desire.

The announcement of decisions of government policy on this important issue will be made in the house. I might also say this; that the government, when placing such decisions before the house, will, naturally, at all times afford an opportunity for discussion. However, and I emphasize this, in each of the instruments that we have, the Bomarc and the Voodoos, nuclear weapons could be used. The defensive requirements of Canada and the need for the preservation of security will be the overriding consideration in the mind of this government.

No decision has been made. When a decision is made the house will be clearly made aware thereof, as I emphasized a moment ago. Speculation which has been going on in the last few weeks is based on nothing more than the views of those who, desiring one final stand to be taken, are not taking into full regard the international situation nor in the event that it should worsen, the welfare, the future and the safety of Canadians.

Mr. Pearson: May I thank the Prime Minister for his answer to this vitally important question and ask him, as I did in my original question, whether before a decision of the kind he has mentioned is taken there will be an opportunity to discuss the matter in parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I did not misread the discussions on the estimates of the Minister of National Defence there is little more that can be said in this regard. The responsibility is one which the government must take having regard first and foremost to the welfare of the Canadian people. I must add, of course, that in any stand it takes the government must ask for the support of the house. That does not mean, however, that the decision would first be tentatively placed before the house. That would be a denial of responsible government and a denial of the principles which the hon. gentleman himself has so long advocated.

PARLIAMENT HILL

INQUIRY RESPECTING EXPLOSIONS DURING CONSTRUCTION OF TUNNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether he can inform the house how long he expects the underground explosions to continue in connection with the tunnel being constructed between the house and the west block.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): When the contract was let and the time for the explosions was arranged, we did not anticipate that parliament would be in session in September. However, all members will be glad to know that the explosions will be completed by the end of next week, so that the part of the session which continues beyond that time will continue in peace and quiet. Only yesterday, in my office, someone who served overseas with Colonel Churchill remarked, when an explosion took place, "Here is Churchill's armoured regiment".

SHIPPING

COMMUNICATIONS FROM U.K. RESPECTING CANADIAN SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): On September 15 the hon. member for Leeds addressed two questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

1. Has the government received two memoranda from the British government relating to the government's shipbuilding subsidy?
2. If so, what is the effect of such memoranda?

Some weeks after the Minister of Transport had announced in the house, on May 12, the government's new policy with regard to ship operating and shipbuilding, we received an aide memoire from the United Kingdom government commenting on this matter and asking a number of questions concerning the effect of the policy announced with regard to shipbuilding subsidies. This aide memoire has been answered.

VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO SUBSIDY ON FIRE BOAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister able to say whether the city of Vancouver will qualify for a subsidy in connection with the construction of a fire boat?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, no application has been received as yet in connection with such a fire boat. If a subsidy application is received by the Canadian maritime commission consideration will be given without loss of time, and a subsidy will be granted if the vessel to be constructed complies with the regulations.

TRADE

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, and inquire whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who now appears to be on the continent of Europe, will be in London shortly to discuss with the United Kingdom government the allocation of the uranium contract; and is he able to indicate the date the discussions will begin?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I expect that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be doing just that, but I am not certain of the date.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

CABINET MINISTERS' TRAVELLING EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Secretary of State could give the house a progress report on the efforts he is making to expedite the return to an order of the house made last November relating to the travelling expenses of ministers?

(Translation):

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will realize that we have to go to several departments to gather the necessary information and documents. I am doing all I can to secure the required documents as soon as possible.

INDUSTRY

USE OF SPECIAL FUND TO RETAIN CONTROL OF CANADIAN COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Finance in view of the rather evasive answer given by the Minister of Finance to a question I put to him on May 24, in which I asked:

Could the minister inform the house whether the government is giving consideration to the establishment of a fund which would be used when necessary to purchase shares in Canadian companies in order to prevent them coming under foreign control?

I ask the question again today, because there are again rumours circulating to the effect that the government is giving consideration to such a fund.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question does not strike me as being one of immediacy simply because something might have appeared in the newspaper about it. It strikes me as being a question which might more properly be asked on the estimates of the department. Perhaps the hon. member could place his question on the order paper if he feels it should be answered.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-71, respecting the civil service of Canada.

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, the opposition will support this bill on third reading, for the reason that the Civil Service Act after 43 years was in need of revision, and no doubt in this bill there have been incorporated a number of changes that will bring the measure into conformity with modern practices that have developed in Canada in the intervening years. I wish to repeat what I said on second reading. This is not a new charter for the civil service, nor is it by any means a new deal for civil servants. This is the conception of the government and of the civil service commission.

One point that must be clearly stated at this stage before the bill passes is that the requests of the civil servants were not heeded in drafting this measure. Representatives of civil service associations appeared before the special committee and presented briefs and suggested amendments, but at no time were their suggestions accepted. Despite what has been said by the hon. member for Carleton, the hon. gentleman must realize that as far as the civil service associations are concerned they wasted their time in appearing before the special committee, because the government had a closed mind and the amendments advanced by the associations were rejected by the government majority on the committee.

These proposed amendments were repeated in the house by the hon. member for Hull, but were thrown out by the government one after the other. Those amendments represented the feelings of the employees of the government. They outlined the deal for which they were looking, and their requests fell on the deaf ears of this government.

The hon. member for Carleton on a few occasions admitted that the draftsmanship of this measure left something to be desired. I say with confidence that this measure will not survive for 43 years without amendment. Changes and amendments will have to be introduced from time to time because the faulty draftsmanship will come to light, and some portions of the measure will be found to be inoperative. There was no need to pass the bill in a hurry. An attempt should have been made to find better wording for use in some portions of the measure to satisfy the requests and requirements of the civil servants.

I repeat that this is not a new deal but merely a revision to bring the act into conformity with modern practice; that the requests of the civil service associations have been ignored, and that we on this side attempted on second reading to have the government consider the requests of employees of the civil service but met with no success. Surely some government some day will recognize the rights of civil servants to deal with their employer as do other employees in industry.

[Mr. Churchill.]

An hon. Member: Why did your government not do it over the 43 years?

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): That is a good question, but it is a very poor defence coming from a government which revised this act without taking into consideration the requests of the civil servants. The Liberal government embarked upon this revision of the Civil Service Act several years ago. The Heeney report was the result of an investigation ordered by Mr. St. Laurent. If the recommendations of the associations had been followed we would have the form of bargaining which I sought to advance in my amendment to section 7.

I repeat that this is not a new deal. This is a vast disappointment to civil servants and those who are close to them. Again I warn that the measure will have to be revised frequently. An employer cannot have working for him a group of dissatisfied employees. The government, above all others, needs the support of its employees. We on this side will support this bill in its present inadequate form, and look forward to the time in the near future when we will be given the opportunity to introduce the necessary amendments.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting to see how a transfer from the seats of government to those of opposition serves as a stimulus to thought. We regret that bargaining rights are not included in the bill presently before us. It is a well known fact that this is one of the things which we have campaigned for and advocated all across Canada for many years. I think it is also a fact that no Liberal government in any province, or in Canada, ever gave any consideration to this matter or ever established the right of bargaining for employees in the public service of the provinces or of the dominion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member proceeds I should say that, although I did not interrupt the hon. member who preceded him, who was in pari delicto, as the lawyers say, I should remind him that the subject matter of the debate is the contents of the bill, not what is not in the bill. While I appreciate that the hon. member is not going to take any length of time, I think I should draw his attention to that point.

Mr. Howard: First I would say that it is regrettable to us that the bill contains the provision it does in clause 7 with respect to consultation. In this regard it is a failure. I think it is regrettable also that the bill contains provision for infringement upon political rights and activities of employees in the public service. We dealt with this at the committee stage by way of amendment, and it is not necessary at this time to go over these particular matters again. But basically, so far as consultation and the relationships between the various associations in the civil service and the government itself are concerned, I think the provision is not such as to allow for any large degree of self determination on the part of the civil servants themselves with respect to their wages, hours of work and working conditions. It seems to me they will not be able to find proper, fair and adequate solutions to their particular problems by attempting to channel them through the restrictive conduit of the civil service commission, and that is what is necessary.

Apparently it is too late to do anything now because we are at this stage of the bill, and the government has not acceded to these legitimate and proper requests for one of the basic rights, namely to bargain collectively. Apparently sometime in the future we shall find that this provision will be contained in the act. I hope we do not have to wait for that long period of time until the Liberals get back into office, if they ever do, before we reach that particular stage.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one of the most astonishing statements that I have ever heard uttered in this House of Commons was that by the hon. member for Ottawa East, when he said that the voice of the civil service was not heard, and that at no time were the representations and the suggestions of the staff associations accepted. He suggested that for their part it was a waste of time to have come before the special committee.

Well, sir, I say that the facts controvert every statement made by the hon. gentleman. The fact is that the members of the staff associations have expressed themselves in the warmest possible terms on the treatment accorded to them by the special committee of this house. This special committee was one of the best committees it has ever been my privilege to sit on in this House of Commons. It was presided over by a very distinguished chairman of great ability, the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLellan). Over a period of 26 or 27 sittings the committee gave the most detailed consideration to all the representations made.

What are the facts as to the attitude which the associations took after the hearings? I read from the letter of Miss Frances E. Goodspeed, president of the professional institute of the public service of Canada. This letter is dated June 27, 1961, and is addressed to the chairman of the committee. It reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. MacLellan:
> On behalf of my colleagues in the professional institute and myself may I express our appreciation of the opportunity which was afforded us to appear before your parliamentary committee on Bill C-71 and the careful consideration of our views on the subject matter of this bill by the committee.
> Members of the professional institute who attended the sessions of your committee were greatly impressed with the very thorough and searching review which was given every section of the bill. We are confident that your efforts will result in a new civil service act which will afford an opportunity to continue in the future the development in Canada of a public service which will give the utmost satisfaction to the public in the discharge of its duties, personal satisfaction to those who seek therein a challenging and useful career, and which will gain even greater regard abroad than it currently enjoys.

How does that language stack up with the language we have just heard from the hon. gentleman from Ottawa East? In a statement issued by the head of a staff association representing 80,000 civil servants, Mr. Whitehouse president of the civil service federation had this to say—

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me you admonished me for speaking about things which were not contained in the bill, and I acceded to your legitimate objection. I think perhaps the same rule should apply to the hon. member. He has not yet touched upon what is contained in the bill.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is correct in principle, but of course before I appreciated that the debate was going beyond the scope of what is in the bill, or at least before I took any exception to it, a good deal had been said which is now in the course of being answered. It would not be fair to limit the answer, other than to remind the hon. member for Carleton, who is a very good parliamentarian, that what he is replying to perhaps should not have been permitted in the first instance, though that does not mean he cannot reply to it. If I have done any injustice to the hon. member for Skeena I am sorry, but that has been the result.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It appears that perhaps the hon. gentleman does not like this. I am sure the hon. member for Ottawa East would not like it. Mr. Whitehouse said this in his press release:

> It is apparent that the government in providing for compulsory consultation has moved a long way towards giving public servants a voice in determining their rates of pay and conditions of employment. This is especially true in view of the statements made by the Minister of Finance in committee that it was expected that the provisions for consultation would evolve into a system modified to meet the needs of the Canadian civil service.

The statement went on:

> The civil service federation of Canada agrees to the foregoing with a view that experience will lead both sides to the evolution of a system of negotiation and arbitration in the shortest possible period of time.

At the same time the civil service association of Canada issued a statement. Unfortunately I do not have the full text of it in front of me at this moment, but I do have this, which I will quote:

> There can be no doubt that the amended clauses represent improvement over the original forms of clauses 7 and 10.

The statement went on to express a preference for spelling out in the legislation the exact procedures on consultation and the results to flow therefrom. Then it ended in this way:

> The civil service association of Canada will do everything possible to assist in working out proper machinery under the act. We will certainly do everything possible to contribute to an atmosphere of mutual trust and confidence in the period when such machinery is being developed.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker; does this type of language from all the major staff associations seem to indicate what the hon. gentleman from Ottawa East suggested, namely that the voice of the civil service was not heard? I say, sir, the voice of the civil service was heard. There was an opportunity over 26 or 27 meetings to consider in detail the amendments which were proposed by the staff associations, many of which were adopted by the special committee and last night were adopted in the committee of the whole.

I am sorry that in its final stages a partisan turn should have been given to the debate. I believe that in its day and age the 1918 Civil Service Act was a model of employer-employee relations. It established on a firm basis the merit system, a system which has given Canada a civil service of which every member of this house is proud. I believe that within the new 1961 Civil Service Act we have created a framework which will equally be a model in the future in the development of employer-employee relations. I believe it will stand as an example of the merit system which we in Canada will be able to say is not exceeded by any country in the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Churchill: Will you call the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker, please?

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Call in the members.

Mr. Pickersgill: More time wasting.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Churchill, for Mr. Fleming, Eglinton) which was agreed to on the following division:

SPORTS—AMENDMENT OF WORDING OF RESOLUTION

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house for unanimous consent to remove item No. 8 from today's order paper for the purpose of making a slight change in the wording. The purpose is to change the words in the second line of the resolution "physical fitness through" to "fitness and". The new resolution would read "fitness and amateur sport" rather than "physical fitness through amateur sport", and then the word "physical" in the sixth and seventh lines would be deleted.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any objection to this, and I doubt whether it is necessary for the minister to go through the formality of withdrawing the motion. The corrections are purely mechanical, and it seems to me they could be made and the resolution could be left on the order paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Does the house give unanimous consent to the suggestion made by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): The house gives unanimous consent to amending the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

178. Departmental administration including a grant of $10,000 to Frontier college and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,373,104.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the minister made a statement in the two days that were taken up on these estimates before the adjournment. An examination of that statement, however, will reveal that the minister did little more than give us an account of the department's general activities. In no real sense did the minister address himself to what undoubtedly is the major domestic problem in Canada at this time; that is, the continuing problem of unemployment, a problem which in our opinion this government has not resolutely and forthrightly confronted.

Yesterday the departments concerned released the latest available figures, which were for the month of August, showing that as of that month 323,000 persons were unemployed. This represented a drop of some 31,000 from the corresponding period in the previous year. Nevertheless, not much satisfaction can be taken from this figure in spite of its improvement. It is also noteworthy that the labour force decreased by 39,000. It is significant that while unemployment dropped by 31,000 to 323,000 between July and August, unemployment nevertheless continues to be higher in Canada than in any other country of the western world. As long as there are these numbers of people out of work, with all that unemployment means, this government and all of us have a responsibility to try and correct this situation.

It is significant that while unemployment in August was below the total for the previous year, it represented 4.8 per cent of the labour force. That figure should give no one cause to gloat. The release, for instance—just to take a reference here and there—indicates that employment in Quebec decreased by 17,000 between July and August, which is somewhat more than usual even for this period. We see that in the Atlantic region employment declined by an estimated 12,000. Therefore when we compare these figures with countries that provide a basis for comparison, in this regard we continue to confront a problem that is of the greatest magnitude.

We must not forget that this is tradition ally not the slack period. We must not forget that in March of this year we had, on the basis of the standard provided by the administration, 705,000 people out of work. It is important to note that the present standard of measurement does not take into account all those who are disengaged or who are out of work. It does not include people who work for less than 33 hours a week. Therefore I say that when we refer to our unemployment figures on the basis of these standards we should not think we have covered all those who are out of work.

When we think that Great Britain had to hire 500 Canadian men to assist in a supermarket project in that country, that is not something which should warrant our feeling that we are seriously coping with this problem. It should not give us any satisfaction to realize that on the basis of the report provided by the New York Times the rate of unemployment in Canada as of March was 11.1 per cent of the work force. In Australia, according to that survey, it was 3.4 per cent; in France, 3 per cent; in Germany, less than 1 per cent; in Great Britain, 1.6 per cent; in Israel, 7 per cent; in Italy, 5.4 per cent; in Japan, 1.1 per cent; in South Africa, 1.9 per cent; in Sweden, 1.7 per cent, and in the United States, 6.8 per cent.

In the face of all this I repeat that the government cannot, by its proper emphasis on other problems of a domestic and international character, seek to impress us that this is not a continuing, serious problem, because it is. Since this government came into power this country has experienced excessive unemployment, as we know. In 1958 some 7.1 per cent of our work force was out of work. In 1959 the figure was 6 per cent, and in 1960 it was 7 per cent. Moreover, we know that at one point this year almost 12 per cent of the work force of Canada was out of work. During the current year unemployment has never fallen below 6 per cent of the labour force after allowing for seasonal factors. These excessive levels of avoidable unemployment sap the vitality of our nation, deprive us forever of the wealth and products which could have been produced at full employment levels and, more important, have a devastating impact on the personal lives of the unemployed.

We have also at our disposal the various studies which were provided by the other place, studies which could have been provided by the House of Commons if we had had a willing administration which wanted to recognize that we had a responsibility in this elected chamber. Nevertheless, the excellent manpower study conducted by the Senate last year estimates that one million additional jobs will be needed by 1965 in order to accommodate the estimated growth in our labour force and get the rate of unemployment down to a reasonable proportion. Therefore it will not be sufficient for the government to claim month after month that more Canadians are working than ever before.

A significant fact is that unless the government takes action, more Canadians than ever before will be unsuccessful in obtaining work. It is suggested that 3 per cent of our labour force is the maximum rate of unemployment that we can permit. Our objective, of course, should be to see to it that all Canadians are at work. That is the objective of the Liberal party in the program which has been stated in this house and which I propose, before I resume my seat, to repeat. That program, if implemented by this government, would provide a solution to this problem, as no other proposals put forward by this government or by any other political group are capable of doing.

In the Canadian economy long term unemployment, that is unemployment extending for more than 15 weeks during the year, is tending upward at a discouraging rate. My examination of the unemployment figures shows, for instance, that on the basis of the information presented yesterday, in August of this year 117,000 of the unemployed have been seeking work for over four months. This represents more than one third of the total number of unemployed in Canada, and 16,000 more than the unemployed in this particular category in August of 1960.

A long period of unsuccessful job seeking represents a real crisis in the personal life of an individual and an irrecoverable loss, both to himself and to the economy, of his productive capacity which goes unused during that time. The available statistics actually underestimate the amount of long term unemployment, for the labour force survey gives us only a snapshot at one point in time of those who have been continuously unemployed for a long period. However, a high proportion of those who have been out of work for 15 weeks of the year have more than one spell of unemployment per year, so they would not show up as having been unemployed for over three months on any given survey date.

We cannot blame the growth in the labour force, as the minister is apt to do, for this phenomenon, for the fastest growing components in the labour force are women and young men who do not suffer from unemployment. Growth in long term unemployment is due to basic changes in the structure of the economy, a decline in agriculture, in the extractive industries, railroads and so on. Workers in specific geographic areas have been victims of plant shutdowns or relocations. Many factors contribute to an excess of supply over demand for labour for long periods in distressed areas, factors such as the immobility of labour, about which I shall have something more to say when I discuss the question of distressed areas.

What about this government's program for assisting distressed areas, by the way? What are the latest figures as to the number of areas that have been designated for assistance under this government's anaemic program deriving from the announcement made by the Minister of Finance last December of the government's plan to allow double depreciation; this program which has become, in the judgment of all responsible persons, a farce? It has, of course always been difficult to conceive how a program which provided for depreciation allowance in respect of one year only could be capable of meeting the serious problem which confronts us.

Even if we had full employment at the national level the minister recognizes, I am sure, that automation and the immobility of labour would leave us with pockets of high unemployment. Such is the character of our economy as it has taken on its present form, particularly during the past three or four years. The inability of the government to promote measures to ensure full employment at the national level has tended to aggravate the problem of regional unemployment. Many people living in areas of high unemployment lack a gainful livelihood for prolonged periods. The loss of income at the personal level results in the community being unable to provide even essential services.

Coupled with this deficiency, the problem of providing welfare for the unemployed in turn becomes impossible. The federal government is not seeking to overcome this problem. It comes forward with assistance to small business; it comes forward with a program of vocational training and so on, but all these things are of long term consequence. What the government fails to produce is a crash program, something which would provide immediate relief for the thousands who are still out of work. Failing such action, according to the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission, unemployment this coming winter will reach proportions similar to the figures of the past winter. Should this be the case the government has no excuse now, after the experience of three years, for failing to come forward with a crash program, as well as its long term program, to meet the situation.

To overcome this problem the federal government must aid in regional planning and supplement the financial capacity of the various regions to implement a region wide plan by means of federal grants and credits so the unemployed will have jobs to move to and, what is more important, by means of tax incentives promote the location of industry in distressed areas.

I have a great deal to say on these estimates, and under our procedure it will not be possible for me to say all I have to say at this time. However, I propose to deal with a number of matters before these estimates are passed. I wish particularly to deal with the manner in which this government has escaped its responsibility in connection with the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I wish to deal with the contemptuous way it has treated parliament in deciding to establish a royal commission to assume the responsibility which, in the month of January, this government said it was going to assume by bringing forward a bill during the present session of parliament. But I shall say more on that subject later on.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member for Essex East has mentioned that the rules governing this committee will not permit him to carry on beyond a limited time. May I say it would be very acceptable to us if the hon. member were to be allowed unlimited time in this regard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister is indeed very generous, and I thank him.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give the hon. gentleman unanimous consent to continue—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I point out that my time has not expired yet. I have been speaking for only 15 minutes.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent for the hon. gentleman to continue for an unlimited period if that will afford greater continuity to his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister is among those who take the position that all we do is criticize the government, and then the minister asks what we would do. That reply frequently is echoed in certain newspapers in our country. The suggestion is that all the Liberals do is criticize, that we never put forward a positive program.

The fact is that we have repeatedly in this chamber put forward our ideas as to how this problem can be met. I am going to repeat that program today so the country will know that not only have we indicted the government for its failure to deal with this problem, but at the same time we have a positive approach to the solution of the problem. Our solution is predicated on the belief that the freedom and integrity of our society depend on our being able to minimize the severity of all that is involved in a high level of unemployment. Let us examine what we would propose to do.

1. We would first of all transfer the responsibility for unemployment from the Department of Labour to the government as a whole. That in no way is a reflection on the minister himself. We maintain that the Department of Labour as presently constituted is not in a position adequately to deal with this problem.

2. We would establish a national advisory council to deal with the problems of economic development, automation and employment.

3. We would reassess federal agencies concerned with unemployment for the purpose of greatly extending their job finding function, of helping willing potential workers to find jobs outside of labour surplus areas, of intensifying vocational training programs. I shall have something to say about the vocational training program of the government later on. At first glance the program of the government may appear sound, but it is not providing results of the type which it was intended to provide, as I shall show particularly when I examine the situation in certain Canadian communities with regard to unskilled workers.

4. We would integrate a flexible monetary policy with a fiscal policy suitable to the promotion of growth. In passing I should like to say that the government at long last has accepted the position we have taken with regard to its responsibility in the matter of monetary policy. The statement of the present governor of the Bank of Canada and that of the present Minister of Finance reflects what we have been contending all along. If this government had recognized earlier its responsibility in that regard, it is highly likely that the problem of unemployment would not be as severe as it has been and continues to be.

5. We would balance the budget at full employment levels giving tax rebates during periods of recession and refunding the public debt during periods of expansion.

6. We would introduce tax measures that would provide exemptions to encourage enterprise and increase private investment which, by the way, has drastically fallen since 1960. We would provide exemptions of a type that would encourage industry to locate in depressed areas. We would provide such policies as would encourage an improvement in our export position. We would provide a real accelerated depreciation program, one that would be a real encouragement to industry, not the kind of anaemic program presented by the Minister of Finance, jointly administered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Labour; a program which I venture to suggest will, by the revelation of the latest figures, prove to be absolutely ineffective in providing substantial employment in Canada. I would be surprised today if the Minister of Labour could point to one instance of an individual being employed in Canada as a result of the double depreciation program.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

We would provide encouragement, then, through an accelerated depreciation program, through depletion allowances, through special treatment of retained earnings that are actually invested, and through lower corporate taxes on increased export activities. These are the things which must be resorted to if we are going to stimulate our economy and provide the level of employment which our people expect and which this government in 1957 and 1958 assured the Canadian people it would effect.

7. We would modify the present winter works program. We believe that the federal government should pay a higher percentage of the total cost and not just part of the labour costs on municipal projects. We believe that federal assistance should be given on a sliding scale measured in terms of the gravity of the local unemployment situation.

8. As we indicated at our convention last January, we would establish a municipal loan fund to enable local governments to participate in intergovernment make-work schemes. This would have a special meaning for such areas as the Atlantic provinces. We would provide a shelf of public works to be implemented at the local level, federal assistance being conditional on implementation of projects during the periods of high unemployment. We recognize that while much can be done in this particular there are limitations that attend such a program.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, to continue the program of the Liberal party, as a means of dealing with this major program, No. 10, we would provide for massive vocational and retraining programs to up-date the skills of the labour force, similar to what was accomplished during the war. Supplementary benefits paid to those willing to undergo instruction training should be provided.

No. 11, we would provide for increased public investment. Not merely would we divert investment from private sectors to the public sectors, but we would provide increased public investment itself.

Additional expenditures on central public services, hospitals and the like, provide an avenue of assistance that would help to stimulate the economy. This was noted by the mayors and municipalities of Canada at the recent meeting of the Canadian federation when it was observed that in every community across Canada there exists a great and growing backlog of essential community requirements of which the most urgent are housing, hospitals, schools, recreational facilities, renewal of blighted areas in the central core of our cities, civic centres, streets, highways, bridges and public transit to facilitate movement in our rapidly growing cities; underground service for water supply and food disposal.

In addition, we would provide assistance to secondary industry. Secondary manufacturing industries must play an increasingly important role in providing both uprising employment and income. Healthy expansion of these industries calls for special measures to increase both their markets at home and abroad. Tax measures should be used to encourage our domestic manufacturing industries to expand their exports, and incentives should take various forms such as reduction in the tax on the earnings of business, where there follows an increase of export sales. I made mention of this earlier but I have dealt with it a little more particularly now.

There must be stimulation of our export industry. The new Liberal government would take the initiative in actively pursuing, with other members of the organization of economic co-operation and development, all possible methods of freeing trade and expanding employment in the Atlantic area.

We ought to provide for more flexible forms of credit for industry and consumers. There is need for improvement in our financial machinery, in order to increase the availability of capital for the establishment, expansion and development of industries. We would see to it that adequate credit is available for the growth of industry. We recognize that there are special responsibilities of the federal government toward certain areas in Canada. I have mentioned distressed areas, but with special mention, I should like to note the assistance that we believe should be provided now for the Atlantic region. We believe that there should be measures to encourage the expansion of industry and employment in the Atlantic provinces. We have set forth in the resolutions of the January convention the details of this objective.

All the economic policies of a Liberal government, Mr. Chairman, would be directed toward recreating an environment in which Canadians can work, save and invest with confidence in the growth of the country and its stability. It will be said, as it has been said, that when in opposition we take a bold and forthright position. The fact is that when we were in office, notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen may say, we did provide the highest level of employment that this country has ever enjoyed. At no time during the period when we were able to resuscitate ourselves from the consequences of the 1930-35 depression did unemployment ever reach anything over 3 per cent of the total work force. Hon. gentlemen may trot out figures for this particular year or that particular month, but the record is there for everyone to examine. No one will be able to contend that there was any period, during the time when we were in office, that is comparable with the situation now confronting us. But even if there was, that does not absolve this government from its responsibility in the face of this serious problem.

This problem is one that must be resolved if we are going to preserve, as I said a moment ago, the integrity and character of our free society. There are many things that the government can do now. Over four and a half months ago we had presented to us the Bladen commission report, a commission appointed by the government to examine into the state of the automobile industry, but we have not had any indication from the government whatsoever of its intention to implement that report. It is true that the assistance that was given by a reduction in the excise tax was a recommendation of the commission. This reduction had been urged in the house, and hon. gentlemen who refer to that as an acceptance of the Bladen report will find themselves not fully demonstrating that they have exhausted their reading of that report. Why should there be this delay in examining and accepting either in whole or in part the proposals made by that royal commission with regard to a very vital industry in our country or providing alternatives to those proposals?

True, the government brought forward legislation last fall to provide for vocational training. We were told, as I have reminded the house on a number of occasions, that the chairman of the unemployment insurance commission said that only one in ten of the unemployed in our country possesses a skill that would enable him to assume a particular job there available. That is a serious situation. True, the government brought forward an amendment to the vocational training act. We pointed out at that time that those provisions were not generous enough to meet the problem, and I have before me pretty strong supporting evidence of the grounds that we took at that time.

I understand, for instance, that in the city of Toronto alone there was recently produced a figure of 2,642 unemployed Toronto men and women who were barred from participating in the retraining program set up for them. That figure represents 70 per cent of the applicants for retraining. I say that a scheme which overlooks 70 per cent of the applicants is obviously inadequate. One might well say, what kind of a program is it that turns down three quarters of the jobless people it is intended to help?

The real reason for this, of course, is that the vocational training courses being offered under the combined federal-provincial assistance program require grade 10 qualifications and most of the applicants in this figure of 2,642 do not possess a grade 10 certificate. There is an obvious remedy for this situation and that is to offer academic subjects in the program. We want to provide education to men and women so that they can be fit to take on jobs that are available to them. We should now recognize that the vocational training act must be amended to provide this recognition of the need of training persons with education below grade 10 level, so that they can have the necessary academic background to take added training and in turn to provide them with the kinds of skills essential at this time.

These are just two of the things I mention to indicate that the government is really not meeting this problem head on. The government as a whole has not engaged in a process of planned effort. I do not mean planned effort in the sense in which that term is used by those who would build up a state octopus. I do not believe in the planning to which some totalitarian countries of communist or other types have resorted to, but the kind of planning necessary at this time, if we are going to have a successful confrontation of this problem. These two isolated cases demonstrate how the government has not engaged in a process of planned programming to try to meet the problem. That is why we find ourselves face to face almost every day with evidence which shows the lack of a dynamic and complete approach by the government to this whole problem.

On these estimates there is one other matter which I have foreshadowed and about which I would like to say something. We were told by the Minister of Labour on May 9 last that a carefully thought out program of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act would be brought before parliament this session. We were told that the government had made a study of the report of the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission and that as a result of the government's study of that report it had come to the conclusion that the problem facing the authorities could not be met simply by appropriating money to meet the payments which would be required to bolster the fund. The important thing is that the minister told us that the program would be brought down in parliament during the course of the session in which we were then, as now, engaged.

This intention was referred to, of course, by the government in the speech from the throne, in the month of January, when the government announced that legislation would be brought forward at this session to provide amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to deal with substantive features of the act as well as to provide for the kind of economic cushioning, necessary because of the perilous financial state into which the fund had been plunged. We were told, as I say, about the government's intention in the month of January. It was confirmed during a speech made by the Minister of Labour in this house on May 9 and confirmation of the government's intention was repeatedly given by responses to questions put by members of the Liberal opposition during the course of the present session of parliament. About two days before we adjourned in July I asked the government when it was going to bring down these amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The Minister of Labour told us that that matter was still under study. The implication was clear, that when we resumed we would have before us the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act and that we, in this house, would give consideration to those amendments.

A little more than a week after we adjourned in July an announcement was made in the press, I think it was on July 25, that the government had appointed a royal commission. The Prime Minister did not use the words "royal commission", but he said they had appointed a committee. This committee was to go into the whole question of the proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The Prime Minister mentioned in his statement the financial state of the fund, thereby indicating that this committee would also examine into that problem. I say, Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time this government has resorted to this particular device, leading the house to believe in the dying days of the session that it was going to carry forward with its program announced in the speech from the throne and then the moment we were out of this chamber, no longer face to face with the Minister of Labour, the government announces a device by which it hopes to remove from this house not only the responsibility for formulating a policy but for discussing the measure prior to the formulation of that policy. This act was an act that can only be branded as one that holds parliament in contempt.

This was not the first time this had been done. We will all remember that just before parliament adjourned in the summer of 1960, I asked the Minister of Labour to table the latest report of the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission. He said it was not available and within a few hours of our adjourning, in a manner that defied our examining the report, the report was placed on the table through the Clerk. We had prorogued, as a matter of fact, before we learned the contents of that report. Parliament was denied, then, the opportunity of discussing the terms of that report, just as we are now being denied the opportunity of knowing what the government's policy is with regard to amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The government said it had a policy in January. It told us the same thing on May 9 and yet, within a few days of our leaving this house it announced that instead of the policy being formulated by the government, it was going to appoint a royal commission to examine into the whole state of the unemployment insurance fund, to provide suggestions for amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I say, Mr. Chairman, that act on the part of the government is one that shows the government's contemptuous regard for this parliament. We should in this session be dealing with the unemployment insurance amendments. We should not leave this subject to gentlemen outside of this house. This is our responsibility. The government said it was our responsibility in January. What has intervened in the meantime to cause the government to change its position?

Is it because the government has not the courage to face the issues that will be projected as a result of gaps that exist in the Unemployment Insurance Act? This is not the first time, as I say, that the government has resorted to this device. I regret that the Minister of Labour should be the tool of the government in this devious practice of not recognizing the pre-emptive right of parliament in these matters. Of course, this device of this government, the appointment of royal commissions, is not new. In the course of three and a half years this government has appointed 14 royal commissions to assume responsibilities which the present Prime Minister said, when he was in opposition, were those which should be borne by the government as a whole. These are devices which fool no one. These are devices to enable the government to escape its responsibilities, to enable it to say to the Canadian people, "Oh well, we could not bring forward a definite policy with regard to this matter for the simple reason that matter is now being studied by a royal commission."

You know, a royal commission is sacrosanct. It is difficult to discuss a subject that is before a royal commission. It is argued here that this government, by the use of this device of appointing royal commissions, has not removed from us in this house the responsibility of examining these matters. We have before us the latest report of the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance fund. I would be interested in knowing how many members have read this report. Those who have read it will come to the conclusion, that it is most regrettable we are denied the opportunity of examining the unemployment insurance amendments and considering the government's policy for replenishing the fund. The fund has reached a perilous state. The unemployment insurance fund will be down to its last penny by early 1962, so the committee points out, unless the government replenishes the fund in some way. The committee points out that with another winter of high unemployment the fund may be expected to be empty entirely by next May. It points out that the balance in the fund has been skidding for three years. It was $184,685,000 on March 31, about half what it was the year previous, and this in the face of the fact the fund in 1956 stood at $962,726,930. The latest published figure, since the fund year ended on March 31, shows that at the end of July the balance was $120,771,909. The committee goes on to advise the government that it should make special grants to the fund from which unemployment insurance benefits might be paid in order to carry the fund over until the precarious state of the fund can be corrected by amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Is it because of this report that this government has taken steps to deny us the opportunity of examining into something about which this government said in January, 1961, it had a definite policy. When we think, Mr. Chairman, that during the whole 20 years of this fund $3.25 billion have been paid out in unemployment insurance benefits, when we realize that in 1942 only $37 million was paid in benefits and that by 1958 the benefit total had reached $492.9 million, we see perhaps some of the provocation for the devious course the government is following in this matter through the appointment of a royal commission and its reluctance to do something which this government said in January last it was prepared to deal with in this house. These are matters the minister will have to explain. These are matters which he cannot leave untouched. He cannot say the government, in its wisdom, has appointed a royal commission now and that it would not serve the national interest for us to take a course with regard to this matter that would in any way work against the careful and objective assessment of the royal commission. The royal commission has not yet begun its sittings. I venture to suggest that a federal election will be over before we get a report from the commission. We will not know for many months, for many months, for over a year, what amendments are going to be provided for with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Act and what this government is going to do to replenish the fund.

This is not a fund that belongs to parliament; this is not a fund that belongs to the government of Canada; this is a fund in the main which belongs to two segments of the Canadian population, the workers and the employers of Canada. It is their money. This government has used this money, and it owes it to those who are the beneficiaries of the fund, who are its owners, to explain what the government is going to do by way of bolstering that fund.

We would like to know, for instance, if it is the government's intention to bolster the fund by increasing contributions, without in any way providing an increase in the pattern of benefits, as was done two years ago That was a scandalous performance, increasing the contributions of the workers of this country at a time of high employment, without increasing the pattern of benefits.

These, Mr. Chairman, are some of the matters that engage our consideration as we begin once again to discuss the estimates of the Department of Labour. I hope before the Minister of Labour allows these estimates to pass he will indicate that the government is not sitting back complacently with regard to this problem of unemployment; that it is not drawing the conclusion that because the figure for the last reported period shows a drop of 31,000 in the number of unemployed, everything is well. Let the minister take the committee into his confidence.

What are the prognostications of his department? There was a time—and I would be surprised if that practice did not still exist —when the Minister of Labour was furnished with quarterly assessments for the ensuing period. We have seen assessments as to what levels of unemployment are likely to persist during the fall of 1961 and the winter of 1962. The advisory committee of the unemployment insurance fund, a non-political body serving the government in an advisory capacity, tells us that unemployment in this period will be comparable to last year. If that is the case, what is the government going to do about it? Is it going to continue in the way in which it has dealt with this problem over the course of the past three years, or is it going to come forward with a program, not only in the long term but to meet the existing social waste that flows from unemployment?

That is the main domestic responsibility of this government and no other issue, no matter how important it may be, on the domestic front or internationally can becloud the existence of this issue. This government cannot shrink from its responsibility. Let the government no longer say that it has not had suggestions from the opposition. Those suggestions were in large measure repeated by me today for the simple reason that I did not want hon. gentlemen opposite to say we had no suggestions to make, repeating the suggestion they have made from time to time to the effect that we do not have a positive program.

We were not elected to deal with this problem. The responsibility is one that primarily rests on the government. If it has no program, then let it adopt the Liberal party program. If it does that, we will find that Canada will gradually be restored to the high economic state it had when in 1957 we left office. That is the challenge I put forward.

The Minister of Labour has an opportunity to examine every one of these proposals. Let him tell the committee whether the government subscribes to them or not. If he does not accept those proposals, what does he offer? To tell us that the government is going to continue with its double depreciation program will certainly be a farcical answer because that program can only be described as one capable of producing little, if anything at all.

The government's winter works program, good in principle, obviously does not go far enough. Amendments are proposed by us and by the organization of mayors and municipalities. This is not a federal program. The minister talks about this winter works program as though it were the responsibility of the federal government. It is the program of the municipalities of Canada and the provinces of Canada; they pay two thirds of the cost of the program. Yet this government parades across the country, referring to its achievement in terms of solving unemployment by its winter works program, a program that basically, in a titular way, belongs to the provinces and municipalities and to which the federal government is only one third a contributing party and to which it does not contribute as much as the other two parties.

Let this government realize that it has thus far failed to meet its responsibilities in this field. Let it courageously tell the house and the country what it proposes to do to bring about a mitigation of this, the most serious domestic problem in our country.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, it is always interesting to listen to the hon. member for Essex East. However, I often wonder why his actions when in office did not meet his eloquence and the embracing of particular ideas that he now espouses.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course, they did.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member says they did. Of course, the record will show the position to be completely otherwise. It is not my intention to again enter into an extensive discussion of matters coming under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour, for this was done earlier this session when the estimates were considered before the recess.

However, there is one matter of general importance and general concern that took place after parliament recessed in the summer and about which the hon. member for Essex East spoke at some length. I should like to make a comment or two in this regard. I refer to the appointment of the royal commission to deal with the Unemployment Insurance Act.

All this indicates to me is that the government itself, and perhaps even the minister, is void of opinions and policies on what should be done with respect to unemployment insurance and has used the means of the appointment of some study group to deal with the matter in the hope that it can prevent itself being criticized for delay and procrastination on this very, very important matter.

It would not surprise me in the least, with the expectation that we may have a federal election next year, if this royal commission report were just coincidentally made available at the time of that election so the Prime Minister could tour the country waving this royal commission report, along with all the other royal commission reports, in front of the general public saying to them, as the Prime Minister is so able to say, "All you have to do is just re-elect me and these things will come into effect tomorrow". We all know, of course, that the past record of this government and of the Prime Minister particularly shows that actions while in office have no connection whatsoever with lavish promises made before an election. I wish the study group well in its considerations and in its discussion of the Unemployment Insurance Act and of the fund itself. Certainly there are hundreds of thousands of people in this country who are concerned about these subjects and who have been concerned about them for years. So, naturally, the government should be concerned about this field. As I say, I wish this study group well and I hope it comes up with some sensible and fair recommendations for changes which will be found acceptable by the government in office. However, the experience of past practice leads me to believe that the government will not give too much consideration to what this commission or study group recommends. A few years ago an investigation was made into another matter of concern to the people of Canada, and the result of that recommendation is referred to now as the Clark report. This was an urgent matter in 1957 and 1958—urgent only because the Prime Minister wanted to use it as an election gimmick. That report has been filed with the government for a long time, now, but so far all we have discovered is that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has lost it or, as the phrase goes, is giving it consideration. I doubt very much whether the Prime Minister or the government intend to take any action with regard to it.

There was a report made to the government by the royal commission on publications but so far nothing has been heard of it. I suppose that has got lost, too. The report of the royal commission set up to inquire into the automobile industry, known as the Bladen commission, is another report which has been by-passed and pushed into some dusty closet. In this connection I recall reading some Conservative party propaganda published back in 1957 in which the present Minister of Labour was lauded as being the sole and only expert in Canada on the automobile industry. In any event, we had a royal commission to investigate that matter and the report has been lost. There was a report and recommendations with respect to national fish marketing questions but so far the minister and his colleagues have pushed them to one side. Thus, as I say, past experience indicates that this so-called royal commission appointed to deal with the Unemployment Insurance Act, the commission and the fund is nothing more than a subterfuge to enable the government to get out from under a difficult problem about which it intends to make no decision anyway. In this regard the government operates in an ostrich-like fashion, as does the Minister of Finance in particular, hoping that things will get better in the coming year and giving that as an excuse for doing nothing. I think that is a disgraceful manner in which to treat working class people—to shift these all-important matters on to a royal commission or study group and then, when money has been spent on making the report, to file that report away and forget about it.

One specific matter I should like to deal with relates to wages, hours and working conditions in the H.M.C. Dockyard in Halifax and particularly those of tradesmen employed in the yard. As far back, at least, as 1950—and this includes the period when the hon. member for Essex East was in office—there has been dissension between the employees working in that yard and the government because of the attitude taken by the government with regard to wages, especially the wages paid to tradesmen. There is a system in effect—what the formula is it is impossible to discover—which allows the government to conduct surveys from time to time in private industry in the particular area around Halifax and by some magic formula determine what the prevailing or average rate of pay is. This average is then applied to the workmen in the dockyard. This is what causes the disagreement, the hard feelings and the bitterness, in many instances, of the employees working there toward this government and other governments which have held office.

In the past the government has been inundated with letters, telegrams, personal visits, telephone calls, briefs, presentations, arguments and the like from employees and unions representing those employees in the dockyards about this question of prevailing rates and the rate applicable in the yard itself. So far, no answer has been given. So far over all the years all the employees have got is the run-around, being pushed from one department to another. The question has been referred to interdepartmental committees for study and report but no action has been taken toward a solution, nor is there any indication that a solution will be arrived at. As a result the government cannot expect anything else but disagreement and hard feelings to develop, together with occasional walkouts on the job. As I say, this has been going on for at least ten years and the position has become even more difficult in the last few months. At one time there used to be an arrangement with regard to certain tradesmen under which rates were known as starred rates, or what we might call red circle rates, under which an extra five cents an hour was paid. This was in recognition of efficiency and extra skill on the part of the individuals concerned. In May, 1960, there was a general five cent an hour increase in the rates of the industry itself. When this five cent increase was applied in the yard it was decided that the men getting the starred rates, or red circle rates, would not receive the five cent increase. In fact, they lost five cents because of the attitude of the government. From that time on there were more briefs, more letters and more telephone calls to a variety of members of the cabinet but, once again, all the workers got was the run-around.

As a matter of fact, this question was dealt with by treasury board. The board discussed what was to be the position with respect to establishing a proper formula to govern the pay of the employees. Some time in April—I believe it was on April 17—the board decided that no change should be made in the formula, the reasoning being that it would not be economically sound to take a wage structure which applied to one section of the economy and superimpose the average on another section of the economy. This meant, for argument sake, that the treasury board said that the administration was not going to survey, say, the construction field and then decide that the prevailing rate, or the average rate, should be applicable to the dockyard workers. This would amount to taking results from one section of the economy and impinging them on another section, and for this reason the board decided that the old system should continue to prevail.

What position has been taken by the government with respect to other types of employees in the dockyard? With respect to carpenters and others it takes the prevailing rate applicable in the industry and applies it in the shipyard.

Surveys into the matter have been conducted by the unions in an attempt to find logical and statistical arguments to present to the government. As of July 5 of this year the prevailing rate for comparable work in Nova Scotia ran as high as $2.80 an hour but the rate applicable at the dockyard was $2.05 an hour. By virtue of the government's inherent laziness in dealing with difficult problems a discrepancy of that magnitude is permitted to exist. I submit this is not a sensible way for the government to behave, especially a government which espouses the ideas which the Prime Minister says it espouses. When treasury board met on this question it brushed aside the legitimate request of the men in the dockyard. I do not know why that was done unless, as I said, it was because the government is lazy in coming to grips with difficult problems.

There are several rankling features of the situation in the dockyard. Over the years these employees have attempted to have instituted a system of collective bargaining. They wish to sit down with their employer and discuss the question of a formula for applying prevailing rates. Even that small request has been denied them. No opportunity has been given them to discuss this matter with those who make these decisions and impose them on the employees, usually without consideration as to the result. These people desire a fair formula and the right to enjoy collective bargaining. They merely wish the rights that are available to almost all other employees in the nation.

There is also concern about the question of check-off. I do not have details of the matter but I know the government will check off union dues for members of staff organizations and associations but does not have the decency to extend the same courtesy to those who are members of trade unions. I am sure this is not in keeping with the public utterances of the minister concerning the rights of employees in Canada. Possibly the minister is not aware of the situation. Perhaps it was not discussed at meetings he attended or perhaps he simply did not pay attention. In any event I put this matter forward now in a public way.

I am informed that on June 27 meetings were held at which these matters were discussed, the questions of a formula, check-off and collective bargaining. In the month of April the minister must have had some knowledge of this matter because he wrote a letter to the dockyard council saying that an interdepartmental committee had been set up as a result of these questions having been discussed. These committees offer little hope to the people on the job. They are not concerned with committees that meet in secret and which take no action. They are concerned with their basic right to enjoy some control over their own welfare, the right to discuss points of difference with their employer. The government should have the courtesy to advise the unions involved that an opportunity will be provided to discuss these points of difference in an attempt to reach a mutually agreeable solution.

I wish to point out to the minister that this problem will not be solved by interdepartmental committees. These have been established on this question before. The question was brushed aside by the committees and no conclusion was reached. Treasury board made the spurious decision to which I referred earlier. As a result of not adopting a fair formula some employees receive up to 75 cents an hour less than comparable employees elsewhere in the province engaged in private industry.

Because of the failure of the government to extend the courtesy to which I referred with respect to the check-off of union dues those outside the staff associations must wander about attempting to collect cash dues from their members. The minister can appreciate how this interferes with the work force and contributes to a negative attitude.

In conclusion I say to the minister that the problem will not be solved by interdepartmental committees nor by letters to the effect that the matter is being given consideration, no matter what adjective is used to qualify the consideration. The minister must say to the council and the union that the government is prepared to sit down with them and negotiate these differences of opinion in an effort to reach a conclusion satisfactory to all. If the minister were to do that he would have taken a forward step toward reaching settlement of the difficulty and would remove any doubt that would tend to be cast on the sincerity of his public utterances.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, I was most impressed by the eloquent speech made in this chamber by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). He is always interesting, and the only criticism I would address to him would be that he repeats a little too often previous statements made by him many times at the beginning of this session. I cannot blame him because, as I just said it is always a pleasure both for government and opposition members to listen to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I have no intention today of dealing with a controversial issue; neither do I have any desire to discuss the particular arguments brought forth in the course of this debate by the hon. members of the opposition. I would rather deal with a general issue of great interest to me and which in my opinion should also be of interest to all the right-minded Canadians. I am referring to the economic freedom in Canada.

Freedom, our most precious right in this world, as it was so well described by the great French writer, Louis Veuillot, inspires good thinking and I noticed when I was preparing my remarks that thoughts along that line are not always easy to express. I therefore ask the house to be indulgent for someone treading on ground as difficult as world economy.

The person who can act without restraint, while abiding by the laws, enjoys civil liberty, from which stem liberty of thought and action on temporal and spiritual things.

Canada certainly has just as much wealth of civilization if not more than her neighbours.

The faculty we enjoy of acting, speaking and writing freely is however submitted to the free right of criticism which is rarely unemployed here in Canada. Criticism can be severe at times, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier used to say that it uses a sprinkler which often has the appearance of a bludgeon.

Criticism might be severe and refuse to admit certain views I express, but I do not think it can lessen my sincerity. It is a well known fact that the majority of the Canadian population is of French or English descent and that it has a leading influence. However, that influence does not allow us to ignore that Canadian freedom, during the last 60 years, has been generously granted to an important part of our population which is of other descents.

Thousands of immigrants, indeed millions, have come from almost all the European countries. Many of them settled in our cities, but the majority chose our western prairies. They took advantage of our naturalization act, thus securing the franchise and the consequential freedom to discuss with us our national issues.

In the economic structure of Canada, their intellectual influence and their material wealth cannot be ignored.

For Canadians whose forefathers settled in this country long ago, whether French or English speaking, as well as for Canadians by adoption, the freedoms of thought, of speech, of writing, and the right to pray, to own properties and to vote are the same. The privilege of being a free man in a biethnical and bicultural country is one of the greatest advantages that is fortunately to be found in our country.

In the province of Quebec, we enjoy this great privilege of having for our mother tongue the French language which has the fluidity of running water and the resistance of metal, as a great French writer so well described it.

Moreover, we enjoy this freedom of religion which has enabled us to build churches in our cities where we may pray God in the faith of our parents or that of our choice.

In addition to this freedom of speech, of religion, of action and of opinion, we enjoy economic freedom that permits us to convert into riches the products of the soil with which Providence has so generously endowed all parts of our country. The material results obtained are impressive: transcontinental railways whose facilities are being constantly improved, civil and commercial aviation, the building of the St. Lawrence seaway, huge Canadian factories, agricultural products of which wheat alone represents up to 500 million bushels—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Sevigny: —exports of forest products—

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained to rise on a point of order. My point of order is that we are considering the estimates of the Department of Labour, the conduct of the Minister of Labour, and presumably those problems directly associated with his department. I am just wondering whether the Associate Minister of National Defence has not made a mistake about the audience to which he is speaking and perhaps the speech he intended for the Richelieu club is being delivered here instead.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, may I say first of all that when I started my remarks I said that I was going to speak on a general theme. I am trying to give a general description of the advantages which we have in Canada which to my way of thinking permit us to say that the economic situation, far from being as bad as hon. members of the opposition would like the Canadian people to believe is on the contrary a very strong, very potent and very rich one, and that we have every reason to be proud of the results which have been achieved. The fact that, in spite of the prophecies of gloom which we have heard so frequently from hon. members opposite, this government has succeeded in defeating the economic recession which was threatening the nation, is to its credit and its honour.

At long last we are on the way to our new and ever higher destinies. This has been done by various methods which I should like to explain to the committee, and which I am sure are just as interesting to the committee as the eternal prophecies of gloom and doom which we have heard so frequently from hon. members opposite.

If the hon. member will permit me to continue my remarks I shall do so, and I would appreciate it if he did not interrupt me any more than we did when he repeated the same old speeches which we have heard so frequently in the house.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should intercede just briefly to indicate that I was listening carefully to the minister. I am inclined to the view that a general discourse on the economy of the country as a whole or of the entire world would be straying a little far from the narrower subject that is before the committee for consideration.

I have made it a practice, as hon. gentlemen know, to allow a pretty wide scope of debate on item No. 1.

I hope that no member or minister will take advantage of this generous spirit by wandering too far from the topic under consideration.

Mr. Sevigny: I will certainly abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I was trying to point out in the earlier part of my remarks that in Canada we have a tremendous development program which, if you look at the potential of the nation, is really only in its initial stages. My remarks were intended to indicate that, far from being pessimistic concerning the difficulties which we have experienced in the past and which we may experience again, we have in the contrary every reason to be optimistic because though we have had problems during the last two years we seem to have found the proper solutions and today we are marching toward ever greater prosperity and certainly toward progress.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I should like to revert to the use of the French language to continue the remarks I was making when I was interrupted by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

Mr. Denis: And rightly so.

Mr. Sevigny: As I was saying, I listened to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) who, explained to us once more before recess, what he said many times in this house when he gave figures on the unemployment situation in Canada, during the past few years. As a matter of fact, we were worried about the unemployment which was prevailing in Canada and which seemed to threaten our economy and the present and future welfare of our fellow citizens.

It is precisely because we were worried about the consequences of unemployment that the government introduced measures which made it possible to cope with the existing difficulties.

For instance, with a view to activating the circulation of money, which means greater buying power for individuals, we have asked the chartered banks to guarantee loans to small industries that need money to build or improve their plants.

Because we have recognized the fact that most of the unemployed are labourers, this government has contributed to a large extent to the establishment of schools which the unemployed of this country can attend to learn a trade, because the government realizes that construction is an essential factor in our country's prosperity.

Billions of dollars have been loaned to Canadian builders and to the citizens who want to build their own homes. This was done through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Precisely because this government knows it is essential to have close co-operation between capital, labour and government, we have decided to call together in a productivity council the heads of the major Canadian industries, the heads of the main labour unions in the country, the people who are experts in economics, industry and all other fields. It is by uniting those three forces—labour, capital and government—that we succeeded in finding formulas that made it possible for our economy to spring back to new life and soar to new heights.

Mr. Chairman, we are happy to find that all our efforts have been successful, since unemployment is not only decreasing but everything shows that the proportion of Canadian workers who are unemployed will continue to decrease. The forecasts for coming years are excellent and even give a promise of unprecedented prosperity.

For instance, allow me to point out that this reduction in unemployment is felt in the district I represent here in this house, where there are about 171,000 workers. There were, last March, more than 6,500 unemployed in that district. Now, last Friday, I met the director of the unemployment insurance office who told me that this number had gone down, in the relatively short period of six months, from 6,500 to about 1,800, and he added that there was work for at least another 1,200 persons.

Mr. Denis: This is on account of Mr. Lesage's administration.

Mr. Sevigny: Just in order to show you that the reduction in the unemployment rate in the Longueuil area is very real may I point out that in the Nouveau Journal of Saturday last, we find full pages of ads put in by our merchants, industrialists or businessmen, offering jobs to potential workers.

This goes to show, Mr. Chairman, that the prophecies of doom and gloom we have heard repeatedly from hon. members opposite these last few months, were not based on facts but rather on the only hope these gentlemen have, of regaining, at any price, the power which they lost in 1957, through their inertia, their incompetence and their long disinterest of public affairs.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to recall all the evil done to the renown of our country and, at the same time, to the welfare of our fellow citizens, by their constant harping on the fact that there is in Canada a certain degree of unemployment, as well as the exaggeration, constantly entertained by hon. members opposite, of the seriousness of this problem. I will not go as far as saying that the problem was not serious. I will not try to minimize the importance of taking care of those who are without work and of finding them a job so that they can play an important part in the economy of our country. On the contrary, we have been concerned with those who are without work. We have understood the hardships suffered in homes where the scourge of unemployment unfortunately strikes. As I just said, we have taken all the steps that we could take to check this scourge, and we already consider ourselves very fortunate for having succeeded in this.

I believe that it is in poor taste and surely not proper to constantly seek to blacken Canada's good name by over-emphasizing the seriousness of our economical situation. Last winter, in French and English newspapers, well-known journalists were writing articles telling the British, French, and other Europeans to forget Canada, to forget about coming to settle here and even to forget about investing money in our country because, as they said: "It is becoming more and more obvious, when reading Canadian newspapers and the criticisms made there, that Canada is a country suffering distress and hardship; Canada is no longer the land of tomorrow that we had heard of."

This reputation, given to Canada, is harmful and even disastrous. Moreover, it is not based on fact because Canada, far from being a land of hardship, as hon. members opposite have unfortunately too often tried to give the impression—only, as I say, in order to attain certain political ends—far from being a land of hardship, Canada, on the contrary, might well be the wealthiest country in the world. It is certainly the country where the future is most promising for those who want to start a family, establish a business or an industry, and prosper along with the country.

[Mr. Sevigny.]

Mr. Chairman, one only has to travel in foreign countries, to go to South America for instance, or Africa, or to look at what is happening in Asia, to realize that Canadians born here in Canada, or those who had the privilege of coming here to settle, are actually privileged, and that in fact it is in this country that we find true happiness and the best opportunities for prosperity and a happy future.

Mr. Chairman, I recently went to South America and I was able to witness the poverty of those who live in countries under an autocratic regime, or those whose countries are too often torn by internal revolutions. I saw there, Mr. Chairman, the havoc that communism can visit on a country when it permeates the social, cultural, intellectual and economic life of the nation.

I saw a country, such as Brazil, where out of a population of 70 million inhabitants, 35 million are illiterate and live in the most awful poverty. I saw that land which was called, not so long ago, "Brazil, land of the future", a country one step from bankruptcy, one step from ruin and one step from the most complete social upheaval.

In Argentina, which bears a striking resemblance to our country, from a cultural, social and economic point of view, I saw the threat of complete bankruptcy, and had it not been for the constructive genius of the man who is now that country's president, I think it would be today in the throes of revolution.

Why are those nations in such a state of distress, whereas we here in Canada today are enjoying prosperity, peace and what might be called almost full employment? This, Mr. Chairman, is due to the fact that over there, countries did not realize the greatness of that democratic freedom I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks. They failed to realize that it was by living in accordance with the democratic ideal and the philosophy of life which is ours, that a country could develop, prosper and aspire to still greater destinies. At the turn of the century, when they were offered the same chance as we were, they preferred to that democratic system, which gave us our strength which enabled us to develop and prosper and reach our present standards of living, an autocratic and despotic rule which destroyed all liberty. If I mention those things now, Mr. Chairman, it is because I have gained the impression that if we continue being prophets of gloom and doom in this way, and to sow doubt and anxiety in the minds of people, we shall create, here in Canada, a class of revolutionaries, which will grow in strength, in power and in number at times of economic recession like the one we have known the last two years, when there was unfortunately too much unemployment. It is in the minds filled with doubt and anxiety and it is in homes where people suffer that communism can be sown to develop and eventually spill over and lead to devastation.

I can understand that politicians would want to say that everything is wrong and try to gain some political advantage among a certain class of people by exploiting a certain uneasiness which may exist within the nation. But such an attitude, in my opinion, is not that of a good Canadian, because a policy like this one when stretched too far, when exaggerated as it has been by members of the opposition, is likely to give rise to concern and even terror in the minds of the people, and could easily lead a country, where everything is good, great and prosperous, where freedom prevails like nowhere else, to the tragic situations in which other countries exposed to revolutionary movements find themselves and to the crises which accompany communism wherever it is successful.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest earlier to the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and I told him too that is is always with a renewed pleasure that we listen to him in this house. He suggested that the program of the Liberal party should be implemented, because, according to him, it woult result in a prosperity unknown to us up to now. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, why the Liberals did not think about some of those points during the 22 years they sat on the treasury benches.

Mr. Denis: There was no unemployment in those days; we had prosperity.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, a report on the economic prospects, prepared by Canada's outstanding economists, forecast, in 1956 and 1957, the economic difficulties we experienced in 1958 and 1959; however, our friends of the opposition, knowing quite well that that report would certainly not help them on the hustings, chose to hide it because the people would have realized by reading it, that it was not with those who had run the country during 22 years, that Canada would achieve prosperity but with the Conservative government which, after its election, succeeded in getting our economy out of the rut where it had been left by the Liberal party. If we are enjoying a certain degree of prosperity today, if today we have progress and if we can look to the future with confidence, surely we do not owe it to any advice given us in this house or elsewhere by the hon. members of the opposition, but rather to the wisdom, skill and intelligence shown by the leaders of the Conserative party in introducing social and economic measures that have brought the country its present state of prosperity.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Bennett used to talk like that.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the associate minister would permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. Sevigny: If the hon. member will permit, I shall finish my remarks in about two or three minutes and then I will be delighted indeed to answer all his questions. Mr. Chairman, I say to this committee that in our opinion the Canadian people have every reason to be proud of the performance which has been demonstrated by the members of this government in the finding of solutions to the economic problems which faced this nation. The problems were great and it was indeed difficult to find the proper solutions.

The members of this government worked many hours in order to find what they considered to be the right formulas for the Canadian economy. They had the help of all those who in their opinion knew something about these economic problems. They requested the co-operation of all those Canadian citizens interested in the future of Canada and the welfare of its citizens. It is through this co-operation of the state, of capital and of labour that we have arrived at the present successful conclusions.

A moment ago the hon. member for Essex East was suggesting that in order to get more and more prosperity we should follow the program that was enunciated at the Liberal convention which took place here in Ottawa last January.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sevigny: May I say this to the hon. member, that if he reviews the various points of this great program to which he refers, he will realize that most of the measures contained in it have already been put into effect by the present Conservative government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sevigny: If the hon. member looks still more closely and if he goes back to the authors who describe what socialism is, he will find out that the other measures he suggests are purely socialist measures which possibly could be understood if they came from the mouths of the members of the new party but which cannot be comprehended when they come from members of this once great Liberal party, which at one time could describe itself as the party of free enterprise but which today is more or less a modified version of the so-called new party.

I am very much afraid that if the only formulas the hon. members of the opposition have to suggest are those which they expressed during that great convention of theirs which took place last January, the Canadian people will not find much comfort or much solace in these suggestions. I am confident, on the contrary, that the Canadian people today appreciate the fact that if there is prosperity in this country it is due to the enlightened leadership of the right hon. Prime Minister, the members of his cabinet and the members of the Progressive Conservative party of which I am a proud member.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the associate minister was kind enough to say he would be glad to answer all the questions I might ask about his speech. However, I do not think I will take up the time of the committee by going into all the irrelevancies, foreign and domestic, in the speech to which we have just listened. I have a hard, practical question I should like to put to the minister.

He talked about the desolate economic state of this country as revealed in a secret report, which his friends were apparently too stupid to appreciate at the time until they found a report in a drawer. If the conditions were so bad, surely these bright people, these paragons, might have found that out for themselves.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have as much right to speak in the committee as anyone else and I am, after all, speaking about the only thing in the speech of the minister that was relevant. What I am doing is laying the foundation for a very simple question. Could the minister explain this. If the economic condition of Canada was so dreadful and so menacing in 1957, and if we have now reached new heights of prosperity, as he has said we have, under the enlightened leadership of the present government, why was it that in 1957 some 280,000 people came to this country from abroad and found employment and a chance to make a living here and this year barely a quarter of that number are going to come, and practically none of them are coming to look for work because they know that is not worth doing?

I should also like to ask the hon. gentleman how it happens that if conditions were so dreadful in 1957 and are so wonderful today, there are more than twice as many Canadians looking for jobs today as there were in August of 1957?

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, I have said, and I repeat, that in 1956 and 1957 those who studied the economics of the nation could see the dark clouds looming on the horizon, and they said so in a report.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not true, of course.

Mr. Sevigny: It was only because hon. members opposite knew that it would be dangerous, after 22 years of power, to tell the Canadian people all was not rosy on the Liberal horizon that they kept this report carefully hidden. The hon. member has mentioned that 280,000 people came to this country in 1956 or 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was 1957.

Mr. Sevigny: It is true that this year the number has decreased.

Mr. Pickersgill: To less than a quarter.

Mr. Sevigny: This number has decreased because the hon. members of the opposition, whether it be in this house, on television or on radio, have said too often that there was no future in Canada, and that this was a land of despair. It is because of this that people from abroad are afraid to come here and have refused to come here.

However, I can assure the hon. member that in view of what is happening at the present time this situation is bound to change in future years, because at long last, thanks to the actions of this government, people abroad realize that Canada is a land in which it is pleasant to live and not the land of distress which has been described by hon. members of the opposition.

An hon. Member: Because there are fewer Liberals.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter on a more personal level. I do not recall that I, or any of my colleagues, have ever called the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate names or accused him of stupidity. Frankly, may I say that I find the word "stupid" rather unparliamentary and surely it is out of place in the present debate. I do not hold it against the hon. member for using such words, but I believe his stature would grow in this house and elsewhere if he respected those who engaged in debate with him as much as we try to respect the hon. member when he rises to express his views in this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps he misunderstood what I said. I suggested that the minister was himself accusing his colleagues of stupidity, not that I was. I would explain to him very briefly and very simply why I say that, and I think it is very important.

The minister has asserted, as his leader asserted on January 20, 1958, that in a secret document some economists predicted a recession and that this document was hidden. That document was written in January of 1957 apparently by gentlemen with greater prophetic gifts than the leaders of the Conservative party. That was the point I was making, that today the minister has said what the Prime Minister said in January of 1958, that some people working for the federal government knew what was going to happen a year later, but that the Conservative leaders did not know. Why didn't they know, if the signs were so clear? Is the minister saying, and was the Prime Minister saying, that they were, to use the word I used, so stupid that they could not see those signs although some economist in a back room could see them? If so, why have they chased those economists out of the public service and stopped issuing those reports? If these men were so valuable why did hon. gentlemen opposite not keep them instead of getting rid of them? The fact is that months after the present occupants of the treasury benches had taken office the government was still saying there was nothing serious about the employment situation. When the Prime Minister met the premiers in November of 1957—I have not got the document here, but I could get it—he told them: there is a very temporary situation, but we are going to correct it in a few short months. He told the premiers: do not worry, it is nothing serious at all. Remember that the Prime Minister had been in office from June to November, that is to say, for five months, and if he was not stupid it was certainly careless of him not to have discovered this information in the meantime and found out what it was that the economists knew that he himself was not bright enough to see for himself. And, indeed, no other Canadian was aware of it, because anyone who reads that document objectively will realize that it never said what the Prime Minister made it say by picking out bits and pieces and leaving out all the rest. What it did say was that the rate of growth was going down, and Mr. Harris said the same thing in almost exactly the same words in his budget speech well before the election. There was no deception. There was nothing of that sort. The fact of the matter is that in the year 1957 practically every Canadian was employed all through that year though we received, in that same year, the greatest addition to our population from abroad that we have had since 1913—282,000 people. Practically all of those people found work and most of them are still here and looking after themselves.

Mr. Sevigny: On a point of order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I should like to ask him this: is he asking a question or making a speech?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am making a statement in response to the minister's request that I should not accuse him of being stupid. I started out by saying that I was not accusing him of stupidity but that he was accusing his colleagues of stupidity or, to say the least, of carelessness.

Then again, on December 10, 1957 the Minister of Labour himself went to Montreal —this quotation has been referred to year after year and if anyone challenges it I shall produce it. I do not think the minister will challenge it. Well, the Minister of Labour has said on that occasion that there was no recession, that there was no serious unemployment.

An hon. Member: Seasonal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, seasonal, as my friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont has just reminded us. He said it was just seasonal. Even in December, six months after this government came to office, they had not discovered this terrible situation that some economist in the back room somewhere knew all about the previous March. If that is not a confession of stupidity or a confession of carelessness or a confession of incompetence, I do not know what is. And that is really what the minister's statement amounted to.

The minister cannot get around this other fact that at any time in 1957 unemployment was a great deal less than it has been in any year since in a comparable month—a great deal less—and in the month of August, 1957, it was less than half of what it is today.

The plain fact of the matter is that when members of the government say: why did you not put into effect when you were in office these recommendations you have made regarding unemployment, the answer is that we did not do so for the good reason that at no time after the war was there any persistent unemployment which necessitated such measures. There was, certainly, unemployment in two winters—quite serious unemployment—and at that period the St. Laurent government did not waste any time. They called the provinces together and my hon. friend from Essex East put before them a scheme for unemployment assistance which was accepted by the provinces and which, fortunately, was put into operation by a Liberal government. If it had not been there would have been a great deal more suffering than there has been in the last four years during a period when the Prime Minister promised there would be no suffering as a result of unemployment as long as he was prime minister.

Mr. Sevigny: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has once again referred to the stupidity of members of the government—

Mr. Pickersgill: Self confessed stupidity.

Mr. Sevigny: He says that at that time we lacked the brightness which, he believes, illuminates his own side of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is obvious.

Mr. Sevigny: The hon. gentleman referred at length to this report which was so carefully hidden away from the eyes of the Canadian public, and he has referred at length to the speech which was made in January of 1958 by the Prime Minister in this house. It seems to me that if he and his friends remember the effects of that speech it would be best for them in view of the eventual results to forget it. We on this side, of course, are far too courteous and polite ever to call an hon. member of this house stupid or lacking in brightness, but I am afraid that if the hon. member continues in this vein it will be the people of Canada who will call him stupid and lacking in brightness.

Mr. Valade: On a point of order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will, I am sure, allow me as a backbencher to correct his figures regarding unemployment. I should like to ask him the authority for his statement that there is more unemployment today than at any time in earlier years.

Mr. Pickersgill: From the bureau of statistics. I happen to have the figures right here on my desk.

The Deputy Chairman: That is hardly a point of order. The hon. member can carry on later. The hon. member for Fort William—

Mr. Badanai: The Associate Minister of National Defence who has just finished a speech on this subject of unemployment is to be congratulated on his faith and belief in the government of which he is a member. He believes the government is meeting the employment and economic problems of the country. However, we on this side cannot find evidence to substantiate the belief that a solution has been found to these problems.

I do not wish to be analytical or controversial in discussing the estimates of the department presided over by the genial Minister of Labour, for whom I have great respect as a friend of long standing and as the chief executive officer of a most important department of government, but I have one or two questions in which I am particularly interested because they affect my own constituency to no small extent.

The first is the fact well known to this house that the city of Fort William needs new quarters to accommodate the unemployment insurance office, which now occupies a 70 year old building with no sanitary facilities available to the hundreds of people who visit this office daily. I have pointed out to this house on several occasions the deficiency of office space in which this important department is housed. The Minister of Labour informed me two years ago that plans for a new building were being drawn up and that he hoped it would soon be built to accommodate the staff, now subject to the worst possible labour conditions imaginable.

I visited the offices in question on several occasions. The last time I was there was the last week in August of this year. The basement was flooded—it had rained during the night. The corridors were crowded. I could hardly distinguish the office workers from the job seekers. I doubt whether there is a national employment office anywhere in Canada with facilities as poor and inadequate as those at Fort William, which serves an area of 70,000 people.

The minister is well aware that the Department of Public Works owns a central site which was formerly occupied by an armoury now demolished. I should like to hear from him what happened to the plans for the new building, which incidentally when built could accommodate other federal department services now renting from private concerns.

The unemployment situation at the lakehead has eased somewhat, as was expected, and thanks to the defence production program announced by the Minister of Defence Production a few weeks ago industrial plants in the eastern part of Ontario are now busier than they were in the past and the employment outlook is brighter. Canadian plants are beginning to reap the reward from purchases of defence equipment such as aircraft and heavy equipment of all kinds, but unfortunately the plants which are getting the largest share of orders are concentrated in the eastern parts of the country, chiefly in Toronto and Montreal. While the plant of Canadian Car and Foundry Co., Limited at Fort William is now engaged in the manufacture of prefabricated movable homes for the armed services in the Arctic regions, I am convinced that it should share a larger proportion in the defence production program for Canada. Instead of employing a few hundred people, it should employ a few thousand. I beg the minister to use his influence with his colleague, the Minister of Defence Production, to try and equalize the distribution of defence orders more equitably than has been the case in the past.

The announcement of the minister that the government will contribute to an expanded municipal winter works incentive program to go into effect on October 15 next was, by and large, well received. However, while it includes projects hitherto not allowable under previous legislation, it does not fully meet the requirements of assistance which would spur the municipalities into a program of public works that would absorb a far greater number of men from the ranks of the unemployed.

What the municipalities want is to have the government share in the cost of materials. If such a policy were adopted, it would provide employment for twice the number of men, to say nothing of providing an increase in employment in the manufacture and supply of materials and services as a result of the program.

During the past several years efforts have been made by municipalities, by individuals and by organizations to stimulate winter employment. As an example, the lakehead unemployment advisory board has carried on a "do it now" winter work campaign for some years, and with great success. This committee is composed of men and women dedicated to the welfare of the community who have spent hours at every meeting trying to find some means by which to alleviate the vicious problem of unemployment. I sat in at some of their meetings and I know the sincerity of purpose of these people representing a cross section of the population of the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur. Not the least among the members are the managers of the unemployment insurance offices of both cities, whose zeal and dedication are indeed worthy of praise. I congratulate the department for having men of such high calibre at the head of these offices.

Winter construction now is not what it used to be. With the advancement and adoption of new techniques, construction undertaken in the winter months is of a quality equal to that undertaken in other seasons and therefore there should be no hesitation in stimulating construction in the winter. Contractors should assume greater responsibility in their bidding on projects for construction during the winter.

The co-operation of all levels of governments, and that of individuals, organizations, architects and contractors is required to obtain the maximum construction activity during the winter which alone can ensure a vast improvement in the winter employment situation.

The August issue of the Bank of Montreal's Business Review notes that while everyone agrees high levels of employment are desirable, there is disagreement as to ways and means of achieving this aim. The publication summarizes the findings of the special committee of the other place on manpower and employment, which findings have contributed to a better understanding of the unemployment problem. And here I should like to say that if the other place had done nothing else during the year, the submission of their report alone would fully justify the existence of the upper house.

The review goes on to say that the Senate committee believes that a slower rate of growth, coupled with changes in Canada's basic economic structure, are the principal factors accounting for high unemployment. There was a decline in the rate of capital investment, so that a large portion of the labour force was displaced from construction and capital industries, without the opportunity arising for absorption in other kinds of work. Finally the review quotes the committee's own summary in these words:

> There is a changed world environment. There are new trends and new circumstances in our society at home. These require re-thinking and a willingness to re-examine our priorities, our methods, and our machinery of economic policy. Continued progress depends on the ability to adapt, to solve new problems, and to take advantage of new opportunities.

The committee responsible for the statement which I just read has certainly rendered a public service of inestimable value in contributing toward a better understanding of the unemployment problem.

One cannot speak on unemployment without thinking of the melting unemployment insurance fund. In tracing the history of the fund, we find that when it was established in 1940 it was designed to be stable and self perpetuating. The act, which provided for a contribution of 20 per cent by the government, 30 per cent by the employee and 30 per cent by the employer, stood at $900 million by March, 1957. By March, 1958, it had declined to $754 million. By March, 1959 to $512 million and by March, 1960 to $383 million. I am informed that as of August 30, 1961 it was at $140 million.

Unless something is done, and done soon, it will not be many months before the fund will have reached bottom. This happened notwithstanding the government's action of two years ago, which increased by 30 per cent the rates payable by employees and employers.

It is true that the number of weeks allowable for benefits under the act was extended from 36 to 52. Is the government considering another boost in the rates which employees and employers are now paying?

Drastic remedial measures are needed now. A blood transfusion of approximately $200 million is necessary to put the fund back at a level where our present unemployed may be assured subsistence payment until they can find gainful employment again. And I submit that the only source this money can come from is the federal treasury.

The one-time surplus unemployment fund of $900 million is no longer self-sustaining. Apart from the causes of poor investments, this diminution has been brought about because of relatively high unemployment with which this government has been unable to cope.

I wish to have the permission of the committee to insert in Hansard a table having to do with the number of claimants for unemployment insurance. The source of this information is the Canadian Statistical Review of March, 1961. If the committee wishes I can read it.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give leave to the hon. gentleman to have this table inserted in Hansard at this point in his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Source:—Statistical Report on the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act February 1961; Canadian Statistical Review March, 1961

*Claimants currently reporting to local offices; all persons currently reporting to local offices to claim unemployment insurance benefits, either regular, seasonal or fishing.

Mr. Badanai: As I have already mentioned, when the fund was set up unemployment insurance was established for the purpose of giving workers some protection against loss of income during brief periods of unemployment. Since then, the brief periods for which the fund was designed have developed into an all-year-round chronic jobless problem.

The fund is no longer looked upon to serve its original purpose as a stopgap for people between jobs, but rather as a welfare agency, the only source to which the unfortunate unemployed can turn.

[Mr. Badanai.]

I do not minimize the seriousness of the situation into which the government, unwittingly perhaps, has fallen, but it cannot be denied that a major reappraisal of the unemployment insurance system should be proceeded with without delay.

I am sorry to say this, but I must say it. This government's worst enemy, is its attitude of procrastination when confronted with major issues requiring major remedies.

One of the solutions may be that which was recommended by the Canadian welfare council before the manpower committee of the Senate to the effect, that the national employment service should be separated from the unemployment insurance commission. This separation could lead to a number of important changes in the machinery for the handling of both employment and compensation for unemployment.

With regard to compensation for unemployment, there are reasons to believe that there are instances where a too rigid interpretation of the act affecting seasonal workers, especially those in the building industry, has worked considerable hardships on those people who, as a result of the strict interpretation of the act, were denied unemployment insurance benefits.

Moreover, a new interpretation of the act, which I think was never intended, is evident by the denial of unemployment insurance benefits to tradesmen, such as carpenters, plasterers and brick-layers, only because they accepted employment from individuals and notwithstanding the fact that stamps have been provided for their books. It seems to me that this new interpretation should be re-examined at the earliest possible moment.

On the other hand cases have been reported where some individuals have cashed in on a loophole in the unemployment insurance regulations. An example was reported a few months ago in an editorial of the Financial Post. I do not recall the exact date or month; it might have been in October or November, 1960. It concerns a family living in Winnipeg who had earned $10,205 in a year while drawing unemployment benefits. Here is how it was done, according to the report.

The husband earned $85 a week as a carpenter and was laid off in December, 1958, just as he bought a building lot and poured a concrete basement. His wife, a garment worker, stayed at her $30 a week job, while he signed for jobless pay, claiming a nine-year old son as a dependent. He got $36 a week in benefits. This also entitled him to earn $18 a week as an "allowable" income and he promptly got a job for one day a week that paid $16.50. He mortgaged the lot and built his own home with money he borrowed. He worked four days a week on his house and one day at his carpenter's job. Several months later, while still unemployed, he sold the house for a profit of $4,860. Then, he promptly went back to work full time.

To sum up this family income: salary, June to December, 1958 at $85 a week, $2,210; unemployment insurance benefits December, 1958 to July, 1959 at $36 a week, $1,080; allowed income $16.50 a day for the same period or $495; his wife's earnings, $30 a week or $1,560; profit on the sale of the house, $4,860; total income, $10,205 or $194 a week. In January, 1960 he was laid off again. He got another one-day-a-week job, bought a second lot and, according to my understanding, has now completed another house and will probably repeat the performance of the previous year.

The reason for bringing this particular episode to the attention of the government is to show that our present regulations are inadequate to control a situation such as I have tried to describe. There is no regulation to stop anyone from duplicating the performance of this person whose name I do not know.

There is no law to prevent a man out of work from building a house, a boat or furniture, and I am not advocating that there should be. Indeed, I commend any person for his enterprise in trying to keep himself employed. But if it can be shown that the income of such self employed persons is above a ceiling and that therefore they should not be entitled to receive unemployment insurance benefits, there should be some means whereby the regulations can be so amended. In other words, there must be a better way of operating an insurance scheme.

Perhaps consideration should be given to setting up two separate systems with separate funds, one for seasonal workers and the other for non-seasonal workers. The latter fund would serve non-seasonal workers, which was the original purpose for which the unemployment fund was established, to give regular workers some degree of protection against loss of wages for brief periods of unemployment. Such a fund should be as nearly self sustaining as possible. The other fund would require substantial annual assistance from the government.

In any event, the government has to make a decision soon. It cannot postpone the day of decision indefinitely. The question of what is to happen to the fund and how it is to be supplemented before it has all melted away and only drops remain is of course the responsibility of those who sit on the treasury benches. We in the opposition can only hope and pray that conditions will improve to such an extent that fewer people will need the assistance of the unemployment insurance fund in the future.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, before this session resumed on September 7 I for one had made a pledge to myself that for the balance of the session I would use the greatest of self restraint because I am one of many Canadians who feel that this session which started last November has produced far too much talk and far too little action. However, I find it extremely difficult in a situation such as this to exercise that self restraint when, for example, we hear the Associate Minister of National Defence painting such a rosy picture of the present economic situation in Canada and when we realize that to paint such a picture he had to make use of comparisons with the cannibals of South Africa and the poor downtrodden people of South America. Surely the time of the house should not be wasted with such comparisons. Since when are we going to say that our situation is so wonderful by comparing it with that of the thousands of illiterate, downtrodden people in South America? Why does he not make comparisons with the people of the British Isles, Europe, the Scandinavian countries, Australia and New Zealand if he wants to make proper and sensible comparisons with regard to economic conditions? Instead, as I say, he compared Canada with South America, Cuba and so on, not realizing that we are as guilty as anybody for the present situation in Cuba. When the Cuban people tried to lift themselves up by their bootstraps, what did we do? We chased them straight into the arms of the Russian bear, possibly irrevocably. I think the time of the associate minister could be put to better use in this house.

I also think that the Canadian people are not too impressed by the endless statistics we hear from the hon. member for Essex East. I think a great many Canadian people realize that for 94 years we have had the Liberal pot calling the Tory kettle black and they are becoming fed up with this situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The best years in Canada's history.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I think it is time that both the government and the official opposition realized that it is the system to which they both subscribe so slavishly which is the cause of the problems that we now have.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I think they should realize, as the associate minister said, that things are changing. Surely one of the greatest indications that things are changing was given to the Canadian people in the month of August when there took place in this very city the largest political convention ever held in this country, which was attended by people who are fed up with the old system.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And when you could not agree on giving people jobs, when you disagreed with Eugene Forsey, when you said you would not guarantee people jobs.

Mr. Cooper: How many farmers were there?

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Never was there a party whose bankruptcy was so well displayed as by that disagreement.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, possibly I have underestimated the effect that the convention had on the hon. member, especially when just the very mention of it raises a storm such as we have just witnessed. As I say, my resolve was to restrain myself, and while I am greatly tempted to continue further along this line I will try to come back to my original intention to restrict my remarks as much as possible. I should like to deal at this time with just one matter which I raised in the house some time ago. I believe hon. members will recall that on April 25 last I had occasion to raise a grievance in the house with regard to certain alleged working and living conditions at Moosonee having to do with a contract being carried out by the Carter Construction Company.

I make no apology for the grievance I raised at that time. It was based on information which had been supplied to me by letter from a union representative and also through personal contact with men from my constituency who had worked at Moosonee and who reported on the conditions there when they returned to Timmins. However, on the day that the house recessed in July, I believe, I received a letter from the same Carter Construction Company which reads as follows:

> On April 25th last you commented on the floor of the house concerning a report that found publicity in several daily newspapers of Ontario, that had been made by Mr. Harry Hegge, a business agent for the carpenters union, regarding the working and living conditions on a project that we have under contract for Defence Construction Limited at Moosonee, Ontario. You might be interested to know that a contract has been signed between our company and the carpenters union for a period of one year on this project, and in the course of the contract negotiations, we brought to the attention of Mr. Andy Cooper, the national vice-president of the carpenters union, and Mr. Brodack, secretary of the carpenters local 1669 in Port Arthur that we resented these malicious and false statements that had been made by their union organizer, Mr. Hegge. I felt that, as you had taken the trouble to comment on this situation at Moosonee, it is only proper that you should have a copy of the letter of apology for your files wherein the union regrets the statements made by Mr. Hegge and states that they were "proven by investigation to be false and malicious".

Before I put this letter on the record in regard to this matter, I should like to deal with what happened in the interim between the time I raised this grievance in the house and the time I received this letter. Many of you may recall that conditions went from bad to worse and finally ended in a strike in this particular project. I am not sure of the exact duration of the strike, but it lasted for some weeks and was finally settled by the agreement to which Mr. T. N. Carter referred in his letter. Enclosed is this copy of a very brief letter, and I quote:

Dear Sirs:

During our discussion with you concerning the above labour dispute, it was brought to our attention that statements made by our representative on the Moosonee project, Mr. Harry Hegge, that appeared in the various newspapers in southern Ontario, primarily the March 14 issue of the Globe and Mail, and also were quoted in Hansard, are for the most part wrong and grossly exaggerated, and were proven by investigation to be false and malicious statements.

I have found that the construction camp that you operate at Moosonee is well conducted and orderly and that the food being served the men is normal construction camp food, and that your camp is kept in a clean condition.

It is to our regret that our representative, Mr. Harry Hegge made these statements that have been so embarrassing to you.

Well, Mr. Chairman, needless to say I was rather shocked when I received this information. I was shocked particularly in view of the seriousness of the original charges and in view of the reports that had been given to me by men who had worked on this project. I also wondered if these statements were as false as they are now represented to be, and if so why had the situation deteriorated into a strike which in due course was settled. I made some inquiries and I was told that because of the fuss that was raised, both by the report and by my raising the matter in this house, the Carter Construction Company had been taken off the list of preferred contractors for defence projects, and in order to regain their status there must be some reply to these serious charges. I am told also that the strike at the camp was for $2.50 per hour in wages and the settlement was $2.85 an hour. This is the first time, to my knowledge, that any bargaining unit has gone on strike for a certain figure and has settled for a figure in excess of their demands. As I say, I am told that this was one of the conditions in order that the Carter Construction Company regained its previous status. They settled for 35 cents an hour more than was being requested, and in return received this letter of abject apology.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a rather shattering experience for any hon. member who in good faith raises a grievance on the floor of this House of Commons, then finds he has been undercut in this fashion. I think it is to the discredit of any trade union, be it the carpenters and joiners union or any other, to pull off a deal like this. I think they should be roundly condemned for doing so. I think this is something that we can do without in this country. Any trade union that will pull a thing like this, in my opinion, does not deserve much credit.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, much could be said about the efforts of the Minister of Labour and his department in connection with unemployment and other problems. In taking part in this debate, I should like to point out the improvement shown in the twin cities of Kitchener and Waterloo since the first of the year and also the great benefits derived from the location of vocational and technical training schools there. The number of unemployed in these two cities, as well as other parts of the county, has dropped at a steady rate since January 1, 1961. This statement was made by the manager of the unemployment insurance office in Kitchener, and he added that the downward trend in unemployment has not hit bottom yet but should continue for some time as the economic situation brightens.

Construction workers made up the big portion of the unemployed, along with labourers, carpenters, painters, electricians, plumbers, cement finishers and plasterers. Millions of dollars worth of construction projects have been started and many others pending, and these are bound to have an effect on the employment situation. Amongst the projects which have made fine progress are the B.F. Goodrich new plant, the new brewery, and the new addition to St. Mary's Catholic hospital which will make this one of the finest hospitals in Canada.

Recently the Department of Labour announced the approval of technical and vocational school additions for the Eastwood collegiate in Kitchener and the Waterloo collegiate in Waterloo. These additions will be financed, as we know, by the dominion and provincial governments, the federal government bearing 75 per cent of the cost. This announcement, I am sure, was particularly approved by many of the citizens of my district. No doubt when they are completed they will be of great value to those who neglected to complete their education or, through other circumstances, were unable to take advantage of further schooling. I believe that these additions will provide work for many of our citizens.

I understand that nearly 70 per cent of the unmarried young people between the ages of 14 and 19 who are registered as jobless and living at home, have at least one parent working. In thinking of these young people I am led to commend the Minister of Labour and his department upon the introduction of measures concerning vocational and technical training which facilities have been increased to the extent of 50 per cent in Canada. The federal government is to pay 75 per cent of the provincial contribution to the cost of these schools up to 1963. These young people living at home have a wonderful opportunity to improve their education and qualify for better positions and the security so necessary under modern conditions.

I hope that all people were able to read the statement recently made by our beloved Governor General in which he said:

> Young people who leave school prematurely are cutting themselves off from most of the opportunities available in our country. Now, as never before, Canada's progress and security depend on the educational level, technical knowledge and skill of her people. It seems inevitable that those who leave school before graduation will miss most of the opportunities available in our country. They will cut themselves off from the possibility of training in industry. They may have to face a lifetime of insecurity.

Recently, I read an editorial in my local newspaper the Elmira Signet written by R. S. Reid of the Kindersley Clarion. I should like to quote a part of it:

> It has been a tragedy in every age and it is a greater tragedy in ours that so many of our most promising young people voluntarily cripple themselves. Their enthusiasm for life, their urge to be independent and self-reliant, their appetite for adventure—the very qualities which fit them to earn a place among our most useful and successful citizens—lead them instead to throw away their greatest chance of fulfilling their destiny. Eager to become a part of the adult world, they leave school before they have acquired an education that would enable them to make use of their natural gifts. The tragedy is greater today because our modern technological world has so little use for the half-taught—and such a desperate need for men and women with a full, well rounded education. Figures recently released by the national employment service clearly show that a high school education is a must for any person who wants to be sure of holding a job in our modern society.
> Most young people must be aware, by this time, that the adult world is concerned about those who are unemployed in the nation. What they may not know is that persons with a less than grade 9 education form the greater part of the total of the unemployed.
> Automation does create more jobs than it eliminates, but the new jobs are skilled jobs. In far too many cases the persons displaced by automation are unable to step into the new job it creates because they lack the education needed as a basis for training in the new work.

Our Minister of Labour, in bringing about new technical and vocational schools across Canada, is doing a most important job for those unfortunate people who may not have had the opportunity or ambition to carry on their studies in their younger days.

As a young man coming back from world war I in a disabled condition, I fully realized that I had neglected one of the great assets of life—education. In order to prepare myself for the future I attended the vocational school offered by our government under the Department of Veterans Affairs, and later on attended night school for some years. Taking advantage of these opportunities has meant a great deal to me. May I say that such opportunities to attend vocational and technical schools are now offered to our young people by the government. As previously mentioned, Canada's progress and security depend upon the educational level, technical knowledge and skill of her people.

Today we are blessed with wonderful schools, colleges, universities and teachers who are ready and willing to bring that knowledge so essential to every boy and girl in this great country of ours. We have these additional vocational and technical schools, and a great majority of these unemployed young people between the ages of 14 and 19 years, along with others anxious to improve their education, should be impressed with these added facilities. These facilities will give them an opportunity to obtain an adequate education where they will have the chance of working up to the required income.

In concluding my remarks, Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that parents should take a greater interest in our youth. Yes, I know we supply them with the necessities of life, but after all that is only the materialistic side of things. What about the personal relationship of our boys and girls? No doubt we will admit that the basic education of any good citizen starts in the home, and there is no substitute for this first step in the over-all process. Like all proud parents, we expect much of our youth, and we must do so if our young country is to fulfil its ambitions.

Mr. Chairman, may I again commend the Minister of Labour and his department for their untiring efforts and impress upon all parents and others—indeed, upon all of us—that we have a very important part to play in the progress of Canada. One of these important efforts could be the encouraging of our youth, and others who neglected or did not have the opportunity of continuing their education, to attend these vocational and technical schools in order that they may provide for themselves a brighter future.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I did not interrupt the hon. member earlier in his address because I did not know whether or not when he referred to the governor general, his reference was to the late governor general or our present beloved Governor General. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would inform the committee whether or not he was making reference to the present Governor General.

Mr. Weichel: The present Governor General, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Then I must, upon reflection, concede that I should have interrupted the hon. member at that point to rule that any such reference or quotation would be out of order under our rules.

Mr. Weichel: I am sorry; I did not understand this, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I had a call from one of the high officials of the city of Welland who told me that work was getting much slacker there at the present time. He said the number of unemployed was increasing, and no doubt the number drawing unemployment insurance will increase also.

So far this year there have been 1,090 welfare recipients, and the welfare paid out by the city of Welland has amounted to approximately $228,000. I do not give these figures to embarrass the government but because I wish to bring to the attention of the government some of the needs of the city of Welland and that area.

Welland does not seem to come within the category of the depressed area for double depreciation, according to the definition laid down by the government. Even so, Welland has had a great deal of unemployment for the last three or four years. There is a plant in Welland at the present time, Atlas Steel, that has a great expansion program in prospect. Consideration is being given by this company to a location for this expansion.

I understand that some high personages from other provinces have been in Welland offering certain definite considerations to Atlas Steel to locate in their respective provinces. No doubt one of the considerations offered has been that the plant will be located in an area where double depreciation would be allowed. Also rumours are prevalent there among these officials that another area in Ontario that is declared at the present time to be a depressed area eligible for double depreciation has been making a bid for this particular expansion program.

At the present time Welland is not in that category. I am informed that if they could receive more favourable treatment under the depressed area program there would be some likelihood of this plant staying in Welland. The minister told me today that as of now this plant would not get the double depreciation in Welland, while it could in these so-called depressed areas where double depreciation would apply. To me this seems rather discriminatory and unfair.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the hon. member for Welland does not wish to leave a wrong impression with the committee. He stated that I advised him that this plant would not receive double depreciation in Welland. The position is that Welland has not applied as a municipality for that designation. I am sure that if Welland applied for designation in a very simple way, perhaps by telegram or by letter, we would waste no time in looking at the situation to see whether Welland would qualify under the formula which has been set up, as some 19 municipalities and areas have already qualified. I do not want the impression to be left with the committee that Welland could not qualify. Welland has not applied in order to ascertain whether they could qualify or not.

Mr. McMillan: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, if I left the wrong impression with the committee. I intended to come to this point later and say that the minister told me Welland had not applied. However, if a plant moved from one part of the country to another they would not be increasing the wealth of the country but would be removing the facilities for production from one part of the country to another. I know that the Department of Labour—the Minister of Labour—has been flexible in reaching decisions as to whether certain areas can be included in the category to be declared areas to which the double depreciation allowance will apply. We know, for example, that one area was declared to be qualified although it was not in existence at the beginning of the period covered by the formula. I refer to Elliot Lake. In other cases, too, the minister has shown a degree of flexibility. I spoke to the minister this morning and he said that if Welland were to send in an application it would be given every favourable consideration. I thank the minister for this. I have talked to the mayor of Welland, and he said he would apply immediately.

I would appeal to the minister to give Welland the same degree of favourable consideration as he has given to some other places. Welland has been seriously affected by unemployment problems and I should not like to see a company leave the area to build an extension in another location because of this double depreciation feature if that feature were in any way to be a deciding factor. Atlas Steel has been in Welland for a number of years. The people of the county of Welland have reason to be proud of the Atlas Steel Company and of Mr. De Young, the president, now president of the productivity council, his staff and the employees. We should all like to see them remain in Welland; we should all like to see the expansion program carried out at the site of the main plant. The people of Welland would not like to see them move to another location which might be more desirable from the point of view of taxation as a result of some action of the government.

In view of Welland's unemployment problem I again appeal to the minister and to the government not to let this happen.

Mr. Regier: I have assured a number of those who have made representations to me that I would raise this matter at this particular time. I do not intend to take more than a limited number of minutes. I want to begin by endorsing wholeheartedly the contention made this morning by the hon. member for Essex East when he said he felt sympathy for the Minister of Labour on his having to take all the blame for unemployment in our nation. I agree with the hon. gentleman's contention that the question of full employment ought to be the responsibility of the government as a whole. I say this even at a time when we have the Minister of Labour sitting across on the other side of the committee. I rather regret, also, that the minister of labour in the former Liberal government had to take upon his shoulders almost alone responsibility for the level of unemployment which then existed. As is apparent if we consider the organization of the Department of Labour and the specific responsibilities assigned to the Minister of Labour, he alone would be completely unable to do much about what is, in effect, a major national calamity—or at least it is to those who are unemployed.

In the past mention has been made by the government of the national productivity council and its work. The council has been referred to again today. I was interested to hear the reply which the minister gave to a question asked by the hon. member for Leeds this morning. Any organization set up by the government which has been given the heavy responsibility of recommending ways and means of causing our economy to expand to such an extent that unemployment is reduced to a reasonable level should, in my view, certainly have met more often than three times, and I hope the minister realizes that this is a matter of such great significance to the welfare of all the Canadian people. Three meetings over a period of many long months are far from sufficient. The council ought to be meeting morning, noon and night until it comes up with answers which will be acceptable to the government and to the people.

The particular complaint I have this afternoon is one in connection with which I feel the national productivity council could really assist the minister. I have here a complaint, a letter and a resolution passed by local union 1064 of the united steelworkers of America in Sydney, Nova Scotia. I am impressed by the reasonableness of the proposals made by this local union. They do not contend that there must be no readjustment in this industry in the Atlantic provinces. They do not even claim that the complete abolition of unemployment in the Atlantic region of Canada is possible. However, they do complain that the Avro company, which rules over the destinies of so many tens of thousand of Canadians, should be able to act in such an arbitrary and high-handed manner as it acts on occasion. They point out that more than 1,100 employees have been laid off at Dosco's Sydney steel plant, with a most recent lay-off of 606, including men who had been in the employ of the company since 1942. A resolution which was passed unanimously at a membership meeting urges that immediate steps be instituted by federal, provincial and municipal government heads to summon Avro officials to a meeting for the definite purpose of making commitments for the future of our economy. It may be that lay-offs are inevitable and that in the national interest they might, here and there, be the one and only thing that can be done. What these people are complaining about is the uncertainty. They are aware that Avro has plants in many parts of Canada and overseas, and they are unable to obtain from officials of Avro any indication how long they can reasonably expect to continue to be employed. It is in this regard that I should like to appeal to the minister to get his productivity council busy so that if there is to be relocation of either industry or labour, or both, these things may be arranged in an orderly manner, thereby averting the needless and unwarranted personal hardship which is imposed by decisions of a board of directors meeting, perhaps, in London, New York, Hamilton, Ontario, or elsewhere and deciding that it is in their interest to cause six or seven hundred men to be laid off, and having the power to pay no heed to the immediate effects that such an arbitrary decision must have on the lives of the individuals and of the communities in respect to a continuation of steady employment.

Our corporations are growing smaller, more powerful and limited in number. I feel the time has come when no Canadian corporation should be permitted to treat any individuals or community in the manner in which these people have been treated by those who own this plant. I am not contending that Dosco ought not to be expanded. I do not know why it should not be. If conditions warranted, perhaps Quebec, Nova Scotia and British Columbia could have plants to turn out our basic steel. However, as long as conditions continue as they are I believe the national productivity council, the minister and indeed the government as a whole have the responsibility to ensure that individuals will not be dealt with arbitrarily as industries move from one area to another. The government should take steps to prevent arbitrary treatment such as that to which the people of Cape Breton island have been subjected over a period of several years.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, as I represent a riding where the working class makes up the greater part of the voters, I think I should at this point of our discussion of these estimates of the Department of Labour express the views of my voters, and therefore my own, with regard to unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, the word unemployment is in every Canadian citizen's mouth today, whether he is affected by unemployment or sincerely and loyally trying to work out some solution to alleviate as much as possible that social blight.

The causes of unemployment are many. It may be attributed partly to immigration, to automation, to the lack of primary industry in this country, however wealthy, to the lack of technical training among our fellow citizens, more particularly the young people, to incomplete education, or to the increase of the number of women workers on the labour market.

The causes may also be attributed to seasonal lay-offs as well as to seasonal unemployment or to competition on the world markets. Whatever the cause, Mr. Chairman, I think that unemployment is a blight which should be looked after with the greatest haste and care in order to avoid that certain revolutionary groups with communist leanings rouse the workers against established order, as they did before during the depression years, 30 years ago.

The right to work is a sacred right; nobody would deny to any person the exercise of his right to work, because it is a fundamental right. I know all hon. members, whatever their political affiliations, acknowledge this basic right. Now, if the workers have the right to work, I say that governments should look after the working class by taking the necessary steps to ensure that every individual who wants a job gets one.

Unemployment, Mr. Chairman, has often given rise to political controversies in this house, on the hustings, on television, on the radio and elsewhere. However, while we should not, on this side of the house, raise political issues in this respect, we cannot let go unanswered some more or less sincere remarks which opposition members like to voice in connection with unemployment. We cannot but, in all sincerity, honesty and loyalty, point out in this house, and to the whole Canadian people, everything this government has done to alleviate the effects of unemployment.

Everyone knows, Mr. Chairman, that the Conservative government has done much, in the few years it has been in power, to remedy the unemployment situation.

May I mention some measures which have been taken for the benefit not only of those who will read the newspapers, but also of some opposition members who stubbornly refuse to see what the Conservative government, aware of its responsibilities to the Canadian people, has done since it took office as far as unemployment is concerned.

As soon as it took over, this government carried out a considerable amount of public works in all municipalities which asked for them.

Obviously it was a remedy. It was not a measure intended to abolish or completely eliminate unemployment, but it was a definite and concrete measure. That winter works program caused a Liberal minister of the present provincial government in Quebec to say that there had been a reduction of about 48,000 in the number of unemployed, due to the implementation of the program.

It can be seen, therefore, that this Conservative administration due to the interest it showed in trade and the incentive it gave our domestic and international trade, as well as to the loans it granted small industries or businessmen, was quite successful in creating employment and opening new markets.

We should not forget also the absolutely concrete, logical and intelligent action of this government when it offered the provinces to contribute as much as 75 per cent of the cost of implementing a vocational training program for all workers wishing to use the benefits under the act. In fact, I was informed that in the province of Quebec, more than 3,000 workers availed themselves of these provisions, to the application of which the federal government contributes up to 75 per cent of the costs.

Mr. Chairman, the population and opposition members should be told of the considerable sums this government has put into the C.M.H.C. fund, for housing construction and urban redevelopment. That initiative has greatly contributed to alleviating or checking unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, since the beginning of this debate, we have not heard a single opposition member explain the unemployment problem.

I would be tempted to deal with employment, but I feel that to find a solution to the problem, we must first consider the different types of unemployment and their causes. Those who have dealt with this problem in a somewhat more personal way have defined four types of unemployment.

Frictional unemployment results from defective functioning within the labour market. Incidentally, this type of unemployment may exist even at times of full employment and it is due to fluctuations among the various industries.

There is a second type known as cyclic unemployment, which is caused by the cycle of business, according to whether it proceeds slowly or at an accelerated pace.

There is also a third type known as seasonal unemployment which apparently is the nightmare of all northern countries.

