NATIONAL DEFENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN ARMED FORCES —STATEMENT ON EMERGENCY MEASURES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it will, I believe, assist hon. members in their discussions during the next few days if the house is informed at this time of certain decisions taken by the government. I shall deal with certain phases, and my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) will deal with one or more others. These statements are not intended to take the place of the more comprehensive statements of ministers on estimates, including the statement that I shall be prepared to make on emergency measures when the estimates dealing therewith are under consideration.

I think it is generally agreed that the international situation has deteriorated since we last met, and tension has increased. Much of this has arisen from the statements of Premier Khrushchev in respect of the intentions and attitudes of the Kremlin toward West Berlin and allied questions. The government, after consultation with allied governments in NATO, has come to the conclusion that certain measures should be taken to strengthen Canada's preparedness for defence both at home and overseas.

We have decided to increase the overseas and naval forces assigned to NATO as follows:

To bring R.C.N. ship complements up to the strength necessary for a prolonged emergency the present complement will be increased by 1,749 officers and men.

The fourth Canadian infantry brigade in Europe will be strengthened by 1,106 all ranks, and there will be made readily available in Canada 1,515 as reinforcements.

The R.C.A.F. No. 1 air division in Europe will be strengthened by a total of 250 officers and men.

To allow for the strengthening of the brigade and air division in Europe, and for further strengthening over and above the foregoing, an order in council has been passed increasing the present ceiling on personnel strength in Europe from 12,000 to 14,000.

The increases to NATO assigned forces will be accomplished by transferring fully trained personnel now in home establishments.

In addition, to improve the general military effectiveness of our forces at home, and particularly those earmarked for the strategic reserve and available for use in Europe, it is intended to increase the strength of army formations by 8,950 personnel, and air force units by 989.

These measures will require a total increase of approximately 15,000 members in the regular forces, and it is intended to proceed immediately with the recruitment of this personnel. To authorize this increase under the National Defence Act an order in council has been passed increasing the limit of the numbers in the regular forces from 120,000 to 135,000. I shall ask leave to table the orders in council in question at the conclusion of my statement.

In the interests of maintaining the present high efficiency of the brigade overseas it has been decided, as already announced, to defer until next year the return to Canada of the Black Watch battalion now with the brigade and its replacement by a battalion of the Black Watch from Canada.

The decisions I have outlined will not have the effect of forming new units or formations but will bring existing forces to a higher state of preparedness and will make more effective the armed forces' contribution to the civil defence emergency organization. It is hoped that these decisions will be regarded not as provocative but rather as a manifestation of Canada's intention to stand solidly with its NATO partners.

In reviewing our defences we have concluded that in the event of nuclear war there would be a need for a larger number of men trained in survival operations than we now have. As things are today, the militia has an effective strength of approximately 42,000 men. Should Canada be attacked, many more men would be needed for survival operations and for the support of regular army field forces.

Consequently the government has approved a plan to increase the number of men trained to take part in survival and rescue operations should the need arise. It has been decided to train up to 100,000 men on special courses, each lasting six weeks. Approximately 25,000 will be trained on each course in existing military armouries across the country.

These courses will provide sufficient basic military training to maintain the discipline and response essential to the control and effective employment of such a force on operations, but emphasis throughout will be on the teaching of subjects essential for national survival. During the period of their course trainees will serve in the militia on a continuous call-out basis. They will receive normal pay, with subsistence allowance in lieu of rations, as given to a regular army recruit private of single status. Physical requirements will not be as stringent as those now in force for the regular army, and standards of enrolment will be modified to permit acceptance of applicants between the ages of 18 and 50 years, married or single.

The first course is scheduled to get under way in mid-November. When the courses are completed, Canada will have a sizeable reserve of trained manpower essential to carrying out many tasks required for survival should this country come under nuclear attack.

I want to emphasize particularly what I am about to say. I would not want these measures to be interpreted in any way as being taken in contemplation of an early outbreak of war. Rather, they are insurance which the government, realizing the possibilities, must take as prudent, safeguarding precautions. I now ask to table the two orders in council in question.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps it would make for a more orderly presentation if I were to make this further announcement. Recent decisions have been made in respect of accelerating the army's program in national survival. I should like to outline the various decisions that were taken and the action that has resulted from these decisions so far.

It was decided to initiate partial manning of emergency headquarters by military staffs in order to provide greater reliability in the army command structure. As a result a full time skeleton staff was in operation in Camp Petawawa from the 24th of August, thus providing an emergency army headquarters. In addition, emergency command and area headquarters were established in each province at the same time, and the army centres from which the warning would be issued to the public were moved out from major centres of population.

We have been planning to establish headquarters associated with each likely target city. Their establishment has been accelerated, and in the last two weeks the staffs and interim sites have been selected and the senior officers will attend a two week training course later this month.

It was further agreed that additional stocks of food should be bought and that stocks of food, vehicles, blankets, clothing, medical and other such stores required to meet army needs should be dispersed to installations outside of target cities. We are now in process of making these purchases, and army commands have started to disperse their holdings.

It was decided to expedite the formation of the nuclear detonation and fall-out reporting system by redistributing certain radiation monitoring equipment on issue to army units for use in re-entry operations pending receipt from the various suppliers of the equipment which has been on order for some time. This action is going on and the system now has a limited capability. It was further decided that the Department of National Defence should speed up the survey of existing fall-out protection offered by its buildings. This is going ahead.

Department of National Defence officials have been in touch with the officials of the Department of Transport and of the C.B.C. with a view to ensuring that the emergency broadcast system is brought into being at the earliest opportunity. Steps have been taken to expedite the siren installation program that had already been approved and, in addition, an extension to this program has been authorized and is now being undertaken.

Orders for additional radiac and rescue equipment are now being placed to permit the reorganized re-entry units to be equipped as soon as possible. This reorganization involves almost tripling the rescue force, and includes an increase in the militia.