There is, too, a fourth type of unemployment—technical unemployment. It is brought about, of course, by the introduction of new techniques into the industrial world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it so happens that the riding I represent in this house is particularly striken by the three last types of unemployment: cyclic, seasonal and technical unemployment.

The present government has dealt with the problem arising from the fourth type, technical unemployment, and has suggested to the provinces ways and means of meeting this type of unemployment.

There is still seasonal unemployment, a situation that is to be found in all northern countries. We could obviously take more steps to lessen the effects of this category of unemployment; but, after all, it is due to nature.

Therefore, I believe there is an unemployment situation that should be called "general unemployment". It is due to a lack of cohesion in the distribution of the labour force. It is on this situation that I request the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) to get as soon as possible the necessary datas for economic planning, which involves a knowledge of labour demand in every industrial category, and the distribution of that demand according to the needs and the various categories of employees.

[Mr. Valade.]

Mr. Chairman, unemployment is not only—those words are not mine—a federal responsibility. Whatever its causes or reasons, unemployment is not only a federal responsibility; it is also the responsibility of the provincial and local administrations, and even that of the unions. The heads of each of those administrative levels should assume their responsibilities in order to restore full employment in this country.

We read every day in the papers reports of some labour disputes that are more or less fair or reasonable, but I fail to understand that in times of serious unemployment, labour and management cannot agree in order to prevent as many strikes as possible. Considering the frightening number of millions of working hours lost through those strikes, it is of the utmost importance to urge labour unions, union leaders, labour and management also to assume their responsibilities in this field.

Mr. Chairman, as I said earlier unemployment is not only a federal responsibility, but also a provincial one, and I am not the one who said so. In this respect, I should like to quote the statement made by the ephemeral leader, Hon. Jean Lesage, head of the Liberal party in Quebec.

Mr. Deschatelets: Hear, hear.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, judging by the applause, I think that the word ephemeral won the approval of the house; but it must be kept in mind that it means short-lived and that the Liberal leader will not last very long.

As I was just saying, the Liberal leader stated that unemployment is a provincial responsibility. Therefore, if we examine the current statistical data in the province of Quebec, and more especially those relating to unemployment in general, we find that it has declined everywhere in Canada, except in the province of Quebec, where it has increased in the last six months.

Therefore, we would ask the provincial government which declared that unemployment is a provincial responsibility to carry out its election promises and to set up a program to reduce the unemployment which prevails in the province of Quebec at the present time.

Every week, electors come to my office by the hundreds to tell me that Mr. Lesage, the premier of Quebec, has promised and even sworn that he would solve the problem of unemployment in the province. Yet, they say, he is the first one to fire us from the jobs we hold with the provincial government.

If that is how some premiers intend to assume their responsibilities concerning unemployment, I call on the people to sweep the Liberals out of office, as they did in Ottawa, and we will take their place and strive to take efficient steps to fight unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few suggestions to relieve somewhat the unemployment which the Quebec provincial branch of the Liberal party ignores, and even to put an end to it in my province and in the constituency I represent.

I wonder if the Minister of Labour could not, in co-operation with the city of Montreal, undertake a huge project such as the construction of a scenic route all around the island of Montreal. As everybody knows, Canada's metropolis offers great advantages from the points of view of aesthetics, culture and education. In my opinion, we have somewhat neglected, until now, to develop Montreal's natural advantages. Consequently, I would ask the minister to discuss this matter with his colleagues so as to come to an agreement concerning a winter works project such as the construction of a scenic route around the city of Montreal, to reduce unemployment.

Moreover, as another way of creating jobs for the unemployed in the Montreal area, I wonder if the Minister of Labour could not, once more, co-operate with his colleague the Minister of Public Works and have a tunnel built under the St. Lawrence, in order to improve communications between Montreal and the south shore.

Also, Mr. Chairman, in order again to create jobs and reduce unemployment, which has become a serious problem in the province of Quebec since the Liberals have taken over, I would suggest to the minister to speed up large scale town redevelopment, so far as housing in Montreal is concerned.

Mr. Chairman, some time ago responsible persons made a study of the unemployment problem. I did not say that the former government should be blamed for it, nor should we now be. I did not say either that the provincial Liberal party was responsible, although some members of the opposition may be oversensitive on that issue since their election campaign is being turned against them.

With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I should like to quote a paragraph on future prospects in Canada:

> There is evidence that the recession in the regular business cycle is coming to an end and that an economic recovery is appearing. The recovery factors have been operating for several months in the United States and, if they go on, they will spur a business readjustment in Canada in the months ahead. It is to be expected that such an improvement will contribute to increase employment and, as a result, reduce unemployment. It is essential that this expansion be facilitated and supported by proper fiscal and monetary measures. In order to encourage the expansion of business transactions, it will be necessary, in particular, to increase the credits available.

Mr. Chairman, that is precisely what this Conservative government has done in the way of unemployment prevention, something the Liberals have always tried to prevent us from doing. Because we increased the housing money supply, members of the opposition called out that we were overloading the government's budget. When we wanted to make ready money available to industry and business, again, members of the opposition protested that we chose to uphold Mr. Coyne's destructive policies instead of promoting a normal and realistic economic expansion which would procure employment in this country.

But this is not from me, Mr. Chairman. If our good friends, who are a little ill at ease because of these arguments, would read the report of the Senate special committee on manpower and employment that was published on June 14, 1961, where the Liberal senators had majority, they will find that this Senate committee with a Liberal majority has just approved the very methods used by this government to fight unemployment.

Well, Mr. Chairman, if our friends want to be sincere and honest, they will admit that this government has done more than any previous government to fight unemployment. If they are not satisfied with that, let them ask their leader, Premier Lesage of Quebec, to do more than we have, because he has done nothing up to now.

Before I conclude my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I should like to correct certain statements made here this afternoon, especially by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), to the effect that we never had so many unemployed as today, if I understood him correctly.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I have here the Montreal Star of September 19, 1961, where we read that in August, 1960, the number of unemployed, in thousands, was 352, and in August 1961, 323. This is a decrease of 29,000.

I wonder where the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate could possibly have picked up his statistics. As the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) would probably put it, most likely from Martin's bureau of statistics; but I prefer to rely on those of the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly would have more remarks to make, more particularly in regard to female workers on the labour market. From 1949 to 1959, the labour market has shown a 43 per cent increase in the number of female workers. Of course, always according to those statistics, it is said that most female workers are married. Well, that is a problem which we shall have to consider carefully, but, in my opinion, female workers contribute to the increase in unemployment among married men.

Therefore, I would ask the minister to take into consideration those few remarks I have just made, and at the same time I would ask our Liberal friends to be a little more serious and less politically-minded when they talk about unemployment.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I felt I should wait until the hon. member for St. Mary had concluded before pointing out to him that I think he misunderstood what I said. What I said was that month for month in no year since 1957 has unemployment been as low as it was in 1957. I have all the figures right here in my hand. They are not from newspapers or anything else, but from the bureau of statistics. I will give the bureau of statistics figures for the month of August in the years from 1957 on. This is the labour force survey of persons without jobs and seeking work. In August, 1957 the number was 174,000; in August, 1958, 281,000; in August, 1959, 239,000; in August, 1960, 322,000, and in August of 1961, according to the latest release, 301,000.

Mr. More: How many were working?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not the point that was being discussed. I am merely correcting a point that the hon. member raised but since the question has been asked I will answer it. The proportion of the total population employed—

Mr. More: How many were working?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member would just listen to the answer to his question. The percentage of the total population employed was higher in every month in 1957 than it has been in the corresponding months in any year since.

[Mr. Valade.]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I have to correct an experienced member of the house, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. He said that in 1957 the number of people employed was higher than ever before. Am I correct?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I did not say any such thing. What I said was that the number of persons unemployed was lower in each month of 1957 than it has been in the corresponding month in any year since. I gave the figures for the month of August and I am quite prepared to give them for any other month if the committee wants them. These are dominion bureau of statistics figures. I also made the assertion that the percentage of the total population which was employed was higher in each month of 1957 than it has been in the corresponding months of any year since.

Mr. Valade: If the corresponding numbers in each month were better, then I suppose the corresponding average for the year would be better than in any year before; otherwise the premise of the member would be false and would lead to a fallacy, which I do not doubt it is. I have here the report of the Senate committee on manpower and I should like to refer the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to it. There have never been so many people employed in Canada as there are today. In 1950 there were 5,163,000 people employed, while in 1960 there were 6,403,000.

If I follow the argument of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, then the average is much lower in 1956 than in 1957. If I have the correct figures here, then it is also less in 1951, 1952 and 1953, perhaps because of the Korean war. I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should refer to this report of the Senate committee on manpower.

Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot allow those figures to go unchallenged. We know, of course, that practically every year there have been more people employed than the year before because we have a lot more people. What I was talking about was the percentage, and I think my statement will stand.

Mr. Carter: The latest figures released by the Department of Labour, in conjunction with the dominion bureau of statistics, show a slight improvement in the unemployment situation. The report for the week ended August 19 indicates that unemployment declined by an estimated 31,000. This stands out in sharp contrast to the figures for the Atlantic region where unemployment increased by about 12,000. It seems, therefore, that despite all the encouragement we may get from the over-all picture as contained in this report to which I have just referred, it nevertheless appears that unemployment is still our most pressing domestic problem and is likely to continue so for some time to come.

I must confess that I was greatly impressed by the sharp contrast in viewpoint concerning unemployment between the hon. member for St. Mary and the Associate Minister of National Defence. The hon. member for St. Mary, who represents a workers' riding, still maintains, as we do, that unemployment is a very serious problem. No matter from what angle we may look at it, unemployment is a tragedy. It is a tragedy of human suffering. It is a tragedy of economic waste, of potential wealth, and a tragic waste of human skills and talents. This tragedy is heightened all the more when we see so many of the needs we have here in Canada and in the world which are still waiting to be filled.

Now, everybody seems to have some plan for solving this tremendous problem. The government called us together last November and announced a program for a massive assault on the unemployment problem. To facilitate that program, we of the opposition elected to forgo the time traditionally allocated to the speech from the throne. The minister, in the presentation of his estimates last March, referred to some of these measures and today the hon. member for Essex East put on the record a number of other proposals for our party. There are some who maintain that it is up to the government to solve this problem, that the government has the sole responsibility for finding jobs for people.

Personally, I cannot subscribe to this philosophy because it is not compatible with individual freedom. We have many lessons from history which indicate that when people are prepared to forgo or to sacrifice that responsibility and trade their freedom for security or for work, then the result has always been tyranny. I think it is reasonable to expect that if we adopt this kind of thinking, history is bound to repeat itself.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the house leader could indicate the order of business expected for the next two days and if he could give us any enlightenment about Saturday, as I think it might be helpful to all hon. members. I hope it will be lightened.

Mr. Churchill: The enlightenment about Saturday will depend on the enlightenment the house offers to me tomorrow about the progress of business. We will settle that tomorrow. Thursday, we will continue with the estimates of the Department of Labour, followed by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Then on Friday, in response to a number of requests, the following arrangement has been agreed upon: We will interrupt the study of the estimates on Friday to deal with the resolution concerning fitness and amateur sports on the understanding that Monday and Tuesday, which normally are for legislation, may be used for estimates if we so desire, on the same basis as last week, moving into supply without a debate or amendment. This has already been agreed through the normal channels, and if it is satisfactory Friday's business will commence with the resolution stage of the bill pertaining to fitness and amateur sport. If it is finished in good time on Friday we will revert to the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. That carries us into Thursday and Friday, and tomorrow we will make a decision with regard to Saturday. If things move very quickly the third department to be considered will be national revenue.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it that the other two departments mentioned by the Minister of National Health and Welfare last night will follow if there is an opportunity.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, privy council and legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Is the house agreed that on Monday next we will move into supply without a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Provided the government asks for it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): Provided the government asks for it?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chown): It is so ordered, for Monday and Tuesday next.

Mr. Churchill: That is, we will move into supply without debate or amendment on the motion to move into supply.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is clearly understood.

It being three minutes past six o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, September 21, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. REGNIER—PROTEST AGAINST PROCEDURE RESPECTING BILL NO. C-129

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wish to protest against the way in which certain matters have been handled in this house. I refer to Bill No. C-129, which was dealt with on Monday, the number of which is written in on my copy by pen.

I was able to secure a copy of this measure only after the bill was passed. I happened to be five minutes late at the sitting which commenced at 7.30 on Monday evening. At the resolution stage I was the only one who questioned the transfer of the school lands by the federal government to the province of Manitoba. Under the British North America Act of 1930 public lands were transferred to the province of Manitoba, but school lands were reserved. If we look at the Dominion Lands Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, chapter 113, we find that section 40 reads as follows—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. member is rising on a question of privilege relating to some proceeding of the house which took place on Monday. This is Thursday. I am not sure what the hon. member's complaint is. Certainly it is not clear yet that he is entitled to discuss substantive matters of debate on a question of privilege. If there was some proceeding that the hon. member felt was irregular of course he should have drawn attention to it at the time. If he was not here and could not do so I shall be glad to hear him now, but I think he should come to the point of what is his objection to the proceeding.

Mr. Regnier: Very well; I shall be glad to elucidate this point as well. It was only by reading La Presse of Montreal yesterday afternoon that I found that the bill had been passed. I had been looking at the order paper every day and checking. I have been attentive to my duties in the house. I was five minutes late on Monday, and during those five minutes the bill was read three times. Here is what La Presse said about the manner in which the bill went through:

(Translation):

In less than 10 minutes, the house had approved the preliminary resolution and read the bill three times. Usually, only the first reading is done the same day.

(Text):

Here is what the Free Press said.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but I am interested only in what the hon. member says, not in what the papers say about our proceedings. In fact it is irregular to read criticisms from the press of what members do in the house.

Mr. Regnier: Well, Mr. Speaker, my objection is first that the bill never appeared on the order paper.

Some hon. Members: Oh, yes.

Mr. Regnier: I challenge anyone to bring me an order paper which has any reference to the bill in it. The resolution appeared on the order paper; the bill did not. I have been checking it. Second, according to the chairman of the committee of the whole to whom I complained and who made a note of the time, the three readings were given in 3 minutes and 30 seconds.

An hon. Member: Co-operation.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Speaker, this was done on Monday evening. Usually it takes at least five minutes to get a quorum of 20 members together. I believe I was in the chamber within the five minutes, and it never dawned on me that this bill had been discussed and read three times. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I spoke to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance and asked him if the agreement had been tabled. He said, "Yes, but I think you can get a copy". I called for a copy and obtained one in French, but the parliamentary secretary never put me wise to the fact that the matter had been disposed of.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I thought the hon. gentleman knew.

Mr. Regnier: When I came into the house, Mr. Speaker, I saw an expression on the faces of certain hon. members which seemed to indicate that I might be carrying a bomb in my pocket. This is not only a criticism of the government but a criticism especially of the official opposition, whose duty it is to protect the rights of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: I have every sympathy with the hon. member, who apparently intended to take part in a debate which occurred while he was absent, but I have the record of the proceedings before me and while it is true that the house moved very fast in this case, it moved by unanimous consent and in the regular way according to our procedure. One can only hope that the hon. member will find another opportunity to expound the views which he was not able to express on that occasion.

Mr. Regnier: With deference, I should like to say that I had served notice on the chairman of the committee that I was interested in the agreement and was going to deal with it. I criticized the agreement without knowing what the agreement was, and I happened to be right. In addition—

Mr. Speaker: Order. In the absence of any irregularity in our proceedings, I think the hon. member will have to await another opportunity to express his views.

UNITED NATIONS

RED CHINA—CANADIAN ATTITUDE RESPECTING RECOGNITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the reply he made yesterday to the hon. member for Kootenay West when asked a question regarding the admission to the United Nations of the communist Chinese People's Republic. In view of the reply made by the Prime Minister, are we to assume that it is no longer government policy, as stated by the Prime Minister in the house on November 1, 1957, that there can be no recognition of communist China until the communist government of China expiates its wrongdoing under international law?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is somewhat mixed up; I put it in that way. I was referring to the question of admission to the United Nations or what action might be taken by the United Nations, which is quite a different matter, as he knows, from the question of recognition.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

STATEMENT AS TO WORLD SYSTEM OF SAMPLING RADIOACTIVITY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I might answer the question raised by the hon. member for Essex East yesterday as found at page 8590 of Hansard and which was in these words:

> Is either hon. gentleman in a position to say whether or not all nations in the United Nations are now co-operating in the world wide attempt to provide an adequate and accurate system of sampling radioactivity as a result of these explosions?

At the 14th session of the general assembly in 1959 an international program for the co-operative study of fall-out levels around the world was initiated as a result of Canadian leadership. Under that program countries which had the technical experience and the laboratory experience to carry out analyses of radioactive fall-out levels were asked to offer to countries not similarly equipped to undertake the analysis of samples collected in the territories of the latter in accordance with the program of work of UNSCEAR, the United Nations scientific committee on the effects of atomic radiation, of which Canada is an active member.

In addition to its active sponsorship of the resolution, Canada made an offer to carry out analyses of soil, food and bone samples collected in other countries. The governments of at least 14 other countries—I can name them if the hon. gentleman desires—as well as the international atomic energy agency and the world health organization have made similar offers. Accordingly, it is now possible for all countries in the world to obtain scientific data on the levels of radioactivity within their territories. Moreover, since 1959 there has been a marked increase in the number of member countries supplying UNSCEAR with data on radioactive levels.

Four countries, Burma, Malaya, Ghana and Pakistan, have so far indicated a desire to avail themselves of the Canadian offer, and the first samples collected in these countries are expected to be received in Canada shortly.

AIR TRANSPORT

C.P.A.—APPROVAL OF FLIGHT FROM WESTERN CANADA TO LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and ask him if the British government has yet given its approval to the new air route from western Canada to London announced by the minister on behalf of C.P.A., and whether the consultations to which the minister referred some time ago when I asked him a similar question have been concluded.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no, and the answer to the second part is that discussions are still continuing.

FLOODS

MANITOBA—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT ON RED RIVER CONTROL PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether the government has yet been able to reach agreement with the government of Manitoba on Red river flood control?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): We are proceeding very happily in our negotiations, and when there is anything to announce we shall make the announcement in the house.

TELEVISION

RIMOUSKI—APPLICATION FOR SATELLITE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I inquire of the parliamentary secretary, in the absence of the Minister of National Revenue, whether he is in a position to answer a question I asked on September 13 and again on the 14th, in connection with the erection of a satellite station to serve Madawaska and Victoria counties?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker. That recommendation, along with others, is being processed and an announcement will be made in due course.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

178. Departmental administration including a grant of $10,000 to Frontier College and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,373,104.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, when the house rose yesterday at six o'clock I had referred to the seriousness of the unemployment problem and had proceeded to deal with certain ideas that had been put forward to solve it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am having a little difficulty in hearing the hon. member because there is some undercurrent of conversation in the committee. I wonder if we could quieten down so the hon. member can receive a proper hearing.

Mr. Carter: I had pointed out that there are some who hold that the responsibility for providing jobs rests solely with the government, and with nobody else. I maintained that this concept of making people employees of the state was not compatible with the concept of individual freedom, and that history had proven on more than one occasion that such a course leads only to dictatorship and tyranny.

There are some who feel that productivity is the answer. If we are going to examine this question I think we must ask ourselves exactly what we mean by productivity. If we mean an increase in over-all production, there is then some validity in this proposal. However, I think we must realize that its effectiveness will in large measure depend upon having markets for the increased production. We must also remember that productivity is synonymous with efficiency. We think of it in terms of more output per man hour. While this might improve our trading position and also the unemployment situation indirectly by enabling us to compete with foreign countries, both in our domestic markets and abroad, yet from this standpoint productivity is not likely to create many new jobs.

There are others who say that the answer to unemployment lies in greater emphasis on manufacturing, and particularly in expansion in the manufacturing of our primary products. I am sure this proposal will find a great deal of sympathy not only in this committee but throughout Canada, as manufacturing is lagging too far behind other industries in Canada. But here again we must realize the limitations of this proposal. It overlooks the handicap that we in Canada are under because our population is far too small to enable us to have the benefits of mass production. Hence an expansion in manufacturing can take place only behind a huge wall of tariff protection. This proposal also disregards our trading position. We produce many primary products which we cannot consume at home and which we must sell abroad. In order to sell abroad we must buy from other countries. This proposal also disregards the necessity for expanding the development of those areas which are dependent upon resource industries.

Still others have put forward the idea that the answer to our unemployment problem is increased capital investment, and probably this affords the best answer. But here also we must take account of the fact that if Canadians have the necessary capital, they are unwilling or reluctant to risk it in the development of our country. If Canadians will not provide the extra capital we require, we must be prepared to accept foreign capital and even to encourage it.

The truth is that there is no single cause of unemployment; therefore there is no single cure. We must explore every avenue and exploit every opportunity to the fullest possible degree. While I said that government does not have all the responsibility for curing unemployment, that does not mean that government has not some responsibility. In fact government has a great deal of responsibility in this field, as many hon. members have pointed out. The chief responsibility of government to my mind is to create the kind of climate in which our free enterprise system can fulfil its normal functions. In order to do this the government has to provide proper incentives through sound fiscal and monetary policy. The government also has responsibility for providing wise and courageous leadership so as to inspire confidence at home and abroad; because while confidence may be something intangible it is nevertheless an important factor in helping to solve our unemployment problem.

The present government have already taken some measures to deal with our unemployment difficulties, and I wish to commend them most of all on their program of vocational training. I think we all realize that this is a long term program and that it cannot be expected to produce any immediate results. However, it is a necessary program, and no doubt it will bear fruit in due course. The government's retraining program will, perhaps, be less effective, because here we are dealing with people of an age where they are handicapped by mental attitudes which are not conducive to training of this kind. In many cases the men concerned are anchored to specific localities; everything they have is there, and they are unable to pull up their stakes and move elsewhere.

As far as the monetary policies of the government are concerned, the incentives so far have not proved effective in dealing with the problem in the underdeveloped areas of Canada. The figures for the Atlantic region referred to yesterday bear out this contention. Programs of public works are perhaps among the least effective measures which governments can undertake in order to alleviate unemployment. Only a few days ago I read an article in which it was pointed out that the Canso causeway cost around $23 million in public investment, yet provided jobs for only 150 to 200 persons. So much of our work today is done by mechanical means that this is the pattern we must expect. We shall not create the same ratio of jobs for public moneys out of public works projects as we might in other ways. This observation applies also to some extent to the winter works program. I very often feel that the winter works program looks better on paper than it really is.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: Did you say "hooray"?

Mr. Carter: It reduces the number of unemployed for a specific period and makes the unemployment picture look better, but I feel that very often this is done at the expense of using up jobs which would become available later in the year in the normal course of events, when the work could be done more effectively and at lower cost to the taxpayer.

I think we should realize also that not only the government but industry has its share of responsibility with respect to unemployment. It seems to me that Canadian industry is too concerned with protecting capital investment and maintaining profits to play an effective role in solving this problem. I feel that Canadian industry is too prone to take the line of least resistance, to pass responsibility on to the government or to run to the government for protection whenever the going gets a bit hard. Industry in Canada must realize that freedom is only one side of the coin; the other side is responsibility. If freedom is lost, the capital investment and the dividends will go along with it. I think that contention has been borne out by what we have seen happening in Cuba, which is practically in our back yard.

Not only government and industry but labour as well must bear a full share of responsibility for seeking to solve this problem. In particular, labour has the responsibility of giving the maximum return for the wage dollar and for putting forward, whenever possible, ideas concerning ways in which management can effect savings and increase efficiency. In addition, labour has the responsibility for not making demands without having regard to the effect of such demands on other sectors of the population and on the economy as a whole. Certainly, both labour and management must realize that the welfare of each is bound up with the welfare of the other. They must learn to co-operate, because our country cannot afford a conflict between capital and labour. They must work together not only to prosper but to survive.

I think we all realize that we cannot solve this problem by pointing the finger at each other or by trying to fix the blame on each other. We must recognize that unemployment presents us with a tremendous problem and that "the fault is not in our stars" but in ourselves. No matter what measures are taken by the government, by industry or by labour, they will not work unless a determined effort is put forward to make them work. The human factor is all important, and we must make a definite and determined effort to improve human relationships at all levels. Anyone who exploits difficulties in human relationships in order to cause friction is not only an enemy of Canada but an enemy of freedom.

Before I close I want to bring to the minister's attention once again a problem which I have already mentioned in this house on several occasions. If I remember correctly the minister promised that he would look into this, but my latest inquiries show that nothing has been done to date. I refer to the system by which government employees in the various maritime provinces are paid. I know that the minister's department maintains an office in St. John's where there is an employee who collects figures as to prevailing rates in different parts of the province. The rates paid by the government are based largely on the figures gathered by this employee on the advice he gets from the sources he consults.

I want to point out to the minister once again that the samples which this office collects are taken from too small an area. In fact I think we should not have differences of pay as between the maritime provinces, but that we should regard them as one single area and make the same rates of pay for government employees prevail throughout the whole Atlantic region. It seems to me preposterous that a person working on a ship, doing the same work as his colleagues and working in the same area, should receive less pay because, for example, he was recruited in Newfoundland. Yet men recruited in Newfoundland get one rate of pay, those recruited in Nova Scotia get another, and those recruited in Quebec get still another.

That situation prevails on the boats operated by the hydrographic survey branch, on the icebreakers operated by the Department of Transport, and on other ships. These ships are doing the same work, are interchangeable and move from one area to the other. I feel there is a great injustice—one could almost call it discrimination—resulting from the system of prevailing rates which the government uses in calculating the wages of these employees. I urge the minister to take action with respect to this problem. I suggest that the only equitable way of dealing with it is to establish a standard scale of wages to apply throughout the whole maritime area.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member takes his seat I think it right that I should point out for the record that the problem of the rates of pay for Newfoundland seamen on Canadian government ships is now receiving active study and consideration, at least in the Department of Transport, with a view to having the rates adjusted to put these men on a more equitable basis with their counterparts in the other maritime provinces.

Mr. Carter: I am glad to have that information from my hon. friend, but I wish to point out that in addition to the Department of Transport being involved the problem extends to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Department of Fisheries and even to the customs branch, which operates some ships. The problem is not confined only to people employed on the ships, but applies also to those who work in other fields. We should have a general policy for the maritime area with regard to government employees, under which we would give them equal pay for equal work.

Mr. Morris: Mr. Chairman, during the course of his remarks on an earlier occasion in the discussion of this item the hon. member for Skeena introduced questions arising out of the wages paid prevailing rates employees in H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax. It is well known that hon. members are occasionally required to be away from the chamber and that was my position when the hon. gentleman was speaking of these matters. I note that the hon. member who raised the subject has himself just been called from the chamber. It is ironic that while the hon. member was presenting the situation to the committee with something less than accuracy I was meeting with representatives of the Department of National Defence on the question. Because it is a matter that relates to the area represented in this chamber by the taller hon. member for Halifax and myself, I feel perhaps I should say a few words concerning it.

The question of the wages paid prevailing rates employees in H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax, I suggest is not one which should be exacerbated by inaccuracies on the part of people who are not acquainted with the area nor fully knowledgeable with respect to the matter and, indeed, whose motivation might appear to be more related to a partisan attitude than one of true interest in the welfare of the workmen involved. There were major inaccuracies in the statement offered to the committee by the hon. member for Skeena. I do not wish at any time to confine myself to a simple denial of inaccuracies emanating from an hon. gentleman who it perhaps would not be realistic to expect to be accurate.

I cannot refrain from commenting that it was a source of amazement to me that the hon. member for Skeena, British Columbia, should find it desirable to speak in this chamber about a problem that obtains at the other end of the country, when surely there are problems in the area from which he comes to which he might more usefully attend. However, this is happily a free country, and it is wholly within the prerogative of any hon. member to raise in this chamber a matter of consequence to any constituency in Canada.

I do not deny the seriousness of the situation in the dockyard, but I feel I owe it to my constituents to place on the record a more accurate version of the situation, and perhaps hon. members of the committee will consider it useful that I do so. I might say that these facts are all known to the Minister of Labour whose estimates are now before us. Only 72 hours have elapsed since I last spoke to him about this question. The minister is personally familiar with the inaccurate references in which the hon. member for Skeena indulged.

For instance, the hon. gentleman said there have been occasional walkouts at the dockyard in Halifax. If this were true, and I hasten to say it is not, it would be a matter of concern to all hon. members, because the dockyard there is now the abode of two thirds of the ships, officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy. At a time when hon. members of all parties have acknowledged the gravity of the international situation it would be a matter of consequence if workmen in this area were engaging in itinerant walkouts. There has been none at the dockyard.

I am not suggesting that the workmen at the dockyard should be denied or should deny themselves any rights to which they feel entitled, but when a misstatement of fact has been made it requires immediate correction. The men have not walked out. Occasional union meetings have been held, but the men have not walked off the job in the dockyard. I for one, and my colleague from Halifax for another, are doing everything in our power to bring about a situation in which the men there will find it not in their interest to take steps of the kind referred to.

Among other things, the hon. gentleman said yesterday that there used to be an arrangement for starred rate differentials for extra skills. That arrangement still exists. Dockyard employees in certain trades and skills receive a starred differential of 5 cents an hour over shipyard rates.

The hon. member suggested that the interdepartmental committee meets in secret. The committee occasionally meets in Ottawa and has done so with increasing frequency in the last few weeks. It has to meet here in an effort to settle the employees' demands. Men are available to come to Ottawa at any time. Last evening I was speaking by long distance telephone to one of the representatives of the employees. I have done this practically every day for the last ten days. They are available to come here and are anxious to co-operate in settling the matter. They were here three weeks ago and are eager to come again to any meeting which might be useful. The interdepartmental committee did not meet in secret when it met in Halifax. It met with representatives of the men and heard their wage demands.

What is the background of the current request of prevailing rates trades in H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax, for an increase in wages? It was in the apparent interest of dockyard prevailing rates employees in the past to be identified for pay purposes with comparable trades in the private shipbuilding and repair industry. Although we have great confidence that the recent shipbuilding construction assistance program announced by the Minister of Transport will bring about a useful change in this area, over recent years it has been possible for contracting companies and their representatives to negotiate wage agreements with their employees that have been more favourable than those that have been negotiated by shipyards workers' representatives. So that historically in the past dockyard employees found it apparently in their interest to be identified with shipyard wages.

Now they do not. When it was in their interest they wanted to be identified with shipyard rates. Now that it is not in their apparent interest they do not want to be identified with shipyard rates. We can all understand this; we can all understand they would want to move to a higher wage level with which they could compare their wages. There is no secret about the prevailing rates policy. Essentially it means that prevailing rates employees in H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax, are identified with comparable shipyards trades.

Well, as I have said, over a period of years in the past they found this in their interest. Now they do not; therefore they want to move away from it, but the government policy is to identify dockyard employees with shipyard rates. I point out that it does this not only in the Halifax dockyard but also in Esquimalt; therefore any change in this policy must be one that affects both Halifax and Esquimalt. It is understandable that the prevailing rates trades in H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax, would want to move away from what they consider to be lower comparable shipyards rates. What they are asking for is a fundamental change in government policy.

The hon. member who spoke yesterday, the itinerant British Columbian who came in here with his inaccuracies, asserted that simply because the government has not immediately accepted the whole demand of the prevailing rates employees it is procrastinating, nefarious, or doing something that is against the workers' interest. I venture the opinion that I am at least as well informed about the dockyard employees in the Halifax area as is the hon. member for Skeena. I had better be. I have met with them at times when they were drafting reports to government. I have talked to them on regular occasions in the dockyard, and I am in constant and daily communication with their representatives in the present circumstances.

The hon. member for Skeena did not find it possible yesterday to mention that the dockyard prevailing rate employees were just granted a 6 cents an hour increase, 3 cents of which was retroactive for a full 12 months. This 6 cents an hour increase did not satisfy the dockyard workers in Halifax. It did not satisfy them because it simply retained the adhesion of dockyard rates to shipyards rates. I understand that, but they have had a 6 cents increase as a way toward full justice. It is asserted that there is no apparent solution to the problem. The hon. gentleman said at page 8610 of Hansard:

> No action has been taken toward a solution, nor is there any indication that a solution will be arrived at.

After the meeting with the workmen in Halifax, the interdepartmental committee reported last April to treasury board, and treasury board decided against the application of dockyard employees in Halifax for increased wages. This was disappointing to the workmen; in many instances it was inflammatory to them. That is not unreasonable with respect to men who apply for wage increases when they do not get them immediately, and do not get all of them. This does not mean that a workman can reasonably go out and accuse the man who refuses it of being a blackguard or a procrastinator. What happened was that the men did not satisfy treasury board of the adequacy of their case. There was no secrecy about the treasury board ruling in this matter.

I invited the representatives of the seven prevailing rates locals in H.M.C. Dockyard to come to Ottawa. They said they were prepared to do that and are now prepared to do it with responsible and reasonable action. I invited them to come to Ottawa and I personally told them of the treasury board decision and the reasons for it, in a room in this very House of Commons. As one of their two members I would have been glad to give them happier information; we would all be glad to see our people get wages higher than they are now getting. No member of parliament is going to turn it down. But they wanted an answer, and they received one. It was not the one they wanted, but it was not procrastination. It was a judgment that they had not made their case, and they were given explicit reasons why treasury board had reached that decision.

The very next day, in my presence, those seven representatives of H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax, were given a personal assurance by the Associate Minister of National Defence that when they appealed that ruling he would see that their appeal was reconsidered. They went away from here unsatisfied with the result of the treasury board hearing. They were disappointed with the result, but they were assured that they had access to appeal procedure.

What is unfair about that? They went back to Halifax and drafted an appeal and sent it to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Then two of them, Mr. Hayter and Mr. Lyons, came here from the N.D.E.A. conference in Montreal. Again they had a meeting with the Associate Minister of National Defence, which I arranged for them at their request. They were told by the minister that in his judgment this appeal would require at least until September 30 for full consideration by treasury board. There was no procrastination; there was no delay, and no deception was practised. There was an honourable statement by an honourable minister that it would take some time to handle the appeal, because it was a request to upset a ruling and to change a fundamental labour policy.

Well, it is not September 30 yet. In their wisdom the men have issued a statement that this is not the time to threaten the government; that the government will not act faster if it is under an ultimatum. In any event, the deadline of at least September 30 has not arrived. I am not the spokesman for treasury board. Treasury board did advise me, as it would advise any member of the house if he sought the information, which apparently the hon. member who spoke yesterday did not bother to do. They had a meeting last Thursday and gave initial consideration as a body to this wage appeal. They are still considering the matter and searching for a formula, perhaps not one that will satisfy all the demands of the workmen but one that will at least go part way toward doing so.

The workmen at H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax, work in an area which is at the very heart of Canada's connection with the sea and with the men who sail the sea. Halifax was founded as a naval fortress. Its dockyard has been in existence for more than 200 years. When parts of this country were bald prairie, men worked on ships in the Halifax dockyard. These men, the descendants of Nova Scotia seamen and ship workers, in my opinion are not going to allow unreasonable, unreasoning or misguided representation of their case in this house by others to deter them from their advocacy of higher wages in a reasonable, just and fair way.

We have all sought higher wages. In my private life I have often sought higher wages which I thought I deserved but did not get. We have all done that. You do not always get everything you go after, but you do get fairness, you do get justice and certainly you do get a fair hearing. Here in a critical defence installation, and having in mind that in any ultimate war Canada's commitment within NATO will nowhere be more intensive than it will be at sea, two thirds of the ships of the Royal Canadian Navy are based. Here in this dockyard in the fortress city of Halifax may lie the last hope we have within the NATO infrastructure to preserve our commitment to NATO; and to leave the inference that the dockyard workers are about to fling down their tools and leave their jobs is something to which I cannot subscribe. I say that as one of their representatives, as one who has been in closer contact with them than the member who sought to be their self appointed champion yesterday.

I do not deny that it is the right of any member to speak about any public issue anywhere in Canada, but I have been told that the dockyard workers did not want that speech to be made. I have been told that their international representatives have been talking to representatives of the New Democratic party, C.C.F. party of whatever it is. As the representative of my people I am not here to lecture them on how they should do their business. I am not here to tell them things which will cause divisiveness between the locals in Halifax and their international representatives. But I do want to say this on my full responsibility as one of the members for Halifax. No international representative of the dockyard locals has been in touch with either of the Halifax members, but they have been in touch in an inaccurate way with the C.C.F. members.

I say that the issues involved in seeking to do justice to H.M.C. Dockyard employees and to keep the fleet in being and at sea at a more critical time than any in recent years are difficult and complex. These workmen in Halifax know that they live in a prime target area, that they will have to endure things which other Canadians may not be called upon to endure but would if they had to, and their duty and desire now is to keep the fleet in being and at sea.

I am not going to get away from cogency and relevancy so far as this item is concerned, but the other day we heard a spokesman for the Liberal party say that the ships of the Royal Canadian Navy are not capable of dealing with anything. That was an insult to the Royal Canadian Navy and the workmen who keep the ships at sea. I know something about the matter, because I have served with the Royal Canadian Navy. I know its competency. I am not going to stand here and say how many workmen are involved at H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax. If somebody wants to get the information they can try, but I regard the number as a security figure. The number has increased in the last four or five years, and other things have been done to help labour. Only this week a $753,000 contract for a new building at the dockyard was announced, one of many to provide more jobs for more workmen in order to keep our increasingly complex ships at sea.

We are faced with a grave situation requiring that our ships be kept at sea. At the same time the men must not be denied their rights and must be treated with justice so far as their wage demands are concerned. As one who meets daily with the Associate Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Labour and officials of the Department of National Defence, and who is in touch with the men's representatives in Halifax by telephone and by letter, I am aware of the willingness and the desire of their representatives to come here whenever they can be of help. I am also aware of the assurance that they are welcome to come here and talk to us. It was asserted yesterday that nobody in authority would talk to them. The commodore superintendent of H.M.C. Dockyard came here only ten days ago to meet an interdepartmental committee on behalf of the men.

Having in mind our NATO commitments and the necessity of keeping the ships at sea and in good condition on behalf of Canada and Canadians, everything fair, reasonable and just is being done to extend justice and fairness to the men in solving these complex problems. To have the suspicion cast yesterday that there was a playing of politics with regard to this matter harms, I suggest, every individual tradesman in the dockyard. While I said earlier and say again that it is no function of a member to lecture his constituents but only to serve them and keep in constant communication with them, and while they are at liberty to consult any member of the house they wish, I say that they did not consult the member who spoke yesterday. Somebody else did, and did so in an inaccurate way. I say to them in a quiet voice that if they seek other champions that is their right, but for goodness sake seek them among members who at least have some esteem and reputation in the house.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, the study of the labour department's estimates is extremely important, because they have to do with the major domestic problem of Canada, namely unemployment which affects not only the man or the woman concerned, but also and to the same extent, the children.

At the very outset of my remarks, I want to address a criticism to the government and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). Last winter, we had one of the worst unemployment problems since the years 1930-35. There are figures to support that fact.

If the government and the Minister of Labour had really applied themselves to seek at least a short term solution to this serious problem, they would have then put before the house this department's estimates which were of the utmost importance at that time.

It will be remembered that these estimates have already been considered on one particular day; this study is now being resumed. The reasons for this delay in considering the department's estimates are very obvious; the Conservative government is always reluctant to deal openly with this problem. It has always attempted to minimize its full significance, if not to prevent any discussion of the matter.

I can easily prove this statement. The standing committee on industrial relations held practically no sittings since 1958. It is actually the committee that has held fewer sittings that any other committee of the house, and again, the figures are there to prove it.

Whenever this committee sits, as it used to do before 1958, under the previous administration—I was one of its members, so I know what I am talking about—the Minister of Labour attends the sittings with his officers and it is possible to consider matters of concern to the great majority of Canadians.

Most interesting studies could have been carried out in 1958, 1959 and 1960 by this committee on industrial relations, such as the study of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in order to make the regulations more flexible and effective in case of serious unemployment, the consideration of means to replenish the unemployment insurance fund, the examination of short term measures to bring the speediest possible relief to the districts most heavily hit by unemployment.

It will be recalled that immediately after he took over the presidency of the United States, Mr. Kennedy ordered investigations to be carried out on the spot in order to remedy unemployment in the districts where it was most prevalent.

We could have taken more adequate steps regarding several aspects of unemployment. We could, for instance, have found out the approximate number of unemployed and compiled the trades and occupations most heavily hit. There is no doubt that it was the responsibility of the members of this House of Commons to do that but they were not allowed to discharge that responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, those are problems which the industrial relations committee had not only the power but the duty to examine. It did nothing of the sort, it did not even sit except once a year to determine its organization. We must then ask ourselves: Who is responsible for that? Who has constantly prevented the members of the house from coming to grips with this problem of employment and unemployment?

There is no use to ask that question to the government and to the minister himself, who is an ex officio member of the committee, both of whom must bear the responsibility not only of their negligence but also for this insult to the house.

It will be recalled that the Liberal opposition tried on several occasions since 1958—here in the house and in the industrial relations committee, which sat only a few times—to force the government to undertake a thorough study of the unemployment question but on each occasion the Conservative majority prevented any discussion of that problem.

When one speaks of unemployment today, one must consider the problem over a number of years, naturally since 1958; that is the government's responsibility.

I am sure that when the day of reckoning comes around, the government will have some explaining to do to the electors of this country concerning this inertia of the industrial relations committee where members were prevented from discussing unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, I mentioned a few minutes ago the figures provided monthly by the dominion bureau of statistics. These figures must be accepted, but they give a very incomplete picture of the actual situation. That leads me to a strange discovery. During the period from 1953 to 1957, while unemployment on a yearly basis never exceeded 2.8 per cent of the labour force, which means full employment, our friends of the Conservative party, including the Minister of Labour—I have reread several of his speeches —were rejecting the figures of the dominion bureau of statistics, claiming that they were not representative of the true situation. Moreover the present Minister of Labour himself was contending tooth and nail that the figures submitted by the national employment service were the only true and significant ones.

We, in the Liberal party, at least had the decency to issue each month both sets of figures, those of the national employment service and of the dominion bureau of statistics. Well, for a year now, thanks to the decision of the Minister of Labour, figures of the national employment service have not been released to the public. That service which, month after month, compiles the number of applications for benefits and applications for jobs is still submitting monthly figures to the minister, but we do not know what these figures are, because they are not included in the reports given us. Therefore we are now unable to obtain the figures compiled by the various offices of the service, unless a question is put on the orders of the day.

Mr. Chairman, the minister, in his preliminary remarks on the estimates of his department, and also the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) stated with great satisfaction that during August, 1961, according to figures of the dominion bureau of statistics, the unemployed totalled 323,000 while there were 352,000 in August, 1960, a decrease of 29,000. The Associate Minister of National Defence needed no more to declare that today we had full prosperity.

I should like to point out to the Associate Minister of National Defence that the figures for August, 1960, were the highest for that month since the 1930-35 depression and that the figures just released for August, 1961 are the second highest since the 1960 recession.

Yesterday, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) spoke of the seriousness of unemployment in this country and compared this situation to the one existing in several European countries. He mentioned some and I wish to add a few more. According to the international labour office, from 1957 to 1960 inclusive, the Federal Republic of Western Germany experienced an average unemployment level of 2.6 per cent, the Netherlands, 1.6 per cent, Norway, 1.9 per cent and Sweden, 2 per cent.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the situation is still quite serious and the figures will keep going up. I say, without preaching doom and gloom, that what happened in 1958 will happen again because this government has not taken steps to improve the situation. I might recall what took place since 1958 to show why I say that we shall see again this year what happened at that time.

It will be remembered that in 1958, the Minister of Labour and the government considered the matter lightly, since it was mentioned in the speech from the throne of that year that unemployment was a seasonal problem. At that time, the government did not see how serious that problem was and, of course, they could not take the necessary steps. In 1959, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) announced that the economy had surged forward and that we had emerged from the recession. Once again, he missed the boat and events proved him wrong.

In his budget speech of 1960, the Minister of Finance forecast an upswing, that is an increase of 6 per cent in the gross national product for a surplus of $12 million. Everyone knows how wrong he was and you will recall that in the same 1960 budget speech the Minister of Finance uttered these historic words:

> I am confident that employment will rise as the coming of spring opens up new job opportunities.

Those words are quite typical of the government's approach to the unemployment problem. The government's record as far as unemployment is concerned is here for all to see and flighty speeches like those of the Associate Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade) cannot change the situation. When the time comes for the people to pass judgment, sooner or later, we shall reveal this record in detail and we ask the Canadian voters to judge objectively this government which has refused to give serious consideration to those problems, with the result that for the last three years, thousands of our fellow countrymen to whom had been given the solemn pledge "No one will suffer", have endured undeserved hardship.

The Associate Minister of National Defence tried yesterday to excuse his government's disinterest in the matter of unemployment by claiming, quite wrongly, that the heritage we had left them in 1957 was the true cause of the present situation.

I should like to put once again on record the figures that have been there since March 2, 1960 at least, when the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) quoted them, in order to recall them to the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) and to those who would like to try, as lightly and erroneously, to put the blame on the previous government.

On March 2, 1960, the hon. member for Laurier, during the course of his remarks, quoted the following figures from the supplement to the Statistical Review of Canada, 1957. He had first given, for the years 1946 to 1949, the percentage of unemployed workers, based on a full year. So, here they are:

> In 1946, 2.9 per cent. In 1947, 2 per cent. In 1948, 2 per cent. In 1949, 2.6 per cent. In 1950, 3.2 per cent. In 1951, 2 per cent. In 1952, 2.4 per cent. In 1953, 2.5 per cent In 1954, 4.2 per cent. In 1955, 4.1 per cent. In 1956, 3.1 per cent. In 1957, 4.3 per cent. In 1958, 6.6 per cent; and in 1959, 5.6 per cent.

Those are facts that no one can deny. However, I will add another proof which appears to me even more convincing, because the Associate Minister of National Defence is not the only one, there is also the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion). The latter, in several speeches he has made within the last year, across the country, has attempted to have the people believe that the present situation was inherited from the previous government.

Well, there is one standard we can admit, and which makes it possible to compare the responsibility of the previous government with that of this government in regard to unemployment. When we left the administration in June 1957, the unemployment fund amounted to more than $900 million. In 1956, when I was a member of the industrial relations committee which had examined this matter, the fund amounted to $926 million, if my memory serves me right. The expert we questioned at the time had stated that, if the fund sank below $500 million, it would be in jeopardy. Now, when we left the administration, there were $926 million in the fund. If, all those years until 1957, unemployment had been as serious as it is today, there would not have been $926 million left in the fund; anyone in good faith will admit that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deschatelets: When this government came into power the unemployment insurance fund, as I said, contained $926 million. Well, three years later, in 1961, this amount has practically dwindled into nothing, in spite of the sums which were paid into the fund.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the unemployment insurance fund is the best yardstick to measure the responsibility of the former administration and that of this administration. No speech can change this yardstick, and I would even invite the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) to comment upon the matter.

Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of dealing with that subject. The question of responsibility with regard to the present situation is purely academic and of no interest to the jobless. What the Canadian citizen is interested in today, is to know whether those who have jobs are going to keep them and whether those who are out of work are going to find work.

I made that review only because, after the speeches of the Associate Minister of National Defence, someone had to put the record straight.

Since 1958 the Liberal party has made suggestions which were all ignored by this government. Only yesterday the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) put on the record suggestions which, in some form or other, had been made since 1958.

I remember that on March 2, 1960, the hon. member for Laurier (Hon. Mr. Chevrier) made 25 suggestions and recommendations in this house, but they were never seriously considered by the government. I therefore submit that the responsibility for the present unemployment situation can be easily established. In 1958, when the Prime Minister, for reasons well known to himself flourished the secret report on economic prospects, I submit he was flourishing then a boomerang which will come back and strike him at the next election.

When, in 1958, the Prime Minister discussed the secret report on economic prospects, he publicly acknowledged the forecast of the government economic experts who warned him of a threatening recession. The government, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour ignored those warnings, except when they made use of them to the end we all know.

Mr. Chairman, I come now to a matter discussed yesterday by the Associate Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade), the problem of unemployment in the province of Quebec. There is nothing new in the fact that the number of unemployed is proportionately higher in Quebec than in any other Canadian province. I am most surprised that the Associate Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for St. Mary have just found that out. As a matter of fact, it has always been so since 1944. Because of yesterday's speeches, I will now have to mention what I consider to be the causes of that situation in the province of Quebec.

Here are a few. Hon. members will recall that from 1944 until his death, Mr. Duplessis did not stop saying: "Unemployment is Ottawa's business. Quebec has no responsibility as far as unemployment is concerned." I dare the government members from Quebec to deny that well-known fact.

Mr. Duplessis was not at all interested in unemployment; it was no concern of his. He passed the buck to the federal government and never bothered giving excuses for having done nothing. He said: "I do not do a thing, this is not my business". And that situation lasted from 1944 until his death.

Another reason is Mr. Duplessis' refusal to participate in the joint plans and to accept his share of the amounts which rightly belonged to the citizens of the province of Quebec as to those of all the provinces. The specialists who examined that question of Quebec's refusal to accept her due share of those amounts estimated to about $100 million the unwarranted loss suffered by the people of Quebec.

A third reason is the neglect of the government of the province of Quebec in the field of education. And we know the courageous reforms of the present Liberal administration, embarked upon to make education accessible to all and to reduce by such steps the possibilities of unemployment, because in my opinion there is in Quebec a direct relationship between the current unemployment situation and the neglect we witnessed in the field of education.

A fourth reason is that Quebec had refused in the last few years to participate in the winter works program and everyone knows that when Mr. Lesage assumed the direction of the province of Quebec, he accepted to take part in this program because he deemed it necessary and in the interest of the citizens of Quebec.

As a matter of fact, he did more than accept to participate, because Quebec was the first province to grant a supplementary subsidy of 40 per cent towards the cost of labour over and above the 50 per cent paid by the federal government, and that example was fortunately followed by several other provinces.

Mr. Chairman, we know that on October 5 next Quebec will open a trade bureau in Paris, and then another one in London, in 1962, to promote the sale of its products and to enable industrialists to export, and this will create a much more favourable atmosphere for employment in Quebec.

We also know that a steel complex will soon be developed in the province of Quebec and if sometimes we easily forget all the steps taken by the Liberal government of the province of Quebec, I feel that the people of Quebec will never forget the courageous attitude of its premier when he said: "I recognize that the province has a responsibility as far as the unemployment problem is concerned". It is most obvious that there is a provincial and municipal responsibility as well as a federal responsibility, but when he did that, his stand was a courageous one.

Mr. Chairman, I have wanted to set forth those facts in order to reply to the rather childish remarks made by the Associate Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for St. Mary.

Since 1958, the situation has become unbearable for thousands of Canadians, and I repeat that the present federal government must take upon itself the responsibility for this serious situation which is due to its own carelessness in face of the unemployment problem, and which is also the direct result of its fiscal and monetary policy.

When you consider all these points, you no longer wonder that the Prime Minister has not dared to put into effect his threat of an election, for the record of this government, with regard to unemployment is a very doubtful one to bring forward before the Canadian people. Sooner or later, there will be an election. The Prime Minister cannot unduly set it back, even if he dreads it. Then we will objectively put forward to the Canadian people the failure of this government with regard to unemployment, and then we will explain with confidence our policy of full employment, which is well known.

Mr. Chairman, before concluding my remarks, I should like to quote a few words by His Excellency Cardinal Leger who stated as reported in Le Droit of September 18 1958:

> The right to work is a natural right. It corresponds to the duty to work in order to meet one's own needs. And Cardinal Leger recalled the statements made on December 24, 1952 by Pope Pius XII on this matter:
> "Human solidarity requires, not only in the name of brotherly love but even also for the mutual benefits derived thereof, the use of all possible means to preserve employment and to create new jobs".

This, Mr. Chairman, is our approach to the problem, and I might add that we are the only political party with a record in this regard.

(Text):

And now if my hon. friend has a question I shall be pleased to accept it.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I wish to put a question to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. Following the plea he has just made for the Liberal government in the province of Quebec, would the hon. member tell me if the Hon. Rene Hamel has approved the Liberal policy advocated during the provincial election campaign in 1960 as to unemployment, when Mr. Lesage admitted the existence of a provincial responsibility?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the question put by the hon. member.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member if the Hon. Rene Hamel, a colleague of Mr. Lesage's in the legislative assembly, shares the views of Mr. Lesage on the responsibility of the provincial government as far as unemployment is concerned.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I regret that I cannot give an answer to this question.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, since the house is in committee, I take this opportunity to draw to the attention of the hon. member who just resumed his seat that, on Saturday, July 9, 1960, during a televised program from Montreal, the following question was put to Hon. Rene Hamel, minister of labour in the Quebec Liberal cabinet:

What do you intend to do about unemployment, Mr. Hamel?

Here is what Mr. Hamel answered:

Unemployment is not our problem; that concerns the federal government.

That statement was made by Mr. Hamel on the television network.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of that statement, but I know very well that the Quebec premier took a courageous stand.

Mr. English: Which one?

Mr. Deschatelets: After Mr. Duplessis had stated that unemployment was no concern of his, he was the first one to say: "I recognize that the Quebec government has a responsibility concerning unemployment". At that time, Mr. Lesage was speaking not only as a great Liberal leader, but as a Canadian who considers that the unemployment problem should be a matter of interest to all those whose responsibility it is to see that all Canadians find work in order to provide for their families.

(Text):

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, on April 26, 1957 in a major address the Conservative leader promised full employment and high living standards as a primary goal toward which the Conservative government would work. A similar statement has been made by the Prime Minister in different addresses at various times, but the key phrase has changed in the interval that has elapsed. We are familiar with the expression that no Canadian would suffer as a result of unemployment, and with the further extension which crept in at a later date when the right hon. gentleman said that no Canadian would suffer as a result of unemployment "so long as public works and that type of thing will provide them the immediate assistance they require".

We know that on June 22, 1957, the day after this administration took office, there were 162,000 persons without jobs and seeking work, and we have learned that as of August, 1961 the number was 323,000. The Daily News of March 10, 1960, with respect to the unemployment debate held at that time had this to say:

About all that came out of the debate was the admission of the labour minister, Mr. Starr, that while opposition proposals might have long range possibilities, they could not provide more jobs right away.

More than a year has elapsed since that date. The Leader of the Opposition in speaking on this subject has pointed out the urgent importance of the crash program. In examining what has been said and done on the part of the government up to this point it would appear that the only crash program envisaged by the government in the foreseeable future is some proposal that is to come up relating to shelters, and training soldiers without adequate weapons and equipment.

I put it to this committee that there was a time when the Department of Labour was a dynamic, creative department. We remember that it was set up in the first instance by a student of economics and social studies who believed that there was something creative, something seminal, in this department which would spread out its good works into almost every other phase of government.

It seems inconceivable that the Department of Labour can continue in any really effective way without the closest co-operation with the Department of Finance, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Public Works and, in days as critical as these, surely with the Department of National Defence. We on this side wonder at times whether there is that close interchange of ideas among experts in the various departments of government, and perhaps particularly between the departments of finance and labour. We know that each department employs some extremely able people. Are these talking back and forth? Are they exchanging ideas and co-operating in working out ways and means of lifting the economy of this country from the slump it has sustained? Is there close intimate co-operation among the Department of Labour and the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Public Works?

A few days ago we listened while at considerable length the Minister of Public Works outlined the program of his department. We could not fail to compare his program with some of the major projects that have emanated from that department as recently as a few years ago. I recall that when this administration took office it hastened to accept full credit for the work done at Ripple Rock. From everything we have been able to discover the project was well under way at the time the Conservatives took over, and indeed had reached the final stage.

This administration was very happy to enter into all the ceremonies and take all the honours that went with the opening of the seaway, but has it been responsible for one measure of any importance which will serve the purpose that the hon. member for Essex East referred to, namely a crash program, something to lift the economy? My own constituency is considered to be very wealthy, comparatively speaking; from an insurance standpoint it is one of the best places in the dominion in which to do business. In the neighbourhood in which we live we have people of fine technical training who have been unable to find work in the past two years. Men with children are going through very real hardship. I know of two families that have left for New Zealand. In both instances the husbands were veterans. One of them had served in the army and the other in the navy. They had acquired skills and had come to the point where they did not have much in the way of a future in my home town.

We read a few days ago about Canada day being celebrated in California. At this celebration there were something in excess of 2,500 former employees of the Avro plant in Toronto. We wonder about these things. We wonder why it is that 500 Canadians are needed so urgently by Loblaws in London. We wonder why it is that Canadians are so eager and anxious to rush off to England. We are now suffering from a major emigration problem. We look at our universities and see the work that is being done there training people in the professions and in the highly developed fields of graduate work in science, and so on. Many of these people who are actually getting this training will have a bright future in the United States or indeed in Europe. We wonder why this is.

A number of things have been suggested but I am wondering whether this department has really gone to sleep and become crystallized. Has it simply become functional only? Has the Minister of Finance been talking to the Minister of Labour as little as he obviously did to the former governor of the Bank of Canada? Is there any real integration between the Department of Labour and the Department of Public Works? Are conversations going on between the Minister of Labour and the Minister of National Defence, who now talks in terms of expanding our army in some rather substantial way? Thank goodness; otherwise those people would be in the position of receiving unemployment insurance benefits along with the discouragement that go with them.

Has the Minister of Labour in any real way said to the Minister of National Defence, "Look here, you have an opportunity to train young Canadians in uniform". Is this training harmonized in any way with their future opportunities in civil life? We know that even during the terrible days of world war II it was a constant consideration of the government that the men who were in uniform should be doing work which eventually would serve some useful purpose, if such were possible. We had the nucleus of a merchant service. I am speaking now in terms of the navy. We had the possibilities of expansion in our air industry.

All these things seem to have gone by the board. When we look at the statistics before us I question seriously whether this type of broad, generous, harmonized program is taking place at all. Are our departments simply functioning because there is no impetus, steam, drive or imagination left in them at all?

One of the things that encouraged me most in recent months as a Canadian was the suggestion that in this country we were going to do something to upgrade our skills and technical resources. Is it preposterous to think that portable pensions would improve the opportunities of a person with technical and scientific skill so that he could move from one place to another and continually improve himself? He could move from the shop to the school, to the university and back again. Therefore a man with perhaps no high school training but with a high degree of technical training might end up in a very high income bracket. If this were done it would be an encouragement to many people. We recall that many of the most creative people have been without university training and without even any advanced mathematical training at all. Is it possible that Canada could move into this league, where a person who has imagination and creative abilities and is willing to work would have unlimited possibilities? In the Windsor Star of November 8, 1960 there is a story under the heading:

> Jobless to receive training.
> All provinces taking part in program.

It reads in part as follows:

> Hon. Michael Starr told the meeting "a number" of provinces have indicated they are doubling the programs and that one province plans to increase its training by 400 per cent.

We shall be listening with very keen interest to a report of the progress that has been made within one month after the announcement. This is rather important. An article appeared in Saturday Night of March 4, 1961 in a different vein. I wonder what are the true facts when after all this talk of upgrading skills and after all this urgent consideration we find that Canada is lagging seriously behind other countries in so far as technical training is concerned. This article was written by Frank Drea, and is headed, "Nibbling At the Edge of Unemployment". I should like to read three short paragraphs, as follows:

> However, the retraining program is already too little and may be too late to save the nation from being dragged down to a second rate industrial power by the weight of its misery class—the jobless whose lack of skills threaten to keep them on the dole for the rest of their lives.
> Ontario, with at least 127,000 persons out of work last November, was then busy retraining nine workers—six of them in commercial courses and three of them as welders.
> From April to November of last year, Ontario retrained either 43 or 65 workers, depending on which set of figures is used. Whether the nine in November were being retrained under the controversial schedule M of the vocational training act is a controversy in itself.
> In Toronto, where unemployment insurance benefits alone amount to more than $1 million a week and more than 60,000 are jobless, there is not one place where the idle may seek retraining—unless they use most of their meagre jobless benefits to pay for such training.

I am a person from a small town and I know this is true in the smaller cities and towns of the province.

Will you call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, the shocking figure of 323,000 unemployed during the month of August is not attributable solely, of course, to failure on the part of the Department of Labour, and I hope my remarks did not suggest that. What I have been attempting to suggest is that there is always a need in this country for a flexible policy with relation to economics which involves the closest and most intimate harmony among finance, trade and commerce, public works, defence production and no doubt defence as well as labour.

Before the recess I was speaking about the matter of technical education, to which a great deal of attention has been given in every country in the world. We are aware of the interest of the department by reason of commonwealth technical training week, which took place from May 29 to June 4, 1961. The material that has been prepared with respect to this subject poses the problem but seems to supply none of the answers. I will be interested to learn during the course of discussion of these estimates what answers have been discovered, because there are many people in Canada who know something about this problem. I refer the minister to the excellent compilation of articles by Mr. J. Bascom St. John, which appeared in the Globe and Mail beginning on May 7, 1958. They have been published under the heading "Technical Education". I should like to read the foreword to that publication. The editor says:

> In almost all western countries, the startling technological achievements of Soviet Russia have inspired a renewed interest in the quality and types of education available to our young people, especially in the technical field. Some controversy exists as to whether technical education in Ontario is fulfilling the expectations held forth when a need for it was first recognized about 60 years ago.

The concluding article in the series refers to the fact that this is a matter that has been given close attention in almost all modern European countries and in Great Britain following the Russian example. Under the chapter headed "Ontario Program Needs Reform" there is the following:

> That something ought to be done is evident from the cost of technical education.

Many other excellent studies have been developed on this subject, and in this regard Britain leads the way. I have here a publication issued by the federation of British industries entitled "Further Education for Those in Industry and Commerce", which deals with this problem in some detail. We are familiar with the book "Technical Education and Social Change", published in Britain, and I quote the following from page 205:

> Yet this study indicates the need for a radical rethinking of the system of further education in its relations to the social structure if the demands for trained manpower are to be met... Rapid change will require political action...

We know there has been rapid change. Has there been any real political action? In the booklet—

Mr. Grafftey: What booklet are you holding? What do you call it?

Mr. Matheson: I am holding a booklet—I am answering the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi—which is entitled "The Record Speaks".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Matheson: This is a booklet which has a portrait of the Prime Minister on the front page over the name "Canada". Under the chapter headed "Labour" there is a paragraph which reads:

> Canada is living in the midst of an automation revolution. While it will be beneficial in the long run, nevertheless this revolution has caused part of the Canadian labour force to be unemployed.

We are well aware of this fact. I should like to touch on the record, and the way the record speaks, in so far as this administration is concerned. As I develop my thoughts with respect to the productivity council may I say this. Although we do not have the technical facilities that they have in Germany or western Europe, in Japan or in the United States, in Russia or in Great Britain, nevertheless we do have something with which to start namely people who care a great deal about this problem. In the town in which I live we have a man named Ardell Wilson who has done a great deal for technical training. If he received some encouragement at the official level this man could do a great deal for the young men who have been walking our streets wishing that the plants would take on more employees. The people who are out of work have been longing for some kind of training in the interim period, and it has not been forthcoming.

In a part of Smiths Falls just north of my riding there is a technical school, called the trades college of Canada. We can be proud of this institution which is operated by Commander Clarence W. Warner. In talking to Mr. Warner about the courses this college offers I discovered it offered courses in television electronics, industrial electronics, refrigeration and air conditioning and automotive mechanics. Smiths Falls is a small place, and if it is possible to operate such a college there it is possible to do so elsewhere.

Commander Warner was in charge of operations of our radar school during world war II, one of the important electronic installations on the allied side. The commander is presenting a course of study which is available to men between the ages of 16 and 65. He is serving people who reside in Smiths Falls, and serving those outside of Smiths Falls by mail. You may be interested to learn, Mr. Chairman, that we have navy personnel in the Queen Charlotte islands, in Fort Churchill and elsewhere in Canada who are taking technical training at considerable expense to themselves, running between $400 and $500, in order that they will be better equipped to enter the employment field in Canada. Surely this sort of thing could be done under more spirited leadership than that which has been shown in the past few months.

Another matter I think I should mention is that we must be prepared to courageously, fearlessly, and in a non-political way review the Unemployment Insurance Act. There was an address delivered on this subject by the member for Kingston prior to the summer adjournment and I am sure the contents of that speech are worthy of examination. There are many things that could be done here. We might separate one type of employee from another, always keeping in mind the proposition that people are our most important asset. There is nothing in Canada, capital, ores, lands, transportation, that is as important as the people we have here. This is our real source of wealth.

During the question period on September 20 last I ventured to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, as reported at page 8594 of Hansard for that date. I asked how many times the productivity council had met since its appointment on February 28, 1961, and had the government received any recommendations from the council. I was interrupted during the course of this question period and no answer was given. A number of members shouted, so there was no answer.

I hope there will be an answer to this rather important question, that is whether the productivity council, which was set up so long ago, has had any meetings that have been productive. If so, what has the result been in so far as this government is concerned? It would seem to me that although this council comes under the purview of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, it is of vital significance to any consideration of the labour department estimates. Let the minister at this time tell us in a fairly expansive fashion what the situation is in this regard. I hope this question will not be cut off.

Canadians were reading for many months addresses given by the governor of the Bank of Canada to various audiences he was invited to address. Questions were directed to the Minister of Finance in respect of the policy of the government in relation to the governor, and finally we had the fiasco that took place in the early part of this summer. I ask now if the minister would be kind enough to address himself to this question of the extent to which this ministry is in sympathy with the various addresses that have been given by representatives of this productivity council. There is an article in the Hamilton Spectator of June 7, 1961 in which Mr. H. George De Young is quoted as follows:

> Most of our people have no conception of the seriousness of Canada's position.
> Until we get a change in attitude we will continue to have those who wish to change the productivity council to gain factional goals.

He went on to say that Canada's gross national product per person has decreased since 1956 while that of most competing countries has gone ahead. Taking 1950 as 100 Mr. De Young gave the following estimated figures for 1960, with those for 1956 in brackets. Canada 111 (116); the United Kingdom 124 (115); France 142 (125); Germany 185 (152); Italy 175 (135); the Netherlands 140 (127); Sweden 128 (115); Japan 190 (147). I say, Mr. Chairman, that this is an extremely serious matter and should be of concern to every member in this committee.

The same speaker, Mr. H. George De Young, gave an address on May 29, 1961 in which he said:

> —Canadians will have to accept change if they are to help Canada move into the organized big league of world trade.

The other day I read into the record of Hansard a reference in the London Times to the arguments that have been advanced by our Minister of Finance and Minister of Trade and Commerce, in which those arguments were referred to as "negative" and "sterile". I would be curious to know what policy, if any, this Department of Labour has with respect to growth, with respect to economic policy. Has this government any economic policy at all?

Mr. Grafftey: If you have eyes to see and ears to hear, yes.

Mr. Matheson: I am sorry; I missed the interruption by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

An hon. Member: You did not miss anything.

Mr. Deschatelets: He is just talking to himself.

Mr. Matheson: The editor of the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph, which is a fairly wise newspaper that has been sensitive to trade and industry in general, and whose editor knows a great deal about commercial conditions both in Great Britain and northwest Europe, had this to say:

> Canada's industrial might cannot remain prosperous if the market is restricted to 18 million people residing within our borders.

Is it the policy of this minister, as it appears to be the policy of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance, to be satisfied with things the way they are? We are not satisfied, Mr. Chairman, with the way things are at all. We enthusiastically support any steps this government may take with respect to putting young men in uniform and teaching them to dig shelters, and all that sort of thing, but conditions in the world are such that we feel this government is overlooking the real problem we have here. I refer to the problem of how this country is going to grow and assume its proper place in the wealth of nations.

Mr. Starr: I made a full and comprehensive statement on the function of the Department of Labour when the estimates of this department were up for consideration by the committee of supply of this House of Commons some time in March, when discussions on the estimates of this department were carried on for a full two days. On rising today it is not my intention to be belligerent in any way or to be critical of the remarks that have been made so far in this debate, but rather to put on the record certain pertinent facts with respect to the unemployment situation in Canada.

Controversy has arisen as to when the present unemployment situation actually started. I am not going to enter into the argument about that aspect of the matter, but I should like to read from the report of the special committee of the Senate on manpower and employment, at page 21. There we find the following statement:

> With the wisdom of hindsight one can see in the statistical record evidence of weakness emerging gradually over a period of many years.

Here they were discussing the unemployment situation. I will deal with unemployment and indicate some of the measures that have been taken by the government to correct the situation.

An hon. Member: Deal with them all.

Mr. Starr: I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that unemployment has taken a dramatic downturn in recent months. My opinion that the figures were considerably improved was confirmed when hon. members opposite failed to ask me any questions when the dominion bureau of statistics release was made the other day. This situation is quite understandable, but how different the attitude is when the figures show an increase in unemployment in this country. As a matter of fact, a decrease of 31,000 between the month of July and the month of August is not only greater than seasonal but is a record for all the years in which figures have been collected, and they have been collected since 1944. It is a record since 1944.

The hon. member for Essex East, in speaking on the estimates yesterday, said that in the report of the special committee of the Senate on manpower and employment it is stated that we must provide one million jobs in the next four or five years. I wish to bring to the attention of this committee the fact that this government is in the process of doing just that. Since 1957 during the term of office of this government more than half a million new jobs have been created in Canada.

In August unemployment represented 4.8 per cent of the labour force. This figure compares with 5.8 per cent at this time last year. The hon. member for Essex East also stated in his remarks the following, and I refer the committee to Hansard of yesterday, September 20, as recorded at page 8602:

> It is suggested that 3 per cent of our labour force is the maximum rate of unemployment that we can permit.

I am not going to argue about that matter. I believe that full employment is the objective of all of us, or as close to full employment as we possibly can get. For those of us who have the responsibility of government it is always a matter of concern to see to it that people who are seeking work are provided with the opportunity of finding work. In connection with the statement of the hon. member for Essex East I should like to refer him to the report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, which was written by Mr. Walter Gordon, who is well known to members of the party of the hon. member for Essex East. At page 421 we find the following statement:

> Many people will think that we shall continue to be threatened with serious inflation if, on the average, only 3 per cent of the total working force are frictionally unemployed; especially so as this average figure includes "seasonal unemployment", which because of our climate is bound to be higher in Canada than in some other countries. It is possible that such fears may be justified. Professor Neil H. Jacoby, a former member of President Eisenhower's council of economic advisers, has stated that "the consensus of American economists is that the United States economy has full employment in a practical sense when 96 per cent of the working force has jobs and about 4 per cent are in process of changing jobs.

Then this statement in brackets:

> (Many believe that the ratios are closer to 95 per cent and 5 per cent.)"

At mid August here in Canada 95.2 per cent of the Canadian labour force of 6,704,000 were gainfully employed. The hon. member for Essex East compared percentages of unemployment in various countries in the world. I should like to read again from the report of the special committee of the Senate on manpower and employment as set out on page 15, where they deal with this subject of the comparison of unemployment statistics that are recorded in other parts of the world. I read from this report at page 15:

> We have attempted no international comparisons of unemployment levels for, as Dr. Ostry has remarked, "In different countries unemployment series vary greatly not only in the definition adopted, but in economic scope or coverage, source of data and methods of compilation." That different concepts and methods produce different results is abundantly clear from the material provided in Dr. Ostry's report.

This is what they say about the comparison that could or should not be made with countries other than Canada, particularly those in Europe. The hon. member for Essex East endeavoured to point out that the situation in Canada was far more serious as far as unemployment is concerned. It is difficult to say whether he is right or wrong in view of what has been reported by those who have made a study of this situation.

He also asserted that the percentage of unemployed in Canada is the highest in the western world. The method of compilation of the labour force and the unemployed in the labour force in the United States is quite similar to the one we employ here in Canada. Compared with the United States, where the percentage of unemployed between July and August of this year was 6.2 of the labour force, Canada had 4.8 per cent of her labour force unemployed. Let us compare the figures further to see whether the hon. gentleman was right in making the statement he did. The percentage of unemployed in Canada in June of this year, for example, was 5.6 per cent. In the United States it was 7.5 per cent. In July the Canadian percentage was 5.2 and in the United States it was 7 per cent.

This indicates, I submit, that the hon. member for Essex East was in fact giving an incorrect impression. Let us now compare similar areas in the United States and in Canada. In August the percentage of unemployed in Ontario was 3.9 per cent. In Michigan, a state bordering Ontario and an industrial state like Ontario, the percentage of unemployed was 11.4 per cent. In June of this year, the latest month for which figures have been issued by the state labour departments, the percentage of unemployed in Pennsylvania was 9.9 per cent and in the state of New York it was 6.6 per cent. In Ontario in the same month it amounted to 4.5 per cent.

I have taken those two states because they are close to Ontario and are industrial in the same way that Ontario is. In June of this year the percentage of unemployment in the prairie regions of Canada was 2.6 per cent. In Minnesota, a state bordering on the prairie provinces of Canada, it was 5.8 per cent and in North Dakota it was 3.7 per cent. To take a further example, in the month of July the percentage in Ontario was 4.6 while in Ohio, a similar industrial state, it was 6.9 per cent.

I think these figures refute emphatically the statement made yesterday by the hon. member for Essex East. Unemployment in the United States is 754,000 higher than it was last year in the month of August. Here in Canada it is 29,000 lower than last year. At the same time employment in our country has risen while unemployment in the United States has risen. Employment in Canada in August represents an increase of 1.8 per cent over the figure for the same month last year. Especially encouraging is the fact in the manufacturing sector, an area to which the government has devoted special attention, the number of jobs available shows an increase of 2.6 per cent compared with last year. We are looking forward to a still greater increase in the number of new jobs created in manufacturing as a result of the upturn in the economy and the measures which have been brought forward during the past months by this government.

It has been said that we have no program to deal with this situation, that no action has been taken by the present government to deal with this serious problem. The official opposition have told us what they would do if they had once again the opportunity to sit on the treasury benches. I do not intend to enter into controversy, or to take up point by point the program which has been placed before this committee and relate it to the action which has been taken by this government. However, I feel that in the circumstances I should outline in detail some of the measures which have been taken by this government to cope with this situation. I wish to deal at this time especially with what has been done in connection with housing and related matters.

Hon. members will recall that in 1957 the amount of money which could be advanced to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation out of the consolidated revenue fund was raised from $250 million to $400 million. Higher loans for home owners were approved, and income qualifications placed upon intending home owners were relaxed in a program to provide more employment and to meet the need for housing. Direct loans from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation were extended to all centres of population and to builders and rental investors in addition to home owners. Some 24,900 dwellings were financed through corporation loans amounting to $233 million. The number of housing units started during the year was 122,340 and completions numbered 117,283.

Then in May, 1958 the National Housing Act was amended increasing to $750 million the amount which could be advanced out of the consolidated revenue fund for direct lending and related activities. With this increase in funds, the corporation's residual lending was again available to home owners in centres of more than 55,000 population, and to builders in all areas. As a result of such loans some 36,400 dwellings were financed through the commitment of public funds amounting to more than $372 million. The number of housing starts in 1958 was 164,632, and completions numbered 146,686.

Then in March, 1959 the National Housing Act was again amended to raise to $1 billion the amount which could be provided out of the consolidated revenue fund for lending purposes. In 1959 the corporation financed more than 32,200 dwellings, and commitments of public funds amounted to $343 million. Corporation commitments for this year exceeded National Housing Act loan commitments to approved lenders for the first time. In 1959 the number of housing starts was 141,345 and completions numbered 145,671.

Then in March, 1960 parliament raised the amount available to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for direct lending purposes to $1.5 billion. In 1960 there were 108,858 housing starts and 123,757 completions.

I give these figures to the committee to indicate what is being done to provide employment in this country. Every time a house is under construction some five people are engaged, either directly or indirectly, and each house under construction also provides employment in such industries as the electrical and building supplies industries. The purpose of the government's program has been to provide jobs and alleviate the unemployment situation.

I bring to the attention of the committee the home improvement loan financing scheme, which has done a great deal in providing work particularly in the winter months. For example, during the first half of this year the banks approved 11,747 loans amounting to $17.4 million. The federal government has also provided grants to assist cities to undertake urban renewal programs. Since 1957 grants totalling $14 million have been approved for this purpose. Redevelopment projects are under way or completed in several cities across Canada. Public housing projects have been undertaken. A total of 3,063 dwellings have been approved by the government under federal-provincial arrangements, and some $82.8 million worth of construction has taken place in building these dwellings and in servicing lots in land assembly projects.

In December, 1960 Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was authorized to make loans to universities for the construction of resident student accommodation, and loans amounting to approximately $17 million have been approved for 16 projects under this plan. A total of 30 applications has been received and an additional 23 preliminary inquiries have been made as at September 14, 1961.

To help combat soil and water pollution this government made available in December, 1960 the sum of $100 million for loans to municipalities for sewage treatment projects and trunk collector sewers, and agreed to write off 25 per cent of the loans covering work put into place before March 31, 1963. By September 5, loans amounting to $35.4 million had been approved for a total of 106 projects. I remind the committee that on September 7 last the Minister of Public Works introduced a resolution, now approved by the house, to amend the National Housing Act of 1954 in order to increase the amount of money available for all the undertakings I have mentioned.

In the field of industrial development, in order to encourage industries to locate in certain areas in Canada where unemployment has been chronic over the years we are allowing double depreciation for income tax purposes for such industries. The hon. member for Essex East made mention of this program, and minimized it. As hon. members of this committee are probably aware, it is the responsibility of the Department of Labour to receive applications from municipal authorities, to review the record of employment and unemployment in those localities, and to make recommendations to the government with respect to the designation of surplus manpower areas.

Applications for accelerated depreciation certificates from individual firms are dealt with by the Department of Trade and Commerce. This program is in two parts. If an industry wishes to produce a new product that has not as yet been produced in Canada it can locate in any area in Canada and be eligible for this double depreciation allowance. If an area makes application to be designated as a surplus manpower area and following the survey is so designated and qualifies under the formula, an industry locating in that area or municipality also qualifies for the allowance. Since publication in March of the regulations relating to the plan, applications have been received by the Department of Trade and Commerce covering a wide variety of products including chemicals, steel, textiles, electronics, plastics, food and other products. The value of the assets covered by these applications is approximately $85 million. It would appear that a representative cross section of Canadian secondary industry is taking advantage of the program, with some firms establishing new plants while others are enlarging their present facilities in order to manufacture new products and thus diversify their output.

The municipal authorities have shown a great deal of interest in this plan. They have become aware of the advantages attendant upon attracting new industries. By mid September of this year 49 applications had been received from various municipal and county authorities requesting designation under the program. The government as at this stage has designated for the purposes of the program eight local areas administered by the national employment service. These areas included in their boundaries 16 of the municipalities and counties that applied for designation. In addition, 11 specific localities have been designated. The Department of Labour after investigation found that 17 of the areas that applied for designation could not qualify under the program at the present time. Investigation is presently continuing with respect to a further five applications.

I think it will be of interest to note that of the applications for accelerated depreciation that have been received by the Department of Trade and Commerce from individual firms, applications covering assets valued at $42 million were from firms intending to locate in surplus manpower areas. I submit that this program is working effectively and has brought about results. We have also provided an easement in the corporation tax for smaller firms. Canadian manufacturing will be further assisted through anti-dumping legislation in relation to "class or kind" goods made in Canada.

A national productivity council has been established by this government, and has been held up for ridicule by some people. The council has already met three times. I anticipate that the council will assist in the establishment of new industry, the development of a larger skilled labour force and the coordination of activities to increase productivity. I feel it will serve as a clearing house for information and ideas reaching down through the regional committees and committees which already exist in the industry.

Yesterday on the orders of the day the hon. member for Leeds asked a question in respect to this matter. Upon checking Hansard I find that in the first part of his question the hon. gentleman inquired how many times the productivity council has met since its appointment and whether it reported to the government. The productivity council will implement its own program. However, it may advise on the implementation of programs relating to productivity. At the next meeting, which is going to be held in Ottawa on Monday and Tuesday, September 25 and 26, I understand they will be considering labour-management co-operation services.

I must point out, Mr. Chairman, that the government has no control over the activities of the productivity council. We have established this council, and its membership consists of some outstanding Canadians representing every segment of our economy. They are on their own, and we expect they will be bringing a great deal of benefit to industry and the economy as a whole in the months and the years to come.

One of the most significant programs administered in my department has been the municipal winter works incentive program, a program that the hon. member for Essex East refers to as a bagatelle.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Anaemic, I said.

Mr. Starr: The municipal winter works program has proved an effective method of stimulating employment at the local level during the time when seasonal unemployment is at its peak.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under ordinary circumstances the committee would want the minister to go on; especially is this so because of his generous treatment of the member for Essex East yesterday. I hope he will continue to be generous in his references to the member for Essex East, rather than severe in his indictment as he is being now.

Mr. Starr: I want to thank the hon. member for Essex East and the members of the committee for this opportunity to carry on. I wish to assure the hon. member for Essex East that I have no intention of being severe with him, or of being critical. What I am trying to do is to set the record straight.

This program has been in operation now for three winters. During the three winters of its operation a total of 12,127 applications has been approved by the provinces and accepted by the government of Canada. The total cost of work put in motion during the three winters is estimated to be over $500 million, of which it is estimated over $350 million was expanded during the period covered by the three programs. An estimated 214,440 jobs have been provided over the three winters. The number of man days of work provided is estimated to be 8,812,394.

This program for the coming winter has been broadened to quite an extent to include almost any municipal undertaking of a capital nature, and it is expected that next winter's program will be even larger than that of last winter. Under the public works sector we have had an ambitious program of public works, and this has been pushed forward during the past three years. As an example, the Department of Public Works has in progress at various points across this country some 19 architectural projects each valued at more than $1 million. There are many who maintain that the government should launch upon a very large public works program. That is exactly what we are doing, Mr. Chairman.

In addition to this, six architectural projects valued at between $500,000 and $1 million are under contract. There are also 16 engineering projects, each valued at more than $500,000, in progress at this time. The expanded program of public works had in 1958, 50 architectural projects under way each with a value of more than $1 million, and 33 engineering projects with a value of more than $500,000 each.

We are now carrying out a program of engineering and maintenance projects which are worth well over $400 million. These include a $13 million harbour improvement at St. John's, Newfoundland; construction of the new $22 million aeroquay at Malton airport in Toronto; construction of a $60 million power reactor at Kincardine, Ontario; the $35 million Champlain bridge at Montreal; defence construction contracts with a total value of $100 million; and projects with a total value of nearly $30 million being carried out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for other governmental departments and agencies.

I come now to the trans-Canada highway system. This program has been an encouraging one. In 1960 the Trans-Canada Highway Act was amended to provide an additional $50 million for construction and to extend the act until December 31, 1963. A great deal of work has been provided in this area.

In the resources development area the federal government, during the past four winters, has contributed half the cost of the $13 million program for the construction of camp grounds and picnic areas, and this work has provided some 650,000 man days of employment. Approximately $6 million is being spent this year—that is, in the fiscal year 1961-62—on national parks and historic sites. Another $2 million is being contributed over a period of four or five years toward the cost of camp sites and picnic grounds along the route of the trans-Canada highway, with the provinces matching this expenditure.

We are contributing half the cost of constructing roads that will open new areas for development, to a maximum of $7.5 million per province. When fully implemented this program will produce some 4,500 miles of roads to resources. Some 3,500 miles are under construction, and expenditures to date in all provinces total some $55 million, of which the federal government contributes 50 per cent.

The Columbia river power treaty, which was recently signed in Washington, provides, I submit to you, sir, the basis for a very large expansion in that area also.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is non-existent. This is an amazing statement.

Mr. Starr: I said the treaty had been signed in Washington.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Signing a treaty does not give men work.

Mr. Starr: The Pine Point railway project, designed to tap new resources of mineral wealth, will involve a capital expenditure of at least $65 million on the new line alone, plus additional expenditures on line improvements south of Grimshaw. A new northern Quebec railway to Mattagami lake will open the way to further resources in this part of the province. Work on the South Saskatchewan dam is well ahead of schedule and is providing an important stimulus to this part of the west.

During the past four years this government has provided a $29.5 million loan to New Brunswick for the Beechwood hydroelectric development, and has made payments totalling $14.7 million to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick for terminal stations and 562 miles of transmission lines used in the interprovincial power grid system.

Some 2,300 miles of development roads are being constructed in Canada's northern territories, and 458 miles of low standard roads are being reconstructed to the development road standard at a total cost of $106 million. Development road construction has been completed on 574 miles, with 790 miles of right of way cleared. Some 800 miles remain to be surveyed. The forest access roads and trails agreement provided many jobs and expenditures in that area.

As far as small businesses are concerned, on January 19 of this year the Small Business Loans Act came into effect. By way of a guarantee of loans made by banks, it provides intermediate and short term credit to proprietors of small enterprises for the improvement and modernization of equipment and premises. The government is now authorized to guarantee loans up to $25,000 and for periods up to 10 years. Up to the end of June 1, there were approved 394 loans with a total value of $10,484,275. However, small business organizations have estimated that the value of renovation and extension work waiting to be carried out under this act amounts to $75 million. The government has also provided an easement of corporation taxes.

As far as trade stimulation is concerned, this is very vital to our economy from the point of view of supplying jobs. In the automobile industry, for example, the excise tax on cars was abolished.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thanks to our efforts.

Mr. Starr: I promised the hon. member that I would not enter into any controversy with him so I am not going to make any attempt to reply to what he has just said. We have also taken action with respect to the discount on imported motor vehicles and parts through reduction of the discount allowed. We have taken steps to make foreign automobile manufacturers compete on more equal terms with Canadian manufacturers. Meanwhile the recommendations of the royal commission on the automobile industry are being considered.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit me to ask him one question for clarification? He talked about foreign cars competing more equally with Canadian cars. Among foreign cars does he include British cars?

Mr. Starr: All cars that are imported into Canada are designated as foreign cars, and I think the hon. member for Essex East will agree with me on that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You and I can agree on that subject.

Mr. Starr: Our merchandise trade deficit, which has been a source of great concern to all of us, was reduced in 1960 to $97 million from $369 million in 1959. In 1956, for example, our trade deficit was $713 million and I repeat that in 1960 it was reduced to $97 million. I feel that this gives reason for satisfaction. The employment benefits from this reduction are going to be significant, and a further reduction in our trade deficit is being attempted.

We have endeavoured to help and give leadership to Canadian businessmen interested in developing further trade abroad. Recently we arranged to bring the trade commissioners to Ottawa so that they might meet those who are in business in this country. The conference proved to be very successful and some 1,400 business executives took advanage of it. It was significant to find at that time that about 20 per cent of the businessmen attending these meetings were for the first time considering the development of an export market for their goods.

To enable Canadian business to compete on better terms in foreign markets, the government provides assistance through the Export Credits Insurance Corporation. This assistance has been expanded and the results are gratifying because we are able to ship more goods made in Canada through the facilities of this corporation as well as through the Export Finance Corporation of Canada Limited.

I turn now to the field of training which has been a source of interest to a great many people including members of the government party, the government itself and members of the opposition. I want to remind the committee that as a result of the act passed by the house before Christmas a new federal-provincial agreement became effective on April 1, 1961. This agreement provides for a greatly increased technical and vocational program in Canada. The objective of the new agreement is to provide a means whereby Canada's manpower training requirements may be met. In the new agreement emphasis is placed on upgrading and retraining those now employed as well as on pre-employment training for those entering the work force.

The number of unemployed persons receiving training has increased each year and a substantial increase is expected during the coming winter. In his remarks yesterday the hon. member for Essex East referred to this act and said that it was not meeting the need for training the unemployed because grade 10 education was required and also because the act does not provide for training in academic subjects. He also said that the act requires amendment to correct this situation. Neither the act nor the agreements require grade 10 education for entry into the unemployed training courses. The normal entrance requirements have been waived for most courses except where a knowledge of advanced mathematics is necessary for successful mastery of the courses.

The vast majority of the numbers of unemployed being trained have formal education much below grade 10 level. Basic training in mathematics, science and communication skills necessary to obtain and hold employment has become an integral part of the training program for the unemployed in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Quebec and New Brunswick. Plans are now being made to operate such courses in all provinces during the present fiscal year. However, the act does not require amendment to meet the problem referred to by the hon. member for Essex East.

In his remarks a few moments ago the hon. member for Leeds mentioned the inadequacy of training in the technical field. I am unable to recollect the figures he used but for his information I wish to advise him that in the year 1960-61 training in technical and vocational classes in institutions throughout the country was given on a continuing basis to some 368,347 Canadians so the fact is that there are people being trained on a continuing basis in institutions established for this purpose. The hon. member may have had in mind the short courses that are established for some specific purpose and for a limited time, with the federal government paying 75 per cent of the cost. When these people are trained these courses are, of course, discontinued, but the fact is that some 368,347 people were being trained across Canada in the year 1960-61. We have not got the figures for 1961-62.

The hon. member also mentioned that technical people are leaving this country in increasing numbers. I was interested in reading an article published in the Montreal Gazette today. It is headed, "Skilled Personnel Return". I think it is important enough that I should read a portion of what is said here because all of us are very much interested in this matter. The article reads in part as follows:

> A small but growing return to Canada of Canadian professional and technical personnel has been remarked by the technical service council, an industry sponsored placement agency which has opened an office in Montreal. The annual exodus of Canadian trained scientists and engineers still greatly exceeds the numbers who are returning, and no doubt will continue to do so for some time yet. Still, it is encouraging to know that the traffic is no longer so obviously one way.
> The causes for a return to Canada are several. They arise, for the most part, from a dissatisfaction with the American way of life. A related consideration is the readiness with which many American employers will lay off even skilled personnel when times are bad. Canadian firms, in the experience of the council, tend to hold on to their men; American firms do not.
> The council does not appear to have experienced much difficulty in placing the returnees. An encouraging demand is developing for professional personnel in anticipation of improved business activity.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. gentleman tell us the source of this information?

Mr. Starr: The Montreal Gazette of Thursday, September 21, an article on page 12 written by John Meyer, the financial editor. I continue the quotation:

> The demand for production engineers, time study and cost experts is particularly significant. It suggests to the council further evidence of Canadian producers' sharpening awareness of the need to wring out cost consuming slack in their operations.

There may be another reason for the reported views of a number of these technical people, and that may be that they have found out this government has taken action and that the economy of Canada is on the upward swing, that opportunities are here again.

Now, I should like to make a statement on the training program in so far as facilities and the equipment of those facilities are concerned. As a result of the stimulus of increased federal contributions to training provided in the new technical and vocational training bill passed earlier this session, additional expenditures on new and enlarged training facilities are now planned by the provincial governments amounting to $164,808,000 up to March 31, 1963. This is the program that provincial governments have indicated in so far as these facilities are concerned. The federal government will contribute 75 per cent of this total expenditure, and we have already approved an amount of $98,312,000 as our share.

The province of Quebec signed the training agreement last Friday afternoon, following similar action by all the other provinces earlier. Applications for approval from Quebec are expected shortly. All the provinces have signed the necessary agreements. The Quebec program will add to the totals I have given.

Of the $98 million which the federal government has already approved for capital expenditures, it is expected that $62 million will be claimed during the present fiscal year. There will probably be another $4 million or $5 million from Quebec. Provision is made in the present estimates for capital expenditures by the federal government of $29,500,000, of which sum $15 million is in the main estimates and the balance in the supplementary estimates. I anticipate, Mr. Chairman, that there will be need for an additional amount to be provided in a later supplementary estimate to cover the remainder.

Included in the new facilities that have already been approved are nine institutes of technology, 11 trade schools, 69 vocational high schools, making a total of 89 new technical and vocational training institutes across this country. Now, these facilities and the enlargement of the existing schools will, it is estimated, provide accommodation for an additional 30,000 students. I submit this is a very worth-while program which has been given life by the federal government and which provides an incentive to the provinces to undertake these worth-while projects.

In the field of transportation, I would recall to hon. members that during the past three years over $45 million were spent in providing new and modern ships for the Department of Transport. Other ships have been built by the federal government to be operated by other bodies such as the Canadian National Railways, and this work brings the total expenditure in the field to $57 million. The ship construction assistance regulations went into effect on September 12. These regulations provide for a subsidy in respect of construction in Canada of self-propelled vessels of 100 tons or over, tugs of 50 tons or over and other vessels of 200 tons or over. This, too, Mr. Chairman, I submit will give the necessary boost to the shipbuilding industry of our country which has suffered in the past.

In the field of winter employment, the federal government has taken an active interest in trying to stimulate co-operation between all Canadians across this country to provide more employment during the months in which it is most needed. All of these programs, and these are only some of the programs I have time to bring to the attention of this committee, were brought forward by this government for the purpose of stimulating planned investment, to create new jobs and guarantee old jobs and to maintain a healthy degree of expansion of the economy. These things are now taking place.

What has been the result of this action by the government? The gross national product was up 3 per cent in the second quarter of 1961 over the second quarter of 1960; personal expenditures on goods and services were up 3.8 per cent. Government expenditures on goods and services were up 7.9 per cent. Exports of goods and services were up 9.7 per cent. Wages and salaries were up by 3.5 per cent. In the field of employment, total employment, at 6,381,000, was up 110,000 from August, 1960. There were 59,000 more men and 51,000 more women employed in August, 1961 than a year ago. There were 5,578,000 employed in non-farm industries, 127,000 more than in August, 1960. There were 803,000 employed on farms, and this figure dropped by 17,000 as compared with a year ago. Manufacturing employment was up 41,000 from August, 1960; wholesale, retail trade employment was up 24,000; finance, insurance and real estate employment was up 14,000; and there were 68,000 more people working in the service industries than there were a year ago.

I should give the committee the regional picture in so far as employment is concerned. On a regional basis, employment in the Atlantic region was up by 32,000; the Quebec region was down 29,000; the Ontario region up 59,000; the prairie region up 26,000; the Pacific region up 22,000. In so far as the percentage of unemployment is concerned as related to the labour force of these regions, the Atlantic region, 6.8 per cent as against 6.9 per cent in August, 1960; in Quebec it is now 6.3 as against 6.2 per cent; in Ontario it is 3.9 per cent as compared with 5.1 per cent last year at this time. In the prairies, it is 2.7 per cent as compared with 2.4 per cent last year and in the Pacific region it is 6.3 per cent as compared with 7.5 per cent last year. I am sorry to have taken up so much of the time of this committee, Mr. Chairman, but I felt that some of these things had to be brought to the attention of this committee, in order that all of us may realize that no effort has been spared by this government to deal with this unemployment situation in Canada. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I can assure the members of the committee and the people of Canada that this government will continue to exert all possible effort on behalf of the Canadian economy and the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): I recognize the hon. member for Peterborough.

Mr. Chevrier: I understood that, following a government member, it is normally the turn of some member of the opposition. I do not wish to dispute the right of the hon. member for Peterborough, of course, if that has been the practice.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): I am informed that the hon. member for Leeds spoke prior to the minister and the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont prior to him. I therefore believe it is in order for one of the members of the C.C.F. party to have the floor. I recognize the hon. member for Laurier next.

Mr. Pitman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. What we have seen happen here this afternoon is, I think, rather extraordinary. We have had virtually a speech from the throne in reverse. We have had the citation at the end of the session of all the actions of the government over the last seven or eight months, and this is quite an innovation I am sure. However, I feel there are one or two things which were stated by the Minister of Labour which should not pass unnoticed. One of the things which always interests me is the rather interesting logic behind such statements. I can remember last December and January, when we saw these figures rising dramatically, the reason given for unemployment was loss of trade, the fact that the devastation in Europe had been repaired, that there was no longer any war scare and the fact that so many young people had entered the labour market and that the government had little part in it at all. But now that the figures are beginning to go down, suddenly the government's achievements are the main reason for it.

I was a little bit worried about the rationale which the Minister of Labour used in indicating that now 5 per cent is going to be looked upon as an acceptable proportion of unemployed. I can remember when, 10 or 15 years ago, a figure of 3 per cent was looked upon with concern and 4 per cent with great alarm. However, I believe now we are going to be expected to recognize 5 per cent.

Mr. Starr: No.

Mr. Pitman: I would suggest that slight inflation can easily be looked after by an entirely planned economy and there will be no need to worry about that matter in terms of 5 per cent. Indeed, we must bring this unemployment figure further down than such a level.

One suggestion which I found somewhat surprising was the suggestion of the Minister of Labour that the hon. member for Essex East had misled this committee because he asserted that Canada had the highest unemployment rate of any country in the western world. The minister used the figures of June, July and August in order to prove this statement. I think that is a rather unfair example as Canada, of course, has a much greater fluctuation from winter to summer than has the United States. Surely the only fair way in which to decide this question would be to use both winter and summer figures in order to make any kind of acceptable comparison.

So far as the use of housing is concerned, I would think there may well be a serpent in the basket in the use of housing as a means of bringing down unemployment in this manner because, to my way of thinking, at a time when we are bringing down the income needed to buy a home, and when we are making mortgages with longer terms and payments much higher, if there is a slight recession there is going to be a tremendous number of houses which are going to be in the hands of the government. The government will be really in the housing business. What we need is direct action by the government in subsidizing low cost housing. One critic has suggested that the number of housing units is outpacing family formation in the middle income area and that this is going to be a real problem in the future.

Finally, the Minister of Labour indicated that the hon. member for Essex East had minimized the government's double depreciation measure. I would suggest that he could not possibly minimize it or it would disappear altogether, certainly in one aspect at least. So far as areas designated as surplus manpower are concerned, the minister did not prove that one single job was created by this particular piece of legislation. So far as areas being designated are concerned, this may look to be very strange at the moment, but certainly in the past we did not get any great run on this particular kind of help. In fact, it took from December until March before we could find out what the system was going to be. Then, of course, by the time we finally found out what the system was going to be, we found that the measure was not strong enough to cure even the mildest form of unemployment. It was coming too late. There was no knowledge of it until March 2. It was too late to do anything about the level of unemployment we had last winter, and of course, many knew nothing about it. I would suggest that the way in which this particular aspect of the government's policy has been handled has been the most complete negation of government responsibility which I think could possibly be examined.

The criteria were made fully public on March 2, but cities throughout the country had no idea whatsoever whether or not they were covered by these criteria. For example, in April or May I went down to the library to discover just exactly what the situation was in many areas of Canada. I found that so far as the metropolitan area of Windsor-Leamington was concerned, the figure was 80.9 per cent of the months between May and November between 1953 and 1960 and this city had applied. But when we turn to major industrial areas of 10,000 or more, which required 75 per cent, we find Rouyn-Val d'Or with a figure of 76.2 per cent had not applied; Shawinigan Falls with 90.5 per cent had not applied; Cornwall with a figure of 80.9 per cent had applied; Lac St. Jean with a figure of 76.2 per cent had not applied; Trois Rivieres with a figure of 90.5 per cent had not applied; Brantford with a figure of 90.5 per cent had not applied. Surely it would have been very simple for this government to inform the municipalities throughout this country at least to what extent they apply, in one of the areas which could come under this scheme.

I realize that, in order to find out whether the number leaving the industrial force was the reason for the number becoming less, certainly there was needed some kind of local investigation. I know of one community where the mayor came all the way down to Ottawa —and perhaps there were many others—when there was no possibility that that city could be given this designation of a surplus manpower area under this piece of legislation. This is government irresponsibility at its worst. If you go into most industrial areas of 10,000 and less what do you find? In those nine major industrial areas, eight had not applied. The minor industrial areas required 50 per cent. In St. Stephen the figure was 73.8 and it had not applied; Gaspe with 66.7 per cent had not applied; Rimouski with 61.9 per cent had not applied. Similarly I could go on down the list. This measure was supposedly to deal with unemployment at the time when there was unemployment which was, of course, last winter. Now with employment rising the whole manner of government appreciation now with the very little effect it will have, almost becomes irrelevant. I think this is certainly a damaging indictment of a so-called method by which this government was going to deal with unemployment.

I am not going to comment on the mass of statistics which we have just been given. I am sure that all of us want to sit down for a few hours in order to read that speech before we can decide really what has been said. However, I wish to say this, at any rate, about this whole area of employment. Today, with all the seriousness of the international situation and with the bureau of statistics giving us at least a little bit more hope than it has given us in the past, perhaps unemployment does not seem to be quite so overwhelmingly significant. Perhaps this provides an opportunity to sit back more coolly and impassively and to discuss the problem of unemployment without the white heat of urgency we felt last March. We in the New Democratic party look upon this problem as the most serious of all the internal difficulties facing the people of Canada. The Senate committee put it very well when they indicated the extent of the material loss involved in unemployment. I am reading from page 1 of the report of the special committee of the Senate on manpower and employment wherein it is stated:

> The failure of the economy to utilize fully its labour resources involves a loss of production. Nor can this production be later recovered—it is gone forever. Unemployment implies, then, both the inability of certain members of the society to share equitably in the national output and a reduction of the national output itself. Furthermore, the mere awareness that a significant number of people are out of work—and with the modern development of statistics and the means of communicating them widespread awareness is never long delayed—has an adverse effect on social morale and the climate of enterprise. In fact, the number of people without jobs is one of the most common and most important standards used to evaluate the performance of a free society and in the present world of ideological conflict it is hardly an overstatement to say that a high level of employment is a goal deserving of the utmost priority.

These are the material losses. Now we all hope that the cold war will soon be something of the past, but let us not forget that we shall have another war, though a different kind of war, on our hands, and the way in which we deal with unemployment will be a very real part of that war.

I should like to mention here the spiritual significance of unemployment. Lord Beveridge in his book entitled "Full Employment in a Free Society" says:

> The greatest evil of unemployment is not physical but moral, not the want which it may bring but the hatred and fear which it breeds.

We on this side fully recognize that this is an extremely complex problem and that it has as many facets to its solution as there are to its causes. But there are two approaches. One is simply to stand back and say: we can do virtually nothing about it—at least in those circumstances the Canadian citizen knows just what to expect—and the other is to refuse blindly to accept the extent of the problem. This certainly was the policy of the present government through November, December and January of last year. Their philosophy was: we can spend a little money, take the minimum of action accompanied by the maximum of publicity, and hope that the Canadian people will be hoodwinked into believing that we have a policy of full employment. We in the New Democratic party have decided to hit this problem head on, much to the consternation of certain organizations. We say that a government must guarantee employment, using as its methods a wide range of fiscal, monetary and economic policies. This could be done, and we say it has to be done. We believe that we, in Canada, are the ones who are out of step with our slogans of "free enterprise". Let us look at what some of the other nations have done. I should like to quote from an address given by Mr. T. Carlsson, a Swedish labour attaché to Canada and the United States in which he said:

> Sweden controls its economy by exercising overall planning and integration of all phases of industry. No move is made in any one sector of the economy without regard to the effect on the country as a whole. When a recession threatens, the machinery to avert it is ready to swing into action immediately.

This, of course, is very different from the philosophy here where we wait until a man falls flat on his face and then pick him up, as distinct from doing something to bolster him before he falls.

Mr. Carlsson continued:

> As a result of advance planning, the government and municipalities have public works projects ready to roll in an emergency to provide more jobs and stimulate the economy.
>
> Private investment is encouraged in a recession by making it tax free for a limited period, thus developing new industry and expansion of existing facilities when it is most vitally needed.

And here, I think, is the important statement.

> We don't tolerate unemployment in Sweden. A full employment policy is in the bedrock of our national economic system.

How do they maintain jobs for all in Sweden? The answer, again, lies in planning. To quote Mr. Carlsson again:

> The workers in Sweden, including the white collar workers, are 95 per cent organized, and the employers are also fully organized. This makes it possible for the leaders of both unions and management to negotiate "economy-wide" contracts, governing every company and every worker in the country. The profits of all companies are published periodically, and wages are geared scientifically to productivity.
> Our employers have accepted their social responsibility. They acknowledge the right of the workers to share in their profits.

Then, later:

> Labour mobility—the shifting of workers from one region to another and one trade to another—is a big factor in the Swedish success story. The government provides very generous travel allowances for families changing jobs, and offers vocational retraining courses of up to two years' duration—families being supported by government funds while the breadwinners learn a new trade.

Mr. Grafftey: You are a bore.

Mr. Pitman: I am afraid the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi is in jocular mood this afternoon. I did not hear what the question was.

An hon. Member: He is talking to himself.

Mr. Pitman: I put it to the committee that another country has done something about unemployment. I have here a clipping from the Globe and Mail on June 9, 1961 headed: "West German Jobless Dues Suspended". Instead of the bankruptcy which virtually faces our own fund, Germany is in effect having to give a rebate to the workers who are being asked not to contribute further to the fund because it is already far too large.

The French economist, Andre Philip, speaking at a conference in August, 1961, said that in France "If we had 2 per cent unemployment we would have a revolution". Mr. Philip is further reported as saying:

> In the European community we are changing our economic and social structure. In the United States and Canada you must also make a change because if you don't you will lose and you will make us lose, which I don't like.

We might well consider the position of New Zealand. Perhaps I could illustrate it by quoting from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of January 26 of this year.

> New Zealand in fact seems a Fabian paradise, an almost classless society with full employment and high living standards. This little country of 2,300,000 has virtually no unemployment. Of a total labour force of 885,000, only 276 are registered as jobless. And at least 17,000 jobs are vacant.

Thus, governments abroad have realized that full employment is the only solution—full employment not merely as the subject of election speeches, but full employment in reality. We face the realization that we have today what is known as cyclical unemployment and that the cycle has changed. I am sure that is part of the reason for some of the more hopeful statistics we have heard from the minister. While we know that after a certain time cyclical unemployment seems to disappear, we should also recognize that it leaves behind a hard core of men and women who do not re-enter the labour force. This hard core will cost the Canadian taxpayer a great deal more in the future. I am thinking of a piece of research which was done by the Catholic Service Bureau in my constituency. They examined the histories of people who are known as "down and outs"— those who sit on park benches and have lost all interest and participation in competitive living. The bureau's investigators found that nearly every one of those was a man who had had a job in his early thirties or forties, had lost that job and failed to re-enter the labour force. This constitutes a serious social problem and one which will cost even more than we are paying now in unemployment relief.

We realize that automation offers us an opportunity to increase the prosperity and living standards of the people of Canada, yet we stand wondering who is going to pay for this technical change—and we cannot help asking ourselves whether it is not going to be the workers who find themselves faced directly with the prospect of losing their jobs in an economy where they would find it difficult to find any other employment. We wonder, also, what would happen if the dream of total disarmament did come true. Could we reorganize our economy sufficiently to take up the slack and provide new employment for those now employed in the defence industries? I suggest that the government would have to take a far more conscientious view of its activities and responsibilities before there would be any hope that such a thing could happen. We believe there is a need for government responsibility. We were shocked by the lackadaisical attitude in dealing with the situation. We believe that the twentieth century makes great demands that call for some faith in democratic government action. I am sure that future historians in looking back at our age will not be so much impressed by our cars or even our missiles as by the fact that with the height of technological and scientific advance we have achieved our society was unable to give jobs to those Canadians who last winter were looking for employment, and will be even more impressed by our utter callousness in dealing with the situation.

Yesterday the hon. member for Essex East placed before the committee the program of the Liberal party for dealing with unemployment. We are able to agree entirely with many and indeed most of the points he raised. There was, however, one fatal flaw, almost Shakespearean in its depth.

Mr. Grafftey: Oh, the hon. member reads Shakespeare too.

[Mr. Pitman.]

Mr. Pitman: The hon. member appeared to fail to realize that such activity, if it is to be co-ordinated and purposeful, demands a level of government participation and direction beyond that acceptable by the members and supporters of the Liberal party. We feel that success is impossible without a planned course, that all these principles would result in utter chaos. We are unhappy to see the word "planning" being dropped from the vocabulary of hon. members of the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I used it yesterday, but in the right context.

Mr. Pitman: It is evident that the hon. gentleman and I disagree as to the meaning of the word and the proper context in which it should be used.

Without planning, many of these courses of action could lead to total chaos and confusion. We feel that the programs which appear so acceptable on the floor of the convention when the Liberals meet lose all shape and meaning once they are taken over by the party leadership.

We in this group also wish to present to the committee a program for dealing with unemployment. We believe that there must be a planned approach at every level. It will not be regimented and will be acceptable to the Canadian people. A planned approach is today used by captains of industry but without the full view being taken into consideration, without sufficient research and information, and all too often it entails planned profits and planned obsolescence. We wish to create a pattern within our economy which will provide a full employment society. By whom would it be planned? Certainly there would be an inner council of the cabinet. This is not a matter that should be the full responsibility of the Minister of Labour. Both the hon. member for Leeds and the hon. member for Essex East commented on this point as well. We envisage an inner council of the cabinet which council would be composed of the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and perhaps other appropriate ministers who would hammer out policies destined to bring about full employment in our society.

We would require a planned approach at the provincial level as well. We shudder at the course of this government at the present time. It is losing fiscal control in the new taxation arrangements with the provincial governments. We have a situation in which one province can negate the influence of the federal government. We had a classic example of that recently. The federal government removed the tax on automobiles and the Ontario government introduced a 3 per cent sales tax.

Mr. More: What about the tax in Saskatchewan? We have had it for 20 years under a socialist government.

Mr. Pitman: I suggest it was not levied in a manner similar to that in the instance to which I refer, nor by the existing government.

Mr. Jones: It was increased by the C.C.F.

Mr. Pitman: I am not attempting to discuss the irrelevant situation in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Jones: The hon. member had better talk about something he knows something about, if there be such a subject.

Mr. Pitman: We require a planning and development council to dovetail plans and programs at every level. There must also be planning by different economic groups including industry, labour, agriculture, the extractive industries and others. These should be given a genuine role to play and not just sent away immediately after being constituted. They should have a genuine opportunity of participation, a sense of responsibility, an opportunity of following through and of making a vital contribution. They should not simply hold conferences. It is only through planning at the federal and provincial levels and at the level of all economic groups that we can possibly solve the problems with which we are confronted.

We wish to institute a program to give Canada the opportunity for the economic growth that is necessary to ensure her prosperity. This is the touchstone, as was mentioned by other hon. members who have participated in this debate. We must ensure that all sectors, regions and groups share in this growth and it must be a purposeful growth. It is all very well to talk about training the unemployed which is of course a necessary and important thing but if jobs were available industry would train men to fill the jobs. I have been told by industrial leaders that that is true. Certainly we need vocational training but it will not solve the problem. To achieve the purposeful sense of growth to which I refer we must come to appreciate that if one region is depressed and is not receiving a fair share of the national income we are all at fault, we all lose and that this is a measure of our failure to cope with our problem. If one group, whether it be old age pensioners, farmers or fishermen, is not receiving a just share of the national prosperity, we are all the losers and again we share responsibility for this failure.

We require a national investment board capable of implementing a dynamic investment policy and of planning and regulating investment. It must direct this investment in a way that will create employment. Let us put a sense of purpose in our war on unemployment just as in times of emergency we have put a sense of purpose in our war against enemies when they have beset us. If we had that sense of purpose the Canadian people would rise to the occasion and invest their money in Canadian enterprise but lacking that sense of purpose there is no great desire to do so.

We need greater control over anti-cyclical financing as was mentioned in earlier discussions on the budget. This government has failed to adopt methods by which we can prevent recessions through the use of fiscal and monetary policy. This is a very real failure. There must be a recognition of the public sector, so long neglected. It must be appreciated that we can stop unemployment by building the schools, universities, recreational centres and other things we need. I was pleased to hear the Minister of Labour stress the importance of construction in relation to employment. The Minister of Public Works denounced us as being unrealistic when we said that public works could provide employment. There appears to be a difference of opinion on this matter within the ranks of the cabinet.

We require a new approach to secondary industry. We need a minister of industry. We have ministers for such departments as fisheries and mining and technical surveys. Secondary industry employs more people than any other segment of the economy and requires the establishment of a department with a minister to look after the many needs obtaining there.

There are many other areas where a new approach must be adopted including that of area redevelopment. Redevelopment projects would aid in giving the Canadian people a sense of national purpose especially in areas where the economy loses its strength by reason of the relocation of industry or changes in technology. I refer to communities such as mining and industrial communities who have recently lost their source of income.

We feel that the program we have outlined can be put into effect but we must have a full scale war on unemployment. This is the only answer to the problem. It may very well be that this winter we shall have less unemployment than we had last winter and I certainly hope that is the case. The Canadian economy may be dragged up by world economic conditions and particularly by the United States economy, but this will not mean the end of the problem. I hope this government will seize the challenge that confronts it to come to grips with the problem of unemployment by introducing long term measures that will ensure that we will never have in Canada again the levels of unemployment we had last winter.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have listened carefully today to most of the speeches made on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Labour and I must say nearly all were constructive speeches. I thought particularly constructive the speech made by my colleague the hon. member for Essex East with which the minister did not disagree too much, I think, although he did take issue with some of the statistics submitted to him by the hon. member.

The hon. member for Essex East has been our spokesman on this subject for a number of years now. Not only did he give the position of the opposition and of the party but he also spoke with the same authority on this subject as he does on many other subjects.

I should like also to refer particularly to the contribution made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont who dealt I believe more particularly with the Quebec aspect of the situation, although he did speak in general terms as well.

I should like to commend the hon. member for Leeds who, I think all hon. members will agree, is making a serious and substantial impact upon the house by the manner in which he prepares himself for these debates.

The hon. member for Peterborough has just completed a constructive speech. With many of the things he said I, and I am sure those who sit on this side of the house, agree. I was pleased to see him put on the record some of the things that his party would be prepared to do in case of an emergency, having particular reference to the situation in which we find ourselves today. Many of those things were advocated by the Liberal party quite some time ago.

The minister made a long speech. I am glad the committee permitted him to speak at length so that he could put on the record the whole program, as he wished to, of the government in reference to the unemployment situation.

Mr. Starr: Just some of it.

Mr. Chevrier: I listened to him carefully and I believe in an impartial way. Judging by the glowing statement he made on behalf of the government, suggesting all that had been done by the government, I would have thought he would have come to the conclusion that something substantial, something consequential, had materialized from what had been done. But that was not the case. If you look at the cold facts of the matter you will find that the situation in Canada in the month of August was still twice as bad as it was when the present government took office in 1957. If you look at the figures of 323,000 in August 1961, and compare them with the situation in 1957 when 162,000 were unemployed when we left office, notwithstanding the glowing picture painted by the minister, you can draw your own conclusions as to the effect of the program which has been put into operation.

Notwithstanding the rosy picture painted by the minister of the program adopted by the government in many fields there is still one cold fact which no one in this committee can contradict, and it is this. When we left office the unemployment insurance fund was close to $1 billion. Today it is down to $100 million or less. These are cold facts and they give some idea to the committee and the country how it was depleted and of what is happening now.

The minister read from a paragraph of the report of the special committee of the Senate on manpower and employment. I cannot understand why he did not read the whole of the paragraph. At page 21 the minister read these words:

> With the wisdom of hindsight one can see in the statistical record evidence of weakness emerging gradually over a period of many years.

He stopped there. I should like to go on. Here is what the report said:

> In a sense, though, the 1957-58 recession was a major turning point. The recovery from this recession was relatively moderate and conspicuously short-lived. Widely held expectations about the increase in national output soon turned out to be over-optimistic, and the economy proved incapable of providing the number of new jobs necessary simultaneously to absorb the increases in the labour force and to reduce unemployment to pre-recession levels. The volume of immigration had declined sharply from its 1957 peak and the rate of family formation had fallen off. Overcapacity had developed in many parts of the economy and this situation, which persisted throughout the period of recovery, had a serious effect on investment expenditures. Early in 1960 the economy entered another recession without ever having recovered fully from the preceding one.

From this report on manpower and employment it will appear very clearly that a serious situation began following the 1957 recession. The minister took the figures for the month of August and he was very happy with the result. Let me tell him at once that I, too and we on this side of the house as well, are happy to see a betterment of the situation; notwithstanding the betterment of the situation there are a number of facts which were pointed out by the hon. member for Essex East which I will not, nor do I feel I should, repeat. One of those facts is that there are still 323,000 unemployed in this country. This is a serious matter. Whether it be 5 per cent of the labour force or 4.3 per cent, it is still a serious matter and the country will want to know what is the position of the government with reference to it. It has been said by the minister that this is a decrease of 31,000 in the month of August as compared with the month of July. That is good. I am pleased; we are happy with that; but in the other sentence in the labour force statistics issued by the Department of Labour the following appears:

> The labour force decreased by 39,000, which is more than usual for this period.

This is a sentence which should be read in conjunction with the other statement.

I do not want to deal at length with any particular part of Canada but I would be remiss if in passing I did not make some reference to the province of Quebec. The minister said very little about it. The unemployment situation in that province in August was 6.3 per cent of the labour force compared with 6.2 per cent a year earlier. In fact, the situation there is worse than it is in any other part of Canada save the maritimes. We have this situation, sir, notwithstanding the fact that the present administration in Quebec—and I do not want to get into a political argument; these are facts which I believe are accurate—has accepted contributions from the federal government with reference to unemployment assistance, which it did not do in previous years. It contributes 40 per cent to the winter works program as compared with absolutely nothing by the administration prior to the present one coming into office in Quebec.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Chevrier: You will have to ask your friends to answer that question.

As I say, we have the situation notwithstanding the fact that the Lesage government have accepted contributions under the Trans-Canada Highway Act, which unquestionably helped the unemployment situation in that province and notwithstanding the fact that government has accepted contributions with reference to access roads to forests and other natural resources areas. The fact is that prior to the advent of the new administration in the province of Quebec only 174 municipalities in that province had applied for and obtained the benefits of the winter works program—these figures are from returns to the house—compared with 1,286 projects under the present Quebec administration as reported on December 14, 1960, and almost 2,000 as of this date. I conclude this part of my remarks by making the statement that the government certainly cannot complain about the co-operation it is receiving in the field of employment and with respect to its so-called program to relieve unemployment so far as the province of Quebec is concerned. Yet notwithstanding the government's program and notwithstanding the contribution by the province, 6.3 per cent of the labour force in the province of Quebec were still out of work in the month of August.

An hon. Member: Since the new Liberal regime.

Mr. Chevrier: I say that is a serious matter and it is serious because in my opinion the government is not doing nearly enough in that area. The minister has referred to certain projects in the province of Quebec. He has referred to the Champlain bridge which was approved by the former administration. He has referred to the Mattagami railway line which was approved by the house, of course, and which I hope is helping to relieve the situation in that area of the province. Those are the only two projects in the province of Quebec to which he referred. I suggest to him that not nearly enough public projects have been instituted by the government of Canada in that province.

The minister dealt at great length with the program of the government and he put on the record a long list of things which had been done by the government to meet the unemployment situation. But all of the things he put on the record had to do with one aspect of unemployment only, unemployment in the construction field. He suggested absolutely nothing to deal with cyclical unemployment or structural unemployment. He did refer to assistance to depressed areas, about which I will have more to say in a moment. I say to him and to those who sit behind him that 75 per cent—I was going to say 90 per cent but perhaps I would be mistaken—are projects which, if they are of assistance, are of assistance only in one sector of the economy, namely, in the field of building and the allied trades.

There are other areas of the economy which are suffering and for which little is being done. The minister has said nothing about emigration. He did put on record a statement by Mr. Meyer of the Gazette toward the end of his speech but there are other aspects of this matter which I think also deserve to be put on the record. I should like to refer to a newsletter prepared by the department of economic development of the Canadian chamber of commerce, and I quote from the last page thereof:

> Stuart Armour, economic adviser, the Steel Company of Canada Limited, speaking to the annual meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, commented: "Can it be that we are attempting to solve our unemployment problem by losing population? Let us hope not, for in 1957, when we had the second highest net migration in the past decade we had a very much higher level of business activity than we are now experiencing".

A little farther on in the letter is this paragraph:

Of particular concern in this connection is the steady flow of emigrants to the United States. In the 12 months ending June 30, 1960, there were 46,668 immigrants to the United States whose country of last permanent residence was Canada. Of this number, 30,132 were born in this country.

Because it is of tremendous importance I repeat that last statement.

Of this number, 30,132 were born in this country. During this period, Canada lost to the United States more than 5,700 professional, technical and kindred workers including professors and instructors, draftsmen, engineers, physicians and surgeons, teachers, technicians, and 1,372 badly needed professional nurses. We lost more than 1,100 managers, officials and proprietors and more than 4,500 craftsmen, foremen and kindred workers, including brickmasons, stonemasons, carpenters, machinists, mechanics, plumbers, plasterers and toolmakers.

I could go on. The decrease in the number of unemployed amounted to 31,000 in the month of August but, as this newsletter indicates, 46,668 persons, of whom 30,132 were born in Canada, emigrated to the United States in the period mentioned. The question arises in our minds at once: Are we to understand that we have to solve our unemployment problem by emigration to the United States?

Mr. Starr: In one month?

Mr. Chevrier: It does not matter whether it is in one month or in 12 months. I am dealing with the 12-month figure, and it is a serious matter that over 46,000 people should have gone to the United States, 30,000 of whom were born in this country. I pose the question because it is one of serious importance for all of us.

The minister dealt with the encouragement the government has given to depressed areas. Perhaps I am not using the right term. I believe another expression has been used by the minister from time to time but I will use "depressed area" for lack of a better phrase. The minister made a great deal of the applications that had been received which he said represented a value of approximately $85 million. So far so good, but how many of those applications have been approved by the government? I think the house has a right to know that. As hon. members know, the purpose of assistance by way of double depreciation is double-barrelled, as the minister has stated. First, it is to come to the assistance of an industry which might develop a new product anywhere in Canada. Double depreciation will be granted to such an industry. Second, if an industry decides to establish itself in an area so designated by the government it will receive double depreciation for one year.

I want to know how many applications for double depreciation have been accepted by the government and, second, I want to know how many men have been put to work as a result of this program. I doubt very much whether one man has been put to work by virtue of the action taken by the government in this field. The next question is, what areas of Canada have been declared by the government to be depressed areas? The minister stated that the municipal authorities were interested in this program, that by early September 49 applications had been made and eight local areas and 11 specific locations had been designated. We said at the time that this was not the way to do it, that is the method whereby the municipalities should make application to one or the other of the departments of government. We said the government should itself take the initiative because it would know from what information it had, be it in labour, be it in trade and commerce, be it in public works or in finance or any other department, which areas were the depressed areas. I say with respect, of course, that when the minister dealt with that part of his program, in so far as meeting the unemployment situation was concerned in my opinion that was the weakest part of his contribution to this debate.

Even under the best of conditions of full employment at the national level, certain sectors of the Canadian economy have experienced stagnation. There is no doubt about that, it is admitted by all of us. This is due, in part, to the geographical dispersion of industries and the tendency towards regional concentration of single industries. When there are any shifts in consumer preference, changes in technology, depletion of resources or a resurgence of world competition, the local industry's market position is constricted, but the severest impact is on the locality that is totally dependent upon the industry. The disappearance of such an industry, although it leaves a vacuum gives no assurance that the vacuum will be filled by a new industry.

There are certain economic factors which contribute to labour immobility, so there is no outflow of workers to bring the supply and demand of labour into equilibrium. Under conditions of less than full employment or severe unemployment such as existed in Canada since 1957, the problems of the distressed areas are greatly aggravated. As the house knows, the average unemployment for the year 1958 was 7.1 per cent; 1959, 6 per cent and 1960, 7 per cent. The Canadian government is pledged to a national goal of full employment. The white paper on unemployment which was tabled in this house many years ago by the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe stated unequivocally that full employment was the major goal of government policy. Here was a policy to deal with the post-war transitional period laid down clearly. There were 11 points which dealt with the situation, not as we found it then, but as we anticipated it might be. First, the employment problem was dealt with; next, the sources of employment and income were described; then export trade was dealt with, private investment in Canada, consumption, public investment, scientific and industrial research, placement and training of workers, wartime controls, government financing, the beginning of the transition. Anyone reading this short pamphlet can come to no other conclusion but that here was a program which had been thought out; here was a program that had been brought about by the meeting of many of the best minds in our country. It was this program that helped Canada go through the post-war period from 1945 to 1957 in a manner which resulted in no more than three per cent on the average of the labour force being out of work at any time, and 3 per cent was considered by economists as full employment.

Mr. Valade: That is false.

Mr. Chevrier: My friend behind me says that is false. I have put on the record on many occasions the statistics and they are there for whoever wants to see them.

In order to accomplish full employment, these regional pockets to which I have been referring of chronic unemployment must be eliminated. They must be eradicated since they have reached such proportions as to become an effective brake on the economic capacity of the nation to attain and sustain an adequate rate of growth. If any further justification is needed for an all-out federal attack on the problem of distressed areas, one has only to refer to the report of the Senate committee on manpower and employment. At this point, I should like to quote from page 69, as follows:

> This is not to suggest that technological change and the provision of cheaper goods by foreign suppliers are without benefit. Their benefits are obvious. Nevertheless, it must be recognized that they sometimes create serious problems for particular industries and, in so far as these industries are geographically concentrated rather than spread uniformly across the country, the problems may manifest themselves in particular areas. In other words, while the benefits of technological advance and cheaper imports may be widely distributed the unfavourable effects may be geographically confined.

This quotation substantiates the statement which I have just made. There are, as the minister knows, specific distressed areas in the Canadian economy that endure, at the present time, one and a half to two times the national average in amount of unemployment. The duration of the unemployment is just as important as the rate. Long term unemployment, that is unemployment over 15 weeks during the year is prevalent in these areas. A long period of unsuccessful job seeking usually represents a real crisis in the personal life of the individual and an irrecoverable loss both to the individual and to the economy of his productive capacity which goes unused during this time. An excess of supply over demand in labour for long periods of time in distressed areas, coupled with the immobility of the labour supply, due to such things as home ownership or lack of information on alternative job opportunities outside of the region leads to a lack of hope and despair on the part of the individual involved. The loss of income on the personal level results in communities being unable to provide essential services. This deficiency in essential services, when coupled with problems of providing welfare, constitutes an impossible financial burden on the stricken community.

How is this problem being met? The minister has indicated in his earlier remarks what the government has done. But I say to him with respect that that part of his program is inadequate to meet the situation as we find it today in the depressed areas across Canada. Here, I should like to quote what Professor Stanislaw Judek of the University of Ottawa had to say in his submission to the Senate committee on manpower, and which was in a large part adopted. He said:

> The attempt to ease unemployment on a seasonal basis—

I ask the committee to listen to this carefully.

> —through an inadequate winter works program and on an industry basis, mainly through housing and other construction projects, is not sufficient in the long run because it does not recognize the condition of persistent local unemployment. Other more acceptable alternatives and long term measures must be devised to deal with structural unemployment and localized unemployment.

Here is a person who has given a great deal of thought to this aspect of unemployment and these are his views.

What is needed is a systematic study of our economic regions which will form the basis for the national employment policy. To overcome this problem, the federal government must provide technical aid for regional areas and supplement a region-wide plan by means of grants and low interest loans, and by means of tax incentives to promote the location of industries in distressed areas. What we need to do is to return to the philosophy of the white paper on employment, as submitted to the house in 1945, which states, and I quote:

—that the dominion (government) will undertake its own deferred projects in those localities in which decline of war contracts or other circumstances have made available labour which can be included on such projects and for which the localities give promise of permanent employment.

It was this philosophy that enabled Canadians to demobilize with a minimum of dislocation and to generate a rate of growth from 1945 to 1957, which was the envy of every country in the world. That is not the condition in Canada today. I have already put on the record some of the statements made by persons in the common market countries. When they were told what to do by members of this government they replied, "You should be minding your own business and not telling us what to do, because your own economic situation is in a bad way".

Such a national employment policy as that which I have been attempting to lead up to would, of course, necessitate co-ordination. It would necessitate co-ordinated government activity at all levels. It should have as its first goal the upgrading of the skills of the unemployed in distressed areas so that they will be able to find alternative employment; second, to increase the number of jobs available in the distressed areas; third, to slow down or prevent the development of new areas of chronic unemployment.

I should like to put on the record now the steps which we on this side of the chamber or a Liberal administration would look to in order to eradicate unemployment in distressed areas.

The Deputy Chairman: Before the hon. gentleman proceeds, I must advise the committee that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to allowing the hon. gentleman to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The steps to which I refer are as follows:

1. Establishment of a national advisory board on economic development, automation and employment, that would work in co-ordination with local development agencies, co-ordinating their efforts and providing technical assistance at the local level.

2. Detailed economic regional development plans based on adequate research for each distressed area.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

3. Tax exemptions to encourage enterprise to locate in distressed areas.

4. Accelerated depreciation over the whole term of investment.

5. Special treatment of retained earnings that are specially needed in distressed areas.

6. Massive vocational and retraining programs to prepare people for jobs in the regional or national labour market, worked out in conjunction with provincial authorities so as not to infringe on provincial rights.

7. Supplementary unemployment benefits paid to those willing to undergo instructive training.

8. Federal assistance in the preparation of local development programs. Contributions towards urban renewal both for labour and capital costs to the end of restoring lands to effective commercial and industrial use in distressed areas.

9. Expansion of the terms of reference of the industrial development bank so as to supplement the regions' financial capacity, to seek effective action against unemployment.

10. Co-ordinate monetary and fiscal policy in order to promote the proper atmosphere for general growth in the economy, thus relieving the local incidence of unemployment and providing alternative sources of employment outside the region for those willing and able to move out of surplus labour areas.

The committee has been good enough to give its consent to allowing me extra time and I am not going to abuse the privilege. However, before I take my seat, I wish to say a word about some of the things to which the minister referred, but I shall do it briefly.

The minister referred at some length to the public works projects that were being put into effect by this government. He referred to the Columbia river project. The committee, of course, knows that no one has been employed because of this project, although the treaty between Canada and the United States was signed many months ago; and it was signed notwithstanding the fact that no assurance had been obtained from the provincial government involved, namely the government of British Columbia, that it would be willing to go along with the project.

The minister referred to the Pine Point railway. We have just this morning approved this project in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. We have the word of the minister that the survey will not be completed until the end of the year. Hence there is certainly no ground for making the statement that benefits will flow from this project at least before it gets started, and I doubt whether that will be prior to 1962.

Then the minister referred to the Beechwood project. This project was finished before the loan was given. How could it provide any jobs? I have dealt with three of the five projects to which the minister referred.

Then the minister had a great deal to say about the national productivity council. However, he did not say much about what the chairman of the national productivity council was saying. Does the government and the minister approve the statements and speeches made by Mr. De Young? Can the minister state whether or not be he approves of the pronouncements that have been made by the Mr. De Young? A moment ago he said the government had no control over the productivity council. However, the government also had no control over the Bank of Canada. The government also did not like the speeches made by the then governor of the Bank of Canada. Are we again in a position similar to that in which we were with reference to the government going one way with its economic policy and the Minister of Finance being dissatisfied with the other arm of government the Bank of Canada? Is that the position with reference to the minister and the national productivity council? I wish he had said more about that matter.

Then he spoke at some length about the winter works program. I put on the record a statement made by a professor from the University of Ottawa before the manpower committee of the Senate. The minister himself referred to it and I need not repeat what he said. As to the winter works program, however, let it not be forgotten by the committee that, although the government calls it its program, only one third of the funds are provided by the federal government. The rest of the funds come either from the municipalities or the provincial governments. Notwithstanding that fact, the figures I have been given are that this employed about 85,000 people, many of whom would have been put to work under any circumstances.

The minister went far afield of his department in dealing with other extraneous conditions and circumstances that have helped the position of employment in Canada. For instance, he told us about the anti-dumping legislation. How could the anti-dumping legislation enter into the matter, when it has never been used by the government, unless I am mistaken, except perhaps once or twice. Notwithstanding the fact that we protested against this legislation and were condemned for protesting against it, the very reasons we put forward for not passing it are some of the reasons the government is now using for not putting it into effect.

I have dealt with the national productivity council as briefly as I could. The minister spoke about trade. I do not want to get into an argument about what happened at Accra. I will keep away from that matter as there will be an opportunity to deal with it later.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not know about that. The Minister of Finance is not coming back until Christmas.

Mr. Pickersgill: He is having a second honeymoon.

Mr. Chevrier: However, let it not be forgotten that this government had the opportunity to assist in the promotion of jobs by accepting the free trade offer from the United Kingdom. However, it turned its back on that offer. To use an expression which the Minister of Finance likes to use in the house from time to time, the government ran away from this free trade offer just as fast as its legs could carry it. There is no doubt about that. Now the government is critical of the United Kingdom because it is about to make application to join the common market. I do not intend to talk about the tendency of this government toward protection, a tendency which certainly does not help employment. Proof of that can be found in the period of time which elapsed from 1930 to 1935. We do not want to go back to those conditions when we "blasted our country into the markets of the world". When we adopt that kind of language rather than attempt to make a deal with the tremendous potential market of the E.C.M. containing some 220 million people, we are certainly not acting in our best interests. I think the method which seems to have been adopted by the ministers, as well as by the government up till now does not seem to be one conducive to the promotion or expansion of jobs, but rather to the restriction of jobs.

All I need to say in conclusion is that I have attempted to deal with a specific aspect of this question, namely unemployment in distressed areas. I do not think—and I say this again to the minister with respect—that he has dealt effectively with this problem. I have tried also to put on record in Hansard some thoughts which I believe may be helpful. If we were to follow those suggestions I am hopeful that in the distressed areas—and there are far more of them in Canada than the minister would seem to indicate—a much larger dent in unemployment in Canada would be effected than is being made at the present time.

Mr. Winch: I believe nearly every member of this committee understands that I represent an urban constituency in the east of the city of Vancouver. I think I am safe in saying that almost 100 per cent of my riding is a working class residential area. It is therefore understandable that in this constituency of Vancouver East we have had a very serious problem arising from unemployment and it would be almost axiomatic that in rising to speak on this, the first item, of the estimates of the Minister of Labour, I should have an emphatic speech to make on unemployment, its cause and its cure. It is not my intention to do that. I may be criticized for this, but I do not believe in political expediency or in useless repetition. I believe that since the discussion opened on this item just about everything that could be said has been said with regard to the seriousness of unemployment, its causes and the means by which it might be cured. So why should I take up the time of this committee by repetition? I do not intend to do so.

My purpose in rising to speak on this item is to raise one question with regard to which I should like to have an answer from the Minister of Labour. The question is this: what attitude does the minister take toward the I.L.O.? The international labour organization is a body which in my view has been ignored by this government for far too long, as it has been by previous governments. As I am sure you know, Mr. Chairman, the international labour organization is the oldest of the major specialized agencies which function today as part of the United Nations family. I am sure that many of us forget that the organization came into being as far back as April, 1919, under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles. It was, and still is, a tripartite international agency. Its policy—a wonderful one—has been accepted, namely that there should be government, employer and worker representation from all parts of the world.

According to the last report in June of this year there were 100 nations in the organization. I do not think it is generally recognized that Canada was a founding member in April of 1919. Here we have on an international basis an organization whose policy and principles could with advantage be further advanced in the domestic field in Canada. I should like to hear from the minister his views on the international aspect of Canada's representation on the I.L.O. I shall put it this way: the international labour organization promotes the voluntary co-operation of industrial nations in an effort to improve labour conditions and to raise living standards. I think that the instrument through which the I.L.O. is making the greatest contribution to the welfare of the workers and the farmers of the world is through what is known as the international labour code. This code is based on what are termed conventions, and since the first meeting of the I.L.O. in 1919, 115 conventions have been passed. Canada, with government, industry and workers represented, has taken part in the passing in Geneva of those 115 conventions.

What is the purpose behind the I.L.O.? Hon. members will find it in the constitution of the organization. As stated in that constitution, the I.L.O. was founded on the fundamental tenet that universal and lasting peace could best be established only if it were based on social justice. I did not know until recently that the I.L.O. had a motto. Its motto is: Poverty anywhere is a danger to prosperity everywhere. Canada was a founding member of the international labour organization in 1919. I am informed that 115 conventions have been passed by the I.L.O. in Geneva since that date with Canada supporting most of them. However, out of that number Canada has ratified only 19, most of which deal with the welfare of seamen, their standards of food, etc. Canada's record is one of the poorest of all the states and nations that make up the I.L.O. I shall place on the record figures relating to the number of conventions ratified by other countries in order that hon. members of the committee may appreciate what a rotten record Canada has:

Country	No. of Conventions Ratified since 1919
Belgium	60
Italy	59
United Kingdom	58
Uruguay	57
Norway	52
New Zealand	41
Sweden	38
Canada	19

This is an important matter. I feel that we are entitled to ask the Minister of Labour what the position of the government is with respect to the I.L.O.

I received last week from the I.L.O. a chart dated June 1, 1961 outlining all the conventions adopted by the I.L.O. since 1919. In the four years during which the present minister has held office Canada ratified only one convention, No. 105. To what did it refer? The abolition of forced labour.

Mr. Chambers: Is the hon. member against that?

Mr. Winch: Of course we support the ratification of this convention. We have in Canada what I wish to describe for the purposes of these remarks as a constitutional, democratic, parliamentary federalism. Strict lines of demarcation are drawn between the jurisdiction of the federal and provincial governments and perhaps the minister will take refuge in that argument. However, I emphasize that it is a damnable disgrace that no action has been taken to improve Canada's record with respect to the ratification of I.L.O. conventions. We should be ashamed of our record; but, taking pride in the fact that we were a founding member in 1919, action should be taken to ratify, in the respective jurisdictions, the I.L.O. conventions which are of a constructive nature.

I do not think this matter has been raised in the chamber before and so, because the points I would have made concerning unemployment were all covered I chose not to repeat them but to bring this matter to the attention of the committee. I urge the minister and the government to take action to improve Canada's record with respect to the ratification of I.L.O. conventions so that if Canada is not at the top of the list it will at least be close to the top in terms of the number of conventions ratified.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) to ask the minister to tell us what he thinks about the Canadian government's attitude towards international labour agreements.

I believe that the hon. member for Vancouver East has raised a point which interests not only labour unions in this country, but also management, as well as every Canadian and especially all members of this house.

If some of the unemployed have read the speech of my hon. colleague from St. Mary (Mr. Valade), they must have derived much comfort from learning that they belong to the category of frictional, cyclic, seasonal or finally technical unemployment. It must be for them a cause of great satisfaction to know to what class of unemployed they belong.

As recorded on page 8628 of the Hansard of September 20, the hon. member for St. Mary had this to say while speaking about the responsibility for unemployment:

> In this respect, I should like to quote the statement made by the ephemeral leader, Hon. Jean Lesage, head of the Liberal party in Quebec.
>
> In the language I tried hard to learn, to quote someone means to repeat literally and faithfully what that person said. The hon. member for St. Mary however did give but a paraphrase of what the Hon. Mr. Lesage had said in the province, and if this is not true, I want the hon. member to call me to order.
> The Hon. Mr. Lesage never stated that unemployment was exclusively a provincial responsibility as far as Quebec is concerned. He said that the province of Quebec had also to assume some responsibility for the unemployment problem, since it concerns the citizens of that province.
> I think that by such a statement, the leader of the province, proved not only realistic but also courageous, since he repeated it after he had been elected to the position he now holds.
>
> If the hon. member for St. Mary has reported with as much accuracy the speech delivered by Mr. Hamel on television, I think it is not necessary to carry on a controversy with him on that matter.
>
> However, all I should like to add is that the government of the province of Quebec has already started taking action in that field.
>
> The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), on the other hand, has mentioned some action that has been taken since the election of the Liberal government in the province of Quebec.
>
> In the field of winter works only, I think, the government has done a lot and the province of Quebec comes first as far as federal government proposals are concerned. Incidentally, I would be dishonest if I failed to recognize that the winter works program initiated by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) means something to this country in the matter of employment. But, as my colleagues who spoke before me said, the program is not adequate and too many people still cannot earn a living in this country.
> The number of Quebec municipalities which submitted projects to the federal government in 1958-59 was 67; for the 1959-60 fiscal year, 93; for the 1960-61 fiscal year, 535.
> The projects approved by the federal administration in 1958-59 numbered 289; in the fiscal year 1959-60, 336 and in 1960-61, 2,027, out of a total of 7,095 for the ten provinces.
> The total expenditures involved by the various projects submitted by the provinces, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, as well as by the Indian reservations, amounted to $289,911,087, in the fiscal year 1960-61. The province of Quebec alone submitted projects amounting to approximately $125,732,715. I think that the province of Quebec has tried to do something, and that it has really taken concrete steps to alleviate the unemployment problem, in the quickest way possible; but immediate steps are not the only thing required to alleviate the unemployment problem. Since 1957, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and some others of my colleagues have been submitting to the house all kinds of projects designed to provide a long term solution to the unemployment problem.

I am not interested in knowing who is responsible for unemployment. I am interested in the fate of those who are jobless and want to work.

Whenever we make a suggestion implying long term legislation to the government, we are accused of never submitting anything realistic which might immediately relieve unemployment.

To quote only one instance, in Quebec—and the federal administration recently took similar action—we set up, as I said, an economic guidance council for the province. One of the principal aims of the council is to decentralize industries and to see to it that some are established in those communities which suffer more particularly from the blight of unemployment.

A start was also made on plans to set up a steel industry in Quebec. Indeed, an investment fund of $1 hundred million will be available to industrialists who want to establish such an industry in the province.

At this time, the prime minister of the province of Quebec is in Europe, where he very actively is trying to obtain capital with a view to setting up that industry.

Other suggestions were made by my colleagues and others, and I shall not linger on the subject.

Yet, before sitting down again, I want to reiterate a suggestion which I have frequently made in this house. I am sure that it has much merit, as it was made by the Prime Minister of my country (Mr. Diefenbaker), when he addressed the citizens of Canada in 1957. Indeed, in a talk at the Montreal chamber of commerce, on February 19, 1957, he said:

(Text):

Every encouragement must be given to the processing of domestic raw materials in Canada to a much greater degree than prevails, in order that our resources may be utilized to the maximum advantage of the Canadian people.

(Translation):

In the opening speech of his electoral campaign, in Toronto, on April 25, 1957, the Prime Minister made the following statement:

(Text):

We believe that the welfare of Canada demands the adoption of such a policy which will encourage more processing of Canada's resources in Canada.

(Translation):

This is what the Prime Minister said in Campbellton, New Brunswick, on May 4, 1957:

[Mr. Brassard (Lapointe).]

(Text):

If we are to build a country and provide jobs it cannot be done by exporting employment to the United States in the form of raw materials.

(Translation):

In the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of May 1, the Prime Minister is quoted as saying in New Glasgow, on April 30, 1957:

(Text):

If the majority of the 10 million tons of ore exported raw from Canada yearly were processed here it would help solve the problem of keeping Canadians at home.

(Translation):

Here is what he said in his own riding of Prince Albert, on May 27 of the same year, as reported in the Prince Albert Herald of May 28, 1957:

(Text):

Mr. Diefenbaker's point by point policy included "more processing of natural resources in Canada".

(Translation):

To quote a last statement made by the Prime Minister, here is what he said in Parry Sound, on May 10, 1957, as reported in a Canadian Press dispatch published in the daily Standard Freeholder of May 11:

(Text):

In his Parry Sound speech he (the Prime Minister) called for a firm stand on export of raw materials to the United States. A Conservative government would do its best to assure that a larger share of irreplaceable raw materials was processed in Canada "for the benefit of Canadians and to ensure employment".

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I agree that the establishment of industries like those is not possible overnight, but those statements were made more than four years ago by the Prime Minister and he then promised the nation that he would do something in that field. If, at least, he had established a committee and requested some experts to examine the possibilities and means to implement what he preached during his campaign. Even if that had not been implemented, I would say that at least he wanted to do something in that field, which he considers one of the most important of our economy, I mean the processing of raw materials in our country. In fact, the Prime Minister even stated that when we shipped our raw materials to the United States, we were exporting our labour force, when we had unemployed in this country.

If the Prime Minister was sincere when he made such a promise—and I do not doubt his sincerity—it is time that something be done in that field because the situation is very serious.

That is a long term measure which he could have caused to be examined, so that it could have been implemented at least four or five years after his coming to power.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, what is lacking in some government members, at the present time, is a deeper sense of responsibility towards the common weal of Canadian citizens.

I do not want to resume my seat without telling again the Minister of Labour that I am personally convinced that he made some efforts to correct the situation. But he should consult more with his cabinet colleagues and greater efforts should be made by the government as demanded by the hon. members for Laurier and Essex East (Messrs. Chevrier and Martin), and even the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman).

Mr. Chairman, everyone knows—and I said so unequivocally—that I am a bitter opponent of socialism, but I feel that western democratic governments must control unoccupied areas or sectors of our economy in order to strengthen it and to provide work for as many Canadians as possible.

It is not enough to speak highly of the democratic system. That system must prove that it is the best. Indeed, it would be useless for us to crow over the fact that it is the best, if too many Canadians had to wait till spring or summer in order to earn their livelihood and that of their families.

Mr. Morissette: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Lapointe allow me a question?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Certainly.

Mr. Morissette: The hon. member has argued at great length about the steps taken by the government of the province of Quebec in order to fight unemployment. I should like him to tell me why it is that, contrary to a tendency shown in the other nine provinces, the level of employment has gone down in the province of Quebec during 1961 as compared to 1960?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, unlike the reply that our friends usually make when they are being asked a question concerning the present administration, I shall not say that we have inherited it. I will say that we have, in the province of Quebec, a prime minister who has shown leadership by the measures he has taken. Most of them are long term measures and they will have a great effect on employment in the province of Quebec.

But what I find most funny with my Quebec friends who are in the house—

Mr. Morissette: Answer my question.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): —is the fact that for seven or eight years, the province of Quebec was under an oxygen tent. It has only been released from it a year ago, and some already want it to go running in the streets.

Mr. Morissette: You have not answered my question.

(Text):

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak for a few minutes about one aspect of conditions in Newfoundland which has a direct bearing on the minister's department. I refer to the almost complete failure of the codfishery in many parts of Newfoundland and Labrador during the past season. As the minister is very likely aware, in southern Labrador and the northeast coast of Newfoundland and other parts as well—I speak particularly of my own riding which I know best—the codfishery was almost a complete failure.

Last year the fishery was very poor but this year it was even worse and many fishermen will not have sufficient fish this year to qualify for fishermen's unemployment insurance. This second bad season has caused and is causing acute need in many communities. I wish the minister would consider the possibility of including some of these small fishing communities in his winter works program. I have in mind in particular a community stage building program similar to the one now about to be completed. I think the last community stage in the present program is being built at the present time.

I might add that such a program stands on its own merits as a worth-while contribution toward increasing the efficiency of the fishing industry but it would be doubly important if a community stage building program could be considered at this time in connection with the need for work. This in fact would mean a good program being put to an even better use.

I would ask the minister to consider immediately the advisability of another community stage program to be initiated as soon as possible so that the fishermen in these communities where community stages might be built will have the opportunity of working during the winter to procure the necessary materials. As you know, winter work in Newfoundland, particularly in the northern areas, means late fall or early spring work, but materials for community stages could be procured during the winter.

There is one other point I should like to mention, the desirability of making Newfoundland a separate region in so far as the administration of unemployment insurance is concerned. This matter has been mentioned before. When disputed claims have to be referred to Moncton it means further delay.

I should like to suggest that Newfoundland be made a separate region and that it should not be considered as merely a part of the larger Atlantic region. I should also like to suggest that Gander might be a central place from which such a region could be administered.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak in this debate. I think those who have been in the house since I have been a member know that I do not rise on many occasions. I do not seek newspaper headlines or rise merely to repeat many of the things that have already been said in a debate. I have listened carefully to the debate on these estimates and I should like to say that the interest shown by hon. members in this problem is no greater than my own. Any individual who tries to wear a particularly bright and shining halo around his head in expressing his concern about these matters is only trying to fool the public and seek publicity.

I think all members who have spoken in this debate have done so because of their serious concern and genuine interest. However, there were many inaccuracies in some of the speeches that were made and I can see only one reason for the continued repetition of these inaccuracies, namely, that there are certain members in the house whose interest in their political future is such that on every occasion they rise to speak they have to conduct a baby election campaign on a provincial or federal basis. I think that those who do these things are much less effective in their presentations to the house. Much has been said at times about interruptions but when some hon. members do these things I suggest that they invite interruptions. I am not given to interruption. I exploded once during the speech of the hon. member for Peterborough and I would apologize to him if I disrupted the tenor of his thought. I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members that I am credited with a couple of interruptions yesterday in this debate. They were not mine. I did not make them and I hope that the member who did will take the opportunity tomorrow to have them credited to himself.

I want to commend the Minister of Labour upon the realistic, proper and responsible manner in which he placed before the committee a factual report of the government program, after the many needles that had been thrust at him in a very polished manner. He gave us a statement of the results and the hopes for the future. He outlined these in a fashion that I think everyone should understand and I want to commend him for it. This was not done in a partisan manner and I believe hon. members of the house who know the minister, know his background and know his interest in this problem, know that his attitude is one of genuine concern and his method is that of co-operation.

The hon. member for Leeds made what I thought was, in many respects, an interesting speech. However, he made some remarks which I am afraid indicate that he has already become infected by the environment of these former cabinet ministers who will not accept the verdict of the Canadian people and realize that the policies they had, for which they claim such glory and greatness, were rejected by these people. The arguments placed before the committee by the hon. member for Leeds were less effective because of this fact.

The hon. member for Trinity raised a matter which bothers me a good deal. It lies on my heart in a heavy manner. I refer to the decision taken by the government, because of the world situation, to recruit for the army and the militia. These steps were taken with only one thought in mind, to provide for the survival of our way of life, our country and our people. The innuendo that this step was taken for the purpose of lessening the impact of unemployment this winter and so that the true unemployment picture would be covered up, is one for which I believe the hon. member should apologize. This suggestion was echoed by the hon. member for Leeds in his speech. I took down his words, and here is what he said: The government is expanding our army, and thank God; that will reduce unemployment. I just cannot understand any responsible citizen of this country, for any purpose whatever suggesting that the government took this step in order to cover up the true unemployment picture. I do not believe the Canadian public will think very much of hon. members who make such suggestions.

I have heard a great deal about the great 22 years of Liberalism and the greatness of those men, some of whom are sitting here now. The only happy warrior amongst them is the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. He is the only one sitting in this house who has said, "The people of Canada kicked us out and I will accept their verdict. I am an opposition man now, but I will be getting back over there some day." There are many hon. members who are unable to make a constructive speech. They introduce extraneous matters, such as provincial elections.

Mr. Chevrier: Your members are experts at bringing in provincial matters.

Mr. More: Some of our members do that perhaps, but I wish they would not follow the example of some of your members as often as they do. However, I do not intend to do so.

It would seem from the criticism that has been offered in the speeches made since the minister spoke that some members cannot appreciate the information he gave in a factual manner because hon. members have continued to use their narrow arguments purely for the benefit of their political parties.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We will be back in soon.

Mr. More: I say to the committee that as long as there is one person in this country who is unemployed and who really wants to work, I am concerned. I, too, would say to the government your measures have not done enough. I have had some very good experiences in this connection because I have lived in the one community for over 30 years. On occasion I have been in the position that caused people to come to me. I can recall one boy who came to me on many occasions seeking work. I checked his background, checked his employment picture and tried to help him. I tried to find out what his own efforts had been to find work. On the last occassion I saw him he had another young fellow with him. He introduced me to this young fellow, who was his cousin. I said, where are you from, and ascertained he came from a farm 120 miles from Regina. The boy with whom I had been dealing had been out of work for six months, but his cousin from the farm came into town and found a job within four days. The government cannot do everything. People who try to help cannot do everything. There must be within the individual a real desire and a real effort to find work.

The hon. member can correct me if I am wrong, but I think it was the hon. member for Laurier who said that at no time before 1957 had the unemployment average in Canada been greater than 3 per cent. On page 59 of the French version of the Senate committee report on manpower I notice that in 1950 it was 3.6 per cent; in 1954, 4.6 per cent and in 1955, 4.4 per cent. Those are figures taken from this report. I wanted to make this correction because this is one of those inaccuracies which has been repeated and repeated and I felt I must correct it.

However, I do not believe it has much to do with the problem. We know we have unemployment today. We all want to solve the problem. I want to commend the government for the action they have taken. I believe that towards the end of the remarks of the hon. member for Peterborough, if I understood him correctly, he said that the government planned in the long term. I agree with that. I say to him that some of the measures the government has adopted are long term measures. We heard a remark to the effect that as soon as we removed the tax on automobiles, the Ontario Conservative government imposed a 3 per cent tax. Well, I have lived under your socialist policies, I have lived under your great authoritarian planning and I recall that over 20 years ago the Liberals imposed a sales tax. Your party, who are so honest and keep all their promises, said they would remove this iniquitous tax completely. They took office, but they did not take any action. Then, another election came along and they reduced the tax by 1 per cent, saying that as soon as other sources of revenue were available they would abolish it.

The year before this government took office the province had an income from federal sources, grants and so on of $34 million. Last year this income amounted to some $76 million, but we have not had any reduction in taxation, not a nickel. Before they got the 50-50 deal for hospitalization—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I take advantage of the pause on the part of the hon. member in order to remind him that we are on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Labour. He seems to be straying a little bit away from that topic.

Mr. More: Many of the other members who preceded me in speaking also strayed from the topic. I am only answering, in the only way in which I can do so, some of the arguments they advanced. I say that we have had over 20 years of socialist rule in Saskatchewan. Those people or that little group of them with all the brains in the country, want to sit in a room and tell you, me and everyone else in the country what we should do. They should look at what is happening in Saskatchewan and find out how futile it is. Democratic free people do not want that sort of planning done for them. In a democracy the people want an opportunity to exercise their skill and to get the benefit for so doing and to expand the economy. That sort of planning does not do it.

We are supposed to have had Utopia in Saskatchewan for almost a quarter of a century, or it is getting on to that length of time. It will not reach that stage, however, because the next election will fix the situation. Nevertheless we have the lowest rate of growth in Canada. Our population has never got back to the figure at which it stood when the socialists came into power. Our people are still going to places where they do not have all these great benefits of these fine planners.

They find it better to go there. Perhaps at the moment they are not well off but they have opportunity. I do not want to see this thing happen at the federal level as then we would really have stagnation of the economy.

An hon. Member: A planned economy.

Mr. More: It has been said that we ran away from the free trade offer at the conference. That reference was made by someone. I do not know whether or not he is a free trader. When he is out west he is quite a free trader and at times I have had occasion to hear him expound his views. But when he is down east and when he is in this House of Commons and is trying to make sure that he comes back here again, it seems to me that he is anything but a free trader inasmuch as he would bar from coming into Canada every foreign automobile that some of our people like to buy and to drive, thereby providing money so that we can have two-way trade.

I heard remarks made about this government's seeking to have more material processed in Canada; I refer to raw material. Yet every time they take some action that would assist in the matter, they are accused of having a high tariff policy.

I think I have said enough. I just say, in closing, that I have not had to speak in the house in order to put my views before a government whose concern is second to none—it is certainly as great as that of any group in this House of Commons—and whose actions indicate that they work closely together, that the program of each department is concentrated and coagulated in order to gain results—

An hon. Member: Coagulated?

Mr. More: The hon. member can pick me up if I use some wrong words. However, I think hon. members know what I mean. I did not prepare a speech and come here with a great deal of material. I am speaking as I feel. When, because he is frustrated and is sitting where he does not want to sit at the moment because of the judgment of the Canadian people, anyone tries to destroy, by insinuations and inaccuracies, the Prime Minister and members of the cabinet, may I say to that person that the next time the people have an opportunity to express themselves by their vote, he will find out that such a policy is futile.

I look forward to the government expanding its projects. I know they are digging fully and completely into these matters and are expanding their projects with a view to reducing this problem. I would not say that I would be complacent, satisfied and happy when the figure reaches 3 per cent, by diligently seeking and looking for improvements, we can reduce it below that figure. The unemployment problem will never be gone, however because there are people who are not built in such a way that they want to work steadily. There are people who would like to relax at the expense of the taxpayers. We shall always have them. However, the lower we can get the figure of those that are unemployed, the happier we should all be, whether or not it redounds to our benefit politically.

Mr. Herridge: I am sure the committee listened with great interest to the speech of the handsome, well-fed and well groomed member for Regina who has had to live under a C.C.F. government for something over 16 years. From the tenor of his speech I presume it is his valedictory address in the House of Commons.

Mr. Jones: He is not quite as well fed as is Clarence Fines.

Mr. Herridge: His approach to the problem of unemployment on the estimates under discussion was somewhat different from that which has prevailed in this debate today. I thought it struck a rather depressing note when dealing with a serious question which we should approach in a non partisan spirit although we may differ in our suggestions as to objectives and proposals.

I listened with great interest to the minister's outline of the government's actions to date and its efforts to meet the unemployment situation. However I must say this. While we welcome and support all the efforts that this or any other government has made to meet this serious problem which confronts members of this House of Commons and a great number of Canadians, I think it is quite fair to say that the minister painted a somewhat rosy picture. In the first instance, we all know that the federal government pays only one-third of the cost of the winter works program. Therefore they must not take credit for more than one third of the expenditure in that connection. In the second place, the government shares with provincial governments the cost of a good many other projects. That is all to the good. Then he mentioned the Pine Point railway. We all know that, if the surveys are not now completed, with winter coming on it is not likely that there will be any employment on that railroad, owing to the geographical location of the road, until some time early next summer.

Then I was rather interested to hear him mention the Columbia river project as a possibility of providing employment. May I say this. In my opinion to mention the Columbia river project is to treat a vision as a reality.

However, that procedure has become rather a habit in these later days in this house.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Herridge: I am not criticizing the minister as an individual. I am speaking through you, Mr. Chairman, to the minister.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He is a victim.

Mr. Herridge: He is a victim of the system under which we live. He is Minister of Labour in a capitalist society. I speak to him as a member of the working class, expounding their views.

Some hon. Members: Oh, Oh.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Herridge: It is six o'clock, Mr. Chairman. Some hon. members are rather anxious for me to conclude.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Herridge: In order to facilitate the passage of the estimates I will say on some other item the few things I had intended to say on this one. I do not intend to be long. I do not want to hold up the estimates. However I have one or two gems of wisdom I wish to bring to the minister's attention.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 178 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Item agreed to.

179. Economics and research branch including research grants and related expenses, $821,935.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 179 carry?

Mr. Herridge: No. It is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I note that in vote 179 there is an increase of $82,008 provided for the economics and research branch this year. I believe there was considerable discussion last year when this item came up. Questions were put to the minister with regard to the kind of reports which are made to him from time to time, estimates for quarter periods ahead or even for 12 month periods ahead, the idea being that as a result of these assessments one might be able to draw some conclusion as to what could be expected in the way of growth of employment or a further increase in unemployment.

We are, naturally, all interested in the unemployment figures as well as in the employment figures. The advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission has indicated that it believes that in the 1961-62 period there will be unemployment comparable to that which we experienced last winter. Of course, this would be unfortunate and it would have serious economic and social consequences. We all hope this will not be the case. But in the light of the vote provided here, the minister ought to be served with these prognostications as to future levels of manpower and employment.

I think the economics and research branch formerly presided over by the distinguished deputy minister ought to be in a position to inform the committee what we may expect for the next ten or 12 months. I should like to know what the anticipations are for the period until the end of December and for the period from January to, let us say, the middle of June. I have a suspicion that the branch devotes much of its activity to manpower studies. If that is the case the minister should be in a position to give some assessment from the information supplied to him as to the probabilities of employment in the immediate future.

We do know that in the Department of Trade and Commerce in other years a confidential and private economic survey was prepared from which the government could draw conclusions in this regard. We also know that the Bank of Canada prepares summaries, half yearly, I think, as well as yearly. It would be interesting to know, particularly in the light of last year's discussion, what the minister has available in this regard. I made the statement yesterday that the practice has been to issue quarterly statements. This was certainly the practice when I was familiar with the department. These statements were, of course, privileged. They were the minister's prerogative and the hon. gentleman may so regard them now. If that is the case, perhaps within those limits, the minister could, nevertheless, give the committee some indication of what he anticipates would be the employment situation in Canada in the next ten or 12 months.

Mr. Starr: The hon. gentleman answered his own question at the end of what he had to say with respect to the reports. He has had experience as parliamentary assistant to the minister of labour and he must certainly know that these reports are available to the minister. They are compiled by the economics branch from whatever information the branch is able to gather. They make guesses as to what may happen in the immediate future, and only in the immediate future. These reports are, naturally, available to the minister but, as the hon. gentleman himself pointed out, they are confidential. They have remained confidential and are so at the present time.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, you will permit me to say a word about the international labour organization. The hon. member for Vancouver East asked certain questions with respect to the ratification of the conventions which have been adopted by the organization since its inception in 1919. Although that was raised under the first item may I be permitted at this stage to give the information to the hon. member for Vancouver East. I personally look upon the I.L.O. as an important organization. The fact that it has a membership of some 100 countries lends credence to the fact that it is highly regarded by practically all countries in the world.

The Department of Labour has a special section that devotes its time to the functions and activities of the I.L.O. Although it is a matter of regret to me, I personally have not had the opportunity of attending as many of these sessions as I should have liked. My only opportunity was in 1958 at which time I appreciated very much the opportunity to learn of the work of the I.L.O. during my visit. During that short period I observed that the Canadian representatives of workers and employers were treated with great respect. Many of our representatives serve as chairmen of committees and in other responsible positions in the work of the I.L.O. This pleases me very much and I take pride in the fact that the contribution of Canadians is recognized in this way.

Without casting a reflection on the hon. member for Vancouver East may I say in passing that I think he was one who criticized me for being absent from the house at the time of my visit and I have not visited again since then.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry to interrupt but I challenge the minister to produce from the records a statement attributed to me in which I criticized the minister for being absent on official business.

Mr. Thrasher: Read Hansard.

Mr. Starr: I believe I returned on the evening of the same day the hon. member questioned my whereabouts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I remember an occasion when the minister was precluded from attending because his estimates were not completed.

Mr. Starr: Due in part to the efforts of the hon. member for Essex East I was precluded from attending the 1959 session.

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Benidickson: Unemployment levels were very high at that time.

Mr. Starr: I regard the work of the house as being of primary importance, coming before all else. Since its inception the I.L.O. has adopted 115 conventions. I am not too familiar with what happened in the past with respect to the ratification by Canada of these various conventions but since 1957 11 conventions have been adopted by the I.L.O. Conventions Nos. 108, 109, 112, 113 and 114 were adopted in 1958 and 1959. In the main they related to the maritimes and fisheries. Consultations with respect to these five conventions are now being considered by this department and the departments of transport and fisheries with respect to the possibility of ratifying all or some of them. No decision has yet been arrived at and the five conventions are still in process of study.

Mr. Winch: Only one has been ratified since the minister took office.

Mr. Starr: In 1958 we ratified a convention adopted in 1957 with respect to the abolition of forced labour. Convention No. 106 having to do with weekly rest in commerce and offices, No. 107 concerning indigenous and tribal populations, No. 111 concerning discrimination and No. 115 relating to radiation protection, lead us into jurisdictional difficulties. Under our federal system we encounter a snag because these conventions relate to fields which partly come under provincial jurisdiction and thus, under our system, the federal government is prevented from ratifying them.

Mr. Winch: May I ask what steps are being taken to reach an understanding on the matter with the provinces?

Mr. Starr: This is one area where an attempt could be made to rectify the situation through consultation with the provinces and perhaps we could look into this matter.

Mr. Winch: Is the department doing so?

Mr. Starr: I said that we could explore the possibility of achieving some understanding with the provinces in determining whether they would be agreeable to the ratification of these conventions.

Convention No. 110 has to do with the employment of plantation workers and is not applicable in Canada. I feel there is no sense in ratifying a convention that does not apply here.

We are awaiting a legal opinion from the Minister of Justice with respect to convention No. 116 concerning the partial revision of the conventions adopted by the general conference of I.L.O. in 1961.

Mr. Winch: Is that an important convention?

Mr. Starr: We in the department look upon all the conventions as important because we regard the work of I.L.O. as important. If we do not agree that they are important we feel the time to say so is when they are being adopted. Canada has played an important part in many of these conventions, whether or not they are applicable to Canada.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, in my opinion this is one of the most important items that comes under the jurisdiction of the minister and so I should like to make some comments and ask some questions at this point. In my view we desperately need concentration on the entire problem of job training and should look for changing patterns of employment for the next 20 or 30 years. I hope to obtain some information in this regard under this item.

In support of my contention I wish to quote from the report of the special committee of the Senate on manpower and employment. At page 7 we find this statement:

> It is essential that we keep the closest watch on changing patterns of employment, on the requirements for the various skills, on developments in foreign and domestic markets, on the effects of technological change, on the implications of changing levels of investment and changing patterns of government expenditure, on the impact of population growth, changing rates of family formation, and changing levels of immigration.

I realize that many of these areas of activity do not come within the purview of this branch of the department but certainly some of them do. The report goes on to say:

> More specifically, steps should be taken immediately to initiate a continuous and comprehensive program designed to provide periodic analyses and forecasts of the size and composition of the labour force and the demand for workers in different industries, areas, occupations, and with different skills.

I note with some consternation that there are only five economists in the employ of this branch. This is a nation of some 18 million people with a labour force of several million persons. I am led to wonder if sufficient research is being conducted in the branch. I am aware that the people dealing with vocational training were very much concerned about the courses that were being set up. They want to know whether there is any point in training a welder. What will the employment opportunities be in five, six or 10 years from now? Is there any point in training a certain kind of pipefitter? Will this particular job disappear? I realize that in a sense this has all the appearance of star gazing and crystal ball gazing as well. Surely we have some bases on which we can operate. Surely we can send questionnaires to employers and industrialists who to some extent know what the pattern of industry is going to be.

It seems to me that economists in the department might well spend their time looking at tables in the Labour Gazette and writing a few speeches and preparing reports to which the hon. member for Essex East has referred. I should like to know whether there are any long range research projects going on in the department having to do with this particular area and seeking out the labour problems over the next 10 to 20 years. If so, to what extent are they being carried out?

Mr. Starr: The hon. member for Peterborough quoted from page 7 of the report on manpower and employment. If he had looked at the paragraph immediately preceding the one he quoted he would have seen that the committee said:

> The committee is impressed with the work being carried out in various branches of the federal government.

This of course included the Department of Labour, because the economics and research branch of the Department of Labour made a number of comprehensive submissions to this committee which helped it a great deal in the study it was carrying on.

As far as the recommendations in paragraph 2 are concerned, to which the hon. member has drawn our attention, I can assure him that we are going to do everything possible to live up to the request that has been made in this recommendation.

Mr. Pitman: I am glad to hear that. Is any research project being carried out right now to try to give the employment picture of the future? I have in mind those who are setting up vocational courses for the unemployed in the various municipalities. Is there any possibility of carrying on these studies within the research branch? This is a question which I have thrown at me quite often by those who are operating in this area.

Mr. Starr: They are making this study continually, Mr. Chairman. In the particular field mentioned by the hon. member it would be of some help to those people who are engaged in the training if they knew what type of course they should undertake, and so forth. They can get all the help they possibly need and all the information they require as to the requirements of the labour force for certain skilled workers from our national employment service which has an up to date record in each and every district and area.

Item agreed to.

182. Industrial relations activities including the administration of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, the Female Employees Equal Pay Act, the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, the Annual Vacations Act, and regulations, and the promotion of labour-management co-operation, $643,798.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but my recollection is that in the speech from the throne two years ago, or some time since then, information was given of the government's intention to bring in amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. Certainly if that is not so, the minister did during the course of the present parliament indicate the government's intention to bring forward other amendments to the act or a substitution therefor. We have not heard anything more about this intention. It seems to have suffered the fate of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act and other well expressed intentions of this government such as providing a system of contributory pensions based on the United States experience. There is such a gap between good intention and realization that the minister will not mind if I inquire tonight what has happened to the proposed amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act?

Mr. Starr: My nature is tenacious and I like to finish whatever I am trying to do, in the best way I can possibly do so. My intentions with respect to this matter were certainly sincere and I asked labour and management to submit their recommendations and ideas as to what type of amendment should be made to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. This was done in 1958. It took quite some time before the various organizations, labour, industry, industrial organizations and business organizations were able to submit their suggestions. I will be quite frank with the hon. gentleman. I do not know what other course the hon. gentleman would have followed, but I found that management did offer many drastic suggestions affecting labour. On the other hand, labour had very few suggestions. They felt well satisfied with the present act. Under those circumstances I felt that since I did not have a balanced number of suggestions, one offsetting the other, I would not proceed with any changes in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act because one segment of the people who are affected by this act seem to be quite satisfied with the act as it stands now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister's statement is an interesting one. I do not suppose there has ever been a finer tribute paid to the perspicacity and the vision of Mr. Mackenzie King than the statement we have just had from the Minister of Labour. Mr. King was the first Canadian deputy minister of labour and then minister of labour. He played a significant role in labour-management relations. He was the author of this act. That it has withstood the chill blasts of cold winters subsequent to its introduction, is I think an effective and deserving tribute to a man who played such a great part in our national life.

Mr. Starr: May I just make a comment in answer to that. Those amendments are still under consideration and the time may arrive when we might amend this act. In view of what the hon. member said, namely that a great deal of credit must go to Mr. King, I must remind the hon. member that the original act has been amended many times so that it is in its perfect form now.

Mr. Pickersgill: By a Liberal government. I should like to ask the minister a speculative question on this subject. The minister said he was still considering the possibilities of certain amendments. Does the minister think he is apt in this slow motion race to reach the post before the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration does with the famous revisions of the Immigration Act?

Mr. Starr: I realize the humour that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is endowed with and that he must display it at times; otherwise he might burst at the seams. I have given the reasons why. It is not on account of lack of activity on my part but because of the legitimate reasons I have given, and I was quite frank about them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am glad the minister recognizes that there is a difference between the legitimate reasons he has given and the reasons his colleagues give.

Mr. Starr: I do not make that comparison at all.

Mr. Winch: I should like to say one word. May I perhaps be so impudent or imprudent as to say that Mackenzie King and R. B. Bennett have been dead for a long while and all honour to their names, but let us now discuss and decide the problems of Canada in the light of conditions in 1961.

Mr. Benidickson: I feel sure that the government in its planning, although we have heard little about it since last December, had in mind some connection between the Department of Labour and the productivity council. When we are considering vote No. 182 having to do with fair wages, hours of labour and so on, I would think that there is a relationship, and perhaps the minister might tell us what is happening with respect to the productivity council which was talked about last December.

Mr. Starr: I said this afternoon that the productivity council will be meeting on Monday and Tuesday, September 25 and 26, to discuss subjects related to the matter which the hon. member has brought up.

Mr. Benidickson: Which would include hours of work.

Mr. Starr: Labour-management co-operation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce be back to meet the productivity council?

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, I recognize that what I wish to say is essentially related to the national employment service but I feel the matter is also of particular concern in connection with the progress that has been made in Canada under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and other labour legislation. I have reference to the possibility of employers using the national employment service to break strikes. An employer goes to the national employment service to get persons whom he wishes to employ in place of those who are on strike. The minister is quite right that the form which the prospective employee receives has the notation stamped on it that he is going to a strikebound plant or to a hotel such as the Royal York, but when a person has been unemployed for many months it is very hard for him to put the labour situation in Canada ahead of the welfare of his own family.

I think this has become a very dangerous precedent and a strikebreaking technique which has all kinds of implications. In my view the whole idea of a strike is that both sides suffer. The employer suffers through not being able to make a profit and the employee suffers through not having his wages. I think the unfortunate practice to which I have just referred has been aggravated as a result of the great unemployment in the last year. I should like to know whether the minister does not feel that some method should be devised whereby a plant where the workers are on strike could be considered as being out of bounds and isolated from normal labour procedures so that the national employment service would not be put in the position of sending people to a strikebound plant to the detriment of the striking employees. I would hope the minister might consider that as a possibility.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member realizes, I am sure, as he has admitted, that the national employment service has been set up to serve the public of Canada and that includes employers and employees. We cannot take sides in these matters. The service has to perform the function for which it was established. If an employer presents an order for a number of men, we do not question the fact that his plant may be strikebound, but in referring men we tell them that we have an order for so many men for a strikebound plant, that a strike is now in progress and that it is entirely up to them to decide whether they want to be referred to the job in question. In addition, the fact that there is a strike in progress is noted on the referral slip. If the person is on unemployment insurance and drawing benefits and refuses to go, he is not penalized. We remain neutral in this situation. If the person refuses to go to the job he can still draw his unemployment insurance benefits whereas if he is referred to a job falling within the classification in which he is listed in a plant which is not strikebound and refuses to go he is disqualified so far as benefits are concerned.

Item agreed to.

183. Civilian rehabilitation branch including payments to the provinces to implement a program for the rehabilitation of disabled persons, in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, $270,655.

Mr. Benidickson: To what extent, if at all, is the department involved with the provinces in rehabilitation that might be necessary as a result of injury in a nuclear war? Is the labour department negotiating with the provinces with respect to rehabilitation that might be made necessary by reason of a nuclear war?

Mr. Starr: As the committee knows, parliament approved and passed a bill consolidating the work in the field of rehabilitation of civilians. Until that time we only participated with the provinces and other agencies through agreements. Now we have a bill under which agreements are being negotiated with the various provinces. Only last week the deputy ministers of the various departments interested in civilian rehabilitation attended a conference in Ottawa in order to discuss the terms of the proposed agreements. The act has not yet been proclaimed. Nevertheless, we see no obstacles in the way of agreements being signed shortly so that the whole plan will become effective as of April 1, 1962.

Item agreed to.

Special services—

184. Special services branch including the promotion of a program for combatting seasonal unemployment, the organization and use of workers for farming and related industries and assistance to the provinces under agreements entered into with the provinces by the Minister of Labour with the approval of the governor in council, $498,860.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon we heard speeches about the assistance given to the province of Quebec in order to help remedy the situation as far as unemployment is concerned. Would it be possible for the minister to give us a breakdown under this vote which is for the promotion of a program to combat seasonal unemployment, the organization and use of workers for farming and related industries and assistance to the provinces under agreements entered into with the provinces by the Minister of Labour with the approval of the governor in council? Would it be possible for the minister to give us all the schemes that come under this vote and the amount of money paid by the federal government to the province of Quebec since the inception of every scheme included in the vote?

In order to make some kind of comparison would it be possible to have a table which would also show the money paid to the province of Ontario? I suppose that unemployment assistance and seasonal unemployment come under this vote. Some schemes were started two years ago and others three years ago, and I think it would be very interesting to the committee and also to the Canadian people to know how much money the federal government has provided in order to help the seasonally unemployed or those who cannot receive unemployment insurance benefits. We would be interested in knowing the total amount of money provided by the federal government for these schemes under agreements with the provinces. I suppose the cost is divided 50-50. If I am wrong, the minister will correct me, but I take it that the provinces supply 50 per cent of the money and the federal government pays 50 per cent. Is it possible for the minister to give us a breakdown of the amount of money given by the federal government to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec since the inception of the scheme?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, there are no agreements with the provinces in respect of this particular vote. This vote provides for the continuation of the publicity program to assist in the promotion of employment in Canada during the winter months. This is done through the newspapers, the radio, films and other media of publicity. The purpose is to bring to the attention of the people the "Do it now" program with which I think the hon. member is acquainted. Some of the provinces have participated in this scheme at their own expense and much in the same way as we do. Private enterprise is doing the same thing across Canada. This is all the vote provides for. There are no agreements with any of the provinces because it is strictly a publicity program.

Mr. Denis: Does the government give money directly to the provinces in order to have this promotional work done?

Mr. Starr: No, we undertake this publicity on our own.

Item agreed to.

Technical and vocational training assistance—

185. Administration, $146,905.

Mr. McGrath: I wonder if the minister could indicate to the committee, under this vote, what projects have been submitted by the government of Newfoundland for the technical and vocational training assistance for approval, and what projects have been approved as well as those projects which are currently under consideration?

Mr. Starr: In Newfoundland the following projects, Mr. Chairman, have been approved: Burin district vocational trade school; Corner Brook vocational trade school; Gander district vocational trade school; Grand Falls district vocational trade school; St. John's college of trade and technical training; Itinerant fishing school district.

Mr. McGrath: Could the minister give the total cost of this program and what projects, if any, are still under consideration?

Mr. Starr: The total cost of the projects approved in Newfoundland under this program, $12,081,591, and the federal share of that is $9,060,093. I know the province of Newfoundland is contemplating other schools but they have not submitted their plans or specifications for approval, consequently I am unable to give any details.

Mr. Benidickson: I should like to ask the minister if this is the vote under which the minister approved a co-operative grant with the province of Ontario for the vocational training enlargement at Fort Frances, Ontario?

Mr. Starr: Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the minister for his approval of that scheme.

Mr. Rogers: I wonder if the minister would give the same information for Alberta as he did for Newfoundland?

Mr. Starr: Projects approved in Alberta, Mr. Chairman, are, in Calgary, the southern Alberta institute of technology, $1,176,338.80, of which the federal share is $882,254.10; in Edmonton, the C.V.T. commercial school at an estimated cost of $1,920, of which the federal share is $1,440; in Edmonton again, the northern Alberta institute of technology, $11,791,800 of which the federal share is $8,843,850; in Edmonton, vocational school, $2,300,000, the federal share is $1,552,500. In Lethbridge, there is the junior collegiate and vocational school, $590,000, and the federal share is $398,250. In Red Deer, there is the vocational high school at an estimated cost of $1,365,000, and the federal share is $921,375.

Item agreed to.

186. To carry out the purposes of the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act and agreements made thereunder, including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, to make commitments for the current fiscal year not to exceed a total of $27,108,700—payments to the provinces, $26,600,000.

Mr. Pitman: This particular vote, I think, is of a great deal of importance. It is one of the most important items put forward by the Minister of Labour, but one which I am afraid has caused a great deal of consternation in many parts of this country. It involves, as well as the building of technical institutes and so on, the training of the unemployed. I cannot help but feel that this plan has been less than successful over the last number of months. It seems there has been no pattern set up whereby the local municipality really has any sense of confidence in what it is doing.

On June 9, I asked the Department of Labour just how many municipalities in Ontario had instituted programs for the training of unemployed persons under schedule M. I was informed that only five in the whole of Ontario had done so since April 1, 1961, namely, Brantford, Cornwall, Toronto, St. Catharines and Windsor. When one looks at the courses that are given in each of these centres, one cannot but notice the absence of any kind of pattern. Perhaps this is what I was trying to get at when I was referring to the department of research. I do not feel these people on the local level really know what jobs are going to be available in the future and therefore they are rather reticent about dealing with the problem. The hon. member for Essex East brought up the whole problem of academic training which must go along with this.

The municipality which I represent made a magnificent effort to retrain the unemployed, but this problem came up again and again. Another problem which arose, of course, was that of getting the unemployed into these courses. It seems to me that after the last war we developed a very worth-while system intended to help the veteran find the slot in which he could be placed after he was taken out of the service. I am not sure but what the Department of Veterans Affairs could be of great use in this particular area. It seems to me that surely there could be some counselling service in the national employment office in these municipalities to bring about this kind of program. In Peterborough, they sent out questionnaires to all the unemployed, but then they faced the problem of getting the questionnaires back. The unemployed person has no knowledge of his abilities or the direction in which he should be going. You have, therefore, as many courses as you have people asking for them.

I realize that to a large extent this is a provincial problem but I feel that perhaps the federal government needs to take more responsibility by giving some aid to the municipality which is trying to provide this kind of retraining. One of the questions which I should like to ask is, have municipalities within all the provinces set up retraining schemes for the unemployed since the schedule came into effect in April, 1961?

Mr. Starr: The hon. member said that this problem lies within provincial jurisdiction, and it is one which is more jealously guarded by the provinces than any other. Consequently, it is not our intention to move in on this jurisdiction in any way whatever. All we are trying to do is to help the provinces advance an area of education for the training of certain types of people for whom we feel there is a need in Canada. We have agreements with all the provinces, the whole ten, in respect of this matter.

As an incentive to undertake these courses we raised these contributions from 50 per cent to 75 per cent of the total cost. That includes equipment that is necessary for these courses. This is as far as we go with respect to the direction. There is no direction from us at all. We extend help to these local people—boards of education or whoever they may be—who might be setting up these courses; and in guiding people as to the type of courses through our national employment service offices. That is where the employers put in their orders and that is where they are able to say, "In this area we can place immediately 12 welders", or five barbers, or three hairdressers, or whatever it may be. There is no sense in training people if there is no call for that type of trade in that area. If there is a call in another area, then we will most certainly direct them to that job after the training course is over.

I do not want to take up the time of the committee to explain this. However, last fall we were advised by the pipe line contractors that they had plans for the construction of many miles of gas lines in the province of Alberta, that this work would require specialized welders in this field and that we did not have that type of skill here in Canada in sufficient numbers to fill these jobs. We immediately contacted the three prairie provinces and with their co-operation and that of the pipe line contractors who supplied the equipment, we were able to train sufficient specialized welders to fill the needs of these pipe line contractors for this year. Consequently, this is planning not in the socialistic way as the hon. member would have it instituted in Canada but it is planning to take care of situations. This is what we are doing and this is what we have done with good results.

Mr. Pascoe: Under this item I should like to commend the minister and the government for what is being done in technical and vocational training assistance. This financial assistance can very readily be seen in the details of payments to the provinces as listed at pages 264 and 265 of the blue book. I will just read two or three of the items:

Assistance to trade and vocational schools, technical institutes, and technical and vocational high schools: Capital assistance, $14,775,000.

Assistance towards operational costs of trade and vocational schools and technical institutes, $3,125,000.

Assistance towards operational costs of technical and vocational high schools, $1,965,000.

Under the heading of "Assistance for Training Programs" we find the following:

Training for unemployed workers, $4,000,000.

That is under schedule M which was referred to a while ago.

I think this indicates very well how much the federal government is paying towards the technical institutes. In the terms of the technical and vocational training assistance bill that was passed earlier this session, the federal government pays 75 per cent of the capital costs of these technical institutes and also of the equipment needed in these institutes. This is a very generous federal offer. As has been pointed out, it is inspired by Ottawa's conviction that much of our unemployment results from lack of training for many in Canada's labour force.

The city of Moose Jaw in my constituency has a fine technical institute built with federal financial assistance. The Minister of Labour was the guest speaker out there in January at the official opening of the institute. He was invited in recognition of the big part the federal government played in making the institute possible. The minister made a tour of inspection of the building. He knows that it was planned to accommodate technical and vocational classes until 1965 at least. He will be interested to know that the institute is already being used to capacity. In fact, it might now almost be described as being overcrowded. I have here figures in regard to training for schedule M, the special winter training for the unemployed. It indicates that more are being enrolled now than it had been anticipated would be taking these classes, in 1965. On the grounds on which the institute is built there is room to double the size of the building. I suggest that this expansion should be undertaken as soon as possible, by next year at the very latest.

In his statement in the house last December the minister said that the success of any vocational or training program depends upon the supply of qualified instructors. I am sure that all in this committee will agree with this statement. The Moose Jaw institute has qualified instructors. What the institute needs is greater space for classrooms and workshops. I am drawing this matter to the minister's attention, although I know the initiative with regard to expansion must come from the provincial government in Regina. The Saskatchewan government has indicated that it is considering enlarging the Moose Jaw institute. I hope the minister will encourage the provincial government to undertake this needed expansion as soon as possible.

Mr. Denis: May I ask the minister whether he will be good enough to give us a breakdown by provinces of the money spent under this item during the last five years. At the same time I should like to know under what item we would get information with regard to the winter works program and unemployment assistance. In 1960 I asked in the house a question about the winter works program and I was answered by the Department of Labour. I later asked some questions about unemployment assistance and the answer came back from the Department of Labour. I have been looking everywhere in these estimates but I do not find anything that relates to this winter works program or to unemployment assistance. I should be greatly interested in knowing the amounts paid to each province during the last five years so that we could get a clear picture of how much money has been given away by the government to each province, in order to prove that since 1960 when the Liberal regime came into power in Quebec, they did much more to help with the problem of unemployment in the province of Quebec than did the previous government which declared that unemployment was not any part of its responsibility. The new regime in Quebec decided that it was a responsibility not only of the federal government and of the provincial government but of the municipal governments and of every person who wants to see his neighbour have some work in Canada.

Mr. Starr: I cannot read all these figures but I shall be glad to table them for the information of the hon. member. They go back to 1957. These tables give the capital and operating costs for each province for vocational training.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister leave to table the statistical table which he has just produced?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is understood that these tables will be printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: That has been the usual practice.

The Deputy Chairman: I would ask the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to reflect upon the amount of statistical material that is here.

Mr. Pickersgill: This has been done over and over again, Mr. Chairman. I can assure you there is no precedent created here.

Mr. Starr: I have no objection.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give its unanimous consent to the printing of these tables.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The tables above referred to are as follows:]

Mr. Badanai: During my remarks on the first item yesterday I endeavoured to point out the deplorable condition of the unemployment insurance office at Fort William. Today I received a report from the manager of the office which I requested a few days ago—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Fort William will find that this subject might more properly be discussed on item 188 which is coming up shortly.

Mr. Pitman: The remarks made by the Minister of Labour only serve to illustrate the point which is being raised. This is a national problem, but we are trying to deal with it on a municipal scale. I can assure the minister that the local authorities are in complete confusion about what to do. For example, in June, 1960, there were 200,000 unemployed in Ontario. There were 103 who graduated from this course. In all the courses of Ontario, including St. Catharines, the number was 687 at a time when the unemployment figure was as high as 200,000.

I think this is an indictment of a program which the minister himself told us was going to deal with this problem in a realistic way. I realize the provinces are jealous of their rights with regard to education, but we are speaking now not of education as it is generally understood but of vocational training. This does not involve a language or a culture. I should like to know the extent of this program. This summer hundreds of vocational schools were empty. How many were engaged in training unemployed persons? I should like to know how many unemployed were being trained during July and August.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the minister replies may I speak briefly on this subject? I think that what the hon. member who has just resumed his seat was saying has great validity. One of the problems facing us with regard to unemployment is, according to the government's own spokesmen, that many of those who are now unemployed do not possess the necessary skills to enable them to be assigned to certain jobs which are available. While what has been done is commendable, it will be recalled that when the amendments to the Vocational Training Act were brought before us last fall, we pointed out that this program did not go far enough in meeting the problem.

I mentioned yesterday the inadequacy of the program—a program, by the way, which represents an amendment to an act which has been in existence for a long time. The present government did not introduce this act. What this government introduced were amendments to an act, which, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate reminds me, came into being in 1910.

Mr. Chambers: You should have done it in the fifties.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member always says: you should have done this, or you should have done that. Hon. gentlemen opposite including the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence who intervened a moment ago, should know the answer in advance. The fact is that his colleagues are in office. It is they who are confronted with this terrific problem of unemployment. One of the ways of meeting that problem is to provide people with the necessary training so that they can assume jobs for which they are not at present fitted. But to demonstrate the inadequacy of the program, and in support of what has been said by the hon. member for Peterborough, let me recall what I said yesterday, namely that more than 2,600 applicants representing 70 per cent of the total applicants for vocational training in Toronto were rejected, because they did not have the necessary foundation to take the training which was being made available under this arrangement between the federal and provincial governments. How can a scheme be said to be meeting the problem, when more than 70 per cent of the applicants are said not to possess the qualifications necessary before the training can be undertaken? That is what the hon. member was seeking to establish. We are not going to make a real contribution toward the solution of the unemployment problem until we recognize the necessity of providing those who lack these skills with the opportunity to acquire them. It is true that the administration of this program is something which comes within the authority of the provinces, but it is the federal government which provides 75 per cent of the capital cost, and surely in any agreement this government makes with the provinces it ought to be possible for the government at least to use its persuasive powers—its good offices—to see that the administration in the provinces is carried on in such a way as to meet the objective which the federal government and, I am sure, the provinces themselves have in mind.

This is what the hon. member is seeking to establish. I am sure that from my own interest in this problem—and I am not speaking now, politically, because this is too important a matter for that—I would welcome anything that could be done to make this program work more effectively. We cannot sit back and pretend we have solved the problem merely by voting money to the provinces to enable them to carry on certain projects. That is an important contribution, it is true, but we must go further and see that our people are provided with the facilities for training in all sorts of jobs—jobs in television and in many branches of electronics, for example. They must not only be given a basic training, let us say, in electronics, but training must be given to them so that they can appreciate the nature of the more advanced training they are to be given. There are all kinds of private schools in this country engaged in teaching people electronics. That is all to the good, but there is a responsibility which rests on this government and on provincial governments. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to solve this problem of unemployment this is one of the ways by which it could be done.

Mr. Denis: I thank the minister for tabling details of the training scheme and of the payments made to the provinces during the last five years. But I also asked the minister to let us have a list of the money spent in every province since the inception of the respective acts concerning unemployment assistance, and upon the winter works program.

As I said, I do not see anything in this vote that relates to it. When I ask questions in the chamber I do not understand why they are answered by the Department of Labour. I suppose the minister is aware of the expenditure of money by the federal government to assist those unemployed who do not qualify for unemployment insurance. I wish to know what amount of money has been expended by the federal government to each province since the inception of the municipal winter works program.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member, of course, will have an opportunity to ask for that information when the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare are before us because this matter comes under the jurisdiction of that department.

The hon. member also requested the amount paid to each province since the inception of the municipal winter works program. I ask the unanimous consent of the committee to have this information in table form printed in Hansard at this point.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the tables presented by the minister be printed at this point in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Denis: I have another request Mr. Chairman. Our good friend who is a Conservative member from the province of Quebec always says that spending this money under a joint agreement with the federal government is a crime against the economy, and I should therefore like to have the yeas and nays called in order to see how the hon. gentleman would vote.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you call the yeas and nays, Mr. Chairman, I wish to put a question to the minister. I take it that under this vote expenditures of three types are made. One is for capital works, one is for a share of the cost of the administration of schools in so far as they are attended by young people who are not yet in the employment stream, and the third is for assistance to persons who are in the employment stream but are unemployed for the time being. Could the minister tell us how much of the total vote is for the third purpose? That is to say, could the minister advise how much of the total is for assisting unemployed persons to obtain technical or vocational training?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, that question is also of interest to me. I have examined the details as found at page 264 of the estimates. There is, of course, a large sum for capital assistance which I think relates to the kind of thing about which I asked the minister earlier such as assistance for the vocational school at Fort Frances. There is a breakdown on page 264 of this large amount. I believe my deskmate is concerned, as I am, about assistance for training unemployed workers. It is suggested that $4 million is required for the fiscal year 1961-62. I would imagine this is without regard to age or any other restriction. We are concerned about unemployed persons.

We have reached the half year point in our 1961-62 program. I should like the minister to indicate to the committee to what extent there has been activity in co-operation with the provinces under this $4 million vote. Having heard from the provinces at almost the half year point is the minister able to say whether the $4 million will be fully expended in the current fiscal year and, if so, on what type of project concerning which he has been in touch with the provinces?

Mr. Starr: I believe the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River answered the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate when he said there is an appropriation of $4 million which I think is the information the hon. member required.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I wished to know was elaborated much better by my colleague. I could read the figure of $4 million. Obviously this was just a figure more or less plucked out of the air.

Mr. Starr: It is an estimate.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I was interested in was how much had already been spent on unemployed persons, which is the information my hon. friend also sought.

Mr. Starr: We do not know what expenditures the provinces will make in respect of this type of training and $4 million is the figure we put in the estimates. We are continually encouraging the provinces and have offered them an incentive in that we will pay 75 per cent of the cost. Up to August 31, 1961 our payments to the provinces in this respect have amounted to $507,000-odd, from March 31 to August 31. Our information is not complete but the provinces advise us there will be a more vigorous program during the fiscal year in the training of unemployed than has been undertaken before. There is no discrimination as to age with respect to the training of these people. As at March 31, 1961, there were more than 5,000 persons in training in the provinces across Canada. From April 1 to July 30 there were in excess of 2,000, making a total of more than 7,000. In 1960-61 in excess of 10,000 were trained. I realize that much more should be done in this field but I wish to make clear that we are not wedded to the figure of $4 million and if a larger sum were required we could return to parliament with a supplementary estimate which I am sure would be approved.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not think any hon. member of the committee will quarrel with the statement the minister just made. The minister indicated that at the end of the last fiscal year there were approximately 5,000 persons undergoing training under this vote.

Mr. Starr: Yes, at that time.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, at the end of the last fiscal year. We are asked today to consider a vote of $4 million for a similar program for the year that will end on March 31, 1962. With all due respect to the minister and having regard to the total unemployed, the figure the minister gave is not very impressive. Neither, perhaps, is the amount of the vote. But accepting it as it is, we have almost come to the half way point in the fiscal year 1961-62. The minister indicated that commitments made to the provinces under this $4 million appropriation amount to slightly more than half a million dollars.

Mr. Starr: Actual payments.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. Perhaps the minister will indicate to us what actually is in hand. What are the provinces doing for those people who should be at the top of our consideration these days? We make massive expenditures in other directions, but surely there is nothing more important than trying to do something to train, as this grant says, the unemployed workers. I do not want statistics; I do not want details. I simply want a few examples from the minister of what the provinces are doing in the present fiscal year to account for the expenditure of our 75 per cent share of $507,000.

Mr. Starr: I am informed that in Ontario and Quebec we expect to have people in training under this program to the total of about 10,000. This is in those two provinces alone.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the minister will appreciate the fact that I was directing my thoughts to him in a way that would indicate I was interested in the kind of training, the skills, and so forth that are in contemplation.

Mr. Starr: There is a very wide variety of skills. They are listed here alphabetically. I am sure the hon. member would not want me to take up the time of the committee to read them. If he wants the list printed in Hansard I shall be glad to have it done.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the printing of these lists in the record at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister one question before we have the vote. Can he tell us just precisely what assistance, if any, is given to the unemployed persons while they are taking this training? I realize of course that the federal government is paying a substantial share—in my opinion it should be 100 per cent—of the cost of the training of the unemployed persons. I do not say that for the people who are not in the employment stream. What I am trying to get at is, what assistance is given to unemployed persons so they will be in a position to take those courses? In many instances those unemployed persons have not enough income to look after themselves and attend those courses. This is particularly true with respect to unemployed persons who are no longer in receipt of unemployment insurance and may be on relief. Is any special allowance given to those people? Is it given directly by the federal government or is there any assistance at all?

Mr. Starr: Every province has its own specific allowance for the people who are in training except the province of Manitoba. It varies but in most cases it is equivalent to and in some instances more than the unemployment insurance they may be receiving at the time, or if they were not receiving any unemployment insurance, then the living allowance equivalent to it. To all this the federal government contributes 75 per cent.

Mr. Pitman: Judging by the minister's remarks, we have to conclude that this program has certainly not been a roaring success. I think it is particularly upsetting to dump money on the provinces, particularly on the percentage basis, because it costs them money to accept it. In addition it seems to me that the provinces simply are not directed. They simply do not know where they are going in this whole business.

I asked a question a few minutes ago and I should very much like to get an answer to it. As I said, there were thousands of vocational schools across this nation which were not too busy in the months of July and August. Here was an opportunity to give six weeks training to a great many of the unemployed throughout this nation. I should like to know how many were being trained during July and August? Even if the provinces do not send reports, I should like some indication, if it is at all possible to give it, of how many people are being retrained? The minister mentioned 10,000 in Ontario and Quebec. Can he give us the numbers for the rest of Canada, possibly up to the end of December? The only way we can judge the success of this program is by knowing what percentage of the total unemployed are actually receiving this kind of training.

Mr. Starr: I might say to the hon. member that this represents only a segment of those people who are undergoing training in technical skills in various institutions across this country that educate people in technical schools. Some 368,000 are under training now; but under this program, where we give the incentive to the provinces to undertake special courses for training the unemployed, as of April 1—I said this a few moments ago—or from April 1 to July 30 there were 2,173; but these courses are going to be continued during the winter months. I said a few minutes ago that in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec 10,000 people will be under training under this scheduled grant to which the federal government contributes 75 per cent.

The hon. member was engaged in school teaching in Peterborough. Surely he knows the jurisdiction in these matters. He knows that the provinces do not condone any infringement by the federal government of their rights in the field of education. I am sure that if the hon. member approaches the provincial governments and helps us to persuade them to undertake more of this training plan it would be very helpful.

Mr. Pitman: I can assure the minister that I will do everything I possibly can to assist.

While I am on my feet I should like to thank the minister for the assistance which was given toward buying machinery in one of the schools for the retraining program. But what bothers most of us is this. In my particular constituency there was an organization of unemployed workers. Their hopes were raised on high because they felt they were going to be retrained, not just a few, not just 2,000. There was going to be a vast training of unemployed people. That was certainly the impression received from the publicity which emanated from this chamber. Certainly the feeling I get, as I am approached by these people, is that we let them down. They have not received this training. Some of them have received training, of course, and are concerned because they are not receiving jobs. However, this is another problem.

What I am suggesting is that it is a monstrous problem and we have to make a response to it which is in keeping with the problem.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I do not think any impression was given in this House of Commons at any time that a particular municipality would have a training school established by the provincial government.

If the hon. member has not been of any help to the unemployed in his area in trying to establish a school I shall be glad to undertake it and take it up with the minister of education of the province of Ontario and urge him to set up a training school in Peterborough for the unemployed because the hon. member did not know when to approach.

Mr. Pitman: I can assure the minister that one of the most successful areas where training for the unemployed was carried on was in Peterborough. In fact, I was told more people were being trained in Peterborough last summer than in the whole city of Toronto. I can assure the minister that they have been very active in that particular area.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member has been giving the wrong impression up to now.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre asked a question when he spoke last in respect to the provincial government's intention to enlarge the technical institute at Moose Jaw. I am sorry I did not reply. I can assure him that if it is along the same lines as the one that is in existence now, undertaking the same type of course, there will be no problem in approving federal grants.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, there is one comment I cannot resist making after what the minister said to the hon. member for Peterborough when the minister talked about the jealousy of the provincial governments with respect to their jurisdiction over education. I do not believe there is any provincial government in this country that considers that education means the training of the unemployed. I think every provincial government would welcome the day when the minister, as he probably will just before the next election, gets around to announcing the fact that the federal government will pay 100 per cent of the cost of training the unemployed, as it should have done from the beginning. We on this side of the house have advocated this from the day that the hon. member for Trinity, who is not here this evening, first proposed it two years before the government got around to doing anything substantial about it. To hide behind a phony argument like that is no answer at all. If it were applied, of course, to the training of the young there might be something in it, but in the case of people who have already gone into the labour force and have then become unemployed, to suggest that to pay the shot for these people will be considered by the provinces as an invasion of their jurisdiction over education is the most Alice in Wonderlandish argument that has ever been produced in the house.

Mr. Starr: The silliness we have just heard from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is in line with what we hear all the time. His arguments have no foundation at all. All he says is that it should be more. I venture to say that if the federal government did say "we will pay 100 per cent" he would jump up on his feet and ask for 110.

Mr. Pickersgill: Anybody who has paid any attention to my career in public life in this house, either on the other side or on this side, knows that there is no hon. member more concerned about saving the taxpayers' money than I am. I have not advocated extravagant courses, but we in the Liberal party think it is not extravagant to train the unemployed so they can earn their livings. It is a great deal cheaper to do that than it is to be paying relief and unemployment insurance when these men might better be working and adding to the productive wealth of the country. That is why I say in this particular instance that the greatest incentive you can give to the provincial governments and municipalities to do a good job in this field is to pay the whole cost in respect of those persons who are unemployed and being trained under this scheme.

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on vote 186.

Item agreed to: Yeas, 52; nays, nil.

Government employees compensation—

187. Administration of the Government Employees Compensation Act, $121,391.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, before we pass this item, I should like to point out that all the hon. members from the province of Quebec who object to it are never here to vote, but come in immediately after the vote.

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Chairman, it is out of order to comment on the vote of the hon. members.

(Text):

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for St. Denis was looking at me when he made the remark he did. I came in just after the vote and I must explain why I missed the vote. After looking at the face of the hon. member for St. Denis for about ten minutes I had to have a little bowel movement and I excused myself for that purpose.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not think the hon. member would want to leave that on the record.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, since I was accused I have to give the reason why I was absent. The hon. member for St. Denis has cast doubt on the reason for my absence and I have no other answer to give the hon. member than this purely physiological reason.

Mr. Denis: I did not mention the hon. member for St. Mary but if the hat fits him let him wear it.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment insurance commission—

188. Administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act including expenditures incurred in connection with other duties and responsibilities assumed and carried out as required by the governor in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour in accordance with section 4 of the act, $45,542,980.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, during my remarks on the first item yesterday I endeavoured to point out the deplorable condition of the unemployment insurance building in Fort William. Today I received a report from the manager of the office.

Mr. Starr: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit me to bring to the attention of the chairman of the committee that we have two supplementary votes under labour which have nothing to do with the unemployment insurance commission and perhaps the committee would be good enough to consider those two supplementary votes at this time.

The Deputy Chairman: The votes referred to by the minister are Nos. 533 and 534.

Items agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: We will now return to vote 188.

Mr. Badanai: I wish to point out to the committee for the third time that conditions in the unemployment office at Fort William are deplorable. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer to a brief but very eloquent statement of the manager of the local unemployment insurance commission office at Fort William which I received today in a letter dated July 20, 1961. He points out that they had a heavy downpour of rain the day before which flooded the entire basement to a depth of four inches. He says that they are worried about their stock room and that the floor there has heaved and looks like it may cave in. He goes on to say that the manager's office had water running over the floor because the overflow pipe could not carry the excess water away fast enough. He points out that staff members are worried that an accident may result from someone going through the first floor. He says that the officials of the Department of Public Works have been notified, that they will carry on as best they can under the circumstances, that they will do everything in their power to prevent any accidents and that the staff are being warned accordingly. He says that he felt I should have this information in view of their immediate request that consideration be given to providing them with new premises.

The question is, has the minister any information to give the committee about the prospects for a new building to accommodate the unemployment insurance commission office at Fort William? This question is not a new one. It has been talked about over the past two or three years at least and the minister is well aware of the situation. I hope he has something concrete to say.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, we realize, as the hon. member for Fort William does, how necessary a new unemployment insurance commission building is in Fort William and in our planning we have been most anxious to have one built for us by the Department of Public Works. However, certain matters have stood in the way and certain complications have developed as a result of a change of plans by the Department of Public Works in one instance because they felt that they would like to house all the federal government departments there in one building. We, of course, would like to have a separate building. At the moment, there is a full investigation being conducted by the Department of Public Works as to the possibilities of either a new building or some better type of building than that in which we are housed at the moment. This is the extent of the information I can give the hon. member at the moment.

Mr. Badanai: Would the minister see to it, then, that an investigation is made and furnish me with a report or furnish the people of Fort William with a report about the possibility of some immediate action?

Mr. Starr: It is difficult to do that when no decision has been arrived at, but the hon. member can be assured we will be pressing at all times for immediate action in this connection.

Mr. Herridge: This item provides also for the national employment offices, which are included in the offices of the unemployment insurance commission, so I should like to speak on the subject for a few minutes. I intended to speak on item 1, but I did not want to delay the estimates. I point out that while governments at the federal, provincial and municipal level do what is within their capacity financially to meet the unemployment situation, private business fails to accept its responsibility in many aspects in this country. I have seen numerous illustrations of this. They reap the profits and then leave the governments to bind up the wounds of the industrial unemployment casualties, without accepting any responsibility whatever. Their decisions as to their operations are not related to the national interest or to needs of the employees but are, generally speaking, related to the rate of profit, the development of automation and also, because they are under the control of international cartels, are related to various monopolies in various fields. On the whole, they accept no responsibility to the state or to the workers concerned.

If I may illustrate, Mr. Chairman, I would say I received a letter today from the unemployed workers of Windsor. It points out that the automobile companies are laying off workers and at the same time going in for overtime. I am not going to deal with that because I know the hon. member for Essex East is very interested in that problem and intends to deal with it. Then, we have the illustration of the Canadian Pacific Railway on many branch lines in Canada, particularly the Kettle Valley Railway, reducing the service to the area from which they get their greatest profit without any regard for the employees or the circumstances that exist or the welfare of the district concerned. The government also knows that prominent coal mining interests in the maritimes have not played the game, not accepted their responsibilities so far as meeting the present circumstances are concerned. They have failed to co-operate with this government to do what they could to continue employing persons who are at the present time being laid off for the reasons I have mentioned.