It was agreed that to enable the army works service to undertake the extra work involved in providing fall-out protection for the nuclear detonation and fall-out reporting system, the accelerated siren program and the survey of buildings, a civilian increase should be provided to the army works service. This has been approved, and arrangements are being made to take on the necessary engineers and technicians. In addition certain decentralization of authorities—G.O.C.'s and others—has been arranged to expedite the whole program.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the house has heard two statements the importance of which I certainly do not depreciate, and based on situations the seriousness of which it is not easy to exaggerate, statements on matters which are very much in all our minds today.

It would have been easier, and perhaps more effective, for the opposition to comment on the statements which we have just heard for the first time if they had been made by the Minister of National Defence in connection with the general statement on defence policy which presumably he will be making when the defence estimates are before the house in a few days' time. Because it is, of course, impossible to assess the value of the proposals which the government has now put before the house in relation to defence, and to comment on them in terms of the present serious situation or to justify the large sums of money which will be required to implement them, without knowing more about the objectives of defence policy and the means by which the government expects to reach those objectives. Therefore no considered statement would be expected from us at this time, I know.

Emphasis is being placed in these statements on the necessity for measures to improve the chances of national survival in time of catastrophy. I do not underestimate the importance of that subject. Perhaps it is not inappropriate, however, to point out that the only way we now have to ensure national survival is to prevent war, to abolish war as an instrument of national policy; because war now means general nuclear destruction.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, members of this group are fully conscious of the seriousness of the present world situation. I believe it is correct to say that all of us in this house have one purpose in our hearts, and that is the protection of our freedoms while at the same time maintaining peace.

Although we have one purpose we have, as democrats, the right to advance different proposals and methods. We are asked to comment on statements just read by the Prime Minister when we are absolutely in the dark so far as the government's proposals with respect to defence policy are concerned, to which the leader of the official opposition referred. We are asked to comment almost without knowledge of the policy and detailed objectives of the government in that respect.

On behalf of this group I can say that in principle, under present world conditions, we cannot agree that the present situation is best met by increasing our military might and our armaments. We urge the government to use moderation at this time. I have had the opportunity of talking to many Canadians of all parties, and am able to say that many of them are seriously concerned about what action the government intends to take in the near future.

We shall have more to say on that subject at the appropriate time. We urge the government to continue to press for the building up of the United Nations police force, placing less emphasis on our national forces. Let us make our contribution to collective security through an organization which comes under the control of the nations supporting the United Nations.

We readily support the proposals that are suggested for national survival to meet the frightening prospects of nuclear warfare. We are glad to know that additional numbers are to be trained to meet this threat because, in doing that, if the unfortunate should happen they will be a mission of mercy to save Canadian lives.

After we have had an opportunity to read carefully the Prime Minister's statement; after we have heard from the Minister of National Defence; after we, as it were, come out of the dark and are more into the light, we shall comment more fully and in greater detail on the statement just made by the Prime Minister.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister tell the house the estimated cost of the proposals announced earlier this afternoon by the Prime Minister and himself?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, for the balance of this fiscal year a rough estimate has been made. There will, of course, be detailed estimates made and submitted to the house. However, the rough estimate is that these various measures will result in expenditures in the neighbourhood of $35 million more than was provided in the book of estimates.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a supplementary question. Can the minister indicate what the annual cost will be after they are completely in effect?

Mr. Harkness: I should not like to give figures on that matter at this moment without going into it.

Mr. Hellyer: Surely they have been determined.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says "Surely they have been determined". We have some estimates on them, but from memory I do not wish to give an answer which might not be absolutely correct.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister take the question as notice?

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

TEXTILES—TABLING OF TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON REFERENCE NO. 125

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copies in English and in French of the report which I received from the chairman of the tariff board relating to reference No. 125 on textiles. I am tabling also a transcript of the evidence presented to the board at its public hearings.

This report covers a miscellaneous group of tariff items relating primarily to textile products of jute, flax, hemp and other hard fibres. It is the eighth report to be presented by the board pursuant to the textile reference. Two further reports will be required to complete the series. They relate to coated fabrics and to hats and caps.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder whether the Prime Minister is in a position to give the house any information as to when the commission that has been set up to examine into unemployment insurance matters is likely to report.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no definite information about that. I know that the chairman and those associated with him are devoting themselves most assiduously to the problem before them. However, I shall endeavour within the next few days to ascertain their target date, and will then inform the house.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister inform the house of any efforts the government has made since the adjournment to reach an agreement with the government of British Columbia with respect to the development of the Columbia river? Is he prepared to make a statement at this time as to the government's position in this stalemated situation?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question, which, however, reached me only just before I came into the house, and did not contain the postscript which he has just added.

May I deal with it as he asked it. He asked whether I could inform the house of any efforts made to reach an agreement with the government of British Columbia on the Columbia river problem. As my hon. friend knows, it has not always been easy for me to establish contact with the premier of British Columbia; therefore I am necessarily forced to rely upon the statements I read in the press of that gentleman's intentions. Naturally enough, as my hon. friend will appreciate, we are assessing the implications of the position taken by the premier and the government of British Columbia, as that position is modified from day to day by further statements that the premier issues. The position of the government of Canada is being considered and I expect will be announced very shortly without any possibility of misinterpretation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED FINANCIAL IRREGULARITIES RESPECTING FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a report from the Minister of Justice on the transcript of evidence in connection with the Jean Talon hospital inquiry, and more particularly in connection with Senator Courtemanche? Has the Prime Minister any comment to make on the transcript, if he has received it?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have received the transcript, and an examination has been made of the statements that were made by witnesses on both sides. Having made that examination, and having been informed that the royal commission will report on September 30 in regard to the matters that came before it, I would suggest that the report of the royal commission should be awaited.