Then, I come to the question of Algoma Steel. I want to mention this as an illustration particularly of how international cartels are frustrating government intentions. You get this under a capitalist society. I want to quote briefly from a book entitled, "The Power and the Money", by F. W. Park. I should like to quote particularly from the chapter headed "Shifting Patterns of Power".

> Dosco, the other major steel producer acquired by the Roe group, has had a long and enormously complicated history. Inefficient management, bitter opposition to the demands of labour have characterized its past. Since the war it expanded under the presidency of L. A. Forsythe, Montreal lawyer. Forsythe died on January 1, 1957, and soon thereafter rumours began to circulate that other interests were seeking control. Dosco owns "almost unlimited" iron ore reserves at Wabana, Newfoundland, and Cape Breton coal; its Sydney steel mill is strategically situated for export markets.
> The first stage in the bringing together of this new steel alliance was the purchase of Algoma through an intricate series of operations that show how quickly international groups of financiers and industrialists can combine for common profit and how little attention is paid in this process to any concept of national interest.

Some $60 million in cash was needed to buy a substantial block of Algoma shares from the Dunn estate. Here two new groups enter the scene in alliance with A. V. Roe of Canada. First is the West German firm of Mannesmann A. G. headed by Wilhelm Zangen, the other is the group controlling the McIntyre Porcupine gold mining interests. Mannesmann, as will appear, put up some $24 million, and McIntyre Porcupine between $12 and $13 million. The balance was supplied by the Roe interests and the Royal Bank of Canada.

Then, they go on to deal with the international investments of these various companies in countries in Europe, South America and other places.

The Mannesmann firm was established in 1885. By 1938 it employed 50,000 workers and owned coal mines, iron mines, smelter and rolling mills, with a distribution network that extended from Germany to Argentina . . .

Zangen, head of Mannesmann since 1934, was one of the executive council of WASAG, the Nazi munitions trust, along with Krupp, Stinnes, Vogler and Poenagen. A member of the Nazi party and of the SS, he was one of the group of big German industrialists who financed the Nazi rise to power and provided the armaments for Hitler's conquests.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; I think the quotation is getting a bit long and I would have to have the consent of the committee if it is to continue.

Mr. Herridge: I have just concluded, but I have two comments to make, Mr. Chairman. I will conclude at that point and accept your chastisement, Mr. Chairman. In any event, while this McIntyre Porcupine group were piling up profits and investments, they have been receiving substantial sums from the federal government under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, $808,942 in 1955 and $688,081 in 1954.

Then, dealing with the fact that this company is investing millions and millions in other countries, not in Canada, after receiving subsidies from the Canadian government under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, the article goes on to state that the company is investing tremendous sums of money in South America and other countries.

Mr. Chambers: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that we are not discussing the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Mr. Herridge: No, Mr. Chairman, but I am allowed to discuss the fact that a company receiving assistance from this government in order to enable it to carry on in one field, takes its profits from operations in that field and invests them in another country while workers in Canada are unemployed.

Mr. Chambers: On the same point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I ask what the relevance is to the item under consideration?

Mr. Herridge: Unemployment, because these offices related to this vote try to place Canadians in employment. I think the hon. member is a bit unfair. I have been rather restrained during this discussion.

The Deputy Chairman: I might speak on behalf of the hon. member who has the floor to indicate that he previously forfeited his time to some extent on item 1 in order to get the estimates under way. I think, therefore, the Chair should allow him fair and reasonable latitude.

Mr. Herridge: I thank you very much for your consideration, Mr. Chairman, but I did want to bring this point out. We criticize the government, whether it is the federal, provincial or municipal government, but under our present system the government is not entirely in control of this particular situation. Here are these large monopolies and corporations receiving the benefit of Canadian funds and reinvesting their profits in other countries while we have natural resources undeveloped and workers unemployed. I just want to make this point. The point of view of the party to which I belong is that the only remedy is in some effort at planning by the persons who are responsible either directly to the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of the provinces. We are told there has to be planning to provide control of natural resources and their development, for the manufacture of a greater proportion of our raw materials in Canada instead of shipping them out of the country to such an extent as is done today. If you control the sources of energy, such as electrical power, then add to that the control of the raw material, then you can get federal-provincial co-operation to give the impetus to get this country moving in the direction where the governments elected by the people are going to do something to meet the unemployment situation.

I just rise to make these few observations because I am confident that, regardless of the best intentions of the government, under the present circumstances we must grasp this nettle with both hands and ensure that the parliament of Canada governs for the people of Canada and is not going to continue to govern for those interests who have no respect for the national interests or the people of this country under these circumstances.

Mr. Rapp: I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether consideration has been given to bringing farm labour under the Unemployment Insurance Act. The minister will recall that I have brought this problem of our farmers to his attention on previous occasions. I am sure this problem of ours will get worse before it gets better. With the advent of automation on the farm, the farmer finds it difficult to find labour skilful enough to operate the highly mechanized implements he needs at the present time. Unless attention is given to this problem and a solution is arrived at, namely that of bringing farm labour under the Unemployment Insurance Act, it is my opinion that the farmer will suffer severely.

From past experience I know that when harvest time comes along, farmers are not able to get operators who are able to run these implements. They are able to obtain employment somewhere else where skilled labour is required and where, when they are not employed the whole year around, they are under the Unemployment Insurance Act. This is not the case with the farm labour. I would seriously request the minister to take this matter into consideration when the Unemployment Insurance Act is revised or amended.

Mr. McMillan: I wish to raise a matter which the hon. member for Niagara Falls and I have brought to the attention of the minister on two or three occasions. On April 24 last, a number of unemployed came here to Ottawa in order to present a brief to the government. Those in our area—and I cannot give the exact number although I think it is 11 or 12—were disqualified as to unemployment insurance benefits while they were here in Ottawa. They were disqualified by a local official of the unemployment insurance commission. The reason given was that they were unavailable for work on that day. An appeal was taken to the board of referees which met in St. Catharines, and there was a split decision. Two members of the board voted to disallow the appeal and one voted to allow it. Those voting to disallow the appeal asserted that the men should not have their appeal allowed because they were not available for work on that day. The one who gave the minority report asserted that he thought they had fulfilled their obligation by reporting to the office that they were going to be away and gave the reason therefor. When that appeal failed, the men appealed to the umpire and the case was scheduled to be heard last Monday, but up until now I have not heard what decision there has been. I think it should be the inalienable right of all citizens to come here and make a presentation to the government without penalty. I think this is the very basis of our democracy. In reading over the evidence, I think I can say it was agreed that these men were honest, that they said openly in the office in Welland why they were coming to Ottawa and that they did not try to hide the facts in any way. Unfortunately for them, however, April 24 was the date on which they were obliged to report to the office and, according to them, sign in at the office. I do not know exactly what that means. I know of a number of other unemployed who were here and probably they did not have to sign in on that day. I know that a number of unemployed were here from Windsor, Hamilton, Toronto, Oshawa and Peterborough; and to my knowledge not one of the other unemployed from those centres has had a disallowance of his unemployment insurance benefits. If I may give my lay opinion, I would say that the government is labouring too much the argument with regard to these men being unavailable for work when, in fact, there was no work for them. I do not find any criticism of the board of referees because they were giving their decision within the context and the ambit of the regulations. Injustice can result, however, because of lack of foresight and because of lack of ingenuity on the part of man to anticipate all the complexities for which he must provide in the regulations and in the statutes. Since we have been here in Ottawa, I think we have seen examples with respect to the statutes. In fact, it is said that the fathers of confederation could not foresee everything that has happened in order to include it in the British North America Act. If we cannot include everything in the statutes how can we include everything in the regulations when we do not pay as much attention to the regulations?

In my opinion there has been injustice here. I think too much emphasis has been given to the consideration of whether or not these men were available for work. The unemployment insurance commission in Welland did not call their homes or did not try to get in touch with them on that particular day. I think that the department here should be a little more humane and should use common sense. Had they done so, I think this matter could have been cleared up a long time ago.

Mr. Carter: I just want to take one minute of the committee's time. First I want to support the request made by my colleague from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador that Newfoundland be made a separate region as far as the administration of unemployment insurance is concerned. I do not wish to expand on that request. In his remarks he has given all the reasons for it and there is no need to repeat them here.

The other reason why I am on the floor is to ask the Minister of Labour or the unemployment insurance commission to make a special exception for dragger fishermen. I have in my riding a number of fishermen who leave Newfoundland and join a dragger fishing out of Nova Scotia. These people leave their homes in early January and are away practically the whole year. The vessel will go on refit perhaps in the summer months when the fishing is perhaps not so good, but it is not possible for them to go to the expense of going home at that time. They therefore find other work or get on some other boat which is still fishing. But after being away for nine or ten months, around Christmas time they do feel an urge to join their families, like the rest of us. If they do they are penalized for leaving work voluntarily—they are disqualified under present regulations from coming home to see their families, and if some other operator happens to offer them another job on another dragger while they are home they are further disqualified. These people are not protected. They are not given any holidays under any legislation we have on the statute books, and the only chance they have of getting a holiday is to take one in this way. I think they should be entitled to special consideration and that some way should be found to avoid having to disqualify these people if they return to see their families after seven or eight months. I should like to see some system worked out so that they could rejoin their families after working for a certain period without being disqualified from receipt of unemployment benefits.

Mr. McFarlane: I have a problem here which I should like to bring to the minister's attention. It concerns the payment of agents for making out unemployment insurance claims. At the present time, in many of the smaller townships and more remote areas the commission has appointed agents to handle the work rather than go to the expense of setting up offices. At times it has been very difficult to obtain suitable men to do this work and the difficulty has been accentuated by the fact that the department will only pay $1 per application. The agent in the area is required to return all correspondence and, nine times out of ten, to return the unemployment insurance book to the regional office, in respect of which he has to pay postage. Thus the agent makes approximately 75 cents per application. In many of the offices in the larger centres where accommodation is provided I am sure the cost per application would work out at a great deal more than $1.

I am unable to find out exactly how this figure of $1 has been arrived at. I presume the applications have been handled in some of the larger offices where everything is convenient and where the claimant is an English speaking person and the costs have been based on that. But in many of these rural areas it is a problem even to understand some of the applicants who come into the offices or homes of the agents. I feel all this should be taken into consideration and that in the circumstances the payment of $1 is not sufficient.

We have allocated over $33 million under this vote, and I feel that an increase in the payment made to agents is desirable. I have here a certain amount of correspondence, some of which relates in particular to the appointment of an agent in Golden, British Columbia. I would point out that if a man applied for benefit in Golden and if his application could not be dealt with locally he would have to make a return trip to the regional office which is 380 miles away. The round trip would cost approximately $19 and applicants for unemployment insurance are not in a position to pay out travelling expenses of this kind. So I say that some consideration should be given to increasing this payment. The department, in the correspondence I have received from them, simply says "no" and that is supposed to be final, but I think the question should be given further consideration at this time. The agents are doing a good job in the smaller centres and rendering a valuable service to the public, especially to those who are in the unfortunate position of being unemployed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Kootenay West mentioned that I had received some representations from a Windsor unemployed organization, and that I proposed to say something about them. He had spoken to me earlier about this matter. I indicated that I had received these representations and that I intended to bring them to the attention of parliament and the Minister of Labour.

These are representations made by this organization of unemployed in the city of Windsor. These representations have been addressed to the Minister of Labour in this government, to the minister of labour in the province of Ontario and to the federal and provincial members from the county of Essex. The representations include an allegation that in certain automobile plants, not only in Windsor, lay-offs have taken place in large numbers; that some of those lay-offs include skilled tradesmen and that they have taken place at a time when there has been a scheduling of an overtime program covering as much as from 16 to 30 hours and more a week, though many are unemployed. This is a matter which concerns the hon. gentleman not only in his capacity as minister, because it applies as well, to the General Motors plant in Oshawa. I am sure he would want this matter looked into. I bring this matter forward as a representative from the city concerned with this problem. I have no hesitation in saying that at a time when there is a high level of unemployment, although responsibility for meeting that situation rests primarily, I believe, on governments a responsibility likewise rests on employers to see that they in turn are doing everything in their power, having in mind all the problems which confront them, to see that men and women are not unemployed. I think the Minister of Labour would want to be satisfied that people were not being left idle at a time when they could be put to work, particularly if there is a heavy scheduled program of overtime work. I do believe a more conscious effort, on the part of some employers as well as by governments, could rectify this problem.

I hope the minister will take a look at this memorandum which I propose to discuss with him at the earliest possible moment in order to see what correction can be made in this situation.

Yesterday I put before the committee and, particularly, before the minister, what I believe is one of our major grievances on these estimates at this time. The minister spoke this afternoon. I missed a few moments of the early part of his statement. If he covered this matter then, I do, of course, acknowledge that I may be in error in repeating the matter tonight. But in the absence of an explanation, I want to reiterate that I believe this government treated this parliament with contempt when it announced the appointment of a royal commission to enquire into the Unemployment Insurance Act, shortly after we adjourned in the month of July.

I have no objection to the fullest examination being made of the Unemployment Insurance Act by those who are competent to make recommendations as to what changes should be made to make that act more effective; nor have I any objection to anyone outside of this house indicating to us and to the government how the perilous state of the unemployment insurance fund could be dealt with. I believe this problem is a responsibility of parliament, but primarily it is the responsibility of this government. I believe when the government turns over to a royal commission a matter of this sort, and particularly when it does so under the circumstances attending this situation, it leaves itself open to the indictment that it is transferring to a royal commission the examination of this problem, to escape its own responsibility, especially when we realize how long this problem has been before the government.

We have had recently tabled the latest report of the unemployment insurance advisory committee for the year ending March 31, 1961. This report bears close examination by hon. members of this committee. At page 1 the committee reports that the balance in the unemployment insurance fund as at March 31, 1961 was $184,685,000. The report goes on to point out that by May, 1962 there will be nothing left in the fund if the present levels of unemployment or levels comparable thereto persist in the ensuing period. This is a very serious situation.

We have continually reminded the government, during the course of this session in particular, but also in other sessions, of the dangerous state of the fund. All hon. members know that in 1956 the fund stood at over $900 million. We are now told that at the end of the last fiscal year the fund was down to $184 million. The report points out that by May next there will be nothing left in the fund unless something is done to bolster it. We have repeatedly asked the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Finance what the government was going to do. We asked if the government was going to bolster the fund by increasing the contributions. We indicated that if this course were followed we, in the Liberal party, would consider it an unconscionable thing to do particularly in the light of the action taken by the government two years ago, when it increased the contributions from 25 per cent to 55 per cent, imposing this added burden on the employees and employers of our country at a time when there was no change in the pattern of benefits.

If the government proposes to resort to that formula once again it will certainly meet with very strong response from those in the Liberal party who opposed this remedy so vigorously two years ago. As we all well recall, it was the Liberal party and none other that took that course in the house when we levelled criticism against the government at that time.

The government has now referred this matter to a royal commission. The Prime Minister does not call it that; he said it was a committee. The reason the Prime Minister does not use the phrase "royal commission" is because he has understandably become somewhat sensitive to the criticism directed at his government, that it is a government of royal commissions. The fact is, as I indicated yesterday, this government has appointed no less than fourteen different royal commissions to deal with matters which could have been dealt with by the government. During its appeal to the people in 1957 and 1958 the government promised it would resolve the questions which were covered in the references to these royal commissions.

This is one question the government said it would resolve. It has now turned over to a royal commission the responsibility for investigating the problem. We do not know when a report will be made. The commission has not yet begun its public hearings, which I believe are to begin some time in October. We have had no indication from the Minister of Labour as to when this commission will report. He will have an opportunity to give an indication with respect to that question this evening. We also have had no indication as to whether the report will be received early enough to permit the government to bring down legislation before we go to the people in a general election.

The government owes it to parliament and to the people of Canada, to state what its position is with regard to amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act and with regard to what the government proposes to do to bolster the fund, particularly in view of the fact that in the previous session of 1959-60—not in the session that adjourned in the month of July—it asserted that it had definite views as to what amendments should be brought forward. The government indicated at that time that those amendments would be brought forward in legislation at the earliest possible moment.

When we met last November at the beginning of this session we were solemnly told in the speech from the throne by Her Majesty's representative that the government was going to bring down amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. During the course of this session various members of this party have asked the Minister of Labour to say when the legislation foreshadowed in the speech from the throne would be presented. The minister said these matters were under careful consideration and would be presented in due course.

I believe it was on March 9, during the course of debate that I suggested that the government had then had in its possession for some eight months a special study presented to it by the unemployment insurance commission, containing a whole series of recommended amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The minister did not deny that that was the case. The minister cannot say he did not have before him a carefully considered body of recommendations presented by the unemployment insurance commission, composed of experienced people specially endowed to deal with this problem.

As late as May 9 last the minister said in the house as reported at page 4555 of Hansard of that date:

> —a careful study of the report of the advisory committee leads to only one conclusion, namely that the situation cannot be met simply by merely appropriating money through parliament to meet the payments from the fund. It is evident that what is required is a careful review of the act, something which we are undertaking with the officials of the unemployment insurance commission and with others, with a view to incorporating amendments that will restore the full effectiveness of the scheme.

When asked if the amendments would be introduced this session he said "of course, they would." He acknowledged that this had been mentioned in the speech from the throne. Two days before we adjourned, I asked the minister when we were going to receive the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The minister's reply was that the matter was under study and that the government's policy would be announced in due course. There was no suggestion then that we were going to have a royal commission, that the government was going to shelve its responsibility, that the announcements in the speech from the throne were going to be thrown aside or that the government was going to ask someone vicariously to give consideration to a matter about which the government told us it had definite views. There was nothing of that sort at all. We were again told the policy of the government would be "announced in due course." We had the right to expect when we returned, as we have returned, that we would have those amendments before us, and that a committee of this house would be established for the purpose of studying the amendments.

It cannot be argued that the amendments are so complicated, so difficult, that they defy consideration by the House of Commons, because the whole Unemployment Insurance Act, introduced by Mackenzie King as the leader of the Liberal party in the dark days of the war was not referred to a royal commission. It was referred to a committee of this house. It was a committee of this house which considered the legislation and put it into such form as to make it properly presentable to the committee of the whole and later to the house itself for approval. This is the course that should now be followed. Instead, we adjourned on July 13; we went to our respective constituencies and on July 27 the Prime Minister announced the appointment of a royal commission, to do something which this government said it was ready to do in the month of January.

I say, Mr. Chairman, the course taken by the government and by the Prime Minister on July 27 amounts to nothing less than contemptuous treatment of parliament. This is not the first time this has been done. It was done by this government on several other occasions. We tried to get the report of the advisory committee to the unemployment insurance commission in June 1960. As I indicated yesterday, and I repeat now, because the minister has not commented on this important phase of administration in his department, on the very last day of the session, when we asked whether there would be a tabling of the report of the advisory committee, we were told by the minister that it was not ready. And yet, before six o'clock, before we had prorogued, the report was clandestinely tabled under our procedures with the Clerk. Only late that night, and after we had prorogued, did we learn of the existence of the report and of its terms. That was also holding parliament in contempt. Now we have had a repetition of this by the reference of this matter to a royal commission, composed of worthy gentlemen, who have no electoral responsibility to the workers of this country, as we their elected representatives have. I say this government has dodged this issue.

Mr. Speakman: Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "nonsense". This is his conventional repartee to any indictment made against a government which he so blindly supports.

The fact is that, along with other members, the hon. gentleman was elected to consider measures of this kind. He was not elected to transfer that responsibility to others, who were not elected.

This government has appointed 14 royal commissions. It has reported on only two of them. I suspect we shall have no report on this one, until long after a federal election and then it will be the responsibility of a Liberal government to deal with the recommendations made to it by this commission.

This is a vital matter, Mr. Chairman, one which affects thousands of people in this country who have a financial stake in the unemployment insurance fund. This fund does not belong to this government. It does not belong to the people of Canada. In the main the unemployment insurance fund belongs to two classes of our people. In law or in any other way this government has no right—

Mr. Spencer: The hon. member believes that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course he believes it and so does the hon. member for Essex West. This is a matter that vitally affects thousands of people in the city of Windsor, as it does in other sections of Canada.

My hon. friend and others may laugh. This is an important matter to the workers of our country. This government has treated this matter in a shameful way. I can hardly believe that the Minister of Labour was in any way a party to this devious practice. I can hardly believe that the minister who looks at me so sympathetically now—

Mr. Starr: That is right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —approves of this device. I am sure that in the month of January the minister wanted to bring forward a bill providing for amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, but I suspect that some of his colleagues, perhaps the Minister of Finance who is now in Vienna, did not agree. Nevertheless, when Her Majesty speaks as she was made to speak in the speech from the throne last January—

Mr. Benidickson: November.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Last November,—she spoke for the government of Canada.

Mr. Spencer: Corrected again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen may think that an undertaking given through the mouth of Her Majesty's representative may not be important, but under our system of government it is important. This government has disregarded this fact; it has thrown parliament aside. What does parliament matter? "As soon as the session is over we will relieve ourselves of this embarrassment; we will turn the matter over to a royal commission", said the government. The commission will not report until after the election. The government will be saved the embarrassment of doing something which it should have assumed. The government believes it got away with it in the Clark report. It hopes it will get away with it so far as the Unemployment Insurance Act is concerned.

If this is the policy of this government, then I am sure the Minister of Labour will conclude his estimates tonight on a very sour note. This government has failed to discharge a responsibility about which it made a commitment two years ago to the country. This parliament, the employers and the workers are no wiser now as to what kind of changes are going to be made to an act the benefit of which we all recognize, particularly at this time of unprecedented unemployment in our country.

Surely the minister cannot fail to reply, to give us the reasons for this devious course taken by a government that is not inexperienced in the art of device.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, once again I am going to occupy only a limited number of minutes of the time of this committee. I should like to remind the committee—and I am speaking now to both Liberal and Conservative members of the committee—that half a dozen or so years ago I noticed that there were over $900 million in the unemployment insurance fund and I said at that time that if ever an economic recession hit the nation what then appeared to be an immense amount of money might disappear overnight and the fund would be in danger or on the verge of bankruptcy. I can still hear, almost as if it were yesterday, the hoots and the catcalls that I received from both the Liberal and Conservative members of the house on that occasion.

Now the Liberals are blaming the Conservatives because the fund has been depleted and is facing bankruptcy. However, by their lack of foresight the Liberals even yet are responsible for the economic difficulties facing this nation today. I regret that, despite the election promises, the Conservatives have been unable to remedy the situation. We have had supplementary budgets, baby budgets and regular budgets and I do not know how many new names we will invent for budgets, but I noted with pleasure the announcement of the Minister of Finance in his latest budget speech indicating a willingness on the part of the Conservative government of the day to make a loan to the unemployment insurance commission in order to ensure that the unemployed will be able to obtain their legitimate benefits as prescribed by the act.

Mr. Speakman: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would he define their legitimate requirements?

Mr. Regier: I would define the legitimate requirements of a man who is willing and able to work as being a minimum basic standard of living in this day and age.

An hon. Member: What is it?

Mr. Regier: You know, Mr. Chairman, when my grandfather first came to this country—

Mr. Speakman: Why?

Mr. Regier: —he was able to take a gun over one shoulder and an axe over the other and go out and make his livelihood from the raw resources of Canada. Today a man who is unemployed is no longer able to go out with a gun or an axe over his shoulder because the so-called free enterprise system is now denying him the right to make his own livelihood. He now has only one alternative and that is to go to some employer, some corporation that may have its head office in Accra, London or New Delhi and say, "All I have are my two hands, my brains and my brawn; I offer them to you", and the employer has the power to say whether these brains and brawn are going to be usefully employed.

An hon. Member: Ridiculous.

Mr. Regier: I regret that I was unable to precede the hon. member for Essex East because I would have made the same plea for the unemployed of Windsor. I believe the situation is regrettable and must be corrected in view of the fact that many people are being paid for overtime work while at the same time others who should be employed and who were employed in the same industry remain unemployed.

I want to mention a matter in connection with the unemployment insurance commission. I can remember the time when the Liberal government introduced a plan to pay pensions to the physically handicapped. The hon. member for Essex East, and I give him marks for it, was the man who introduced that measure in the house. At that time I pleaded with the government of the day that in implementing this most desirable plan they should not superimpose new administrative machinery throughout Canada. The hon. member may have forgotten my plea at that time. I said that the administration ought to be tied in with the existing machinery.

What concerns me is that a man who is unemployed today is entitled to so many weeks of unemployment insurance benefits but at the expiry of that time he then has to go into an entirely new world if he has been unable to find employment. He has to go to the municipal office and apply for what we have now decided to call social security but which we used to call relief. Once again he has to go through all the red tape, all the administrative procedures, in order to qualify for relief. We have welfare plans and pension plans in Canada that astound me. They run into the dozens. We have pensions for the blind, pensions for the handicapped, unemployment insurance, pensions for this, pensions for that, welfare for this and welfare for that, each scheme with its own hierarchy of officialdom, administration and red tape.

It is time that we adopted a comprehensive, all-inclusive social security system. I see no reason why we should not. I notice that a number of our civil servants are looking askance at me. If we were able to extend the number of weeks during which an unemployed man is eligible for benefits, I see no reason why we should not be able to extend our unemployment insurance system to the point where a man and his dependents will be looked after until work is again found and he will not have to be kicked out and have to go to the city hall and beg for relief or social welfare.

I know that the minister may say immediately that this is an anti-union attitude. I know that for many years the unions of Canada insisted that the Unemployment Insurance Act should be an insurance act, and therefore the proposals I am now making would be in violation of that intent. But the Unemployment Insurance Act as it is now administered no longer has much of an insurance feature about it. It is in effect a welfare measure and we should not allow the unemployed of Canada to be kicked out of one welfare agency into another.

I am very pleased to note that the Canadian labour congress and the major unions of Canada are now pleading with the federal government to recognize that any costs over and above reasonable unemployment insurance benefits should be met out of the consolidated revenue fund and that adequate amounts of money should be paid into the unemployment insurance fund to meet needs in excess of reasonable demands upon that fund. The day has arrived when we can no longer laugh about this matter because the people of Canada are becoming very cynical. A lot of Tories are laughing behind the curtains. That is fine and I accept it, but I forecast to the house at least half a dozen years ago that if an economic recession came the unemployment insurance fund would go broke, and it has gone broke. The government does not want to do anything about the matter except to lend the fund $125 million in order to tide over the evil day for one more year. In the budget speech the Minister of Finance announced that the government was making provision to that end.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But at 5 per cent.

Mr. Regier: There may be an interest rate attached to it as the hon. member for Essex East points out. What this government must realize is that unemployment, beyond that which can be reasonably expected, is the responsibility of the government and that responsibility should not be put on the Minister of Labour or the unemployment insurance fund. If they are going to make a welfare instrument out of the unemployment insurance fund, then they ought to go all the way and pay benefits to the man who is without a job until a job is again found for him.

Mr. Crouse: It was not my intention to speak on these items but I listened with great interest a little earlier this evening to the remarks of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. I believe they are worthy of some comment. He suggested that we extend the payment of seasonal benefits only to fishermen from Newfoundland, and I must take exception to that. I would be the last one in this house to speak out against unemployment insurance or seasonal benefits for fishermen, especially those in Nova Scotia or those fishermen from Newfoundland. Some of our best fishermen and sea captains in Lunenburg come from Newfoundland. We hope to secure even more men from that source.

[Mr. Regier.]

However, we must be realistic. Under the present system, these men come to Nova Scotia early in March or April and join our ships in that port. They remain until September or October and then return to their homes. Now, to extend their seasonal benefits would work a further hardship on the men who are left to man the ships. After all, we are speaking about unemployment and about methods of curing it. The extension of these seasonal benefits would not improve this situation. You cannot run a fishing vessel or a dragger without a full crew and when these men return to their homes, of necessity the ship must be tied up to the dock. This situation creates some unemployment.

I should like to suggest, therefore, that the minister give careful consideration to the proposal made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo before taking any action. We do not want to create unemployment; we want to do everything possible to keep everyone physically capable of working employed in Canada.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Lunenburg has misunderstood what I requested. I did not request that they be granted seasonal benefits in September or at any other time. Under the law, they cannot get seasonal benefits until December 1. What I did say was that these fishermen leave their homes in Newfoundland early in the year, some time in February or March. They go to the mainland and are employed there on fishing vessels until nearly Christmas time. Having been away from their families for almost a year, and being human like everyone else, they want to spend some time with their families at Christmas. They get no holidays, and the only way they can get a holiday is to take one. They leave these ships voluntarily to go to Newfoundland to spend Christmas with their families. When they leave these ships voluntarily, they are disqualified from receiving benefits.

All I asked the minister was to find some way of avoiding the imposition of a penalty on these people because they have been absent from their families for such a long period, and this fact should be taken into account. They should not be penalized because they are forced to resort to this method in order to spend time with their families. I feel they deserve special recognition and they should not be disqualified when they apply for benefits in December.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates for the Department of Labour.

Mr. Starr: Through you, Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the members of the committee for the very fine co-operation I received in the passing of these estimates.

The Deputy Chairman: We now turn to the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Indian and northern health services—

261. Operation and maintenance, $22,882,898.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is under vote 261 that Indian and northern health services come. Can the minister tell us whether, under this vote, there is any assistance given in respect to the Indians in the province of Newfoundland? I recognize that the only part of Newfoundland in which there are Indians, of course, is Labrador.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I would prefer to wait until my officials arrive, Mr. Chairman, to give me some assistance with this. We do not have Indian hospitals or nursing stations in Newfoundland to the same degree we do across the rest of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Having been the superintendent general, perhaps I could assist the minister a little on this subject. I recognize that the Indians in Labrador are not Indians under the Indian Act and therefore strictly speaking the federal government, under the terms of union, has no responsibility at all except such responsibility as it has to all other citizens in Canada. I do not recall the details, but some special arrangement was made to provide a certain measure of compensation. Perhaps this arrangement was not made by the minister's department and, quite frankly, I do not remember the details. I simply wanted to find out if there had been any recent change in that or if the minister could throw any light on it.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I would be pleased to inform the hon. member, and I understand that full medical care was to be given for ten years. The agreement still has three years to run. Is this the agreement to which the hon. member refers?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the scheme for the eradication of tuberculosis?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It is for full medical care carried out through the Grenfell mission.

Item agreed to.

263. Medical advisory, diagnostic and treatment services, $4,201,995.

Mr. Benidickson: Does this item include payments to private doctors in any substantial degree? If so, under what terms are payments made to private doctors?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes. Actually the department has full time medical practitioners on the payroll as salaried employees. Then, of course, in certain areas there are some part time doctors who are paid on a fee for service basis.

Item agreed to.

265. Administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act, $276,810.

Mr. Benidickson: Does this item include payments to local agents for prosecutions with respect to the narcotic drugs act or would a vote for that purpose be under the estimates of the Department of Justice?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No. This would be in our vote No. 265.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—family allowances and old age security—

266. Administration, $3,341,497.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has had a rather successful inning. I am sure he would expect now to be given an opportunity to catch his breath.

In the remaining few moments of tonight's sitting, the minister should tell us what progress he has been able to make, since he last addressed himself to this question. That is the study he has now been making for over three years of the Clark report. The minister may recall that the Clark report was a document, which had been prepared by a professor of one of our universities at the instance of the government. That professor had been engaged to make an inquiry into the operation of the old age survivors scheme in the United States, which operates on a contributory basis. The provocation for that report arose out of a statement made in this House of Commons by the Prime Minister of Canada. As the minister may recall if he will search his memory with diligence, prior to the election of 1958 the Prime Minister solemnly told the House of Commons that he thought we should have a system of contributory old age security, modelled on the principles of the system in existence in the United States. In order to meet that objective he said that he had appointed a Professor Huson of the University of Western Ontario, and that the report was to be completed within four months. At the time great publicity was given to this announcement of the Prime Minister. However Professor Huson decided that he could not possibly make the report in four months and, as a result, he resigned from the assignment.

Mr. Benidickson: He was fired.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In his stead Professor Clark was appointed. He took some eight or nine months and then presented a rather monumental document, in two volumes. The minister was questioned about this document a year and a half ago in the estimates committee. He then gave evidence of great comprehension and understanding of the report. No one was convinced that he had not fully studied it. At the end of the presentation of his evidence before the committee, we were somewhat surprised to find that he was not in a position to announce government policy. However, as I say, he clearly established in our minds the impression that he had carefully studied this report and that there was no paragraph in the complicated recommendations and factual statements made by Professor Clark, that the minister did not understand. But since that time we have been told repeatedly in this house by the minister that he has not yet completed his study.

With great respect and having in mind the minister's heavy responsibilities, may I ask him this question. I realize that he suffers a particular disability latterly, when he has not been able to walk the streets in his own clothes. However, that fact should in no way be regarded as an excuse for his not having completed the study. May I therefore ask him now whether the study has been completed. Has he made any recommendations to his colleagues? Does the government have any idea of implementing that report in part or otherwise? If it proposes to implement the report, is it the government's intention to establish a parliamentary committee, so that we may consider the report and the government's recommendations, or is this simply another stall on the part of this government, one that has devised more impressive ways of stalling than has any of its predecessors?

We have shown great forbearance tonight. We have progressed in the passage of the minister's estimates largely because we wanted to deal with this problem. We sympathize with the minister. We realize that he is the most studious Minister of National Health and Welfare in the history of our country. He is one of the most studious ministers, but he is not one of those who acts with the greatest rapidity. We ask him to tell us tonight what the government is going to do about this report. Is it something that we should forget?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): First of all, I should like to express my appreciation of the hon. member's concern about my clothes. As a matter of fact, at one time I had every intention of asking him for the loan of a suit. However, I suddenly realized that probably too many seams would have to be taken in and too many alterations made.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister is quite right there.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): However, I appreciate the kind gesture. The hon. member for Essex East has given the complete history of the Clark report and therefore I do not think that I need to go into it. I should like to assure him that I am an extremely slow but thorough reader. After I have read an article I sometimes must go back and study the more difficult points, those with depth and meaning. I admit that process takes me some time. However, I can assure the hon. member that I am giving deep study to this report. An interdepartmental committee has been studying it. I should not be too greatly surprised if before too long he were informed of the government's action.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At this instructive point, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I have some further observations to make, may we call it 10.30?

Mr. Churchill: Can we not go on for another 10 minutes and complete the estimates of this department?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that would be rather difficult.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We could not possibly finish them.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the house leader could give us as much indication as possible of what the government is planning for the rest of this week and whether he could even project his mind forward to next week. If he could do so, I think it might be very helpful to all hon. members.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, we are within sight of the end of this session.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: That is the hope I express.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The government must be forthcoming or we are not going to agree.

Mr. Churchill: We have left just four items in the Department of National Health and Welfare; we have the privy council items to pass—these were commenced the other day when the Prime Minister was speaking. We have also the estimates under the heading of legislation which Mr. Speaker himself deals with, and these do not normally occupy much of the time of the committee. We have also the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Finance and 20 items left in the Department of Transport, estimates of which were before the committee earlier, besides the Department of Veterans Affairs. Those are the estimates we have to complete.

On the legislative side we have the resolution stage with regard to the sports council, followed by the bill; the bill in connection with the Pine Point Railway which will be back for consideration in committee of the whole house and for third reading, and the debate on the dominion-provincial tax collection arrangements. For tomorrow, by arrangement, we shall take the resolution stage of the fitness and amateur sport proposal. On its completion, if we do not take all day on it—

Mr. Pickersgill: We won't.

Mr. Churchill: —I think we shall take the estimates of the privy council, followed then by those four items in health and welfare, and, depending on the time available, we might make a start, or perhaps even complete, the estimates of the Department of National Revenue.

An hon. Member: Some positive thinking there.

Mr. Churchill: Whether or not we sit Saturday I think we shall determine by noon tomorrow. We shall confer and see what the house would like to do. If we sit Saturday we might then find it possible to complete the business of the house by Thursday of next week. If we do not sit Saturday we might still finish by Thursday of next week. I do not know.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the leader of the house would permit one question. It is true that an order of the house was made that the government could be assured of going into supply on Monday and Tuesday. Is it the intention of the government to complete the legislation at the beginning of next week before going on to estimates?

Mr. Churchill: That is a very good question. But I should like to make an announcement concerning Monday tomorrow because, as I say, we are so close to the end it is a matter of adjustment and I shall be in a better position tomorrow to give that information.

It being 10.35 p.m., the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Tenth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines—Mr. Keays.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING FISCAL MATTERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies of correspondence exchanged between provincial premiers and myself on the subject of federal-provincial fiscal relations as requested by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on Friday, September 15.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to table the documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the Prime Minister ask leave to have it printed as an appendix to Hansard?

[Later:]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I am not sure that it was clearly understood, although I thought the Prime Minister assented to the proposition that the correspondence he tabled should be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought that was clear, Mr. Speaker. We follow that course regularly.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the correspondence tabled this morning by the Prime Minister be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For correspondence referred to above, see appendix.]

NATURAL RESOURCES

TABLING OF BACKGROUND PAPERS FOR CONFERENCE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies in English and French of the background papers for the resources for tomorrow's conference to be held in Montreal from October 23rd to the 28th. These papers have been prepared in two volumes by outstanding Canadian authorities in the field of renewable resources, that is, soil, water, forests, fisheries, wildlife and recreation, and will constitute the basis for discussion of these important subjects at the conference. They are also the first comprehensive renewable resource studies done in Canada and as such have outstanding general educational usefulness. Already one Canadian university has declared its intention to use the volumes as textbook material.

The volumes are available to members of the house through the checklist procedure and will be sold to the general public. They ensure that discussion at the conference will proceed on an organized basis. It is confidently expected that out of the resources for tomorrow conference will come much of the new thinking for intergovernmental cooperation required for the fullest development of our renewable natural resources and the sound advancement of Canada's dynamic and expanding national economy.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the documents tendered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

REVISION OF GRADES RESPECTING RAPESEED AND MUSTARD SEED

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-130, to amend the Canada Grain Act (rapeseed and mustard seed).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Rapp: Canada, Mr. Speaker, is best known in the commercial markets of the world for the high quality of its grain, particularly wheat. The purpose of this bill to amend the Canada Grain Act is to bring other grains such as rapeseed and mustard seed to the same high standard. Ninety to 95 per cent of all the rapeseed grown in this country is exported, and it is imperative that the quality of this grain be of the highest standard that we are able to achieve for it.

The amendment proposes to revise the present statutory grades for rapeseed to meet present-day trade requirements. This is in conformity with the suggestion of the board of grain commissioners for Canada to have the Canada Grain Act reclassified in accordance with attached schedules A and B. It also meets with the full approval of the Minister of Agriculture, under whose jurisdiction the Canadian wheat board and the board of grain commissioners for Canada come, and I am sure it will also meet with the approval of hon. members of the House of Commons. Schedules A and B are based on the recommendation of the chief grain inspector for the board of grain commissioners for Canada, and are in compliance with the export requirements, containing stipulations with regard to maximum percentage of foreign materials, degree of soundness and standard of cleanliness.

Clause 2 of the bill will change the definition of the grades of domestic mustard seed from the present commercial definition to a statutory definition. The committee on western grain standards established commercial grades for domestic mustard seed on November 4, 1953. These grades have now been revised to meet trade requirements, and the effect of this amendment is to raise these revised commercial grades to the precedence of statutory grades.

You will realize, Mr. Speaker, the importance of this amendment—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am glad to assure the hon. member that I do realize the importance of his bill.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask whether the government has considered taking over this important and useful measure and making it a government bill?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION ON SENATE AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the right honourable doctor of sacred letters, the Prime Minister, and I congratulate him on receiving this distinction from the outstanding university in the country. May I ask him what action the government proposes to take during this session with relation to item No. 1 on the order paper, that is consideration of a message from the Senate insisting upon its amendment to Bill No. C-72, to amend the Customs Tariff.

[Mr. Rapp.]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): First I want to thank the hon. gentleman, because I understand that he is also a holder of that degree. As I pointed out yesterday, I understand he is continuing his interest in that regard and that today he is going to start a missionary trip to western Canada and will endeavour to lead back the politically lost, in his view, in that part of the country.

In so far as the question itself is concerned, the house will be made fully aware of the circumstances before the conclusion of this session.

TRADE

AFRICA—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING EXPANSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask a question of the Prime Minister and doctor of sacred laws, and also congratulate him on receiving that degree. My question is based on a news story in the Globe and Mail of September 21, 1961, which I must say shocked my Anglican and socialist sense of propriety. The news item reads, in part:

> Canada will use beer and dancing girls to spearhead a million dollar trade drive into two expanding West African commonwealth markets early next year.

Would the Prime Minister inform the house whether these beer and circus proposals for the expansion of Canadian trade represent government policy and are a true reflection of Canadian character and culture, or do they result from the colourful exuberance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I feel sure the hon. gentleman did not intend to do more by his question than make the house aware of the fact that he has a continuing interest in high jinks, even if restricted to newspaper headlines.

TRANSPORT

EASTERN NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO BUILDING OF CAR FERRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport or, in his absence, to the acting minister. Would the minister advise if he is in a position to say whether a decision has been reached to build a new ferry to operate from some port on Newfoundland's east coast, and if so when construction will begin?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): We will take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

DRUGS

REPORTED INCREASE IN NUMBER OF FORGED PRESCRIPTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. R. Mitchell (Sudbury): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister anything to add to a dispatch in this morning's Toronto newspaper regarding an increase in the number of forged prescriptions for schedule G drugs as the result of recent federal legislation?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article in the newspaper, but I will be glad to look at it and give the hon. member an answer on Monday.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS

QUEBEC—POSSIBLE ADOPTION OF RESOLUTION RESPECTING SEPARATISM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister in connection with a press report to the effect that the national union party, at its rally in Quebec city, will adopt a resolution on the determination of separatism—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member goes further I should like to remind him that no member of this administration takes responsibility for what is going on in the place mentioned.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, will you permit me to ask my question and then you can judge if it is out of order? My question is this. In such a case, would the federal government submit the matter to the United Nations, as in the case of Katanga?

PUBLIC WORKS

OTTAWA—CONFLICT IN DATES AND TIMES OF PUBLIC FUNCTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. It has to do with a public function at which he is officiating, namely the opening of the Old Chelsea section of the Gatineau parkway in Gatineau park by the national capital commission. On the same day and at the same time the mayor and council of the corporation of the city of Ottawa are holding a public function honouring the opening of the Britannia water purification plant and pumping station. My question to the minister is this. In view of the conflict of the dates and times of these two interesting public functions, will he approach the city with a view to trying to rearrange the hour of one of the functions so that it would be possible for the same persons to go to both?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is with trepidation that I ever suggest to the city of Ottawa, and particularly to Her Worship, that they make any change with regard to any function. She is quite an authority on all things social, and I understand Her Worship feels that such distinguished citizens and statesmen as the hon. member for Ottawa West will have ample opportunity to attend the water purification plant ceremony first and then to go out to the ceremony in the Gatineau hills afterwards.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Hon. W. A. C. Bennett has distributed copies of the speech he made to the associated boards of trade of central British Columbia at Prince George on September 16 with regard to the Columbia river treaty, I presume the Prime Minister has also received a copy. I was going to ask him whether he had any comment to make with respect to the caustic criticisms on the part of Premier Bennett of certain aspects of the Columbia river treaty.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not get much time these days to read fiction.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR TODAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I just say a word with regard to the order of business for today. It is our intention to commence with the resolution stage of the legislation on physical fitness and amateur sports. I would advise hon. members that, if they would care to restrict their remarks today and pass that resolution rather quickly, we would then go on to the four items remaining in the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, which would be followed by the estimates of the Department of National Revenue. All those who would like to speak on the subject of fitness and amateur sport, a subject which is of great interest to the house and to the public, would have ample opportunity to do so on Monday, when the bill would come up for second reading.

The second thing I should like to say is this. It is the general wish of the house to sit tomorrow. That being the case, we would endeavour to deal with such estimates as are not finished today and then go on with those of privy council, legislation, veterans affairs and various supplementary estimates which must be dealt with.

SPORTS

ESTABLISHMENT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL ON FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the encouragement of fitness and amateur sport in Canada; to provide for the making of grants to agencies, organizations or institutions; to provide for entering into an agreement with any province for the payment by Canada to the province of certain contributions in respect of the costs of programs relating to fitness and amateur sport; to provide for the establishment of a council to be called the national advisory council on fitness and amateur sport; to provide for the payment of the chairman's remuneration and of the travelling and other expenses of the members of the council; and to provide further that the Minister of Finance shall pay out of the consolidated revenue fund each fiscal year such amounts not exceeding in the aggregate five million dollars as may be required for the purposes set forth in the measure.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Chown in the chair.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to introduce this measure relating to fitness and amateur sport, the intent of which was announced by the Prime Minister recently in Toronto. Particularly at this time when our thoughts are so much taken up with the sombre threat to our way of life, and indeed to human existence itself, it is refreshing and heart warming to turn to a matter which is wholly dedicated to the greater benefit and enjoyment of the people of Canada.

As hon. members are aware, the resolution now before the committee had its immediate origin in the throne speech of last November. The thinking behind these proposals is not, however, of so recent origin; it dates back several years and, in fact, includes the efforts of a number of hon. members of this house. These and others have been outspoken champions of fitness and amateur sport and have repeatedly urged some form of assistance from the dominion government in support of such activities. While it has not been possible to implement all their specific suggestions, I hope they will find in our new proposals the achievement of at least the spirit of their intentions.

It is, of course, no secret that the dominion government has previously made efforts in supporting a nation-wide program of physical fitness, and that these proved disappointing. But the fact that the program which was in force from 1943 to 1954 failed to meet expectations does not, to my mind, imply that the job cannot be done, that a new start should not be made. Indeed, as I will be pointing out later when the bill is before the house, circumstances have changed radically in the interval, and moreover, we are convinced that the present plans constitute a very substantial improvement over those previously in effect.

In outlining the background of this measure, mention should be made of the speech delivered by His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh before the Canadian medical association on June 30, 1959. On that occasion, the committee will recall, His Royal Highness drew attention with great force to the extent of what he termed "sub-health" among Canadians. He said:

There is evidence that despite everything, people in Canada are not as fit as they might be—

Then he went on to say:

Some scheme, therefore, which exists to encourage participation in all sports and recreations, for all ages and sections of the community is absolutely essential to any modern community with a high standard of living.

Whether it was the words themselves, or their source, or a combination of both plus a particularly favourable climate of opinion, there can be no doubt that this address by the Duke of Edinburgh had a far reaching impact on Canadian thinking. Certainly an important contributing factor to the enthusiam of the response on the part of Canadians was what His Royal Highness referred to as "the question of national prestige in sports and games." As he stated quite bluntly:

With a few notable exceptions, Canada's achievements in this line are hardly in keeping with a country which claims almost the highest standard of living in the world.

In any event, with this added stimulus the already growing interest in fitness and amateur sport, which as I have mentioned was highlighted by various members of this house, underwent a sharp upsurge throughout the country. Associations and organizations active in the field as well as the national sports governing bodies began to take on added drive and vitality.

The Canadian Medical Association, which had been the immediate recipient of the Duke of Edinburgh's challenge, stepped up its consideration of the problem. This bore fruit early in 1961 in the conference on physical fitness sponsored by the Canadian Medical Association in collaboration with its fellow professional organization, the Canadian association for health, physical education and recreation.

The interest of governments also increased. At the provincial level a number of special committees on physical fitness were set up. The committee in Ontario was under the leadership of that distinguished champion of amateur sport, Mr. Harry Price. In the case of the dominion government a new look was taken at the problem with a view to developing an approach which might fit into the current context and which might hold out hope for the achievement of real progress. My department had, of course, continued to maintain consultant services in this field, and had as well set up a special committee to give certain aspects of the subject serious study.

I might point out, incidentally that our reappraisal of the situation has already produced results aside from these present proposals. I refer to the provision of financial assistance through the municipal winter works program for the construction of recreational facilities, as well as the federal grant to the Canadian Olympic Association to further its efforts in obtaining for Canada the 1968 winter Olympics.

In attempting to draw up a new approach to fitness and amateur sport for the long term, we have taken account of a number of basic factors. While the precise relationship between fitness and health remains far from clear, there seems to be no doubt that participation in amateur sport and recreational activities does have a beneficial effect on an individual's well being, particularly with respect to his emotional and social outlook. Besides affording pleasure, participation in competitive games teaches valuable lessons in the exercise of personal powers to the full, in the development of team spirit, and in learning to respect and make friends with one's opponents. The value of these qualities speaks for itself.

Furthermore, in a world which is being constantly reduced more and more to neighbourhood proportions, such qualities can have a vital bearing on the achievement of understanding and friendship among nations and peoples. Indeed, this is where I see the greatest contribution of international competitions. Although we all experience a keen sense of pride and exhilaration when Canadians come out on top in such competitions, I would agree with those who maintain that this should not be the overriding consideration. Rather I would go along with the view of Pierre de Coubertin who had much to do with making the Olympic games what they are today. He said:

> The important thing is not winning but taking part. The essential thing in life is not conquering but fighting well.

That is the point I believe we should keep before us. Our aim should be primarily to provide the proper environment and training for the youth of Canada so they may in fact be good competitors. If this is done, then we can have every expectation that in due course Canada will have all the champions we could reasonably hope for.

But providing this proper environment and training is not a simple matter these days. Many trends in our society are against it. For example, there is the continuing movement of our people from the more vigorous life of rural areas to large, crowded cities, which too often do not furnish recreational and sports opportunities required by an urban population. Then too the effects of automation have drastically reduced manual labour, and have opened the way for an increasingly sedentary way of life for many Canadians.

These are some of the fundamental factors which we have borne in mind in developing the program which is the subject of the resolution now before the committee. Detailed comments on our new proposals will, of course, have to await presentation of the bill, but there are some general observations which I might make at this stage. As is obvious from the wording of the resolution, the scope of the projected program is broad and comprehensive. The program envisages very generous financial support on the part of the dominion government. Indeed, in setting aside an annual amount of $5 million we are providing greater assistance for fitness and amateur sport than has ever been available in Canada from a single public source.

Moreover, the program does not represent a stereotyped or rigid approach, but provides a framework through which federal aid may be channelled into those areas where it is needed. These include:

1. The provision of greater assistance to Canadian teams participating in sports meets both at home and abroad.

2. Support for the expansion of facilities and services for the training of coaches and instructors.

3. Provision of bursaries and fellowships to improve the competence of personnel connected with fitness and sport.

4. Support for research and for a greater effort in the field of information.

5. Granting of fitting recognition for outstanding achievement.

Advisory Council on Sports

As the resolution indicates, federal money will be available for the purposes of the program to agencies, organizations and institutions concerned with fitness and amateur sport. In addition, the proposed measure provides for the development of federal-provincial agreements through which a mutually acceptable arrangement can be worked out for federal assistance designed to strengthen and extend provincial programs in these fields.

In all its many aspects the new plan will benefit from the experience and guidance of a national advisory council which is to be set up under the terms of the legislation. This council will include not more than 30 members representing the provinces and the various agencies concerned with these subjects.

In this connection I should like to emphasize that we do not regard this new program as in any sense a purely federal venture. In the Prime Minister's words, we look on it as a people's program, with all that implies. In other words, not only will its full implementation rest at the grass roots level, but in its development we will welcome the advice and suggestions of all who have an interest in furthering the fitness of the people of Canada, in bringing to our sports activities the qualities that will not only produce champions but will also provide opportunities for as many Canadians as possible to enjoy and benefit from healthy participation in sport and recreational activity.

In referring to this new measure in Toronto recently the Prime Minister formally invited the assistance of any and all Canadians interested in these matters. I am happy to say the response has exceeded all expectations, and I should like to take this opportunity to thank those who have sent us their views. I can assure them that their comments are being given careful study.

In presenting this resolution to the committee today, I should like to follow the Prime Minister's example and say that the government would welcome any suggestions concerning the proposed program which hon. members may wish to put forward. We are very anxious that this be in the fullest sense a bipartisan effort, and to this end I can assure hon. members that their suggestions will be accorded the most serious consideration by the government.

While I would not wish to dampen in any way the enthusiasm aroused by the announcement of this new undertaking, I feel I should issue a word of caution. Although I believe the program to be an excellent one, I do not think we should expect it to achieve miracles overnight. Significant gains will be registered only after a sustained effort, and much remains to be done before such an effort can be mounted successfully. Progress at first may seem slow, especially if we concentrate on building carefully rather than spectacularly, but we have tremendously improved resources to work with compared to the past.

Given time and patience, I hope we will see great things develop in this field. I hope we will see mounting numbers of our young people engaging in track and field sports, in baseball, hockey, and tennis, to name only a few. I hope we will see adequate facilities for all kinds of sport spring up throughout the length and breadth of Canada. And finally, I hope we will see more and more Canadian athletes achieve that degree of excellence which will make them the equal of the best the world can offer today and in the years ahead.

These are my expectations, Mr. Chairman, as we embark upon an undertaking which I am confident will make a unique contribution to our national development and well-being.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, hon. members who heard me speak a couple of years ago on a private member's resolution having to do with this matter will not be surprised when I say that we on this side will support the resolution before the committee. When it is embodied in a bill, Mr. Chairman, we will be glad to accept the minister's invitation to contribute some constructive suggestions which perhaps will improve the bill.

As the minister said, the matter is noncontroversial and I think can be approached in a bipartisan way. It is also, as he pointed out, a resolution which deals with a more cheerful matter than most of those which we have been considering since the house resumed its session.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that in its original form the resolution was one to which we would have taken exception, but that particular difficulty has been removed by the amendment which was made so that it now reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the encouragement of fitness——not through amateur sport, as the first draft of the resolution had it, but the encouragement of fitness and amateur sport in Canada, this is a much better and a much broader way of approaching the problem, as the minister himself pointed out the other day.

Normally there can be a difference between physical fitness and amateur sport. While it may be desirable, and I think it is, for government to accept in this day and age, both on the federal and the provincial levels, some responsibility in this matter, that responsibility may well be different in its application to physical fitness than to amateur sport.

The resolution itself makes clear that the obligation which the government asks the house to accept in this regard is to be discharged by grants and also—and this is of course very wise—through co-operation with the provinces. Not only must there be, or should there be, co-operation with the provinces, but there must also be, as I think the minister pointed out, the closest kind of co-operation with voluntary bodies concerned with fitness and amateur sport. For this purpose the resolution proposes the establishment of a national advisory council on physical fitness and amateur sport with a paid chairman.

There will be, and there have already been, those in the country who are worried about the entry of the federal government into this field. I have before me an editorial from the Montreal Star of August 29 which gives expression to that worry, arising out of the possibility of government assistance in this field somehow prejudicing the assistance that government should give and has been giving to activities of a non-material kind in other fields. I see no reason why one should in any way interfere with the other, because I think they are both essential.

The editorial which I have just mentioned, expressing this anxiety—and it is an anxiety we ought to keep in mind—has this paragraph:

> But even through the vociferous cheering—

The government's announcement has been received with a certain amount of cheering.

> —we can hear the subdued voice of the Canadian taxpayer murmuring that he can think of much better ways of spending the money. If anybody put it to him in these terms he would say he would rather see the money go to training minds than bodies.

Mr. Benidickson: Let's do both.

Mr. Pearson: Nobody in this chamber will underestimate at this time the importance of the maximum effort being made by all governments in the training of minds, but surely there is no contradiction between doing perhaps even more than we are doing now for the training of minds, and this initiative to assist in the development of fit bodies through amateur sport and facilities for physical fitness is a step in the right direction. Therefore I do not myself accept any contradiction between these two objectives, although I think there is a danger. If government is not careful it might do more for one than the other, and therefore the balance will have to be preserved. In that balance, of course, I think we would all agree that the training of minds is even more important than the training of bodies.

This resolution and the action which will be taken, we hope, through the bill which will be based on it, deal with amateur sport as well as physical fitness. Perhaps we should ask ourselves how government can properly and constructively assist in this field of amateur sport. We might even ask ourselves a question which is not too easy to answer these days. What is amateur sport? The definition of amateur sport in certain instances, and only in certain instances, is such as to take a good deal of the content and meaning out of the word "amateur", and I am sure no one in this house or in the government would wish to direct the kind of assistance for amateur sport which is visualized in this action in a way which would help certain sports bodies train and develop athletes for professional activities when they graduate from some of those amateur bodies.

Then of course amateur sport itself—and I think mention was made of this—has two aspects. There is the domestic aspect and the international aspect. It is perfectly true that the achievements of a nation in amateur athletics, amateur sport, in its domestic aspect leads to achievement in the international side of amateur sport which does do something for a nation's morale, its confidence and its prestige. It may be unfortunate, but it is true that the prestige of a country can be affected by failure in this field, though it should not be nearly as important as failure in other fields. However, in the light of present conditions—all the publicity attached to international sport and the fact that certain societies, particularly the communist societies, use international sport, as they use everything else, for the advancement of prestige and political purposes, it is a matter of some consequence that we in Canada should do what we can to develop and regain the prestige we once had, to a greater extent than we now have in international competition.

The minister mentioned Baron de Coubertin, the founder of the Olympic games and his emphasis, which at least in theory has been the emphasis of the Olympic games ever since, that it is not the achievement but the participation which matters. It is very difficult to maintain that ideal in the face of international competition of the type we have today, even at the Olympic games. Therefore I would hope that an important by-product of assistance, and I think it would only be a by-product, would be to recover in this country most of the prestige that we once had in the field of international athletic competitions.

There was a time not very many years ago when our population was less than half what it is now, when governments did not assist international athletic competition, when we did not have the facilities that we have now, let alone the people, when we loomed very large in international competition, especially at the Olympic games. I think I have mentioned before in the house that in 1924 or 1926, I am not sure which, Canada, with not as large a team as she has been able to send to recent Olympic games, managed to win the 100 yards and the 220 yards, and would have won the 440 yards if Jim Ball from Winnipeg had not looked back in the last 10 yards. There is a lesson in that for all of us, not only in athletic competition.

I should hope that the action we are being asked to take now, would do something to encourage the zest for international competition by Canadians, because that is a legitimate and laudable objective, and I think government support of this sort of thing is also legitimate. However, as I said a few minutes ago, the plan has to be very carefully administered indeed; otherwise we may find that our support is going in directions which will not help to achieve the objectives we have in mind. The support can be direct, but I suspect it will be found to be most useful when it is indirect, through helping to finance and develop training facilities and all that kind of thing. Indeed, this is mentioned in the resolution itself.

But government support, however great—I am talking not only about athletics, not only about sport but also about fitness, which is related—will not alone draw young people away from television sets and into games, competition and fitness. There must be in young people that zest for competition, that zest for achievement in games, that desire to go out and take part which I think used to be more noticeable in Canada, when I was young than it is now. We did not have so many distractions at that time, and we were perhaps more concerned with this kind of activity and the good effect it used to have on our fitness and on national morale in those days. All Canadians in those early days got a thrill out of the achievements of our athletes at the Olympic games. I am going back a long way before world war I, when it was taken for granted that if a Canadian did not win the marathon race at the Olympic games he would be among the first two or three, and we had some of the greatest runners of all time in those days.

Perhaps the contrast between that day and now is to be seen in the fact that there is less interest in amateur competition, less interest in games for the sake of playing games, and greater interest in professional competition and in watching professional competition, something about which I should not be very critical because I spend a good deal of time doing it myself. I think there is also a good illustration in the contrast between our sort of North American approach to these matters and that part of the European approach with which I am familiar. At Oxford University in England—and it is still the same as it was 100 years ago—every day after lunch every student takes part in some form of athletic activity, and if he does not he is considered to be very queer indeed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oxford is not the only place where that is done.

Mr. Pearson: It is not quite as easy to do that over here, and there is not quite the same incentive. I do not know what is responsible for this change. Perhaps it is a change in our way of life, a change in the habits and customs of the people. I hope that government intervention of this kind may do something to restore what I like to think was an earlier, healthier condition both in games and in fitness. There is no profit in trying to blame anybody or anything. "The fault, dear Brutus, perhaps does not lie in our stars", though the cult of the star may have had something to do with it; and it certainly does not lie in our governments. Rather it lies in ourselves and the situation can be changed if the people wish to change it.

Australia is a good example of what can be done to develop fitness, zest and participation in games without too much government support. There is government support, but that support is not nearly as important as the co-operation that Australian athletes and youth get from voluntary bodies. The same is true in France. There is a good deal of government support in France, and this has a bearing on the danger I mentioned a few moments ago, the danger of perhaps overbalancing support for fitness against support for things of the mind. In France there is more government assistance for the arts, letters and sciences, I suppose, than in any other country in the world—I speak without knowledge of all the facts— and that goes alongside assistance for physical fitness, so the two things are not incompatible.

There is a danger in the government entering this field which I have only touched on so far, the danger that now that the government has taken this responsibility and accepted this obligation there may be a tendency to leave too much to the federal government in what we are now beginning to do. There is also a danger in the administration of a fund of this kind, and we are all aware of that. Who will be helped and how will they be helped? One of the competitions which will develop shortly and for which there will be a great deal of zest will be the competition to share in this appropriation on the part of all those who think quite rightly that they deserve and need help. Therefore the administration of this fund is going to be very important indeed, and the whole thing can be spoiled by the wrong kind of administration.

I do not need to mention to the minister that it is absolutely essential that there should be completely non-political control over the administration of this fund, as all members will agree, I think, there is in the administration of the funds of the Canada council. The dangers that might arise if this did not happen have been referred to by a good many sports editors who have written some very perceptive articles on the subject matter of this resolution. Jack Kinsella, in the Ottawa Citizen of August 28, 1961, had this to say, and he is in favour of this legislation as I think all sports editors are:

> The only thing I don't like about the plan is the inference that it will be politically controlled. Like oil and water, sport and politics don't mix too well.

I have not myself drawn any such inference from the resolution, and I hope none will be required to be drawn. One reason, of course, why the Canada council has this relative independence from political interference is that the council itself is financially independent, in the sense that it derives its income from an endowment. This council, as I understand it, will get its income by means of an annual vote and this, in the nature of things, may result in the loss of such independence as an agency like the Canada council has.

Incidentally, in reference to this question of balance between help for the arts and letters and help for sports and fitness, it is perhaps just as well to remind ourselves that while the amount in this resolution is $5 million a year, that is about twice the income the Canada council gets for all it is trying to do in the field of the arts, letters and sciences. Perhaps the time will come, perhaps it has already come, when the Canada council will make us aware of the fact that this balance will have to be redressed and the council will have to be given more help. The council has already, I believe, made representations in that regard, yet $5 million may soon be considered not enough for all the work that this council may wish to do.

There is an article in the Montreal Star of August 30, 1961 by Baz O'Meara in which he says:

> It isn't enough, it should be $25 million.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, it will never be enough.

Then I hope the assistance which is given through this action will be given not to those—I am talking now about the amateur sports side of it—sports which are self sustaining because they are spectator sports. We do not want to help hockey clubs produce professional hockey players or junior football clubs produce professional football players or baseball clubs produce professional baseball players. We do want to help, I think, through the creation of facilities, those sports which will never be self sustaining in the sense that they will be able to meet their expenses. I am thinking of those sports which are extremely important from the physical fitness point of view. I am thinking of aquatic sports and of Ted Reeves' passionate desire to bring lacrosse back to its old place as Canada's national game.

There is one other consideration which I might mention to the committee, and that is the danger which always attaches to this kind of government assistance and actions which are not directly within the field of government activity. I refer to the fact that once this activity becomes dependent to a great extent on government support, then it becomes more difficult to get voluntary assistance for it. The net result would not be good; it would be bad, if these public spirited citizens and organizations in the country who are now interested in amateur sport and fitness felt that now the government had taken over they would not have to do so much; they would not have to produce the funds. I hope it will be made clear that this kind of assistance is a supplement to what people can do for themselves.

This is the danger—perhaps "danger" is too strong a word—as it is apparent in connection with the work of the Canada council. There is a tendency to say the Canada council has this endowment so corporations and wealthy individuals feel they no longer need to contribute. It was the intention of the government in setting up the council to use government support as the foundation on which private enterprise could build its support. However, the temptation is to say, let the government do it; it has taken on this job. I hope this will not happen in connection with this resolution.

Perhaps before I conclude, Mr. Chairman, I might pay my own tribute to those organizations in the country which without very much encouragement in the past have done what they could in this field. I know some of them have become discouraged, but they have worked very hard to improve the physical fitness of our people. I am thinking of Lloyd Percival's sports college, and I am thinking of the central fitness council run by Mr. Harcourt Roy, out in Vancouver, and the difficult, rather discouraging work he tried to do to develop physical fitness. I believe he has given up this work and returned to England. There have been people in this country who, in these relatively dark days compared with the brighter days of 25 or 30 years ago in the field of amateur athletics and fitness, have been trying to improve the fitness of the people of this country. This is important work, and the ideal they have in mind is an important ideal; to build up the fitness of our people, not only through amateur athletics but through more direct methods such as those which have been put forward by these two men to whom I have referred.

When the bill is before the house, Mr. Chairman, there will be, as I have said, an opportunity to deal with this matter in detail. However, I am afraid I shall not be able to do so because, as the Prime Minister mentioned, I am going off on a missionary tour shortly in response to the cries of those people who are hungry for the pure gospel. I can only say at this time that we will support the bill and the resolution on which it is based, and we hope that this action by the government will achieve the objective which the government has in mind, of improving the fitness of our people at a time when fitness of the body is only second in importance to fitness of the mind. We hope they will be able to encourage amateur sports generally as a step in the direction of the improvement in physical fitness.

Mr. Pitman: It is certainly the wish of our party to congratulate the government upon the introduction of this resolution, and especially to congratulate the minister for the very gracious way in which he performed that introduction. This matter is of great interest to all members of this house, as was indicated by the debate on a private member's resolution some months ago. Certainly the interest shown by the hon. member for Kootenay West, who unfortunately had to leave the chamber before he could make his remarks, and by the hon. member for Port Arthur indicates the feeling of our members.

No one questions the purpose of this resolution, nor do we question the need for the bill which will follow, we have no way in which we can obtain accurate statistics as to the level of physical fitness throughout this nation. Over the years we have been receiving some indication from those who are engaged in physical education in the various provinces of Canada that our level is falling behind that which has been achieved in other parts of the world.

A resolution of this nature perhaps raises as many questions as it answers. How do we encourage physical fitness and amateur sports?

How do we encourage physical fitness through amateur sports? It is not the same as subsidizing agriculture or gold mining, because the success of such a program depends on the realization of the material benefits that will be received through the acceptance of the subsidy. Surely the success of this measure is dependent upon the enthusiasm and initiative of the young people or people of all ages who are going to be encouraged to take part in amateur sports, who are going to be encouraged to improve their level of physical fitness.

I am sure each one of us from the various constituencies in Canada has passed playing fields on Saturday afternoon which were completely empty. All of us have heard of schools where they could not find enough boys to play on the football team even though the equipment was there and there was plenty of money available. This is a crucial question; how can a government encourage enthusiasm for physical fitness through legislation?

Another question that arises is this. What group are we mainly concerned with? Are we mainly concerned with young people, or are we really going to try to encourage physical fitness in other age groups? The Leader of the Opposition raised the whole question of what is amateur sport. Can we subsidize amateur sport without the realization that possibly this legislation will be used by professional entrepreneurs for their own benefit as well? The fact is that many sports start out as amateur but end up very much as professional enterprises. Of course the question that arises is this: What sport produces physical fitness to the highest degree and most efficiently? I am sure the minister and his department have dealt with these questions as they bring this resolution to the floor of the House of Commons. Certainly I hope they have done so.

One body which I think has done a great deal in this area is the Central Council of Physical Education in Great Britain, which since 1936 has been trying to deal with the very problem which the minister has brought before us this morning. I should like to read one or two sentences from the 19th annual report of this body:

> Our declared aim is: "to promote and improve the physical and mental health of the community through the development of physical recreation". In other words, people are our primary concern, physical recreation—games and sports of all kinds, outdoor activity such as climbing and camping, recreative physical training, dancing and so on—a means to the end.

In other words, let us not regard sports in too narrow a field. The minister mentioned track and field, hockey and football, but let us not simply consider sport as it is portrayed on the sporting pages of our national newspapers. The results of sports on physical recreation can perhaps be met in many other areas which receive very faint recognition by many sports minded people. Then the report goes on to say this:

> The forty or so activities with which we are concerned offer fresh air and exercise to sedentary workers; encourage youngsters to develop their potentialities, to seek adventure and to learn to work and live with others; introduce people of all ages to skills which may give them lifelong pleasure; foster the fuller use and appreciation of the countryside; proffer companionship to the lonely; and guide into constructive channels the energies of those who seek self expression through movement.

Here I think is a very important reflection which the author puts in this last sentence:

> But few will voluntarily take part in a physical activity simply because it may "do them good". It must capture their interest, arouse their enthusiasm, make demands on their physical and mental resources—only then will it be really satisfying, really educational.

I would commend those words to the minister and his department because I think this is the crucial point. How do we arouse enthusiasm? How do we arouse initiative?

My greatest fear in connection with this resolution is that we may lose sight of the aim expressed in it. I am sure the Prime Minister did not mean to give this impression, and perhaps I am wrenching this statement out of its context, but when he announced this bill in Toronto he said:

> Success in competitive sports ... has become an important element in the contest for the hearts of men. Success in Olympic games and in all fields of international competitive sports has a tremendous effect upon the prestige of nations.

I hope this consideration will not deflect our minds from the main purpose. Reading from an editorial which appeared in an Ontario newspaper, the Peterborough Examiner on August 29, we find concern expressed on the part of this writer who states in one sentence as follows:

> If the national advisory council is going to have a brief with overtones of the cold war, we might as well forget about encouragement and take up the Soviet system of compulsory exercises in the factory every day at 11 a.m.

We are certainly interested in the Olympic competitions. However, I think the British council has a point when it says this:

> British supremacy in international sport is not the objective of the central council of physical recreation. Yet, the better the council does its work of encouraging everyone, the more probable it is that the country will produce sportsmen of Olympic calibre. Only by broadening the base of the pyramid of participation can its height be increased.

The government in this resolution has chosen three methods by means of which these purposes can be achieved. The first is by making grants to agencies, organizations or institutions. Of course we hope to see by the bill just exactly what this will mean. However, at this particular moment the matter is all very vague and one is filled with doubts. On what basis is the government going to decide just what are the aims of an organization? Is it really concerned with physical fitness, or does it have other social aims which may entirely undermine the efforts of this agency in carrying out the purpose of this resolution? Before the great rush begins for part of this $5 million, surely a criterion must be established for evaluating the basis on which contributions will be made to these various agencies in order to ensure that the agencies know what amateur sport really is and what its purposes really are.

One person has called it a "slush fund for sport". None of us in this chamber wish to see this take place. However, the national government must take some responsibility for defining with excessive care the kind of sports and activities which will fulfil the aims, the kind of agency which is sincerely motivated to provide physical fitness recreation, which does not have other interest involved and which is concerned also with mass participation.

The second method suggested in this resolution is to provide for entering into an agreement with any province for the payment by Canada to the province of certain contributions in respect of the costs of programs relating to fitness and amateur sport. As we discuss this resolution I am sure we are sobered by the fact that we have already had a physical fitness act. I note that the hon. member for Essex East has just left the chamber. However, before this resolution stage has been completed I hope the hon. member for Essex East, as the former minister of national health and welfare, will give us the benefit of some of his experiences in this field.

Why did that act fail? I spent some time in reading over the minutes of the council from 1943 to 1952 to see whether I could discover why that act had failed to arouse the imagination of the provinces. In 1946 this physical fitness legislation, which was put through by the former administration, was given a citation by the American academy of physical education as pioneering legislation in the interests of human development. Yet by 1953 it had failed. Province after province had not passed physical fitness acts, which I think it had been hoped would be passed. You find rather a sort of ad hoc arrangement by means of which the provinces were attempting to carry out their responsibilities through health and welfare departments, public education departments and so on.

Advisory Council on Sports

I was much impressed by the great variety of activities carried on under that physical fitness act in attempting to raise the standard of physical fitness, in attempting to find a role for sports in all parts of Canada, and in attempting to encourage youth through the setting up of physical education departments in our universities. But while I was deeply impressed by what was done, none the less the act failed and it has been wiped off our statute books. In many cases the provinces failed to take up the grants that were available. I note that British Columbia and Saskatchewan seem to have had the most interest in accepting the grants. But certainly as you read through the minutes you could not help but feel that there were major problems. I hope those problems have been looked into by this government, and that they have been dealt with. I noted with some hope a remark by the minister, when he stated that some of the difficulties and concerns in 1961 are different from those of the '40's and '50's. This gives us reason to believe that new initiative in this field will have some effect. I certainly receive the impression that there was a disconcerting lack of trained personnel back in the 1940's and 1950's. With the increase in the physical education branches of our universities, and certainly the far more ambitious program of assistance, we hope that some of these problems are going to be dealt with. We come to this problem with some feeling of frustration, what we call our frustration of federalism. I am not speaking in a partisan way in this connection, but so often I think we give money to the provinces and in order to accept this money they have to share part of the cost. As a result this of course immediately dampens some of their enthusiasm.

Even more important, so often they have to provide the initiative, they have to provide the administration and they really have to provide the pattern by which this legislation that is going to provide physical fitness at the lower levels will be realized. So often there is insufficient direction and planning from the federal government to give this initiative to the provincial governments.

I must say that in many cases I feel this almost circumvents our democratic system. For example, last night we talked about vocational training for unemployed. We find that in spite of the fact that the dominion government has been most generous, this program has not been accepted in the dynamic way in which the federal government itself hoped it would be accepted. The provinces have not gone all out to train unemployed people. This is the problem. When it comes to debating it in this house, of course the government rightly says it is the fault of the provinces because they have not gone all out in the program. When it is debated in the provinces the provincial governments say it is a federal plan, the federal government has provided 75 per cent of the funds and it is really not their responsibility. I think this is a negation of our whole system of democratic governmental responsibility.

I think the people of Canada tend to become disconcerted by this approach. There is nowhere you can say somebody is at fault or somebody should take the praise for the measure. I hope this will not be the effect of this particular piece of legislation. I hope there will be definite direction and plans from above, and that there will be a real effort to make sure that this legislation is carried out in a dynamic way.

One of the problems that I am sure the provinces are going to face in carrying out this measure is the lack of facilities. It is too bad that last winter we could not have been building recreation centres across Canada into which this program could have fitted. We could have provided the horse before we provided the cart. It is too bad, because I think this is a major problem. The minister mentioned track and field facilities as a major area of our concern. In my constituency there is not an indoor track within 80 miles. How can we, in a climate like ours, produce athletes of Olympic calibre and sports enthusiasts under these conditions? There is not a decent outdoor track for 40 miles, and we virtually have to go down and kick the ponies off the racetrack and try to run the boys and girls in what can only be described as mud in many cases. A country the size of Canada should be providing these facilities at this stage.

We hear this all across Canada from other track and field groups, universities and high schools. Until we provide facilities we cannot produce the results. Is it not too bad that the Minister of Public Works did not announce a bill extending N.H.A. financing to municipalities in order to provide recreation centres, instead of paying out so much money in unemployment insurance. This could be done either through the winter works program or N.H.A. financing, as we have done in providing residences to universities, sewage projects, and so on.

We must show that the national government is serious about this whole matter of physical fitness. We know there is a problem regarding swimming. I think there are only three or four Olympic size swimming pools across this nation. I think this is a serious problem. We are not concerned, I am sure, about simply producing Olympic champions. I am sure when we realize that the U.S.S.R. produced a championship gymnastic team, it is not the fact that seven of their people won Olympic gold medals which concerns us, but that the Olympic team was chosen from several thousands gymnasts across the U.S.S.R. I am sure this is the kind of thing this legislation is designed to do, and we sincerely hope it will achieve these results. But it must be done with considerable purpose, planning and direction if it is going to provide the kind of results which all of us in this chamber, of every party, are hoping will be achieved.

The second theme, apart from the question of facilities, is the problem of leadership. We still do not have enough people to lead a program of this kind. The central council of physical recreation of Great Britain, which I have just mentioned, set up three national physical recreation centres. Is this not what we need? Perhaps we need national emphasis to provide leadership. That council in Great Britain spent only one fifth the amount we are proposing to spend in one year, and they trained 12,000 people in these recreational centres in every sport imaginable. I think we have to provide leadership, perhaps national physical recreational clinics, to give direction throughout the whole of Canada if this physical fitness program is going to have any effect. It so often happens that plans are arrived at by the national advisory council at the top but they do not come down to the bottom, to the level at which the actual physical fitness takes place. Unless people at the bottom are completely cognizant of those plans at the top and how they are to be carried out, how can a scheme such as this work properly? I think this is a major problem which the former legislation failed to solve.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned the whole question of financing. We are impressed with the amount of money this government has decided to put into this effort. Perhaps, indeed, it will encourage this government to give more money to the areas of education, the arts and the Canada council. In Britain, for example, 50 per cent of the money is provided by private donations. We want to encourage the people of Canada in this regard, because perhaps this is the answer. The Leader of the Opposition said we do not want voluntary agencies to give up and not contribute anything now and let the national government do it all. Is there not a possibility that private donations to this scheme might have some validity and might be a way of centering the interest of the Canadian people upon this scheme?

Of course the third major aspect of this resolution is the creation of the national advisory council. This is the body which must give the direction at the top. As I see it, under the last physical fitness act the problem was that the men at the top knew what they were doing and were making a very worthy effort, but the plans at the top never reached the bottom. I believe this was the major failure of the effort we have already made. I think this is what we must learn from that effort if this program is going to be successful.

The men to be appointed to this council will be a matter of some concern. This will be as large a problem for the minister as deciding which agencies are going to receive the grants. This will be a very difficult problem for the minister and I hope he has already been at work dealing with it. For example, on the council in Great Britain they have men such as Noel Baker, the Nobel prize winner, Right Hon. Vincent Hampden and Brigadier Sir John Hunt. These men are interested in the arts and sciences as well as simply in physical recreation; they are men with wide interests. I think these are the kind of men we want on this council, men who are distinguished in their experience and interests but also who do not see amateur sport simply as poor competition.

I am sure the progress of this bill will be viewed with great interest not only in this house but in the country. I know all of us are hoping that this bill will be worthy of the interest and concern of this chamber, and certainly it will receive the full support of this New Democratic party in this house.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity of speaking on the sports program brought forward by our government to encourage our youth in amateur athletics, and of presenting my personal observations and suggestions in this regard. In my maiden speech in the House of Commons, on January 20, 1959 I was privileged to be the first to mention and support amateur sports and the advisability of the government lending financial assistance in this field. At that time I said:

> It is my opinion that it is now time for our government to take a look at things. A ministry of sports and athletic development might be the answer. With government assistance we might be able to reach the day when we could send national teams abroad without forcing their leaders to go begging for funds to make the trip.
> Millions of dollars are spent each year on cultural development in this country. I am in total accord with this as any fair minded sportsman would be. I also feel, however, we should spend a similar amount on the physical and athletic development of our young Canadians. Let the government look at the by-product of sports events.
> There is the good will the competition fosters for Canada; the easing of international tension through international sports; the raising of the prestige of the country through participation, and the example the sportsmen on these teams set for our youth. So far Canada has not achieved the place in international competition which the potential we have warrants. However, with proper assistance that goal is attainable.

There were few things in the government's throne speech earlier this session that brought more loud cheers from Canadians, and especially our youth, than the government's announced intention to give financial assistance to the furthering of amateur sport. The position in which I now find myself makes me very happy. For years I, along with many other sports minded Canadians, have been talking up sport, aiding it in every way I can so that young Canadians can develop healthy bodies and healthy minds. I am now in a position to offer suggestions as to how government aid to a national sports program might be administered.

Although we as Canadians become quite smug about our material attainments, our high standard of living, we trail far behind other countries in the provision of facilities for our sportsmen. Russia, of course, is an example which first comes to mind of a country that is leaps and bounds ahead of us. Through a concentrated government crash program, that country has been dotted with sports palaces, swimming pools and local gymnastic training programs. You might say they are as far ahead of us in their programs as their runners were in the summer Olympics at Rome and as their hockey players were in the winter games at Cortina. The results of government assistance like that provided in Russia have been evident in recent Olympic games, just as our lack of a program here has been evident in our dismal showings.

The ideas that I would like now to present are a combination of my own thoughts, and suggestions from other sportsmen across the country that have flowed into me since the announcement that the government would undertake this program of aid to amateur sports. Because we seem so far behind other countries in this matter our problems are manifold, and for that reason they must be approached step by step. I suggest that our three realms of activity could be:

1. The provision of sports facilities, adequate playing fields, stadia, swimming pools, gymnasiums, tennis courts, and other training and competitive areas. These facilities would mean physical fitness for our youth.

2. The provision of competent coaches, invaluable to our youth.

3. Direct financial aid to national teams representing Canada in international events.

To remedy Canada's lack of sports facilities, I suggest that the government consider a plan providing a certain amount of money per year for, say, 20 years. Grants would be made available to communities which agree to build stadia, playing fields, pools, etc., which conform to recognized international standards, and to any others which Canada may see fit to impose. Because we are far behind, these grants should be substantial so that, say, perhaps 20 communities across the land could get modern facilities each year. These naturally should be strategically located throughout Canada to give the best possible service at the start. The gaps in location could be filled in in future years. This money should not go to communities without there being some evidence of civic support and interest. The government might provide 50 per cent of the cost of any approved scheme; the rest could be raised by the community concerned.

Turning to the question of government aid in the provision of competent coaches for our young sportsmen in every field, it is my suggestion that the government make annual grants to existing amateur sports groups which can come up with a coaching plan and approved coaches who should be, I would think, internationally known figures such as Rocket Richard and Gordie Howe in hockey, Gus Ryder and Cliff Lumsden in swimming, Mr. Reid of Vancouver in rowing, and Wally Brown in track and field, etc. We will have to pay for the best, but if we do it will undoubtedly pay off in a more fit Canada, a healthier youth who will build a healthier nation. The results have been evident in our sister country of the commonwealth, Australia, where a concentrated sports program has produced the world's greatest runners and swimmers.

On the other hand, the government may decide that full time coaches would be desirable. These could be employed by the federal government that will operate the nation's sports program, and made available to clubs across the country on demand. When not out on the hustings in this capacity, these coaches might be planning Canada's future progress in their particular lines, developing visual aids with special films, delivering talks and writing manuals on sport.

Let us now turn to the matter of competition expenses of our sportsmen who will develop this far reaching program. It is my belief and that of millions of sports loving Canadians that all national teams going to international events such as the Olympics, the Pan-American and commonwealth games, world hockey tournaments, Davis cup tennis championships, etc., should have their basic expenses paid by the national treasury. Their costs of uniforms, equipment; hotel and travelling expenses and other incidentals should also be met. I do not believe, however, that there should be a scheme providing for personal reimbursement for time lost from employment. If some private contributors wished to help defray the loss of money by any individual, that would be another matter. It is my firm belief that all our national sports representatives should be removed from the embarrassing position of having to go, cap in hand, begging for bare necessities when other nations fully back up their sporstmen through the treasury.

I am very close to this problem, coming from the Waterloo North constituency which I call home. Its major municipalities, the twin communities of Kitchener-Waterloo, through their former hockey team, the Dutchmen, represented Canada in two Olympic hockey tournaments. In order to make these two trips the people of Kitchener-Waterloo and the district, along with some sports minded friends, had to raise over $40,000 for expenses. Financial worries for those taking part are a big hindrance in their desire to win. This was clearly demonstrated in the case of the Dutchmen, who had to make a special effort the last few days prior to departure for Squaw Valley in raising extra funds. Yet this team was not representing Kitchener-Waterloo; it was Canada's team. All Canada felt sorrow at their plight and there was experienced almost a national embarrassment when the team lost to the Russians in 1956 and to the Americans last year.

This situation also applied in the cases of Miss Anne Heggtveit, Canada's first Olympic Alpine champion, the champion pair skaters of Toronto and others who competed. They carried the financial burden, assisted by donations from individuals and associations. Our country did not share in the expense incurred in sending these athletes thousands of miles to compete in the highest arena of sports in the world.

In providing this money, however, there is an underlying danger. There must be a proper balance struck so that individual initiative and leadership are maintained and encouraged. Too much welfare dulls the spirit. Not enough of it means misery, as some of our teams that have struggled to compete in international competition will attest. Sport is no different from anything else. If it is made too easy the sportsmen will not appreciate it.

Now the major consideration is, how can this country-wide program of aid to amateur athletics be instituted? This council, to be called a national advisory council on fitness and amateur sport, should have a permanent office in Ottawa, with the funds administered through the department of health and welfare by the minister of that department. So that the ideas can filter down to local levels there should be a voluntary provincial council or sports body of some kind headed by an Ottawa appointed sportsman. Then in each sizeable community across the country there should be a local community recreational council similar to the one acting in my home town of Elmira and other similar centres, to carry out the broad program and wishes of the national committee or council. About 15 years ago this council was instituted in my home town and I had the honour and privilege of being its first president. This council has been very successful, and in order to show the committee just what it means, our town of 3,200 people is spending $15,000 every year for recreation and sports purposes.

How can we maintain this spirit of helping while getting aid from the government? One answer could be a national sports day each year, when every local group would sponsor a program to raise money to augment the national effort. We could aim at, perhaps, 10 cents a head. That would provide $10,000 alone in my own twin cities of Kitchener-Waterloo and district, and in Canada as a whole $1.8 million. The money would go a long way to pay administrative costs and some of the expenses. In addition, the publicity and the locally staged efforts would give the program the national focus it would need to whip up country-wide support.

These are my suggestions, Mr. Speaker, for a sports organization that, I believe, will in a few years put Canada in its rightful place in world sports activities, and in so doing it will develop generation after generation of young Canadians with healthy bodies, healthy minds and a true understanding of sportsmanship, fellowship and friendship.

The problem of juvenile delinquency has become so widespread that it constitutes a pretty serious indictment of the society in which we live. The fact that this problem is caused by only a small minority of our youth does not excuse it nor minimize its importance. In 1958 Canada had 31,000 or more juvenile delinquents. Like all proud parents we expect a lot from our children, and we must continue to do so if our young country is to fulfil its ambitions. We should not forget however, that they will only be able to shoulder their responsibilities in a manner consistent with the teaching and example which they have received from us. The sports program suggested by our genial Prime Minister and being brought forward by our government, with the assistance of parents and all sports minded citizens can be priceless in helping to wipe out juvenile delinquency. With a country so young, so virulent, and with such a promising future, can we afford not to have this program?

Advisory Council on Sports

For some years we have had some sports minded citizens who have made a fine contribution to amateur sports, perhaps in some cases unknown to Mr. John Public. I refer to such men as Major Connie Smyth, M.C., of Toronto. Some army officers credit this man with the high place that hockey holds in the army sports program. He made the army hockey conscious when he organized it during world war II. The sports program for Canadian servicemen and their dependents has been steadily broadened in the ten years that Canada has been contributing ground forces directly to NATO. Mr. Len Taylor of Kitchener, one of Ontario's leading sports writers, who has been on many visits to Europe with our competing teams, has this to say:

> Some of the most interested people in the projected national sports and recreation council for Canada live in Europe.
> Among the Canadian forces overseas there is a greater awareness of the need for a national program than there is among the average man at home. This is due to several factors. One of them is that the army and air force personnel here have been provided with far better facilities than any Canadian community.
> Another factor is that they are able to see at first hand what can be done by a national program because most European countries are years ahead of Canada in this field.

These European friends, including our own Canadians, are very interested in the government's sports program aimed at encouraging youth in amateur athletics. May our efforts not be disappointing to them. Recently I read an article written by Peter Fraser in which he refers to another fine Canadian, Mr. Jim Daly, the new national track chairman for the amateur athletic union and former Manitoba half mile champion. This gentleman is promoting a program for more year-round competition on the local level leading up to interprovincial meets and winding up with a national final. Mr. Daly is very enthusiastic and feels that Canada has a track and field potential to finish third in the British empire games. He admits that money is needed to carry out his program, but he feels that sport can ultimately pay its way. This man has done a great deal in promoting track and field for our youth.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, Canada has many such sportsmen ready to take their part in this program. I think of such wonderful organizations as the Royal Canadian Legion. I understand that up to now the Legion has spent up to $80,000 on track and field alone for our young Canadians, and many thousands of dollars on other recreational work. President Kennedy of the United States recently appointed Charles Wilkinson, the former coach of Oklahoma football teams, to head the national youth fitness program. Mr. Wilkinson thinks that his first problem will be to track down the youth and sell them the idea that getting and staying in shape can be fun. After all, youngsters must be convinced that keeping in condition pays rich, lifelong dividends.

In recent years it has been recognized more and more by Canadians, as well as by our American friends, that physical fitness has an important part to play in the life of every nation; therefore it is gratifying to know that our government has given this desire the impetus it needed, the go-ahead signal that will provide sports for all. I will keep striving to further this program, to assist others in its promotion and to encourage every Canadian to give it his wholehearted support. Let us now forget about our past lack of a national sports program, our lacklustre performances in international events, our poor publicity through weakly supported teams and individual competitors, and look ahead to a brighter future for sports in Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, according to press reports which appeared in most Canadian newspapers on August 28 last, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) stated in Toronto on August 26, at the official opening of the international hockey hall of fame, that he would recommend to parliament the establishment of a national sports council to improve conditions in the field of recreation, amateur athletics and physical education.

The resolution we are now considering contains the following recommendations:

1. The establishment of a national advisory council for the encouragement of fitness and amateur sport.

2. To provide for the making of grants to agencies, organizations or institutions.

3. To provide for entering into an agreement with any province for the payment by Canada to the province of certain contributions in respect of the costs of programs relating to fitness and amateur sport.

4. That the contributions and moneys paid every year do not exceed in the aggregate $5 million.

5. To provide for the payment of the chairman's remuneration and of the travelling and other expenses of the members of the council—

Mr. Chairman, the resolution has nothing to say about the standards which will establish the statute of an amateur. Will they be the standards followed for the Olympic games and which are described thus on page 781 of Encyclopaedia Britannica:

(Text):

An amateur is one who participates and always has participated in sport solely for pleasure and for the physical, mental or social benefits he derives therefrom, and to whom participation in sport is nothing more than recreation without material gain, direct or indirect, and in accordance with the rules of the international federation concerned.

The Canadian amateur hockey association has defined an amateur hockey player as follows:

An amateur hockey player is one who either has not engaged or is not engaged in organized professional hockey or, if he is so engaged, has been reinstated.

(Translation):

Is the council considering other standards? Which groups of amateur athletes will be eligible for government grants?

Mr. Chairman, I should expect that amateur sports which do not draw such large crowds as, let us say, hockey, baseball, basketball, will get the same consideration from the council.

Sports and recreational activities which should get the considerations of the proposed council would be, for instance, swimming, outdoor athletics, track and field events, hockey, boxing, cycling, fencing, gymnastics, physical education, rowing, shooting, archery, tennis, baseball, figure skating, basketball, judo, etc.

Mr. Chairman, the council will have to tackle the difficult task of dividing fairly this money, so that all sports, all organizations and all athletes benefit by it. There lies the problem. And what a problem it will be.

Up to now each group in the field of sports has been looking after itself as best it could. Each leader worked very hard and devotedly to ensure the success of his section. Now, it is to be feared that they will fight one another in an effort to secure the lion's share of this assistance promised by the federal government.

Sports organizations throughout Canada, sports editors and all those interested in the welfare of our youth and in amateur sport, will undoubtedly be invited to offer their suggestions in order that may be found the formula through which sport—and the country —will get the maximum benefit out of that amount of $5 million.

Mr. Chairman, will the council grant bursaries and fellowships to those who would like to become coaches in the sport section of their choice? Will grants be made for the development of regional schools or clinics to train coaches and referees?

Will the council sign agreements with cities and municipalities, through provincial governments, for the construction of recreation halls or gymnasiums? Will the council give assistance to our athletes and teams participating in national games, international games and Olympic games, in the matter, let us say, of transportation, purchasing of equipment, uniforms and even souvenirs?

Mr. Chairman, it is not merely a case of winning victories, there is our country's prestige to think about, the important part the world of sports can play in the improvement of international relations, so that countries may understand one another better.

When the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) referred to those projects, he said:

In 1928, Canada had its best successes at the Olympic games.

I should like also to refer to those who, in 1928, won medals for Canada.

(Text):

Mr. P. Williams in the 100 metre dash, Mr. P. Williams in the 200 metre dash, the Canadian team in the 400 metre relay, E. Catherwood in the high jump and J. Wilson in the 500 metre speed skating. The field in which Canada has the most victories is hockey. World hockey competition started in 1920. Canada won the gold medal in 1920, 1924, 1928 and 1932. In 1936 it was won by Great Britain. In 1940 and 1944 there was no competition because of the war. Canada won in 1948 and 1952. Russia won in 1956 and the United States won in 1960.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned, at one o'clock, I had just given the list of the countries that have won the golden medal for hockey at the Olympic games since 1920.

The council could also ask the national radio and television networks, as well as the private stations, to give more time to amateur sports in their reports.

Mr. Chairman, I should also like our organizations, at the national, provincial and local levels, to continue their splendid efforts in the field of amateur athletics.

Advisory Council on Sports

At this stage, I should like to quote a paragraph from an editorial which was published in the Ottawa Citizen on August 29, 1961:

(Text):

Local authorities should not think that their responsibility will end with the federal government's action. It will, indeed, be greater than ever, for success in sports as in so many other endeavours depends on community effort. Funds from parliament, thinly spread over the country as they must be, are only intended to give welcome support to local organizations.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, our young people must seek more than mere success in sports. While playing their favourite games, they must try to develop the sporting spirit as such, the respect for the opponent, the desire to give a good account of themselves for their country, while at the same time trying to act as ambassadors of good will in all international competitions, thus contributing to the maintenance of world peace.

Mr. Chairman, I have always been interested in amateur athletics as a medium for helping our youth to indulge in healthy recreational activities and to become better citizens in their later years.

I endorse the principle of the resolution, while reserving myself the right to take part in the debate when the bill is before the house.

(Text):

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, my first words, of course, are words of commendation. I should like to thank the Prime Minister for the action which he has taken. I had the opportunity of being in Toronto during the Canadian national exhibition when he made this announcement, which was one of great importance. The amount of $5 million annually is about 83 times the amount which the senior government made available for this purpose last year and is exactly $5 million more than the senior government made available during non-Olympic years. During Olympic years, some $60,000 was made available to the Canadian Olympic association.

I should like also to thank the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the fine presentation he made. He certainly indicated that we do not want a nation of spectators but rather a nation of participants. I was impressed by the words of the Leader of the Opposition. The matters with which he dealt were matters about which I have been concerned for some two or three years. I think the Leader of the Opposition made it clear that this was not entirely a matter which could be brought about solely by assistance from Ottawa. It must begin in the home with encouragement by the national government. I have been impressed, too, with the work that has been done in this connection for many years by the hon. member for Waterloo North. He has done a great deal to assist amateur sports in this country. I felt, too, that one of the colleagues of the Leader of the Opposition would have introduced a similar resolution years ago had he not passed away while doing the type of thing that he loved, namely trying to stretch a two-bagger into a home run. I am referring to the late Lionel Conacher. I think that had he lived, and had he had the Canada council as a precedent, he would have been encouraged to introduce the type of resolution which has been introduced here today. The resolution and the legislation which will follow it is certainly a step in the right direction. It is noted that within the last year the government of France has made provision for this purpose of $125 million to be spent over the next five years on amateur sport with a view to regaining lost prestige in international competition. The government of Sweden has granted a subsidy to amateur sports bodies of 750,000 pounds. The government of England has been asked to contribute 5 million pounds for revenue expenditure and another 5 million pounds for capital expenditure each year.

In passing may I also thank the many officials from across the country who have been associated with amateur sports bodies for writing to me, my colleagues, the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, encouraging the type of action that has been introduced in the House of Commons today. The list is too long to refer to all of the organizations and to the many officials who have spent a great deal of time in presenting their valuable suggestions and very learned briefs to persons here in Ottawa. Upon passage of the bill, amateur sport in Canada will enter a new era.

The Leader of the Opposition this morning referred to some of the stars of yesterday. While he did not refer to Percy Williams of Vancouver by name, he made reference indirectly to him. I am sure that all of us will recall that Percy Williams popped the eyeballs out of the sporting world when he won two great events overseas. I am sure most of us will recall that he had great difficulty in making his way first of all to Hamilton and then overseas. His trainer came across Canada escorting Chinese to New York and he made his way overseas behind Percy Williams on a cattle boat. That is the kind of thing that had to go on formerly.

Today amateurs in Canada are facing murderous competition in the world. It is this welcome type of action that is being taken today that will bring about great benefits everywhere. It is the type of resolution that will affect the masses. A small contribution of say $75 in a small town will do wonders in bringing the "small fry" along. I am sure that in due course we shall be able to uncover "world class" amateur prospects who are at present buried away all over Canada and the nation's morale will benefit from it.

I have what I feel is a practical program following the passage of the bill. The first practical step could be that able, conscientious and qualified people be appointed to the council. This could well be the most important issue because it will be these people who will have so much to do in advising the government and in drafting rules which will in turn help so many people. I therefore suggest to the minister that much time and effort be spent in appointing qualified men from across the country.

I think a very fine job was done in the matter of choosing persons to serve on the Canada council. Generally speaking, I think they have done a very good job. I read the most recent Canada council report. It is a fairly glowing report of the progress that has been made in its field. I should like to feel that after this new council has been appointed and has spent some time on the matter, we shall have from it equally glowing reports. In the last annual Canada council report we find the following statement:

> —much has been accomplished. This is clearly true of the support that has been given to the humanities and social sciences. With the assistance that the council has been able to provide, the possibilities for advanced study and research in these two areas have been enormously increased; they have not only been enormously increased, they have been taken advantage of, and productive results have followed.

On another page we find this statement:

> The arts story for the year 1960-61 is told in detail elsewhere in this report. Here it is appropriate to make the generalization that during the past four years our orchestras, theatres, ballets, opera, art galleries and festivals have all benefited by council support. In this area of the council's responsibility many problems exist but the overall condition is one of growth and often of improvement.

Then the report goes on to refer to the many individuals who have been assisted by the Canada council. I know that when this legislation is passed and the council is appointed, many problems will develop. The council will not be able to cure all the ills that will face amateur sport, but certainly much can be done to minimize and eliminate the major ones.

Another practical suggestion which I should like to make to the minister would be this. Upon appointment of the council I would suggest that the members of it should study closely the operations of the Canada council. The sports council or council of the other name which the minister has given to this proposed council, will have to decide what amateur sports should be assisted most. The council will have to decide what aid can be given to recreation.

Another practical suggestion I should like to make to the minister would be that members of the council should make a study of what is taking place in other countries and should personally examine the athletic facilities, stadia and so on.

Another suggestion—and in my opinion, this is an extremely important one—is that the council and the government should, at an early date, set up two or three national schools for coaches. Here is a program which could be aimed at the masses and from which, as a natural by-product, our super stars will be developed.

As I indicated, we are entering a new era. The Leader of the Opposition has referred to some of the stars of yesterday. It was said that when Neil Colville first went to New York as an amateur his first account which he submitted to the management was "one sack of apples, one detective story magazine, one pair of shoe laces for dress shoes, one box, small, epsom salts and one telegram to dad." If you compare that account alongside the accounts of modern day stars, it would certainly be refreshing to those who organize amateur sports to go back to that type of thing. In the new era it is no longer good enough for a coach to say, "Here is the net and there is the puck. Put the puck in the net". There is more to the matter than that in this day and generation.

It is no longer true to say, as one athlete said, "Just give me the gloves, any old gloves, and a referee who can count to 10". Times have changed on the world scene, nationally and individually.

I should also like to suggest that the council proclaim an Olympics week every four years, when citizens could be urged to support, with money and otherwise, the Canadian Olympic team. The Leader of the Opposition today pointed out that it was his hope that once the new council was set up and these funds were made available, the public would continue to support our amateurs. Once financial assistance was given to the arts and the humanities, support increased; it did not decrease. I suggest that may well be the situation after we have formed the new council.

I should also like to make another suggestion. Under the new legislation grants should be made to appropriate cities in Canada that show a marked interest in and the ability to hold the Pan-American games.

Advisory Council on Sports

I am sure hon. members are aware of the fact that Canada has never entertained the Pan-American games. We have never entertained the winter or summer Olympics, or the world hockey finals. It is rather a sad comment to find that next year the world hockey finals go to Colorado.

I hope that in this young and vigorous country we will soon be able to bring these international sports events to Canada, because it will do so much to foster new interest on the part of our young people.

Another suggestion which I put forward is this. May I refer, by way of a good example, to the fact that when Percy Williams returned to Vancouver in 1928 renewed interest was taken in track and field sports, with the result that in Vancouver today we hold the largest track and field meets in all Canada. While Empire stadium is not filled to capacity, the crowds number over 20,000 for these track and field events. I feel that some credit is due to Percy Williams for having set an example.

I should also like to suggest that under this new legislation the federal government should give every consideration to the construction and erection of those things which would encourage the youth of Canada to participate in outdoor activities. That is very significant in my area because we have upwards of 5,000 skiers leaving the province of British Columbia every week to ski at Mount Baker in the United States. I feel that under this legislation encouragement could at least be given to the building of those facilities which will keep our amateurs and our skiers at home. This in itself will reward us in many ways.

With this new fund it will be possible for our outstanding athletes to visit the youth of Canada. Personal visits by our best athletes will do wonders in encouraging others to participate in sport. Knowing the champion pays off with young people.

In the past I have witnessed one soccer club after another coming to Vancouver. This is a fine idea. But very seldom do we see our national amateur hockey clubs on the coast. I hope that with the new funds to be made available we will be able to see our national clubs. Whether it be in hockey, lacrosse, or whatever the sport; and we should see our star tennis players, and so on.

Another suggestion I put forward is that once the new council is formed it could encourage the Department of Trade and Commerce to ensure that Canada constructs hospitality centres at international sports shows. I was impressed with the hospitality centres constructed by France and Austria at Squaw Valley. I should like to suggest that when winter Olympics are held in Austria next year Canada should construct hospitality centres there. Furthermore, with these new funds we could hand out these simple, inexpensive pins which young people at these events like to wear. This plays a very important part at these shows. We do not lack the common courtesies at these international events, but we are certainly lacking in some of these matters.

I also suggest that the council could encourage the national film board to attend international sports shows to take films of Canadians participating therein. Different organizations across this country would like to secure films of some of these events and see, for instance, some of the figure skating of Barbara Wagner and Bob Paul; but there are no such films available. Here is a job which could be done with the encouragement of the new council. Appropriate training films could be provided and these could be sent across the country.

I should also suggest that when the council is formed they should do everything possible to encourage the C.B.C. to attend these international shows. In the past the C.B.C. radio has been there, but not C.B.C. television. I think a much better job could be done in this regard. I also suggest that sustaining grants be made to various existing sports governing bodies which are organized on a national basis to enable them to do a more effective job of promoting and developing their own particular sport. Another suggestion is that grants of a non-recurring nature should be made for special projects at the national, provincial or local levels.

I should also like to suggest that grants be made to provide necessary salaries for the upgrading of coaches, a matter I touched upon earlier, the initial stage being designed to provide qualified leaders in the universities and colleges. Another suggestion is that grants be made to the Canadian Olympic Association, the British empire and commonwealth games association of Canada and other organizations concerned with officially recognized international events.

Another suggestion I put forward is that grants be made to universities and colleges and other organizations for the encouragement of intersectional games and/or appropriate national championships.

I further suggest that grants be made for the development of suitable programs of physical recreation such as camping, mountaineering, hiking, etc. Furthermore, grants could be made to the Canadian association for health, physical education and recreation to support consultant and leadership services and increased publications.

These are some practical suggestions which I desire to make and I hope that the minister will in due course give consideration to them. In closing, I wish to say once again how pleased I am to find that appropriate action has been taken by this administration. I am sure that in due course the results will be felt everywhere.

I realize that we will not be able to achieve too much in a short period of time. However, I should like to feel that at the next British Empire games Canada will at least rank ahead of South Africa and that in due course at some of these sports events we will be able to get a few more points than Mexico, and the West Indies. I again wish to thank the government for taking this action.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, the idea of a Canada sports council was in all probability sparked by the success of the Canada council which was established by the Liberal government of Louis St. Laurent to assist the arts, humanities and social sciences. This was a popular move which met great success and has been a tower of strength in assisting worthy individuals and organizations. I venture to say that the general approval which greeted the establishment of the Canada council will also be extended to the Canada sports council.

The Prime Minister's announcement which he made on the occasion of the opening of the hockey hall of fame in Toronto last month, to the effect that a national advisory council on fitness would be established and that an annual federal contribution of $5 million will be made available for the purpose of giving encouragement and stimulation to interest in physical fitness and the development of recreational facilities was received with general approval. It is a recognition that in the day and age in which we live there is a great need for active promotion of sports and athletics on a national basis in which a maximum participation by all those agencies with experience in the field of physical exercise and development should be encouraged.

Here we are dealing with the health and fitness of the people of the nation. I am glad to see in this resolution that the government is concerned with the fitness of the people of the nation. This resolution does not spell out how this sports council will be administered nor who shall benefit most from it. We have agencies such as the Y.M.C.A., scout movements, girl guides, community recreational committees, parks boards, and others, all making an inestimable contribution to the sum total of recreation.

Provincial governments are also doing their share in community sports leadership training. I visualize that the federal government sponsored the sports council as a co-ordinator of municipal and provincial governments' efforts in the fitness field, and to meet the opportunities of sending athletes to compete in international contests such as the Olympic games. In such cases, the council would assist in ensuring that no Canadian team would leave our land without maximum training and provisions for their welfare.

We should never allow a situation to arise where a community would bankrupt itself in order to finance its own team as we witnessed when the Belleville hockey team was financed for its attendance at the world competition in Europe a couple of years ago, through a questionable use of city funds, thus casting a shadow on the brilliant victory they won. What was more deplorable was the slander and suspicion of mismanagement directed towards some of that city's elected representatives and faithful servants. I honestly believe that an injustice was done to these public spirited public servants whose sole interest in the matter was to assist in the only way they knew possible to enable their team to win top honours in the international field.

Canada is blessed with a few unselfish hockey enthusiasts who in spite of lack of public support have made a great contribution in fostering the participation of boys of school age in the game of hockey. I have in mind an example in Mr. Maurice Black of Toronto who organized the first hockey school. Out of 70 boys attending only 30 could pay a small tuition fee. If such schools were assisted this would render an inestimable service in the promotion of good clean Canadian sport and at the same time would represent a step forward in assisting Canada to catch up with other countries in terms of athletic achievement and national physical fitness.

The Pepsi-Cola Company of Canada Limited is also to be complimented for its interest and assistance by way of substantial contributions towards enabling some 325,000 young Canadians between ages 12 and 19 to participate in Canadian sport. This was accomplished through the promotion of regional junior championships in a wide range of sports.

Last year, Canada lost the Olympic hockey title at Squaw Valley for the obvious reason that there was a lack of co-ordination in the selection of the team which evidently did not have a sufficient workout in terms of meeting other teams before leaving Canada.

In all of these fields government assistance would be necessary. This loss of prestige by Canada in a sport which was born and developed in this country, revealed without a doubt the need to get the very best out in front before sending a team to an Olympic competition.

Advisory Council on Sports

The loss of the gold medal in the 1960 Olympic hockey event in a sport which we always claimed to be our national game further damaged our prestige and morale. Hockey is to Canada what baseball is to the United States, yet a team from the land of the stars and stripes beat us at our own game.

If as a nation we have grown complacent and are deluding ourselves by thinking that we are superior, and if we are relying on our past performance rather than realizing the ever present danger of being beaten by more determined, better trained, better financed opponents, then we have reached a dangerous state of affairs, and we should not blame the referees but rather our indolent attitude towards amateur sports.

In my opinion the answer to the problem is embodied in the resolution which we are discussing and that is, for the federal government to accept the challenge of encouraging sport in all its phases, and to accept the responsibility of contributing financial support, especially when we are selecting the cream of our youth for international competitions abroad. Canadians are not only proficient in ice hockey, but in skiing, skating, swimming, curling, track and field, rugby and rowing. We have a rowing club in Fort William which won the Lipton trophy in international competition eight years in a row. My constituency also boasts of a rugby team which won the dominion intermediate rugby championship two years ago. In the event that an opportunity of competing in far away places arose, these teams could not enter without a measure of financial support which our city would not be able to provide. The Canadian Legion branches of Manitoba and northwestern Ontario have an Olympic training plan for track and field clubs. In July, 1958 they were able to send some representatives to Toronto. One girl placed first and another second in the high jump event of the Canadian Olympic training plan.

Two summers ago, 11 athletes attended the Canadian Legion youth training course in Toronto, and managed to bring home three gold medals, and several silver and bronze medals. These athletes had to pay their own expenses in attending meets such as the prairie track conference held in Saskatoon, the Pan-American trials, and the invitation meet at Bemidji, Minnesota.

It should be understood that athletes need outside competition for their development without which the chances of winning in a highly competitive sport are almost nil. It is to be noted that the organizations which conduct these various sports activities operate in many ways and are constantly begging for support. The training and skill required in these sports are sometimes helpful in determining the future of many young men carving out careers for themselves in businesses. Some of these men have gone into businesses of their own, and have made good.

By giving our sports minded young men and women encouragement and assistance in deserving cases we would create a favourable climate for good and intelligent citizenship, resulting in inestimable dividends in terms of service to the nation. The council should not however, consider that its existence is for the sole purpose of assisting athletes to take part in international contests. From the Prime Minister's statement, I gathered that this national advisory council on fitness will function in a pattern similar to the Canada council, and if so, I submit the following suggestions. Qualified leadership, properly trained and highly competent, is priority No. 1. It therefore seems necessary to encourage coaches and physical educators to obtain more training, and money should be provided for clinics and summer courses. Such clinics and courses should include all sports and physical fitness.

I believe that emphasis should be placed on physical fitness with a number of short term courses conducted across Canada, and subsidization should be considered for those who could attend courses of longer duration, even if this involves sending people outside our own country. There is some need for training officials as well as instructors in all the various sports.

I would like to call attention to a matter which should be of special interest to a Canada sports council, and that is the junior leaders training conference which the Y.M.C.A. conducts annually at Geneva park, lake Couchiching, and which was attended to the number of 76, by members of leaders corps this past year, from Saskatoon to Montreal. This is an intensive training program for those who will render volunteer service in their own Y.M.C.A.'s and communities. The cost is carried by the leaders and by their own Y.M.C.A.'s, and if a subsidy in the way of travel were possible, it would mean that more leaders could be brought from outside Ontario. Without enlarging on this, it is obvious that Canada needs more Olympic sized pools and more running tracks. In addition, I feel that every consideration should be given to encourage the family engaging in sports and recreation. I have in mind such things as canoeing, camping, hiking, and such like.

May I presume that the interest of the Canada sports council would be in the amateur and not in the professional athlete. We should, therefore, have concern for the athlete with a future who does not have the opportunity to go to college or to receive a sports scholarship. I would like to see standards created for sports clubs and athletic organizations, and those meeting the sports standards to be assisted financially so as to involve greater numbers.

Financial aid could be considered for those organizations willing to promote provincial and/or Canadian championships. Finance could be considered for those athletes meeting standards to be assisted to attend provincial and/or Canadian championships.

A general athletic development would contribute to the solution of the problem which faces this young nation of having so many of our young Canadians unfit, as was discovered by medical boards in the second world war to the consternation of Canadians in general. It is worthy of note that Prince Philip, during one of his visits to Canada, brought this national weakness to the attention of the Canadian people in his characteristic and forceful fashion.

What I have been trying to convey is probably not the complete answer. Other hon. members have made notable contributions, particularly the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who was the first member to bring this to the attention of the government last year. I certainly hope that some of my suggestions may commend themselves to the Prime Minister and to the government. I also hope that during discussion of the bill the government will be willing to accept, if necessary and if found desirable, amendments which may be proposed. I think it will be a great day for Canada and for Canadian youth when we pass this bill and money is made available for worthy individuals and organizations.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourbonnais: Mr. Chairman, like other members who spoke before me, I am pleased to take this opportunity to say a few words about this resolution.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) announced recently in Toronto that the federal government was going to provide a substantial assistance to the field of amateur sport in Canada. All the young people of Quebec, and even those who are not quite so young, were very enthusiastic when they learned that at long last the central government was going to deal with this matter which, in order of importance, comes immediately after that of primary education. Indeed, sports are an essential complement to the education of our youth, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) is to be commended for having introduced this measure the results of which will be invaluable in a few years.

On February 10, 1959, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) made a most eloquent speech in the house—he repeated it this afternoon—when he recommended the establishment of a council to encourage amateur sports. The hon. member must undoubtedly be very happy that the Conservative government has seen fit to take action with respect to his recommendation, which should set an example for all members.

Another member who did a lot to call the government's attention on the importance of setting up an amateur sport council, is the member for Waterloo (Mr. Weichel) who spoke this afternoon but who made numerous speeches in that connection during previous sessions.

The people of the province of Quebec remember that the former premier of our province, the late Maurice Duplessis, liked to attend hockey or baseball games whenever he had the time. It is because of his interest in professional sport that he brought his government to vote—a thing which had never been done before—large amounts of money for the recreational centres of the province, which had been specially established for the practice of amateur sports. His immediate successor, the late Paul Sauve, also recognized the importance of amateur sport and, following the example of his predecessor, contributed much to promote that cause. For example, one of the finest sport centres, the "Centre Paul-Sauve", was erected in Montreal and thousands of young people in the metropolis benefit by it.

In my riding, numerous sport organizations are to be found. In almost all parishes, there is a recreational centre for our youth. Recently, olympiads were held at Vaudreuil and also on Perrot island, where hundreds of young girls and boys took part in the different competitions. The example set by those parishes should prompt all the others to establish such sport festivals. At Hudson, there is the little baseball league, where four clubs are in competition for the local championship. The winning team then plays against other clubs of the area until it is eliminated. We have there some 60 boys between the ages of nine and 13 who are learning, while enjoying themselves, one of the great principles of life: "There is always someone better than you and you must learn how to lose in order to know how to win."

Advisory Council on Sports

I could mention many sport organizations in my county and in the province of Quebec which enable our young citizens to indulge in wholesome recreation and to spend their leisure time building up their bodies and their minds.

I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to all voluntary organizers and coaches who are really dedicated and who devote much of their precious time, their efforts and in many cases their money to teach our youth the way to indulge in wholesome recreation.

Sports instructors are doing an invaluable contribution. How many of our youth have been spared from a life of debauch by having been invited to join some amateur team where they have met better companions and found out they had certain natural dispositions which, once developed, restored their confidence and gave them new aspirations? How many of our youth have been lured away from bars by our instructors who made them like sports and showed them how to achieve their physical development?

There are many, many examples, and it is to the credit of those who recognized the importance of amateur sport and who tirelessly worked for that cause. Unfortunately, the number of these charitable people is too limited. Today, in this materialistic age which is affecting all groups of our society, it becomes more and more difficult to ask the individual to make the sacrifice of his time and his energy to teach our youth how to make good use of their leisure hours.

Recreational organizations cannot manage to find the necessary funds to pay for their equipment and provide the locals required by modern sports. Much less can they find the necessary financial means to pay instructors and supervisors who must supplement voluntary workers. Although it is desirable to leave it up to the parents to organize and finance those institutions whose purpose is to supplement the education of their children, it remains that the state, be it at the municipal, provincial or federal level, is duty bound to contribute to the development of amateur sports, which are an indispensable complement to the culture we wish to give our children.

There was a time in the province of Quebec when religious teaching institutions were the only ones to encourage and organize amateur sports. Members of those institutions, priests and teaching brothers, were the only ones to recognize the importance for all young people to practice some kind of sport and to participate in team games.

Those institutions were too widely dispersed in the province of Quebec, and at that time only a very small proportion of our young people were able to benefit from the advantage of amateur sports.

Today, almost all our villages and parishes have very modern schools and adequate and competent teachers. On the other hand, this lay personnel must be paid according to a contract where the teaching of sports is not mentioned. Therefore, in the very great majority of our schools, more particularly the rural ones, which have known fantastic changes in the last 20 years, organized sports and even the practice of sports are unknown. In our schools, sports are left in the hands of devoted people who do not have enough time to give them the required attention. Our young people therefore suffer from a lack of physical training and competitive spirit which would enable them to face the problems of their age with more confidence.

This is in no way limited to the province of Quebec, but extends to all the rural areas of this country.

This is what an officer of the 4th Canadian brigade meant, when, speaking of relations between the children of our Canadian military personnel stationed in Germany and their young German friends, he said:

(Text):

Canadian kids don't want to play games with their German opposite numbers; the Germans are too athletic and too competitive.

(Translation):

This shows a gap in the sports education of our Canadian youth. We know how Germany recovered politically, economically and morally since the end of the last war, and this is due in a large measure to the physical fitness of all her citizens.

This country which knew the greatest destruction and the worst defeat in her history, in 1945, has rebuilt and is experiencing today a prosperity unequalled by any European country, through the determination and the will to succeed of all her citizens. These two qualities are not hereditary, but are acquired by intensive training from a very tender age. This physical training improves the health and strengthens the will power through participation in competitive sports where there is eagerness to overcome all obstacles.

This example of our young Canadians who refuse to play with their German friends, because they are physically superior, should be a lesson to us.

The measure proposed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare is adequate and will give all the Canadians the required incentive to regain lost time in the field of amateur sports and will improve their physical condition to make it superior to that of most of their elders.

There is no doubt that the Canadian people love sport. But I think that we are all somewhat of the spectator type sportsmen who prefer to watch their favourite sport while comfortably seated in an arena, or in a chair before a T.V. set. We would rather watch the performance of some professional hockey or football stars.

I would not wish to criticize our professional athletes who bring us fame, especially in hockey, and who contributed in spreading throughout the world that typically Canadian sport which spotlighted the excellence of our athletes abroad. But our interest in professional sports should not cause confusion in the minds of our youth about the very reason for the existence of sports in a highly civilized country.

Active participation in any sport is becoming more necessary for all young Canadians, particularly so with the modern tendency to replace men by machines, due to which physical effort is becoming less necessary to ensure one's survival.

Since everyone can put forward his suggestions concerning the use of the funds to be voted following the adoption of the legislation before us, I, for one, would rather have greater emphasis placed on youth training in sports and on the practice of physical exercises.

Our young people have no idea of how to organize and amuse themselves until some instructor gives them that knowledge. The young from six to 16 or 18 years of age need a monitor, or a coach to teach them how to participate with enthusiasm in team games. It is also necessary to have someone teach them physical education and other sciences. The participation of our amateur athletes in the Olympics or in other international competitions is very important to maintain our country's prestige abroad, and everyone across Canada is happy whenever one of our fellow citizens wins a trophy or a gold medal for his achievements in a competition. But if we are to increase our achievements in sport competitions abroad, the first thing to do is to train all the young people among whom we shall discover many potential athletes.

I therefore suggest that those monitors and coaches be trained through an agreement with the provinces or by the Canadian armed forces, so that every city, town or parish may have some day, one or more experts in the organization of amateur sports, coaches or physical instructors.

A special corps under the control of the Canadian army could be formed and young people 14 years old or more could join during the summer holidays and learn the science of sport organizing and physical education. In addition, when they returned to their books, those young people could teach others what they had learned in such training camps, while they were paid for that service, which would help them to carry on their education.

A number of other suggestions could be made, Mr. Chairman, but what really matters is to arouse, in our young people, the desire to take part in sports and to train themselves so as to become champions, true Canadians, strong and exuberantly healthy.

What young man has not dreamt some day of being as great as Maurice Richard, Gordie Howe, Robert Bedard or Babe Ruth? We must replace this inclination to dreams by the desire to undergo training. We are therefore responsible for giving them the opportunity of doing so and of becoming what we have dreamt of being ourselves one day.

In the resolution, reference is made to the agreements which might be signed with the provinces in order to legislate on the amounts of money to be handed out to them under the physical fitness and amateur sports program. This reference is a good indication of the attitude of the Conservative government—that of always respecting the autonomy of the provinces, especially of those that are very sensitive in that respect, when education is concerned.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to say how proud and happy I am to note that the resolution before us will be yet another of the many important accomplishments of this Conservative government. I feel proud, for the benefits which young Canadians will derive from this measure will be to the credit of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and to the credit of all the members of this house, and especially of those who are responsible for it.

(Text):

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a small contribution to this debate. I think that up to the present it has been most useful. The minister put the subject forward on a broad and intelligible basis, and the discussion has been carried forward on that basis. This matter could be of enormous importance. It seems to me that some of the incidental things that have come out during this debate have indicated how important the considerations are. One of the things I liked about the minister's speech was that he made it quite clear this was not merely a resolution on physical fitness but also on what might be called morale or moral fitness. He pointed out how far-reaching the effect would be, stating that participation in athletics had an effect on peoples' emotional nature; that it helped them make friends. He even suggested it might help us make international friends. He had in mind perhaps an ancient practice which is referred to by one of the nineteenth century poets. In speaking of the Persians he said the Persians taught three useful things: "To draw the bow, to ride and to speak the truth". I take it the implication in that is that they felt physical fitness and moral fitness were akin to each other. I think so too.

I was delighted, as I say, with the breadth of the minister's approach to this subject because I felt that it meant he would be seeking for the national council the kind of men who will understand these things and do a good job.

If I may just digress for a moment, when the minister was speaking about sport being a means to international friendship I thought of the current issue of the London Illustrated News. It was rather pleasant to see a picture of the Russian crew taking the grand challenge at royal Henley and another picture showing an English oarsman winning the singles and being congratulated by the Russian who had been defeated. I am not forgetting what the Leader of the Opposition said this morning, that we need not deceive ourselves when the Russians come to participate in our academic events. They may not be single-minded; they may have other things in their minds, but that does not worry me. My feeling is that in the end it will be good. The more we see of each other, the less likely we are to drop bombs on each other. In my opinion, we must go ahead although there are plenty of discouragements, as the minister implied, with these friendships.

I should like to come back now to say a word about sport and our own parliamentary system. I believe it was the great American writer William James who said the English parliamentary system could not exist without a spirit of sportsmanship. What did he mean by that? I think it is very clear and was made clear by a remark in this house by the late C. D. Howe years ago. He said, speaking of the House of Commons, "we of the government open the house but you in the opposition close it." How true that is. What does that mean? It means that the business of this place could be brought to an absolutely dead end unless there were a spirit of sportsmanship, of give and take.

This same spirit can be applied to other things. It can be applied to business. We know there was a time, perhaps it is not so prevalent now, when a current phrase throughout the world was, "the word of an Englishman". Consider what a promoter of efficiency that was. We all know that in business if you can take a man at his word, you have greater efficiency. Those of you who are lawyers know that there is a phrase used by lawyers. I would not do business with him on the telephone. We all know what that means. We all know how it slows up the conduct of business.

However, I come back to say that I was glad the minister referred to the emotional side in his speech this morning. Do not let us forget that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when reviewing external affairs the other day, said that we had to toughen ourselves and be prepared to perhaps make sacrifices and bear burdens we had not borne before. Those of us who have been in the army will know what it would have meant to try to carry on war unless you had people who had been brought up through the practice of sport to have a sporting sense and a spirit of toughness.

I am not going to go into the details of the subject. People who have spoken in this debate know much more than I do about the details of athletics, and they have been able to make much more useful and practical suggestions. There is only one point I want to make, and I want to stress it as strongly as I can. I believe there are a lot of people who regard this bill as something which is designed to promote greater skill and promote a larger number of highly skilled athletes. This is not my idea. I do not mean we should not make a reasonable grant towards the Olympic games. I do not mean that at all. But in my opinion what we want is a democracy of athletics; we want the largest number of people playing. We want them to be playing, as the minister said this morning, not for the prize but for the love of the game.

I was terribly taken aback by what the hon. member for Peterborough said this morning. I could hardly believe my ears. However, I have spoken to him since and I had not misunderstood him. He said we now had in the schools a great many boys who do not want to play games. I assumed every right thinking, healthy Canadian boy wanted to play athletic games. I was devastated to hear that was not so. Then, I began thinking about it and I said to myself, why is it not so? There were two things that occurred to me and I think they are both relevant. The first is professionalism. The production of people of super skill who become heroes to the youth has the effect of discouraging the youth from taking part in games. The boys feel, what is the use; I cannot be an expert so why should I play?

Another thing is the lack of playing fields. I think it was the minister who spoke about city life, automation and the effect of that. When I go up and down my constituency and see boys playing hockey, if you please, on the dry streets without any other place to play, it makes me realize that playing conditions are very unsatisfactory.

I lived in a small city when I was a boy and we had playing fields within 100 yards of my home. We never lacked them. Now, we have this new urban civilization, and I think we are faced with a new problem. I say again that I hope with all my heart the bulk of the grant which is being made will be made to encourage the participation of the largest number. When I was told that the desire to play athletic games had lessened, I wondered if that had anything to do with education. I wondered if the literature the boys were reading was different. We used to read Sir Walter Scott, what I suppose one would call heroic literature. I wondered whether this tendency had disappeared. Those who know more about education than I do will know whether or not this is a consideration.

I feel, with all my heart, that if we are raising a generation of boys who do not like athletic games, then it is a dangerous situation. Every one of us should be concerned about it. I believe that as firmly as I believe that I am standing here. I have little more to add, but I should like to repeat what I said a moment ago. I hope very little of this money will go for the purpose of providing high class coaches and high class players. They will be provided by business. In my opinion the box office will take care of them. But what I hope will come from this legislation is that there will be democracy of athletics and that we shall work against a situation in which young boys sit and watch television or engage in other equally unathletic occupations rather than take part in athletic games.

The last point I wish to make is with regard to the question of the council. It, of course, will be all important. I have no nominations to make. Judging from the minister's speech this morning, I am quite sure that we can safely leave the matter in his hands. I have just one suggestion to make for what it is worth. I believe that the chairman of this council ought to be a man who is in touch with youth. For that reason I would hope the minister would take a good look at universities and other educational institutions, including high schools, if you like. At any rate, I would hope that he would endeavour to find someone who really has been in touch with youth and who knows the problems such as those disclosed this morning by the hon. member for Peterborough. If that is the line on which the grant is used and if that is the line the council follows it seems to me that what we are doing today is something we can look back upon as one of the most important actions we have taken for a long time.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Monteith (Perth) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-131 to encourage fitness and amateur sport.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Family allowances and old age security—

266. Administration, $3,341,497.

Mr. Benidickson: We had a feeling that the minister would give to us a little bit more explanation in reply to the inquiries that have been made and would go beyond saying that he was giving it very earnest study, something which he has been doing for a couple of years or more. Having in mind the fact that we closed on this item at 10.30 last night without an opportunity for him to talk to us, can he not tell us a little bit more about what has resulted from the studies he has made in this field.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No. I have nothing further to add. I have explained this matter many times and have said that the report has been studied by a special committee of officials and is now being studied by the government. I cannot report anything further, other than to say that when a decision is made as to action it will, of course, be reported.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister was more encouraging last evening than he is now. He said that an interdepartmental committee had been set up to study this matter and that we could anticipate an announcement by the government much earlier than we would normally have anticipated. We have all taken that statement to mean that the minister was going to bring down some definite policy or program within the course of the next two or three months at the latest. The minister's statement now is not as generous as was the one made in answer to the interrogations I put to him last night. I do not know whether the reason is that the question this afternoon was put by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. However, the minister has not been as forthcoming to the hon.

member for Kenora-Rainy River as the latter deserves and as he was to me last night. This contradiction, in my opinion, calls for a clear and unequivocal statement by the minister with regard to a matter which he acknowledges he has now been studying for three years.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I should just like to read my words of last evening. They will stand as of today both for the hon. member for Essex East and in reply to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. As found at page 8708 of Hansard I said this:

> An interdepartmental committee has been studying it. I should not be too greatly surprised if before too long he were informed of the government's action.

I still stand by that statement.

Mr. Benidickson: Does that depend on an election?

An hon. Member: It might.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister for this confirmation. May I ask him to bear in mind in his studies something that is not contained in the Clark report. What I refer to is this. Having in mind that the old age survivors system in the United States is based entirely on contributions from the pensioner and the employer, there being no financial participation whatsoever by the state, such a scheme in Canada might not be as feasible unless there were contributions by Canada.

We have already put on record our party's view with regard to this matter. We have said that we believe the time has come when such a contributory scheme should be provided for, supplemental to the existing universal old age security plan, and that if and when such a contributory scheme is adopted it should include contributions from Canada as a whole. We hope the minister will give consideration to the position which was enunciated by our leader two years ago in this House of Commons, with regard to a matter that is engaging the public attention more and more.

The problem of our ageing population is, of course, a vital one. Our population is ageing. By 1975 the number of people who will have reached the qualifying age for the universal old age security pension will have considerably increased. The problem of meeting the requirements of an ageing population is not, of course, one that is peculiar to Canada alone. It is one which exists in this country. However, I hope I have a right to be heartened by the statement the minister has made this afternoon.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

269. Emergency health, welfare and training services, $8,004,165.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, this vote of $8 million represents the contributions made by the Department of National Health and Welfare to civil defence. This aspect of civil defence, of course, is confined to emergency health, welfare and training services.

I should like to deal with one aspect of the minister's responsibility. I refer to the two important announcements he made in this house during the course of the last few days, when he advised us of the increase in radioactivity levels following the various explosions, undertaken by the Soviet union, following the breakdown of the nuclear tests talks and the decision of the Soviet union to ignore the moratorium and carry on tests.

Perhaps there is no more important problem facing mankind today than the implications resulting from these explosions. I have already said that the house and the country warmly supports the minister in the decision to keep the Canadian people fully informed of the levels of radiation from these explosions. I sincerely hope the minister will keep up this practice. The country will expect it and will applaud him if from time to time, when parliament is in session or when parliament is not in session, the minister keeps the Canadian people informed about the levels of radiation from test explosions and other forms, more traditional, from which have flowed an even higher measure of radioactivity.

The Leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister to see to it that the results of these two recent readings were made known to the United Nations. One would hope that these readings would have an impressive bearing on the proposal now before the United Nations, for a further effort toward banning nuclear tests. However, there are certain aspects of this problem that have not been touched upon in the minister's statements or in the comments made by opposition members following those statements. I think I should deal with these at this time.

I am not quarrelling with what the minister said. Certainly I would not be in any position, scientifically, to take issue with him and I have no doubt that what the minister said represents the best scientific thinking available to him. But since he made these two statements I have had an opportunity of examining the observations made by several Canadian scientists, one in Manitoba and one in Halifax.

I regret that I do not have at my fingertips the names of the two Canadian scientists who have expressed the view that the levels of radiation, prior to the recent Soviet union explosions did warrant the belief that there was an increase in the danger to human health. The two statements of the minister established the view that the extent of radioactivity in our country, including that brought about by the 13 or 14 Soviet union explosions, had not added appreciably to the danger to human health in our country.

These two scientists, however, take issue with this view. As the minister knows much better than I, the scientific opinion in the world on this whole question is divided. I have before me now some notes that I made on a recent statement of Dr. Linus Pauling, one of the Nobel prize winners in physics. I might possibly have refrained from relying, for the present purposes of my argument, on Dr. Pauling because of the political views which one might reasonably have thought he entertained. However, the recent statement he has made is directed not against any test explosions by the United States—those test explosions, of course, were made underground and in the laboratories—but against the test explosions made by the Soviet union.

I do not believe that if we are going to discharge our responsibility to future generations we can overlook this problem. We need not make dogmatic assertions as to the existing danger, but I do not believe we can ignore the kind of statements made by Dr. Pauling and others.

If future generations should suffer, particularly through strontium 90, which takes a long time to level out, and if as a result of these explosions and other forms of radioactivity human beings suffer from cancer and the like, we in this generation will, I think properly, be held accountable if we do not demonstrate that degree of care and concern which I am sure we all want to display at this time.

Dr. Pauling estimated that today—that is, as of yesterday—the fall-out from nuclear tests carried out by the Soviet union in the current series will increase by 5 per cent to 10 per cent the total of human death and damage which would ultimately have been caused by the tests of all nations up to the end of 1958.

If that statement is true, then the situation is even more serious than that conveyed in the two statements made by the minister. I am sure it will be found that other scientists do not fully agree with these conclusions of Dr. Pauling, but we cannot ignore a man who has been recognized in this field, through having beeen awarded the Nobel prize. We must take into account his views as well as those of Dr. Teller, for instance, the discoverer of the first American atomic bomb.

Dr. Pauling argues that previous tests could be expected to cause, for instance, 140,000 grossly defective children to be born in the next few generations due to the relation of fission products such as cesium 137. He also says that 2 million grossly defective children will be born over hundreds of generations as a result of the atmospheric production of carbon 14, which has a half life of 6,000 years. He also argues that the deaths of 140,000 people before their time in the present and the future generations due to leukaemia, bone cancer, other forms of cancer and other diseases might result from strontium 90 fall-out.

He then points out that if Mr. Khrushchev should carry out his threat of discharging 100 megaton bombs the damage would be double the present calculated damage.

He concludes his statement by saying:

> When scientists such as Dr. Edward Teller, the American father of the H-bomb, speaks of there being "no danger" from radioactive fall-out they are using the word "danger" in a special sense. They mean there is no danger of the human race coming to an end or of countries being depopulated by the radioactive fall-out from bomb tests. They do not mean that individual human beings will not suffer and die.

We cannot ignore the deaths and suffering which nuclear testing, certainly if continued on an accelerated scale, will cause. I join with all hon. members of the committee and others in the country, in supporting the government and particularly the Department of National Health and Welfare in the pursuit of the sampling and testing that is being undertaken. We hope it will be possible for countries not now fully contributing to the collective effort of the United Nations in these sampling processes to do so. I believe that Canada is undertaking for certain countries tests on foods such as milk. We hope that in the interests of mankind itself all countries would ultimately assume these responsibilities.

I know the minister is concerned about this problem. He has indicated that thus far there has been no real injury to human health. That was the view taken in the United Kingdom in 1956. The minister might tell us if he subscribes to the view expressed by the Right Hon. Ian Macleod who said on March 22, 1956 that radiation does produce genetic effects but that the radioactivity of the atmosphere is increased only slightly as a result of nuclear bomb explosions. Is the situation today substantially that, notwithstanding the increase in the levels following the recent explosions undertaken by the Soviet union? Is it still the view, as stated by Mr. Macleod at that time, that present knowledge is insufficient to fix precisely the level of radioactivity above which genetic damage would substantially affect the well being of populations?

Mr. Macleod also observed on that occasion that research in genetic changes is necessarily and inevitably slow in producing conclusive results. Have any new conclusions been arrived at with regard to the rapidity from which inferences may be drawn?

Mr. Macleod concluded his statement with remarks which I quoted in the House of Commons in reply to a question put to me in my capacity as minister of national health and welfare. He said, in effect, that it is extremely unlikely that the increase in radioactivity which has appeared up to the present will have any appreciable genetic effect. Since that time there has been increasing evidence unearthed by scientists which would suggest that possibly one cannot now go quite that far. There may not be any evidence to show that the increase in radioactivity will have any appreciable genetic effect, but can one dogmatically say that the increase in radioactivity will not in fact have an appreciable genetic effect?

When the minister replies will he tell us whether or not there has been an expansion of the program under which the University of Toronto is measuring the levels of radiation in the human body and in various substances on the earth's surface? The minister will recall that in 1956 or 1957 the government of that day, with the support of the house, provided a substantial grant to the University of Toronto for the purpose of ensuring a greater measure of reliable information on radiation levels. It would be interesting to know if that work has been extended and if similar work is being done at other universities. I am sure there has been an expansion in this area but I am not familiar with the details. I know that the government has increased the sampling stations and it may be that in that process it has also embarked on an extension of the program through the universities.

This is a matter of the greatest importance. Through the mail we are receiving, there is increasing evidence of public concern over this matter. The government has taken the position as I think have all hon. members that there should be no future nuclear tests. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has been adamant in this particular. He has taken the position that there should be no tests with or without control. That is not the view of all countries, even some in the western world. I believe that the symptoms of the problem and the possible danger arising out of the detonations are such that we cannot be too vigilant in our effort to obtain the most accurate information. If there are grave doubts as to the genetic consequences, then it would seem to me we are in a position in which I would regard it as immoral to embark on programs of nuclear test explosion, when there is doubt as to the potential danger for the human race.

We are presently engaged and rightly so in expending millions of dollars in research against cancer, one of the great enemies of mankind. We vigorously applaud the achievements of the medical scientists in gradually closing in on that enemy. It would be ironic, if in the face of the progress that has been made, in the light of the resources that are being expended towards that objective, we should through this other medium about which I have been speaking bring about increasing causes of cancer among human beings. I refer not only to cancer but to other forms of illness. Valuable work is being done at the University of Manitoba, I believe, in the examination of milk to ensure that it is free from radioactive forces. About a year ago an assessment was made of an increase in certain Canadian produced milk although it was not said to be a dangerous increase. Scientists hastened to advise us that there was no real danger from the milk tested. The mere fact that in that substance so widely used on this continent there was present even a slight increase was enough to cause great concern.

I need not go on. The minister is aware of this problem. I felt it was incumbent upon me to say these things not in criticism of the government, because it is doing everything I am sure that can reasonably be done in this matter, but to elicit a further statement from the minister.

May I make one further suggestion. The minister's two statements were correct. In form they observed the objective language of his scientific and professional advisers. It is correct that the most careful use of language should be made in order to give as objective a portrayal as possible; but this language is not always easily understood. It may be, that because of the difficulty of understanding some of the scientific jargon, interpretations are placed on these statements which might be avoided, if greater care were taken not in cheap popularization of these reports but in the use of phrases and words that might give a greater appreciation to the public of the significance of the reports. There was a suggestion in the Ottawa Journal last night along these lines. It struck me that there was some merit in the editorial, and I merely echo it for the minister's consideration.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member finished up with that touch concerning the Ottawa Journal last night I presumed that he also read the accompanying editorial and took it to heart.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, I did not read that one.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The accompanying editorial on the same page.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That was a political editorial and I am keeping away from politics.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): In that respect I would also recommend an article by Mr. Gordon Dewar which appeared on the front page of the second section of last night's Journal. He gave an excellent report of the situation as it had been explained to him not only by myself but by Dr. Bird of my department.

First of all, I cannot help agreeing with the hon. member for Essex East that this matter is of the greatest importance and concern. Actually it is a very technical subject, one which I am afraid none of us has completely mastered. To make any statement on this without ample preparation and discussion with my officials is something I would hesitate to do. It is of too much concern to the people and to us in the department to make any statement which has not been a considered one.

In answer to some of the questions I think it is safe to say that Mr. Macleod's words still hold true, to as great an extent as we know. The University of Toronto and other universities have been working in this field, yes, but as to details I am afraid I do not have them at the moment.

I am deeply concerned over this matter. First of all, I think I should say that we said back in 1958 and 1959 that the October, 1958 tests caused a rise of strontium 90 in milk, which has since decreased. It had a significant effect on the air sampling. At that time I indicated that I wished to see the public fully informed and as a consequence this is the course we have been following. I would say that the department is very anxious to get all the information possible that is available in this field. We do not feel that the fall-out thus far has been sufficient to cause health damage. I said earlier that if it was very high over a lengthy period of time it might well cause a health hazard. I do not think I care to go any further.

When I started my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I indicated that this is a very technical subject. I would prefer to have a full discussion on it and give a prepared statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister propose to say anything about what is done under this item? There is an increase of $2,610,068. This is part of the civil defence program of the government. Does the minister wish to give us some indication of what is going to be done with the additional funds provided and what progress has been made in the program to date.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The explanation of the increase of $2,610,068 is that first of all emergency health services increased 59 per cent, or approximately $2.5 million, mainly owing to cash provision for the portable hospital and medical stockpile programs. Emergency welfare and training services remained at about the same level with the exception of the special requirements for radiological monitoring training equipment owing to the increase in the training program on radiation at Arnprior college and 10 mobile feeding units and five mobile clothing sorting units which will be used by the provinces for further testing and for training purposes.

Mr. Denis: With the consent of the committee may I be permitted to revert to item 266. I do not want to make any argument but to get details of the amount paid by the federal government to each province since the inception of the Unemployment Assistance Act. I suppose the minister will produce it and have it printed in Hansard.

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I shall be very glad to present that information at any time. I do not need to have the question put on the order paper. I shall be glad to send the information to the hon. member but I should like to point out that the item has been passed.

Mr. Denis: This will be very interesting information for most hon. members. Will the minister be kind enough to have it printed in Hansard?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes; I have no objection.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When I spoke a moment ago I did not have before me several statements to which I made reference. I now have them and I believe it is necessary to bring them to the attention of the minister. For instance I find in the Montreal Gazette of November 17, 1959 the following:

> Dr. J. Gordin Kaplan, associate professor of physiology at Dalhousie University, told a public meeting of the Canadian committee for the control of radiation hazards at the McGill physical sciences centre that deception has been carried out by the use of false comparisons, half truths, silent misrepresentation and "deliberate, wilful distortion."

I am not subscribing to that, of course, but simply pointing out what this gentleman has said. He goes on to accuse some United States and Canadian government agencies and spokesmen of deliberately and systematically deceiving the public on the true facts about radioactive fall-out on this continent. The article goes on to say:

> He said he is convinced that the level of strontium 90 in North America is at the danger point, "that further nuclear test explosions will, in a matter of a few years, elevate the strontium 90 concentrations in children to levels known to cause fatal bone cancers in dogs."

Then there are other statements. For instance, in the Globe and Mail of March 2, 1960, there is a statement attributed to Dr. George Dion, dean of agriculture and vice-principal at Macdonald college. Speaking to the central Ontario branch of the agricultural institute of Canada, he said, as quoted:

> The Department of National Health and Welfare says there is no need to worry. I say we simply do not know. There is no basis for these false reassurances. In Canada the numbers would be small, perhaps 35 per year, but still we must be concerned.

Those are two statements about the matter. I have another one here but the two are sufficient to indicate the disparity of opinion in our own country. One can also refer, of course, to many other statements made outside our country, but I believe that the minister should comment on the two statements to which I have referred.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Very briefly, first of all I should like to emphasize again our concern about this whole subject. Then I should like to say that we have never suppressed any information and we have never given any false reassurances.

Mr. Benidickson: I am sure the minister heard on the national radio news broadcast this morning, as many of us did, the indication that in Ontario at least some technical person would make known each day the result of a daily test of radioactive fall-out. I am concerned whether or not this information will come from an agency of the federal government or will it come from an independent university in Ontario or from a provincial government source?

In a serious debate on civil defence recently some cynicism was expressed about the divided type of government under our federal system which might involve some buck passing with the result that we might not have a complete grasp of a serious situation such as that about which we are now talking. Is this testing to which I have alluded and about which I heard this morning on the radio conducted by someone employed by the minister's department or is it done by the province?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The department of health of Ontario.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Benidickson: If the activity is divided under our federal system, what is the relationship between the federal and provincial governments with respect to this so vital matter of radioactive fall-out testing?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Our department has been making these tests for some years now and my understanding is that quite recently the province of Ontario undertook to set up its own system of testing. I do know that the situation is being discussed interdepartmentally with the Ontario department of health. We are discussing the matter because we are concerned about the more general situation.

Mr. McMillan: I should like to ask the minister whether the booklet "Eleven Steps to Survival" was prepared under this item?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, that is under the emergency measures organization.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the minister's statement will receive attention. While the danger must be appreciated, we do not want to overstate the case or cause unnecessary fear, but does the minister not think it might be useful if he were to give the house some statement as to the existing levels of radioactivity that flow from traditional sources such as the normal use of X-ray which we have been using now for over 50 years? It is suggested now that more careful use is being made of X-ray because of the radioactivity that flows therefrom. Can the minister tell us whether or not the department has been able to eliminate the use of the fluoroscope which was used by so many retail establishments in the sale of shoes and from which there flowed a surprising amount of radioactivity? I think the best opinion suggests that more radioactivity comes from this source than the other, not that the other is not serious, or that we must not be on our guard. If we had this further statement the whole picture would be placed before us in the proper perspective.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, officials of our department have discussed this whole matter with the radiologists as a body. We have made recommendations about the use of fluoroscopes in the sale of shoes from the point of view of trying to see that there is no unnecessary use of these things. Certainly we appreciate that there is radioactivity from some of these sources and we have taken the stand that these devices should never be used unnecessarily.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps I have not made myself clear. I think we will all agree that there should be no unnecessary use of radioactive producing instruments, but can the minister not give some indication of the proportions of radioactivity consequent upon known and traditional uses compared with the radioactivity which flows from nuclear test explosions? I have mentioned shoe fitting fluoroscopes, dental and medical X-rays and the like. Can we not say that there is a much greater amount of known radiation from these instruments and sources than there is from the other about which we have, understandably and properly, such concern?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I do not have with me the statements that I made to the house prior to this more recent increase in radioactivity. However, thinking back to 1959 I am quite sure that there was considered to be more radioactivity from these common uses than there was in the fall-out of strontium 90.

Mr. McMillan: Following up my earlier question, I just wanted to ask the minister if his department was not consulted in the publication of the booklet, "Eleven Steps to Survival"? I think this booklet should be given a wide distribution. I have heard some criticism of it here in this house by members, but it is some time since I have read it. It seems to me if my memory serves me correctly, too little attention was paid in that booklet to the protection against breathing of air containing highly concentrated radioactive fall-out. I know from reading the newspapers considerable attention is being paid, for instance to the making of masks in the United States and in Great Britain. I do not believe there was any reference to that in the booklet.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): As I mentioned earlier, this booklet was prepared by the emergency measures organization, but undoubtedly in consultation with the department.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. We will now consider the estimates of the Department of National Revenue.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

272. General administration, $5,278,399.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Chairman, I will speak very briefly on the estimates of this department which, as the committee knows, are divided into two branches, customs and excise and taxation. The votes which we are now considering deal with customs and excise. There has been a slight fall-off in revenues from import duties during the past years and from sales taxes. This was off-set, to some extent, by increased collections from other excise taxes on imported and domestic manufactured goods as well as from excise taxes on alcohol and tobacco.

During 1960 there were 9,351,000 foreign automobiles which entered Canada. This is one phase of the department's activity. During this same period there were 9,291,000 Canadian vehicles returning to Canada, an increase of 376,000 vehicles in the year. This gives some indication of the tremendous expansion of motor vehicle traffic in this country.

Coming to the estimates themselves, Mr. Chairman, the estimates for this division have increased this year by $1,142,198 over last year. The record which we have established in one respect has been dissipated. However, I want to point out to the committee that 87 per cent of this increase results from the general, over-all increase in salaries which was authorized by the house some time ago. I should like to point out also that the division has managed to reduce its personnel establishment by eight positions, even though it has been necessary at the same time to provide for 20 additional auditors as well as 58 additional positions for the inland sufferance warehouses which we have at Toronto and Montreal. Considering the increases essential in these quarters, therefore, and the over-all decrease of eight, I think this reflects upon the department in a satisfactory manner. I would hope the committee would agree with that as an indication of the efficiency of this division.

Apart from salaries, which make up over 84 per cent of the total estimates for this division, there was an increase in the estimates for postage, telegrams, travelling expenses and so on. This increase is directly related to the need for more audit and investigational staffs in the field and to the general growth of business in this particular division of the department's operations. This is a very brief survey of the department's activities but I hope the committee will accept it as adequate. I would be glad to answer any questions to the best of my ability or give further explanations as they are required by the committee.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I want to bring to the attention of the minister a situation which exists in the sales and excise branch which is causing wholesalers a considerable amount of trouble and unnecessary expense. Producers enjoy the privilege of purchasing parts for the repair of machinery used in production of goods exempt from sales tax simply by making the following declaration on their purchase order:

We hereby certify that the goods purchased and/or imported hereby are to be used directly in the process or manufacture or production of goods.

This privilege is appreciated by producers. However, unlicensed wholesalers are considerably disturbed because they have to purchase goods from suppliers, pay the sales tax and then file a claim later. This is most unfair to wholesalers, and all this trouble could be avoided if the Department of National Revenue would grant the wholesalers permission to use a certificate similar to that which is used by producers to purchase goods from suppliers to fill orders received from producers exempt of sales tax.

I would recommend, therefore, that the regulations be amended to give the same privileges to wholesalers that producers enjoy. I would request also that no one be permitted to make the following declaration on purchase orders without first having obtained approval from the department, together with a certificate number:

We hereby certify that the goods purchased and/or imported hereby are to be used directly in the process or manufacture or production of goods.

If this were done, wholesalers could accept orders and supply the goods exempt of sales tax. At the moment, unlicensed wholesalers receive orders from certain producers who certify that the goods are to be used in production. Some of these producers are not familiar with the regulations and make the aforementioned declaration. The wholesalers accept and execute the order exempt of sales tax, after which they file a claim against the department since the goods were purchased tax included. After verification by the department, some of these claims are rejected. The wholesaler must then send an additional debit note to the producer, sometimes several months after the goods have been supplied. The producer wonders why he gets an additional debit note, enters into discussion with the wholesaler, and quite often refuses to pay because he is under the impression he is entitled to obtain goods exempt of sales tax. In the event such a declaration is erroneously used by a producer, the responsibility is on the wholesaler instead of the department.

In order to avoid this situation, a producer should apply to the department for permission to use the certificate and, upon his application being approved, a serial number should be allotted. Then, the wholesalers would be sure their customers were really entitled to purchase goods exempt of sales tax. I hope the minister will take this matter up with his officials because I have had a great number of representations from wholesalers and I think the matter is vital to them.

[Mr. Richard (Ottawa East).]

Mr. McMillan: I should like to bring item 709a of the Customs Tariff to the attention of the minister at this time. Under this item Canadian-made goods can be sent abroad, for example to the United States, and can be admitted duty free on re-entry to Canada within five years provided, among other things, that from the time of the exportation they have not been enhanced in value, improved in condition by the process of manufacture, combined with another article, or treated in some other way.

Otherwise the appropriate duty in full would apply on the re-entry of Canadian goods. I understand that under this section Canadian tires can be sent to the United States and be imported free of duty on new United States trucks and automobiles that are being imported. The words "combined with any other article abroad" preclude expensive Canadian equipment from receiving the minimum of work on it in the United States to combine it for example, with a duty free tractor as an expensive accessory and then being admitted duty free into Canada. The full import duty would then apply because the expensive Canadian equipment had been mounted on a tractor in the United States. If this assembling of equipment was allowed in the United States to some limited degree our working men would have more work and the Canadian would get his finished equipment, in the case that I have in mind, $133 per unit more cheaply.

I can explain this matter by being more explicit in connection with a company. There is, for instance, a John Deere works in Welland under very enterprising and successful management. Their primary product has been farm equipment. It is a subsidiary of the John Deere Company of the United States. They have facilities to manufacture approximately double their present production. At the present time 70 per cent of their production goes to the United States, mostly to New York state and other northeastern states. There is no duty on farm equipment going into the United States or coming into Canada. In the United States this particular company has been diversifying into industrial equipment in recent years. One of their farm equipment plants in the United States has been converted into an industrial equipment plant and facilities have been completed in the United States to turn one of these plants into a tractor plant for the industrial trade.

The Canadian customer has to pay duty on the industrial equipment admitted from the United States but not on the tractor. Two years ago the Canadian plant started to make bulldozers and they sold them in Canada at the same dollar price as that at which they were sold in the United States. The Canadian importer saved the duty. This company is now prepared to spend $40,000 in order to tool up their plant in Welland to make front end loaders; I refer to front end loaders on tractors. They started to do this some time ago but when they became acquainted with item 709a in the tariff act, they were obliged to discontinue it.

These loaders are mounted on crawler tractors in the United States and are imported and the Canadian importer pays duty on them. He pays duty just on the loader. There are approximately $1,500,000 worth of these loaders sold in Canada by this particular company, $1 million worth of them in eastern Canada and about $500,000 worth of them in western Canada.

The company had plans to bring the tractors to Welland for two thirds of their production and to mount Canadian made loaders in Welland. There would be no problem here. They assert that they can make this loader in Welland as cheaply as they can make it in the United States and that the whole unit will sell for the same dollar price in Canada as that in the United States, and that the Canadian buyer would save $133 per unit. The saving, of course, would be in the duty alone.

It is not, however, economical for this company to bring their tractors to Welland, to mount these front end loaders on those tractors there and then ship them to the United States as this would involve extra freight of from $100 to $150, depending on the place to which they were destined in western Canada. The company has no plant in western Canada and it would not pay them to set up the staff and rather expensive equipment for the small volume of business in that part of Canada. If the Canadian equipment could be shipped to the tractor plant in Iowa for their western Canada requirements and then admitted to Canada duty free, the western importers would save $100 as the only extra expense would be the shipping of these particular machines from Welland to Dubuque, Iowa, where they would be mounted on tractors.

As I see it, this company has $1,500,000 worth of business anyhow in Canada in respect of front end loaders. They ship them in from their United States plant and Canadians pay the duty now. Last year I believe Canadian importers paid upwards of $100,000 duty on these particular American made machines. If there were a little bit more flexibility in respect of item 709a so that Canadian manufactured products could be readmitted to Canada, duty free with a maximum allowable amount of work, on them, I think it would help us a great deal with regard to employment here in our country.

The efficient and energetic president at Welland, Mr. D. Brown, obtained permission from his home plant to go ahead with this new manufacture. As I said, he started to tool up and was obliged to discontinue because of section 709a, of which he was not aware. He assumed that these particular machines would be admitted into Canada in much the same way as tires are admitted duty free when they are on United States made trucks and United States made automobiles. If it were possible to go ahead with this project in Canada, they would employ 35 to 40 men steadily on this work. It would provide extra business in Canada. It would help our secondary industries that would be supplying steel. Not only would that be the case, but it would save our importers, on the present basis, upwards of $100,000 in respect of duty. I should like to hear from the minister on this point. I intend to discuss this when the estimates of the Department of Finance are being considered.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Shall vote 272 carry?

Mr. Nowlan: If there are any other questions to be asked, I think they might be asked at the same time. I should like not to be obliged to rise too often in order to deal with them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can save the minister time by asking one simple question. After the minister has replied to the other points raised, I think it would be interesting to the committee if he would tell us briefly just precisely what use he has made of the powers parliament conferred on him in 1958?

Mr. Nowlan: Are there any other interesting philosophical questions to be raised about the history of the last three years?

Mr. Benidickson: If we are getting into that arena, Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise a matter that relates in a close way to this subject. The Minister of National Revenue is of course very familiar with the measures introduced on December 20, 1960 in what was called the baby budget of the Minister of Finance, under which certain resolutions were presented to this house which would amend the Customs Tariff. In particular, to be brief, they concerned amendments to the class or kind of goods which would be interpreted as made or not made in Canada. In consequence they would have, under the minister's direction, either a high or a low rate of tariff imposed against them.

It has always been my understanding that from the hour that a budget is introduced, the Department of National Revenue automatically carries into force in its administration the decisions announced on budget night. It is true that we have had some legislative difficulty with respect to some of these items. For example, the other place had not approved, as late as six months after the baby budget was introduced, certain of the proposals of the Minister of Finance. As I say, it has always been my understanding that it is obligatory for the officials of the Department of National Revenue, on the day following the budget, irrespective of whether or not parliament has actually completed the statutory approval, to consider what the Minister of Finance announced in his budget proposals as the law of the land.

I read with some surprise after we recessed during part of July and all of August that the statement had been made that, notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance proposed in his baby budget on December 20, 1960, the officials of the Department of National Revenue had in no instance adhered to the new policy that was part and parcel of what the Minister of Finance proposed in that baby budget.

Whether I agree with it or not, I find this rather surprising. I thought it was completely contradictory of all our practices in the past. I understood that the Minister of National Revenue, associated with the Minister of Finance and the officials of the Department of National Revenue, after a budget proposal is made immediately carries out that policy from the time of the announcement, irrespective of whether or not both houses of parliament have approved of the policy.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Ottawa East raised a question with respect to the administration of the sales tax and its collection as between producers and wholesalers. This is a suggestion which has previously been studied by the department. The whole procedure of the collection of these taxes is under review, of course, at all times. I listened with interest to the suggestion of the hon. member and I can assure him through you, Mr. Chairman, that the department will again take a very close look at this matter and see if in any way and to what extent we might adopt the suggestion proposed by him.

The hon. member for Welland spoke at some length about a problem which is of great interest to him and his constituents and which is of course of interest to Canadians generally; that is, providing the maximum degree of employment in Canada for Canadians and the working out, in so far as is practical and in so far as the law allows from time to time, co-operation between the productive facilities of the United States and Canada so as to provide maximum employment in Canada.

There are various cases where this has been done to a greater or lesser degree, but the hon. member is referring primarily and specifically to item 709a of the Customs Tariff Act. Of course, whatever my sympathies or feelings may be with respect to this matter, the fact remains that item 709a is part of a taxation statute, and that of course falls within the purview of the Minister of Finance rather than that of the Minister of National Revenue.

It is my responsibility to administer the law as parliament enacts it. Whatever merit there may be in the hon. member's suggestion—and I am not saying there may not be considerable merit in it—it is a matter that parliament must consider on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, as a fiscal measure. I would hope that when the estimates of the Department of Finance are before the committee—if they have not already been concluded because I am not too sure what progress has been made as I have not been too closely in touch with matters—the hon. member will raise this matter with the Minister of Finance. I can assure him that as far as our department is concerned we will co-operate in every way possible to facilitate the maximum amount of employment for any Canadian industry within the law of this country.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River suggested—and I think correctly—that following the baby budget the departmental officials, or the minister, did not start making decisions with respect to class or kind as set forth in the budget. He suggested this was contrary to the practice which had been followed by the department in former years.

I think there is some misunderstanding here. I am told by officials, and I believe this to be the case, that when the Minister of Finance brings down his budget, any tax changes, reductions or increases automatically come into effect that night regardless of the fact that parliament has not yet approved of them. That is the only way in which we can administer the tax laws of this country, because if there were a long period of time between the announcement of the imposition of a tax or the reduction of a tax business would come to a stop or would be accelerated in certain fields, and so on.

However, I am told this does not apply to legislative changes in principles or in practice, as distinguished from rates. In the budget speech of the Minister of Finance there were proposals authorizing the minister, then empowered by parliament, to enlarge the scope of the class or kind legislation. Very briefly I may say that was it.

We know that legislation was debated here and it was debated elsewhere. The legislation has not yet received the consent of the Governor General, as I understand it, although I must say that I have received this particular information since I came back. Pending the enactment of this legislation the departmental officials have no authority or power to carry out, nor will they carry out, the principles set forth there with respect to class or kind because they have not the legislative power to do so.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: Five o'clock.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether with the consent of the house it would be possible to proceed with the estimates? Perhaps I should make this request when the Speaker is in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: If the minister would kindly make his request when the Speaker is in the chair, he can give it consideration.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to request the consent of the house to move that we revert to committee of supply and continue consideration of the estimates which were before it before progress was reported.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, that will be quite agreeable to us. I should like the minister to know, however, that this represents a genuine personal sacrifice because I understand that an extremely important bill I have been most anxious to bring before the house for many months would have come up if we had not been so acquiescent.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the hon. gentleman for his courtesy and acquiescence.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I will not be so effusive about it. There is no disagreement here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: But then, it is not the hon. member's bill.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the minister has requested and been accorded unanimous consent to waive the hour devoted to private and public bills in order that the house might proceed with the business interrupted at 5 o'clock. Is it the pleasure of the house to accord consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise division—

272. General administration, $5,278,399.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am curious as is the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate with respect to the administrative action that might have been taken as a result of the changes made in the customs tariff in July or August of 1958. On a former occasion—I think last year when dealing with the estimates—I asked the minister what steps had been taken as a result of the amendments passed in 1958 which altered our law particularly with respect to dumping duties. Perhaps the minister could indicate what administrative decisions have been made by him since that time.

Under protest the minister received discretionary powers as a result of the 1958 amendments. Is he able to tell us what classes of goods have been dealt with since that time under administrative rulings?

Mr. Nowlan: I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I do not have clearly in mind what it is the hon. member has reference to but may I point out that the amendments passed in 1958 were fairly substantial and that the department has been administering them constantly since that time. Various rulings and steps have been taken. At one point I did say that no specific action had been taken but to tell the truth I have now forgotten what it was to which I was referring.

Mr. Benidickson: I think reference was made to sections 39, 40 and 41 of the act. I can readily put a question on the order paper in order to secure full details.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, we all recognize the difficulties under which the minister is labouring and we do not wish to be difficult about this. However, the minister did considerable boasting at one time about the fact that having secured this power, which he told us in 1958 was urgent to the well being of the country, he had never used it but simply held it as a club over the heads of possible importers and kept out goods without any use of it. Surely if the minister has never used the anti-dumping legislation it should not take long to say so.

If he has used it he ought to have in mind in a general way precisely what kind of use has been made of it.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I never boast. I merely make simple assertions of fact. I indignantly deny the suggestion that there was any boasting on the part of the minister. I do remember that at one time I said that I had not exercised certain authority or done certain things under the act. At that time as the hon. member well knew, I was referring to specific powers under the legislation.

Certainly those amendments were essential and under them we have exercised various powers. The hon. member and others said they would operate to the detriment of Canada, would result in tariffs as high as Haman's gallows, and engaged in other speculative comments none of which has been justified by the record.

I remember that I did refer to the section authorizing us to deal with fixed values on fruit and vegetables coming in when the value was below the average for the three year period. When I made that statement we had not taken any action under that particular item. During my recent absence from the office that section has been brought into effect and one declaration was made thereunder, I believe.

Mr. Benidickson: Does that relate to potatoes?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes. That is the only step we have taken under that item. There was another matter of values to which I referred at that time. I have forgotten for the moment what it was we were dealing with.

We have taken various steps under section 38 which was amended at that time. There have been questions of having a third-country valuation where goods were coming from a country without a free economy. With respect to the proposed importation of certain goods, as the committee knows, we ordinarily accept the value of the country if it has a free market economy. Where a country has not a free market economy, it is occasionally necessary for the minister to make certain decisions and rulings establishing a third country market value as closely as possible approximating the circumstances in the country of origin. I have done that on several occasions with respect to certain proposed importations of gasoline, certain proposed importations of automobiles, pig iron, textiles and other commodities from countries without a free economy. These come to my mind at once and there may have been others.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

BOARD OF BROADCAST GOVERNORS

42. Salaries and other expenses, $331,170.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I assume the minister will have something to say on the subject.

Mr. Nowlan: It was not my intention to make any extended remarks. There are various activities of the board to which I could refer. I could deal with the number of hearings the board has held, the amendments to the regulations and applications the board has considered but from time to time these matters have been fairly well reported in the press. The estimates themselves indicate an increase of $32,750 over the amount provided to the board last year. This increase is due almost entirely to the necessity to increase the amount provided for salaries of full-time members of the staff as a result of the general salary revision passed last summer and fall. Just as in the Department of National Revenue, Mr. Chairman, the general salary revision has resulted in some increase in the costs of the operation although there has been no increase in the staff.

In most other objects of expenditure there has been a decrease in the amounts provided this year from last year. That covers the salient features of the board's operations. If there are any questions which the committee wishes me to deal with I shall try to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wish to make a few observations about an interim decision which was made by the board of broadcast governors after what was described in the press as a closed hearing during recess, on which the board gave a public statement on August 28, about which I made some inquiries of the minister before I had actually seen the statement, and when I had seen only references to it in the press. To make my observations intelligible perhaps I should read the whole of this public announcement made by the board of broadcast governors on August 28 of this year:

> At its meeting on Thursday, August 24, the board discussed with representatives of Baton Aldred Rogers Broadcasting Limited, licencee of station CFTO-TV, Toronto, an application passed to the board by the Minister of Transport under section 103(3) of the general regulations pursuant to the Radio Act.
> In the highly competitive Toronto market the performance of CFTO-TV compares well with other television stations recently licensed. The programs offered by the station have received commendable audience acceptance, and revenues have met expectations.

I draw the attention of the committee and particularly of the minister to the phrase "and revenues have met expectations" because I think it should be compared with something I am going to read a little later from these gentlemen. I continue:

The licencee has fully lived up to the commitments made to the board in the provision of facilities and the employment of staff—

I hope the minister is listening to this as well because I intend to read some of these commitments that were made, and if this statement can be reconciled with the statements made by these people to the board at the time of making their application, I have no understanding of the English language. I go on:

—indeed, expenditures on these and on other operating items, have considerably exceeded the financial commitments of the station.

Whatever that means I do not profess to know.

Additional capital is required—

That is interesting too, as will be seen from something else I intend to read later from the application of these people for this licence.

—and the station should not be unnecessarily delayed—

Mind you, this station came into operation only on January 1 of this year.

—in proceeding with required adjustments.

At the time it came into operation everything was perfectly satisfactory for years ahead. They indeed forecast precisely what their profits would be after a certain period and what their losses would be before that period. This is an extraordinary comment on that forecast.

The board is therefore, announcing the recommendation which has been forwarded to the Minister of Transport.

The board recommends that approval of this application be deferred to provide the applicant an opportunity to receive offers from experienced Canadian broadcasting interests on terms and conditions substantially as favourable to the station as the offer which the applicant has received from the American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres Incorporated. The board should be advised by noon on September 25—

Which is next Monday.

—of all offers made. If in the opinion of the board, no acceptable offer as defined above has been received by noon on Monday, September 25, the board will at that time recommend the approval of the present application for the transfer of shares. If, in the opinion of the board, an acceptable offer has been received, the board will not recommend the present application and will advise the applicant to submit a new application if he so desires.

Now, sir, in the light of the astounding announcement that apparently something like a quarter of the interest in this Canadian station, which made a particular boast of its Canadian character at the time it made its application, was to be sold to American interests, one should read the application made by the applicant who was successful in getting this licence. I, of course, do not intend to read the whole of it but I should like to read certain selected portions of it, sir, and perhaps make a few comments about it. I have in my hands the transcript of the public hearing held by the B.B.G. on March 14-21, 1960, in the oak room, union station building, Toronto. I turn to page 424. The beginning of the presentation was made on March 17, 1960 by Mr. E. A. Goodman, who I assume was a solicitor representing the applicants. I wish to read from page 425 and a little from 426 a few of the observations he made about the applicant. He cited 12 factors and said:

There can be no doubt that all of the preceding 12 factors must be regarded in the light of this final and all-embracing one.

Now relating this important factor to this hearing, it becomes clear that for the proposed Toronto station to be successful in this very highly competitive area, it is necessary that the licensee possess a wide and varied experience in every field important to television broadcasting, together with the ability to use this experience creatively and imaginatively.

I feel that our presentation this morning will substantiate that Baton Aldred Rogers Limited possesses the financial resources—

I ask the minister to note this:

—possesses the financial resources, the material resources, but above all, the human resources that fully qualify them for the privilege and responsibility that the holding of this public franchise entails.

Now the presentation will take place in four phases. The first phase covers the human aspect, it deals with the people presently associated with or to be employed by this company; the second phase covers the financial aspect, that is the capital that is available from its expenditure; the third phase sets forth the technical details,—

I am not going to go on with that.

—and the fourth and final phase, which is a culmination of everything else, covers programming.

The first and second are the two I am going to deal with, and I am going to read a few points relative to the point made. On page 427 we find the following:

Now I turn to the first phase of our presentation, the human aspect. The people responsible for its management are the most important factor in any company. This is particularly true when you are in a creative field like television concerned with education, the dissemination of information and the presentation of entertainment.

Then, he goes on to describe very briefly who these people are. The principal one is Mr. John Bassett, who is the chairman of the board of the company and who has a connection also, of course, with a newspaper known as the Toronto Telegram. He explained Mr. Bassett's connection with the Telegram and various other philanthropic activities—I use that term advisedly. Then, he went on to say:

Mr. Bassett, however, possesses qualities which are even more important to the operation of the proposed station than his newspaper and executive experience. These are a deep understanding of and a high regard for his fellow men.

I am sure, sir, that the board was particularly touched by that observation. Mr. Bassett was then given the task of presenting his colleagues. He pointed out how difficult it was going to be for this station to compete with the three stations in Buffalo and with the C.B.C. and to build up an audience with programs that were essentially Canadian in content. He saw the Toronto station as an anchor to the whole of private television broadcasting in Canada outside the national network. He said, as found on page 429:

It is our belief that none of these requirements will be met, nor will the job of building a station be successful, if the new television station is simply to be a carbon copy in concept and programming of the American stations which now come so strongly into this area.

I hope the minister has noted the words, "a carbon copy", since now they are proposing to turn the station over for all practical purposes to the American Broadcasting Company.

To meet these problems it has been necessary, we believe—

Will the minister note this particularly.

—to build a company in which each shareholder has a specific duty in management and in which each member of the management group has a definite responsibility and a particular contribution to make.

In other words, this was a package and the whole package had been very carefully put together to be the best broadcasting station in Canada.

This we have tried to do. We have no investors in the sense that there is absentee ownership.

That was one of the great things, "no investors in the sense that there is absentee ownership". Then he goes on to talk about the importance of the local character of the company and so on. As found on page 430, he said:

In order to achieve these objectives we believed that it was necessary to try to build a company where those responsible for management and direction would have an intimate and lively knowledge of the local conditions in Toronto...

Such, of course, as would obviously be possessed by the American Broadcasting Company. Then he goes on:

I am sure the members of the board have noted in our original brief that 51 per cent of the voting stock of Baton Aldred Rogers is controlled by the Toronto Telegram, although our financial participation in the profits which may be derived from this operation is limited to 40 per cent. In this way control of the company is vested with the Telegram, and I may say to the board this organization was done deliberately because it was our belief that responsibility and control go hand in hand.

I must say that that particular point made by Mr. Bassett seems to have been clearly emphasized by some of the events that have taken place since, and if the minister wants any confirmation perhaps he might like to consult Mr. Aldred or some of the other people now being pushed out. Mr. Bassett went on to say on the next page:

...therefore, through mutual agreement among all the shareholders of Baton Aldred Rogers it has been decided to vest control with the Telegram as we believe this institution has developed over the years a recognized concept of Canadian public service. It is our belief that through this concept, plus the extra invaluable assistance that the newspaper can give us in designing our seven daily news broadcasts, we have followed the proper course and one which is designed to ensure both the ultimate success of the station and the development of television in Toronto on the broadest possible Canadian base.

Then, on page 432 he said:

The president of the company—

Who is no longer going to be there under this new set-up.

—Mr. Aldred, has a wealth of practical experience in all phases of broadcasting and he, of course, will devote his entire working time to Baton Aldred Rogers.

Then he has something to say about Mr. Foster Hewitt, Mr. Ted Rogers, Mr. Nathanson and Mr. Purdy, the program director who is no longer program director. Then he goes on to point out how important to the whole scheme of this station Mr. Aldred and Mr. Purdy are. He says:

For this reason it is essential, we believe, that programming plans are completed on a sound basis before the station ever goes on the air. This Mr. Aldred and Mr. Purdy have done, and it is our belief that largely through their efforts we will be able to hold a great proportion of the new audience who are awaiting the advent of channel 9 in the Toronto area.

Mr. Bassett only took nine months or even less, actually about six months, to change his mind apparently about the merits of these gentlemen. Then he goes on to point out what a great job the station is going to do in the French language. I am not going to say anything about that. Perhaps it would be just as well not to, but I draw attention to this paragraph on page 435:

I have covered these points, Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, to try and indicate that every shareholder of Baton Aldred Rogers and every member of our management group, as well as our board of directors, have been chosen specifically because of some particular talent and experience that we believe is essential for the development of a successful television station in Toronto.

Now they are going to be replaced, except Mr. Bassett, by the American Broadcasting Company. Then he goes on:

We recognize that there is certainly no place in Canada where a more competitive situation exists and, if this station is to be successful, not only commercially but as a means of developing among Canadian viewers an appreciation of Canadian talent, Canadian programs and a greater understanding of Canadian events and the effect those events have on their own lives, then those who are charged with the responsibility of station management and development, we believe, must also be directly and personally concerned through ownership.

That ownership is now to be transferred to the American Broadcasting Company. Then there is a lot more in the same vein, quite a good deal of it in French, and then Mr. Bassett goes on to sum up and says, as found on page 440:

...the character of our company, we believe, is completely Canadian and essentially local.

Essentially local. The American Broadcasting Company.

I do not mean "local" in a narrow parochial sense.

Evidently not.

Indeed our program director, Mr. Purdy, as I have told you, has had a very broad experience in this field here, in the United Kingdom and in the United States.

Now he is apparently going to have more experience somewhere else.

Mr. Aldred, our president, is perhaps one of the best known men in television in North America.

He is also going to be one of the best known somewhere else than in Toronto.

But I do mean that this is a group of Toronto men who believe that a Toronto television station can only be successful in every sense of the word if those charged with the responsibility of management are extremely sensitive to the needs—

I do not think the board thought at that time that Mr. Bassett meant financial needs.

—the wishes and the aspirations of the viewing audience within our own area here.

Anything that could be more of a travesty than that in the face of the application which the board has now decided to grant, unless some philanthropic Canadian comes along to subsidize Mr. Bassett and leave him with 51 per cent control, it would be pretty hard to find. Then, listen to this:

We believe that the responsibility of management must be completely interwoven with the responsibility of ownership.

Does he still believe that? If he does, that means that the American Broadcasting Company is going to have a pretty big say in management. I repeat:

We believe that the responsibility of management must be completely interwoven with the responsibility of ownership so that the success or otherwise of this station will be reflected directly by the ability and effort of the individuals who hold these positions. Within our group of ownership and management we have built a team—

I stress that word, sir, "a team".

—thoroughly experienced and trained in the whole field of mass communications as represented by newspapers, films, radio and television. This has been done deliberately because it is our belief that only this kind of team—

I stress that, only this kind of team, and not one word about the American Broadcasting Company or Paramount Theatres.

—working together with a common interest in the public good, can ensure the ultimate success of this new television station.

I felt, then, that was really all I intended to read until I turned to page 513. Then, I did feel I should read the beginning of page 513 because, in a way, perhaps it is rather prophetic. I quote:

Mr. Bassett: Yes, Mr. Haig. You can conclude that. We have gone a good deal along the way, as you can see, by establishing a nucleus—

Then, in brackets and in capital letters I find this:

(All lights in building go out and the answer given by Mr. Bassett was not recorded).

Well, Mr. Bassett was not satisfied with just putting the lights out. He appeared again the next day and, in reply and in a very condescending fashion indeed, he congratulated all the other applicants on the applications that they had made. One could make some comment on that, but I think it will be in everyone's mind so I will refrain from making it.

Then he said this, as reported at page 986:

We believe that the most important part of the character of Baton Aldred Rogers Broadcasting Limited is that all its shareholders have a direct responsibility in management, and that these shareholders, all Torontonians, came together deliberately because it was our belief that we had a specific contribution to make to the success of television in the Toronto area. The shareholders are all interwoven into management, and in this sense they have direct responsibility and there are no such things as absentee shareholders.

It almost looks as though Mr. Bassett was anticipating something and trying to guard against it even then. I continue the quotation:

Each of our directors has proven business and professional experience. We believe that this station, to be successful in such a competitive market, that executive ability and experience are required in addition to the direct experience of the creating and performing arts. Our board of directors, with every shareholder represented on it, and participating daily in the operation of this station, does have those requirements.

Then, a little later on, on the same page, I find this:

In our main presentation we dealt at length with the financial aspect of our proposed station. I don't wish to go into it again. I just wish to make the one observation. That after providing for our pre-operating losses and for what we think to be an adequate operating capital, we have provided for a cash contingency of $1 million to meet some of the difficulties which all the applicants have spoken about in the early days of operation...

We have provided that there will be no repayment to shareholders at all in the first five years of our operation. We have provided for this financing from our own shareholders and without setting up through this company any bank loans.

In other words, Mr. Bassett certainly gave the board every reason to feel that the financial basis of this company, the financial basis of this operation, was quite adequate. I am sure that the board, notwithstanding the pressures which one cannot help but feel were upon the board and about which I have had something to say on other occasions, would not have granted this licence if they had believed that six months later Mr. Bassett would be back telling them he was in financial difficulties, and telling them that this closely interwoven group that was going to make this the best Canadian television station had disintegrated for reasons which we do not know; that these great and talented Canadians no longer seemed to have the talent required and that in order to rescue this financially precarious operation the American Broadcasting Company would have to be brought in.

It is apparently true that the hearings were in private and all one can learn about what really went on is from reading what Mr. Bassett calls the competitive press in Toronto. I must say that after reading the different articles in the different Toronto newspapers one gets rather different views of what the real situation is. It does seem to me in the circumstances to be rather extraordinary, in view of the assurances given the board, that this hearing should have been held in private at all. What is more extraordinary than that is that the board would consider for one minute permitting this minority stock ownership to be transferred to these United States interests. If there was one thing that was made clearer than any other on both sides of the house, and by no one more eloquently than the present minister, it was that the whole purpose of public participation in broadcasting, public control and regulation of broadcasting, was to keep it Canadian. No one thinks that the American Broadcasting Company and Paramount Theatres are a group of philanthropists. If they are going into this operation, they are going into it to make money, and not just to make money out of the televising of their programs. No doubt, they hope to make money by selling their product to the station. It may well be that from a purely technical standpoint, they will have a better product to offer than the one made at home. But to have the home made product is the reason we have any public broadcasting in Canada at all.

It is precisely because we were afraid the whole market would have been taken by United States interests if there had not been public participation, that we have this public participation. I have never heard any Canadian who was not a socialist defend it on any other grounds. I have never defended it on any other grounds. I think it would be far better, if we could have the assurance that the broadcasting would be Canadian, to have entirely private broadcasting. But regardless of party most of us in this country, from the days of the Aird report and the days when Mr. Bennett brought in the legislation to establish the radio commission and the days when Mr. Howe introduced the C.B.C., have felt that the only way we could have control over broadcasting in this country was to have public participation in it and pretty rigid public control. It is for this reason we have this participation and this control which, though it has varied a good deal in detail to meet new conditions, has been fundamentally the same ever since the parliament of this country enacted the first legislation in the early thirties.

I say, sir, that we recall only a few short months ago in 1960 when these applications were heard that there were nine applicants for the T.V. station in Toronto. Three of these applicants were closely associated with and almost indistinguishable from the three newspapers. I have said on several occasions that I thought the board should have rejected these applications out of hand from all three newspapers on the ground that where it was possible to have equally good operations unconnected with newspapers, that was to be preferred. I have also said that there are many places in Canada, and I could document these at length but I am not going to do so now, where there is no one except a newspaper or its publisher willing to risk money in the television field. Where that situation arises, people should not be denied television nor should the taxpayers be forced to build a station just because that condition exists.

However, this was not the condition in Toronto. There were six other applications and the board described the applications as all of excellent quality. There were six other applicants who could have been considered if these three applicants had been, as I maintain they should have been in the light of the debates that took place in parliament when the board of broadcast governors was set up, thrown out before the hearings were even held. Only the other six should have been considered. I am seeking, sir, not to go into the realm of rumour and speculation to which reference has been made or to refer to the exchange I had with the chairman of the board of broadcast governors in the special committee.

However this company may have obtained this licence in the first place, the fact is that it obtained it; and surely it should be expected either to live up to the terms under which it obtained that licence or to lose the licence and not to have a United States company brought to the rescue. My suggestion is this, Mr. Chairman: If they cannot get suitable Canadian participants by the deadline on Monday I suggest that, far from approving this proposal, what the board should do is to call for new applications for that station and to apply to that station the provisions of the Canadian Broadcasting Act as it was prior to the recent broadcasting legislation which was put into effect and to say that the new applicant would be obliged to reimburse the existing owners for all their out-of-pocket expenditures properly depreciated so that they would not be robbed in any way.

However, here they have been given a piece of the public domain on representations—some of which I read—which they have clearly not lived up to and now it is proposed to allow a United States company—and I may say, a very reputable company—to come in and rescue them financially. We even read that it is far more than the stock that is being bought and that this company is also paying off their debts. I do not believe there are many Canadians who think for one minute that a company is going to do that sort of thing in order to have a minority interest as an investment in an outfit which claimed to be financially solvent when it made its application and which six months after going into operation has to be rescued financially in this way.

I say that this is a scandalous proposal made by the board of broadcast governors and that if they persist in this proposal Her Majesty's ministers should not entertain their recommendation for one instant as it would be utterly contrary to everything that they have professed to believe in, or everything that was professed by the minister when he introduced the legislation in 1958, and contrary to all the principles on which all of us have believed public broadcasting stood in this country.

I say that there might be another solution of this matter. There were these other six applicants. It might be that Mr. Bassett could now be satisfied with a minority interest and that one of these other applicants could take over a majority or controlling interest.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I dislike interrupting the hon. member but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Deputy Chairman: Would the committee give unanimous consent to permitting the hon. member to continue?

Mr. McGrath: How much more time would the hon. member require?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would find it impossible to give an estimate. If there is not unanimous consent—something which, incidentally, we gave to have these estimates continued—I will take my seat.

Mr. Jones: I think the question is a legitimate one. It is a quarter to six now and there might be a chance to reply. I think the hon. member is entitled to an answer to that question.

Mr. Pickersgill: There either is or is not unanimous consent. If there is unanimous consent, I will continue. If there is not unanimous consent, I will take my seat.

The Deputy Chairman: I thought I had unanimous consent until the question was asked. The question was not asked to protest against the continuation but rather to inquire how much more time would be consumed. This is something that the hon. member could not predict. However, in my opinion, he has the unanimous consent of the committee and he has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was saying that there might be another solution of this problem. In view of all the circumstances I would not think that there would be any great likelihood of any new applicant arising apart from those who made applications in 1960. Knowing a little bit of subsequent history, I doubt that one of those applicants would be very apt to apply or, if he did so, that he would be very apt to qualify inasmuch as that gentleman has since gone to the United States, I believe, and has sought to accelerate his acceptance as a United States citizen. But let us consider certain other applicants.

There is one very distinguished applicant who is not a political friend of mine. At least he was closely associated with one of the applications. I refer to Mr. Sedgwick. Mr. Sedgwick and his family have had a long experience in the broadcasting business. As I say, while I do not share his political views, I have a good deal of respect for his capacities in many directions. I cannot imagine Mr. Sedgwick or his associates coming along for one minute and accepting this suggestion of the B.B.G. that they should accept a minority interest in the station, with Mr. John Bassett, who has already fired all his previous associates, standing there with a club ready to club him. I would not think that any Canadian applicant would come in under those terms. However, I suggest that those are not the only terms.

I suggest that this is an applicant who has failed to carry out his undertaking, and who has made a mess of this thing financially. I am not saying anything about its programs.

I do not know anything about them. I do not happen to live in Toronto. To the best of my knowledge, I have never seen any of its broadcasts. They may be just as good as the B.B.G. said they were. I hope they are. But what I am saying is that they appear to have made a financial mess of this venture. I think they were quite right in saying that it would be a tough problem to run a private television station in this highly competitive market. However, because they have shown that they are not competent to do it effectively, I say that is no reason why, because some Canadian is not, for a minority interest, ready to come in and bail them out, we should allow Americans to do it, particularly the American Broadcasting Company.

One cannot help but feel that this is a back-door method of establishing what in effect is bound increasingly to become merely another affiliate, perhaps with a little arrangement here and there to meet the exigencies of the laws and regulations, of one of the United States chains. If that is what we had wanted for our private stations in Canada, we would not need to be spending any money on the board of broadcast governors or on the C.B.C.

I say that this proposition is something that should simply be rejected. I think it should have been rejected out of hand by the board of broadcast governors. I cannot understand what possible defence there can be for their decision. I do not expect the minister to defend their decision. The minister has pointed out over and over again that he does not seek to influence their decisions. However, that does not exempt them from the criticism of this parliament to which they are responsible. It does not, of course, remove from us our right to criticize their conduct in this particular, as I am doing now.

The board of broadcast governors, of course, cannot make the final decision about this matter. All they can do is to make a recommendation. The final decision must be made by the governor in council. Hence the government itself cannot escape its responsibility in this matter and it should not seek to do so. It seems to me that we in this parliament should now indicate our views about this transaction so that the board of broadcast governors may be aware of them, in the hope that some different solution to this problem may be found.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 42 carry?

Mr. Robichaud: Before this vote carries, Mr. Chairman, possibly the minister could give the information which was asked for and which he said he would give me at a later date, when I asked him a question about the application of the Rimouski station for the erection of a satellite station to serve Madawaska and Victoria counties in New Brunswick.

I understand that the board of broadcast governors has approved the application, which was heard on February 24 of this year. That is almost seven months ago. The population of Madawaska and Victoria are still awaiting the service for which they have been asking for many months. I understand that the reason for the delay is that the Department of Transport has not granted the licence which has been approved by the board of broadcast governors. I wonder whether the minister would comment on this application.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, the facts of this situation are that the order in council has been passed and it has been published. That was done several days ago. I have forgotten the exact date.

I did not deal with the arguments of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate because, frankly, I doubt whether they are in order and I do not propose to become involved in a discussion about something which the board has considered and has adjourned to a future date.

If and when decisions are brought down and action is taken I think that would be the proper time to deal with the matter, but I do not think I should comment on it at the moment. In my opinion, as far as I am concerned this matter is sub judice and is something upon which I should not comment at all.

I do not want to be taken as agreeing with many of the statements which have been made, despite the fact that they attracted the hilarity of representatives of certain newspapers which apparently appreciated them. I must say it is the greatest tribute that could be paid to the board of broadcast governors—I am not assuming, but I am hoping this is the conclusion of this debate—that after a year of strenuous activity in which they have had so much responsibility, criticism has centred on this one situation, which is something that has not yet been finalized.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps the minister would have been wiser not to have offered the temptation which he offered in his last sentence or two, because I have a whole file of things, some of which I raised at the committee, that I would like to say about the work of the board of broadcast governors. However, I recognize that there will be plenty of time to do this in another session, which I hope will not be the longest session in the history of the Canadian parliament since confederation.

Mr. Nowlan: You will make this a shorter one if we can get through this item.

Mr. Pickersgill: I advise the minister that if he wants to get through this item he should listen to what I am saying. I was saying, when my sentence was cut in two by the minister's intervention, that I deliberately did not intend to mention any other matter because it did not seem to me there was any other matter that was so urgent that it could not be considered at what I feel would be a more opportune time.

However, I did feel that this matter, since apparently it is going to be settled on Monday next, is so urgent that any opposition member of this house, and indeed any hon. member of this house feeling as I do, would have been derelict in his duty not to see that it was aired. I also agree with the minister, that in the position in which he finds himself, as a member of the cabinet which will sooner or later have to reach a final determination about the matter—which, as he properly says, is not yet final—he has taken the right course in making no comment upon my observations.

I must say that I was rather encouraged the other day, and I noticed the Telegram was correspondingly discouraged, when the minister suggested that when I in very brief form expressed the same sentiments I was probably expressing sentiments widely held throughout the house.

I am not going to seek a denial or anything else from the minister, but I should like to go on believing that the views I have expressed are not very different from the real views of the Minister of National Revenue.

Item agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

43. Grant in respect of the net operating requirements of the radio and television services, $70,418,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I assume from the indications which have been given to the house by the Minister of Veterans Affairs in his capacity of house leader that no one has any intention at this session of arranging for a debate on the report of the committee on broadcasting. I fervently hope that my interpretation of the views of the house leader is a correct one.

Mr. Nowlan: I would hope so.

Mr. Pickersgill: I simply wanted to say, so that it would be on the record, and I think I can probably do it between now and six o'clock, that speaking not just for myself but for the Liberal party, I dissent and we dissent from the recommendation made with respect to the proposed recomposition of the board of directors of the C.B.C., and particularly to the recommendation that no executive officer or other employee of the corporation shall be a director of the corporation. The reasons for this dissent will be very plain from the debates of 1958, and our position in this regard has been strengthened rather than weakened by the experience since.

I felt it was desirable to say this because I do hope that if the government should decide between now and the next session to bring in any legislation to amend the Broadcasting Act, they will not bring in legislation which will create a board of political appointees solely and exclude from that board the officers of long experience who are now, respectively, the president and the vice president of the corporation.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, where was the hon. member when the report was written?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the hon. member for St. John's East asked that question.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: When the report was written the hon. member who is now speaking was in his place in this house, which was sitting at the same time as the committee was meeting, as has happened over and over in this longest of all sessions because of the shocking mismanagement of the business of the house by the government.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 43 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I see the clock, Mr. Chairman. Of course, we are all so pleased that the minister is in such good health again. I am only going to say that he knows I have had a long-standing interest with respect to the possibility of the C.B.C. doing something for Atikokan, Fort Frances, the Red lake area and some other parts of that very large riding which I represent. I do not expect a reply from the minister tonight. I would simply ask him, in view of his ability to be back on the job, to look at this matter again and perhaps advise me and my constituents about it.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 43 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before this vote carries I should just like to say one word. I am not going to oppose the carrying of the vote right now. However, I would like to make it very clear that there are two considerations in the minds of the opposition in agreeing to the carrying of this vote. One is a proper human concern for the Minister of National Revenue, for whom we have great respect. I do not say that in any patronizing way at all; we realize that the minister is carrying a very heavy load—

Mr. Benidickson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: —under considerable difficulties. The second reason is that the session has already been so prolonged. But we do hope that in taking this position—and I am speaking here, I think, for hon. members on both sides of the house—we will not read in half the newspapers in the country tomorrow that, notwithstanding the shocking increase in the cost of the C.B.C., parliament dealt with the item in 10 minutes. After all, we did not deal with it in ten minutes; we spent many days on it in the special committee. Even the Ottawa Journal said editorially the other day that we ought to give the C.B.C. a rest because parliament had spent so much time dealing with its affairs.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Nowlan: At the conclusion of these items, Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my appreciation to the committee and make it plain that I hope it is not out of consideration for myself that their scrutiny has been expedited, because the minister could sit here tomorrow and deal with these matters. However, I thought if we got through with them tonight we might facilitate business tomorrow.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I take it we will be sitting tomorrow. In view of that I would ask the house leader to tell us what business we will take tomorrow. Perhaps he will also indicate what we will be doing next week.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I thank the house for the commendable progress it made today. We will take the estimates of privy council first tomorrow followed by those of veterans affairs and those under the heading of legislation. There are some additional supplementary estimates which we shall endeavour to clear away. If time permits and the house is willing we might take the estimates of the Department of Finance.

Tomorrow I shall be better able to forecast the completion of the business of this session and make a good guess about the termination, with the assistance of the opposition.

Mr. Chevrier: May I direct the minister's attention to the fact that on my list there are several small items such as insurance and Auditor General which must be dealt with.

Mr. Churchill: I do not wish to hurry the house but those could be taken tomorrow. They normally are taken following the estimates of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Chevrier: I would hope that we could dispose of all these smaller items with the exception of finance. If the minister calls finance tomorrow there will be a general debate. Could we leave that until next week?

Mr. Churchill: I take it that these other items might be called in advance of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Pickersgill: They are not under the heading "Finance" in the book.

Mr. Churchill: No, but they are normally dealt with following the estimates of finance. We could call Auditor General, atomic energy, national research, insurance and governor general which follows privy council. The intention for tomorrow would be to complete the items I mentioned with the possible exception of the Department of Finance. I am not pressing the matter at all.

It being 6.06 p.m., the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CIVILIAN PAY RATES, R.C.A.F. BASES AND MILITARY COLLEGES

Question No. 290—Mr. Dupuis:

1. What is the hourly rate of pay for persons holding one of the following positions; cook, assistant cook, waitress, truck driver, labourer, and not being employed in the civil service: (a) at the Royal Canadian Air Force bases of St. Jean, Quebec; North Bay, Ontario, Ottawa, Ontario; St. Hubert, Quebec; Comox, British Columbia; (b) at the Royal military colleges of St. Jean, Quebec; Royal Roads, British Columbia; Kingston, Ontario?

2. Are the above named employees in some of these places paid a higher hourly rate for overtime work performed on Saturdays and Sundays? If so, at what places, and what rates are being paid at such places?

Answer by: Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence):

1.

Location	Cooks	Assistants	Food service attendants	Truck drivers	Labourers
	$	$	$	$	$
St. Jean, P.Q.	1.42	1.14	0.87	1.50	1.40
North Bay, Ont.	1.50	1.25	0.93	1.40	1.30
Ottawa, Ont.	1.81	(1) 1.71 (2) 1.32	0.99	1.57	1.51
St. Hubert, P.Q.	1.64	(1) 1.56 (2) 1.25 (3) 1.10	0.95	1.70	1.65

R.M.C. Kingston, Ont.	1.36	1.15	0.90	1.47	1.42

2. Compensation is based on the above rates of pay in effect at each location.

INCOME TAX POLICY ON HIDDEN RESERVES, CHARTERED BANKS

Question No. 297—Mr. Benidickson:

1. Does the income tax office inquire from the finance department about "inner" or "hidden" or "contingency" reserves of the chartered banks in Canada?

2. If so, what income tax policy is operative in this respect; and, in particular, what is the policy relating to income tax exemption for banks on such reserves?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

1. No. The Minister of Finance advises the Minister of National Revenue of the amount which, in his opinion, may be deducted from income each year under section 11(4) of the Income Tax Act or must be added to income under section 9.

2. See reply to question No. 1.

APPENDIX

EXCHANGE OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING TAX SHARING

OFFICE OF THE PREMIER
British Columbia

Victoria,
June 26th, 1961

Rt. Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, P.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir:

Thank you for your letter of June 16, which has arrived during the absence of the Premier.

Your communication will be placed before him at the earliest opportunity for his attention.

Yours sincerely,
(Mrs.) K. R. Mylrea,
Secretary to the Premier

PREMIER'S OFFICE
Regina

September 11th, 1961

The Rt. Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker, Q.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

In the Premier's absence, may I thank you on his behalf for your letter of August 30 and assure you that it will be brought to his attention at the earliest possible opportunity.

Yours sincerely,
Eleanor McKinnon
Secretary.

Ottawa, August 30th, 1961.

Honourable T. C. Douglas, M.A., M.L.A., Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

My dear Premier:

I have given study to your letter requesting a further dominion-provincial conference to discuss fiscal arrangements for the period commencing April 1, 1962.

The federal proposals which were advanced in my letter of June 16 followed three dominion-provincial conferences. The substance of these proposals was presented to the dominion-provincial conference of February 23 and 24, 1961. Following this conference the proposals were discussed by officials at two meetings of the continuing committee on fiscal and economic matters, and provincial suggestions received further careful consideration by the federal government and certain concessions were made. Since we have reached the present proposed arrangements after giving the matter so much careful study, I do not believe that any useful purpose would be served by a further conference at this time.

You have raised a number of points in your letter. In my letter of June 16 I dealt at length with the issue which had been raised and the decisions which had been reached with respect to various aspects of the proposals. The Minister of Finance, in introducing the new federal-provincial fiscal arrangements bill gave a very complete statement in the House of Commons on July 11, 1961.

I believe that your differences with the federal proposals are in large part a matter of approach. In designing the proposed new arrangements the federal government placed emphasis on the constitution, on the need for the freedom and a system of equalization which would more accurately reflect fiscal need. We believe that unless the system is based on such sound principles it cannot be expected to lead to mutual respect and harmony among the partners. The great weakness of the tax rental system is that it forces the provinces to importune the federal government rather than take their financial problems to provincial taxpayers as they have every constitutional right and responsibility to do.

You state that you object to equalization based on the national average. We believe that equalization to the yields in the top two provinces or the top one, as some provinces have proposed, is impracticable if applied to anything more than a small segment of provincial revenues however appealing it may be to provinces with lower per capita tax yields. From the standpoint of fiscal need we believe that a far sounder result is attained by broadening the base to include natural resource revenue and equalizing to the national average. We included natural resource revenue because the variations in resource revenue from province to province are more extreme than for any other provincial revenue and it would therefore improve the equalization formula more than the inclusion of any other provincial revenue source.

As to your suggestion that non-recurring natural resource revenues be excluded from the formula, the reasons for the decision in this request were outlined in my letter of June 19.

You refer again to the proposal of some of the premiers that equalization on the basis of the present standard rates should be continued and the provinces should also receive the benefit of the increased federal withdrawal proposed at the February conference. I should like to quote from my letter of June 19 as to why we were unable to accept this suggestion:

"Some provinces have asked whether the federal government would be prepared to extend the guarantees offered under the federal proposals. One suggestion was that there should be an additional guarantee that no province would receive less in equalization under the new proposals than it would have received under a projection of the equalization component of the present arrangements. Another suggestion was that what was referred to in my statement to the conference as the (a) guarantee should be extended to provinces above the national average. Under the proposals as presented by the federal government, the provinces will receive the benefit of substantially increased tax room in addition to equalization and the equalization guarantees. The federal withdrawal from the personal income tax is to be raised to 20 per cent by the end of the period compared with the standard rate of 13 per cent for the present year. Having in mind its heavy responsibilities, the federal government cannot provide additional equalization guarantees of the type mentioned above while at the same time offering substantially increased tax room to the provinces."

You state that the suggestion that the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant should stand as a separate feature of the tax-sharing arrangements was rejected. These grants were introduced as a separate feature of the fiscal arrangements with the provinces and remain so under the proposed arrangements. The Atlantic provinces adjustment grants of $35 million will be paid separately and the whole increase of $10 million will be reflected in increased Atlantic provinces adjustment grants. These payments will be separate and distinct from the payments which the Atlantic provinces will receive under the basic equalization formula to bring their per capita return from the standard taxes and 50 per cent of natural resource revenue up to the national average. In addition to the basic equalization formula, a guarantee was given that the return to provinces below the national average would not be less than under the arrangements now in effect, including the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants. In fact, the Atlantic provinces will be considerably better off than under the present arrangements so that this guarantee provision is unlikely to be operative for them. The existence of the guarantee provision does not, however, change the fact that the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants remain as a separate and distinct feature of the proposed arrangements.

You contend in your letter that the federal government wishes to restrict provincial flexibility in taxation under the new arrangements. On the contrary, we wish the provinces to be as free as possible. We have undertaken to collect the provincial taxes free of charge and it seems to be not unreasonable therefore that there should be certain limitations wherever these are necessary from the standpoint of administrative feasibility and the convenience of the taxpayers.

Contrary to the implication in your letter that the federal government has been unyielding to provincial requests, I would point out that if the suggestions I made to the October conference are examined it will be realized that the federal government made substantial concessions at the February conference and that further concessions were made in my letter of June 19.

In summary, we have attempted to achieve a system of fiscal arrangements with the provinces which will be sound and equitable and in which there will be the fullest cooperation between the federal government and the provinces. I believe that our proposals will make this possible.

Yours sincerely,
John G. Diefenbaker.

PREMIER'S OFFICE
Regina

June 30th, 1961.

The Rt. Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker, Q.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

My colleagues and I have now had an opportunity to study your letter of June 16 regarding federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements for the period 1962-67. We regret to find that, except for two very minor points, the federal government's position is completely unchanged from that originally advanced at our conference last February. All the representations made by the provinces, both at the conference and in subsequent discussion by the officials' committee, appear to have been wholly disregarded.

As I said at the conference, our main criticism of the new proposals is that they abandon the principle of equalization, and replace it with "averagization". Under the existing agreement the income tax revenues of all the provinces are equalized to the level of returns in the two richest provinces. Your letter makes clear that the federal government still feels that this reasonable yardstick should now be scrapped, and replaced by the much less equitable measure of the national average tax yield. While it may be true that the provinces may now increase their own income taxes, this is surely not a reasonable substitute for equalization. In fact, my officials calculate that, based on current Department of Finance estimates of tax yield, if the provinces of Newfoundland, Saskatchewan and Ontario each required an increase of $10 per capita in revenue, under the proposed new system the personal income tax rates in Newfoundland would have to be raised by 28 per cent, in Saskatchewan by 15 per cent and in Ontario by only 7 per cent.

At our February conference it was suggested by the federal government that equalization had been discarded and natural resource revenue added to give a better measure of fiscal need. While I think separate cases can be made for both equalization and fiscal need, I still fail to see how the inclusion of only one source of provincial revenue, and that a highly fluctuating one, can possibly provide an accurate indication of provincial fiscal need. If such need is to be regarded as a major factor, it is obviously necessary to include all sources of provincial revenue in the formula. The choice of the particular resources item alone clearly works to the disadvantage of certain provinces.

While most provinces disagreed with the new proposals, we did make a number of suggestions for improvement. Premier Lesage suggested that equalization payments under the new arrangements should be maintained at levels at least equal to those which would have prevailed had current arrangements been continued. This would make meaningful to provinces like Saskatchewan the "substantially increased tax room" held out by the federal government as an advantage of the new approach. The rejection of this suggestion means that an increase in the federal withdrawal from the personal income tax field from 13 to 20 per cent is purely illusory as far as Saskatchewan is concerned and probably also as far as Quebec and Manitoba are concerned. In each case any gain from increased tax room is subtracted from the guarantee payment.

Furthermore, you also indicate a rejection of the suggestion made by several provinces that the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants should stand as a separate feature of the tax-sharing arrangements and should not be included when calculating the minimum payments that are guaranteed to the provinces. This means that the Atlantic provinces will not get the full benefit of the $10 million increase promised but instead will receive only a part of that amount. The inclusion of the special adjustment grants as an integral feature of the new arrangements serves only to disguise the fact that the application of the new "national average" formula substantially reduces the amounts payable to the Atlantic provinces below the levels provided for under the existing equalization standard.

Finally, the federal government has rejected the suggestions made by Premier Manning and myself that non-recurring natural resource revenues should be excluded from the calculation of equalization payments. This suggestion was not made because the change would be of any financial benefit to our two provinces, but rather because the inclusion of such revenues could result in a great deal of instability in the payments to all provinces. The base used in the illustration given to us last February included the peak years of the oil boom. In the last two years, the years which will influence the actual payments under the new proposals, these non-recurring resource revenues have declined. This means that the so-called equalization payments will be less than the illustrative figures suggested. I urge you to consider again whether the interests of all the provinces would not better be served by the exclusion of non-recurring resource revenues from the calculation of equalization payments and a compensating adjustment provided for by a slight further federal withdrawal from the individual income tax field.

Not only have these provincial suggestions been rejected, but your letter also indicates that the federal government now wishes to restrict the very flexibility in provincial taxation so strongly emphasized both by yourself and the Minister of Finance last February. The only condition attached to tax collection agreements at that time was "that the province under its laws define the tax base, i.e., taxable income, to be identical at all times with the federal definition". Your letter now states that even if this condition is fully observed, the federal government will only collect provincial taxes on the further condition that they are expressed as a percentage of the federal rate. Even this would be acceptable if the provinces had certain safeguards: for example, if we were notified in advance of changes in the federal tax rate so our own rates could be adjusted, or should this be impossible, if the provinces were compensated for any changes in federal rates. However, provincial receipts will change with every federal tax change and our percentage rates once fixed "must be constant throughout the year". On the other hand, the federal government reserves the right to change its rates whenever necessary. The instability and uncertainty thus introduced into the annual budgets and budget procedures of the provinces is self evident.

For all of these reasons my colleagues and I feel that a further discussion of the proposals reiterated in your letter of June 16 is vitally necessary. I would urge that you follow the precedent established in 1956 and call a final conference immediately. To do otherwise would be a departure from the flexible and considerate attitude you have espoused in the past.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas.

My dear Prime Minister:

Thank you very much for your letter of June 16 telling me of the federal government's decisions regarding a number of points which have been raised in connection with the proposals you placed before the dominion-provincial conference of February last.

My colleagues and I will study the effects of these proposals and I shall be glad to write you further once we have had an opportunity of doing so.