FINANCE

EDIBLE OILS—INQUIRY AS TO TARIFF BOARD HEARINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. The minister may recall that in his budget speech of December 20, 1960, reference was made to the Customs Tariff and, in particular, to that part of it dealing with oil seeds and vegetable oil. The minister also stated at that time that representations had been made to the government by growers of these oil seeds for a modification of the tariff.

Would the minister be in a position now to inform the house whether this matter has been referred to the tariff board for study and report?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member and the house that the tariff board has given notice of public hearings on this reference on January 15 next.

INQUIRY AS TO OPERATIONS OF SECURITIES PURCHASE FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister indicate the extent of the operations of the securities purchase fund, which was announced in the budget?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Hon. members will be aware of the fact that in the budget speech on June 20 I announced that the government would establish a securities purchase fund with which we would be making purchases in the long end of the market with an initial amount of $100 million during the course of the next 12 months. That purchase fund has been in operation since that time. It is operated with a view to assisting in the management of the public debt.

In the budget speech I said that details would be announced later. I may say that monthly statements have been and will be issued in this regard. The first announcement was in fact made in our monthly financial statement for the month of July, and indicated purchases in that month of $11.8 million of outstanding securities.

I expect that purchases may vary considerably from month to month. In the recent past we have regarded our purchases and the modest measure of support that may flow to certain areas of the market at certain times in the light of differentials between interest rates in Canada and other countries, particularly the United States, and the influence of those differentials on international capital flows and the exchange rate. Any mechanical regularity of monthly purchases would, of course, be inappropriate, since the intention is to endeavour to impart some stability to the market. Purchases by the fund this year will not necessarily be limited to the figure of $100 million to which I made reference in the budget. If in a period of less than 12 months our purchases were to reach the figure of $100 million, they would not necessarily cease for the remainder of the 12 month period.

[Later:]

Mr. Stuart Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the Minister of Finance relating to or arising from his answers to earlier questions. Can the minister report on the course of recent foreign exchange transactions?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will not need to be told that the Canadian dollar, expressed in terms of the United States dollar, has shown quite an impressive stability in international exchange. Its value expressed in terms of the United States dollar has been between 96 cents and 97 cents for some time now. I think the house will be pleased to know that it has not been necessary for the government to make massive commitments of funds in the exchange fund. This is certainly a matter of satisfaction to the government, and I think it will be to the house as well.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I might make a comment on an associated subject while I am on my feet. In the course of the meeting of the executive board of the international monetary fund some time ago several directors expressed the hope that Canada might in due course see its way to rejoin other countries within the general system of fixed exchange rates. The meeting to which I am referring is the one which occurred in mid-July. There was, however, no suggestion that we ought to choose parity with the United States dollar or any other particular rate of exchange.

Mr. Louis Rasminsky, the governor of the Bank of Canada, who represented Canada at that meeting of the executive board of the international monetary fund, in expressing the government's intention to remain in consultation with the fund took the opportunity to remind other directors of the special continuing features of the Canadian situation which had led Canada some 11 years ago to abandon the fixed rate system after successive attempts to adhere to it. I may say that at that meeting also Mr. Rasminsky set forth the economic situation of Canada and the position of the Canadian exchange rate in the light of the statements which I made in the budget speech on June 20.

The meeting, which was called at our request, provided Canada with a welcome opportunity to reassure other directors of the international monetary fund that no competitive depreciation of the Canadian dollar is to be anticipated.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Is the present discount, vis-à-vis the United States dollar, the equivalent of what the minister described in his budget speech as "a significant discount"? Those are the words he used when he described the aim of the government with respect to international exchange.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will do me the honour of reading that speech very carefully he will see that the expression "significant discount" was related to circumstances at a particular time, and circumstances may vary. But I think the hon. member is aware that I have expressed the view that thus far the results of the change in the external value of the Canadian dollar have been quite satisfactory in the view of the government.

Mr. Hellyer: Significant.

TELEVISION

TORONTO—REPORTED TRANSFER TO U.S. OF INTEREST IN PRIVATE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Before doing so, if I might be permitted, I should like to express what I am sure is the view of the whole house that we are very glad to see the minister back in the house.

The question I wish to put to the hon. gentleman is, has he any statement to make on the fantastic story which has appeared in the press that a very substantial interest in the private television station in the city of Toronto is to be transferred to United States interests?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I appreciate the very kindly reference which has been made by the hon. member. I would have preferred, however, to have him confine himself to the flattering reference without the embarrassing question. Having had a heart attack, I have been prevented by the doctors from reading fantastic stories, so I have not seen the one to which the hon. member refers. However, I shall give consideration to his statement and advise the house later.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN AND DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he can tell us whether the government is having any difficulty in finding directors for the Canadian National Railways, and also what the situation is so far as the status of the president and chairman is concerned.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, these nominations will be made very soon. So far as the second part of the question is concerned, there is no change in the status of the president.

CIVIL DEFENCE

PETERBOROUGH—REPORTED GAPS IN WARNING SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, especially in view of the statement which has just been made. Is the minister of defence aware that gaps in the alert system which showed up during civil defence exercises at Peterborough last January, and which were reported immediately, have not been filled? If so, could he assure these officials that the situation will be rectified immediately?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): I think the hon. member is referring to the siren system in Peterborough. I believe this system was installed in 1957 on the basis of a noise level survey made at that time by the department of health and welfare, which then had the responsibility for the siren system. There were certain gaps shown in the system in the last exercise, Tocsin, which was held, and a new survey is being undertaken of the noise level. It is proposed to add additional sirens in order to cover any deficiency which may be found to exist.

Mr. Pitman: Will the Minister of National Defence make a comment on the press statement by army officials of the eastern Ontario command that the sirens being installed for civil defence are primarily aimed at alerting people outside of buildings and not those inside buildings?