Yours sincerely,

PREMIER'S OFFICE

Regina, May 30th, 1961.

The Rt. Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker, Q.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

At our February conference you outlined the federal government's proposal for new federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements. The proposal would require each province to decide whether to collect its own personal and corporate income taxes or sign a collection agreement with the federal government, and even if tax collection agreements are signed, the province must decide on the tax rates it will levy in 1962. I understand that in order to minimize the confusion and inconvenience of a change-over from tax rental to tax collection agreements the provinces may be expected to decide on their 1962 tax rates by September, 1961.

Before this decision can be made, however, it will be necessary to conclude our negotiations on the new proposals. A number of suggestions were made at the conference which you undertook to consider, and your decision on these as well as the answers to a number of questions raised at the continuing committee of officials must necesarily precede our decision on tax collections and rates.

Saskatchewan, and I am sure a number of other provinces, would appreciate an early letter outlining the details of your February proposal.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas.

Honourable Duff Roblin, M.L.A.,
Premier of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

My dear Premier:

Thank you for your letter of August 23 referring to the prospective federal-provincial fiscal arrangements for the period commencing April 1, 1962.

I am glad to have your view that the arrangements which have been proposed for the new period commencing April 1, 1962, are a decided improvement over the agreement of 1957 and represent an improvement even over the 1958 amendment of the agreement which raised the provincial share of personal income tax from 10 to 13 per cent. You add that you would still propose that equalization be based on a per capita yield of revenues in the province with the highest yield rather than on the national average yield per capita. I should like to point out that a comparison of two systems of equalization can be made only by taking account of the coverage of the revenue sources to be equalized as well as the level to which these revenue sources are to be equalized. The proposed new formula for equalization to the national average per capita yield is based not only on the yield of the standard taxes, but includes as well 50 per cent of natural resource revenue, the provincial revenue which exhibits the most extreme variation from province to province. The federal government is convinced that this more broadly based equalization formula gives much more equitable results by ensuring that the distribution of equalization payments will be more in accordance with fiscal need, and is quite superior to the more narrowly based formula now in use which takes account only of the variation in yield from the standard taxes.

You list also 11 other items as "Manitoba proposals ancillary to main tax-sharing submissions" and suggest the usefulness of further negotiations with respect to these matters, but I think you will agree that further discussion of which can remain in abeyance for the first concern should be to proceed with the implementation of the main tax-sharing arrangements as you indicate in your letter you plan to do.

Yours sincerely,
John G. Diefenbaker.

My dear Prime Minister:

I have received your letter of June 17 announcing the policy of the government of Canada in respect of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements for the period commencing April 1, 1962, as well as Bill C-122 by which you give legislative expression to that policy. I also acknowledge receipt of a copy of your letter of August 4 to the premier of Quebec informing him of your view that no good purpose would be served by a further federal-provincial conference at this time. May I record the fact that Manitoba would be pleased indeed to attend any further conference that might be decided upon.

It must be acknowledged that there are aspects of your announcement which represent a decided improvement over the federal-provincial agreement of 1957, and indeed it is estimated that Manitoba will likely benefit financially at least to some extent during the course of the new arrangements even after the amendments of 1958 are taken into account. Nevertheless, I must again draw your attention to the fact that Manitoba is not to receive under the new proposals that proportion of the shared tax fields for which we believe we have made a convincing and logical case. Further, I must refer particularly to that portion of the equalization formula based on Canadian average yields. Manitoba reaffirms its proposal to equalize to the highest Canadian province and we shall continue to work for its implementation. This we regard as more in keeping with the basic principles on which these arrangements have been founded.

Under present circumstances, however, there is no alternative but to take the steps necessary to implement the most advantageous of the options open to us under Bill C-122 and I shall be informing you of details in this connection before long. There are, however, a number of other matters which Manitoba raised in the course of our recent conferences on which it appears final decisions have not yet been reached. I refer to various supplementary arrangements governing federal-provincial co-operation in the areas of joint interest and endeavour which are listed hereunder:

Certain Manitoba Proposals Ancillary to Main Tax-Sharing Submissions

1. Inclusion of mental and T.B. care costs in the shareable portion of the hospital services program.

2. Inclusion of administration costs in the shareable portion of the joint social welfare and health programs, including hospital insurance.

3. Inclusion of capital depreciation as shareable item under the hospital insurance program.

4. Extension of aid to provincial highway programs in order to encourage development of a north-south system in relation to the east-west trans-Canada route, particularly in relation to international connections.

5. Specific aid programs in respect of such developmental undertakings as the northern hydroelectric, mineral and timber programs. This would comprise extension of the roads to resources program and similar undertakings relative to initial exploration and development.

6. A joint long distance power transmission program.

7. Inclusion of petroleum and natural gas in the category under natural resource taxation definitions in connection with federal tax credits with respect to corporation taxation.

8. Extension of the principles of revised municipal improvements legislation to provide necessary financial support for local social capital development.

9. The expansion of capital funds for public investment in Canada, through specific creation of investment funds for provincial and municipal projects.

10. The introduction of a tax-exempt category for debentures and other issues of provincial and municipal authorities in respect of social capital undertakings.

11. Aid to universities.

In addition to those questions specifically listed above, there are a number of special problems which have been the subject of particular attention and involve direct negotiations. As these are all matters of prime importance to the development of Canada and the province, I would strongly urge a resumption of negotiations so that we may make some advance in arriving at necessary improvements in existing arrangements.

Yours sincerely,

Duff Roblin.

Dear Prime Minister,

Your letter of the 16th instant is at hand and the matters to which you make reference will be given immediate study.

I understand that our officials have been closely in touch with the federal officials, and that the transition in relation to the agreements is going forward smoothly. OFFICE OF THE PREMIER
Province of Quebec

Quebec City,
September 7, 1961.

The Rt. Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, P.C., Q.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear sir:

My colleagues of the provincial cabinet and I have studied your letter of August 4 concerning the dominion-provincial tax arrangements for the period starting April 1, 1962.

You stress the fact that the federal government will, in a proportion which will reach 16 per cent next year and 1 per cent more every year thereafter, progressively abandon the personal income tax field. Without minimizing the importance of that concession, I cannot forget that the changes made to the equalization formula take away from us practically all the advantages it offered.

As for the sharing of the tax on public utility companies for power distribution, I do hope that the decision to give back to the provinces half of the federal income tax revenues will be put into practice in such a way that the provinces will truly get half of the revenues and not only one fifth as it is the case at present for the province of Quebec.

As far as university grants are concerned, we do not underestimate the necessity of providing adequately for the increasingly greater financial needs of our educational institutions, but we must protest against any infringement upon the exclusive sovereignty of the provincial legislatures in that respect. Consequently we must refuse any subordination to the federal authorities such as that implied under a system of grants paid out under its control.

You are perfectly aware of the reasons why I did not find satisfactory the proposed agreement which would have involved a special corporation income tax abasement under the authority of chapter 13 of the 1960 statute. The conditions and restrictions governing the reduction of the normal corporation income tax infringes upon provincial legislative autonomy and I will not be satisfied until it is removed.

However, I fail to understand that this attitude on my part would justify you to revert to the situation as it existed before the 1960 statute.

The basic principle allowing the province of Quebec to levy, all by herself and through the corporation income tax, an amount sufficient to pay the universities the grants they need is, in my opinion, in complete accordance with the spirit of the Canadian constitution. I feel that far from abandoning that principle, we should on the contrary do everything we can so that it be applied without any condition or restriction.

Sincerely yours,

Jean Lesage.

The Honourable Jean Lesage, P.C., M.L.A., Prime Minister of Quebec,
Government Buildings,
Quebec City, P.Q.

My dear Premier:

I have received your letter dated July 13, concerning the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements for the period commencing April 1, 1962.

You are no doubt aware that Bill C-122, entitled "Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act", was introduced in the House of Commons on July 12 and is standing for second reading following the resumption of the present session in September. The features of the new fiscal arrangements and the reasons therefor were set forth in the speech of the Minister of Finance on July 11 at pages 7910-7931 of Hansard.

Under the new system the provinces will retain their full freedom to levy and collect whatever taxes they choose in the fields of personal income tax, corporation tax, and succession duties. Although the federal government has offered to collect the personal and corporation taxes on behalf of the provinces without any charge, you have indicated that your government is not interested in this offer and will collect the taxes it chooses to impose.

You are aware that the federal government is withdrawing to an ever greater degree from the personal income tax field in favour of the provinces. In 1956, the then federal government, of which you were a leading member, considered 10 per cent of the yield from the personal income tax to be an adequate provincial share. At the instance of the present federal government, this provincial share was raised in 1958 to 13 per cent. Under the proposed new arrangements, it will rise next year to 16 per cent and by a further 1 per cent each year thereafter until, in the final year of the 5 year period, it will aggregate 20 per cent. Thus the provincial share will be exactly double what you and your colleagues considered an adequate provincial share for the present 5 year period.

I note, also, that the further proposals of the federal government in relation to the logging profits tax and the tax on public utilities engaged in the distribution of energy commend themselves to you. The provinces will undoubtedly derive substantial additional benefits from these proposals of the federal government. Your reference to the special corporation income tax abatement under the 1960 legislation is worthy of special mention. As Quebec chose to be a prescribed province in pursuance of section 9A of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act for last year and this year, the federal corporation income tax payers in the province received an abatement of 1 per cent in addition to the normal 9 per cent, making a total of 10 per cent.

The provision under section 40(1) of the Income Tax Act, for an additional abatement of 1 per cent in the corporation income tax in a province prescribed by regulation under Section 9A of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act was given a 2 year duration and automatically terminates at the end of the present year. At the time of the dominion-provincial conference in February last, you indicated your wish that this subject be not introduced into the scope of the discussions at the conference. It was our understanding, therefore, that the continuation of these arrangements would not meet with your approval and accordingly the new Bill C-122 makes no provision therefor. I should be glad to hear from you as to what arrangement you consider appropriate for the future regarding this important fiscal arrangement in relation to fedeal university grants. A letter from you setting forth your definite views in this regard would greatly assist the federal government.

The federal government believes that its fiscal proposals to the provinces are most generous. We have carried the principle of equalization further and made it more effective for assistance to the provinces in the weakest fiscal position. By the proposals made the constitution has been strictly respected and the freedom and constitutional responsibility of the provinces have been restored.

Finally, with regard to your request for a further dominion-provincial conference, while I am most desirous of assuring the most amicable relations between the federal government and the provinces, I do not think that any good purpose would be served by a further conference at this time.

I am,

Yours sincerely,
(Signed) John G. Diefenbaker.

OFFICE OF THE PREMIER
Province of Quebec

July 13, 1961.

The Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, P.C., Q.C.
Prime Minister of Canada,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear sir:

My colleagues and I have dutifully given close consideration to your letter of June 16, 1961, in which you set forth the federal government's intentions with regard to the questions raised during the recent federal-provincial conferences and, more particularly, the one which was held in Ottawa on February 23 and 24 last.

The province of Quebec has passed its own laws in the matter of personal and corporation income tax. I have no intention of proposing to the legislature that the care of collecting those taxes be entrusted to the Department of National Revenue. For that reason, I shall refrain from commenting on the collection agreements suggested.

With respect to the equalization formula, the guarantee offered and the gradual widening of the taxation field reserved to the provinces in the matter of personal income tax, I must point out once again that the effect of widening the taxation field is illusory for us, to all practical purposes, since what is given to us with one hand is taken away with the other, due to the decrease in equalization.

Personal and corporation income tax is already a heavy burden for our taxpayers. Therefore, our government will not be able to avail itself of a freer hand in the taxation field without maintaining or increasing double taxation.

You will understand that my colleagues and myself were bitterly disappointed by your letter. As I pointed out in Ottawa, the province of Quebec is in full expansion and needs additional revenues. In order to reach the national average, its expenditures, according to D.B.S. figures, should be materially increased in the important fields of education, health and communications. Those are priority requirements and only through an increase in the revenues at our disposal shall we be in a position to carry out our obligations under the constitution.

With regard to the tax on forest development projects, the solution suggested seems satisfactory.

I am pleased to learn that the federal government has endorsed my suggestion to extend beyond 1961-62 the agreements under which the provinces get a share of the income tax collected from certain public utility companies.

In this respect, I take the liberty of pointing out that the basis of computation used to determine the provincial share and which goes back to legislation passed in 1947 and 1952 that has now lapsed, should be governed by new regulations. As you indicated in your letter, the province of Quebec should receive half of the federal income tax from those corporations. In fact, the federal government pays to the province at present less than 20 per cent of the taxes levied from those companies. This is a serious anomaly that should be corrected.

Finally, I must point out that you make no mention at all of the special abatement on corporation income tax which was granted last year in order to solve the problem of assistance to universities. The wording of Bill C-120 and the explanations of your Minister of Finance indicate the existence of a serious misunderstanding on this matter.

Under the circumstances, it is urgent that another conference be held in order to seek an agreement and to see that no such serious misunderstanding be allowed to subsist.

Sincerely yours,
Jean Lesage.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Upon receipt of your letter of April 12 concerning the basis of distribution of the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants among the four provinces, tentative arrangements were made for a meeting of provincial representatives to discuss the matter.

Preliminary discussions between the various premiers have since taken place by letter and telephone and I would hope that the proposed meeting will soon take place.

I trust that it soon will be possible to give you more definite information in this regard.

Dear Mr. Stanfield:

The Prime Minister had noted that in connection with a number of things raised in your letter of June 29, 1961, you felt a specific reply was not required.

I am simply writing to say that because of the suggestion in the second paragraph of your letter, a copy has been referred to the Department of Justice with a request that model provincial legislation be given attention.

Executive Assistant to the Prime Minister.

THE PREMIER

Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have your letter of June 16 in connection with the proposed federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements. I am pleased to note that the federal government is prepared to continue the sharing of the income tax collected from certain public utilities for the fiscal year 1961-62.

I hope that the Department of Justice will be able to proceed as rapidly as possible with model provincial legislation, as I feel it most desirable to achieve some degree of uniformity in the legislation, so as to reduce to a minimum the possibility of conflict of interest among the provinces.

As you undoubtedly know, we enacted an act respecting individual and corporation income taxation at the last session of our legislature. Our act provides for a tax on personal income based on a percentage of the federal tax. It provides for corporation income tax at the rate of 9 per cent on taxable income with the said tax to be computed as if imposed under the Income Tax Act of Canada and regulations thereunder.

I note in your letter that the federal government is prepared to enter into a tax collection agreement with a province for any corporation income tax which is expressed as a flat percentage of taxable income as defined for federal income tax purposes. I am sure that your finance people and the Department of Justice are considering all the problems which may arise, but I might take the liberty of pointing out that there will have to be great care exercised in defining "taxable income for federal income tax purposes."

It has been brought to my attention that there are certain federal statutes other than the Income Tax Act which contain special provisions having an important bearing upon the liability of certain corporations for income tax. I have been referred to the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act and to the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act, both of which apparently provide that a corporation is entitled to either special depreciation or deductions in computing income notwithstanding anything in the Income Tax Act or regulations thereunder.

I do not require any reply from you in connection with the latter comments. I trust that we will be able to work out all matters in connection with the legislation and the tax collection agreements to our mutual satisfaction.

Yours very truly,
R. L. Stanfield

PREMIER'S OFFICE
Charlottetown

June 30, 1961

Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

My dear Prime Minister:

On June 28th representatives of the four Atlantic provinces, including the premiers, excepting Mr. Smallwood, met at Halifax to discuss the division of the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant.

In previous correspondence with each of the premiers, a copy of which is enclosed, the views of the island government were outlined and our discussions yesterday were an amplification of our position.

We now find that the other provinces are unanimous in preserving the original 30-30-30-10 per cent basis, while we take strong exception to the provision for this province as being unreal and unfair and particularly so under the impact of rapidly expanding demands and services.

The working out on paper by economists of formulae sometimes complicated and far removed from the demands of fiscal need and actual conditions, does not provide a reasonable basis of settlement. The Ottawa conferences to my mind stressed the principle of fiscal need and surely on this basis, 10 per cent of the grant is not appropriate to our situation.

I am concerned with the fact that basic services in this province are reasonably similar to those of the other provinces and undergoing rapid expansion and increased costs. Our prospects for increased provincial revenues are very restricted and recent application of additional taxes in the form of sales and hospitalization levies has created some serious objections.

We are dependent almost solely on the farms and the sea for our basic economy. We have not been blessed with the wide range of natural assets that are common to the other provinces. These provinces are now under a strong development in these respects and national publications have recently outlined an attractive economic future in Newfoundland and New Brunswick through the development of their natural resources. Nova Scotia too occupies a somewhat similar position. Our province depends only on two very unpredictable sources of revenue, the land and the sea and in looking to the period in which the new financial agreement operates, I cannot forsee a development here comparable to that of the neighboring provinces.

Our provincial revenues, that in various forms of taxes and levies, will remain more or less static while revenues of the other provinces have every possibility of substantial expansion.

With these factors in view we submit that the original 30-30-30-10 basis is unreasonable and unfair. It was unfair in its original conception but under vastly changed conditions and demands, it is more unfair when applied to the proposed $35,000,000 grant. If that basis is preserved, it will mean $10,500,000 for each of the mainland provinces and $3,500,000 for the island. These other provinces will receive $7,000,000 more than the island instead of $5,000,000 under the previous allocation. This imposes too small a proportion of the grant and too great a burden to carry on a population of 100,000 people faced with increased demands, services and restricted revenues.

Referring again to the conference of yesterday the mainland provinces seemed very determined on the old formula and while our original demand was for 20 per cent, we offered to generously compromise on a 30-30-30-10 basis on the original $25,000,000 and a more realistic proportion of 20 per cent of the extra $10,000,000, or, as an alternative, an across the board basis of 29-29-29 and 13. This would not seriously affect the mainland provinces but would in view of our low allocation provide a measure of financial relief for the island.

At one of our Ottawa conferences, it was suggested that if agreement could not be reached in the division by our Atlantic provinces premiers that the matter might then be referred back to Ottawa. In view of the situation outlined, we have no other alternative but to ask federal authorities, who are responsible for a very generous grant, to mediate in this situation and provide such adjustment that will bring our portion to some reasonable level above the 10 per cent basis.

Trusting to have your views and I trust a satisfactory solution at an early date, I remain,

Yours very sincerely,
W. H. Shaw,
Premier.

John G. Diefenbaker,
Prime Minister,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Have written you today re disagreement this province with stand of other three provinces for a thirty thirty thirty ten allocation of thirty five million dollar adjustment grant. Feel this very unfair to island facing expanded commitments and similar services and lacking potential other provinces from resource revenues. Have suggested above distribution covering twenty five million but an increased allocation of twenty per cent on additional ten millions or a twenty nine twenty nine twenty nine thirteen over all basis. Do not wish to hoard up necessary decision but if possible would like federal mediation in reaching solution reasonably satisfactory to this province. If slight delay not possible and fair adjustment not made will stape this province feel settlement advocated by other provinces most unfair.

Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker
Prime Minister of Canada
Ottawa

My dear Prime Minister:

I have your letter under date of April 12, regarding an early disposition of the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants between the four Atlantic provinces.

I may say that we have had some correspondence in this connection and I feel that we will get together very shortly and have this matter arranged on what I hope will be a satisfactory basis to all concerned.

Yours sincerely,
W. R. Shaw,
Premier

=Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

Thank you for your message to Premier Smallwood. Nfld. considers its share of thirty per centum of Atlantic provinces adjustment grant as previously agreed very fair and would be happy to participate in increased grant on same basis. Kindest regards.

Leslie R. Curtis,
Acting Premier.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Ottawa, June 30, 1961

The Honourable J. R. Smallwood,
Premier of Newfoundland
St. John's, Newfoundland.

Immediate decision on division of Atlantic provinces adjustments grants among four Atlantic provinces necessary for federal legislation. Please advise decision by return wire.

John G. Diefenbaker
Prime Minister of Canada

Note: A similar wire was sent to the premiers of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

Ottawa, April 12, 1961.

Honourable J. R. Smallwood, D.C.L., LL.D., M.L.A.,
Premier of Newfoundland,
Legislative Building,
St. John's, Newfoundland.

Dear Premier,

In my statement to the dominion-provincial conference of February 23 and 24, I said that the federal government proposed to continue the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants and to increase them effective April 1, 1962, from $25 million to $35 million per annum for the ensuing five years, with the basis of distribution among the four provinces being left for them to determine by agreement.

The additional grants to the Atlantic provinces are presently provided for under section 11 of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. It is intended that the increased grants for the period after April 1, 1962, also be provided for in federal legislation which will be introduced at the current session of parliament. I would urge, therefore, if you have not already done so, that you arrange to determine with the other Atlantic premiers a mutually satisfactory division of the increased grants totalling $35 million for each of the five years commencing April 1, 1962.

In view of the need to prepare federal legislation at an early date, I would appreciate being advised as soon as possible of the division of the grant mutually agreed upon by the Atlantic premiers for the next five years.

Yours sincerely,
John G. Diefenbaker

Note: A similar letter was sent to the premiers of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, September 23, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGED WASTE OF MANPOWER—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the failure of the Minister of National Defence to disclose to the house during consideration of his estimates a hidden report of the Department of Finance asserting that many thousands of men were already being wasted in the navy, army and air force.

Mr. Speaker: I have been asked by the hon. member for Laurier for leave under standing order 26 to move the adjournment of the house for the discussion of a subject which is certainly not the usual type of subject advanced as requiring the postponement of other proceedings and as being of such general public importance to permit a discussion under the standing order.

What the hon. member wishes to discuss is the alleged failure of the Minister of National Defence to disclose what is referred to as a hidden report in the course of the consideration of his estimates. In other words the complaint is about some action that did not take place, or some act within the House of Commons itself. These matters are usually dealt with as questions of privilege if they involve the privileges of the house, or as a matter of grievance if it is a complaint against the conduct of the government in its actions toward the house.

I think it would be improper to extend the scope of the rule to cover matters which are purely questions of the relationship of the minister to the house within the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Will Your Honour allow me to argue the point?

Mr. Speaker: I would be quite ready to hear the hon. member on the procedural point, but not on the substantive subject matter of the proposed debate.

Mr. Chevrier: I quite understand that Your Honour will hear me on the meaning and extension of rule 26 but not on the merits. I propose to address myself now to the point that Your Honour raised a moment ago. I should like to say, sir, that this matter would unquestionably have been raised and discussed by those of us who sit on this side of the house had there been an opportunity to do so, and had we known of it during the consideration of the minister's estimates.

As the house knows, the minister's estimates are now complete and have passed the house. There is no opportunity, therefore, to discuss those estimates again during the remaining time the house will be sitting. Then there is the question of the motion to go into supply. We, of our own volition, decided to forgo that motion, so there is no other occasion upon which we would have an opportunity to discuss a matter of this nature. We did this by agreement among the parties; I will not say it was done at the request of the government, but it was decided we would forgo the motion to go into supply under certain circumstances. Then there was this sensational story in the Globe and Mail of national importance. Surely there is no other opportunity from now until the end of the session when we may be given a chance to discuss a matter of this importance.

I shall not, as I say, go into the merits of the subject, Mr. Speaker, but here is a story which, if there is any foundation for it, at least calls for some explanation by the Minister of National Defence, the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance if he were here. I should like an opportunity to discuss the merits of the subject after Your Honour has dealt with what I am now saying. As the matter stands now there will be no opportunity from now until the end of the session to discuss this matter of urgent public importance.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few words on the point upon which you now have to make a decision. I know, sir, the responsibility that is placed upon you at this moment. There can be no question of the urgency of the matter which is now before us, not only because during the consideration of the defence estimates there was no indication of such a report having been made by the Minister of Finance to the cabinet or treasury board, but also because during the consideration of the estimates the hon. member for Kootenay West made certain statements to the Minister of National Defence, as recorded on page 8320 of Hansard for September 13.

At that time the minister said the hon. member for Kootenay West was incorrect in maintaining that the increase in armed forces for NATO at this time was being initiated to replace the loss of combat troops who are now performing other tasks.

In view of the fact, sir, that this information which now appears in the Globe and Mail was made available to the treasury branch of the government some two months ago, and in view of the statement of the Minister of National Defence in reply to the hon. member for Kootenay West, I would say this is a matter of urgency, and we expect you will so rule.

Mr. Speaker: I, of course, accept quite readily the proposition that the consideration of the efficiency of the defence forces, and so on, which would appear to be the background of the subject under discussion, is a matter of urgent public importance. However, I am asked here to set aside our ordinary procedures to allow a complaint to be made about the conduct of the Minister of National Defence, based on a story appearing today in the press.

At any rate, even if I accepted the hon. member's argument it seems to me that the foundation of the motion is scarcely sufficient. It seems to me that he ought to establish that there is a report and that it is a report which in the public interest should be presented to parliament. That is a matter that can be brought out by questions, and the hon. member will have that opportunity. However, before there is some basis for a debate on the failure of the minister to do something which, I would think, is still in the realm of speculation, I do not believe that I should accept the hon. member's request, at this time in any event. I must indicate that my judgment is that leave should not be given.

REPORT RESPECTING ALLEGED WASTAGE OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he give the house some assurance that the Minister of Finance will be in the house before we prorogue, in order that we may query him as to the charges that appear in this newspaper regarding his concern and displeasure over the waste in the army, navy and air force, according to a report of the Department of Finance to which my friend the hon. member for Laurier made reference a moment ago? This article in the Globe and Mail undoubtedly has come to the attention of the Prime Minister. It makes serious allegations that affect the administration of national defence.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked a question. I think he should not elaborate with comments on the situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the Prime Minister care to comment?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman regularly follows the course of making such statements, which he realizes are out of order, so that he will be able to make unsupported allegations, regardless of the rules.

As to the question whether or not the Minister of Finance will be here, I expect him to be here early next week, on Tuesday or Wednesday. At the moment he is engaged in discharging his responsibilities at the meeting of the international monetary fund, and he has one further appointment before returning.

I do not think I am going to make any observations as to the other matters except to say this. With the experience the hon. gentleman had as minister, he and those associated with him will recall that the policy of all governments since confederation has been not to affirm or deny any assertions about representations or statements passing between governmental committees or between departments of government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Prime Minister's last statement is one with which I take issue. No one will deny that a document as between one minister and another is privileged, but the moment it becomes a public affair, the situation is changed. Here in one of my hon. friend's own journals is the allegation that there is a secret report.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: The allegation?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is now a matter of public knowledge.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member raises as a question of privilege the statement of the Prime Minister that interdepartmental communications have been communicated to the house only in the discretion of the government, as I understand him. There is a question of the privileges of the house, of course, if the minister refuses to communicate to the house something which the house is entitled to have. However, I do not think that question is before us. I understood that the hon. member for Essex East was simply arguing the general statement of the policy that has been followed since confederation with respect to documents.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I just explain what I am seeking to do. The Prime Minister needlessly provoked me into an exchange. I should have addressed myself to the Chair and not to him. I apologize to the Chair for that. The Prime Minister said that exchanges between one minister and another were privileged and that no hon. member had the right to compel or to extract from the ministry the circumstances or the character of these privileged documents. With that there is no quarrel.

My question of privilege is this. Now that there has been a public revelation of the existence of such differences and such a report, it surely is within the privilege of any hon. member of this house to ascertain from the minister concerned or from the government the character of that report, particularly when it so vitally affects our defence forces.

Mr. Speaker: I would accept that there is a question of privilege there, but I do not think it has yet arisen. What is being debated is the general principle. If there has been a refusal and the house considers that raises a question of privilege, well and good; let the hon. member who complains bring it forward in the proper way. But so far I think we are talking about principles rather than acts.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask a supplementary question on the original question?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order before the hon. gentleman asks a supplementary question, because I do not think I would have the right to do it afterward. The Prime Minister asserted in his answer that communications between ministers had always been regarded as privileged ever since confederation, and that all governments had taken that view. The Prime Minister, of course, was very inexperienced as prime minister at the time, but he will recall that on January 20, 1958—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: —he seemed to take a different view—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: —about exchanges between the members of another government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have not raised any objection to the gratuitous statements which have been made. The hon. member for Essex East—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —pretending to operate under a question of privilege, made statements that are not justified as a matter of privilege. This discussion can only lead into a debate and the making of statements that are in no way permissible at this stage.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I agree that we should not debate the principle now. Of course the Prime Minister will, I think, recognize that he introduced the subject of the debate himself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister referred to the practice since confederation. I think we should not debate the question of what has been the practice or what is the practice. If there is a proper question of privilege or a point of order, well and good.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question on the original question, not to be argumentative but merely seeking information from the right hon. Prime Minister. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been drawn to a front page article in the Globe and Mail this morning to the effect that a report was made by the Minister of Finance to treasury board. Can the Prime Minister tell us if such was the case; and further, can he make any comment on the allegations in the Globe and Mail article which reads in part:

> —the defence department should be able to find the men it needs to expand the operational capability of the armed forces without any increase in total manpower—

Is the Prime Minister in a position to comment on the report and the allegations as contained in the article in the Globe and Mail of this morning?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have already dealt with the question as to whether there was or was not a communication. That is one of the matters that, in the public interest, governments since confederation have refused in any way to present or bring before parliament.

As to representations that are made from time to time, any hon. gentleman who has had any connection with government knows that in the determination of any problem that arises for decision by the cabinet, naturally representations are made respecting "the pros and the cons". Those, too, have always been regarded as privileged.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question having to do with the statement he made a moment ago, that communications between one minister and another are privileged and have never been made public. Is he aware that in order to substantiate his position in the house not very long ago, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys made public a letter that I had written as minister of transport to the former minister of mines and technical surveys, and put it on the record?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid we are now getting back to an argument on the question of principle, as to whether the government is obliged to answer questions relating to interdepartmental communications. The government, as I understand the answer, takes the position that it is not so obliged and has, in effect, declined to answer the question on that matter. I think this does not open the way to a debate on whether or not the government is right to decline. That may be possible at another time, but not now.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not desire to open a debate, but I think if the rule applies in one case then surely it applies in another.

Mr. Speaker: It appears to me that the hon. gentleman is making an argument, and I think a debate on this issue would be out of order.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the Prime Minister answer my question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no question to answer.

Mr. Speaker: It appeared to me to be a debating question.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): On a point of order, has not the situation been created by the fact that the Prime Minister was permitted to make a gratuitous reference to what the practice had been since confederation? That reference having been permitted, it is difficult to rule out questions indicating that what he said might or might not be so. This is where the difficulty arises.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is putting forward an ingenious argument. If I were to accept it, it would mean that if any hon. member who had the floor made an observation which was irregular under the rules it would open a debate on that observation. I do not think a point of order arises.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of what has arisen this morning and the article which appeared in the Globe and Mail, does not the minister himself think he should make a forthright statement to the house at the present time?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): I do not believe any such thing. If members of the government were required to answer in detail various speculative stories which appear constantly in the press, the whole time of the house would be taken up with debating these matters. In this particular case it is alleged that a certain cabinet document is in existence. The article then alleges that there are certain things contained in that document. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, it has never been the custom either to admit or to deny the existence of any particular cabinet document. As the hon. member well knows, having been a member of the previous government for many years, such documents are entirely secret.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the issue.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the minister is doing what I have preventd some hon. members opposite from doing, that is debating the principle of what is the practice with respect to interdepartmental communications.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of National Defence a question based on a story which appeared in today's Globe and Mail alleging that there is a waste of many thousands of men in the navy, army and air force?

Mr. Harkness: As I indicated when the discussion of the estimates for my department was in progress, I do deny any such allegations.

UNITED NATIONS

STATEMENT ON ACTIVITIES OF CURRENT GENERAL ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): I am sure the house would want to welcome the Secretary of State for External Affairs back from the general assembly of the United Nations. Perhaps we might take this opportunity of asking him if he could report on the activities of the session to date.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the hon. member for his kind words, and I am sure the house is also very glad to welcome him back from the Middle East.

In his work with the United Nations the hon. member represented Canada in connection with the very difficult question of refugees in the Middle East. He has now had an opportunity to visit the camps and see just what is going on there, and I am sure this will be beneficial to the house.

The outstanding event of the sixteenth session of the general assembly thus far has been the tremendous impact made by the tragic death of the secretary general, Mr. Dag Hammarskjold. It would be difficult for one to express adequately just how the delegates from all countries, except perhaps the communist countries, have been saddened by this event. Tributes were paid to the memory of this great world statesman a day or two ago, and I had the privilege of speaking for Canada and also for Australia and New Zealand. We were very pleased that they asked us to say a few words on their behalf as well as on our own.

This death, of course, could be disastrous for the United Nations, coming as it did at about the worst time such an event could possibly occur. However, I believe there will be a great rallying to the support of that world organization. I believe most of the delegations are determined that the United Nations shall not be allowed to fail, and that it will go on to achieve greater strength as a result of the inspiration of Dag Hammarskjold and the sacrifice he has made in the cause of world peace.

There was no difficulty in electing a president, Mongi Slim, who has given distinguished service for Tunisia in the United Nations. Since that country achieved its independence about five years ago he has been the permanent representative of Tunisia at the United Nations. He is admired and respected by all countries. I believe he is the first African president of the United Nations. The fact that under present conditions he was elected unanimously augurs well for the future.

The immediate question, of course, is what to do about putting someone in charge of the direction of the secretariat. I believe it may take some little time to work out the election of a secretary general on the basis secretary generals have been elected in the past, but at the moment what is needed is someone to act in a temporary capacity as director of the secretariat. There is no thought of making such a man an acting secretary general and giving him that status, but he would be in charge of the work of the secretariat.

Strenuous efforts are being made to arrive at a decision which will bring about that result. Thus far the communist countries say they are going to stand firm on the troika principle, which is that there must be a three-headed supervision with one representative of the western countries, one of the communist countries and one of the uncommitted countries. I think there is no support whatever for that suggestion, either on an acting basis or on a permanent basis, outside the nine communist countries, and two of those communist countries are Byelorussia and the Ukraine. Possibly Cuba might support it, but I believe every Afro-Asian country is against the troika principle. We had a meeting of the commonwealth representatives on Wednesday morning and every one of the commonwealth delegations is against any such principle.

I am hoping that within a very few days some arrangement can be worked out so that a temporary director can be appointed. This would be done in the general assembly, not subject to recommendation from the security council, as would be the case if a secretary general were to be appointed which, of course, would give the Soviet union an opportunity to veto anything proposed in the security council.

I believe there has been quite a reduction in tension during the last two or three weeks. I have always been of the opinion that a meeting of the United Nations assembly would bring about a reduction of tension, and I think it is doing that. It is very significant that the United States and the Soviet union agreed just a day or two ago—I get all mixed up about days; things move rather rapidly in the United Nations—on a statement of principles for disarmament. These are the principles that will form the background of an actual negotiated agreement on the details of disarmament.

I expect that on Monday President Kennedy will announce a revised disarmament plan, in the preparation of which Canada has had a very important part. Many of our suggestions have been written into this proposal, and I think hon. members will find it is the most appealing disarmament proposal which has yet been advanced. There still remains the question of the forum in which the negotiations would take place, whether it would be in the old 10 nation committee of which Canada is a member, or be in the 10 nation committee plus three officers from unaligned countries which we suggested last year, or whether it would be in the 10 nation committee plus 10 uncommitted countries which the United States has also suggested, or whether it would be referred to the disarmament commission of the United Nations. This question of forum will have to be worked out, and I hope Canada will be able to take some initiative in connection with that particular problem.

On the question of Berlin, Secretary of State Rusk and Mr. Gromyko, the foreign minister of the Soviet union met a day or two ago and they are to meet again next week. They are discussing possible negotiations on the Berlin question. It does not do for one to be too optimistic on any of these questions; I learned this the hard way. Some people in Canada believe the foreign minister should not be too optimistic. However, I believe there is a reasonable chance that negotiations on the question of Berlin can be arranged, and we hope to have something to say on this Berlin question ourselves when Canada participates in the general debate which is now taking place.

I have had the privilege of holding discussions with several other foreign ministers. The hon. member for Essex East knows that the United Nations is about the best place possible for foreign ministers to exchange views. I plan to go back on Thursday night, or perhaps Wednesday night, and continue with such conferences, and I believe our statement will be made perhaps a week from Tuesday. In any event, I suggest to the house that there is no need to give up hope for the United Nations. I think it is going to come out of this crisis stronger than it has ever been. I remain convinced that it is the one hope of mankind.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In doing so may I say that we are all very glad to have him back with us this morning. We appreciate his general review of developments at the United Nations since Monday last. We wish him well in these very important deliberations that affect not only our country but the peace of the world.

Perhaps the minister is aware that during his absence, the Leader of the Opposition suggested to the Prime Minister that it would be desirable for the government to acquaint members of the United Nations with the important reports made to the house by the Minister of National Health and Welfare as to the sharp increases in radioactivity levels in Canada. The Prime Minister acknowledged the importance of communicating the results of these readings to our delegation at the United Nations. Can the minister say whether this has been done? Does he not believe it might have a very important bearing on the efforts that are being made to arrive at a convention, in a further attempt to achieve a ban on nuclear tests?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, in the session of 1959 Canada took the initiative on the question of radiation, and after many trials and tribulations was able to get unanimous agreement to a resolution which called for further sampling and testing with respect to radiation and a wider dissemination of the knowledge gained thereby. I think the Prime Minister mentioned yesterday or the day before that we are about to receive samples from four different countries for testing of this kind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With regard to food.

Mr. Green: This fits in very well, of course, with the present situation and gives us a very good background for raising the subject in the course of the general debate. That I expect to do. We have also taken a very definite stand on the question of nuclear testing, under prodding from time to time by the hon. member for Essex East, who seemed a little doubtful of the wisdom of our policy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, no.

Mr. Green: I am very glad to see that he is converted, and I can assure him that we will also be dealing with the question of nuclear tests.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In so doing may I say that our group also welcomes him on his return. May I also tell him that we follow all his activities and statements at the United Nations with great interest. I say that not only on behalf of this group generally but also because of the marvellous education I received as a result of the opportunity granted to me last year to spend some 10 weeks at the general assembly.

Can the minister inform the house whether at the sixteenth general assembly of the United Nations he is going to continue the policy he advocated, the leadership he gave and his exhortation to all 99 countries at the fifteenth general assembly with regard to no expansion of the nuclear club? Is that the present policy of the government?

Mr. Green: I presume that there will be a debate in the general assembly on this question, and at that time Canada's stand will, of course, be made known.

Mr. Winch: I hope it has not changed from what the minister advocated last year.

[Later:]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs one more question. In view of the anxiety in the minds not only of the people of Canada but also of the people of the world over the Berlin crisis, and the statement of the minister a few moments ago that perhaps within the next week or two it may be possible for him or his representative to make a statement at the United Nations, can the minister give us any indication whether in his mind and the minds of the other members of the government thought is being given to the recommendation that Berlin should be an internationalized city under United Nations control and armed forces, in order to relieve the power politics tension which has given rise to the Berlin crisis?

Mr. Green: I think it would be very unwise for me to make any comment on that suggestion. The department is giving very careful thought to any possible role in the Berlin situation for the United Nations, but I am not yet in a position to make any statement as to what our definite recommendation will be.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MOUNTED POLICE OFFICIAL RESPECTING UNION ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to address a question to the Acting Minister of Justice. I regret not having been able to give notice. My question is based on the report of a speech by R.C.M.P. deputy commissioner McClellan at Halifax recently in which he lauded the efforts of one of the factions involved in a current interunion jurisdictional dispute at the Sudbury local of the mine, mill and smelter workers union. Does the minister think it is a proper function of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to interfere in the affairs of unions in such a manner?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Acting Minister of Justice): I will be very happy to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that the hon. member has asked this question.

TRADE

ACCRA—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED STATEMENTS BY CANADIAN MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister now in a position to table the texts of the speeches delivered by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the Accra conference?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to add to what has already been said. As I have said, the Minister of Finance will be back on Tuesday or Wednesday and I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be here on Monday.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

PRIVY COUNCIL

312. Payment, notwithstanding anything in the Financial Administration Act or the Senate and House of Commons Act respecting the independence of parliament, to each member of the Queen's privy council for Canada who is a minister for whom no salary or allowance in addition to the allowances under section 33 and section 44 of the Senate and House of Commons Act is provided (the acceptance of which shall not render such member ineligible or disqualify him as a member of the House of Commons) of a salary of $7,500 per annum and pro rata for any period less than a year, $7,500.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I suggest to the hon. member for Peterborough, who was in the midst of a very interesting speech the other day, that perhaps we could now deal with the item before us and then come back to the emergency measures organization in its proper order. At that time he could go ahead with his speech.

Mr. Pitman: I will be glad to agree.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this the vote on the administration of the privy council office?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Privy council office—

313. General administration, $563,390.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief observations on a matter which I probably could not bring up on any other item in the Prime Minister's estimates. I am not going to say anything about the administration of the office. What I am going to do is make an appeal to the Prime Minister with respect to a matter about which I think he told the house he has reached an understanding with the premier of Newfoundland—certainly there was a public announcement—with respect to the title of the former United States air force base at Fort Pepperrell on the outskirts of the city of St. John's, Newfoundland. I want to emphasize that in what I have to say I am speaking for myself solely, as a member of parliament, and that I am in no way making any plea for any other person whatever. I am seeking to do this in a non-contentious spirit. I do not intend to make any attempt whatever to argue the legal case, because I feel it would be a quite improper use of the time of the committee to do anything of that sort.

The case I want to make very briefly to the Prime Minister is this; that notwithstanding any question as to whether there may or may not be a claim to federal title, there is no compelling reason why the federal authority should seek to get possession of this property. This was not military property of the British government or the Newfoundland government; it was a property that was acquired out of crown lands or private lands in Newfoundland by the then commission of government of Newfoundland to be turned over as a free gift by the British government to the United States on a 99 year lease, in the darkest days of the war. This territory, according to the agreement that was made at that time, was to revert to Newfoundland at the end of the 99 years or at any earlier time at which the lease might be terminated.

It is true, of course, that the ultimate title to anything which was vested in Newfoundland before union, has to be construed in relation to the terms of union; because when Newfoundland became a part of Canada that legal entity of Newfoundland was divided between the government of the province and the government of Canada. I am not seeking to found any legal argument there. What I am suggesting is, here is a very valuable piece of real estate which was, in no way, a military base. It never was a military base even in the sense in which Harmon field and Argentia were military establishments. Fort Pepperrell was not anything but a headquarters. Most of the buildings there are buildings that could and would be put to a civilian use.

For over a year now this valuable property has been unoccupied. It is costing both the provincial and federal treasuries a certain amount annually to keep it up. There are many parts of this establishment for which the provincial government, either directly or through the local authorities, could undoubtedly find a use. Moreover, whatever may be the legal niceties of the matter, there would seem to be an incontrovertible moral claim on the part of the people and province of Newfoundland to the restitution to them of this territory which was taken for exceptional emergency purposes, not Canadian purposes or British purposes or Newfoundland purposes but United States purposes. This was done at a time when everybody was quite prepared to justify it.

The suggestion I am making to the Prime Minister is one about which I am quite sure there would be no criticism in any part of this country. I am not criticizing the decision to refer the matter to the supreme court because, in itself, I think that is a very appropriate way of dealing with a problem of this sort. However, if the federal government were to decide that in view of the unique situation here no precedent that could be embarrassing in other situations would arise or could arise, it could unilaterally declare it was no longer interested in asserting any title to this property, then some means could be found, perhaps by a special act of parliament, of validating the title of the province to this territory. It was made clear during the discussion of the defence estimates that there was no military necessity for acquiring this property.

I believe, and I hope, that such action would be regarded by everyone as a proper disposition of this matter. Even if an announcement were made that such action was going to be taken, and custody were transferred on that basis, this would enable this valuable property to be used effectively immediately. As I say, I am putting this suggestion forward in, I hope, a completely noncontentious spirit. I have no criticism at all of anything the government has done. I am merely suggesting a course of action which I feel would commend itself to most Canadians.

I might venture, perhaps, an analogy. The privy council established that Indian reserves, so long as they are used for the purpose for which they were taken in the first place, they are under the ultimate control of the government of Canada through the superintendent general. However, if an Indian band becomes extinct, the title to that land immediately reverts to the province and does not remain in the crown in the right of Canada.

It seems to me if that is true of Indian lands, some of which may have been Indian reserves for more than a hundred years, then the same principle could be applied to this land. In British Columbia recently there was a case of an Indian reserve which had been established in 1871, or whenever Indian reserves were established shortly after the union of British Columbia with Canada, and the band became extinct. The title to the land was immediately transferred to the province without any question, and it became provincial crown land. There have been a good many other cases of this kind.

I recognize at once that the Prime Minister could not, and properly would not, himself give a snap judgment on a suggestion of this sort. All I am doing is putting forward this suggestion and asking if he will give it most sympathetic consideration. He could discuss with his colleagues whether or not this course would be in the national interest and in the interest of maintaining that harmony we all wish to see prevail, particularly in the light of the fact there is certainly no clear and specific language in the terms of union dealing with this matter, presumably because those who drafted the terms did not feel any provision of that kind was necessary. There may have been the feeling that the normal presumptions would apply in this matter. I say, having put this suggestion to the Prime Minister, all I am asking him to do today is to say that it will be given sympathetic consideration, and I hope he will do this.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I listened to the hon. gentleman, I could not but regret that he had decided to discontinue his studies leading to admission to the bar. He made his argument in a very objective manner. He, of course, frankly admitted that he was speaking for himself alone, and that no one else apparently held the same view or at least had impressed him as to holding that view.

As I recollect it, the premier of Newfoundland at one of the dominion-provincial conferences asked that this matter be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. That was at his request. I seem to recall he said that the legal argument that the lands should be vested in the people of Newfoundland was unchallengeable. Arrangements were then made that the question of the rights of the two governments in respect to this property be referred to the supreme court, and the matter is now before that court. Although it has not been argued yet it is in the custody of the court. When the answers are given by that court, both governments will be in a position to know their legal rights. I think that is as far as I should wish to go at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: In view of the reply the Prime Minister has made, may I say that I either did not make myself clear—and that is quite possible—or the Prime Minister in a very polite way is saying that he will not consider my suggestion. I understand perfectly that the government of Canada must consider that it has some vestige of a claim or it would not have taken the responsibility of making any reference at all to the courts. The argument I was making was that whether or not there was any legal claim, in my view there did not seem to be any good moral claim or any really pressing military reason why the government should seek to assert any title in this matter.

The Prime Minister of course—he having practised law as I have not and never expect to—will know that a great many cases, even though they have been taken to the courts, have been settled out of court. What I was suggesting was this. In view of the importance of getting this property into use promptly, and in view of the fact that in common sense there is no real national interest involved here at all, my suggestion was that the reference should be abandoned and that the government, through parliament or otherwise, could take whatever steps might be necessary in order to make sure that the title would be a valid one on the part of the crown in the right of the province.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 313 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: If no one else has anything to say, there is another point I wish to raise.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: The other day the Prime Minister in another debate—I know I cannot quote from that debate, but I am sure he will not object to my alluding to it—was good enough to make reference to an interest which I had expressed to him in the possibility of the government of Canada acquiring Earnscliffe and using it as the residence of the Prime Minister instead of the present residence. Since the Prime Minister himself raised the matter in the house the other day, I wondered whether there was anything he could now add to what he said on that occasion. I had thought that at a time when there was a vacancy in the office of the British high commissioner it might be an appropriate time at which to make the change.

I should like to say this. Although there might be some members of my party who would think that the residence of the first prime minister of Canada, because of his party, would not be a suitable residence for prime ministers of other parties, that is not a view that I would share; nor would anyone in the House of Commons, knowing how non-partisan and moderate I am in my views, expect me to share it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think any Liberal prime minister or any Liberal who was not willing, and would not consider it an honour, to live in the house in which Sir John Macdonald lived would not really deserve to be prime minister of Canada. There are no sentimental associations that I know of attached to the present residence of the Prime Minister. It is a beautiful place. It is perhaps in an even more pleasant physical location than Earnscliffe. I cannot think that the United Kingdom would be any loser in the bargain. I believe it would be pleasing to all Canadians if that exchange were possible. I would even go so far as to say this. I see in the chamber a member of the New Democratic party, which I am inclined to refer by with different initials. I would call them the S.O.P., or the same old party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I note that they are largely represented in the house at the present time. I would hope that one of their many spokesmen in the house at the present time would join me in an assurance that in the unlikely event that a member of their party should ever become prime minister, they would also feel that it was an honour for them that their leader should live in the home of Sir John Macdonald. I do not expect any such event to occur in the twentieth century. However, I think it would perhaps be just as well to indicate a unanimity of feeling about this matter, if there is such a feeling in the committee.

Mr. Pitman: I shall be very glad to intimate such a feeling, Mr. Chairman. I can assure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that the New Democratic party is as concerned as he is about preserving history of this country and about the residence of former prime ministers. I might also close my remarks by saying that the event to which he refers may occur sooner than he thinks.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 313 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I put a question to the Prime Minister in the midst of my remarks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not take it as a question. I thought it was more or less a philosophic discussion of the subject, which is close to the heart of the hon. gentleman. He wrote me in connection with this matter some months ago. While there has been nothing of a formal nature passing between the Canadian government and the British government, there have been chats about the possibility of at some time acquiring Earnscliffe. Having due regard to the way in which these matters are amicably determined between the United Kingdom and Canada, I am sure that if there was general agreement about acquiring it, the United Kingdom government would not raise too strong an objection.

Item agreed to.

Emergency measures—

315. Administration and operation of the emergency measures organization, $1,053,453.

Mr. Pitman: When the clock interrupted my remarks some days ago, Mr. Chairman, I was expressing the opinion that the government's measures, although we are in agreement with the extent by which they have been increased and their velocity has been increased, still are not geared to the kind of threat with which we are faced. We are not faced with a limited nuclear war but with a massive attack of proportions completely beyond anything which, in our imagination, we could expect from our knowledge of former wars.

During the defence debates the Minister of National Defence refused to give us details of this threat, and he did so quite properly within the bounds of his privilege. However, I cannot help but remind the government that, as was stated by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Trinity, and as others in this House of Commons have suggested, statistics are available from United States and British sources which indicate a far different picture of that which we are either defending against or are expecting to survive. In the discussions on the defence estimates we mentioned the navy, as a part of its work and in conjunction with our allies, attempting to deal with a few conventional submarines when, of course, there may be many. Some of these will be nuclear powered, and completely beyond the capabilities of our vessels. In regard to aerial attack, we will not be dealing with a few bombers but a great many bombers. These will certainly have air to ground missiles capable of dealing with the defences that we have.

What we in this corner are attempting to get some idea about is the massive threat which exists. We feel the emergency measures organization, in the same way as the defence department, is carrying on a business as usual philosophy in connection with this whole matter of survival. In his television broadcast the other night the Prime Minister indicated to the Canadian people that he would be most frank with them in these matters of defence, foreign affairs and, I am sure, survival techniques also. I am sure the Prime Minister would not want the Canadian people to be deceived in this matter; that would be criminal. It is not in any way a scaring of the Canadian people to indicate the extent of this threat. If the defence of democracy becomes dependent upon ignorance of this threat, the defence itself will have lost all meaning because democracy will have completely gone.

Turning to the shelter program proposed by the government, I have suggested that it is based on ability to pay, which is the negation of our whole democratic system; because surely our belief is that every individual is of equal worth in the eyes of his government. I went on to read the letter of a nuclear physicist who is very concerned about this matter because of his experience as a physicist. I should like to read a few more paragraphs from this letter in which he visualizes this kind of nuclear attack.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who is the physicist in question?

Mr. Pitman: He is Mr. A. Charles Whittier, who has worked for 10 years with Atomic Energy of Canada, with the nuclear division of Canadian General Electric, and civilian atomic power development. He now has on hand two instruments, which have been patented, for the detection of radioactivity.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. gentleman indicate the name of the writer?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He just did.

Mr. Pitman: It is Mr. A. C. Whittier. He says in his letter:

> Suppose a nuclear bomb drops a few miles away, and radioactive fall-out settles on the roof of a house. (This process generally takes between 1 and 48 hours after the explosion.) Consider first a case where the fall-out is sufficient to give a dose during a 2-week period of 10 roentgens in an unsheltered basement. In this case the occupants do not need a shelter for 10 roentgens is less than the 25 roentgens "threshold" dose. Now consider a case where the fall-out is much greater, so that the unsheltered dose would be 4,000 roentgens in 2 weeks. In this case, if the occupants had a shelter and stayed in it for 2 weeks they would receive a 400 roentgens dose: half of them would die in a short time, and the other half would wish they were dead. This means, then, that a shelter is only useful for protection against gamma radiation provided the dosage received in an unsheltered area is between 10 roentgens and something considerably less than 4,000 roentgens—say 1,000 roentgens—in 2 weeks...
> Something like a 10 roentgens dose will arise from the fall-out from a 2.4 kiloton atom bomb if this fall-out is distributed uniformly over 1,000 square miles; 1,000 roentgens will arise from a 240 kiloton fall-out over the same area. Therefore a fall-out shelter will be useful only if the fall-out density is between 2.4 and 240 kilotons per 1,000 square miles.
> It has been estimated that the U.S.S.R. has the potential to mount a surprise attack that would give a uniform density of about 5,000 kilotons per 1,000 square miles over the whole of the U.S.A. Of course in an actual attack the density in some areas would be much higher, and in others much lower than 5,000. If a 1 megaton bomb were dropped, what chance is there that the fall-out density would be conveniently between 2.4 and 240 kilotons per 1,000 square miles at the house in question?
>
> The $500 fall-out shelter has no means of filtering the air which the occupants must breathe. This air will be loaded with radioactive strontium, iodine, and other fission products. Just how lethal these would be depends on the situation.
>
> Because of the foregoing I do not think an individual will be affecting significantly the probable lifespan of his family by spending $500 on a basement shelter.
> I feel that $500 per family could be much more effectively spent if done collectively. By far the most effective protection against fall-out is afforded by large public shelters stocked with food and water, and with proper air filtering facilities. These shelters would also have medical equipment, radiation detection instruments, water purification equipment and decontamination gear, along with people qualified to use these articles.

Then he goes on to refer to a study which was made in the United States in the case of an attack where the fall-out is five kilotons per square mile. He says:

> The figures apply to those who are still alive after the blast, fireball, and immediate irradiation have passed on.
> In an unprotected community, 90 per cent of the living would die. In a community full of $500 basement shelters, 80 per cent would die. In a community with shelters prepared from modified buildings—

—as the government is going on with today—

> —50 per cent would die, and in a community with special fall-out shelters, less than 1 per cent would die.

This is a matter which the Canadian people should be very sure of, and I think there are a number of problems to deal with in regard to these basement shelters. The attack must take place, we assume, between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m., when people are conveniently at home. I can imagine the holocaust that would take place in a city such as Montreal or Toronto if the attack took place during the working day when people were concentrated in the centre of the city.

That is why we feel we must either prepare for the kind of war which is to come or —we are not suggesting this as an alternative —not prepare at all. It is not a matter of terrorizing but of facing the issue courageously. In other words, let us just not spend a few million dollars to create the impression that we are doing something—

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, in the letter from which the hon. member read there was reference to a study which had been made in the United States. Did the writer identify where that study had been carried out?

Mr. Pitman: No, he does not identify the area. In terms of populations, similar figures were given to United States congressional hearings.

Mr. Pallett: What was the date of the hearing?

Mr. Pitman: I am sorry; I do not have that information. I will be very happy to try and obtain it.

In an article in the Ottawa Citizen of September 13 a very well-known nuclear physicist, the famous physicist of the Lawrence radiation laboratory of the University of California, Dr. Teller, gave the method by which there could be some defence against nuclear war. He was referring to national survival. Of course, he made these specific suggestions to the government of the United States, but these are the things he suggests and these are the only ways he suggests by which we can really survive a full-scale thermonuclear war. First, building shelters against fall-out and against the blast and fire from nuclear bombs; second, stockpiling surplus food, machinery, machine tools, generators, building materials—the essentials to generate power, start factories, build more machines, transport people and goods, and assure communications; third, planning organized efforts to carry people through the terrible early days, and the hard, demanding, co-operative labour to rebuild modern civilization.

Then, of course, the sobering fact comes out that it would cost billions of dollars, perhaps an average of $4 billion for some years. I think this is perhaps a cost which the Canadian people are unwilling to accept. It is not going to be politically popular. However, other nations have done this. Sweden has built public shelters for its people. It is argued that these are the same things which the United States is doing. We accept this argument, and it has a telling effect. But I am sure if the Americans are going to be decimated, that is no argument that the Canadian people should also be destroyed. We know the extent of the fall-out that has occurred so far from tests that have been conducted. If an anti-missile missile is developed in the next few years, surely the explosion which will take place over Canada as we defend against this attack will create fall-out.

What I always have in mind, as do these authorities to which I have referred, is that we have to deal with the future. Even if the Minister of National Defence is right in saying that only a small percentage of the megaton load which the Russians have can be effectively used against us, that may not be the case over the years from now on. Surely it is not wise to tell Canadians to build $500 shelters which might be completely useless by 1965 or 1966. Assuming we have a population of 18 million and that an average of 3 or 4 people use each shelter, we are asking the Canadian people to spend between $2 billion and $3 billion of their own money on measures which may not offer them adequate protection. People should have some right to hope that survival is possible under these conditions.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that the years to come might well be years of sacrifice and austerity. Perhaps this is an area where we shall need to make sacrifices in future, as well as in connection with the Department of National Defence itself. I must say that my views have definitely changed on this subject. At one time I looked upon shelters as a colossal waste of time; I felt that a nuclear war would cause such tremendous devastation that shelters of any kind would be irrelevant. However, I now think we have a duty to civilization, a duty to humanity, to ensure the survival of some percentage of the population.

I agree with the Prime Minister in his statement that efforts must be made to make sure the government carries on. However, I think the people of Canada are somewhat concerned that we may be more interested in ensuring the survival of the upper levels of government than we are in the welfare of the average man. I know that some years ago the story was that we should never have another war because it would mean that those who started it would die in it. Now the people are losing that feeling of confidence. They are no longer confident that the people in the top echelons of government are as concerned about the people at the bottom as they are about themselves.

We can reach a decision with regard to building public shelters. The cost will be fantastic, but surely we must be realistic about the nature of the threat and the cost of meeting it. We may disagree with many of the things which Bertrand Russell says and does, but there is one statement he made with which I am sure we all agree, namely the statement that since Adam and Eve ate the apple, man has never refrained from any folly of which he was capable. I believe we must make some kind of response to the threat which faces us. However, both the threat and the nature of our response must be assessed realistically and the public must be enabled to look upon the emergency measures organization as an organization sincerely determined to ensure their survival.

Mr. Jung: In the course of a statement dealing with the emergency measures organization, as reported on page 8293 of Hansard for September 13, the Prime Minister advised the house that in planning for the survival of our people accurate public information was of vital importance.

With that statement I agree completely. There is, however, one facet of educating the public on which I should like to speak briefly. From conversations with some of my constituents I have the impression that among the majority of men there is a growing awareness of the need to learn all we can about the consequences of a nuclear war. However, in the case of some women—and I emphasize the word "some"—there seems to be a defeatist attitude which leads them to throw up their hands in despair and say there is no point in preparing shelters because if even one nuclear bomb were to drop on us there would be nothing left.

Possibly women look at the problem of survival in a different light from men. Consciously or unconsciously a woman's thoughts and actions are directed at perpetuating the human race, and unless she can see some security for her family she may feel that there is no point in even trying to survive. In parades and demonstrations against the nuclear bomb and the building of shelters the majority of those who take part are women and children; at least this has been the case in all the demonstrations which I have witnessed in Vancouver.

We can understand the horror with which women, particularly, regard a nuclear war, but I suggest that the government must impress upon all of us that we have a duty to survive. It makes no difference if nine tenths of the population are wiped out. It makes no difference that the country may be completely devastated. Those who remain must carry on. They owe it to themselves as human beings and as citizens of this country to do so. God forbid that we should have a nuclear war, but if there is to be that possibility each one of us must prepare ourselves for that awful event. Once we admit the danger, we can devote our energies and resources to meet that crisis, instead of wasting our time wringing our hands in despair.

I knows as well as anyone what could happen in the event of a nuclear war, because I attended the one month survival course at the civil defence college at Arnprior, and I believe I am the only member of parliament to have done so. Having attended that course I am less afraid of the consequences of a nuclear war, because I know what to do in an emergency and I am much more confident of my own chances of survival. No matter how huge the loss or how great the suffering, we must go on. And without the women of our country, Mr. Chairman, there would be very little reason for us to survive.

I hope that in the months ahead the government will develop a program which will help those women who now hold the conviction that there is no purpose in learning how to survive, to believe once again that there is still very much to live for, and that by taking a few precautions they can, in the absence of a direct hit, ensure their own survival.

Miss LaMarsh: I had hoped to make a few remarks with respect to this subject. Although the situation was well covered by the statement made on behalf of this party by the hon. member for Essex East there are certain observations I wish to make, particularly in the presence of the Prime Minister. I am glad to hear that the last speaker is an expert on the feelings of women in connection with this and other matters. Despite the fact that I am a woman I do not at any time suggest that I am an expert on the feelings of all men with regard to this or any other problem.

Mr. Jung: On a question of privilege, may I remind the hon. lady that I referred to "some" women and emphasized the word "some". If I can undertake to speak only for some women, does the hon. member for Niagara Falls imply she speaks for all men?

Miss LaMarsh: I can only undertake to speak for those who sent me to parliament, and I am not always sure I am able to do that.

With regard to this matter, I have had correspondence from many individuals, and most of the authors happen to be women. They are, of course, the people most concerned. They are the cradle of civilization, as they have been in the past. They are particularly concerned, because they feel this is a problem which is more likely to affect them since they will be remaining at home during the day and during the evenings. They are concerned not only for their own children but for the children of all mothers all across the world.

It is because of this concern that such groups as the Voice of Women have arisen across Canada. This is not a left wing organization, though the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway referred to it as being such in a debate a week or so ago.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): May I inform the hon. lady that I never made any such a statement in the house. I read a statement from a publication which made that claim. I never made any such statement personally.

Miss LaMarsh: Well, the hon. member read it with apparent approval, and it has caused concern to many of the members of that organization, which is not and has never been considered a left wing organization. The article read by the hon. member was one which referred to them, but it does not convey the impression which he may have erroneously left.

This is the reason organizations such as the Voice of Women are springing up. It is felt that women outside of public life, who constitute at least half of our population, can actually participate in shaping the future of the world. They are not a lot of wild-eyed, pie in the sky people; they are responsible people who care, and I suggest that this is the sort of movement which elected representatives should be pleased to see becoming established.

Here we have interested citizens who are coming forward to assist their elected representatives. Further than that, organized groups of women and women throughout the country of course are greatly concerned. They have listened to and read with great care the statements of the Prime Minister within the last few weeks on the proposals which this government is going to undertake to assist in the survival of the people of Canada. But to those in Niagara Falls, and indeed, to those in Ottawa and in other major centres, that is in what are called the 16 target areas—I do not know whether these are in fact in the 16 target areas, but many newspaper reports in the past have indicated that Niagara Falls is listed as one of the primary Canadian targets—the Prime Minister's proposals seem far fetched with respect to the protection and assistance which will be given to the people of Canada.

In his statement the Prime Minister mentioned that a prototype bomb shelter was to be built. This is the first reference that I have been able to find to a bomb shelter. My understanding is that in case of a direct hit from a nuclear bomb it is unlikely that anything would give adequate protection unless it was something of the type of shelter which is being set up to ensure the continuation of government. Certainly nothing which an individual could hope to build would be sufficient against a direct attack.

In many reports, and particularly in one by Dr. Edward Teller, to which the hon. member for Peterborough referred, which was widely circulated through the offices of the Associated Press, it is said that one third of the American people—and I imagine this figure would apply to Canada—could be protected well enough by fall-out shelters. Dr. Teller went on to say that one third would be in trouble, but they could have a 70 per cent chance of survival if given decent shelters. I assume that these people would require bomb shelters. Then he went on to say:

> One third of our people would not even be in danger, because they don't live near targets the bombs hit.

The Minister of National Defence told us it was likely that only one or two bombers would get through. If any bombs were dropped on Canada they would be intended for the 16 target areas, and some concern should be directed toward those target areas.

I am asked by my constituents what is their position. I should like to tell the Prime Minister that two women from my area went to the Canadian national exhibition this fall to see what might be done with respect to fall-out shelters, and they went with the derision of their husbands and their neighbours ringing in their ears. They spent the afternoon there and obtained all the brochures and information. As they were about to leave they were asked where they were from. When the man who was in charge was told they were from Niagara Falls he took away the pamphlets and said, "These are of no use to you; you are in a target area." They came to me as their representative and said, "What are you and what is the government doing with respect to those of us in a target area. Are we in those 16 centres across Canada to be completely abandoned?" I was unable to give them any answer.

There are many in the fringe areas, who by no stretch of the imagination would expect to be struck by a bomb, who have considerable apathy about building even a fall-out shelter. I think it represents more of fear than of apathy. They do not like to hear discussions, and they feel there is really no reason to do anything because, as many women say, "Why should I come up? My husband might be gone, my children might be gone. I would not want to survive in what was left of the world."

Women have a great deal of resilience and courage. In past wars they have been shown to be as strong as or stronger than the men who stood or fell at their sides. Even though they express those opinions they will get out and try to do something to protect their children. But this is the sort of letter I have been receiving, and I should like the Prime Minister and those responsible for the emergency measures organization to consider it. This is a letter from a woman in Niagara Falls. It says:

> But even if my neighbours and I had basements and could afford to build shelters, it still wouldn't help our families. Take mine for instance. Three of my children are in school. They attend three different and widely separated schools. The youngest is seven. His school, which is nearest to home, is a good 25 minutes walk from our house. There are no nearby fall-out shelters to which they could run—there is no protection whatsoever for our school children. A nation's future is its children. In a nuclear war Canada's future will be wiped out. My husband is in construction work. To what public shelter could he and his fellow workmen run? In the meantime, I am to sit home in my (theoretical) fall-out shelter for two weeks and go quietly mad, knowing all of my family and most of my neighbours are surely dead.

In letters to the press this same feeling has been expressed again and again; would it be worth while to survive if everyone that one holds dear cannot survive? Even those who would wish to provide themselves with shelters of one kind or another have this problem, and I quote from two letters which I found in the letters to the editor column of the Toronto Star. I substitute the word "government" for what is here:

> Will government please tell a $50 a week truck driver from Cabbagetown—

May I tell those who are not familiar with the Toronto area that that is what they mean.

—with a wife and two kids and $22 a week rent where to pick up $1,200 for a shelter? Maybe we should try a finance company.

In the other letter from Trenton we find the following:

I make $65 a week and have a wife and seven children. A dollar down and a dollar a week is our speed, and I don't think Khrushchev will give us the time.

These are the people who care, the people who wish to do something. I would say they are the people who deserve to be assisted. If governmental assistance is to be provided for those in non-target areas for a fall-out survival shelter, more must be done to assist than merely to provide assistance for a loan, and something important must be done with respect to those in target areas. If there are evacuation schemes, and they are feasible within a possible 20 minute warning, are they known to the municipalities and the people concerned?

According to press reports the Clerk of the Privy Council and indeed the Prime Minister are building fall-out shelters. There have been press reports that these two gentlemen will not be in Ottawa. Are they to be prewarned of any sort of attack upon Ottawa? If so, I assume that their shelters must be built either as an incentive to show the people the way, while they know they will not have to use them, or they are built to provide what shelter they can for those of their dependents who will be left behind.

I am not sure whether Ottawa is a target area, but I would assume that it might very well be. If it is a target area, I ask this question. Is the provision which they are making for their dependents going to be in any way adequate? I ask them to consider the plight of those hundreds of thousands of people in the most heavily concentrated areas of our population in Canada, those people where there is a heavy concentration of secondary industry, of power development, of rail or other transportation facilities; those people who will be the first to die in Canada should the bombs drop and who now, before they die, cry out to the government for support, for aid, for a plan for evacuation.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, the voices of members of parliament today are music to my ears, because I have been talking about civil defence since 1958. Therefore I will be very brief. I am happy to say that it feels much better not to be a lone voice in the house. I want to recall some of the words of Sir John Hodsoll, co-ordinator of civil defence for NATO, who visited Canada in 1955. I believe he stated that any bombers that may be shot down over this country will at the same time set off thermonuclear bombs.

As a matter of fact it may be safer if one lives in a target area, provided our defences are good because this means that the bombers will fall on other areas, but any bombs or missiles carried by these bombers will create dangers for all those in the area where the bomber or missile is shot down. The more effective our defence, the more dangerous it will be for Canadians generally at any point in Canada. Canada will likely be the battlefield in the next war, and we will have to take the brunt of a thermonuclear attack. If our southern friends are capable of shooting down these bombers all over Canada, Canada will be hit by all these bombs and Canada will be the most dangerous place in the whole world.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, this debate has been of considerable interest to me, because on the occasion of exercise Tocsin early this summer I had the responsibility of being the federal government representative in the province of Ontario. I can report to hon. members that in my opinion the exercise was a first class course of instruction in the type of co-operation that can be achieved among different levels of government in working to achieve a common purpose. The participation by both federal and provincial officials in the exercise was of the greatest use in indicating to them at governmental level the responsibilities that would be theirs and the way in which those responsibilities could be carried out.

I must express at this time my appreciation of the participation of Premier Frost and his cabinet, most of whom were present at the provincial headquarters at Camp Borden, as well as my appreciation of the participation of the large number of provincial members who showed interest. After all, this is one matter in which the provinces must indicate a continuing interest because it deals with the fundamental area of property and civil rights, damage to property and the survival of the person in the form of the individual.

I was also most interested in the split speech of the hon. member for Peterborough. When he first spoke on September 13 I was ready to excuse some of his remarks because I thought he might have entered the debate on the spur of the moment and might not have had a chance to carefully examine the letter to which he referred. However, I thought that between then and now he would have availed himself of the expert opinion that can be had before putting on the record a letter that is incomplete and before accepting the statements contained in that letter and endeavouring to attack a responsible program without first having availed himself of the information that is at hand.

I should like to deal with Dr. Whittier's letter as I heard the hon. member read it, and some very significant omissions. In his letter Dr. Whittier criticizes the pamphlet "Eleven Steps to Survival" and says that a basement fall-out shelter is only 90 per cent effective whereas the pamphlet indicates that such a shelter is 99 per cent effective. What the doctor and the hon. member have omitted to indicate is that the reference is to a basement shelter, that the protection afforded by the house itself is equivalent to 10 per cent, and as 10 per cent of 90 is 9 you therefore arrive at 99 per cent.

The same thing applies to all the other arguments advanced by way of criticism of this type of shelter. The letter refers to radiation areas equivalent to direct blast, not to such areas as those for which the fall-out shelter suggested by the emergency measures organization is designed. This shelter is designed to deal with the fall-out to which it is anticipated that Canadians would be subjected in the unlikely event that there was ever an atomic explosion in this, or a neighbouring country. The hon. member has completely overlooked these things. I draw to the attention of the pedagogue from Peterborough that one of the rules of pedagogy is that you know your facts. In this instance the hon. member has completely failed to substantiate the letter he received. Perhaps he was overly impressed with the degree the doctor holds and did not go into the merits to see whether the criticism advanced by the doctor is warranted.

Mr. Pitman: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say I have checked some of these facts with other physicists who have experience in this field. Furthermore, he is dealing with fall-out shelters not in a blast area. As far as blast is concerned, we all know that these basement shelters are of no use whatsoever, so I think the hon. member should be fair.

Mr. Pallett: I am endeavouring to be fair, and I point out to the hon. member that he was dealing with fall-out in a blast area where the concentration is the highest. The hon. member will have an opportunity to speak again. Surely he does not suggest that everywhere in Canada the degree of fall-out suggested by Dr. Whittier is going to take place. If he does, then he just does not have any conception of what is going on, and I suggest that he devote himself to attentive reading of the material that is available to find out what is going on in this particular field. The $500 basement shelter to which he refers provides an opportunity for the individual to survive, and after all we are talking about the survival of the individual. As a socialist he does not understand individuals.

I was rather surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Niagara Falls, who talked about central survival systems. Man's basic philosophy is his own survival and the survival of those who are dependent on him. This is a method by which under fall-out such as is anticipated the individual man and his family, if they are home at the time anything happens, can have the assurance of some protection. This is an effort that the individual himself can make. The cost is an estimate. A man can do it himself and it will not cost nearly $500. If he wants to call in a first class contractor then it will cost that much. This is a constructive and forward step taken by this government to aid an individual in doing what he can to help himself, in taking those steps which are necessary to protect himself and his family from fall-out that may result in the unlikely event that an atomic explosion ever takes place in this country.

The hon. member for Peterborough, in what I might term his multibarrelled peashooter criticism, endeavoured to bring the Associate Minister of National Defence into this debate by referring to his suggestion that limited war was unlikely. The hon. member denied, therefore, the very principle of the N.D.P. or, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate terms it, the S.O.P., that there will not be an atomic war. The hon. member should be consistent, but perhaps it is not within the realm of possibility for him to be consistent. If they are right in their defence policy, in which they say there will not be an atomic war and no steps should be taken to deal with an atomic war, then he should not get up in this house and try to alarm the Canadian people by saying there is going to be massive obliteration by atomic bombs of this country. In doing so he surrenders completely his responsibility as a member of this house. The speech which he made was self-contradictory of the views of the party to which he professes to belong.

Since hon. members are criticizing the things we are doing in this country. I would refer them to the September 25, 1961 issue of U.S. News. I do not know whether this is where the hon. member obtained his information about Dr. Teller's views, but they are mentioned here. What are other countries doing in this respect? I quote:

> Japan, the only country that actually has experienced atomic bombing, has no national plans for defending her people in a nuclear war...
> The British show less concern than Americans about the danger of a nuclear attack. Britain's civil defence corps is dying on its feet because the government has not been able to get enough people seriously interested in it...

French optimism: Nuclear bomb shelters are practically unheard of in France. A French official says: "Most people here think nuclear war is unbelievable."

West Germans show no interest in building bomb shelters...

In Belgium, Holland, Sweden and Italy you find the same story—nobody building shelters for a nuclear attack.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In Sweden there are all kinds of shelters.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member will have his opportunity to speak. These are responsible statements made about the other western countries which are not advancing at the same rate as Canada with respect to civil defence. We know what we are doing in this country with respect to civil defence measures.

The hon. member for St. Boniface indicated that in the event bombers were shot down, there would be atomic explosions as a result. I can tell him that my information is quite to the contrary; these bombs will not explode. There have been instances, as we know, in the United States where bombers have actually crash landed and the bombs have not exploded.

Mr. Regnier: May I ask a question?

Mr. Pallett: I know the hon. member is an expert in this field and has made a lengthy study of these questions. The technical information leads us to believe that the bombs would not explode unless they had been activated and that, of course, would be highly unlikely in the event a missile or bomber were shot down.

This is a good program for individual participation. It is a program that needs the assistance of the members of this house because it deals with the survival of a man, his wife and his family. It is disconcerting to have a member stand up and criticize, without foundation, a program that is designed to help a man and his family. The hon. member for Niagara Falls mentioned the Voice of Women, an organization is this country. I refer her to the most recent Russian news letter, which says that the Russian women are in full support of the Russian atomic explosions. This is something that should be brought to her attention.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why contrast the two. That is unfair to Canadian women.

Mr. Pallett: I bring that to her attention.

Miss LaMarsh: I am not a member of the Voice of Women, but I draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that there are a number of responsible women who are, and one of them is the president of the Progressive Conservative organization.

Mr. Pallett: Not any more.

Miss LaMarsh: In any event, the purpose of the organization is to join with the women of Russia, the United States and the other countries in the world in an attempt to eliminate wars. This is not an attempt to subvert this or any other government, but it is an attempt to reach from one woman to another across the nations and as such it should not be condemned.

While I am on my feet may I ask the hon. member if what he is proposing is that while governments wage war, individuals may protect themselves? I have asked the question of the Prime Minister and perhaps his parliamentary secretary could answer it. What is being done about those who cannot protect themselves and who are in likely blast or target areas?

Mr. Pallett: I point out to the hon. member that I am not offering any criticism of the Voice of Women. I am merely pointing out, since she mentioned their name, that the voice of Russian women is in support of atomic testing in Russia.

It is just about one o'clock and I should like to conclude, if I may. This is a program for the individual who can, with his own hands, achieve some measure of protection against the fall-out dangers inherent in an atomic explosion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the children in school; what can they do?

Mr. Pallett: This basement shelter program is designed to give to a man and his family those first few days of survival that are so essential.

Mr. Winch: This is absolute nonsense, but may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Winch: At the outset, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I listened with a good deal of amazement to the oratorical outburst of the hon. member who spoke previously. I refer to the hon. member for Peel. In this item in the estimates of the privy council we have before us one of the utmost importance and one which must be considered, in the light of its presentation, the allocation of money and the statements made by the Prime Minister and others, as one that is being considered on the basis of national survival in the event of an all-out nuclear war which we hope and pray will never occur. I was therefore not only amazed but surprised and disappointed by the attitude taken by the hon. member for Peel. As far as I am concerned, I can only interpret his speech as being one made from the position of an apologist of government policy and proposals on expenditure, as one put up as a sharpshooter endeavouring to shoot down members who take this matter seriously and who want to ask serious questions and to get constructive answers. In other words, it could only leave with me the impression, on the basis of what he said, that the government policy and proposal is paper talk and poppycock and that basically what we in this House of Commons and the people have received up until now is propaganda oratory.

Mr. Churchill: No; that is not right.

Mr. Winch: The minister will have his chance just as I am having mine. The reason I say that in particular is to be found in the opening remarks of the hon. member for Peel when, in substantiation of his support of the government's approach, proposals and policies on national survival, civil defence, or call it what you will, he based his experience—and these were his opening remarks—on what he had seen and what he had knowledge of from having had the opportunity of taking part in exercise TOCSIN.

The Prime Minister did as I think he should have done with regard to exercise TOCSIN. He announced it in the House of Commons. He told us that it was to be a realistic exercise in facing the problems of nuclear attack against Canada, with bombs falling on Canada, in order to demonstrate just what could be done on a dominion-provincial basis to carry on the functions of government in Canada. The Prime Minister was good enough to invite two members of the opposition to take part in exercise TOCSIN—and I want to thank him for the invitation—and to be among those evacuated from Ottawa to Petawawa. I was one of those who were invited and I went all through that exercise. It is because of what I saw and because I was given the right and opportunity to ask questions and get answers—and here again I wish to thank the Prime Minister—that I am speaking now. I say very seriously that we must consider just what are government policy and proposals for survival, especially in view of—and I am coming back to the hon. member for Peel—what I saw on exercise TOCSIN, which was a federal exercise from Ottawa to Petawawa, designed to carry on the operations of government, carry on communications with all the provinces, to maintain the economy as best we could and to provide for the defence of Canada. May I very briefly run through that experience which was a practical one or a tactical one, as we were told by the Prime Minister.

First of all, a train must be on 20 minutes call at all times—and it was there—in order to move the government or the ministers, their deputies and the administrative heads, the chief personnel of the army and the civil service, to the only underground shelter we have and which is located at Petawawa. It takes a couple of hours to get up to Petawawa. I imagine anyone who is going to attack Canada will have saboteurs here. At least I imagine they would do so. First, may I say that there was no security check whatsoever. I never saw anybody challenged.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They saw you coming.

Mr. Winch: Then I am glad they understood my loyalty and my patriotism and recognized me. However, I saw many whom I did not recognize and I never saw them being checked. I know the premier was not there. That was very unfortunate, because he died at five o'clock in the afternoon.

An hon. Member: Which premier?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, we may say many things about the Prime Minister, but it would be unfair to say that was true.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite sure what the hon. member said. Did he say it was unfortunate?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Winch: I did not think so. However, according to exercise TOCSIN, Ottawa was wiped out shortly after five o'clock that afternoon; and you, sir, had stayed in Ottawa. There you have this practical, tactical exercise on survival conducted by the federal government, with all these civil and governmental operations.

During the time spent between Ottawa and Petawawa, no communications were kept on the train. So if you had been there, sir, according to this tactical exercise all your heads of government, your chiefs of staff, your ministers, your deputy ministers and your chief personnel would have been completely out of touch with what was happening in Canada during that period.

This was a tactical, practical exercise, so I asked where the communications were kept on the train. The answer was that they did not know whether they had any, but they most likely had. The government wanted to keep down the expense of this exercise and that is why there was no communications system.

We arrived in Petawawa. There we were immediately told what the situation was, and of course your cabinet, sir, and everybody else would have been completely out of touch during the time it took to travel from Ottawa to Petawawa. We were briefed on the situation. Then we were taken around and shown all the administrative set-up. Then we received the warning that just outside Petawawa there had been an atomic explosion so we had time, because it takes a little while for the radiation to come down, to go underground. This tactical, practical exercise was truly an experience. The chief personnel of the federal government, sir, your chiefs of staff, your heads of police were all there and in all probability would have had to stay there for up to 2½ weeks because this explosion was just outside Petawawa.

What did we find? We learned at about 10 minutes after five o'clock I think it was—I may be a little bit out in the time—from the teletype underground that Ottawa had been bombed. If I remember correctly, there were 60,000 dead and I do not know how many injured. But Ottawa was out. Underground in Petawawa there was the administrative control of all Canada, and nearly all of them came from Ottawa. I asked one question immediately, "Ottawa is out?", and the answer was, "Yes". I asked, "What is the reaction of all these people here? Their wives, husbands, children, sweethearts and parents are all dead". This information had just come over the teletype. The answer I received was, "Well, they are just carrying on with their work". Like the blazes they would carry on with their work, if that was the real situation. I asked what was the situation to take care of the psychological factor involved in what had occurred. I was told that this had not yet been considered.

If this had been a real attack, sir, these people would probably have had to remain underground for up to 2½ weeks, if there were radiation outside. I asked, "That is why you are here, and you are not going to open the doors. Where are you going to put your dead?" I was shown a refrigerator which would hold one corpse.

An hon. Member: Did you try it for size?

Mr. Winch: There was just this one refrigerator. I am being very serious, sir. This was the TOCSIN exercise as I saw it.

An hon. Member: Don't be ridiculous.

Mr. Winch: I am not being ridiculous; I am telling the committee what I saw. In this situation communications all across Canada would be of the utmost importance. We were shown over all the communications system. They were proud of their system and they had reason to be. But this they did tell us, Mr. Prime Minister, that it was not the latest, most up-to-date, efficient equipment.

Moreover, all the communications mechanism and teletypes were underground, but the actual dispatch system was above ground. This was an old building that had been converted for this purpose. There may be some other building under construction at the moment and I understand there is, but I am talking about the TOCSIN exercise which was carried out, and the government of Canada would have to continue.

If there were any leakage of radiation it would be in the corridors, and people would have to live for a long time in the offices and rooms. However, that aspect of the matter had not been planned very well. There was air conditioning in every office and every room, and all the air was filtered. But there were no tight doors, so there was ventilation that could not be shut out by closed doors. Therefore it was the same as being wide open, and these people could not have been protected in any way in the event of radiation escaping into the building. It cannot be said that this is ridiculous. The hon. member was talking about exercise TOCSIN. This is what I saw in the exercise. These are the questions we asked. This is the type of planning and engineering carried out by the government. This is how the money would be spent.

Perhaps more important than that is this matter. I do not think we have yet heard any statement from the Prime Minister or others in the government about this. I wonder whether or not since TOCSIN No. 1 the government has been able to work out the relationship with other governmental jurisdictions so that in the event of attack and national survival operations being put into immediate effect government could be carried on.

Let us not forget this. In this house we have listened on many occasions to speeches on constitutional jurisdiction, jurisprudence, control and matters of that sort. The hon. member for Peel was the federal co-ordinator, I believe, in Manitoba.

Mr. Pallett: Peel is in Ontario.

Mr. Winch: I know, but I thought the hon. member was the federal co-ordinator in Manitoba. During the TOCSIN exercise I asked what was the actual statutory authority of a federal co-ordinator.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The War Measures Act.

Mr. Winch: I asked whether the authority was clear under the War Measures Act. I was told that they thought it was. A message came in from all the provinces on the devastation which occurred according to this exercise, and they needed, I think it was 15,000 men to be moved from one area to another. I asked the question, "Where is the statutory authority when a person is endangered by being moved to an area of devastation?" While I was there, over the teletype came a request for the movement of 12,000 workers from one area to another. This I can tell the Prime Minister. The answer I got when I asked that question was, "That is a problem and we are working on it".

I should like to know whether or not that problem has been worked out? I am only telling the committee what I was told. They said they thought it would require legislation of the House of Commons. I think we should know these things because these are the types of questions that were asked on that TOCSIN exercise in which we were invited to take part by the Prime Minister. These are the things we saw; we just did not hear about them. I am not talking about something I have read in the newspapers; I am talking about something I saw, and I only saw it because of the courtesy of the Prime Minister in allowing us to go on that trip. These are some of the answers I received to the questions I asked. I think we are entitled to more detailed information about the program, about the policy and its effectiveness.

I think the hon. member for Peel made the most serious mistake of his life when he criticized what was said by the hon. member for Peterborough, who was only asking the government to face reality and answer some of the questions which are in the minds of some of the people of this country. It is not good enough to tell the people in a blatant manner what they should do. The average individual in Canada is not in a position to build a shelter. I represent a strictly working class constituency—a heavily populated constituency in the middle of Vancouver. I imagine this would be a target area, so-called, in the event of an attack. Very few of the people who live there could afford to build a shelter which might cost between $500 and $900. Moreover, the majority of the people who live in my area do not own their own homes. They rent their accommodation, and the average man is not going to spend upwards of $500 building a shelter in a home he rents—a home in which he may not be living in a year's time. I have yet to hear of one landlord who will put one in.

I think we have to face this situation. In addition, we may as well stop this stupid saying that the position today is better than it was in past years. Every well informed writer I have read on this subject says that any war which starts out as a conventional war is likely to develop into a nuclear war, and this means a nuclear war without restriction. This leads us to the marvellous phrase used by the Prime Minister—"coexistence or non-existence". The item we are now discussing is provision for the event that we may have to face the possibility of non-existence. From what the hon. member for Peel outlined, I cannot see this government, its ministers or their deputies continuing to exist in the event of an atomic attack, judging by what I saw in Petawawa, if that is to be their protection. That was a tactical exercise, I believe, and I think I am correct in saying that when it was over there were only 11 members of the House of Commons still alive. I never did find out whether that would mean I would have any spot in the administration, but that is by the way. These are serious matters and we approach them in a constructive manner. I am confident at any rate, that the people do not want any shilly-shallying. They are prepared to hear and discuss hard facts. They want to know whether there is any possibility of survival in the event of a nuclear attack on Canada. If there is, they want to know what is to be done and how they can do it as individuals. I believe that the individuals in Canada cannot do it. I doubt whether even Canada as a nation can do it with a population spread over 2,700 miles and up to the Arctic circle. We are asking not for bombast but for realism, honesty and frankness in dealing with the public so that they may have a better understanding of the picture. Though I have no authority for saying this I have no hesitation in telling the committee that if we could get a practical program, the money to operate it and the means to operate it in the event of a world catastrophe which we all hope will never come about, then the Prime Minister would receive the wholehearted support of members of this group because we want to see people live and not be evaporated, as was mentioned by a great speaker in England, in the event of a world holocaust of nuclear death.

Mr. Regnier: This morning I made a quotation from memory concerning the danger from bombers or missiles which might be stopped by our own military defences. I mentioned Wing Commander Sir John Hodsoll, chief civil defence adviser to NATO.

I should have mentioned Dr. Alvin C. Graves, scientific adviser to the Nevada test site operations, Los Alamos, New Mexico.

On August 1, 1955, this is what Dr. Graves said while addressing a convention of mayors and representatives of municipalities:

> People in Canada have a problem which is somewhat different from the problems of the people in the United States. The reason for that is the geometry of the earth and the line-up of the powers of the earth today. The reason is that if an aircraft were dispatched to attack the United States under present circumstances we would expect it to come over the North Pole of the earth down from the Arctic regions and down through the plains or the mountains or eastern portion of Canada, attack some targets in Canada, attack many targets in the United States. The plan would be to try to shoot as many of these planes down as possible.
> I would like to say one thing, though. When those airplanes are shot down they will carry with them the atomic bombs or thermo-nuclear bombs with which they were dispatched. What of these weapons? Will they crash to the ground and do nothing? I cannot answer that question since I do not know the Russian plan, but it is perfectly possible to put a mechanism on an atomic or thermonuclear bomb such that it will detonate when it drops below a certain altitude. It is perfectly possible to provide that it will detonate when it strikes the ground.
> I think we would be more than foolish if we did not at least assume that the Russians might do that.

Those are not my words. They are the words of an expert telling Canada and Canadians what to expect. I know the hon. member for Peel has explained that full protection will be provided against atomic explosions in the event of accidents in peacetime to planes carrying nuclear weapons. However, the Russians, sending over planes or missiles to bomb targets in North America, would not want to waste their bombs; they would want them to explode no matter where they might fall.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver Centre on the wonderful address he gave this morning. I should like to congratulate him on being the only member of the house to take the civil defence course at Arnprior. I know that if the people of Canada were properly trained and taught how to safeguard themselves against danger they could face an emergency without panic. They would be able to do the normal things when this emergency would begin. I suggest that no school teacher should be given a degree or permit until he had taken a civil defence course and that no school student should be given a certificate of promotion until he or she had taken such a course. I think that is the place to start—in the schools. Let us train all our children. We hope the danger will not come soon, but it may. Let us not wait until those students have become adults. They should receive full training with the least expense. Teachers might be given an extra allowance by the government in order to take the training. They should be paid an allowance for teaching these extra subjects in the schools. These things are being done elsewhere. I suggest this is the time to start.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested to note the reaction of the hon. member for Peterborough and the hon. member for Vancouver East to the government's proposals in the field of civil defence. The Prime Minister is to be congratulated on stimulating these two members to take the interest they have shown in recent days in this problem. They are almost rebels, Mr. Chairman. They are unique in the party or parties to which they belong. I think I can say something about this. I was the federal commissioner for Saskatchewan during exercise TOCSIN, and one of the things that impressed itself on my mind at that time was the lack of seriousness which the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan showed with respect to that exercise and the little regard that the provincial premier and the members of his cabinet paid to the safety of the people of their province as evidenced by their co-operation in that exercise. The lack of co-operation was manifest. There was not a single cabinet minister from the province of Saskatchewan who took part in that exercise, not one. Not one even had the courtesy to come to civil defence headquarters to take part in it, although we had nine representatives from junior positions in the provincial civil service.

To demonstrate the intense interest of the C.C.F. in saving the people of Saskatchewan in the event of nuclear war we might examine the contribution they made to that exercise in the field of medical component, the medical side, where surely I would think that if that government were going to take the exercise seriously they would see that there would be adequate medical components represented there; but there was not one from the province, not one single representative of the provincial medical staff or the provincial health services.

Another example of the active interest of that government in saving the people in the event of nuclear attack was the interest evidenced in regard to the problem of transportation which inevitably would become a problem. Roads have to be kept clear and maintained. There has to be transportation for different facilities of rescue, survival, food and so on. Therefore one would imagine there would be a large provincial component in the field of transportation in such an exercise, particularly when the provincial government owns the bus lines in that province. What was the provincial representation from Saskatchewan in regard to transportation in the field of bus, road or air transportation? It was nil. They could not turn a wheel, my friend from Provencher says. The contribution of the only elected C.C.F. government in the history of this country was practically nil. The regard in which they held this problem was less than nil.

If the two members who have spoken from that corner, the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member from Peterborough, could form themselves into a committee of two to wait upon the leader of their party, the present premier of Saskatchewan, and give him the benefit of their ideas and suggestions in this particular field, they might stimulate his interest and show him that rebels in the new party might be successful in their attempts to draw the attention of that party to the vital things which affect the Canadian people.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I do wish to answer one or two remarks made by the hon. member for Peel. I am not going to say anything about the speech which preceded his. Of course, in relation to other provinces I should like to know just what is taking place in each area. Of course I do not agree with what the hon. member for Peel suggested. He said that nothing constructive had been said because no one mentioned the measures which the Prime Minister referred to. Nobody suggested that less money should be appropriated. What we are concerned about is that so far the ordinary emergency measures have not made a very good effect upon the people of Canada.

This afternoon some 60 members are sitting in this chamber. They have a better opportunity to know what is going on than any other group in Canada. I wonder how many in this chamber have built a fall-out shelter in their basements, what percentage would there be. This is a rather interesting question to ask, and it would also be interesting to get some statistics on it. This is the problem we are trying to deal with. We do not think this has yet made any impact on the people of Canada. This is why we are taking an active part in this debate.

The hon. member for Peel suggested that the remarks I made this morning dealt with fall-out in blast areas. Well, of course, the hon. member knows, or at least he should know, that there may be no fall-out at all in the blast area. Climatic conditions may cause fall-out away from the blast area. It might be swept into other areas by the prevailing winds and very little fall in the blast area.

We seem to be in complete disagreement as to how much fall-out there might be. The hon. member for Peel says, "we believe it would be a certain amount". On what basis does he arrive at this conclusion. I realize he may have privileged documents at his disposal which are not available to the rest of us, but nevertheless this is a question on which we will never know who is right; at least we do not want to know on the basis on which we can find out.

He turned on a member of his own party who was trying to explain this morning just how serious the situation is. The hon. member for Peel made a passing reference to the socialists and said we evidently do not believe in the liberty of individuals. With 323,000 people unemployed and all their dependents, with some 400,000 people unemployed recently and all of their dependents, and with the possibility of many thousands in farm communities making less than $2,000 a year, would it not be a difficult problem for them to get this much money together? The hon. member for Peel and his party say that they are for individual enterprise. Certainly this does not apply only to the wealthy. I should hope not. Surely this does not mean every man for himself, or, as our leader put it, as the elephant said when he danced among the chickens. I am sure he did not mean it that way.

I have only one or two more points to make. The hon. member also referred to the voice of women. I am sure he will correct himself in this regard. He referred to them in the same breath as the women in the U.S.S.R. who had made some statements about nuclear testing. I am sure he is not attempting to link these two situations and bring into disrepute an organization which is asking questions, perhaps embarrassing questions, but necessary ones.

Finally he suggested that there is a great difference between our attitude on survival and that of the officers of this particular political party. Our survival policy is very simple. It is based on the fact that a war may start, and no one in Canada can make that decision because we will not have the weapons to make such a decision. It can happen by accident. We recognize that is the situation just as I am sure the Prime Minister does. That is the basis of our survival policy.

On the other hand, our defence policy is that we do not want Canada to encourage such a war to take place. That is the basis of our refusal to accept nuclear weapons. I can assure you that we in this group are seeking to find the answers to survival. We do not believe we have the answers. We do not believe that the government really thinks that it has all the answers. We are trying to ask questions and put forward proposals in a constructive way, and I hope that in future our position will be clear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the discussion on this subject. What I have to say will be said with a full realization of the difficulty involved in trying to plan for an adequate program to protect our people in the event of a nuclear war. In my opinion this subject is too important to permit us to be involved in digressions that are not directly related to a solution of the problem.

I think this is perhaps the most difficult problem facing any government in any country of the world at this time. I say that not only because of what I have listened to today and what I have read, but also because at one time, I had a responsibility in connection with this matter. Anyone who has had that responsibility will appreciate that the problem is indeed a gigantic one. This does not mean that we should not put forward ideas in discussing the present government's program with a view to improving that program. If that is done it should not be thought that we are engaging in idle criticism. Certainly that is not what I rose to do at this time.

I am not fully convinced that the problem of leadership in this matter, which is essential, is one that can most effectively be met by the ministerial division that exists at present. I am not asserting this dogmatically. But when the Prime Minister announced a year or two ago that the responsibility for civil defence would be divided between the privy council office, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Justice I wondered if such a division of responsibility was the wisest course. I do not suggest that there is not a function for all of these departments, and, even for other departments, to discharge. But it seems to me that the over-all direction of civil defence requires constant attention to the problem in its full context.

The Prime Minister, it is true, when questioned about this by me at the time, did say that direction would be given by all four ministers, but that we could look to the Minister of National Defence as the one to whom questions should normally be directed. I took it from that and from something that General Pearkes later said that General Pearkes would be regarded as the minister in the government at that time who might be looked upon as the spokesman for the government with respect to matters having general application to the problem of civil defence, but that this did not preclude the Prime Minister from dealing with the estimates now before us. The Prime Minister is a busy man. It would seem to me that it would be difficult for him to give the kind of over-all attention which I believe is required. However, I may be wrong in this. Perhaps the Prime Minister will comment on this point when the moment for doing so arrives.

I recognize, of course, that in the privy council office, under the Prime Minister, are individuals who for a long time have been interested in this problem, and who had experience in certain aspects of civil defence before their transfer to the privy council office. I know from personal experience that the Clerk of the Privy Council has always had an intelligent and deep interest in this problem. He is responsible for the war book, and I am sure that the Prime Minister and those associated with him have had much to do with the program involved in E.M.O. with regard to such things as providing for the transfer of government and the like.

The hon. member for Peel spoke today and I do not think he did full justice to himself or to the cause which he was seeking to champion. It is not a question whether this government is doing more than any other government in the western world. It is not a question whether, in the light of greater knowledge and greater tension, the government is doing more in this field than its predecessor. We are not going to resolve this question by seeking to engage in that kind of argumentation.

The hon. gentleman spoke of the shelter program and said that the general directions given by the government were not fully appreciated by some hon. members, who had participated in the debate, because they had failed to recognize that this program was one directed toward individual participation. If by that the hon. gentleman meant that we cannot have a successful civil defence effort unless every individual citizen takes an interest, then I fully agree with that characterization by the hon. member for Peel. Obviously if the people of Coventry do not want to provide for their defence in the event of a nuclear war, no effort on the part of the government or on the part of their fellow citizens is going to provide the necessary defence.

In that sense what the hon. gentleman said is correct. But if by individual participation he meant that the whole problem, say in the matter of shelters, was to be left to the individual, then I believe the hon. member has not fully stated the case. I am sure it is not the intention of the government, or of any government which directs itself to this problem, that the civil defence organization is to be predicated upon exclusive individual participation. If that were the case, we would not be concerned with the building up of supplies, the storage of medical supplies, preparations for the storage of food, the building of emergency hospitals and the like. There is a very wide area of collective effort without which there can be no successful civil defence effort.

Just as that is the case, so too is it that in a country like our own the job cannot be done only by the federal government. There must be the fullest co-operation at all levels by all governments, provincial governments, municipal governments, supplemented by voluntary organizations, the Red Cross, the St. John Ambulance, all of them together providing a collective effort on the part of the citizens and the community as a whole. So that in that sense what the hon. gentleman for Peel said is not correct.

He was greatly in error, of course, when he spoke about shelters and what was being done in other countries. If I understood him correctly, he said, for instance, that in Sweden no shelters were being built. Well, that is not the case. Not only are individual shelters being built in Sweden but the state has built all kinds of shelters, and this they have been doing for some time. In fairness to the situation in the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, I may say that the provocation for Sweden to engage in a large program of public shelter construction is much greater or was much greater than in the case of those countries with which I have just compared Sweden. The fact is that Sweden has built underground shelters, taking advantage of their great rock formations, large shelters where not only can people go for refuge, security and safety, but shelters where there are actually large industrial establishments and the like. So that in Sweden, contiguous as it is to the Soviet union and with the provocation that exists, there is a wide program of public shelters as well as individual construction of these devices to minimize the effects of blast or fall-out.

Now, the government is wise in giving direction in the presentation of prototypes of shelters. It is wise in bringing the pamphlets up to date and indicating there is a great deal that can be done by the individual to protect himself against nuclear war. I completely subscribe to the view of the Prime Minister that whatever may be the cataclysmic destructive consequences of nuclear war, there is much that can be done to save percentages of our population in the event of a nuclear war. There is much that can be done, and it is a policy of defeat on the part of anyone to take any other view. Certainly, it is not strengthening the deterrent to say that all we have to do is sit back and take whatever is levelled against us by a would-be aggressor. There is a great deal that can be done. That is why the government of this country, and other countries, must at this time be supported in the efforts they are making to try to give the necessary direction.

I know that this is not an easy problem by any means. What are we to do? The government has said shelters can be built and these shelters can provide a great measure of security and resistance to blast and fall-out. But the government has not, I realize the difficulty, indicated if the time has arrived or whether in the future it will be proper to give consideration to much wider participation by the state itself in the construction of shelters. I have read the interesting speech made by the hon. member for Trinity who participated in this debate following the statement made by the Prime Minister on September 13. The government has not stated unequivocally if it is prepared to embark on the kind of program that has been embarked on by Sweden, for instance.

Has the government reached a decision yet as to whether or not the federal government and provincial governments together, or with the municipalities, should begin to build public shelters? Now, that is the great issue which I believe is being discussed at the moment and being canvassed in our country. Are we to leave this responsibility to build shelters exclusively to the individuals, to the fathers and mothers of families, or are we to supplement private construction for individual family purposes by a contribution from the state to build a shelter in the individual home which will serve undoubtedly the purpose intended if the construction follows the recommended line? However, this is not going to provide all the shelter that will be needed in the event of nuclear war. Supposing a nuclear war takes place during school hours. The children are not going to be at home, they are going to be in school. Are we going to provide shelters for these thousands of children in the schools. Most of our working population will not be at home during certain hours of the day. They will not be able to rush from the factory or the office to take shelter in the family basement. They will require shelter forthwith at their place of work.

Unless the government builds shelters, the only way they can be provided will be for industry to build them, or the office people in a building to collectively get together and build a shelter, or the individuals in a school to collectively pool their resources to build a school shelter. These are the problems about which we have not yet had a decision and in connection with which there has not been any declaration of government policy. The cost of building shelters on the scale that I have been envisaging is tremendous. I noted that the hon. member for Trinity mentioned a figure of $4 billion. He may be right in his estimate, but I have seen a much higher figure. It is the responsibility of the government to decide, in the light of all our obligations, what should be done in this regard.