Mr. Harkness: I have inquired into this matter, and I find that no such statement was issued. I think there is some confusion over the fact that part of a lecture which was given by army officers on survival methods, and on warnings, states that sirens are more effective in warning people outside of buildings than inside. This is only natural. If you were deep inside a bank vault you would not hear the siren at all. However, in the normal house you do hear it. It is quite evident that any siren is going to be more effective in warning people outside than in warning those inside. However, sirens are not primarily aimed at those outside of buildings. They are aimed at the entire population. I think that is the only comment I can make.

TRANSPORT

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—REQUEST FOR STUDY OF PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In the light of the statement made recently by United States authorities to the effect that they intend to proceed with the Champlain-Richelieu cut-off without waiting for Canada, has the government decided upon a policy in this matter, and will it establish a board of engineers to survey the project and make a study of its economics?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must first survey the statement before I can give any answer. I have not seen any reference to this matter by the United States.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA—ENTRY OF U.K. INTO EUROPEAN MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of his impending departure, will he indicate the nature of the discussions to be held at the forthcoming commonwealth conference?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Tomorrow my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I will be leaving to attend the annual meeting of the commonwealth economic consultative council. The meeting this year is to be held in Ghana. It is, I believe, the first time a meeting of commonwealth governments has ever been held on the continent of Africa, and will have some special significance on that account.

The agenda of the conference is not normally made public in advance, Mr. Speaker, but I think I may say that in the course of the meeting there will be an opportunity for reviewing economic developments and for considering economic and trade questions of interest to the commonwealth and indeed of aid matters within the commonwealth, perhaps with particular reference to the special commonwealth African aid program which was inaugurated a year ago at the last meeting of the commonwealth economic consultative council. While relationships between the United Kingdom and the common market no doubt will be discussed, it is not considered that this particular meeting will provide the appropriate occasion for a detailed discussion in view of the fact that negotiations between the United Kingdom and the community are shortly to begin.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that following the commonwealth meeting at Accra I shall be attending the annual meetings of the governors of the international bank, the international monetary fund, the international development agency and the international finance corporation, which are to be held this year in Vienna.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister a question arising out of his answer. In view of the fact that he has just said that special consideration is not to be given at the Ghana meeting to the problems arising out of the United Kingdom application for admission to the European common market, could he inform the house whether there are commonwealth consultations going on in regard to this important matter, and how these consultations are being conducted?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It will be recalled that on the last day of sitting of the house some of the ministers were engaged in a conference with Right Hon. Duncan Sandys, secretary of state for commonwealth relations in Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom. He came to discuss with Canadian ministers the question as to whether the United Kingdom government should open negotiations with the community with a view to entering into the community as a member. I think the communique that was issued at the close of the meeting has been widely circulated. In any event, if it has not been already tabled I shall be glad to see that it is placed on the table of the house.

The views of the Canadian government were communicated to Mr. Sandys at that meeting. The house is aware that subsequently the government of the United Kingdom announced its intention of opening negotiations with a view to entry into the community, and that application was received by Dr. Erhard on behalf of the community, and arrangements are being made for the opening of negotiations as to the terms upon which the United Kingdom may enter the community as a member.

There have been discussions in relation to continuing communications on this subject. Hon. members will appreciate that this subject has now entered a different phase from that in which it was at the time of the meeting to which I have referred. There will be opportunity for continuing communication on this subject. I believe it has also been made known publicly that a meeting of officials of commonwealth governments will be held in London later this month at which discussions will be held in relation to those commonwealth economic and other interests which the government of the United Kingdom has indicated it intends to seek to preserve in the course of its discussions with the community.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister is going to attend four or five conferences in a row, can he tell us whether he expects to be back in this house before Christmas? And with regard to the conference at Vienna, may I ask the minister who will be in charge of the delegation? Will it be the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the first question was prompted by the wish. However, if I come back before Christmas I hope the hon. gentleman will recognize me in the role of Santa Claus as usual. As to his second question, which was asked with his usual measure of innocence, I may say that there is no such question, and none such could arise. My colleague and I go to that conference, as we go to other conferences, in order to operate as a team.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): May I ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question. He has indicated that he will be attending the conference of the international monetary fund at Vienna. Can the minister inform the house whether it is the intention of the Canadian delegation to sponsor or advance any specific ideas or representations with respect to the price of gold?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the hon. gentleman is referring to a price for gold that might be set somehow under international auspices. He is aware, of course, that it is the price that the United States is prepared to set for gold that largely determines the world price today. There may be variations in various markets, but fundamentally the great determinant of the price of gold in the world is the price established by the United States, and the present price is established by the United States congress, not by executive action. Consequently no change of a material nature is likely to take place in the world price of gold unless it were marked by action in that behalf by the congress of the United States.

I am not aware of any action intended or proposed in the United States congress in that regard. There have been and may well be at this forthcoming annual meeting of governors, discussion related to the world price of gold. In previous annual meetings there have been references to this subject from time to time, but in the last four years there has been no very direct discussion on the floor of the meeting in that regard. I may say to the hon. member that there have been discussions of a private nature in this regard, but fundamentally this is something which, for any material change, must await action on the part of the congress of the United States.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO ACTING MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): If I may, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Having regard to the fact that there is on the order paper important fiscal legislation, and I am thinking particularly of Bill No. C-122, can the Prime Minister tell the house who will be acting minister of finance while the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce are away?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan).

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

76. Departmental administration, $6,924,915.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Chairman, today we meet in the Canadian House of Commons at a time of deep crisis. As hon. members know, for some weeks tension has been increasing steadily over Berlin, and within the last week the premier of the Soviet union has announced a resumption of nuclear tests. In addition to that, he has stated that his country can develop a nuclear bomb with the power of 100 million tons of t.n.t., and that such a bomb could then be hurled by rocket to any target in the world.

It was very interesting to read the first reports of this shocking statement. No doubt hon. members have seen them. I refer in particular to one which is contained in the Ottawa Journal of September 2. It is a dispatch from Moscow reporting an interview Premier Khrushchev held with two members of the British Labour party. To them he is reported as having declared that he had decided to resume the testing of nuclear weapons in order to shock the western powers into negotiations on Germany and disarmament. In amplifying that statement he apparently said that by taking a tough line he hoped to make the Atlantic alliance agree to merging the discussions at Geneva on a nuclear test ban treaty with negotiations for general and complete disarmament.

There is no doubt that world opinion has been profoundly shocked by the statement and also by the actions which followed so quickly on the heels of the statement. I refer to the conducting of four nuclear tests in the atmosphere, where of course the radiation and fall-out are of the maximum degree. The United States has now decided that in the face of these actions by the Soviet union it must undertake nuclear tests, although they are not of the same type and are reported as being such that they do not produce fall-out. They will be tests in the laboratory and tests underground.

In the meantime a very statesmanlike step was taken by President Kennedy and Prime Minister Macmillan of the United Kingdom when they appealed to the Soviet premier on September 3 in the following words:

> The President of the United States of America and Prime Minister of the United Kingdom propose to Chairman Khrushchev that their three governments agree, effective immediately, not to conduct nuclear tests which take place in the atmosphere and produce radioactive fall-out. Their aim in this proposal is to protect mankind from the increasing hazards from atmospheric pollution and to contribute to the reduction of international tensions.
> They urge Chairman Khrushchev to cable his immediate acceptance of this offer and his cessation of further atmospheric tests.
> They further urge that their representatives at Geneva meet not later than September 9 to record this agreement and report it to the United Nations. They sincerely hope that the U.S.S.R. will accept this offer, which remains open for the period indicated.
> They point out that with regard to atmospheric testing the United States and the United Kingdom are prepared to rely upon existing means of detection, which they believe to be adequate, and are not suggesting additional controls. But they reaffirm their serious desire to conclude a nuclear test ban treaty applicable to other forms of testing as well, and regret that the U.S.S.R. has blocked such an agreement.

As yet there has been no reply to that appeal, and I am sure I speak for all members of the house when I say that we still hope Premier Khrushchev will agree to the proposal which has been made.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the great tragedy of 1961 has been that Soviet leaders have not understood or have ignored the fact that President Kennedy and his top advisers have, from the start of their administration, genuinely desired to bring about a reduction in world tension. We know that for a fact because of our contacts with these United States leaders.

For Canadians it is so important at this time not to add fuel to the flames with the world hovering on the brink of a nuclear war. We must do our utmost to help to reduce tension, and the government has been doing that during the recent very serious weeks. We must not lose our heads but must show Canadian common sense. Common sense is one of the finest qualities in the Canadian character, and now is the time to remember this and to show that common sense in our talk and in our actions.

In addition, we must continue our idealistic approach to world affairs. Because the situation is serious is no excuse for Canadians to abandon the idealistic approach they have had down through their history. These attributes have been shown by Canadians for a long time. Such is our record, and this is what is expected of us now by all nations, including the nations in the communist camp. A few weeks ago in Geneva I had a brief talk with Mr. Gromyko, the foreign minister of the Soviet union. There was, of course, a certain amount of banter but finally he said "I know that Canada stands for peace". That is our reputation in world affairs, and it is a very good reputation to have.

Today I propose to deal with certain material factors in the present world situation. Ordinarily I would go on to cover various other subjects which probably are of equal importance, but I plan today to deal with the facts relative to the present serious situation and later during the discussion of the estimates I shall try to deal with these other subjects.

First of all let me deal with nuclear tests. The tremendous world interest in nuclear tests is because people are rightly afraid of the effects of radiation and fall-out. They remember what happened at Hiroshima and they know that the damage and destruction would be infinitely greater in a nuclear holocaust with the present hydrogen bombs. They are worried about the effect not only on themselves but on the generations to come.

For this reason, and also in the hope that an agreement to ban nuclear tests would be a long step toward a general disarmament agreement, the three nuclear powers, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet union, decided nearly three years ago to try to work out a nuclear test ban agreement. France did not participate in that conference and, I think unfortunately, in the intervening period set off certain nuclear blasts, although the other three countries until last week maintained a moratorium on any further testing.

This conference held its 339th meeting this week and it meets again on Saturday, September 9, in Geneva. Up to the end of last year there had been great progress made in these negotiations. Scientists of the three countries had met and reported on various ways of checking tests, and the delegates had agreed to many paragraphs of a test ban treaty. Incidentally, at the United Nations last year there were two resolutions passed dealing with the suspension of nuclear and thermonuclear tests. One of them contained this operative paragraph:

Urges the states concerned in these negotiations—

The reference is to the negotiations at Geneva.

—to continue their present voluntary suspension of the testing of nuclear weapons.

That resolution was sponsored by Austria, India and Sweden and was adopted by a vote of 89 in favour, including Canada, none against and four abstentions. Another resolution, sponsored by India and 25 other countries, contained the following operative paragraph:

Urges the states concerned in the Geneva negotiations to continue their present voluntary suspension of the testing of nuclear and thermonuclear weapons, and requests other states to refrain from undertaking such tests.

That resolution was adopted by a vote of 83 in favour, including Canada, none opposed and 11 abstentions.

This year for some reason or other—I really do not understand why—the delegate of the Soviet union to the conference in Geneva became intransigent. It was really impossible to make any further progress.

The United States and Great Britain submitted revised proposals meeting many of the objections which had been taken by the Soviet delegate, but these were not even adequately discussed by the Soviet representative. He was insistent on the troika principle for controlling the test ban under which principle there would be one representative of the U.S.S.R., one representative of the western side and one neutral, and was also insistent that the whole question of nuclear tests should be taken out of the conference and put into a general conference on disarmament. However, the conference still goes on. The western side have refused to take steps to break it off, and I believe have acted very wisely in so doing.