The government is in a better position now to determine the likelihood of war. We were all encouraged by the statement of the Prime Minister the other day when he did not believe we would have what the newspapers call in their headlines, a hot war. With the information that is at his disposal, this is a heartening statement. He will have to determine, as head of the government, whether or not that situation may deteriorate, whether or not with the expansion of the ownership of nuclear weapons to other countries than those now in possession of these instruments of destruction, the danger of miscalculation or of accident will become increasingly great. He will have to assess the consequences of such development.

I simply say, speaking for myself, that I believe it is the duty of each and every member of parliament, as I am sure all of us recognize, to support the administration in the effort it is making. We have a responsibility also to indicate what we believe are the areas in which decisions have yet to be made. I believe it is not unfair to suggest that the government should announce its policy in that context or indicate why it does not feel at this time it has to go farther than it has gone.

Now, these general remarks will be interpreted in various ways, I suppose, by various people, but I have stated my views as I conscientiously see them. However, I make them in the full sense of an effort to try to contribute to the solution of what I know to be an extremely difficult problem.

My final comment is this, I believe the hon. member for Peel did an injustice to some of the women of our country when he spoke just before noon. He contrasted the views of the women of the Soviet union as expressed in a document that came before him today with some Canadian women. The women who have organized themselves into the Voice of Women or "La voix des Femmes" are, as far as I can tell, an organization of women who firmly believe, as do we all, in peace. They believe that it is up to each individual person to make a contribution and not to leave that responsibility to the government only. I think it would be wrong to suggest that they are not motivated by the best of intentions, particularly when one bears in mind the fact that this organization is sponsored by some very eminent women indeed in our own country and in the world. For instance, among them I find the name of Senator Josie D. Quart of Quebec city, a woman who has devoted much effort to promoting the United Nations society. Then I notice the name of Mrs. Roosevelt, the wife of a former president of the United States, a woman who has done so much for the United Nations and for good international relations. I also find the name of Mrs. Pearson, the wife of the Leader of the Opposition and other names I do not recognize. They are the names of women who in their own country are distinguished and who have made great contributions. I notice the name of Mrs. Adelaide Sinclair, formerly of the Department of National Health and Welfare, now the director general of the children's committee with headquarters at the United Nations. She is one of our most distinguished women and is certainly associated with women who can be in no way regarded as having produced evidence of having a lesser interest in our welfare than have any of us. Then I notice the name of Mrs. Wendell Willkie, the wife of a former candidate for the presidency of the United States. I note that the chairman is Miss Muriel W. Jacobson. Miss Jacobson was national director of the Canadian committee for world refugee year in 1959-60. From 1952 to 1957, she headed the voluntary international assistance unit in UNESCO's New York office in the United Nations. I believe she is now corresponding in Canada for the United Nations high commissioner for refugees. I do not know Miss Jacobson and I do not know all the women whose names I have mentioned, nor have I mentioned other women who are on the board of directors. I know little about the organization. However, I know of the contribution made by these women to our national life. I believe that they are sincere women who believe that only by mobilizing public opinion can they support a government in its declared policy of peace and goodwill.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I shall be very brief in taking part in this debate. There is certainly no need in urging on anyone a strong civil defence program for this country. That is generally being agreed upon by those who have taken part in the debate. However, for any civil defence program to succeed, it must be accepted by the public and be supported by every person in the country. I therefore think it is most important that we stress the positive values of a civil defence program.

Most of those who have spoken have indicated that we are living in a dangerous world and that, whatever may be our efforts at the United Nations and elsewhere to maintain peace in the world, there is always the risk of nuclear war, and that if we are going to survive we must have fall-out shelters and a civil defence program in this country. However, I think that the possibilities of civil defence go beyond that. In fact, in the years ahead the program of civil defence might well be the main determinant as to whether or not nuclear war comes about, when we consider the position in which we find ourselves today, with each side trying to threaten the other with nuclear weapons and in actual fact holding the people of each country as hostages in order to prevent that war coming about. However, we realize that situation is brought about only because each side is afraid that in the event of nuclear war its population would be destroyed. That is the theory of the deterrent that we have been a party to. However, when you consider the possibility of one side having a very strong civil defence and being able to remove their population from the position of hostages, it certainly would put the other side in a much stronger position. Hence we can see that if the Soviet union were to go on a massive program of civil defence and place themselves in a position in which their population could be protected whereas the population in the western world were vulnerable to a nuclear attack, we would be placing ourselves in a very dangerous position. If it were the intention of the Soviet union to bring about a nuclear war then, of course, that situation could only encourage them to do so.

I therefore think there is a positive value, a deterrent value in civil defence which is just as important as is the deterrent value of our nuclear weapons. I think that this aspect should be stressed throughout the country and be pointed out to the people of the country. As I say, if that aspect is not made clear and if the people do not understand the importance of civil defence, it is very hard to gain public acceptance of such a program. There is no doubt that there has been reluctance on the part of the public to enter wholeheartedly into civil defence, because generally speaking we have considered nuclear war to be unthinkable. It is only recently that the situation has come about where we have had to face that possibility. Particularly when the stress has been laid on the fact that we must have fall-out shelters to protect us in the case of attack, I think the public have been reluctant to accept the program entirely on that basis. I think the more positive aspect is the part that a proper civil defence program can play in preserving peace and avoiding a nuclear war. This aspect should be very well to the front of any program that we put forward to stress the importance of civil defence in this country.

[Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: First, I wish to say that it has been most helpful to have the expression of views of hon. members on this matter. What was said a moment ago by the hon. member for Essex East was true in every respect, namely that this is a matter that requires the best thinking not only of the government and the parliament of Canada but of the provincial governments and the municipalities, as its success depends on the co-operation of each and all. I was interested in what the hon. member for Vancouver East had to say. He said it in turgid words. He described what took place on the occasion of the last exercise. It has always been the policy to have an unprejudiced and unbiased person such as he on an exercise like this, in order to have the benefit of such views as the hon. member expressed regarding an exercise that is part of the survival plan and as such transcends any party considerations.

The hon. member mentioned the need of full liaison between federal, provincial and municipal governments and, while maintaining the constitutional separations of authority, to bring them together in days of peace so that if war should come the plan would have been completed and in effect.

I would say that exercise was a helpful one. It revealed how things would be in actual operation. The hon. member mentioned that he travelled by train and that no security precautions were taken. I can assure him that everybody knew him and such precaution was entirely unnecessary, as it was with the others who boarded that train that day. If he has any idea that he travelled to Petawawa without being identified by the security authorities, I can assure him, that is not a fact.

The hon. member pointed out that authorities there advised him that the signal equipment was not the most modern. That was so. More modern signal equipment had already been ordered and some has been delivered. The rest is generally ready. This was an exercise.

When the hon. member speaks in connection with the disposal of the dead, I can only say that his views are not accepted by those who had the responsibility of bringing together the organization that met in Petawawa. That is not to say that all was perfect. Far from it. That is the reason hon. members from all parts of the house were given the opportunity to be present. All of us are in this together, and by giving this opportunity to those who have different political viewpoints than the government we are assured that a fair measure of criticism will be made. Such criticism is necessary if this difficult problem is to be met, because we are in an experimental position. As one hon. member said, we will only know if it works should the eventuality take place that all of us are guarding against. We are trying to do what can be done now to meet the exigencies of the future by co-operation between the various departments of government.

I am going to refer to what the hon. member for Essex East had to say about organization and the division of responsibility among various departments of government. This was an action taken following the fullest study of what was being done in other parts of the world. I believe we have reason to have a feeling of pride in having brought about the division in question, for only in recent months the United States adopted a system almost analogous with many of those things that we undertook experimentally. They have seen what our action has been and have concluded that this is the action they should undertake, and they are doing so now.

These exercises have to take place from time to time. A few weeks ago I advised the house that a further exercise had been decided upon. The government has decided that because of the current international tension and the necessity for checking the state of readiness in respect to a civil emergency, a national civil defence exercise shall be held late in October or early in November. It has now been decided that this exercise will take place on November 13, extending so far as participation by governments is concerned into November 14. This exercise follows naturally from the one held in May, 1961, in which I frankly admitted to the house certain gaps had become evident, which I believe have been remedied in the meantime as a result of that previous exercise.

It will be our endeavour in arranging this exercise that as many as possible of the Canadian public will directly participate and to a greater extent than was the case previously. With this in mind, a good deal of public information will be made available both before and during the exercise. Extensive use will be made of radio. People will be asked to listen to the broadcasts and to review the plans they have made for the safety of themselves and their families. It is hoped that full support to the exercise will be given by provincial and municipal authorities, whose responsibilities in the event of war are of major importance.

With this in mind I have written the premiers of all the provinces, inviting them to have their governments participate in the exercise and to encourage various municipalities in each of their provinces to do likewise. I would stress that this is a further step in a series of tests to review how ready we are to meet the grave emergencies and dangerous implications that will arise in case we are involved in war.

There is no way in peacetime that this can be done excepting by way of an exercise such as the one we held in May and the further one to which I have alluded. I agree with those who say it is difficult to command and mobilize the public interest in this matter. One hon. member mentioned the fact that I stated the other day that I could not believe it possible that there would be war. By that I meant that I could not conceive that any national leader, whether it be Khrushchev or anybody else, knowing the potentialities of nuclear war and possessing ordinary human intelligence, would wish for war or dare to make a direct move in that regard. But we said the same about Hitler, and it has been said of all the leaders of mankind who have become military megalomaniacs, that they would not go to the limit of war. In the past they have, and in the past, too, there were great fears. Those fears are with us today. Fearful as I am as to what would happen should a nuclear war come, I am not one of those who believe that mankind would be destroyed. I believe that philosophy was built up by Nevil Shute in his book and has caused the hearts of men to be more fearful than the facts of science would justify.

Certainly, the loss would be terrible. It has been estimated that in our own country if a series of nuclear attacks were made upon us the number of casualties would run between two million and six million, which is terrible however one views it. That is why our efforts are directed to bringing about peace, and that is why every waking minute and every waking year all those who have responsibilities have before them that picture of the awfulness, of the havoc of the future, and also of the need to do everything, to preserve peace, consistent with the maintenance of those things which are dearer than life itself.

When organizations spring up for the purpose of doing their part I welcome them. Any group of men and women who join together and endeavour to mobilize opinion within their country on behalf of the best things of life are performing a service; I recognize that as good citizenship. I listened today to what the hon. member for Peel said and also to those who followed him. I think they have done him a grave injustice in the interpretation they have endeavoured to place on his words. He spoke of this organization in Canada and the ideals for which it stood. Then he said that in the U.S.S.R., on the other hand, the women there were standing firmly behind the need for the maintenance and use of nuclear power. He was showing the distinction between those who stand for peace and those who in the U.S.S.R. become automata under the control of the state, carrying out the will of the state. We need to mobilize public thinking with regard to the precautionary measures that must be taken in order to maintain the safety of the individual in Canada. It is hard to do. We are all built the same way. Everyone says in his own heart: it just cannot be—something will turn up to prevent the outbreak of hostilities. Therefore we need the help of members of parliament and of all in public life to mobilize the thinking of Canadians to the need of acting, and acting now, to do those things necessary to provide and assure a reasonably high figure of survival. I am going to say a personal word in that regard.

As Prime Minister my responsibility is provided for in the division of powers between the various ministers. I believe in the need for a shelter program. I am entirely convinced that there is much merit in the basement fall-out program which has been placed before the Canadian people. I know there are some who leave the suggestion that we have in mind the survival of some and have not the regard for others that we should. This was implicit in certain words spoken here which I am not going to identify, although the hon. member in question will, no doubt, know of whom I am speaking. That is a principle which all of us cannot but condemn; we cannot but condemn any effort to leave the people of Canada with the view that we seek to protect those who are rich and not those who are poor. It is the responsibility of government to ensure a reasonable equality in this regard and that is one of the things which is before us at all times.

The hon. member for Essex East pointed out the tremendous cost of a national shelter program. The cost is, indeed, fabulous. All of us who have taken the time to read the information brought together by those responsible for the administration of E.M.O., know that there are vast problems in this connection which have yet not been solved here or in any other country.

I was going to say a personal word. As Prime Minister, I occupy a house on Sussex street. It was suggested to me that we should have a shelter there—a shelter really protective to the "nth" degree. That is where I shall be when and if war should come. That is where I shall stay, and we have there now a basement shelter identical with the one we have asked Canadians to put in their own homes. There is not one bit of difference between that and the one we suggest for others, excepting that this is to accommodate the staff as well as my wife and myself; it covers those in the building. That is where we shall be. That is the understanding, and that understanding will be carried out. I want that realized across this country—that there are no protective measures being taken for the survival of any particular person in this country.

There are, however, responsibilities which rest on a government to ensure a continuance of government, for, without government and with a completely separated group of ministers, you would have chaos. To that end we have available for the purpose of ensuring the continuance of government, for the cabinet, senior civil service officials and others needed to maintain the organization of the country, protection similar to that which has been provided in other countries.

Hon. members may say to me: what will the basement shelter protect against? Well, it will not protect against a direct hit or anything like a direct hit. The only kind of shelter which would protect from that would be a shelter one thousand feet down in rock. What we are trying to protect against are the major dangers we face, that is, from drift, from fall-out and the after-effects from radiation. I think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre made a particularly good contribution to the debate today when he emphasized the need of educating the people about this and showing them that what we are trying to do represents the considered opinion not only of the government but of all the officials and also of experts in other countries who have been consulted regarding the course we should take.

I mentioned a moment ago that we have to interest people. The hon. member for Essex East said that he had occupied a position of responsibility and he realized some of the difficulties. I shall point out some of the increases in expenditures that have taken place and of the action taken by this government as danger has become more and more imminent internationally with the passing years. In 1952 and 1953 the program was initiated of sharing expenditures. The amount expended was $1,400,000. The federal allocation to the provinces was based on 8 cents per capita plus an additional 6 cents per capita in designated target areas. Cost sharing was on the basis of 50-50 between the federal government and the provinces. In 1954-55 the appropriation was $2 million and there was a slightly higher per capita grant to the provinces, namely 11 cents per capita plus an additional 9 cents per capita in designated target areas. In cost sharing there were three alternative amounts, as follows: first, 25 per cent municipalities, 25 per cent provinces and 50 per cent federal; second, 75 per cent municipal and 25 per cent federal; and lastly 50 per cent federal and 50 per cent provincial.

In 1957-58 cost sharing was still 50-50 as between the municipalities and the provinces on the one hand and the federal government on the other. The amount of the appropriation was $2 million.

In 1959-60 the appropriation was $4 million. As of April 1, 1959, we made provision under treasury board minute to provide more generous contributions. The federal allocation was based on a 25 cent per capita grant. Cost sharing was 75 per cent federal, with a 25 per cent share by the provinces and the municipalities, with a further provision that if any portion of $4 million remained after provincial and municipal projects submitted by May 1, 1960 had been approved and committed, further commitments could be made to the extent of the balance. In 1961-62 the appropriation is $4,350,000, and the federal allocation is the same as that in 1960-61.

This does not begin to show the total amount of the expenditure by the federal government on civil defence. That is an amount, including expenditures in the armed forces, of some $44 million.

With respect to the number of people participating, I cannot give the committee figures in detail in recent months, but the figure as of December, 1960, shows that over 100,000 volunteers and 187,000 full-time provincial and municipal employees could be engaged. Of these about 96,800 have received some training in their emergency duties.

In connection with the emergency measures being taken, all ten provinces and a total of 308 municipalities are participating. It should be noted that, depending on the province, a municipality might be a county, which means in effect over 1,200 municipalities are actually engaged in emergency measures activities.

In so far as federal expenditures are concerned, they have continued to increase. I refer particularly to grants to provinces and municipalities for civil defence and related purposes. Between 1952-53 and 1956-57 they ranged from $246,000 to $813,000, in round figures. They have increased since from $972,000 in 1957-58 to $2,245,000 last year. It is estimated that this year it will be about $3,700,000.

Mention was made by the hon. member for Essex East of the delegation and distribution of authority. I should like to refer now to what President Kennedy has done in this connection. The executive order regarding civil defence was made in the United States on July 20. The delegation of authority to the secretary of defence by President Kennedy assigned to the secretary of defence certain civil defence responsibilities, among others, a fall-out shelter program; the warning system; emergency communications including warning and monitoring; emergency assistance to state and local governments in a post-attack period; protection and emergency operational capability of state and local governments; and programs for financial contributions to the states for civil defence purposes.

The order reconstituted the former office of civil and defence mobilization into a new agency known as the office of emergency planning to give advice and assistance to the president in determining policy, appropriate defence roles; helping the states to enter into interstate civil defence compacts and the like.

It will be noted that the main assignments to the secretary of defence under this executive order are most similar to those assignments to the Department of National Defence in Canada by order in council in 1959. The new office of emergency planning in the United States is quite comparable with the emergency measures organization set up in Canada in 1957.

The hon. member for Vancouver East asked under what authority we would act in the event of hostilities. I mentioned the War Measures Act. During exercise TOCSIN we went through the formality of having a cabinet meeting for the purpose of bringing in the War Measures Act—the document was marked as being a defence exercise—so that we would be able to do the things to which reference was made by him and in particular the transfer, I think he said, of some 15,000 people from one area to another.

As the hon. gentleman knows, when the War Measures Act is promulgated the federal parliament and government become almost supreme, particularly in the field of legislative power, and are enabled to do those things which otherwise, under the heading of property and civil rights, would fall exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

I should like to refer to a question raised by the hon. member for Essex East and I think also by the hon. member for St. Boniface, who has devoted himself very greatly to this problem and was, as he described himself, in this regard a lone voice in the wilderness for a considerable period of time. The question was raised as to what should be done with respect to the schools. A strong case can be made out for the provision by school authorities of fall-out shelters in schools. This problem, however, like all the others to which the hon. member for Essex East referred, is tremendous in its implications. Children are actually at school only about 20 per cent of their time during a day and by far the greater part of their time is spent at home or near home. Therefore on the basis of priorities, and I think the provinces take this view, a stronger case is made for the provision of shelters in their own homes. Even in the 20 per cent of time that they are at school it is generally felt, having regard to what may be expected as the normal warning time, that they would have sufficient time to get home. However, as time goes on the case for fall-out shelters in schools to take care of the one chance in five that the children will be there when the attack comes becomes stronger. Nevertheless, starting with fundamentals I think our number one responsibility at the moment is home shelters.

Mention was made by an hon. member of target areas and what can be done in a nuclear attack to safeguard people who live in target areas. That is a problem that has not been solved by any government in any part of the world. If one is immediately under a bomb there is nothing that can be done. If the weapon is somewhat farther away blast-proof shelters are of some help but they are tremendously expensive.

We have distributed to those who have asked for them plans for a blast-proof shelter that can be built in one's yard and there are also plans available for groups or communities that may wish to undertake such shelters. Incidentally, I wish to refer to the very patriotic offer that has been made by the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada and the institute of professional engineers. Representatives of these two organizations called upon me yesterday and offered to the government and the country in the interests of Canada as a whole their services and those of their membership. They promised to do whatever they can and whatever they are asked to do not in a spirit of monetary gain for professional services rendered but rather to show their interest in national survival and in the need of co-operation on the part of Canadians as a whole. The staff of the emergency measures organization is working on a cheaper form of blast-proof shelter based on using heavy steel tanks such as those used in gasoline service stations. The government has suggested to municipalities that they should have plans ready that will make it possible for those people who wish to leave target areas to do so if they so desire, always depending on whether there is adequate warning time before the explosion.

It is not recommended that all people leave such areas because there are serious conflicting considerations that arise. If the warning time is very short it is not possible to leave at all. If one is out on the roads it is even more dangerous than taking cover in the basement of a house closer to the blast. Mass evacuation suggests itself to many as a simple means of meeting the problem but it contains serious risks of panic. There is no doubt that if the problem permitted and arrangements were made to allow a substantial number of people to leave, many thousands of people could save their lives by moving out of the most dangerous areas; but to do so they must have places to go to. They run the risk of going to some place where they are exposed to the weather and possibly the danger of fall-out radiation. For this reason the general feeling is that people should only try to move out provided they have some place to go and know of it in advance. Instructions to this effect have been given and I think they are a matter of public record.

The suggestion has been raised that the government should build blast shelters. This could not be done on a partial basis and something of the immensity of the problem was indicated by a number of hon. members. It would mean that we would have to provide for some five million to seven million people. So far as that decision is concerned, I ask you to place yourselves in the position of the Prime Minister. If we proceed with such a policy costing at least a billion dollars, some say several billions, and war does not come we will then be subject to widespread condemnation for improvident action. We have been inclined to take the stand that that is one risk we have to take, that our purpose is to save the lives of as many Canadians as possible and to see that saving those lives shall not be based on the possession or lack of possession by people of the necessary wherewithal to protect themselves.

Miss LaMarsh: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question at that point? I wish to thank the Prime Minister for his candor in referring to target areas. Because I have seen two lists in different press reports, I would ask the Prime Minister to put on record those areas in Canada designated as primary targets by the emergency measures organization.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think there is no reason why that should not be done. Without designating actual areas I would say that if a nuclear attack on North America were to include a direct attack on Canada, major cities, industrial centres, ports and seats of government such as Calgary, Edmonton, Halifax, Hamilton, London, Montreal, Niagara Falls, Ottawa, Quebec City, St. John's, Newfoundland, Saint John, New Brunswick, Toronto, Windsor, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Victoria could be considered as the most likely target areas.

The hon. member for Peterborough produced a letter from a Mr. Whittier. The gentleman in question wrote to the emergency measures organization expressing his views and we welcome such co-operation. I think, however, that there were some errors in the representations made which were based not on a lack of technical training but on a lack of the full knowledge of all the circumstances. The hon. member said that the correspondent stated that on page 10 of the booklet, "Eleven Steps to Survival", it is implied that the fall-out comes from activation of earth, stones, buildings, etc. but that the booklet goes on to give the decay rate for fission products arising from the fission of U-235. These statements are not inconsistent. Actually, what occurs is that the material blown up is made radioactive by the adhesion of radioactive fission product dust particles. Therefore, it is quite proper to say that the rate of decay as applied to the fission products from the fission of U-235, may be used in describing the rate of decay of the fall-out; and this is fairly applied independently of the land area over which the detonation occurs.

I think the explanation will be understood by all hon. members. With respect to the next point raised by the correspondent in the excerpt by the hon. member, it is apparent that there has been a misunderstanding on his part. It is true, as he suggests, that the shelter described in "Blueprint for Survival No. 1", of itself will stop 90 per cent of the radiation present. What has been overlooked is the fact that this structure is placed in the basement of a house. The hon. member for Peel dealt with this particular phase of the letter. In such case, the house itself will have at least a protective factor of 10. This means that the end result of the basement shelter in most houses is that the protective factor is 100 instead of 10 and that 99 per cent of the radiation, instead of 90 per cent, is taken care of.

I think there were a number of other statements in his letter, and I think they were answered in the reply which was sent to the correspondent of the hon. gentleman. If I have omitted any, it has not been from lack of a desire to meet the points raised but rather from the fact that I have not got the particulars before me.

Now, sir, mention was made of civil defence planning for cities. The federal government can plan for nuclear war as it will affect larger cities only in a general way, since circumstances vary so much. However, it can, with the provinces, help the cities in their planning and it has done so in many ways, namely, by providing a guide for municipal planning which has been widely circulated; by providing courses of instruction for mayors, other municipally elected persons and for civic officials; by providing financial assistance toward costs that arise in connection with local planning. The federal government pays 75 per cent of the costs of approved planning projects, as I mentioned earlier. Planning in detail, however, is the responsibility of the city in question and many of the cities in Canada have developed their plans fairly adequately.

I think that, in general, covers the matters that were raised. Again may I say how indebted I am to all who have made a contribution. We want the very best ideas that you have and that Canadians as a whole have in this regard. In concluding, I am again asking for the fullest co-operation. We have entered a field of activity that is novel; we have entered one that is dependent upon the uncertainties of the future. However, I have this to say regarding Mr. Curry and Mr. Bryce, of the privy council, as well as the administrative staff and the various staffs in the provinces, they have done a great deal and gone far beyond the normal call of duty in order to make a success of dealing with a problem which is novel, unusual, but vital to the future of the people of our country.

317. Expenses of the royal commission on railway problems including the payment, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, of honoraria or allowances as may be authorized by the treasury board to officers, clerks or employees permanently employed in the civil service for services rendered by them to the commission, $40,870.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Prime Minister could bring us up to date in connection with the position of this commission. The Prime Minister will recall that I asked him on the orders of the day when the second volume of the report would be ready. He told me he had a memorandum from the Clerk of the Privy Council. I should like to know now, having regard to what the Prime Minister indicated on a number of occasions, what the position is and what progress has been made by this royal commission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I stated the other day that the second report would be available this fall and that there would be a third report as well. This latter report would be a compendium of the working papers and the statistical information that had been gathered and collated by the commission.

Mr. Chevrier: The Prime Minister will remember that in the first report which was tabled there were a number of recommendations made costing, I believe, somewhere in the neighbourhood of $100 million. The recommendations were divided into four different categories. The Prime Minister will remember that there was a discussion of this matter on an earlier occasion and he indicated that as soon as the report was brought down legislation would be forthcoming. I should like to know what the intention of the government is with regard to the recommendations of the MacPherson commission and whether or not any of those recommendations are going to be implemented by legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the hon. gentleman knows volume I dealt with more or less general matters and had some recommendations. It is necessary for us to have volume II before us before we can finally determine several matters that were recommended and in respect of which further information will be forthcoming in the subsequent volume.

Mr. Chevrier: There are a number of other things upon which I should like some information. The Prime Minister will remember that the object of this royal commission was to consider a number of matters incidental to transportation including, amongst other things, freight rates and the freight rates structure. The point on which I should like to make inquiry at this time has to do with vote 317 which is now under consideration and is related to vote 590. Vote 590 concerns the $50 million which we will be asked to vote under the heading of "Board of Transport Commissioners".

As the committee knows the Freight Rates Reduction Act provided a sum of money, which I believe was in the amount of $20 million, for the general reduction of class rates across Canada and that money has, I take it, been paid by the government to the various railways since the bill was given royal assent. Can the Prime Minister tell the committee whether or not any part of this $50 million will be paid also in reduction of freight rates or how it will be paid?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not that information and when we come to the $50-million item no doubt there will be a discussion. I think it would be well to have the facts fully before us rather than endeavour to answer the question piecemeal.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I will not insist on it, Mr. Chairman. I think perhaps that answer is one which would commend itself to the committee. Then dealing with the royal commission, may I ask this question. Can the Prime Minister tell us when it is expected that the final report will be brought down?

He will remember that when this matter was discussed in the house, he was under the impression that this was something which could be done very quickly. As a result of our experience as members of the former government, we indicated that it took quite a long time, as has been the case. Can the Prime Minister give any indication of when the final reports will be given to the house?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I could do so, I should be most happy to be of assistance in that regard. I remember one time when I entered into the field of royal commission prophecy. Events did not bear me out, and from time to time questions were asked. I do not wish to be placed in that position again.

Mr. Chevrier: The Clark report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman is like Orpheus. He could almost get information on any subject when he takes the kindly attitude. However, I am not going to enter that field even in the face of the blandishments by means of which he has endeavoured to secure the information.

Mr. Chevrier: The Prime Minister is in very good humour.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the same mood and with the same purpose may I ask the Prime Minister if he can now tell us when the government expects to be in a position to announce its policy of acceptance or rejection, in whole or in part, of the Bladen commission report? The Prime Minister will appreciate the fact that this is a matter of great interest to the community from which I come. The report has now been in the hands of the government for some five months. There is considerable interest in knowing when we may expect something in connection with this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman, too, almost persuaded me, Mr. Chairman. However, I cannot add anything to what I have already said, even though I am so highly desirous of being helpful.

Item agreed to.

318. Expenses of the royal commission on government organization including the payment, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, of honoraria or allowances as may be authorized by the treasury board to officers, clerks or employees permanently employed in the civil service for services rendered by them to the commission, $750,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not going to make the mistake made by my colleagues of asking the Prime Minister to prophesy. I am simply going to ask the Prime Minister to tell us what has been accomplished or to give us a report on what has already been accomplished by the Glassco commission and particularly to give us the most up to date estimate of how much of the half billion dollars this commission was expected to save has been saved by it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I say to the hon. gentleman that the commission has undertaken an extremely large and comprehensive examination of the problems that were placed before it. It divided its inquiry into 18 specific projects. I ought to place those projects on record to give an indication of the comprehensive investigation taking place. They are as follows: Financial control and accounting; manpower in the government service; paper work and office systems; real property management; procurement and materials management; transportation; communications; economic analysis and statistics; legal services and procedures; scientific research and development; services to the public; medical and hospital services; education services; public information services; lending, guaranteeing and insurance activities; administrative aspects of the Department of National Defence; government operations in competition with private business; federal-provincial joint and allied activities.

I am sure that enumeration will give the committee some idea of the complex and wide ranging field in which the commission is operating. It does not hold public hearings. It has endeavoured, as far as possible, to secure its information by consultation with departments of government and outside.

As to the savings it will bring about, may I say that I hope that it will be able, without in any way diminishing efficiency but rather indeed increasing it, to recommend changes which will assure reductions proportionately similar to those achieved by the Hoover commission in the United States.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it that this is the first time an estimate appears in connection with the Glassco commission?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: It is for $750,000?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder whether the Prime Minister can tell us what the total cost of this commission will be? I hold in my hand an article which was published in the Financial Post of July 29, 1961 and in which it is stated that the cost of this commission for this fiscal year will be about $2,250,000. Can the Prime Minister say whether or not that is a fact?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know that, when you have some regard to the nature of the expert information that must be secured, the cost will be considerable. I would not be able to give an estimate at all at this time. However, to make it an effective commission, the personnel must be those with wide experience and knowledge, technical, economic and the like. Whatever the cost may be, I think the results will be far in excess of it.

Mr. Chevrier: That remains to be seen. We shall be obliged to await the recommendations of the commission. Can the Prime Minister give some indication of whether this commission will, in connection with this report, proceed along the same lines as those followed by the MacPherson commission, for instance? Will there be an interim report or will there be a number of interim reports?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the hon. gentleman knows there has already been one interim report. There should be another one in due course.

Mr. Chevrier: When is it expected that this commission will finish its work?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the hon. gentleman knows, when the commission was set up the purpose or objectives were set out and it was provided that the commissioners should report to the governor in council, making interim reports on the progress made, the final report to be made within a period of two years.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have not the documents before me at the moment, I admit, but at the time the commission was appointed I seem to recollect that it was stated that it would make reports from time to time and that it would also make recommendations to government departments in the course of this operation, with a view to having them implemented immediately, in order to effect as quickly as possible these economies which, after all, as I understand it, are the sole purpose of the commission. I wondered whether the Prime Minister could give us some indication of the number of recommendations and of the nature of the more important recommendations that have so far been made to the various government departments by the commission in the course of its operation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not that information, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not wish to hold up the estimates. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could have the information prepared in some sort of form that could be made available to hon. members within a reasonable time, so that at least it would be available for consideration at the next session of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will give consideration to that request.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, there is another suggestion that I might make to the Prime Minister about this royal commission, in which it will be understood that because of my previous experience in the public service I take a special interest.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have you given any evidence yet to the Glassco commission?

Mr. Pickersgill: I understood the Prime Minister to say that the commission was not taking evidence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: By that I mean recommendations.

Mr. Pickersgill: As I understand it, it is carrying on a sort of inquisition in private and not a public inquiry; a sort of star chamber, to use a phrase that was very frequently used by a very distinguished member of the house who used to sit on this side of the chamber and is now sitting over there. So far I have not appeared before this august body during its inquiries, though I must say, since the Prime Minister has put the direct question to me, that some legal officer connected with it did telephone me the other day and suggested he would like to talk to me about something. I offered to take him to lunch so that he could do so. I hasten to add, that was to be at my own expense, not wishing to add to the cost of the inquiry.

What I particularly wanted to suggest to the Prime Minister was this. I noticed when the Prime Minister was reading the various branches of the inquiry that one of them was for public information. The Prime Minister will recall that when he sat on this side of the chamber some years ago the critics on this side of the chamber—I do not know that the Prime Minister indulged in this very much, but the Minister of Finance certainly did, and some of the leading members of the opposition who are now on the treasury benches—complained about the excessive cost of public relations officers and information officers in the various branches of government.

In view of the importance which hon. gentlemen used to attach to this subject I was wondering whether the Prime Minister could suggest to Mr. Glassco that this particular branch of the inquiry be expedited and that an effort be made to make a report on this subject in as public a form as possible at the earliest possible date. I ask this because I can well remember how the Minister of Finance, in particular, used to point out what a tremendous saving could be made by reducing these services.

The only clear and precise recollection I have is that before 1957 and right back to confederation, as far as I know, there were no public relations men in the Department of Finance, and the only economy that has been effected so far in this particular department has been to add someone at a reputed salary of $10,000 a year to the staff of the Minister of Finance.

Knowing the passion for economy of the Minister of Finance, who has not increased the annual expenditures of this country by much—over a billion dollars a year from what they were when the previous government was in office—I think that an area where it was recognized these great economies could be made ought to be explored as quickly as possible.

Special—

557. Expenses of the royal commission on government organization—further amount required, $1,577,480.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I note from this vote that if you add vote 318 to this amount the total sum being voted this year for the expenses of this royal commission, which is to save the taxpayers' money, is substantially above $2¼ million.

Item agreed to.

Special—

558. Expenses of the royal commission on Canadian magazines and other periodicals including the payment, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, of honoraria or allowances as may be authorized by the treasury board to officers, clerks or employees permanently employed in the civil service for services rendered by them to the commission, $35,600.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in connection with this royal commission, which has to do with periodicals and publications, can the Prime Minister give any further information than that which he has already given in answer to questions on the orders of the day as to what consideration the government has given to these recommendations and whether or not they will be implemented.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there is nothing I have to add at the moment.

Item agreed to.

559. Expenses of the royal commission on the motor vehicles industries including the payment, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, of honoraria or allowances as may be authorized by the treasury board to officers, clerks or employees permanently employed in the civil service for services rendered by them to the commission, $16,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on vote 559 I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, since there is no vote in the main estimates, this $16,000 represents the total cost of the Bladen commission?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, it does not.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the Prime Minister say when the additional amount, whatever it was, was voted and what it was for.

Mr. Churchill: Last year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Last year approximately $46,000 was spent.

Mr. Pickersgill: That makes a total of something over $60,000.

Item agreed to.

560. Expenses of the royal commission on health services including the payment, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, of honoraria or allowances as may be authorized by the treasury board to officers, clerks or employees permanently employed in the civil service for services rendered by them to the commission, $125,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the Prime Minister could indicate what progress has been made in this connection. Perhaps I should not even ask this question since the Prime Minister refuses to enter into the realm of prophecy, but can the Prime Minister say whether he has any target date for the completion of this royal commission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I should very much like to have an interim report by this commission in the very near future. I know the hon. gentleman is desirous of obtaining something of that kind too. I am sure that all of us would be very happy if we could have a report that would be helpful enough to give a lead as to what might be done.

I know that the premier of Quebec says that this royal commission is not properly constituted; but I hope that his feelings will not prevent the commission doing that which it was charged with doing, namely, not to interfere with provincial jurisdiction in any way, and with a full realization of the responsibility of the provinces for health matters, but to endeavour to find a way whereby the federal parliament might act for the benefit of all Canadians.

Item agreed to.

Governor General and Lieutenant governors—

162. Office of the secretary to the governor general, $220,633.

Mr. Pickersgill: In connection with this vote, Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether any change has been made recently in the arrangements for the expenses of the lieutenant governors, apart from their salaries.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, Mr. Chairman. In the supplementary estimates, vote No. 529, there is an item to authorize reimbursement to the lieutenant governors of the provinces of Canada of the costs of travelling and hospitality incurred in the exercise of their duties, and so on. The amount of this vote is $43,000.

The purpose of this item is to increase by 50 per cent the amounts of the allowances payable to lieutenant governors to reimburse them for the costs of travelling and hospitality incurred in the exercise of their duties.

The case for having these allowances is, I think, best stated in the words of the prime minister of the day, Mr. St. Laurent, when the proposal was first introduced. He said, in effect, that the government did not feel it was the mood of the Canadian people to abolish the office of lieutenant governor and that as long as the function was maintained as part of our constitution "it would not be desirable that it be one available only to persons who could, out of their own resources, provide the services that have to be rendered to the public".

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the privy council.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

453. Departmental administration, $2,550,941.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Before the committee deals with the various items I should like to make, briefly, a few remarks. The estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs were considered by the standing committee on veterans affairs. If our committee system is working satisfactorily, as I think it is, estimates which come before committees such as that should normally take up less of the time of the house itself in committee of the whole. At the same time when we are dealing with a department as important as this one I have no objection whatever to comments or discussion with regard to any factors pertaining to the department. However, I just wish to remind the committee and in particular those who were not members of the standing committee that the most careful attention was given to these estimates. The officials of the department were present and made statements outlining the duties of their various branches in addition to answering questions put to them by members of the committee. It was an all party committee. I thank the standing committee for the very careful attention it gave to the work of the department and for the suggestions which were brought to my notice by members. I think it performed its proper function and I am grateful to the members who so diligently attended the meetings.

The situation with regard to the veterans of Canada is not materially different from what it has been over the year. The veteran population is something over one million. I think about 1,100,000 people are still living who at one time or another, in one war or another, have put on the uniform and served their country—I am speaking of both men and women. Of that number, something over 80 per cent survived without serious trouble and have been able to look after themselves in the course of their lives up to the present time. Unfortunately, between 17 and 20 per cent of those who survived suffered disabilities or difficulties and have had to receive a certain amount of assistance which a grateful country has given without hesitation. One of the impressions I have gained here in the House of Commons over the years is that the problem of the veterans receives sympathetic consideration from every part of this house. Of the veterans who are carrying with them over the years the disabilities of the war there are, still on the roll from the first world war, about 48,000 in round figures. The number was at one time close to 100,000. Those suffering disabilities as a result of the second world war number about 104,000. Those drawing war veterans allowances—people who were not seriously wounded but who nevertheless suffered as a result of their war experiences—number in round figures about 48,000.

In addition to the figures I have quoted, there are, of course, the dependents, wives and orphans who receive some assistance.

During the course of the last 12 months, three major measures were dealt with through the Department of Veterans Affairs by the House of Commons. There was the amendment to the Pension Act which increased disability pensions by 20 per cent across the board and provided for a 33⅓ per cent increase in respect of orphan children. A similar amendment to the War Veterans' Allowance Act was considered and an increase of 20 per cent across the board was granted in that case. A third matter which was dealt with and one which had been troublesome for many years involved a change in the regulations governing the Veterans' Land Act reducing to half an acre the minimum amount of land which could be held. This, apparently, has been well received by those concerned. Those were the most important subjects dealt with.

Other matters which are of interest to veterans and to this committee have been given careful consideration by the very competent officials of the department and are now awaiting my study just as soon as this lengthy session terminates. My hope is that some of the problems affecting veterans which are still outstanding may be dealt with agreeably at the next session of the house. However, up to this point this is the progress which has been made and I hope, now, that the committee will give its approval to these estimates or, if there is some matter which hon. members feel should be dealt with, that they will bring it to my attention.

Mr. Carter: I should like to thank the minister for the statement he has just made and also for his kind remarks about the efforts and the work of the parliamentary committee on veterans affairs.

As the minister has pointed out, these estimates were examined very thoroughly in committee. In fact, ten separate sittings were devoted to them. Officials in every branch of the department were available and gave detailed answers to all the questions which the committee asked. The reports of those meetings are in printed form and are available to all hon. members as well as to any members of the public who are interested in securing them from the Queen's printer. The estimates of this department are never controversial, and we of the Liberal party see no need for a prolonged discussion of them at this time.

The minister has referred to the changes which have been brought about in the veterans charter and particularly to the amendments to the Pension Act and the War Veterans' Allowance Act which gave across the board 20 per cent increases to veterans. The hon. gentleman also mentioned the change in the regulations governing the administration of the Veterans' Land Act. We are grateful to the government for what it has done in this regard, and I am sure this has been much appreciated by veterans across Canada.

I am sure the minister will not mind my reminding him that there are still a few little jobs of tidying up which remain to be done. In particular, I have felt myself that the 365 day qualification with respect to service in the United Kingdom in connection with war veterans allowance by veterans of the first world war should be abolished. I think, also, that most veterans are agreed that something more should be done for the widows of veterans. In particular we feel that widows of Canadian citizens who served in the Imperial forces have a special case which merits consideration, and that it would be a good thing if the government could see its way clear to granting free medical treatment to pensioners and their families and to the widows of non-pensioners, too, and also to members of families of the war amputees. We would like to see the ceiling raised with respect to widows of non-pensioned veterans, and that under certain conditions they be granted pensions as of right. I gather also that the people of Canada, and certainly most veterans organizations, would like to see a change brought about in the legislation so that damages which a widow might collect out of the accidental death of her husband would be treated as life assurance and other assets and not taken into account when the widow's rights to a pension are being considered.

I also think that changes should be made in the legislation whereby a veteran's pension would be made payable to his widow for a full year after his death, and an adequate allowance provided after that.

The committee received representations from many veterans organizations, including the Royal Canadian Legion, the national council of veterans associations of Canada, the war amps association, the Canadian non-pensioned widows association, and other veterans organizations. A study of the briefs submitted by those organizations indicated also unanimous agreement with these proposals. Practically every brief referred to each of these problems and recommended that something be done to correct them.

I must express my own disappointment that when the government was making amendments to the Canadian Pension Act and to the War Veterans' Allowance Act they did not embrace that opportunity to extend the benefits of the veterans charter to the merchant navy, to the rescue tug service, to the fire fighters and to the Newfoundland forestry units of world war II.

I know the minister will not expect me to sit down without reminding him again that the veterans of Newfoundland still are waiting for the necessary changes in legislation which will give them the status of those veterans who served in the Canadian forces, as was stipulated in the terms of union. As it is now the widows of Newfoundland veterans are in a different position from widows of other Canadian veterans. They have no rights. If they are granted pensions it is done as a favour and they forfeit their pensions if they leave the country. I ask the minister and the government to give urgent consideration to this measure and I express the hope that before too long the minister will find it possible to bring about further amendments to take care of those problems. This is all I need to say at this time. There are a few questions which I shall ask on the various items.

Item agreed to.

456. Operation of hospitals and administration including authority, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act, to spend revenue received during the year for hospital and related services, $45,217,346.

Mr. Carter: I think my question could be put on item 456; it is related to items 456 and 457. Can the minister outline to the committee the policy of the department with respect to discovery of new treatments and of new drugs which might be available for the treatment of veterans in the hospitals operated under the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Mr. Churchill: I cannot give the hon. member specific instances but I have confidence that everything possible is being done with regard to changes, if necessary, in the treatment of veterans because they are so well served by a dedicated medical service across this country. The doctors who serve in our veterans' hospitals are men who are at the top of their profession. Many of them are also instructors or teachers in the medical schools of the universities. They comprise specialists in various aspects of medicine. They go beyond the call of duty in giving assistance to many of our veterans whether they are in hospital or not. Since they keep abreast of their profession, as I am sure they do, and I have met many of them, if any mode of new treatment becomes available it will be introduced. But I repeat what I said earlier; I have no specific instance to draw to the attention of the committee on this occasion.

Mr. McGrath: Would it be apropos under this item to ask the minister just exactly what the department has in mind with respect to the operation of the veterans hospital which is now under construction as an annex to the General hospital in St. John's, Newfoundland.

Mr. Churchill: The same purpose as was served elsewhere, namely to provide an increased number of beds for the treatment of people who require treatment; to improve the active bed situation and also to provide what is known as domiciliary care for people who qualify for that type of treatment in our veterans hospitals.

Mr. McGrath: I do not think my question was understood. Does the department intend to operate the hospital?

Mr. Churchill: It is attached to the St. John's General hospital as a pavilion and will be under the administration of that hospital.

Item agreed to.

460. Veterans' bureau, $716,012.

Mr. Carter: I should like to make one brief observation here, Mr. Chairman. It seems that the personnel in the veterans bureau in the various districts are sort of up a blind alley. There does not seem to be much opportunity for advancement.

In the past I have advocated an increase in the staff of pensions advocates, and particularly that full-time advocates be employed in Newfoundland. After looking over the situation over a number of years it has occurred to me that that might not be necessary; that we are now getting in this office in the various regions a personnel who are very experienced in handling veterans problems and in preparing their cases. I would ask the minister whether he would consider setting up a classification of personnel in which we might have assistant pensions advocates who might not have legal training but who, because of their experience in this work, might be able to do it just as capably and just as competently as members of the legal profession. This is just a suggestion that I would ask the minister to consider for the next year.

Mr. Churchill: I will. As a matter of fact, I was talking about this subject with the deputy minister just yesterday. I had the opportunity of meeting the solicitors who are doing this work and who had assembled in Ottawa for a two-day conference. I had the opportunity of meeting them and talking to them, as did the parliamentary secretary, so that suggestion of the hon. member is under consideration at the present time.

461. War veterans allowance board—administration, $170,994.

Mr. Carter: There is just one point I should like to bring to the minister's attention with respect to recipients of war veterans allowance who are under the age of 60. In order for such a veteran to qualify he must somehow get a medical certificate to the effect that he is permanently unemployable. It seems to me that it is very difficult for a man to get such a certificate because in this day of rapid scientific advance, particularly in the medical field, it is most difficult to say that because a person has suffered from a disability for a number of years he will always suffer from it and that there is no chance of his ever improving to the point that he will be able to work. I suggest to the minister that if a person has been disabled for a number of years, say two or three, he should be considered as being sufficiently disabled to qualify for the war veterans allowance. His case could then be reviewed from year to year to see whether any improvement had taken place. I suggest that a person should not be barred until the age of 60 or until he can get somebody to certify that he is permanently disabled.

Mr. Churchill: The problem is not new. It is an important one and has been given consideration in the past. The line is normally drawn at age 60, of course, but there are quite a number of recipients under that age. As a matter of fact, over 4,000 are already on the roll who are under the age of 60. The war veterans allowance board has been very reasonable and lenient in considering these cases. I think it is important though to have this matter drawn to the attention of hon. members as the hon. member has done today. If instances occur where some member thinks that somebody requires attention and perhaps has not been getting it, I would ask the member to write me a letter about the matter and remind me of it again, if he does not get an immediate answer, and we will see that something is done.

Miscellaneous payments—

465. Burials and memorials, $1,435,500.

Mr. Carter: Having had the privilege of visiting the memorials at Vimy and Beaumont-Hamel last July, I should like to take this opportunity to place on record my appreciation of the work that is being done by the department in caring for our memorials and graves of our war dead. I had the opportunity of seeing this at first hand and I was much impressed by what I saw. I am sure that parents, other relatives and friends who have loved ones resting over there will be very pleased to know that these graves are being cared for so well.

I should also like to take this opportunity to pay a special tribute to Mr. Allan Chambers, who also looked after the arrangements for the visit to the memorials, for the splendid work he is doing in this regard.

Canadian pension commission—

468. Administration expenses, $2,693,268.

Mr. Carter: I have only one question which arises out of a case that came to my attention a short time ago. What is the policy with respect to a veteran who may have been deprived of benefits because of a wrong diagnosis on the part of the D.V.A. medical board that happened to examine the veteran? I have heard of a case where a wrong diagnosis was made on two occasions. On one occasion one diagnosis was made and 10 per cent disability was granted. On another occasion another diagnosis was made and 60 per cent disability was granted. On still another occasion the diagnosis was entirely different and 100 per cent disability was granted. Nothing in the veteran's condition had altered from the beginning to the end. The person was totally disabled right from the beginning and had to employ an attendant. It took several years before the board actually made the correct diagnosis and awarded 100 per cent disability and an allowance for the attendant as well. Is it the policy of the department to reimburse veterans for losses they have incurred as a result of faulty diagnoses?

Mr. Churchill: In some instances the pension has been paid retroactively. The problem of diagnosis admittedly is difficult and I presume there are differences of opinion in that regard. However, the re-examination of anyone who is in doubt is always possible under the pension commission. The commission stands ready to assist in matters of this kind. If a veteran feels that on re-examination his case might be diagnosed somewhat differently, I presume it is perfectly all right for him to seek re-examination. In some instances but not in all the pension would be retroactive.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the vote carries I should like to mention something to the minister that came to my notice a few months ago. If a pensioner dies before the date in the month when the cheque has been received, the cheque for that month or part of the month that the pensioner was still alive cannot be cashed, naturally, but there is no payment made to the estate except on application and by grace. In the particular case to which I am referring this really did not matter at all, but it seems to me that there could be many cases where it would be really quite important that the pension should be paid. In my opinion it seems only reasonable and surely it was the intent of parliament that a pension that has been granted should be paid up to the date of the death of the person, even though it is only a fraction of a month. I do not know whether it is the law or whether it is merely a regulation but it does seem to me that this is something which might well be tidied up, not retroactively but for the future.

Mr. Churchill: I was under the impression that was under control but we will look into the matter. My information is that the pension is payable up to the end of the month in which the person died. The head of the pension commission is here and is listening attentively. The matter will be looked into.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Jones: May I, on behalf of the minister, thank the committee for their courtesy and the speed with which these estimates have been considered.

The Deputy Chairman: I have before me the supplementary estimates for the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

548. Departmental administration including Canada's share of the expenses of the "resources for tomorrow" conference—further amount required, $31,334.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is the departmental administration item, and before it carries I should like to ask the minister if he would give a fuller explanation than he gave the Leader of the Opposition the other day as to why it is taking such a tremendously long time for the government to make up its mind what it is going to do about the Red river floodway in Manitoba?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Chairman, I think the passage of time in respect of these matters is a matter of relativity. As a matter of fact the Winnipeg floodway project has been under discussion since about the year 1950 when the disaster flood occurred in the city of Winnipeg. As a Manitoban I was very much aware of the nature of the disaster that occurred even though my own city of Brandon was not affected directly by the flood. We did, at that time, feel the full impact of the refugee situation that was generated by the flood.

In the past decade there has been a continuing discussion as to how this recurring disaster to the city of Winnipeg might be dealt with, and it is only in recent years, since 1959 as a matter of fact, that a decision has been made to proceed with the Winnipeg floodway which was proposed by the fact-finding committee set up at the time of the disaster. I believe considerable progress has been made on this matter. There is a joint committee of engineers representing the provincial government and our own federal government which has been working on the matter since last spring. They have made considerable progress in considering the engineering problems that arise in connection with a project as extensive as this one. Only in the past few days information has become available in this regard.

As to the matter of sharing the costs, we have had continuing discussions and negotiations on this important point. We have almost reached the point of agreement, but a special problem arose in this connection because, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate knows full well, this is an international river which rises south of the border. It cannot be regarded, therefore, as one which comes directly within the terms of the Canada Water Conservation Act which would be the act which would normally apply. This has meant that a special formula has to be worked out, and it is upon this problem we are working at the moment. As I indicated in reply to the Leader of the Opposition the other day, the discussions are proceeding very happily and we hope to make an announcement very shortly.

Mr. Pickersgill: I read the Winnipeg newspapers and I suppose, like time, happiness is also a relative matter. I think perhaps the minister may be happier than the people with whom he is negotiating in Manitoba because the impression one gets from reading these newspapers is that the provincial government is anything but happy with the niggardly way they are being treated by the treasury, as compared with what they were led to expect before March 31, 1958. However, this is not the time to go into that subject.

In order to save time going into the matter on the next item, I should like to ask the minister on this item whether or not the department has in contemplation any special winter works program for national parks, such as it had last year?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we feel that there is a very strong necessity to continue our winter works program much along the same line as we have followed during recent years. This arises particularly from the tremendous upsurge in the numbers of people using the parks. We have preliminary statistics on tourism during the past summer which indicate that there is at least a 15 per cent increase across the board. Our parks have been packed to capacity. We have campsite extension programs under way in almost every one of the national parks and we hope to continue these works under the winter works program during the forthcoming winter.

Mr. Pugh: I should like to ask a question with regard to Rogers pass, having recently come over the route. I find that the federal government has practically completed their portion—that is the part in the national park —of the highway. But as you move eastward a very different story unfolds. You hit the province of British Columbia's part and at that stage it is not so good. I was wondering whether the minister could advise us if a date has been set for the opening of the highway. I should also like to ask what facilities will be available for the travelling public in the nature of camp sites and places to stop over night actually within the park limit.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Mr. Dinsdale: I am glad the hon. member raised this point, Mr. Chairman. I have been quite concerned with the importance of the progress on the road through the Rogers pass, particularly in view of the fact that an important international fair gets under way in Seattle next year. This will be one of the main access routes to that fair. We think it will have a significant bearing on our tourist potential in that area.

As to the progress on the part of the highway through the national park, may I say this. We are giving special attention to this section. The hon. member will realize, of course, that this is the only section of the highway for which I have direct responsibility. However, we are hoping that it will be completed for use next summer, which would suggest that we could have an official opening ceremony some time in the early spring. We are fully aware of the situation. I am glad to have had this opportunity to bring the members of the committee up to date on the progress being made.

Mr. Pugh: I should like to ask a supplementary question while we are on this point. When I came down this fall I took the opportunity to drive through the park. The reason I am pressing this matter a little further, Mr. Chairman, in asking the minister if he knows the intention of the provincial government as to when they are going to open their portion is that work on the provincial portion of the road, to my own way of thinking, is so far behind that it will be practically impossible to open the road next year. I am wondering whether there is any correspondence on file in the minister's office from the provincial government in regard to their portion of the road.

Mr. Dinsdale: This is the trans-Canada highway, of course; and, as such it comes under the responsibility of the Department of Public Works. I shall be happy to consult my colleague the Minister of Public Works and bring this query to his attention.

Mr. Pugh: I have just one further question. Have we a budget for expenditures on campsites within the park limits for next year?

Mr. Dinsdale: I am sorry I neglected to answer that part of the hon. member's question. As he no doubt knows, the policy with regard to the construction of campsites and picnic sites along the trans-Canada highway is to have a picnic site every 50 miles and a campsite every one hundred miles. This policy will apply to the entire length of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Pugh: There is just one further matter. I hate to keep on pressing these things.

Having cleared up all the questions, may I say to the minister that I hope he will give heavy publicity to this Rogers pass route. It is a beautiful route through the Canadian rockies.

Mr. Chevrier: There is just one question I should like to ask the minister. It comes under another vote in the supplementaries but I think I could ask it under vote 548. I raised it when the estimates of the Department of External Affairs were under consideration but I was not given a satisfactory answer. It has to do with the water levels at the port of Montreal, a matter which is a very serious one for that city. As the minister knows, there is a board of control. I think the chairman of that board of control is one of his officers. Can the minister tell me what is being done to provide the port of Montreal with a sufficient amount of water to take the kind of ships that it has been in the habit of taking? I refer to deep sea vessels. What provision is his department making to protect the down stream levels at Montreal?

Mr. Dinsdale: This problem became a matter for consideration early in the year, as the hon. member will recall. At that time my department was consulted because of its responsibility in the field of water resources and one of our experts was assigned to the task of dealing with this difficulty. I must confess that I have not been in touch with the activities of this particular branch in the past week or so. If I can assist the hon. member I should be happy to send him a letter which provides up to date information as to where the matter stands.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder whether I could just leave the matter this way so as not to delay the passage of the item. This is a matter of vital concern not only to the port of Montreal but to downstream interests. It is also a matter of vital concern to upstream interests. I am sure that the officers in question are doing their utmost, and that particularly the officer in the minister's department having to do with water resources is doing his utmost to put into effect a plan which will be satisfactory to all concerned. It so happens, however, that the plan is not satisfactory to all concerned and that it is causing grave prejudice to the rights to water resources first, for domestic and sanitary purposes and second, for navigation. These are the two branches as set out in the order of approval of the international joint commission. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister and I ask him to see to it that there is put into effect a plan which will not in any way prejudice the downstream interests on the St. Lawrence river.

Item agreed to.

Northwest Territories and other field services—

555. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $1,317,300.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 555 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before it carries, may I say that this is a fairly big vote for a supplementary one. I looked in the explanatory material at the back and found that it is just a repetition of what is here. It seems to me that if we are going to vote $1⅓ million, we ought to know a little bit more than we are told there.

Mr. Pugh: Consult C. D. Howe.

Mr. Pickersgill: Unfortunately he is not available at the moment.

An hon. Member: He might be to you.

Mr. Dinsdale: As the general statement in connection with this vote indicates, it is for the construction or acquisition of buildings, works, lands and equipment relating to the Northwest Territories and other field services. If I were to itemize each of the matters under this vote, I think perhaps it might take too much of the time of the committee. Perhaps it would be satisfactory if I indicate that a large part of this vote will be applied to the development work that will be undertaken at Frobisher bay during the coming year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has that work gone on a little bit faster than was expected or was there a bad estimate earlier in the year?

Mr. Dinsdale: The reason for the substantial supplementary estimate arises from the fact that the decision to proceed with this development has taken place since the main estimates were considered.

Mr. Pickersgill: I congratulate the minister on one decision made by the present government.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the supplementary estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

582. Exhibitions branch—further amount required, $307,050.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I notice that this item is for exhibitions. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance could tell us whether any part of this vote is for the travels of the present minister, under the item "exhibitions".

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman may be quite satisfied that such is not the case.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the supplementary estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Auditor General's office—

41. Salaries and expenses of office, $1,115,400.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think the parliamentary secretary should be allowed to say a word. Could he explain the large increase in the vote this year.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The increase is largely due to an increase in the establishment from 141 to 159, or a total addition of 18 personnel. This is due to the addition of six auditors 6, four auditors 5, one auditor 4, six auditors 3, and five auditors 2; less four auditor 1 positions which have been abolished.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the parliamentary secretary say whether this very considerable increase in the cost of auditing is directly related to the phenomenal rise in the total government expenditures over the last four years.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Of course, Mr. Chairman. I would not agree entirely with the hon. member when he suggests anything phenomenal in the increase. It has been in accordance with the efficiency of the service which has been provided to the public of Canada. Of course when those services increase, as they have, the audit costs also rise. This has been in accordance with a study which has been undertaken by the public accounts committee. This committee has seen what the Auditor General has been doing, and I think the public accounts committee has been entirely satisfied that this is desirable.

Item agreed to.

Insurance—

164. Departmental administration, $783,123.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary has any comment to make on this item.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have no special comment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: Is there any intention of amending the Insurance Act?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There were, of course, amendments considered this year to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and the Foreign Insurance Companies Act. These amendments are of very considerable significance, as the hon. gentleman from Laurier knows. I am not aware of any immediate intention with respect to the Department of Insurance Act itself.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one question I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary. Does this department cost the treasury a five cent piece, net? I know we have to vote money because of the antiquated way we have of keeping our public accounts; but is this branch of the government entirely self-supporting?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman is entirely correct. This is charged back on an assessment basis against the companies which are licensed or registered. I think there is no net cost to the government of Canada with respect to this vote, except for the Civil Service Insurance Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is there any profit made?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No, I do not think so.

Item agreed to.

LEGISLATION

The Speaker of the Senate—

190. Allowance in lieu of residence, $3,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, it has been the practice in the past—and I would not want to depart from it—to allow these estimates to go through without any discussion. It is certainly not my intention to hold them up, but perhaps the committee would allow me to just say a word in connection with the manner in which the Speaker has dealt with many of the representations which have been made to him from time to time by those of us who sit on this side of the chamber. I have reference now to not only the secretaries and the stenographers who look after our work, but to others as well.

I know it has not been possible for the Speaker to do everything he has wanted to do, but he has always been kind and considerate in his approach to the problems which we on this side of the chamber have brought to his attention. May I just add this, sir, and I will resume my seat.

As the Speaker knows, always during the period of recess some of the secretaries and stenographers are without work. In this instance, it is not going to be too long until we meet again; it will only be a matter of two months because I understand there will be a new session of parliament in early December. It has been brought to my attention that because of the hardship that is being felt by some of these persons the Speaker might wish to give consideration to allowing them to stay on for that short period of time. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether consideration could be given to that matter.

Mr. Jung: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words, following the remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken, regarding the secretaries of the House of Commons. In so doing, I am sure hon. members will agree that they are all hard working and loyal, and that they deserve even greater recognition. It is therefore my intention to bring to the attention of the committee certain suggestions which I hope will not only improve their working conditions but will also help the members of parliament in the discharge of their responsibilities.

No doubt there will be some hon. members who will greet my suggestions with the reply that this is the way it has always been done. I do not have the advantage of knowing what conditions existed when we were in opposition, so I base my remarks purely on my own experience since I was elected in 1957.

When I first came to Ottawa, Mr. Chairman, I was under the impression that parliament at the most sat for six or seven months out of each year. Those who were employed as secretaries to the members of parliament understood, therefore, that there would be a period of five or six months when they would not be employed by parliament and that it would be their own responsibility to find other employment or just take a holiday. For a long time we had a considerable number of married women on the staff who found this arrangement quite satisfactory because it enabled them to supplement the family income and during the adjournment they were able to spend a few months at home.

I believe the situation has now changed and that a very large number of single girls are now employed who, as the hon. member for Laurier said, because of the irregular pattern of the sessions of parliament find it extremely difficult to make plans for other employment. Under the best of circumstances, when our secretaries go to the civil service to look for other employment during the recess or adjournment they take a considerable cut in pay, even though because of the experience they have received in the House of Commons they are given greater responsibility than other girls in the civil service with whom they work.

I can understand the reluctance of the civil service to employ secretaries from parliament hill because they can in no way be considered permanent employees. But even so, the girls who need work do not object too strenuously to this arrangement because there is at least other employment.

However, in these last two sessions of parliament more secretaries have experienced difficulty in finding work with the civil service because the recess and the adjournment have been so short that the civil service did not even want to hire them. It may be answered, Mr. Chairman, that these girls can draw unemployment insurance, but I have received a number of complaints from secretaries who filed their claim on the day parliament went into recess last July but who had to wait almost a month before they received their first unemployment insurance cheque. I wrote to the Minister of Labour about this, and after he looked into the situation, he confirmed that some benefit payments had been delayed because the records of contribution had not been forwarded to the local unemployment insurance commission office. Surely, we have had enough experience with recesses and adjournments that a secretary need not suffer any embarrassment caused by waiting for her unemployment insurance. In this connection I have been assured by the Minister of Labour that a close watch will be kept on the situation so that it will not happen again.

The argument has been put forward that the rates of pay for the secretaries of the House of Commons are deliberately fixed higher than those received by other secretaries working for private firms so that they are compensated somewhat for periods of unemployment. I suggest that this is unfair, because no matter what salary you give to our secretaries they only receive that rate for the number of months during which they are employed, and the extra salary they receive in no way compensates for the months during which they are unemployed; neither does it help to make up the salary which they receive during the adjournment from the civil service to the level of the remuneration which they receive when working in the House of Commons. At the same time, there might be some secretaries who are not as highly qualified as we would like them to be, or according to civil service standards, but that is the fault of the member of parliament for hiring her and not the fault of the girl.

It has also been said that these secretaries do not have to work in the House of Commons if they are dissatisfied with the conditions. I feel that this statement is not quite fair, because these girls would be the first to admit that they enjoy their work here, and surely we should not take advantage of their desire to work for us. None of us has to be here, but we are here because we want to be here. If we find a girl who is a topnotch secretary we want to keep her, but unless we can offer her better working conditions I am very much afraid that they will be forced through economic reasons to look for employment elsewhere. We all realize that it takes a long time to train a secretary so that she becomes familiar with your own work, and that is another reason why we should make it attractive for her to stay on at the House of Commons.

I repeat that under ordinary circumstances and with shorter sessions, the problem of secretaries would not be as great. However, with longer sessions the problem is very urgent. Lest it be thought that I am thinking only of the welfare of the secretaries, let me emphasize that I am also concerned with the efficiency of the members of parliament in the discharge of their duties, and our efficiency is lessened by not having our secretaries available for work during our evening sessions; by not having secretaries during the recess and adjournment, and by not having dictating machines so that we can put work on tape for our secretaries. I am sure that all of us recall the earlier part of this session when many were attending committee meetings which started at 9 or 9.30 a.m., and then going to the House of Commons at 11 a.m. If we spent all our time sitting in the house, which did not rise until 10.30 p.m., there was no time left to look after our correspondence. If we had dictating machines, many of us could do a lot of work in the evenings, particularly when we sit from 7.30 p.m. to 10.30 p.m., when the secretaries have gone home.

We have now reached a stage where the government has recognized that it is in the interest of greater efficiency that each member of parliament should have his own secretary. This is a very recent move but I think that it recognizes that improvements were overdue. I suggest we should now carry these changes one step further by granting to each member of parliament an allowance for a secretary who would be on a full time basis, which allowance would also be sufficient to cover her travel expenses to and from the House of Commons from her home. It would then be up to the member to decide if he wants to employ her only when the house is in session or if he also wants her to work in his own constituency. There might be a danger of different salaries being offered by individual members of parliament but I think a standard contract could be worked out. I also think the member of parliament should still have the privilege of recommending a girl for employment as his secretary, although the House of Commons would do the actual hiring.

I think that by having a secretary on a full time basis, we would have greater efficiency and continuity. I am sure hon. members will appreciate how difficult it is to get any work done while the house is in recess or while it is adjourned, and if you do not have a secretary in your own office, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to make any replies or do any work satisfactorily.

I think we should also bring the salary range into line with those received by secretaries assigned to the other place. For example, a secretary to a member of parliament must wait five full sessions before she reaches the maximum rate of pay. Secretaries in the other place, however, reach their full maximum after only three sessions. In my opinion, secretaries in the House of Commons work a great deal harder and are under much greater pressure, and I see no reason why there should be this disparity.

The government of Canada is the biggest business in the country. Surely we can apply good business methods of administration to running this colossal undertaking. In my discussions back home I have pointed out some of the problems facing members of parliament, and I always received the classic answer "You are in power now, why don't you do something about it?" I believe that by assigning a secretary to each member of parliament the government recognizes the need of some improvement. I think the suggestions I have made are consistent steps, and if sessions keep up the way they do then I suggest it is time we consider parliament being placed on a full year basis at it is in England.

Certainly, I personally find that because of the nature of the present sessions, my law practice in Vancouver is completely lost and so I might as well devote my time to politics. And if I am to devote my full time to politics, I may as well become a professional in this field, because government is now so complex that it is no place for amateurs. We no longer dabble in politics as if it were a hobby. We work very hard at it.

I think that if the government were to implement my suggestions, the over-all cost of administration would not be great. The secretaries would be much happier; their morale would increase considerably and, equally important, I think the work output for each member of parliament would reflect this increased efficiency.

198. General administration—estimates of the Clerk, $2,215,340.

Mr. Speaker: So that I shall not lose entierly this single opportunity of the year to speak from the floor of the house, I want to thank the hon. member for Laurier for his very generous reference to my administration of the staff of the House of Commons. I also wish to thank the other members who have spoken for their very constructive suggestions which it will be of great pleasure to take into account and bring before the commissioners of internal economy, particularly at this time when consideration is being given to new estimates and an opportunity is available to make good some of the deficiencies.

The administrative responsibilities are substantial, but I have enjoyed the assistance of a very competent staff. I should like to thank them and to pay my tribute to the Clerk of the house and to his assistants, to the Sergeant-at-Arms, to the legislative council and to all the chiefs of the various branches of the house and their respective staffs.

The continuous staff are, I think, particularly badly off because in this unusual session perhaps they have not received the compensation which would make good to them the extra time they put in when the house sits for long hours over many months, inasmuch as such compensation is not adequate for the pattern which this particular session has taken. A good deal of thought has been given and is being given to what alternatives are possible not only for the continuous staff but for the sessional staff to which the hon. member for Laurier and, as well, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre made reference. It is true that many of those who work here sessionally do it by preference because they like part-time work; but there are many others who are working sessionally who are dependent upon their earnings for their livelihood. How to meet that difficulty is a problem. If sessions are to be as long as this one, we suggest that perhaps when we are sitting most of the year consideration might be given to an annual rate. It is true that the sessional rate has been rather better than the normal rate because of the disadvantage of a period of recess.

Various alternatives are being presented. One alternative proposed is for parliament to adopt the procedure of sitting at regular times so that those who work in parliament will know when they will be employed and when they will not. Another alternative suggested for consideration is that of an annual rate. With respect to stenographers, another suggestion is that an allowance might be made to members which will enable them to supply themselves with stenographic service the year round.

In any event, I think hon. members will agree that during the latter part of this session we have improved the service to the extent that every member who required stenographic service has been able to receive it.

I do not want to break the rules myself.

Mr. Chevrier: No one would dare call you to order.

Mr. Speaker: I do appreciate the things that have been said and the helpful suggestions that have been made.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pallett: I wonder whether the permission of the house could be given at this stage for the preparation of the order paper with respect to divorce bills so that they will appear next Tuesday as separate items. I believe the arrangement was made when the notice was given by the hon. member for Halifax who, as we all know, is at an international conference. On his behalf I would ask that this arrangement be made with respect to the order paper for next Tuesday.

Mr. Pickersgill: I see no objection to that.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house then accept this as notice in accordance with its previous order?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pallett: They could be separated for Monday in the event that we arrived at that position; I do not think it is possible.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed that the divorce bills be printed in total in the order paper for Monday and the following days?

Mr. Chevrier: In the light of what has happened today, and of the progress made, I think we were well advised to sit on Saturday. Will the leader of the house give an indication of what the business will be from now until the end of the session?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, again I should like to thank the house for the expedition and the care with which it dealt with estimates today.

We have now left for the consideration of the house Bill No. C-131, which deals with fitness and amateur sport. This will be the first item to be called on Monday; then, Bill No. C-126, dealing with the so-called Pine Point railway. This will be called as the second item on Monday.

The remainder of the business would be Bill No. C-122 with regard to tax collection agreements between the government of Canada and the provinces; the estimates of the Department of Finance and the remaining estimates of the Department of Transport.

Business of the House

For Monday I would propose to call the two bills I have mentioned, the fitness bill and the Pine Point railway bill and then, during the course of the day, determine the situation because we have to take into account this problem of the divorce bills, and the time that may be required by the other house to give its consideration to four measures which will likely reach it by Monday night, namely the centennial bill, the civil service bill and the two that we will be dealing with on Monday. Therefore it is difficult to determine at this moment what time will be required for winding up the business of the House of Commons. It looks now as if on Tuesday night parliament will be finished.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it that there will be no other legislation over and above the three measures to which the minister has made reference.

Mr. Churchill: Unless something untoward occurs between now and Monday I do not foresee any other legislative items.

It being ten minutes past six o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, September 25, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. REGNIER—PROTEST AGAINST PROCEDURE RESPECTING BILL NO. C-129

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege on the ground that as the result of an irregularity in our proceedings, irreparable damage may be done. The other place will be meeting tonight, and unless I am allowed to raise my objection now the other place may have to deal with legislation that is not legally and effectively before them through an irregularity in our proceedings. The other place is being convened earlier than was planned this week. I am asking Your Honour that I be heard now. My argument will be brief. First I should like to read the proceedings as recorded in Hansard of September 18.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made a request which is not within my power to grant. He refers to the irregularity of our proceedings as the basis for his request. He raised a similar objection the other day. From what he said at that time I saw no irregularity and I have not seen any upon further review of what took place. As I indicated, the hon. member was unfortunate in missing the opportunity to speak on the bill on second reading, and he could not expect to be heard now except by unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. Regnier: With respect, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. Last Thursday I was not allowed to complete my argument. The last words I uttered were "In addition". I was told to sit down and out of deference, Mr. Speaker, I followed your instructions. I was not allowed to make a full argument on my point of privilege last Thursday. I am a member of parliament and I represent minorities in western Canada. I insist that I have the full freedom which my mandate allows to a member of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member indicate the page to which he refers?

Mr. Regnier: I refer to page 8502 of Hansard. The part of the proceedings recorded on that page that I wish to read is as follows. It starts at the middle of the page:

> Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Chown in the chair.
>
> Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.
>
> Schedules A, B and C agreed to.
>
> Preamble agreed to.
>
> Title agreed to.
>
> Bill reported.
>
> Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time; now?
> Mr. Pickersgill: Now, by leave.

I do not think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) has the power of attorney to speak for the whole house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Regnier: No question was put to the house asking for unanimous consent. This is the irregularity of which I complain, Mr. Speaker. Just a simple reading of the record, without doing violence to the English language, would prove my point.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the hon. member to say that he had been prevented from speaking. However, in what he refers me to I see nothing which indicates that he was even present.

Mr. Winch: I should like to raise a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Regnier: Have I the floor, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I am afraid the hon. member cannot expect the house to interrupt its proceedings in order to hear him make comments now which there was an opportunity to make when the bill was before the house. It would be disruptive to our proceedings to allow any member who felt that he had not said all he wished to say, or had not been given a full opportunity to do so, or who happened to miss the proceedings, to intervene at another stage and make his speech again or add to it. I think the hon. member will appreciate that fact. He has indicated his interest by raising the point. However, I am afraid that is as far as the matter can go.

Mr. Regnier: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker—

Questions of Privilege

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Before the hon. member for Vancouver East raises another question of privilege, and since the hon. member for St. Boniface was allowed to read a good deal of the record of September 18, I should like to read the lines he left out.

Mr. Pallett: What page?

Mr. Pickersgill: This is the same page, 8502. He read:

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time; now?

Then I am reported as saying this. I happened to be the senior person on the front bench on this side of the house at that time, and this was a perfectly normal procedure:

Now, by leave.

Then the record reads:

Mr. Balcer moved the third reading of the bill.

I think the record should be complete.

MR. WINCH—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN CALGARY "HERALD"

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning an hon. member of this house. My question of privilege is based on an article in the Calgary Herald of Friday, September 22 where, as is understandable, there is a report on the death of William Duncan Herridge. The report states:

Outspoken diplomat dies at 73.

It points out that this man was a wealthy Ottawa lawyer, diplomat and brother in law of a former prime minister. It goes on to say how he was considered as a leader of the Conservative party. That I do not challenge at all, but I do draw to the attention of the house the fact that in the Calgary Herald, where all these statements are made, the picture is that of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge).

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Mr. Winch: I should like to say that the hon. member for Kootenay West, who is the deputy leader of this group in the house and a national council member of the New Democratic party, is alive; that he is alive physically, mentally and politically, and will continue his constructive contributions for many years in this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure all hon. members of the house will be relieved.

[Mr. Regnier.]

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—PROVISION OF AIR TRANSPORTATION AND MAINTENANCE PERSONNEL

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the recent outbreaks of violence in the Congo a serious shortage of internal air transportation and maintenance personnel has developed. This matter was brought to the attention of the various countries concerned by the United Nations secretariat at a special meeting on September 20, when a general request was made for any assistance possible. This request was further amplified on September 22, when more details were furnished as to the exact requirements.

On September 23 the government agreed to provide assistance, and appropriate orders were issued. Two C-119 aircraft of 436 squadron, R.C.A.F., Downsview, left their base at 9.14 and 10.44 on the morning of Sunday, September 24. A C-130B and North Star were also despatched to carry the personnel and extra stores, spare parts, etc., required. These two latter aircraft will return from the Congo immediately they have delivered their cargoes.

Over and above the C-119 detachment, 12 highly qualified supervisory technicians have been provided to assist the United Nations Congo maintenance organization. The entire detachment and supervisors, totalling approximately 80 all ranks, should be in position in the Congo by 7.40 Congo time, Tuesday evening, September 26.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

COST OF PINE TREE RADAR STATIONS

Motion No. 162—Mr. Hellyer:

For a copy of the Department of National Defence working paper showing the derivation of figures used by the minister in respect to the additional costs to Canada as a result of Canada taking over the operation and maintenance of certain Pine Tree radar stations from the United States air force.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Such working papers prepared by civil servants or by service personnel for the guidance of departmental officials are, and always have been, considered privileged documents. I must therefore refuse to accept this motion as presently worded. The last time this matter came up was on February 27, when the house refused a similar motion.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister make the point of order that the matter has been disposed of by the house?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I make the point that exactly the same matter was disposed of by the house, though in connection with another department, on February 27 when a motion was made by the hon. member for Assiniboia for papers of this kind in connection with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. The minister stated that these papers—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I think the hon. gentleman will agree that although that was a similar motion it was not an identical motion, and the circumstances would therefore not prevent the hon. member who wishes to move for these papers from having the question put before the house.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Hellyer) which was negatived on the following division:

CHIGNECTO CANAL SURVEY

Motion No. 163—Mr. McWilliam:

For a copy of all communications received by the Minister of Public Works and/or any official of his department, since July 1, 1961, in connection with the survey of the proposed Chignecto canal, together with a copy of the reply to each communication.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I accept the motion, Mr. Speaker, subject to the usual reservations about the production of privileged documents and communications with the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion pass subject to the reservations announced by the minister?

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO RETURN OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether the story which was heard on C.B.C. "News Round-up" this morning to the effect that the Minister of Finance is being summoned back to Canada from Rome is correct.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the other day a question was raised, I do not know by which hon. member opposite, as to whether the ministers who were participating in the Accra conference would be returning to the house soon. At that time it was expected that the house would be sitting somewhat longer than present anticipations would lead one to believe, in view of the progress that has been made. I discussed the matter with the Minister of Finance and in order to carry out the understanding given to the house I suggested that it might be well for him to be here to answer any questions directed specifically to him, and in particular to pilot through the house the legislation in connection with fiscal matters which it now seems will be available for consideration by the house on Tuesday or Wednesday. There is no question about directing him to return. It was simply pointed out that because of the unusual co-operation of the opposition, the house was proceeding to get its business done with a celerity that has not really been characteristic in recent months.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister, in view of the happy mood in which he obviously is this morning. As the leader of the delegation, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is back in the house, does the Prime Minister not think that if the Minister of Finance were to extend his European tour there might be more progress made in the dispatch of public business at this time?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I suggest to the hon. member that he is the last member in this house who should speak about progress in the public business, because he does more than anyone else to interfere with that progress.

(Translation):

SECRETARY AT UNION NATIONALE CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Has he any comment to make about a report in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that his private secretary, Mr. Benoit Parent, attended the Union Nationale convention held in Quebec city Saturday, and does he think that a minister's secretary should identify himself with the Union Nationale in this manner?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member perhaps misconceives the nature of questions on orders of the day. They are supposed to relate to the administrative responsibilities of the government. The private affairs of employees of the minister or of his department, I would think, do not come within that category. If the hon. member does not agree with me I should be glad to hear what he has to say. However, it seems to me that this is not a question which is within the scope of those permissible.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I should like the minister to tell us whether it was with his approbation that his private secretary attended this rally.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I think this matter should be cleared up now. I myself learned of the presence of my assistant secretary at this convention on Saturday through reading the Globe and Mail this morning. If he went there he did so as a private citizen, of his own volition and without my approval or approbation. He worked here on Friday and left to go to Quebec city on Friday night. If he went, he went of his own volition.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—INQUIRY AS TO CONSULTATION PRECEDING MILITARY ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister in view of the fact that the Minister of National Defence made a statement this morning concerning additional aid granted by Canada in connection with the Congo operation, with which we all agree. In view of the situation in the Congo, may I ask whether any consultations were held with the United Nations secretariat before there was armed intervention in the province of Katanga?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must say that as I understand it, this question is not one of immediate importance. It has to do with something that allegedly took place in the past and, as such, I do not think it is a proper one for orders of the day. I suggest that the hon. member place his question on the order paper in the ordinary way.

DISARMAMENT—CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD SPEECH BY PRESIDENT KENNEDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statements made in this house on Saturday last by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the President of the United States would be addressing the United Nations today and making new proposals relative to disarmament, I should like to ask whether the Prime Minister also heard on the radio this morning that his government had received a preview of the speech which was to be made this morning. If so, in view of the prorogation of the house which is anticipated within two or three days, I should like to ask if he will find it possible to make a statement to the house on the government's attitude to the proposals relative to disarmament made to the United Nations I understand only this morning.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the house should await the speech by the President of the United States.

Mr. Winch: I understand you have it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If there are any questions, they can be asked at that time. As to Canada's stand on the question of disarmament, may I say that it has been stated over and over again. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has placed before the United Nations and elsewhere the policy of this government on that matter. But after the speech has been delivered, if the hon. gentleman has any questions in connection therewith I will endeavour to answer them.

TRADE

ACCRA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him whether, as the head of the Canadian delegation at Accra, he has a report to make to the house this morning.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will be looking forward, as I know my colleague the Minister of Finance will, to making a full report to the house. When he returns I look forward to reporting not only on the economic conference at Accra but also on my visit to five of our major markets in Europe. However, as the hon. member knows, the Minister of Finance will be back in this house tomorrow, and since we attended the Accra conference as a team I think it would be highly desirable that we both give our reports tomorrow. I can assure the hon. member, and all hon. members, that I will be glad then to answer any questions which may be directed to me.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question of the leader of the delegation. Would the minister put us in a proper mood to appreciate the statement to be made by the Minister of Finance tomorrow by providing us with the text of the speeches delivered by both distinguished gentlemen?

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad, as I know the Minister of Finance will, to outline what we said on behalf of Canada at this conference. As the hon. member no doubt knows, it is not considered correct procedure for ministers, when they return to the governments which they represent, and to their houses of parliament, to table the text of speeches delivered at the conference. However, as I say, we will be glad to inform the house of what we said and to answer any questions that might be asked.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he released a partial text of his speech to the United Press service.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I learned that a text that I used at the conference was mistakenly given to the press. There was no fault on anyone's part, but I did not direct that it should be given out nor did I give it to the press. However, I understand copies of the text did get into the hands of some press representatives.

Mr. McIlraith: In view of the fact that the text has been released to the press service, would the minister release the same text to the House of Commons?

Mr. Hees: I have always been of the belief that two mistakes do not make a thing correct. As I have said, by mistake the text was released to the Canadian Press representatives. I do not believe the hon. member would seriously suggest that I table in this house a document which it is not the custom of commonwealth representatives to table in their parliaments upon their return from such meetings.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that the minister expects the members of the House of Commons to treat this as another booboo on his part?

Mr. Hees: Coming from an expert in such matters, I am most interested to hear the hon. member's views on this subject.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I only wanted to ask one question. In view of what the minister has said, I should like to know whether the mistake was in releasing the text to the press or in what he said.

Mr. Hees: I think it is obvious. I think the hon. member will realize, when he hears the very lucid explanations that will be given to the house by my colleague the Minister of Finance and myself tomorrow, that the mistake that was made was in releasing the text to the press.

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he say whether the renegotiation has been concluded of what he earlier described as a firm contract for the sale of uranium to the United Kingdom? If so, can he report to the house?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, not yet, Mr. Speaker. While in London on Friday I talked about this matter with Sir Roger Makins, head of the British atomic energy authority, and suggested that we get together again just as soon as possible. He advised me that his schedule will keep him tied up for the next month. However, I hope it will be possible to continue these negotiations very soon after that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister see any possible terminal date in connection with these negotiations?

Mr. Hees: In a matter as complicated and as important as this, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to predict a terminal date with any degree of definiteness.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask another supplementary question. Does the minister still regard this as a firm contract?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I think we straightened that matter out a few weeks ago.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member's question, in asking for an opinion, is perhaps not in order.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether, since his return, his attention has been drawn to the fact that another uranium mine is shortly to be closed down because of the lack of any allocation under this contract.

Mr. Speaker: I do not see that the hon. member's question is a supplementary one. In any event, it seems to be opening up a line of argument rather than asking for information.

PRODUCTIVITY COUNCIL

OTTAWA MEETING—INQUIRY AS TO PRESS RELEASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister, who will recall that in our debates last week on unemployment there were questions about the further activities on the part of the productivity council. It was indicated by the Minister of Labour that they would meet today, but all that parliament was informed about was that they would discuss labour-management relations. There is some suggestion that as they meet today they will hold a unique press conference—

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question will he please ask it?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. My question is this. Has the Prime Minister become acquainted with the press release of the productivity council? Has he also become acquainted with a suggestion that the productivity council may meet not only with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to whom it is responsible, and the Minister of Labour but might also add another visit, namely to the Minister of Justice with a view to enlarging the amendments that were made to the Combines Investigation Act last year and under which, for export trade purposes—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Benidickson: —there might be a widening of the legislation. Is this the government's desire?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that question is so long and so complicated that it is not understandable. So far as the council is concerned, it will be convening today. I think it is to have a two day meeting. I am not acquainted with any press release that was made, and so I think that is as far as I can go.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF TERRITORIAL WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Now that Norway is reported to be following the example of Iceland and is attempting to enforce the 12 mile limit jurisdiction over its waters, can the minister report what progress is being made toward obtaining an international agreement in this regard?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to say at this time. In any case, it is a question which should be dealt with by my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT INTO FAILURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I should also like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. My question has to do with Mr. MacArthur's report on his investigation into the results of the fisheries failure in Newfoundland. Will the minister consider tabling Mr. MacArthur's report, preferably before the end of this session? If the report cannot be tabled before the session ends, will the minister consider making copies available to Newfoundland members at as early a date as possible?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I will do everything possible to keep Newfoundland members advised of what the situation is in Newfoundland as accurately as we can assess it.

SINCLAIR REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should also like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries, and ask him what progress is being made in the attempt to transform Dr. Sinclair's report on licence limitation on the west coast into policy and legislation and when we may expect such legislation to be presented to the house.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, this is a rather complicated matter which is engaging the time and interest of those in my department. We communicated with the people who are especially interested in this matter. Having had replies from most of them, an attempt is being made to devise a course of action which will be reasonably satisfactory to all concerned. I have nothing further to add at the moment. At a later date I hope I shall be able to report something to the house, but not during this session.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PINE TREE RADAR STATIONS—SAVING TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister say whether the taking over of certain Pine Tree radar stations from the United States air force by the Royal Canadian Air Force will result in an annual saving to the United States of approximately $50 million a year?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, naturally I cannot say what are the United States calculations as to the savings they may make through this action. All I can say is what I have already said; that is, what the cost to Canada will be. Those figures are already in the record, having been put there during the course of the debate on the estimates.

Mr. Hellyer: In view of the very considerable discrepancy between the figures given in the United States—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hellyer: —and those given by the minister here—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is obviously embarking upon a controversial statement rather than a supplementary question in search of information.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED EXPERIMENTAL USE OF CONCRETE TIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Notice of this question has been given to the minister. It has been reported that Canadian National Railways are experimenting with ties made of concrete which are imported from the United States. Is the minister in a position to say whether such experimentation is going on, and if so, why could not these ties be made in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister wishes to answer he may do so, but the same question has already been asked and answered, as the hon. member will see if he refers to the official report.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

SECTION 96A (2) INDIAN ACT—PROCLAMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to either the Secretary of State or the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. My question is based upon a question of mine which was made an order for return on September 13. I understand it is relatively easy to put the information together. I wonder whether either of these ministers could check to see what progress is being made to comply with the order, and have it tabled.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I had a report from my department this morning. The hon. member may think it is relatively simple, but that is not the information I get from the department. However, I am told that every effort is being made to procure the answer for the hon. member before the house closes.

Advisory Council on Sports

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—DISPOSITION OF MONEY FROM LAND SALE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether all the moneys paid by Dimensional Investments in respect to the Sarnia Indian reserve have now been disbursed either to the band funds or to the bank.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, all the moneys which were to be disbursed under the terms of the contract have been disbursed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the hon. lady say what funds there are that have not been disbursed, and what is their purpose?

Mrs. Fairclough: Speaking from memory, there is approximately $1 million which is either held in a trust fund under the terms of the contract or is held in the band funds. I presume that is the information the hon. member requires.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO FALL-OUT RESULTING FROM RECENT TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if any further readings with regard to radiation levels are available since the last Soviet union explosion took place.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the readings as a result of the last explosion, which took place on Thursday of last week, are not available as yet.

SPORTS

ESTABLISHMENT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL ON FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-131, to encourage fitness and amateur sport.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as was evident in the debate on the resolution, all parties have welcomed the initiative being taken through this bill. As President Kennedy has said of his country:

> The physical fitness of our citizens is a vital prerequisite to America's realization of its full potential as a nation, and to the opportunities of each individual citizen to make full and fruitful use of his capacities.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

No one, I am sure, will dispute that these words apply with equal force to Canada, or that the legislation now being introduced fills a long felt need.

In presenting these new proposals for the encouragement of fitness and amateur sport we are fully conscious of the fact that we are dealing with a complex and dynamic aspect of Canadian life on which there are widely varying views. Anyone familiar with this field will be aware of the broad range of activities involved, and of the problems to be faced in endeavouring to work out a sound and practical piece of legislation within which such a program can grow and develop in line with both present and future needs.

Even so, it is our view that the bill now before the house will offer an opportunity to achieve most of the things which have been advocated over the years by lay and professional leaders in the fields of fitness, recreation and amateur sport. But as I pointed out in speaking to the resolution, we would welcome any suggestions which would improve the program as now envisaged. Even in its final form this measure might have its shortcomings, which could become apparent as it comes into operation, and which could require amendments to be made from time to time in order to permit the achievement of its full intent.

Furthermore, we have recognized that the objectives of this program cannot be attained in a vacuum. They can only be reached through the network of recreational programs operated by public agencies as well as by the many non-governmental organizations devoted to fitness and amateur sport. We hope that with the full co-operation of professional leaders and volunteer workers it will be possible to add a new dimension to these activities throughout Canada.

I should like to pay a warm tribute to all those who for many years have been labouring actively in these fields. I hope they will regard this new legislation as the fulfilment of their faith and vision; for our expectation is that building on their efforts, this present initiative will furnish that new spark and that new dynamic leadership necessary to achieve a sound, broadly based and sustained effort all across the country. It is this type of pattern which unfortunately in the past seems to have eluded our grasp.

Hon. members will note that the legislation places considerable emphasis on assistance for amateur sport. We are all aware that in the case of professional sport, revenues are considerable, stemming not only from paid admissions but also from various sources such as television and radio. Amateur sport has, unfortunately, lacked the same degree of support. This has meant inadequate financing for the whole range of amateur athletics, as well as for programs specifically designed for fitness.

Obviously further financial aid is urgently required if existing services for the development of fitness and amateur sport are to be strengthened and extended. Our new program is aimed at fulfilling this requirement. With the assistance now proposed it is possible to foresee a whole new development with respect to sports events supported by federal and provincial governments. We would hope, too, that federal activities in relation to international and national programs would complement and supplement those of the provinces.

In this connection, we are very anxious to assist with joint projects organized and administered by the provinces on a basis that is acceptable to them. Certainly—and I want to make this abundantly clear—the dominion government will be most careful in respecting the rights of the provinces and of local governments in this field, for we are fully aware that if the program is to succeed it must enjoy the wholehearted support of the provinces and, through them, of municipal authorities as well as of local groups within the communities themselves.

There is one further point I would make in relation to the program's scope. The new undertaking will not be concerned solely with the gifted athlete who may be in a position to take part in national and international competitions. It will also be concerned with fitness and sports programs for the great mass of our population. Here I would stress that even the large sum being made available under this program represents but a small part of the total effort required to develop well balanced recreational activities across Canada.

In perusing this bill the house will naturally be interested in comparing its provisions with those of the national fitness act of 1943. Perhaps one or two comments would be helpful on this point. The most significant difference is the amount of financial support provided in the new legislation. The present act makes available the substantial sum of $5 million annually, or about 22 times the amount allocated for somewhat similar purposes under the former provision. I think there can be little doubt that the relatively small sum and the manner in which it was made available under the previous program tended to hamper the work of the then national physical fitness council.

In the years since the 1943 act was introduced, very considerable changes have taken place in Canada. Our population has increased from less than 12 million to over 18 million people. During the interval, provincial and local governments as well as sports groups and organizations have devoted a great deal of effort to the strengthening and extension of fitness and amateur sport programs.

Moreover, the climate of public opinion, as indicated in the many representations received by the dominion government, has changed considerably since the repeal of the former act. As I pointed out in discussing the resolution, there appears to be a growing awareness of the importance of fitness both to the individual and to the nation. Here an important factor has been the advent of new means of communication such as television. The fact that many sports activities are now brought into our homes—whether from another part of Canada or another part of the globe—has done much to stimulate the interest of Canadians in such activities.

Over and above this, Canadian participation in international competitive events is emerging as an important aspect of a growing spirit of nationhood. In the representations made to the government over the past few years, strong desire has been expressed to see government financial aid provided to assist our athletes in competition abroad.

Another distinction between the legislation before us today and the act of 1943 is that the amount of $5 million is set out as a statutory item to be provided each year. No fund is established, as was done under the former act. By making allocations available on a statutory basis the federal commitment will be clearly known, and it will thus be possible for the new advisory council to suggest projects and advise on priorities with the firm expectation that adequate funds will be available from year to year. Continuing commitments and major undertakings requiring a number of years to complete will have as much assurance of financial support as it is possible to give.

At the same time, the statutory approach will provide an important safeguard. Any amounts not expended in a fiscal year will lapse. This means, for example, that in the first few years, when expenditures may be —and I repeat, "may be"—somewhat lower while programs are getting under way, funds will not accumulate in a manner which might lead to a lack of concern for ensuring their careful expenditure.

A fourth important difference in the present legislation as compared with the former act relates to the council. The national physical fitness council established in 1943 was a body with executive authority. Under our new provisions the council will be advisory to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and expenditures will be subject to the usual government scrutiny and control. In following this approach we have, of course, looked to the experience gained through the advisory committee on vocational training, the advisory committee for rehabilitation of disabled persons, and the dominion council of health.

A fifth and final point of difference is the fact that the new program will place considerable emphasis on federal aid for national and international sports events.

To sum up, then, we believe we have now developed a program that is more comprehensive, better rounded, and more in keeping with the needs of the people of Canada than that which was formerly in force. In so doing we have tried to benefit from the mistakes of the past, and to lay the groundwork for an undertaking which will provide greater opportunity for harmonious growth in the future.

Turning to the specific objectives of the bill, the house will note that there is provision of assistance "for the promotion and development of Canadian participation in national and international amateur sport." An important aspect of this objective will be furnishing encouragement and assistance to Canada's more gifted athletes in national and international competitions, this to involve the co-operation of national sports organizations. In the past many Canadian athletes with real potential have not had an opportunity to develop to their fullest extent because of the lack of facilities and qualified coaching. Others have not found it possible to pursue amateur sports beyond local competitions even though they may have had the ability to enter national and international sports events. We would hope that when this program fully develops it will offer greater opportunities for persons with athletic ability to participate to the utmost in athletic pursuits of their choice.

In extending greater assistance to Canadian participation in international sporting events, we are merely doing what many other nations have done over the years, and we hope this will help assure a greater measure of parity for our athletes in relation to their fellow competitors from other countries. In taking this action we are also recognizing the fact that Canadians who compete in the Olympics, the British empire and commonwealth games, the Pan-American games and other international championship competitions are ambassadors of good will for Canada. In this connection it should be noted that support by the dominion government must carry with it a responsibility on the part of our athletes. Canada will expect them to exemplify the highest standards of sportsmanship on all occasions.

In developing a formula for federal aid with respect to international competitions, we shall need the advice of the agencies which organize such events, the Canadian Olympic Association, the British empire and commonwealth games association, and the Pan-American games committee. Other sports-governing bodies covering fields not included in these events are also concerned in Canadian participation abroad and these, together with the Canadian sports advisory council, will, I am sure, all have valuable suggestions on how federal support might be provided on an equitable basis. Here again is an area where the advice of the new national council will be of particular importance.

The new program will give major emphasis to promoting amateur sports and fitness for all our young people. Much of the development in this area has centered around community and school athletic programs and so comes within the jurisdiction of provincial and municipal governments. Accordingly we shall be looking to the provinces for suggestions and guidance in this field. Having in mind the valuable experience we have already had in working with provincial authorities under programs such as the national health grants, vocational training and vocational rehabilitation, I have no doubt it will be possible to work out mutually satisfactory arrangements without much difficulty.

In promoting wider participation in amateur sport and recreation, there is a need for more facilities of both the indoor and outdoor variety. Here the federal government plans to move forward in a number of ways to assist with expansion and development.

I might mention, first, that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is continuing to give considerable attention to the expansion of recreational facilities in national parks. Second, there is the important federal contribution being made through the municipal winter works program in the construction of recreational facilities across Canada. Through the co-operative effort of the various levels of government, the Department of Labour can approve projects covering the construction of community rinks, community swimming pools and playgrounds, stadia and playing fields, as well as other recreational facilities. In the last fiscal year outlays under this program amounted to some $15 million, of which the federal treasury paid $3,800,000 for parks, playgrounds and other recreational facilities. Thus while the main objective of the winter works program is to provide useful employment for persons out of work, it has also had as an important by-product the increase in community recreational facilities across Canada. Incidentally, in these projects alone some 11,000 individuals were employed last year.

A further impetus to the development of such facilities will be afforded by the program we are now discussing. Among other things, it is hoped that this new effort will make it possible to develop some fitness and amateur sport facilities at the federal and provincial level through which courses for coaches and other leaders can be provided. In this connection we plan to seek suggestions from the national advisory council.

Speaking of courses for coaches and other leaders, hon. members will note the bill's provisions for the training of personnel. The emphasis on coaches is deliberate, because we are convinced that if we are to assist young Canadians effectively to discover and develop their capabilities, the number of competent coaches must be increased many times. We believe the potential athletic ability of our young people to be second to none in the world, but it is obvious that they have been handicapped by the lack of opportunities to obtain the proper training. While we cannot expect results overnight, there is every reason to believe that over a period, very satisfactory progress can be made.

Another area in which assistance could be given would be in relieving the shortage of suitably trained persons. As outlined in the bill, this objective may be met through the provision of bursaries and fellowships to provide for graduate training for professional personnel needed in fitness and amateur sports activities. I would also emphasize the importance of voluntary personnel. In a people's program such as we hope this will be, the extensive use of voluntary leadership is essential. One of the major problems for consideration, therefore, will be the ways and means by which progress can be furthered in this area.

A further objective of the new program will be the undertaking or assisting in research or surveys in respect to fitness and amateur sport. Here we have endeavoured to make provision for a variety of projects. For example, there has been a recurring demand for the inventory type of survey of recreational services, facilities and personnel. Many provinces may wish to assess their existing services, facilities and their personnel needs as a part of the long term development of their programs. In all likelihood surveys of this type will receive considerable prominence in the early stages of the new program. In such research projects there would also be a place for studies related to the development of standards.

Another research area in need of financial aid is fitness. Much remains to be learned of the extent to which fitness depends on the mechanical and functional efficiency of the body. The rapid advances in physiology made possible by recent developments in electronic, biochemical and photographic instruments of research have opened up new avenues of investigation. In March of this year the Canadian Medical Association and the Canadian association for health, physical education and recreation held a joint conference on physical fitness. The research personnel attending this meeting included physiologists, neurologists, biochemists, cardiologists, medical doctors, and physical educators qualified to conduct research. Their discussions indicated many gaps in our present knowledge and pointed to the fact that research should be undertaken on the following general problems:

Collection of precise anthropometric data on Canadian school children of all ages in different provinces and information on the combined effect of growth and exercise on stature, weight, muscular and skeletal development.

Measurement of the physical working capacity of representative sections of the Canadian population, both for accurate comparison with data from other countries and to enable changes over the course of years to be observed and measured.

Study of the effect of continuing physical activity or inactivity on normal biological ageing.

Study of the relationship between physical activity and specific disease morbidity.

Study of effect of different types of activity on physical performance.

From these suggestions it is obvious that there are important areas of research to be developed and assisted. We anticipate that this aspect of the new program will be patterned after procedures used in connection with other federal research grants. A panel of research scientists will be established to consider projects submitted for financial support, and liaison will be maintained with other research programs to ensure a coordination of effort and to avoid overlapping.

On the matter of the provision of awards, the house will recall that the former national physical fitness council granted the national amateur athletic achievement award, and that the first recipient was Miss Barbara Ann Scott. This practice of providing certificates, citations or awards of merit is common in many countries as a means of giving national recognition for outstanding accomplishment.

Advisory Council on Sports

We will be looking to the new advisory council for suggestions on the best manner of making such provisions in Canada.

The final objective I would mention is the preparation and distribution of information. Different media may, of course, be used including printed material, films, radio and television. For example, films and film strips may prove helpful in coaching courses. We would also look to an extension of departmental publications on fitness and recreation, which over the years have been very well received and most of which have been made available on a "for sale" basis.

These are some of the directions in which I would expect increased progress to be made through the stimulus of the new legislation. In clause 4 the bill provides for grants to agencies and organizations carrying on activities in the fields of fitness and amateur sport. As I have already mentioned, a satisfactory basis of support will have to be developed to ensure the equitable and effective use of funds. This will not be an easy task but is one which I am sure can be worked out in co-operation with the agencies concerned and with the advice of the new national council.

As to clause 5, considerable discussion with the provinces will obviously be required concerning federal-provincial agreements related to the payment of federal contributions for provincial projects under this program. The basis of distribution of funds among the provinces and matching and non-matching features of grants are but a few of the questions which will be of vital concern here.

The details with respect to both clauses 4 and 5 will be set out in orders in council. This feature we intend to borrow from the national health grants. In this way the formula of assistance and the basis of continuing support can be dealt with in some detail but, at the same time, some flexibility can be afforded in making the changes and adjustments which will arise in developing the program. In the case of assistance to the provinces, of course, any changes affecting the agreements with the dominion government are covered by the provisions of clause 6 of the legislation. This ensures that amendments will be dealt with either through a method of amendment agreed upon and included in the agreement itself or by the mutual consent of the federal and provincial governments.

Clause 7 covers the establishment of a national advisory council on fitness and amateur sport, to which I have already made reference many times in the course of these remarks. It would, of course, be premature at this stage to discuss its membership in any detail, but it will be noted that at least one member shall be appointed from each province. There will also be representation from the federal government. The remaining membership will be derived from various non-governmental sources. A major problem will be to ensure a balance of interest in the wide range of activities covered by the new legislation. We would hope that this could be achieved with a council of from 25 to 30 members. Even with an upper limit of 30 it will only be possible to select a few of the many Canadians who could make a useful contribution to the work of the council.