At the United Nations in 1959 Canada sponsored a resolution calling for more adequate reporting on radiation and for additional steps to warn the people of the world about the effects of radiation as well as further action along that line. The resolution was co-sponsored by ten other nations and was finally adopted by unanimous vote on November 21, 1959. We offered to conduct in Canada tests of samples of air, soil, water, food and bone collected in nations which did not have the scientific facilities for carrying out such tests. In the intervening period arrangements have been made with Burma, Malaya, Ghana and Pakistan for Canada to carry out such tests. We have had to build up staff in Canada to do this work. We have extended our facilities and everything has now been prepared with this end in view.

As a result of the resolution, increased attention has been given to radiation problems internationally. For example, 13 other states have offered their facilities in the same way Canada did. These include the United Kingdom, the United States, Australia, France, Norway, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark, Japan, Israel, the Soviet union, Argentina and Italy in addition to the International Atomic Energy Agency and the World Health Organization. There has been a marked increase in the number of member countries supplying the United Nations with data on fall-out levels. I think we can be proud of the results that have followed from the initiative taken in 1959.

In addition we have made it perfectly clear for a long time that the Canadian government is opposed to nuclear tests of any kind. That was done in order that there would be no misunderstanding and that every country would know exactly where we stood. We see no reason for Canada to change that policy.

In the present situation, with the Soviet union conducting these tests in the way it has been, there can be no doubt that the responsibility for this backward step must be placed at their door. The United States has said that it now proposes to carry out tests. I think in fairness every hon. member of the committee would agree with me that the United States could not sit by indefinitely while the Russians were proceeding with their tests; but naturally we regret that it has been deemed necessary for the United States to announce the resumption of tests at this time. Canada on this problem will endeavour to further an agreement banning tests. That may not be an objective easily reached, but this is the target at which we will be aiming.

Having dealt with nuclear testing, I turn now to the situation in Berlin and Germany. I am sure all hon. members of the committee and the Canadian people generally will join with me in supporting the clear-cut, analytical and statesmanlike speech made by the Prime Minister of Canada in Winnipeg on September 1. I see by the press that the Leader of the Opposition has said he agrees with the attitude adopted in that speech by our Prime Minister. It would be tantamount to gilding the lily for me to attempt today to go over the same ground which was covered by the Prime Minister on that occasion. I merely point out that for many months there have been warnings by the Soviet union that there would be a peace treaty signed with East Germany and there have been various threats, not all confined to one side, incidentally.

Threats do not obtain very good results. Perhaps this is one of the ways in which the Leaders of the Soviet union misunderstand the people on the western side. The Soviet cannot obtain results by threatening the Canadians, the British, the people of the United States or other western nations. We have been threatened before, and have met those threats with the proper action. That is the reason we are in active business in the world today. We do not back down in the face of threats.

There is an election campaign under way in West Germany which tends to add to the confusion with respect to the situation in Berlin. Voting takes place on September 17, ten days from now. The leader of the main opposition party is the mayor of West Berlin. I suppose knowing elections as we do, we might have expected that there would be a great many statements made which might not have been made the day after the election.

I also draw attention to the flood of refugees from East Germany into West Germany. This is a very significant factor. It shows more clearly than a million words could do what the people in East Germany think of the regime in that country. Of course it has had a very damaging effect on the image of communism which is being portrayed to other nations of the world.

Let me say a word also about President Kennedy's stand on Berlin. A few weeks ago he made a speech, which probably all hon. members heard, in which he set out the position on which the western world would stand. I think it was wise to do that in order that there could be no misunderstandings, no miscalculations, as are supposed to have happened in the case of both the first and second world wars. He went further and said that the United States was willing and anxious to enter into negotiations about this whole question, and that too was very wise. Our own Prime Minister has said the same thing and has stressed the need for negotiations. At one stage or another all parties have said that there must be negotiations in an attempt to iron out this difficult problem.

Our policy today on Berlin and Germany is that an attempt must be made to settle it around the table. There are many channels and methods for exploring with the Soviet union possible grounds of agreement. Partly to this end the foreign ministers of the three major western powers and of West Germany will be meeting in Washington on September 14, one week from today, to discuss further the steps which may be taken to reach a satisfactory agreement with the Soviet union. Similarly, consultations will continue in the North Atlantic council—and there have been many consultations in that council during the last few weeks—about peaceful solutions to this dangerous problem in accordance with the United Nations charter.

Through these discussions with our allies and in negotiations with the Soviet union it is hoped that it will be possible to reach an honourable accommodation with the Soviet. Canada certainly will do everything in her power to help bring about negotiations, and will do her part to see that they are brought to a successful conclusion.

The third material factor with which I wish to deal briefly is the position of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Today I would think there are not very many Canadians who believe that NATO is superfluous, and that it does not have a very important part to play in the world situation. So often it is forgotten that this is a defensive alliance. It was not set up for purposes of aggression. We know that the countries of that alliance do not believe in aggression. It was set up to defend western Europe and the north Atlantic area. It is so important that that organization be kept strong.

The Deputy Chairman: May I interrupt the minister. Under the rules, his time has expired. Would the committee give unanimous consent for the minister to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, through you may I thank the members of the committee for giving me this extension.

In recent months discussions in the NATO council have greatly improved, and I am glad to be able to announce that on Monday next we shall have in Canada Mr. Dirk U. Stikker, the distinguished secretary general of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. He will be here for a two day conference with Canadian ministers, and this will give us an opportunity to review the whole NATO situation. Mr. Stikker took on this difficult post just a few months ago; he has been making a great success of that work, and we shall welcome him very warmly when he pays his first visit to Canada.

I think Canada must state once again that she believes in the equality of membership in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. There is always the danger of the bigger nations trying to set up a sort of executive or control body. A few months ago there was concern over a possible three nation executive, a three nation triumvirate directing NATO. Now, with the Berlin crisis, West Germany has been taking part in the various discussions on Berlin with the United States, the United Kingdom and France. I think we must take care to see that there is not a four power group assuming executive powers in the organization.

At the last meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty foreign ministers we were very pleased to find that there was practically unanimous opinion that there was no incompatibility in the member nations of NATO taking independent stands in the United Nations, particularly on peace keeping activities of the United Nations and on appeals to world opinion. Canada has never believed that membership in NATO should restrict her activities in the United Nations.

A fourth material factor today is the question of disarmament. As hon. members know, Canada was a member of the ten nation disarmament committee which was torpedoed by the five communist members in June of last year. Two months later, with the United States, we were able to bring the question before the disarmament commission of the United Nations and to obtain a unanimous resolution there that negotiations should be resumed. Subsequently we brought in a resolution at the United Nations general assembly last fall which was designed to help get negotiations under way again. That resolution was co-sponsored by 18 other nations.

During their meeting in London this spring the prime ministers of the commonwealth issued a very significant statement on the question of disarmament. This was particularly helpful because of the membership of the commonwealth. The prime ministers came from practically every continent and they had varying opinions. They did not agree on all things. But on this statement on disarmament they were unanimous and issued a communique in respect thereof. I think in the days ahead as work proceeds on disarmament this commonwealth resolution will be of great importance.

At the session of the United Nations which ran over into the spring of 1961, it was finally agreed that the problem of disarmament and all pending proposals relating to it, which included the Canadian resolution, would be stood over until the session of the general assembly in the fall of this year. In addition the United States and the Soviet union agreed that they would sit down and try to work out a negotiating group, as well as general principles for negotiations, on the question of disarmament.

Since the spring there have been discussions between the representatives of these two great powers. Canada has throughout warmly approved this attempt to reach agreement on a suitable forum for resuming disarmament negotiations and a satisfactory set of directives to guide the negotiators. We have been kept closely in touch with all that has gone on at each of the meetings, and here again the United States has made a real attempt to devise a satisfactory basis. It has been flexible in its approach during these two nation discussions.

The talks, of course, have been confidential and it is not possible to reveal the substance of the matters discussed. While they have not achieved their goal, the differences between the two sides have been clarified. Yesterday the United States and the Soviet union, were meeting in New York on this question of disarmament.

The last few days, Mr. Chairman, have seen barely concealed threats which, as I have said, we must meet squarely. This situation, however, does not mean that we should downgrade our efforts to further the cause of disarmament. On the contrary far-reaching measures on disarmament are now more vital than ever if we are to avoid even sharper east-west conflicts in a world which daily sees the development of more frightening weapons. We must recognize clearly that until a realistic basis for negotiation is established, we will continue to run the most dangerous risk of all, the risk of nuclear war.

During the past months Canada has taken an active part in the drafting of a new western disarmament plan. Throughout this period the United States and the other countries which represented the west on the ten-nation committee have been in close consultation. The other members of the western alliance who were not on the committee have also had an opportunity to express their views on the new plan. The contents of this plan cannot be revealed at this time, but it does constitute a significant improvement over previous western proposals. We have been represented during these discussions by Lieutenant-General E. L. M. Burns who has played a very large part in the field of disarmament for a long time and who, I suggest, has no peer anywhere in the world in this particular field.

Many of our suggestions have been accepted in the working out of this new plan. A great deal of effort has been put into trying to meet the desires expressed at the commonwealth prime ministers conference to ensure the maximum amount of disarmament in the shortest possible time. Full consideration has already been given to the reasonable Soviet proposals.

This new western plan will be put forward for negotiation, and not on a "take it or leave it" basis. The western powers are willing to take into account any further suggestions the Soviet union may have, provided they reflect a genuine willingness to arrive at a realistic and properly safeguarded disarmament program.

At the session of the general assembly which opens on September 19, Canada will work for the endorsement of this new western plan by the widest possible number of states and we will do our best to ensure that any negotiating body which may be agreed upon will have close relationship with the United Nations. We believe that the most important objective in the field of disarmament is to get negotiations started again just as quickly as possible.

Then, I should like to say a few words about the unaligned nations conference which met over the week end in Belgrade. There you had 25 neutral nations, some of whom were not very friendly towards the west if one can judge by their actions in recent years. The representatives of these nations came from various continents to try to work out some plan to help reduce tension in the world. I grant that a good deal of time was spent in attacking the question of colonialism and issues which affected particular nations. I believe that the press reports of the meetings of these unaligned countries have not done justice to the significance of their reaction to the questions of Berlin and the resumption of nuclear testing. The dispatch which came out during that conference after the Soviet announcement that nuclear tests would be resumed is contained in one of our newspapers under this heading: "Neutrals Rap A Testing; Urge Berlin Talks."

It is very important that that should have been the reaction in Belgrade. I think, for example, that the statements made by Prime Minister Nehru have been and will be very helpful in bringing about some solution of these terrible problems. I learned the hard way at the United Nations, when dealing with our resolution on disarmament last year, that there are a good many countries which will not stand up and be counted for fear of antagonizing the United States. There are a great many others who will not stand up and be counted for fear of antagonizing the Soviet union. As I say, these neutral countries do not like to take a stand if it can possibly be avoided, yet we have witnessed the sharp reaction of these 25 neutral nations to the resumption of testing by the Soviet union and also to the question of Berlin.

Another important factor in the present situation is the attitude of the new nations. We are living in an era in which there has been a greater expansion of freedom, a greater launching of new nations, than at any other time in history. From Asia and in Africa the young leaders of these new nations are coming over to New York, to the United Nations, and are taking their part in the deliberations. They are vitally interested in building up their own countries. They have no use whatever for the cold war because they are so busy and have so many problems of their own. They do not want to be bothered with the cold war. They know that if the cold war ever gets hot they will get little economic assistance from either the western world or the communist world. These new nations have an important part to play in the world today. I believe that their opinion as expressed in the United Nations in the next few weeks may have a good deal to do in bringing about a reduction of tension and in putting pressure behind the great powers for a settlement of these problems.