One further word about the council. It will be noted that appointments may be for up to three years in duration. This could well mean that a number of appointments will be for less than three years, to permit rotation of members. It will also allow for the fact that some organizations may wish to change their representation more frequently than the maximum term provides. Some, for example, may want to be represented by an annually elected president. In any event the bill, I believe, furnishes sufficient flexibility to take care of most problems in this regard.

The house will naturally want to know when we plan to establish the new advisory council being proposed. Before appointing and convening this body it will be necessary to recruit staff and build up a departmental organization to carry out our part of the program. This will take some time, but we will press forward immediately, and when this phase has been completed we will be in a position to hold the first meeting of the national advisory council. I would sincerely hope that this process could be accomplished reasonably soon, thereby setting the course for the implementation of long range plans.

This is not to say, however, that in the interim funds will not be made available for projects which may need immediate attention. I have in mind, for example, further financial support which will be required in connection with Canada's efforts to obtain the winter Olympics in 1968. Another matter of some urgency is the fact that the British empire and commonwealth games association is looking to the government for financial support in connection with the games to be held in Perth, Australia, next year.

All these rather pressing problems will receive consideration by the government and will be dealt with while the over-all plan is being developed. There may be other ad hoc projects which will have to be considered prior to the first meeting of the new advisory council.

In any event, my department stands ready to do its utmost in meeting current needs and in seeing that everything possible is done to get this far reaching new venture off to a good start. I should like to thank hon. members for bearing with me through this rather extended explanation. I trust I have covered the major points of interest and I will, of course, be happy to go into further details when we reach the committee stage.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the minister at once for the lengthy statement he just made, not only regarding the principle of this legislation, but with respect to the various provisions of the bill before us. In his statement, the minister gave us a general idea of the manner in which this act will be administered.

All those who are either directly or indirectly interested in this important matter must be grateful to the minister for the information he supplied to the house.

It is essential, in my opinion, that we should know not only in a general way but also in some detail, the objects of this legislation, how it will be administered, and the manner in which the national advisory council will operate.

For this reason, I say to the minister that the information he just gave will be very valuable to us.

This bill has three purposes. 1. To encourage, promote and develop fitness and amateur sport. 2. To enter into an agreement with any province to provide for the payment of contributions towards the undertaking of programs designed to promote fitness and sport. 3. To provide for the setting up of a national advisory council on fitness and amateur sport.

This bill is not controversial and will not give rise to partisanship.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), has made known to the house our stand on this important bill, and I have no intention of repeating what he said. It is for personal reasons and in my capacity as a private member that I am taking part in this debate.

This bill is not only good, it is essential. I am sure that all parties, indeed every hon. member will be in favour of the bill and will readily support it.

In this legislation, Mr. Speaker, we find two recurring words, fitness and sport. The two features of this bill are the promotion and the development of fitness and amateur sports.

It is a sound piece of legislation for several reasons. First because it concerns more particularly our youth. I do not think one can put too much emphasis on the value of sports as an effective training for our youth.

The aim in sports is substantially the same as that in education. It is to develop the natural dispositions of the individual, to build his character, to strengthen his will and intelligence and to give him sounder judgment. But, I do also believe that sports, where practised in a sound and sensible way, can effectively contribute to the intellectual fitness and moral training of the individual.

I consider athletics as an excellent school for courage. The athlete is called upon to do his utmost, to concentrate all his efforts in order to achieve what he is aiming at.

He must often risk the fiercest impacts, ask of his body efforts which will leave him nearly exhausted, but above all he must work constantly at improving his performance because, of course, no one is born an athlete. Heredity is not of much consequence in this field and athletic ability is only the result of constant effort.

Success in sport is impossible without regular and constant repetition of exercises to develop muscles and reflexes, and that is done by hard training.

I have in mind a great athlete, the greatest, I think, in the field of hockey, Maurice Richard, whose brilliant career has warmed the heart of all his compatriots and indeed of every Canadian. But the triumphs he has known were made possible only by his determination, his steadfastness of purpose and his courage in bringing his art to perfection.

It was that kind of courage which enabled him to obtain the highest honours in the world of sports, and it is that same strength of character which must be developed by all athletes aspiring to success, especially those who want to imitate that great athlete.

I am also thinking of another athlete who won fame on the gridiron, another Montrealer, Phil Cornellier.

In the glorious era when the University of Ottawa won the Canadian football championship year after year, Cornellier was one of the brightest stars on the team. His speed, his running ability, his judgment, his power kicks, won the admiration of all those who saw him in action at the time. But his achievements did not stop there. I think his athletic training had much to do with his academic career, in which he later on obtained unlimited success. He was rector of the University of Ottawa, and dean of the faculties of philosophy and theology. He now lives as a simple Oblate father at the university after such a brilliant career.

In the second place, sports are a training school because they provide the opportunity to exercise self discipline. In a democratic country like ours the discipline necessary for the maintenance of order must be self inspired rather than imposed from outside.

It is said that President Lincoln, on entering an American hospital, collided with a young man who was quite in a hurry getting out. In fact, the president was knocked over and fell. As he was rising slowly, the young man said: "What on earth are you doing? Don't you see where you're going?" Then the president replied: "Young man, there is something wrong within you, in your inner self."

The society in which we live demands from the individual a greater measure of self control. Man must learn to bend his will and conform his actions to the needs of the common weal. In fact, his happiness and success in life are conditioned, to a large extent, by his ability to integrate himself in the life of the community.

In many ways, the practice of sports contributes to instil into the soul that internal discipline which is the best guarantee of success and happiness.

In order to succeed, an athlete should also be able to comply with the needs of concerted effort or team work. In many sports, like football, baseball and hockey, individual feats are less important to the success of a team than harmony and teamwork. Whatever his ability and his desire to shine individually, the athlete should be able to stand aside and co-ordinate his action with that of his teammates. To sum it up, he should make a personal sacrifice for the common benefit of the team.

The happy influence of sport in a young man's education is also evident in many other ways. Such activities stimulate self expression. Living long hours with his fellow athletes, talking and having fun together develop more relaxed personality and faster renewed self confidence. Teamwork and companionship train the young man in self expression and in giving the best of himself. Wherever it may be—at university, college, school, on public playing fields, or even in the great Canadian arenas, sport efficiently contributes to the training of tomorrow's leaders.

In Canada, team work has a particular significance, because it helps bring together from all parts of our vast country athletes who represent the various nationalities and religions comprised in this nation. At a time where complete national unity is of such vital importance, sport can play a significant part as a means of goodwill and understanding.

I am thinking now of "Newsy" Lalonde, one of the greatest of his time, both on lacrosse fields and in hockey rinks. I recently read what he thinks of those with whom he contended. In a talk with the representative of a Canadian magazine, he had particular praise for his opponents. And the same thing happened when Maurice Richard and Gordie Howe made comments with regard to each other. They not only praised each other's achievements, but insisted on moral qualities.

Now, may I ask, how can prejudice and distrust subsist among young athletes brought together in daily life and making a common effort with the greatest and closest possible co-operation?

Inter-scholastic and amateur sports, which oppose teams of different parts of this country, bear the same good fruits.

I recall that several years ago, during the Alexander cup series between Valleyfield and Sydney, Valleyfield authorities organized a grand official reception for the visiting team. I am sure that those young athletes from Nova Scotia, some of whom perhaps were visiting the province of Quebec for the first time, went back home with a better understanding of their French speaking fellow-countrymen and with higher regard for them.

While it is true that clashes of opinion make for better understanding, I believe it is equally true that bodily clashes are often conducive to good will and mutual respect.

In time of peace as in time of war, a nation should be able to rely on a strong and healthy youth. In a rich and young country like ours, those who face life with strength can look forward to a bright future. Our boundless resources belong to the most aggressive and spirited people. They also belong to those who, among this new generation, will show strength, personality and initiative.

Those are a few of the reasons for which, I think, we should support this bill. They are also some of the reasons—there are many more—for which I believe this is an excellent measure.

I should not want to conclude on a discordant note, but may I draw to the attention of this house an item in the Nouveau Journal of Saturday, September 23, 1961, under the by-line of Mr. Jacques Barrette. Let me quote only a few paragraphs of the article entitled:

Will the province of Quebec have its share?

With regard to everything taking place in the federal parliament, at Ottawa, the people of the province of Quebec remain prudent. They are not sure that they will receive their share from those parliamentarians who, more often than not, neglect our wonderful province. This is not chauvinistic, but a statement of fact.

And elsewhere:

One thing always puzzled us. How is it that no hockey team of the province of Quebec has ever been chosen to represent our country at Olympic games or world championships?

And finally, this last paragraph:

Last year, Rev. Father de la Sablonnière, s.j., director of the "Centre de l'Immaculée-Conception", made stirring representations to our governments with a view to securing substantial financial aid, without which the admirable work of those sports devotees is impossible. The "Reverend Father" had also proved unequivocally that the free time of our youth must be properly organized. The best way to achieve this is to get young people interested in sports.

I need not tell the house what place the "Centre des loisirs de l'Immaculée-Conception" occupies in Montreal sports under the leadership of its director, Father de la Sablonnière. Not only did he take particular interest in sports, but he also rendered tremendous service to our youth.

My colleague, the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Ratelle), in whose constituency the "Centre des loisirs" is located, has time and again spoken about it in this house as outside.

I hope that Rev. Father de la Sablonnière's appeal will receive favourable consideration in the future.

Again, I could say something about recreation centres in the parish of St. John the Baptist and of St. Denis, in Laurier riding where tomorrow's youth is being developed, but unfortunately I do not have enough time.

I would only add that recreation centres are to be found everywhere in the province of Quebec and that a wonderful job is being performed there. I hope that, under this legislation, we shall be able to help these establishments as well as the young people who try to improve their bodies and their minds in those magnificent places.

I shall close my remarks with a simple comment, and a rather pleasant one. I thank the minister for having listened attentively to what I said.

It is obvious that the minister will see to it that the act is administered with justice and fairness, whether through a national advisory council or through another body, for all groups, or associations which this legislation concerns.

Since this measure has been welcomed by all the members at the resolution stage and the bill before us will receive the unanimous approval of this house and since, in the administration thereof, there must be no "partisanship", in the broadest sense of the word, I am confident that the minister, through the government, by the well-advised selection of his advisory council, will see to it that the act is administered with justice and fairness throughout Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I intend to occupy even less time than is available before the luncheon adjournment. At the resolution stage the hon. member for Peterborough indicated clearly and ably why the members of this group intend to support this bill at the present stage and also at the ensuing stages.

I have only a few ideas to mention at this time. In the expenditure of this money on physical fitness and amateur sport I hope our government is going to realize the urgent need to develop an adequate number of leaders. Before we can actually have an effective national physical fitness and amateur sport program I believe we shall require tens of thousands more leaders than we now have in this particular field. I believe that one of the most important responsibilities in connection with the expenditure of this amount of money ought to be to prepare a program that will assure us of adequate leadership.

I hope the government is going to be much more successful in obtaining the co-operation of the ten provincial governments in this particular matter than they were in connection with the program of a number of years ago. At the time of the ending of that program only the government of the province of Saskatchewan was taking advantage of the assistance then available. I regret that at that time British Columbia curtailed this program to the point that it no longer participated.

I wish to raise these two points now. I note that the bill contains authority for the federal government to proceed on its own in the expenditure of this money. We all realize that under the terms of the British North America

Act, health and education come within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. Hitherto the provinces to a certain extent agreed to permit Ottawa also to participate in the development of good health in Canada. We have such things as a national hospital insurance program and grants for health. However, in the bill the government takes unto itself the authority to expend this $5 million a year without necessarily receiving the consent of the provincial or municipal authorities.

In the light of our experience with the pro-rec program I believe the attitude adopted may be wise indeed, in that it will enable this government to assist organizations and agencies within a province even though the provincial government may find itself unwilling to have any participation in the expenditure of this money. I hope all the provincial governments are going to recognize their responsibility and are going to help the minister more than they helped the then minister in the days of the pro-rec program.

I also note that the bill contains authority for an annual expenditure of $5 million. This provision is a bit unusual. It is something that we usually do not have in our legislation. The legislation usually merely establishes the authority and the machinery and then by way of annual estimate the House of Commons decides, on the advice of the government, how much it is going to allot to this particular program in each and every year. I know that the act as it is now presented is going to make it much easier for those responsible for planning to engage in long range planning, in that they are no longer dependent upon the House of Commons for their minimum annual revenue. However, it either carries on or initiates rather a departure from established custom, and it contains a certain danger. I should like the minister to tell us exactly what was the reason of the government for making the amount a part of the act, and making it an annual amount.

I hope the minister will also attempt to explain how the government hopes to enlist the aid of other levels of government. If we average this amount among our constituencies we find that it involves an expenditure of roughly $19,000 per constituency. Without the active team work of the other levels of government, $19,000 cannot very usefully be expended on this program in each and every constituency. The active participation of other levels of government will be urgently needed if we are to attain the aim indicated in this act.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Regier.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. W. F. Matthews (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to take part in this important debate on sports. Sports that are properly conducted are very necessary for the youth of today, and extremely important to the present and future of Canada. This year 22 cents out of every dollar of our budget is spent on welfare. One sure way of cutting this down would be the proper training of youth.

It seems that the Olympic games are more in the limelight and receive more interest from the average Canadian than ever before. This is perhaps because of the sports pages of our newspapers, because the games are completely covered by these expert sports writers. Sports and competitions between countries can serve to promote good feelings if conducted in the right way, and I am sure that our sports writers have been and always will be of great help in this regard.

Mr. Speaker, the creed of the Olympic games has been mentioned previously, but I should like to repeat it. It is as follows:

> The important thing in the Olympic games is not winning but taking part. The essential thing in life is not conquering but fighting well.

The motto is simply citius, altius, fortius, which means "higher, swifter, stronger". Neither the creed nor the motto can be properly carried out under the strain of present-day Olympics without the best coaching and direction, and I believe this should be the concern of the federal government.

Grown Canadians have a great variety of sports that will keep them in shape. They can take part in golf, badminton, tennis, softball, ping pong, swimming, boating, fishing, hunting, archery, trap shooting, hiking, mountain climbing, riding, flying, skiing, skating, curling and bowling. Most of these sports are available and are being carried out by a great number of Canadians in all parts of Canada. If one does not care to spend money on any of the above to build up his strength and keep fit, he can get good results by walking or by doing the daily dozen every morning.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that our most important duty to Canadians in the line of sports is to have a program of sports training for our youth. Children should be exposed to sports at a very early age, and should receive proper instruction and supervision. Too many of our children are left to fend for themselves They grow up without proper training, and without this training many of them later on in life help to swell the ranks of the unemployed. The youth of today are the leaders and builders of our Canada of tomorrow. A proper training system should be set up as soon as possible.

Back in 1946 I suggested to Mr. Douglas Grimston, president of the Canadian amateur hockey association, that a school of coaching should be established in Canada by the federal government, and that the government should have a department to promote and finance sports in Canada. Mr. Ken McConnell, then sports editor of the Vancouver Province, agreed to this plan but said I was 15 years too soon. It seems that Mr. McConnell was right when he said 15 years, and I am very pleased that this government is now taking action.

At that particular time I talked this plan over with Mr. Summerfield, sports editor of the Nanaimo Free Press, and also Bill Phillips, who is now the arena manager in New Westminster and was at that time. Of course, as everyone knows who follows hockey, he was at one time a national league hockey player. Mr. Phillips endorsed that plan, and the suggestion that I take it up with the government. As a matter of fact Mr. Grimston asked me to go east to the meeting of the Canadian amateur hockey association, but I was unable to do so at that time.

I am going to take the liberty of reading from an official hockey program of the 1946-47 season. This is a program published by the Queen's Park arena, New Westminster. The editorial is entitled "Hockey News" and reads:

> Bus Matthews of Nanaimo, one of the coast's most ardent hockeyists, both as a player and coach of young players, expresses a thought which carries so much merit, it can not very well be ditched and forgotten.
>
> Hockey today is big business in the east and is becoming big business on the Pacific coast, and, with the expansion of the game the cry is going to be, more and more, for hockey material. Canada has been and will for a long time continue to be the proving ground for young hockey players who will carry the load in the future in top brackets. How these youngsters are trained and developed will determine the greatness of future hockey. The percentage of boys starting the game who make the top is very small; according to Bus, the percentage could be very greatly increased if proper methods of training them, by men themselves properly trained in coaching, were adopted.
> Bus maintains that there are only a few men living today who have the knowledge to set down in print the fundamental principles of good hockey play and the right methods of teaching these principles, and while they are available to the game they should be brought together as a body and set up as the authority defining good instruction, good methods of teaching and qualifications of men to become teachers of our future hockey stars. A few years from now, these men will be gone and the opportunity lost.

I might explain that at that time I suggested the government should get a group of these leaders in sports together for a period of say two weeks. Stenographers would be provided to take down what was said, and each man could contribute from his experience of the phase of the game in which he was most interested, defensive play, attack and so on. I mentioned at that time the name of Lester Patrick as one of the hockey experts who might be invited to such a meeting. He and others like him have had years of experience in training young hockey players and shaping them from the raw material. We have already lost Mr. Lester Patrick, and we have also lost that famous player and coach Mr. Dick Irwin.

Men such as these have an experience which covers many decades of hockey. Their knowledge of the game goes back over the time when we in Canada played seven man hockey, six man hockey and five man hockey. Many people in Canada do not know that there was a league which played five man hockey. I think this new council might well consider the suggestion that men of this calibre should be invited to a conference to give us all the benefit of the knowledge they have gained; and I have in mind all sports, not just hockey.

Today the big leagues want players who are complete in all respects; they do not want to have to teach them anything. That is the work of the coaches. I do not want to give the impression that I have in mind only professional hockey. I do not think it should be confined to professional hockey. I believe it should be extended to help young Canadians who are on their way in the business world as a means of building up their minds and improving their bodies.

In July of 1958 a softball game was played in Hull between members of parliament and members of the House of Commons staff. I forget all those who were there, but I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Weichel) took part. I do not remember now who won the game, but I think it was the staff. Lester Patrick, Newsy Lalonde, Fred Taylor and others were there as guests. We had a get together afterward at which Lester Patrick, Mr. Lalonde and others were asked to say a few words. When my own turn came to speak I stressed the importance of the government setting up a department to help promote sports, and said I thought a coaching school should be established. Hon. members will well understand my pleasure when the Prime Minister announced the other day that such a program would be put into operation by the government.

As reported on page 120 of Hansard for January 20, 1959, the hon. member for Waterloo North suggested that a ministry of sport should be established. If hon. members turn to page 1037 of Hansard of February 16, 1959 they will find that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard proposed the setting up of a sports council. I wish to congratulate these two hon. members and other members of the house who have worked so hard, informally, in the promotion of these ideas. There was a committee formed for this purpose, and the hon. members I have mentioned, together with others, contributed a great deal to the idea which is now being put into practical form.

I support Bill No. C-131. When a member supports a bill in the House of Commons I believe, Mr. Speaker, that he should put his reasons for doing so on record. The following are my reasons. Statements have been made that Canada is a nation of weaklings; that people who are just spectators and who do not play games are weaklings. I do not agree with this, and I do not take such statements for granted.

Let us not sell Canadian youth short. I know that we have in Canada many very fine young people who will go a long way in business and sport as the years go by. Looking around today we see that our young boys are growing broader, taller and stronger. I do not like to hear people say that we are a nation of weak people, and I would not advise anyone to step up to many of these young fellows and say that. It reminds me of a story of a man in Texas. When he had had a few drinks he looked around and said "I can lick anyone in this bar". No one said anything; he was a pretty big man. After a while he turned around and said "I can lick anyone in Texas." Still nobody took him on. Finally, after one or two more drinks, the visitor declare "I can lick anyone in the United States". At that point a little fellow stood up, took off his glasses, and knocked him down. When the challenger finally came around he murmured "I guess I took in too much territory".

Taking part in sports is important for the building of the mind as well as of the body. I coached sports for a number of years, and I found that the important thing was to get the player to think. A player who thinks becomes twice as valuable. I have coached many players who I am sure would have gone a long way in hockey if they had continued in the game. I have kept records of many hundreds of my young players, and I go over them from time to time. There is not one of those boys who is not doing very well today. Two of them, for example, quit and went fishing. They now own commercial fishing boats worth between $75,000 and $100,000 each. Others have become electrical contractors, clothing store owners, pharmacists, dentists and doctors—and I am talking now about the stars who quit the game, people who could really have gone places in the sport itself. However, they decided they would seek careers in business or in the professions rather than in commercial sport.

As I was saying, it is important that a player should learn to think. It is harder to think, to really concentrate, than it is to run, jump or skate. If you cannot get your players to think you will certainly never have top grade players. I remember I was once in a rink at the start of a season when Mr. Lester Patrick was looking over one of his clubs. I said "Lester, you certainly have a fine bunch of strong players. They should go a long way." This was on the west coast. He said "I have not got one man on that team who will ever get to the national hockey league". I said "They look good to me". He said "They can stickhandle, check and skate, but they have not got it above the ears". Unless a player has it above the ears he will not go far in professional sport today.

Today, when we worry so much about what our young people are doing, we should certainly see that their bodies are developed. We should make sure, also, that we have coaches who will develop their minds. If I were going to make a quotation at this time I would say "Men who do not think are the weaklings of today".

People who observe sport have always been important to me, and when I coach I use sports writers as a source of information. A sports writer has to meet a deadline. He has to examine the performance of players and scrutinize the games closely in order to have something about which to write. The only way he can do so is by thinking. The day following a game I always made it a point to talk to the news writers and get their views. As a result I was often able to learn things which were a means of improving my players.

A good coach is, in a sense, a mirror and by that I mean a mirror that is accurate, that is not cracked or distorted. There is no one in this building who would accept as gospel truth the reflection given by a mirror with a tendency to distort. Such a mirror would be thrown out of the window. A good coach requires the ability to accurately reflect the potentiality of his team. I know of a famous golfer in the United States who every once in a while would ask some minor pro to follow him about and watch him play, and advise if he was doing anything wrong. Some pros protested that the player knew more about golf than they would ever know, but he pointed out that it was impossible for him to drive or putt a ball and look in a mirror at the same time. He asked them to reflect back to him accurately the way he played the game. I use this illustration to indicate that a good coach must accurately reflect the ability of his team. If he is a good coach he must be of assistance to the boys.

One could speak at great length about coaching, but I shall content myself with telling one small story. The cousin of a player in a small town, a young lad who had been in reform school, expressed an interest in sports. I spoke to the young man about having his cousin come down to play, and eventually spoke to the mother of the former inmate of a reform school about the boy participating in juvenile sport. I expressed my interest in having him join us. The mother explained that he did not wish to play because he was aware that the boys knew he had stolen and thought they would not want him in the locker room. I explained that I had spoken to the boys and that he would be welcome. After persuasion the young man came and played hockey. In speaking to his mother at a later date she said that had it not been for that opportunity to participate in sports the boy would have run away and perhaps again taken up a life of crime. That young man is now married, with two children, and is purchasing his own home. If it had not been for the opportunity I have mentioned he might well not have been in that fortunate position today.

I have told that story to illustrate how important it is that the council ensure that good coaches are obtained. I think it is most important also that the council give consideration to assisting young Indian boys especially by encouraging them to participate in lacrosse. I urge the council to endeavour to have lacrosse returned to its former standing in the Olympic games.

I hope the council when in operation will be careful in making grants. I do not believe grants should be made to professional teams. I know of a very good orchestra that made application for a Canada Council grant. The orchestra received the answer that the council only assisted orchestras that had reached professional status. Probably the members of the Canada Council know more about music than I do, but I disagree with their basic policy. I maintain that if an orchestra has reached professional standing it should not be given grants.

Similarly, I do not see why grants should be given by the sports council to people who have reached professional status. I believe they should be given only to amateur sports that do so much to build healthy minds and bodies among young Canadians. I suggest assistance in the establishment of playing fields and ice surfaces. I know of a number of clubs that would be interested in participating in a program of that type. Very careful attention will have to be paid to the selection of the members of the council, and equally careful attention will have to be paid by the council in the selection of coaches if a school is set up.

Sports are important to all countries, and one could discuss this topic for hours. Last year I was in attendance at the interparliamentary union conference in Tokyo, where I stayed at the New Japan hotel. I was surprised to receive a telephone call advising me that Prince Takeda, the president of the national skating union of Japan, wished to see me. I said I would be interested in meeting him, and although I suspected at first that I was being kidded an appointment was made for 2.30 the next afternoon. I was pleased when the prince arrived with his secretary and we discussed sports, including hockey. As hon. members know a Japanese team participated in the Olympic games last year and did a fine job, although they achieved no great success. Much credit should be given to them for the spirit they brought to the game. The prince has requested that I send him a film illustrating lacrosse about which I told him. He is of the opinion that it might become a popular game in Japan.

During our visit we wore badges indicating that we were from Canada. At a reception one night I met a young Japanese boy who said, "Me Broda". I found out that he played hockey and knew of Turk Broda, who was his hero. The badge brought me many encounters. Two young Japanese connected with newspaper and radio spent most of an evening with me. All they wished to talk about was sports including baseball and hockey. I assure hon. members that Canada is held in high regard by the people of Japan.

Many interesting articles concerning sports appear in newspapers from time to time. In the February, 1960 issue of The Legionary Mr. Lorne Manchester, in an article entitled "A Bad Case of "Spectatoritis" stated:

> Thousands of youngsters under the guidance of Canadian Legion branches are engaged in regular league schedules throughout the country... Many youngsters are also getting their first introduction to "Operation Star-Shooter", the Canadian Legion's program of carefully worked out gymnastic exercises designed to improve the physical fitness of our young people.

The Legion branches across Canada are sponsoring sports. Every branch in my constituency sponsors a team or buys equipment. All are anxious to do their part for the future of Canadian sports. Before I left home I was approached by the new Legion branch. They are interested in knowing if any assistance could be given in the establishment of a small ice surface. They have a number of boys' teams. They wish information and assistance in the form of a grant, and would be willing to participate in financing the necessary balance. I am proud to say that every service club in my constituency sponsors a team or provides uniforms or equipment for hockey and lacrosse teams. This is a wonderful thing, and I think a similar situation prevails across Canada.

Within these small groups are found some of the finest coaches in Canada. They donate their services without charge and desire no remuneration. Men who are prepared to do that are coaches of the best type. When the school of coaching is established, and when information and ideas on coaching are finally collected and drafted, I suggest that these men be informed. They should be given every assistance and all the information that will be of help to them in their coaching.

I spoke a few moments ago about lacrosse, a wonderful game that is much misunderstood. For years it was represented as brutal and sensational, but when properly presented it is known as a game of skill. It is widely played in England and Australia. Interestingly enough, more lacrosse is played in colleges in the United States than is played in Canada, and that in spite of the fact that lacrosse is historically Canada's national game. I have here a short dispatch from London which reads as follows:

> Canada's historic sport, lacrosse, is becoming increasingly popular in Britain. Two London schools have now included lacrosse in their curriculum, and more are expected to join.

In other words, our game is to be brought up to the status it should have, because it is number one in sports as a mind and body builder. It has been proven by professors who have investigated the matter that lacrosse is number one as a body builder and mind builder. One junior lacrosse team in a league in Vancouver was composed entirely of what we sometimes refer to now as dead end kids. I got to know many of the boys and I can tell you that there were some bad actors among them, but they went on to play senior lacrosse, and played the finest lacrosse in Canada. Those boys were all salvaged and trained to be good Canadians by a coach who was not a professional but who did a tremendous job and prevented those dead end kids from being a charge on the rest of the people of Canada.

I could read other articles about the progress of lacrosse in the United States. No doubt the committee will be made aware of all this information. I have all the statistics as to injuries which show why lacrosse is considered to be safer than hockey and even safer than baseball in some respects. These statistics have been collected over a period of years, and I will be very glad to supply them to the minister because I know he will make good use of them.

It may be that first of all the board will make a survey right across Canada to get suggestions and advice from people who have been engaged for years in the sports field. There are many members of the house who are well qualified to do this work and who would know how to get in touch with people to obtain this information. I know these men could supply good advice on the subject.

I could continue but I know there are other members who wish to speak on this very important subject. There is one point I should like to make in conclusion. I am afraid I will not be able to make it, because apparently I need a little more coaching; I have mislaid my note. I should like to mention that this year the British Columbia senior women's softball championship was won by a Duncan team coached by Duff Chaster. He is not a professional coach, and this is a wonderful achievement for a team in its first year of competition.

Various championships in all kinds of sports have been won by teams in my constituency. However, I do not want to take any more time, and I will simply say that I am very happy that we have reached the ponit of taking action with regard to this matter that is so important for the future of our children and the people of Canada generally. I know the minister will do a tremendous job. I know he is most interested in the subject. I noted a short time ago that due to conditions beyond his control he lost five or six suits. In sports when a sponsor loses a lot of money he is referred to as having lost his shirt. I hope the minister will not allow this committee to get out of control and lose his shirt.

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my first remarks, of course, must be to congratulate the minister on the introduction of what is perhaps in this session the first piece of legislation uncontested and unanimously supported, not only by members of the house but by the people of the country at large. This is certainly to his credit. The demand or desire for the legislation is quite apparent. It was introduced in the form of a private bill initially, and has since received support from newspaper columnists. Credit is due to a great many people for their efforts which have culminated in the bill now before us, even to those members of parliament who have taken part in some athletic endeavour, either in hockey or on the baseball diamond. If their inability to play these games is any indication, surely this bill to improve their physical fitness is certainly necessary.

One cannot and should not be facetious about legislation involving such an important principle, and involving $5 million to be taken from the public treasury. While I accept all the arguments as to the necessity for the bill, perhaps not only at this point but in the committee stage we might look at how these worthy principles and objectives are going to be achieved. How are we going to spend the $5 million; to what purpose; who will receive the money, and what are going to be the problems of the administrative council on whom in the final analysis the success or failure of the legislation will depend?

As many speakers who have preceded me have said, the bill has three principal purposes; first, to improve the physical fitness of the people of Canada as a whole; second, to aid amateur sport and, third, to assist Canada's competing athletes in international events. I suggest to you, sir, and to the minister that all these are separate objectives, though interrelated. None the less, at this stage and in the committee we must assign ourselves the task of recognizing that each requires individual study if we are to achieve any degree of success in attaining our objectives.

We have read the bill, and have observed the nine points which form the basis of the regulations, and the principles as to how the moneys are to be assigned under working agreements with individuals, organizations and with the provinces. The first question we must ask ourselves is, what control will the council have when these moneys pass from their hands.

To take a specific example, let us say that province A is provided with X dollars. How are we going to be assured that the objectives outlined in the legislation will be pursued by province A? How are we going to avert any possibility that these moneys will perhaps go toward some other objective which is not indicated or intimated in the terms of the legislation? To a large degree, of course, this is going to be a responsibility of the council itself, the administrative body.

Second, in addition to establishing a group of fundamental principles and making an assessment of all the essential needs in respect of coaching in schools and improvement of facilities, we must assure ourselves that somehow we create a desire within Canadians to want to be physically fit and to take a greater interest in amateur sport, because if the desire is not present there is no purpose in providing facilities.

At this point it amuses me a little to listen to some of my colleagues who, in describing the advantages of helping amateur sport, cannot resist the temptation to kick what they describe as professionalism in sport. I think it should be clearly understood that many of the youngsters we see on the playing fields are emulating the Jackie Parkers, Babe Ruths and other major sports heroes. It is from these professionals that they get the desire to become athletes. I am not advocating that money be contributed to assist professionalism, but I suggest that in the end this legislation will not be successful unless professional sport and professional organizations carry on as they have done in past years.

I can recall having taken part in the first large scale attempt by the west to win a well known sporting event, the Grey cup in 1948. The effort was not that of a group of professionals. It was a community endeavour by a group of people who got together and decided that the then little known pastime of football should be made a national classic. It was not any paid group of promoters who were involved, rather, it was community spirit which made it so successful. We took our cowboys, our Indians and our football players and captured the imagination of the Canadian people, thus making this sporting event what it is today.

Here again I must relate the importance of this bill to other aspects of the subject. Take hockey, baseball or football, and you can see the advantages of professionals and amateurs working together to achieve a better physical condition for the Canadian public. What concerns me, though, is that Canadians today, unfortunately, are gradually becoming a nation of spectators rather than competitors. I hope this is a place where the bill perhaps makes its greatest contribution. As I said at the outset, we must be absolutely certain we press steadily forward to achieve this objective. The council will have many responsibilities and many problems. Let me try to tell the council what I hope it will not do because, after all, in the final analysis success or failure is going to rest upon this.

First of all, I would hope they would not contribute moneys to purely organizational or office work which is involved in developing a sport. I would hope that the moneys would be assigned to the root of the problem, to the youngsters. Second, I would hope the council would not assign moneys to any organization which had a history of not being able to help itself. I listened to one of my distinguished colleagues who made a great contribution to the debate, but in the first six minutes he had spent the $5 million. I heard also suggestions to the effect that a dollar should be paid here or $50 there, and that this was going to help amateur sports and physical fitness.

I agree that these are indeed worthy causes, but we must remember that if the $5 million is going to be spent wisely it is going to have to be spread amongst a great many individuals and a great many interests in the sporting field. I would hope, therefore, that the council would try to assist those people who are prepared to help themselves, and let the contributions in terms of dollars be measured accordingly. Any sporting organization—you and I have belonged to many of them—which is not prepared to get off the ground itself and do something for itself will never survive, no matter what government hand-out is given. The point I make, therefore, is that there should be a careful assessment of what the organization has done in the past, how it is prepared to assist in its own endeavour, and then whether government aid can give it enough help to get beyond the point of being mediocre.

Then we come to another problem. How do you reconcile the differences that may exist between those people who believe in physical fitness as an end in itself and those well organized groups of people involved in amateur sports, in so far as representation on the council is concerned? How are you going to distinguish where the money is to go, and who is going to get how much? This is going to be another major problem. It is a platitude and a generality, I recognize, to say that one area of sport should receive a benefit while another does not. There is a point here, Mr. Speaker, and the bill clearly sets out that there are these two principles. The one must not in any way become the poor relation of the other. The council must, therefore, be selective on the basis that there will be those who can speak as advocates for both.

I should like to make one or two other suggestions. The council will have its problems, but after all if this legislation passes the house our advice to it will be of little value. It is only now while the bill is in this stage that we can make definite recommendations. I would hope the council would not attempt to spend its money in sending, for example, vast arrays of coaches or escort parties abroad with our athletes. This again is something that is important. I would hope that the money would be spent in developing athletes basically in Canada, and let these other organizations take up these additional costs. I would hope the money would be utilized for some of those things which have been suggested here, but we must place priorities on them and see that we do not spend so little on each that there is no real effect in any particular area of sport.

As I said at the beginning, I think the important thing is to try to get a philosophy of mind in our young people so that they will want to compete. This is the biggest problem the council will have. I have heard from a friend of mine about youngsters who were discouraged from competing in the vast areas which could be devoted to some form of recreation. I suggest to you, sir, that keeping in mind the variety of interests which today compete for the time of our young people, we must map out a plan that will encourage them to reach the standards we hope will be attained as a result of this bill. If Canada intends to put itself on international display in the Olympics and other world events, I believe we should be improving the ability of our youngsters to compete by providing them with the facilities they require. We should set up co-ordinating bodies to ensure that one organization does not overlap on the functions of another organization. This is another area in which the council can well assist, not only through its administrative responsibilities but through the funds it has to administer.

I suggest, therefore, that in making an assessment of the problems you must first of all make a review of the facilities that exist in Canada to determine the areas requiring the most help. Only from this point can we make a successful start.

Finally, sir, I should like to make one other suggestion involving two points. It has been said, I believe by the minister, that it is not the intention to include under this bill any funds that could be utilized for capital costs for national events that may come to Canada, such as the Pan-American games, the British empire games or any of the Olympic games. I think this is indeed a wise move, and not because I come from a city which hopes to be the host for the winter Olympic games of 1968. If you take the moneys available under this bill and assign them to the larger international events it means that the entire program will suffer. In fact it will be disrupted, because all the funds will be required for these three major events I have mentioned. In this way the funds needed to stimulate physical fitness and amateur sport will be lost. I was happy, therefore, to hear the minister make that point very clearly, that this money may be used to help the athlete prepare for the Olympic games, but it is not intended that it should be used for capital costs in connection with those games.

The second point, sir, involves the two booklets produced by the armed services known as 5BX and 10BX, in the war against obesity in the services. I think many of us in this chamber might consider them as required reading for ourselves. These two booklets have become, in fact, Canadian best sellers, with sales totalling something over a quarter of a million. I would hope that the funds derived from the sale of those booklets would not go back into the general revenue fund. I would hope rather that, because of the importance of the work these people have already accomplished in the field of physical fitness, these funds could be used to encourage them to go into other areas as yet unexplored. I believe this is the greatest single contribution that any government agency has made to date in helping to assist in the national problem of reaching some level of physical fitness.

So, Mr. Speaker, I close as I began, by congratulating the minister in making the first step an important one. Second, I wish to state my belief that the council has indeed a real job in making this bill work, function and become successful. Third, I suggest that the council should attend to the problem of creating the desire in addition to the facilities so that our young people may enjoy physical fitness. Fourth, I would remind them that they have a dual responsibility, both in the field of physical fitness and of course amateur sport. Fifth, I would hope that in every area, whether it be in physical fitness or amateur sport, the professional and the amateur alike realize the vast potential that is available to them in the playing fields and the skating rinks; for here the real athletes are to be found. Here are the youngsters who will represent us in future years. Indeed, I suggest that here in fact is the future of Canada.

Mr. R. M. T. McDonald (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to follow such eminent speakers as those we have heard this afternoon. I should also like to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare for bringing this important measure into the House of Commons. I might start off by saying that I come from a town that is well known for its athletics, both in the professional and amateur fields.

However, I should like to confine my remarks to the amateur field. I might say that this bill should be channelled to the masses if we are to have competitors in the future. We cannot merely buy championships. We cannot merely take a hockey team, spend $50,000 and send them over to Germany or to Russia in order to meet someone. I think the $5 million we are allocating today should be spread out across the country.

It disturbed me somewhat in the last week when I noticed that in some of their articles the newspapermen were saying that it was time for Canada to flex its muscles. To me it seemed that they were trying to play down the bill. I think it is a great step in fostering the development of young people in the country, but it should not start when the boy is 18 or 19 years old, with a view to sending him to the Olympic games or to the world hockey championships. It should start in the homes by the parents encouraging their children to participate in active sports. I know that some parents do not wish this participation. They wish their children to go ahead and be scholastic in their ability. However, a little playing never hurt anyone.

In federal politics you should not talk about the provinces or the municipalities, because the British North America Act prevents you from getting into the school systems. But unless the school systems of the country—public schools, high schools and colleges—get behind this physical fitness and amateur athletics bill, I do not think it will get off the ground; for the coaching that we are striving to spread across the country must come and be taught to boys all across the country. I think it is very important that the Minister of National Health and Welfare talk to his provincial colleagues so they can encourage the development of amateur athletics through the education system and so that we shall indeed be trying to teach boys from grade V up to adulthood.

There has been some talk about professional entrepreneurs coming under this type of bill. I do not think we have much to fear on that score. The amateur athletic unions in Canada, such as the Olympic association of Canada, have been well organized for years. Through their representations I am sure they will help this council to beware of professionalism, although professionalism is not a dirty word. Some few years ago I happened to be a professional athlete, and I may say that professional athletes are fairly good types in developing coaching in the country I would not want the minister to set up a coaching system in Ottawa by means of which you would bring only a few people from across the country to coaching school. I would rather see a mobile coaching staff go across the 10 provinces and set up regional schools at given dates so that a larger group of people could come and be helped in this way. Rather than having two or three people sent from Vancouver to Ottawa, I would rather see a coaching school of instructors go to Vancouver and have 50 people or 60 people participate.

In the western world, as I see it today, we go in for a good deal of glamour. It will be noticed that after the Olympic competitions in the past several years, everyone in the United States, Canada and the western world wants to be a sprint champion. They forget about other non-glamorous sports that could be taken up. The Russians have won a large number of points in gymnastics and fencing and what might be termed back room sports. I think if we start to encourage our children who cannot be one hundred yard sprinters in 9.6 seconds to get into some other things by mass participation, we shall eventually have a great deal to look forward to in the future.

With regard to the grants indicated in the bill, I think the minister should be very cautious with regard to whom he gives money. I know there are in the country a great many people who are looking for assistance, but as was indicated by the hon. member for Calgary South, those people who cannot help themselves usually will not get off the ground by means of the great white father from Ottawa coming down and giving them some extra money.

At this point I might indicate the job that police associations, service clubs and sports organizations are doing across this country. I think they should continue to do this job because it is the basic fundamental of amateur sport. I refer to people wanting to get out and play and help the children all the time.

I would also talk to the minister with regard to what I would call socialites in sports. As indicated by the hon. member for Calgary South, when Canada sends 20 athletes to the Olympic games we seem to find that, having regard to our way of life, they must have 10 coaches to go with them. When Australia sent people to the commonwealth games a few years ago they sent some 90 athletes but only 10 coaches. We find that politics are played in many associations. I would make the council aware of the politics that are played in associations across the country.

As to the surveys that are indicated in the bill, I think surveys should be made of the facilities that are required across the country both in relation to coaching and physical requirements. Unfortunately we in the northern part of the western hemisphere have long winters. I think we should look into the possibility of capital cost expenditures in co-operation with the provinces and the municipalities in connection with the creation of field housing facilities such as those in existence in the United States for all-round training in a vast number of sports.

I think this bill will be widely accepted across the country. I do not think any politics will be played. However, I stress to the minister the point that this money should be spent wisely. As indicated by hon. members who have preceded me, if we are going to have the winter Olympic games in this country I do not think this money should be spent for the purpose of building facilities for those games. This money should be used to foster the development of fitness and amateur sport in the country by mass participation. I stress to the minister the importance of getting in touch with his colleagues the health and education ministers of the provinces, so they in turn can sell the program through the schools. I am sure the minister is planning some literature to be handed out for this purpose.

I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the amateur athletic associations in the country which for the past many years have been struggling to get into international competition. I know that I have been called on to donate to these organizations, as have many others. I should also like to point out to this council that something should be put into this bill which will allow the council itself to accept moneys from organizations that wish to help to develop amateur sport. In other words, if we are to make grants to Olympic teams to go over and compete in games in Tokyo or in Helsinki, I am sure the minister will find that there are many people who are willing to put up their dollars in order to help Canada in this respect. I think the bill should stress physical fitness for amateur athletes on a mass participation basis and we should not get down to specialization, for only through mass participation can we produce champions, which might not be in 1968 but it will be some time in the 1970's.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this discussion at this time, and my contribution will be brief. Many hon. members, including the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. McDonald), are far better qualified than I to discuss this subject and have already given some very thoughtful and helpful advice to the council. Without going over the ground that has already been covered, I should like to offer this one suggestion to the council. In my view the whole purpose of this legislation will be accomplished if the notion I have in mind comes about.

Clearly Canada, due to geographic and many other conditions, is not, even in the most optimistic person's mind, likely to become a front runner and top-flight contender in the Olympics of future years. We have, relatively speaking, a limited population and growth potential. We should face that fact, and one of the tasks I hope this council will undertake is to approach the various provinces and the various areas of this country and try in a co-operative way to achieve a fairly well planned cross-section of athletic endeavour.

This point was touched upon by the hon. member for Hamilton South. We can envisage universities in one area of the country concentrating on swimming and related activities, others concentrating on track and field events, others on skiing, others on gymnastics, fencing and the other sports which make up the whole Olympics calendar.

A certain amount of this has taken place naturally, it seems to me. I refer to McGill, Carleton University and Ottawa University. These are universities which are located close to adequate, and in fact very excellent skiing facilities. It seems to me that if the council can encourage this type of specialization and encourage universities or groups of universities, high schools, as the hon. member mentioned, and even the public school system we could develop coaching to such a degree that we would produce results in a very few years.

Most universities, apart from the few specializations I have mentioned, have made some outstanding contributions. Certainly Bruce Kidd, potentially the world's greatest distance runner, is an example of the case in point where proper encouragement and coaching is available. Another example that comes to mind of a small university establishing a reputation for itself is St. Francis Xavier University in Nova Scotia. I think that is an example of what I have in mind operating in a very successful way.

A few years ago that university brought Don Loney, who was a former professional football player with the Ottawa Rough Riders, to that university. He provided the university with the elements of a first-rate coaching staff. The institution has concentrated its athletic endeavours in that direction and as a result it has, I believe, the reputation of being the No. 1 football university in the maritime provinces, if not in eastern Canada.

It seems to me this concept should be extended possibly on a provincial basis, but certainly on a geographic basis. As I said when I rose to speak, if there is some movement and development in this direction this legislation will have justified itself beyond all our expectations.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in this debate today it gives me great pleasure to associate myself with the remarks of previous speakers in connection with the bill which the minister has placed before the house.

It has been said that good health and good intellect are the two greatest blessings of life. This bill, because it strives to promote the health and well-being of the Canadian nation, has almost unlimited possibilities. The health of a people is the foundation upon which all their happiness and all their powers as a nation depend. It is an almost unfailing index of the morals of a nation. It has a very direct bearing upon the prosperity of a country.

The bill now before the house is significant because it serves to place the official sanction of parliament behind the importance of physical fitness in this country. Not only will this bill help to provide the means to foster and encourage amateur sport among people, but it should create a great awareness among the public of the important place that physical fitness must occupy in the life of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that educationalists are becoming more and more aware of the fact that in our educational system physical training should hold a place co-ordinate with that of the intellect. There is no doubt that it should be a part of all academic training. Exercise does for the body what intellectual training does for the mind; it educates and strengthens it.

The maritime provinces are noted for a highly successful tradition in sport. As a matter of fact, Cape Breton island has been a hotbed of athletic competition for many years. As other hon. members have done during this debate, I could mention team achievements and individuals who have attained national recognition for that part of the country. I could mention the prominence brought to Cape Breton by the basketball team from the town of New Waterford. That is a mining town in which the community effort of a group of local sportsmen and the achievements of a group of local athletes have brought to the town national prominence in winning the Canadian title in that particular sport.

I could also mention the Sydney Millionaires and their achievements in hockey. In my own home town I could mention the efforts and the achievements of the Caledonia football team, which for many years was outstanding not only in this country but could face up to world competition in this particular game.

I might also refer to individuals such as three local boys from the city of Sydney who are now on N.H.L. rosters. I think this is a most outstanding achievement, because hockey players in my part of the country have far more to overcome to attain prominence in this sport than most hockey players throughout the country. When they were at school and were starting out in organized hockey they would probably have to be at the local rink as early as four or five o'clock in the morning. Therefore to gain the status of an N.H.L. player, as these three boys have done, is a very great achievement. The three boys concerned are Parker McDonald of Detroit Red Wings, and John Hanna and Allister McNeil now with the Montreal Canadians. I think the accomplishments of these boys in reaching this status has been achieved through a superior effort on their part because I know what they have to do in order to participate in such sports in my hometown. As I said, it means rising at three o'clock in the morning in order to practise in the local rinks that are available.

I might also mention the achievements of Joe Mullins a youngster from my hometown who has come into national prominence in track and field and has on two occasions recently represented Canada, at the Olympics and the British empire games.

In most parts of the country there are two important elements lacking to a greater or lesser degree. These are coaching and facilities. I honestly do not believe there is any shortage of athletes, but this potential needs proper guidance and an opportunity to compete. The funds made available as a result of the passing of this bill will not be sufficient to provide gymnasiums or rinks but will, I hope, encourage municipalities and provincial authorities, and more especially private enterprise, to take a more intensive interest in the provision of these facilities.

There is a great deal which could be said about coaching in general. Every community cannot afford professional coaches and must rely to a large extent on voluntary help. It is to these volunteers that we must look for a great deal of the assistance needed in order to promote amateur athletics. Even professionals must depend on the enthusiasm of the amateur and on the enthusiasm shown by members of the public for encouraging athletics among our young people.

I should like to enlarge for a moment upon what was said by the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. McDonald) when he suggested that we in Canada place too much emphasis on the management and coaching of national teams entering the Olympics and other important events of that kind while placing too little emphasis on the needs of the competitors themselves. In support of what he was saying, the hon. member pointed to the fact that Australia, for instance, could send out a large number of athletes accompanied by only a small representation of management and coaches, while the balance as far as Canada is concerned has always been on the other side. I think it is important we should correct this situation and that we should place greater emphasis on the competitors and their needs.

I should like to bring a further point to the attention of the minister. I think it is important that in this field our efforts to assist players and athletes generally should be concentrated on the phase when our young people are beginning to develop their talents and abilities. In this connection I think that in addition to providing coaches and the proper facilities for training we might organize a scouting team which could go about the country in search of young athletes of outstanding ability, as is already done on behalf of national hockey league teams and national baseball teams. We would thus be able to assist such athletes at an age where they would have every possibility of developing their potential. In other words, I do not think that any great emphasis should be placed on assisting athletes beyond the age of 21 or 22 years. I think help should be concentrated on age groups where the potential is probably greater, say between the ages of 14 and 18. I see no purpose in reaching into the ranks of established organizations. I think efforts should be made to scour the country for athletes whose natural ability could be developed by proper training. As I say, this system has already been developed to a high degree by the national hockey league teams and the baseball teams. No doubt, it has been developed by football teams also. I think this practice could be followed in all fields of sport in co-ordination with the coaching staffs, so that those selected might have the advantage of the facilities to be made available as a result of the present bill.

I should like once again to endorse what has been said by other hon. members who have spoken during this debate. While not playing down the necessity for assisting our athletes in professional sport I should like to emphasize again that before athletes become professionals they must participate in the game of their choice at a very early age. It is at this stage in their development that we should watch for them and help develop the potential which shows itself in any specific sport.

(Translation):

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, allow me just a word so that I may take my turn in voicing my approval for this bill. In my opinion such a bill should have been introduced in this house many years ago.

Mr. Speaker, one must always remember this old Latin axiom: Mens sana in corpore sano, which means: "A sound mind in a sound body". There is no doubt that encouragement to sports and health is good, but I am wondering whether we should not lead the way if we want to be worthy proponents of health and amateur sports.

As a matter of fact, I recently stated, and I repeat today, that we only have to look around to notice that several among us need exercise. I am convinced that if we started by giving an example, by practising sports, and I mean the less violent ones, because I see that many are too old, too fat, and it would take weeks before we could turn them into real athletes—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are not referring to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith)?

Mr. Denis: No, because he is not too fat, but I could refer to the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion), who could certainly afford to lose dozens of pounds, if the government would only give him the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Speaker, very recently the reconstruction of the parliament buildings was undertaken, and repair works are now under way which will amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars, if not millions. I wonder if it would not be possible to include the construction of a gymnasium, not only for members, but also for the House of Commons staff and even for civil servants.

You must know that thousands of federal employees live in Ottawa, and, in view of the limited number of places where they can practise their favourite sport in this city, I think the government should set an example and apply the provisions of the act concerning fitness and the practice of amateur sport to enable the employees under the civil service commission, the staff of the House of Commons and hon. members to practise their favourite sport. Several members are now staying from eight to ten months a year in Ottawa. They even bring their wife and family, and I know for sure that the children of several members of parliament go to Ottawa schools.

I am convinced that various members, and more particularly the wives, children or relatives of members of parliament have nowhere to go, either to meet or to practise some sport. Indeed, they are condemned to live between four walls and they are unable to do any exercise, to practise any sport, as they should, particularly when they are living in this country's capital.

I am convinced that millions of dollars will be spent under the terms of this bill, and when sport is mentioned, it is not just baseball, hockey or tennis that is meant, but every sport, including the less violent ones like bowling, for instance. I do not doubt that other kinds of sport will be included, which would enable citizens of the various provinces to meet and come to know one another better, thereby promoting a better understanding within this country.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of National Health and Welfare should not take this opportunity to convince his colleagues in the cabinet of the necessity to establish a recreation centre, not only for members of parliament or their families, but also for the staff and even people under the civil service commission.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if most of the hon. members had the opportunity to come back to sports in which they used to participate when they were in school or even if some members were to start playing some sport to improve their health, the government would have in its members, its staff and its federal civil servants ideal propagandists for sports and their benefits. Each one would be willing to encourage the members of his family or his fellow citizens to participate in various sports activity. I am convinced that the bill which is introduced today in this house will have at least some propaganda value. Now, if propaganda is good from the point of view of the Canadian citizens' fitness, it is equally good when the government decides to send teams abroad, whether for Olympic games or hockey, tennis or bowling.

Should the government decide that sending our athletes abroad is good publicity, I believe it should endeavour, from the very beginning, to organize, train and assist financially or otherwise, teams that could be a credit to us.

We only have to follow the example given by countries which are not as democratic as ours but which seek publicity more than we do. They have known outstanding success in a short time, simply by making sure that the athletes receive government subsidies so as to develop their athletic potential.

When the time comes to send some teams abroad, I also wonder if the government should not see to it that our best athletes are selected, because what matters—I make this comment even before the legislation is passed—is not to favour one particular team operating in one particular province, but rather to have our champions, from any province, represent the country. It might also be wise to see to it that they train regularly and seriously, so as to do credit to our country when they ago abroad to compete against other teams, for the minister knows that the teams we have been sending to the Olympics for many years have not been too successful.

Incidentally, I wish to recall that sport is synonymous with justice and friendship, efficiency and harmony.

I fail to understand why the province of Quebec seems to be overlooked when teams are being sent abroad. This legislation should not occasion disunion or disharmony in the country. No doubt an advisory council will have to be set up, but it has not yet been established, since this legislation has not been passed.

Therefore, I ask the minister to see to it that, when this advisory council is established, the province of Quebec and French Canadians are adequately represented on the council. I can assure him that if the representatives of the province of Quebec are chosen well and are in adequate numbers, French Canadians will do honour, not only to the minister, but also to the whole country.

Moreover, I believe that by uniting the various ethnic groups in the field of sports, the different races will get to know each other better and to appreciate one another more.

Besides, I think that if the government still has a majority and if its members practise some sport and meet groups and personalities of other races, it will think twice before making other appointments, because in the near future, this bill on fitness and sports, will be useful not only for sports in the restricted sense of the word, but also to the people of Canada by making them a nation of sportsmen, not only as far as baseball or hockey are concerned, but in all forms of everyday life.

When the time comes to make appointments, to do justice or maintain harmony in the country, we will have, thanks to this bill, at least one more reason for being even more united in Canada.

(Text):

Mr. E. J. Campbell (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with very great interest to the fine contributions that have been made by the previous speakers. I must say that I feel there is considerable merit in the suggestions that have been made. It is a great pleasure for me also to have this opportunity to speak for a few moments on this bill which proposes to establish a program to encourage a high standard of physical fitness.

May I say I admired the very broadminded attitude the minister revealed in outlining what he hopes will be accomplished by this measure. To my mind this program could accomplish great good for the people of Canada.

[Mr. Denis.]

I feel certain that this measure can be the means of adding years to the lives of our people and of adding more life to their years.

During my earlier years I had the experience of being an instructor in physical culture. I have not only advocated but have also practised physical fitness for a period of approximately 40 years and so this matter is not a new adventure to me. Many people in my area could, I know, vouch for the truth of the statement I have made.

While the resolution and the bill make reference to "encouragement of physical fitness and sports" and while I have played many games for many years and enjoy them still and agree that there is much benefit to be gained from them, I nevertheless intend at this time to stress the need and the value of fitness for all regardless of how it is acquired rather than limiting my remarks at this stage to the benefits accruing to those who may participate in sports. I was particularly impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) who referred to the benefits that have been and no doubt will continue to ge gained from participation in the 5-BX and 10-BX programs.

I suggest that something continued along that line and broadened to include all the people of Canada might perhaps be of greater benefit than just to train athletes. Since I have been here as the representative of the people of my area in the parliament of Canada I have often thought that the most important contribution I might make would be to do or say something which would encourage the people of our country to follow such a course as is being advocated today. I spoke on this subject in the house on June 22, 1960, as recorded on page 5262 of Hansard. If I may, I should like to review a few of the remarks I made at that time.

May I say that it is my intention to speak about and to attempt to place special emphasis upon the need and the part that a physical fitness program encouraged from the federal level could play in working toward such a goal of improved health. I feel that there are practically unlimited possibilities in this field. I feel that I should at this time also acknowledge that it is generally recognized that the responsibility for this matter of physical fitness falls under the jurisdiction of the provincial authority, but I have long felt that more encouragement should be given from the federal level to encourage and assist the provincial governments, and in turn, the local municipal governments and the people themselves, in a program which would broaden and intensify their efforts in this regard.

Again, on the next page.

I am one of those who believe that health and strength is just as valuable and important to the average businessman and other people as it is to the athlete, and that the same things which the athlete does in a somewhat modified form would also promote strength and health for the one who may not wish to participate in organized sports.

Again, on the next page.

I should like also to point out that the need for a physical fitness program on a national scale is becoming increasingly more important in this day and age when men are devising mechanical ways of doing the work which they did by hand in days gone by. As a result of the increasing nervous strain caused by the pace at which we are moving today I predict that there will be an ever increasing need in the years to come for something to take the place of the work that our bodies were intended by nature to perform.

And finally:

...I should like to take a moment to point out the tremendous benefit that could come to the people of Canada from a dollar and cents standpoint if a concerted effort were made to sponsor a health program which would be dominion wide and in which physical fitness would play a prominent part. I feel this to be especially important at this time since the government has become responsible for the health insurance of the people. An ounce of prevention to my mind is worth any number of pounds of cure. I therefore suggest that the government give most serious consideration to the advisability of encouraging some such program.

I know it is not going to be an easy thing to sell to all the people of our country the idea of keeping fit. In my earlier years I had trouble selling it even to my own family. But as the years have passed by my son now in his twenties finds that his father, who is well on in his fifties, can quite easily set the pace for him still. When my daughters see their mother in her fiftieth year wearing the same size clothes and dancing with the same enthusiasm and ease as she did when she was twenty, I find it becoming a powerful stimulus for them to strive toward that goal which we have attempted to set for them.

I do not say this arrogantly or boastfully. I say it because it is a fact and in the hope that it may prove an inspiration for other people. I know that many people dislike doing any more work than they have to. They seem to feel that the pinnacle of achievement is to get to the place where they do not have to work. I am prepared to agree with the statement that has been made in the house on many occasions, that you cannot legislate virtue. I must say that I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. McDonald) who spoke a few moments ago and suggested that he favoured mass participation. I feel that all of the people, not just the young, should be guided and told of the course that would assist them to maintain their health and strength. I can think of no more worth-while thing for any government to do.

I believe in speaking frankly and because of that may I say that I feel that if this project is to be made to work someone will have to tell the people some things they may not like to hear. I feel sure that the people will have to be told convincingly by someone in authority that, speaking in general terms, we should be more careful about what we eat, and that many people do not get enough of the right food while too many eat more than they need of things that have little real nutritive value. Many people drink too much of things that are destructive to their well-being. Generally speaking we also spend too much time in physical inactivity while at the same time many people indulge at times in activities for which they are not fitted.

We often find ourselves in places where we must, against our will, breathe air that is laden with destructive impurities. For example, we inhale too much tobacco smoke for our good. Even non-smokers find themselves in the position where they must breathe air that has been fouled by the smoke of other people. Yet many people seem to think that the pinnacle of social accomplishment in our day is to be able to inhale great gulps of those same impurities deep down into their lungs and then blow them out again into the air for other people to breathe.

Mr. Pickersgill: Shame.

Mr. Campbell (Lambton-Kent): I ask you, how can we expect to be at our best under these circumstances? I do not have time to discuss fully all the matters I have mentioned but I should like to refer to a number of practical cases with which I have been directly connected. These are cases that have left an indelible impression on my memory and, without doubt in my mind, prove the truth of the points I intend to make. I have in mind a meeting held in the city of London not too long ago at which our own Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was the guest speaker. I happened to be in the unfortunate position where I sat in the midst of three cigar-smoking men, one on each side of me and one behind me, and it seemed to me as though they were deliberately puffing smoke directly into my face all during the evening.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the hon. gentleman making any accusations?

Mr. Campbell (Lambton-Kent): No, I do not think the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) was there.

Mr. Pickersgill: Maybe his smoke was.

Mr. Campbell (Lambton-Kent): While I did survive, the air was almost blue with smoke and a man close to me fainted because, to my mind, he lacked good air.

He slumped to the floor and the confusion caused the Prime Minister to terminate his remarks and the meeting adjourned.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Campbell (Lambton-Kent): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is he suggesting that as a cure?

Mr. Campbell (Lambton-Kent): I am suggesting as a fact that we do inhale more tobacco smoke than is good for us.

I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the newspaper under the heading, "Medical Association Cites Cigarettes for Cancer." I should like to read this part of that article:

> The Canadian Medical Association for the first time has gone on record as saying that cigarette smoking causes lung cancer.
> Until now the association had avoided a direct statement on smoking and cancer, but at its annual meeting Tuesday, the general council of the Canadian Medical Association approved a report linking the two and called on doctors to point out the dangers of smoking to their patients.

This was in Montreal. Another example along the same line but having to do with some of the other points I tried to bring out, is the experience I had in the prize ring in my early years as a boxer. I am thinking of the man who gave me the most difficult battle I ever had. He beat me the first time; I obtained a draw on our second meeting, and I beat him on the third meeting. However, that man died about ten years ago. I also have in mind two other men who were outstanding baseball players in our district. They have both died. These three men were all a little heavier than I was when they were at their best, but when they died they were about 50 pounds overweight. They died when they were still young men. As I have said, this proves that we perhaps eat too much and we eat things that are not good for us. We drink too much, too.

May I say, too, that when I came down here as a member I endeavoured to revive the custom of playing a few games of baseball, and to encourage some of the boys to try to get in condition. I knew what had happened here, and I knew of the tragic occurrence during a game being played here. Some of my well meaning friends in the house suggested that I should act my age; that I should not make any attempt to re-organize the games at this time. I did make the statement then that I thought we could die faster sitting in these chairs than we would on the ball field if we kept ourselves in shape by playing games. I am sorry to say that that prophecy has been fulfilled. There have been a number of members who have died, and a number of them were younger than I am. I am pleased to be able to say that none of those who participated in the games we have played became casualties. The members to whom I have referred were not athletes. They may have been athletes in their earlier days, but they did not take part in the games we played here. I could cite many other cases to prove the point I have in mind.

For example, I have seen men who could shovel tons of grain, corn and sugar beet on their farms day after day without apparent ill effect. However, after a short time of retirement and a period of idleness they would break down while moving a bit of light, fluffy snow off their sidewalk. They were not fitted to do the work they had previously done.

Now, I feel certain that this legislation could serve a most useful purpose if it were to have the effect of developing a number of good athletes. Then, these athletes could go around the country and tell the people how they became good athletes and how they intend to remain good athletes. The example they set would be an inspiration to the rest of the people. I would stress the point, however, that it is not enough to play games for a while, and on this point I am in disagreement with an hon. member who spoke a while ago and said the playing of games should be limited to those between the ages of 14 and 21 or 22. I stress the fact, as I say, that it is not enough to play games for a while and expect to keep strong and healthy for the rest of your life. It is like your bank balance, you must keep adding to it if you hope to keep spending or you will go broke.

May I venture to say that I have seen many athletes who had trouble in their later years because they trained only for the purpose of excelling at a sport, and for nothing else. When the sport failed to give them a substantial financial return, they neglected themselves and returned to an untrained condition. In this untrained condition they are sometimes tempted to do what they used to be able to do while they were in training. The result is that they have a breakdown in their early years. Apparently, they fail to appreciate the value of maintaining a high standard of physical efficiency or are interested only in the money they receive from the sport. The most important purpose of sport, in the final analysis, is to exemplify the use that can be made of a body that is physically fit. I feel, therefore, there should be those who can speak with authority, who can not only advise people on how to become athletes but also on how they can retain their athletic ability in the later years of life. May I also stress the fact that those who are less inclined to take part in sports for various reasons, who never try to make the team, are the ones who need the training most and who would benefit from it to a greater degree.

In my opinion, physical fitness comes ahead of athletic prowess. If you are fit, you can become athletic. If you engage in strenuous activities without being fitted for them, you are inviting trouble. I think we witnessed proof of that right on our front lawn here not too many years ago. It is much more important to keep fit in later life than it is to merely learn to play games during one's youth and then neglect oneself later. It is my well considered opinion, based on observation and experience over a period of many years, that the time when there is the greatest need to be physically fit is in the later years of life, when there is a tendency to let down and take things easy. If one has been active in sports in early life, the need becomes even greater than ever for some form of training to be continued in the later years. The medical profession acknowledges that the later years are the dangerous years. I feel very strongly about the fact that any program that is developed should be designed to encourage the people of all ages to engage in sport and thereby benefit from any plan that is approved. In my opinion it is much more important to health to keep fit later in life than merely to learn to play games in the period of youth. By nature the young are generally blessed with the desire to be active. The very young are almost impossible to keep quiet. We older people sometimes need a bit of prodding to get us to do what we know we should do. Our bodies were designed to be worked. I have often stated that it is by work and care of our bodies that we earn and deserve the right to be fit.

At this point I should like to refer to a number of statements that were made by Dr. Thomas K. Cureton, of Urbana, Illinois, a noted authority on physical fitness, while speaking on this subject in London, Ontario, recently. I am quoting from a press report:

> —a person can extend his or her active life by 15 to 20 years... by following a moderate program of exercise and relaxation, said Dr. Thomas K. Cureton, of Urbana, Illinois...
> In the United States each year approximately 1,300,000 people have coronary attacks, he said. "They just fold up and it is not due to any disease that can be identified under a microscope. The general state of physical fitness in the United States and Canada is a bit pitiful."
>
> Habits make the difference, he said. Graphs charting the fitness of thousands of people show a pronounced decline at the middle-twenties,—
>
> Graphs charting the fitness of thousands of people show a pronounced decline at the middle-twenties, when most young people drop active sports for career and household duties.
>
> "Our bodies should be constantly trained to meet the physical and mental stresses that crop up suddenly—"it might be shovelling snow, or severe tension or over-excitement."
> He advised all mature individuals to adopt a definite plan of exercise, with these points in mind.

That is why I stated I do not agree with the remarks of the hon. member who spoke. I should like to repeat this sentence:

I should also like to refer to the remarks made by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner) while speaking in this house on March 16 last as recorded at page 3063 of Hansard. I may say that the hon. member for Jasper-Edson was speaking on the agriculture estimates and was dealing with the use of butter at that particular time. But since he also referred to another matter I am going to quote him here. He states:

> —butter is a grade A food which we can eat and enjoy without regard for the bogey man of coronary thrombosis, for behind the threat of coronary thrombosis are a number of other factors besides the cholesterol level in the blood.
> I think the greatest underlying factor is a lack of exercise. Canadians and the people of the United States in general are victims of what we might call transportationitis which leads to their taking little physical exercise. This rather than the overeating of fats is probably the greatest cause of heart disease. Of course, I hasten to say that moderation in all things is a sound principle the application of which is essential for good health and this applies to the consumption of animal fats as it applies to other foods.

May I say that I am not one of those who subscribe to the idea that our days are numbered, no matter what we do. I sincerely believe that we can definitely and deliberately add considerably to the length of our own days and, just as definitely, add to the measure of enjoyment of those days, by the way in which we care for our bodies. I believe that we will just as definitely reduce the length of our lives and the measure of enjoyment we get while we live, by taking the opposite course of neglect and misuse. There is a scriptural recording to be found in the 90th psalm, verse 12, which reads as follows:

> So teach us to number our days, that we might apply our hearts unto wisdom.

To my mind that is a divine inference that we may number our own days by the way in which we live now. I do not intend the things I have said to seem unkind. In fact, I intend them to be the opposite. While some of the statements may seem to be unkind now, I predict that as the years pass, the day will come when most of those who are listening here and most of those who may read what I have said will agree that the suggestions I have made here are the most kindly and most friendly advice that I could have given on this matter. If you lose your health and strength, you have lost everything of value. If you can improve your health and keep it longer, you will have gained the greatest treasure.

I am very pleased to have contributed something to a measure which I am sure can help the people by pointing the way toward that goal whereby they may maintain that sense of well being that will enable them to skip, to run, to jump, to dance, to play, to row a canoe down the Rideau river, to chop a log of firewood, to walk from their home to the parliament buildings or to do almost anything within reason. I suggest that if you keep yourself in condition for these things you can go on year after year doing these things you like to do. I know it can be done by those who are willing to train to that end. I am glad to say something to encourage that training.

These things that I have outlined today, Mr. Speaker, are some of the things that I feel a physical fitness council or representatives of such a council will be obliged to tell the people of our country if they hope to accomplish the greatest measure of success and to make this resolution or this bill serve the purpose it should serve.

May I conclude by saying that I am glad to be able to lend my support to any measure which will inspire the people, young or old, to strive toward that goal whereby they might obtain and maintain that greatest of all possessions, namely health and strength.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I should like to associate myself with the hon. members who have preceded me in speaking in their congratulations to the Minister of National Health and Welfare for bringing this resolution before the house. I feel that every member of the house will be in support of this type of resolution. I am sure also that they will join with me in feeling that very beneficial results can follow if this resolution is properly administered. Certainly we all hope that will be the case. The results which can come from legislation such as this are of course, as has been mentioned by previous speakers and as is well known, a healthier nation and a greater national pride. These are probably the two things which are most important in this bill. As I see it, there are two ways in which legislation of this nature can take effect. The first is that it can be forced upon the people. The other—which applies in Canada at least, and I believe it is the only one which should apply—is that this legislation should tend to make sports so attractive that the majority of our people will wish to participate.

[Mr. Campbell (Lambton-Kent).]

The question is asked at the outset, "Why is financial assistance needed in this regard?" I think the first answer is that it is needed to provide the necessary facilities to allow more people to participate in amateur sport and a fitness program. The organization of such a program and the tremendous job of coaching needed is necessarily going to require large sums of money. Travelling expenses for our international representatives, although taken care of normally through other means, should be given consideration in the moneys which are available through this legislation. Then there is the question of the promotion of leadership and incentive to take part in amateur sport. In the promotion of leadership and incentive large sums of money will be required to line up the program across the nation.

I should like at this time to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith), who said that the incentive to take part is possibly one of the more important aspects which has to be put across to the people. As far as I am concerned, the incentive to take part is the most important aspect. If a person has not the incentive to take part in a program of this nature, he might as well forget about it.

All of us have had the experience of desiring our children to take part in sports or athletics of some sort. I think that without giving it too much thought many of us from time to time have felt it is essential that our children should do this. To a point it is fairly essential. But as far as team sports are concerned, I have found that a person should be encouraged in the first instance to give it a try. If after giving it a try they find out that they do not desire to continue in that sport, I do not think they should be given any further encouragement, because if they have not the incentive to take part in the sport they will only be a headache to somebody in the future. Therefore in my opinion the incentive to take part is one of the more important aspects of this type of legislation.

This, along with the provision of facilities and the organization of coaching for such a program is going to be one of the main tasks with which the council will have to deal. I believe this can present quite a problem. I think the suggestions put forward in some of the speeches made this afternoon will provide a certain amount of guidance to the council when set up.

There is one other aspect of a program of this nature that is almost as important, if not just as important, as promoting the incentive to take part. I refer to the vast number of volunteer workers throughout Canada who have given freely of their time for many years in order to promote the incentive for young people to take part in various forms of amateur sport. Without these workers this or any other country would never get very far. These are the people whom it is impossible for any country to replace by paid workers. These are the people who will have to be given a great deal of consideration by the council when it is set up.

When I say they will have to be given a great deal of consideration, I do not mean that consideration should be given in any way, shape or form to paying these people salaries. However, I do feel that money must be spent on encouraging these people who have been doing this work to continue in it. We should encourage more volunteer workers to enter this field. I think the way in which this money can best be spent is in seeing that these people are financially able to attend coaching schools, which schools will undoubtedly have to be set up under this program.

I am sure that every hon. member in the house has come in contact in his own community and others with this vast army of volunteer workers. I am sure we all realize how important they are. However, I should like to dwell on this subject for a moment or two because I believe it is a most important one.

In the town of Flin Flon, Manitoba, in which I live we have been very well blessed with the tremendous number of volunteer workers we have had throughout the years in the field of promoting amateur sport and fitness among the residents of that town. This has resulted in winning a tremendous number of provincial championships for the town. They are too numerous to mention at this time. I believe the number of provincial championships won by teams and individuals representing the town of Flin Flon is a record unsurpassed by any other town in Manitoba.

I am not saying this in a selfish manner of pride in the town of Flin Flon or on behalf of the citizens of the town, but I am trying to make a point in regard to these volunteer workers. Four years ago the junior hockey club of Flin Flon, the Flin Flon Bombers, was successful in winning the memorial cup, emblematic of the junior hockey championship of Canada.

An hon. Member: Amateurs?

Mr. Simpson: Yes, definitely amateurs. Junior hockey in Canada has climbed to a point where most of our major cities only support one club. Some cities, such as Winnipeg, support three or four clubs; but in general even the large eastern cities only support one, and sometimes, two, junior hockey clubs. In fact, most of these cities have on their rosters players imported from all parts of Canada. But when the Flin Flon Bombers won the memorial cup in the spring of 1957, from a town of 15,000 people 11 out of the 15 players on the roster were local boys who had learned and played all their hockey in the town of Flin Flon.

They were playing against a club from the Ottawa-Hull district which had a club with players in it from all over Canada. I must agree that as far as the coaching end of the Flin Flon hockey club is concerned we had a man who is, in my opinion, the top junior coach in Canada and a lot of credit is certainly due to Mr. Bobby Kirk, the coach of that club. However, I do not believe this would ever have been accomplished if it were not for the large number of volunteer workers who gave so freely of their time to managing, coaching, officiating, time keeping etc. and generally taking care of the minor hockey clubs in our town. As I said before, this applies of course to many parts of Canada.

Now I should like to deal with one or two ideas as to how this money could be used to best advantage. First of all, as has been mentioned before, I think the council should give considerable attention to the possibility of conducting nationally sponsored coaching schools in the various provinces of Canada. When I talk about these coaching schools I should like to offer a word of suggestion to the council. I suggest they take a look at the system which the national hockey league has been using for a number of years. The league sends a well known coach and a well known referee to various cities across Canada to conduct one-day clinics in coaching and officiating. This has been beneficial. I think it has shown good results, particularly in western Canada. However, I do not want to see this same system adopted by the council. It is not too bad as far as a one-day school for officials is concerned, because there you have an official of the national hockey league sitting down and discussing the problems which arise in refereeing a hockey game and here you have a teacher instructing people who are going to use this information. But when it comes to a one-day coaching school the situation is entirely different. Here you have a well-known coach attempting to pass on to other people interested in coaching all the fundamentals of coaching a hockey team. He is trying to do all this in one day—to pass on lessons which it has taken him years and years of experience to learn. The difficult part is that he is not only teaching these men how to coach, but that they in turn have to go out and try to impart this information to the players. The idea is all right but I do not think that one day is sufficient for a school of this nature. I would therefore suggest that when these coaching schools go across the country serious consideration should be given to extending them over a period of three, four or five days in each area, and for a further period if necessary. I also think the council should consider setting up nationally sponsored schools in most regions of Canada for volunteer workers, not only to impart to them the idea that Canada in general appreciates their services but to impart ways and means of adding to their value in this field.

I think, also, that schools should be conducted for organizers in the various parts of Canada. Some people may say we are going to have too many schools. However, these are three entirely different fields of endeavour; one is for coaching, the other is for volunteer workers and the other is for organizers. I feel it is essential we should have these organizers, particularly if any form of recreation in addition to strictly amateur sport and fitness is to be taken into consideration.

A few years ago, when legislation similar to this was in being, the province of Manitoba was among the provinces which took advantage of the federal legislation to the extent that it assisted communities which had decided to employ a recreation director. The provincial authority paid part of the cost incurred by the communities concerned. The result was good in many cases, but in some cases the municipalities were merely engaging these men because federal aid was available. Their programs fell through, and eventually the legislation was taken off the statute books in Ottawa and discontinued. I think the council which will be set up under the terms of this legislation should give consideration to assisting, through the provincial authorities, any communities which are interested in paying their share of acquiring a recreation director.

The legislation with which we are dealing is certainly very controversial, and many of us have our own ideas of how it should be worked out. In 1958 there was a Canadian Press ballot asking the following question: "Should the federal government subsidize amateur sport in an effort to develop athletes of international calibre for a healthier nation?" The voting at that time was 86 in favour and 20 against. Hon. members will see, therefore, that this, is a very controversial question. However, I am sure every one of us here is anxious to see this bill come into force and to play his part in seeing that it works.

There are many who feel that all forms of recreation should come under this bill. I know that a large number of the people in the town in which I live feel this way. However, for the time being I think the council should take its first look at assisting fitness and amateur sport. As time goes on, possibly the other forms of recreation could be included. If that were to come about I think more money would be needed. However, I believe that could wait for a year or two yet.

I believe, also, that when we talk of sponsored coaches and organizers the council should give consideration to hiring coaches and organizers on a full time basis in some specific cases. But they must be men of proven ability. There have been times in the past when Canada has lost valuable coaches through the lack of employment opportunities in this field in Canada. I think they should be careful about this and that consideration should not be given to everyone who may call himself a coach. Only coaches of proven ability should be given this consideration.

I think we must examine means of making better use of our existing facilities to achieve greater results in this field. When we examine the question of assisting our teams to participate in the field of international sports we should consider the possibility of using the facilities of the Royal Canadian Air Force as a means of transporting our players. The planes of the R.C.A.F. make trips during the week to many countries in the world and perhaps these facilities could be used by our athletes representing Canada in international sports events.

Greater use should also be made of the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to publicize important sports events and our outstanding athletes. Many people have said that the radio has made the national hockey league the financial success it is. This applies not only to Toronto but other areas. I agree that radio broadcasts have tended to increase the gates in various cities and I feel that the C.B.C. through its television facilities could render a valuable service to amateur sports in Canada by giving them publicity. If more publicity were given to our national athletes through television and other means an additional incentive would be created for more people to participate in sports events.

I do not recall having seen televised a single national amateur hockey final. Professional hockey games are televised consistently and often the national league finals are not sponsored but are presented as a public service of the C.B.C. The same should be done with respect to amateur finals.

Each of us must ask himself this question: How do I feel about Canada's prestige in the matter of international sports events such as the Olympic games? As legislators we must answer this question. The sports council, of course, must also face this question and answer it. We talk glibly about our prestige and national pride in athletics, but what do we actually do about it? I have advanced a few suggestions which I feel are deserving of consideration. I wish particularly to stress the importance of achieving greater publicity through the facilities of the C.B.C. I ask hon. members to consider how well they remember the athletes who through a great deal of self denial have brought honours to Canada by winning Olympic gold medals. Most of us recall, of course, how thrilled we were as a nation when Percy Williams astounded all the experts by bringing two gold medals to Canada in 1928 when he won both the 100 metre and the 200 metre dash. This was the second time that Canada had won a sprint. I wonder how many hon. members will recall who brought that honour to Canada on a previous occasion? In 1908 Mr. R. Kerr won the 200 metre event in the Olympics.

We remember people such as Percy Williams simply because of the publicity which was given at the time of the event. Probably none of us has given a second thought to the fact that in 1928 when Percy Williams returned from the Olympic games with two gold medals Ethel Catherwood of Saskatoon also brought home a gold medal for winning the ladies' running high jump. I recall this because on her return a public reception was held in her honour at Winnipeg.

We all remember Barbara Ann Scott who in 1948 won the ladies' figure skating event but we remember her mainly because of the publicity that was accorded her success. How many of us remember Canada's only gold medalist in individual events in 1952? Honours were won in that year by young George Genereux of Saskatoon in the trap shooting event. Back in 1908 the same honour was brought to Canada when the gold medal was won by W. H. Ewing. I wonder how many of us remember the names Robert Paul and Barbara Wagner who won the figure skating pairs medal this year at Squaw Valley? Probably in a year or two their names will have been forgotten by many of us. We do not forget the names of people like Jesse Owens and other United States winners because of the tremendous publicity accorded them. Their names are by-words when we come to think of athletics. We tend to forget the names of our Canadian athletes and yet as a nation we sometimes feel very deflated when our athletes fail to measure up to the standards of the athletes of other nations.

Some hon. members have suggested that we must be careful not to allow this money to be spent in such a way that professionals will receive the final benefits and with this I agree. I am heartily in accord with the statement made by the hon. member for Calgary South who said that professional sport certainly has its place in our way of life. Professional sport serves as an incentive to many young people to participate in amateur games, an incentive which we as legislators and citizens have probably failed to give them.

Before closing I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the record of Canadian athletes in Olympic games in the past. Of how many of these outstanding athletes have we even heard? The marathon was won only once, by Mr. W. J. Sherring in 1906. The 10,000 metre walk was won only once, by Mr. G. H. Goulding, in 1912. The 110 metre hurdle was won only once, by Mr. E. J. Thomson in 1920. The men's running high jump was won once in 1932. This event was given a little publicity so probably many of us remember Dunc MacNaughton. The sled dog racing event was won once, in 1932 by Emil St. Godard of The Pas, Manitoba.

Turning now to hockey it will be remembered that Canada won the event in 1920, 1924, 1928 and 1932. It was not until 1936 that for the first time Canada did not win. That was the year that Great Britain, with a team composed mostly of players who learned their hockey in Canada, won the Olympic hockey event. In 1948 and 1952 Canada won but in 1956 the U.S.S.R. won and in 1960 the event was won by the United States.

As I said, there are some who say that we must make sure that this money is not spent so that the professional people will derive the ultimate benefit. When some of them say that, I think that possibly they have in mind the hockey situation in Canada today. I think that amateur hockey in Canada should be given all the support that the council can give it because the Canadian amateur hockey association, one of the largest sport groups in Canada, with a registration of approximately 120,000 players from the lowest age group up, has only one paid official, their secretary-manager, Mr. Gordon Juckes of Melville, Saskatchewan. They have only one paid official in their whole organization which looks after the interests of 120,000 children. When you compare Canada's hockey record with its record in other sports in Olympic competition, I think it is obvious that this is one sport that should be given every encouragement by the committee so that our prestige in Olympic competition with respect to our national game can be restored and maintained in the future in order that Canada may come out on top in Olympic competition in this event as we did in the past.

Advisory Council on Sports

In the 1960 summer Olympic games Canada finished twenty sixth out of 53 countries competing and in the winter Olympics at Squaw Valley Canada finished eighth out of 16. When our children come home from school with their report cards and have marks under 50 we feel that something is wrong and something must be done about the situation. If we look at our record in the 1960 Olympics we find that in the winter games we did get 50 per cent but in the summer Olympics we were slightly below that mark. So far as the field of international sport is concerned, I would say that the council to be set up should take into consideration all factors which will assist Canada to produce athletes who can compare favourably with the athletes of other countries. It is not always absolutely necessary that they win. As long as they go to these games and give a good account of themselves, we are all proud of them. However, I believe that the council should give the fullest consideration to those athletes who will be competing in international sport. I should like to suggest particularly that the council should not be scared away from hockey because of the fact that the professionals eventually get most of our hockey players. I think the council should take a look at our great record in hockey in the past and give it as much support as any other branch of amateur sport in Canada.

Mr. M. L. McFarlane (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, at this time I should also like to extend my congratulations to the minister for bringing in this legislation. I believe it is good legislation and I certainly support the contention of previous speakers this afternoon. I do not believe we can minimize the importance of sport in its various phases from amateur right through to professional. A great deal has been said this afternoon about those who have excelled in various sports in the past. I should like to ask the question, what about those who do not excel? What about the average hockey player, the average basketball player, the average tennis player or the average player in any kind of sport? I think these are the people whom we should assist.

At the present time there are established councils all across Canada. There are a great number in small communities as well as a great number in the larger centres. I think these are the people who need assistance. I should like to suggest to the minister that we use our existing government agencies. In most districts across Canada there are already recreational directors who have been appointed by a province or municipality or perhaps by a county. I believe we should use the present administrative set-up rather than establishing elaborate administrative machinery at this time. I believe we should work with the municipal authorities who are in possession of the facts as to local needs and the necessity of promoting sport among the younger generation.

I was very pleased to see that the word "recreation" has been omitted from the bill. Otherwise we would have been in the impossible position of possibly supplying coaches for ardent bridge players or golfers and we might even have found ourselves in the position of supplying coaches for those who play tiddly-winks. I believe that we should cut down the overhead and see that financial help is given to the smaller groups rather than spending tremendous amounts on administration and for council meetings, joint meetings and other meetings all over Canada.

There is another point I should like to bring to the minister's attention. We must cover all types of sport. Various organizations have made pleas. I received one this afternoon from the Canadian amateur hockey association. I believe we should also give consideration to the Canadian amateur basketball association, the Canadian amateur football association, the Canadian amateur rugby association and so on so that we will cover all kinds of sport.

I should also like to have the assurance that the $5 million will be spent for the benefit of those in need of physical fitness, and I believe that in initiating this program we have to start with the youth of the country. Thousands of our younger generation are looking for leadership at the present time and I know that the minister and the government are capable of and willing to give such leadership.

A great deal has been said this afternoon about the necessity of training coaches. I should like to take a slightly different view. I believe coaches are a necessity but what might happen is that we might train a great number of coaches who would be allocated to the larger centres in Canada. I believe that the situation is just as serious in our smaller municipal centres where it would be impossible to obtain people qualified to teach amateur sports to a small group. Elimination of the smaller centres in Canada would have a serious effect. If we look at the line-ups of teams that have excelled in different sports we will find that the majority of the players have come from small communities.

At this point I should like to take hon. members back a few years to 1936 or 1937. In British Columbia at that time there was formed what was called a "pro-rec" department. The provincial government of the day spent thousands of dollars on this program which in my view was a very good one if it had been properly organized and administered. In my own little area, we received over $2,000 worth of physical education equipment, and yet today I do not believe that any part of this equipment can be located. I feel we have a tremendous job to do in supplying leadership for this program.

In addition, I should like to suggest that we should support those who are working with our younger people in all lines of sports. They will produce better hockey players, better baseball players, better basketball players, better lacrosse players, across Canada. There are a great number of these sports that have been played on small playing fields or small sheets of ice, without the use of the elaborate buildings that have been suggested from time to time in this debate. I cannot help, Mr. Speaker, but pass along a word of congratulation to all those voluteer workers to which the previous speaker referred, who are the backbone of our amateur sports in Canada. It is on the basis of their work that we are going to establish this physical fitness and make it possible for our young people in Canada to reach that goal towards which they have been striving for a number of years.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the minister upon the introduction of this bill. I think it is an excellent one and one which is long overdue. I believe it will be one that will provide a broad basis upon which governments, federal, provincial and municipal, will be able to build. We should keep in mind, at the same time, all the pitfalls that are related to the problems of coaching, classes and the even distribution of funds across Canada.

It is no secret that young Canadians have not participated in sports and training to the extent that they should. This participation in training has become necessary over the years in the light of changing conditions in Canada. In 1900 over 50 per cent of the population was engaged in working on farms, doing physical work from daylight to dark. Today, only 10 per cent of the people work on farms because these farms have become mechanized and most of the heavy work is done by machinery. The greater part of our population today is living in urban areas. Even here, the physical work is being cut to a minimum through the use of power mowers, power shovels and snow ploughs. All these things have reduced the physical work tremendously. Shorter working hours have provided a great deal of leisure time. As a matter of fact, not long ago I saw a statement by a psychologist to the effect that the ideal day consists of eight hours work, eight hours sleep, and eight hours play. I believe it is the eight hours of playtime that must be better planned. People require physical work to keep their muscles, heart and other organs functioning properly. People require physical work not only to keep these organs fit but also in order to eliminate waste products in the bloodstream and to burn up other by-products which may be deposited in the body and do irreparable harm.

It is a fact that most Canadians follow occupations which are classed as sedentary. Most of us overeat and do not take sufficient exercise, if we take any at all. Any contribution that this bill will make towards interesting the people of Canada in proper exercise and physical fitness, will contribute in no small measure to the happiness of the individual and to his feeling of well being. In addition, it will also add a few years of extra life. The interest aroused in physical fitness and regular exercise will result in improving the mental condition of our people. I am thinking particularly of the stresses and strains of modern life which drive people to seek tranquillizers and sleeping pills. A physically tired body is a healthy body and of itself encourages relaxation and sleep.

I think, too, of our teenagers and young people with all the spare time that they have on their hands. The other day I noticed that a religionist pointed out that the spare time we have today is one of the tragedies of our time; that the responsibility of charting the activities in which young people engage must be faced by all of us. The fashion for the young people is to get a car of some vintage or other and go places. Most of the appeal is from commercial establishments trying to make a dollar from these people. Some of these teenagers join gangs. An outlet must be found for all this youthful exuberance, and it is small wonder that it finds an outlet in fights and so forth. An interest in sport is inherent in most youngsters, therefore we do have a great responsibility in providing opportunities for planned sport, physical fitness classes and general activities which require physical work. None of our youth in Canada must be by-passed. We must give the youth of this country an opportunity to try to mobilize to become physically and morally strong people with the spiritual courage to make Canada a model for the world to copy.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I deem it a privilege to rise and speak briefly on this bill to encourage physical fitness and amateur sport. I do not intend to go into the broad principles of the bill which have been well covered by the many speakers who have preceded me. However, sir, there is one sport to which I should like to refer and there is one part of the bill about which I should like to speak briefly. I do not want anyone to think I am partial to a particular sport. However, we have heard references to hockey, lacrosse, baseball, football and a great variety of sports. I should like to bring to the attention of the minister amateur rowing.

Now, amateur rowing is a sport in which many municipalities cannot participate because it is a water sport. However, it is a sport in which the participants must attain a very high standard of physical fitness. They must spend many long hours in training, and often with very little publicity. This particular sport, amateur rowing, is well supported by our universities and colleges, and in many cases by our public and high schools. It is a sport, therefore, that we must keep to the forefront; we must not allow it to die out. It is a sport that requires very expensive equipment, but there seem to be those throughout the country who are prepared to help supply it. I think the minister should also lend his support. Many Canadians who in the past have followed this sport have gone abroad and in competition with oarsmen from other countries have brought to Canada national fame through winning what is known as the Diamond Sculls which is the world championship for rowing. I can recall at the present time four who brought that honour to Canada.

In the riding which I have the honour to represent we have a very active rowing club which is fully supported by the high schools. We also have the Henley course which is the course to which students from many high schools in the province of Ontario and in other parts of Canada come from time to time during the summer to hold their contests. At the Henley course there we also have once a year the big event, when teams from the United States and all over Canada come to contest for the international championship.

Rowing is probably not the most important sport in Canada but nevertheless it is an important sport in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Germany, and more particularly in Great Britain. It is a sport that develops strength of character. It is truly a builder of physical fitness and young manhood. When the Minister of National Health and Welfare is considering the setting up of the physical fitness council, which is part of the bill, I would ask that he give consideration to having on that council someone who is an authority on amateur rowing, as I feel that rowing is a very important sport for our universities, our colleges and our high schools.

I am not going to deal any further with the bill. I realize that many have spoken. I concur in most of what has been said and I wish to lend my support one hundred per cent to the bill itself.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure you at the outset that I shall be very brief in the remarks I have to make regarding this very outstanding piece of legislation which the minister has brought before us. I think all phases have been covered very thoroughly. However, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and the council that he shall appoint the fact that, to the best of my knowledge, nowhere in Canada is there a university that provides a degree in the faculty of physical education. I believe that anyone in Canada who wishes to specialize in this field must go to the United States in order to obtain such a degree. I would think that Canada has arrived at the point, having regard to her population and her stature, that we should have in Canada a university that would provide such a degree in physical education.

At this time, if I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest that the University of Toronto, at their faculty of agriculture situated in Guelph, has one of the finest physical education buildings to be found anywhere in North America. It would lend itself ideally to the formation of a faculty of physical education for Canada.

I should like to say how much I as a member appreciate—as I am sure do all other hon. members—the great work the volunteer coaches are doing in the field of amateur sport throughout Canada. I am sure this legislation will serve a very useful purpose in bringing about fitness and improving amateur sport throughout Canada. In so doing we shall be developing young Canadians who will be the citizens of tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief at this stage. I should just like to thank all hon. members for their contributions today. I know there has been a great deal of co-operation in the past. It is true that I mentioned that matter earlier in speeches that have been made in the house on private members bills previously. I think it is the unanimous opinion of the house that the bill should be passed. I can assure all hon. members that every suggestion which has been brought before the house today will be presented to the council for its consideration. I appreciate all the advice that has been offered and it will also be passed on. Many excellent ideas have been put forward, some varying somewhat from others, but at any rate they will all be presented to the council for consideration. I shall, of course, be very happy to go into details on the bill when we come to the committee stage.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Chown in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 7—Council established.

Mr. Clermont: I would ask the minister who will appoint the member from each province?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The governor in council. The members are appointed by the governor in council.

Mr. Clermont: I would direct the minister's attention to the fact that the French text states that he will be appointed by the province. The wording is as follows:

(Translation):

(4) Each province shall have on the Council at least one member appointed by the province.

(Text):

Mr. Monteith (Perth): May I ask the hon. member to repeat that?

Mr. Clermont: This is the French wording:

(Translation):

(4) Each province shall have on the Council at least one member appointed by the province.

(Text):

Do you mean the province?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I fail to understand how that clause 7, subclause 4, reads in that way in French. In the English version it reads as follows:

(4) Of the members of the council, at least one shall be appointed from each province.

We will take this into consideration, of course, but I understand the French version does indicate that the province will name the members.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am afraid there is something wrong in the printing here. Can you advise me what to do in these circumstances, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Denis: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, the minister could amend the English version.

The Deputy Chairman: I suggest that the correction be made in subsequent printings of the French version. If the minister asserts that the clause is properly worded in the English version, then the only logical solution would be to make the correction in subsequent printings of the French version.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am assuming that will transpire, will it? That correction will be made in subsequent printings?

The Deputy Chairman: Is this the wish of the committee?

Mr. Denis: Seriously, Mr. Chairman, why do we not amend the English version so that each province could name at least one member? I suppose that if the province is led by the C.C.F., there are some C.C.F.er's who are good sports and they might find in their ranks someone to represent their party. The same thing applies to the Social Credit party. I think it would be just and fair that the province should name at least one member of the council. I think the minister could do that. It will not hurt if at least one member is named by each province, because even if there were nine from each province, that would be fair.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am not indicating exactly how this appointment from each province will be made, but the intent of the bill is that one member shall be appointed from each province. I prefer to stand by the English version.

Mr. Benidickson: I think that perhaps in our large province of Ontario the most western area might have an opportunity to be represented on the council.

Mr. Chairman, I know the minister is tolerant and I may be rather late in asking him a question or two. However, I should like to ask the minister whether or not he foresees that a municipal enterprise such as that in Kenora, about which I am very concerned, might in the development of swimming pools, tracks, interior tennis areas and so on, receive a small guarantee in this regard. I wonder whether it might also receive a contribution under the program of the minister contained in this bill?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I believe this clause has been passed, but I am glad to mention that of course the projects would come up through the provinces under provincial agreements, just as they do under the national health grants. As a consequence, if the province puts forward a project I assume it will be considered by the council.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in connection with the point raised by my hon. friend from Labelle. I do not think we can leave this point as it is because, as the hon. member has pointed out, the English bill clearly states:

Of the members of the council, at least one shall be appointed from each province.

On the other hand, the language in the French version of the bill indicates that the province shall appoint. Under those circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I think there is only one thing to do; that would be for you to consult the Clerk of the house as to whether there is a precedent for this situation, and what under the circumstances is the best method of determining the point. We certainly cannot have a bill in the English language saying one thing and the same bill in the French language leaving it open to another interpretation. I am sure that is the last thing the minister would want. This is a suggestion that I throw out for what it is worth. It seems to me to be a reasonable one.

The Deputy Chairman: I have already sent a suggestion to the house leader by messenger that an amendment to the French version could be offered by the government to correct the situation. It is not incumbent upon the Chair to consult with the Clerk of the house so much as I think it is for the government to correct the situation by the appropriate amendment.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I thought the two languages were official. In my view there is another mistake in the title. The English says "fitness" and the French says "la santé". I think "la santé" would be translated by the word "health", but one can be healthy and not fit for such sports or activities.

Mr. Drysdale: Then how would the hon. member translate "fitness"?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that "health" may be a proper interpretation of "fitness" in the same sense. I am sorry I am not sufficiently well versed in the French language to be able to give a proper translation. I admit that a healthy person might have a good blood pressure and all that sort of thing, but he might still not be too fit.

Mr. Denis: Yes.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I accept that. In my interpretation "fitness" does mean "health". If a person is healthy, then I think he has a certain degree of fitness.

Mr. Denis: I still do not quite understand this word "fitness".

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Would "aptitude" be the word for "fitness"?

Mr. Benidickson: Let us develop the people who have not the aptitude.

Mr. Denis: "Condition physique" would be a better translation than "la santé".

Mr. Chambers: Let us deal with one at a time.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I am not too well versed in the French language but I wonder whether the effect of clause 7 (4) would be carried out if we left out the words "qu'elle a nommé" and put a period after the word "membre"? Would this give the same effect as the English translation? I think that although the two languages are equal the Minister of National Health and Welfare is more familiar with the English language and would tend to look at the English version and assume that the translation gave the same effect. I think if we removed the words "qu'elle a nommé" and put a period after the word "membre" the French version would have the same effect as the English version.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I think that after the brilliant suggestion of the previous speaker I shall recommend him as a new member of "académie française" very soon. I would move that the last four words of the subclause be removed. The new subclause would then read:

(Translation):

Each province shall have on the Council at least one member.

And the last four words of subclause 4 would be dropped.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: It now develops that there are two inaccurate translations to this bill, the first as pointed out by the hon. member for Labelle and the second by the hon. member for St. Denis. As I look at this and at the clock I am wondering whether it would not be more advisable to ask the translators to look at this matter during the dinner recess, meanwhile standing the title and the clause, because although I think the intention of the amendment moved by the minister and so ably initiated by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond is a good one, nonetheless I personally do not like the way the sentence in French now ends. It seems to me there might be a more elegant way of doing it. So I suggest that for greater clarity, to expedite the business of the house and also to preserve the two official languages, the course I have mentioned should be taken.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I have no objection to that being done. I was just wondering if the committee would agree to deal with the other clauses.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, since the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) has spoken of the French Academy and since he is in the process of becoming a member of that famous body, perhaps he could lend a hand to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) so that the title of the bill we are now considering be translated adequately.

In my opinion, the word "fitness" should be translated in French by the words "condition physique", which is "physical condition" in English.

This has nothing to do with health. In fact, I could easily be an excellent hockey player and have trouble.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 7 be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clauses 8 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could interrupt our proceedings at this stage to ask for consent to revert to motions in order to deal with a matter pertaining to the divorce bills on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: The house has before it a number of divorce bills which could perhaps be dealt with promptly within the next two days if we take certain action now.

This has been a difficult problem for parliament to resolve, that is, the method of dealing with divorce bills, and over the last two years a great deal of time has been spent in attempting to reach a solution. On some occasions we seem to have come very close to doing so, but not with the unanimity that is desirable. However, in view of the fact that the people who have made application for divorces have done so bona fide as far as we know and have complied with the law of the land it might seem wise to the house to deal with these bills this year and to continue to search for what some people consider would be a better solution to this entire problem. I am prepared to make this statement for the record which, if agreed to by other parties in the house, might permit us to proceed with the divorce bills on this occasion. I should like to make this statement: the question of procedure with respect to parliamentary divorce is under study, and the government has hopes of being able to present to the house at the next session some proposals in this regard.

If that is acceptable to the house then perhaps at this stage we might at least agree later on tonight or when we have completed our discussion on the Pine Point railway bill—if we do complete it—or certainly before the house rises at 10.30 to give second reading to the divorce bills on the order paper. These would then go to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills for consideration tomorrow and when they return from that committee they will be available to the house for third reading.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I think that what the leader of the house has said will commend itself to my friends in the house. As is well known there are a number of hon. members on both sides who would, perhaps, not wish to approve these bills but I think there is a feeling that, as long as this procedure and no other exists, persons who have acted in good faith should not be denied a relief which has been available since confederation.

Indeed, I would hazard the suggestion that rather than embark during the next ten minutes on the affairs of the Pine Point railway and then go back to the other bill and return to the Pine Point railway matter again before considering this subject further, that if there were no objection from any other quarter of the house we might during the next ten minutes carry out the suggestion made by the leader of the house and give second reading to these bills which are on the order paper and send them to the committee right away in order that they might be considered as soon as possible.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): If a solution to this particularly vexing parliamentary problem could have been found and agreed upon earlier this session it might, at least, have contributed to a less apoplectic attitude on the part of some hon. members who are not with us at the moment.

However, as far as the researches of the government and others are concerned, we look forward with great hopes and anticipation to a solution of this problem. We hope that at the next session this difficulty may be overcome as far as parliament is concerned and that these particular bills will be able to be dealt with in a more expeditious, fairer and more just manner.

With regard to the bills now before us I think it would take not the ten minutes we have until six o'clock to give them second reading. If past practice is followed of passing them by automation I am sure we could give them passage within 10 or 15 seconds.

Mr. Churchill: The proposal is agreeable, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreeable, then, that the house proceed now to deal with private bills, being bills Nos. 1 to 353 on the order paper, in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, have you referred to Bill No. SD-110 in this respect, or am I wrong?

Divorce Bills

Mr. Speaker: The motion now proposed is that Bills Nos. SD-1 to SD-100 inclusive, and SD-102 to SD-106 inclusive, and SD-108 to SD-264, and SD-266 to SD-356, inclusive in each case, listed as orders Nos. 1 to 353 inclusive under the heading "Private Bills" on today's order paper be now read a second time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.