The new nations are all extremely sensitive on the question of colonialism. They have an emotional reaction when that question is under debate and this reaction is understandable. We would have had the same reaction perhaps a hundred years ago. The Soviet never loses an opportunity to try to play upon and to take advantage of that reaction. Last year they introduced a resolution attacking the so-called colonial powers, demanding that all colonies be freed before the end of 1961, and insisting on target dates being set for each country. I do not doubt that they will be back at that same performance in the next session of the general assembly.

However, this is one field in which the commonwealth does not need to take any advice or any criticism from the Soviet union. Last year our own Prime Minister spiked that attack in the United Nations by his great speech in the opening days of the session when he pointed out the situation in such countries as Estonia, Lithuania and Latvia. I may say that one is amazed at the nerve of the Soviet representatives in coming to New York and talking about colonialism and the sins of the colonial powers. I marvel that they have the gall to take that position. However, certainly in this particular field the commonwealth in our own time in recent years—and I am thinking of 1961 and 1962—has been and is showing perhaps the greatest statesmanship that has ever been shown by a great power in this world. Tanganyika is being launched on December 9, and the West Indies Federation next year. Shortly after that probably Uganda and Kenya will be launched. These latter two may come in with Tanganyika to form a federation in eastern Africa. Other colonies under the British flag are to get independent government in the same way at the earliest possible date and just as quickly as trained leaders can be provided for those countries. We may have some extremely interesting discussions on this question of colonialism during the coming session of the United Nations.

Finally, may I say this. The special material factor in the world today is the United Nations and in particular the session which commences later this month. I have no doubt that nuclear tests and the question of Berlin will be discussed during that session as well as many other issues with which I shall deal later on in this debate on the estimates. We must never forget that the United Nations is the best place we have in which to focus world opinion. The big question in my mind is this. Have the Soviet union gone so far that they are now prepared to ignore world opinion? Hitherto they have been playing up to other nations and trying to get support from other nations all over the world just as the United States has been doing. In their statement announcing that they were going to have nuclear tests, they actually said this was a great movement to help peace and they appealed to the uncommitted nations on that basis. How they could justify that argument I do not know either. However, if they have decided to ignore world opinion, we are in for extremely serious trouble; there can be no mistake about that fact. Let us hope that the leaders of that great country will be sensitive to world opinion, and that they will not simply ignore it and decide to go their own way seeking world domination.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, it is more than ever vital that Canada support the United Nations. This is no time for belittling that world organization. Some people say, "Oh, look at the mess it has made in the Congo". May I say this. Without the United Nations in the Congo there would have been blood feuds there and tribal wars, with thousands and thousands of people slaughtered during the whole of last year. This situation probably would have spread to adjoining areas. The situation would have been disastrous and might well have brought on a world war. The United Nations moved in without any precedent to follow, without trained personnel to do the job. They moved in or recruited a United Nations force and today there is a government in the Congo. They are having many troubles. They do not function as efficiently as does the Canadian government, I admit. Of course, it would be difficult for any other government to do that. However, they have a government and I believe that the problems are going to be worked out as a result of the leadership and the action of the United Nations. I am sure we are all proud that Canada has played such a significant part in the Congo and that we are one of the three European and North Atlantic countries serving on the Congo committee.

[Mr. Green.]

The United Nations today is the main hope of mankind. If it grows and succeeds, there will be world order. If it fails, there will be world destruction. That is the choice. I would hope that all Canadians will rally behind the United Nations at this time as they have never done before, although our people have always been supporters of that body.

In conclusion, I repeat what I said at the beginning. This House of Commons is meeting in a time of deep crisis. In times such as these a nation shows its calibre. Canada has done so on more than one occasion. We remember Canada in the first war. We remember Canada in the second war, the June day 21 years ago, when France was falling and when our then minister of defence was killed in a terrible air crash. It looked as though the United Kingdom would be invaded. I do not believe that in my lifetime there has ever been a darker day than that particular Monday. But no Canadian member of parliament had a thought in his head that there was going to be any surrender, that we were not going to face that situation and were going to win through. I know that Canada will show her calibre and her mettle in these present trying times.

The road ahead will be hard. Perhaps we have had enough of the soft life anyway. But the road ahead is certainly going to be hard and there will be tension for a long, long time. We might just as well face that fact. From Canadians courage will be required, both physical and moral, and sacrifice; and I believe above all, a return to our deep abiding fundamental faiths. If we face this challenge we will win through and the result may very well be to make our nation one of the leading nations of the world.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) stated that this is a time of crisis. The committee may be interested in knowing that exactly 22 years ago today parliament met to authorize a declaration of war. The statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to the critical situation, with the special knowledge that is his, is one which every hon. member of this house will examine with a sense of responsibility and concern. Nearly six months have elapsed since our last brief discussion on foreign affairs in this house. A measure of the urgency and seriousness of this situation is that we are debating external affairs on the first day back.

There have been a number of historically important international events during these months and, like the Secretary of State for External Affairs, while I propose to discuss mainly the immediate situation provoked by the recent decision of the Soviet union to carry on certain tests of nuclear weapons and the situation in Berlin, I should like to mention one or two events the historic importance of which I think ought to be noted at this time.

First of all, Britain's declaration of her intention to open negotiations with the European common market has for her, for Europe and for Canada deep implications. One may well wonder, I think, whether the government, with its policy of reluctant acquiescence in Britain's policy, has a full appreciation of these implications. I believe much progress has been made in the organization of American states during these last few months. We were told by the Prime Minister some months ago that this house would be given the opportunity of expressing its view with regard to the desirability of Canadian membership in the organization of American states. I express once again my own strong personal view that the time has come when Canada must accept its responsibility in this organization.

I do not see how we can affirm our responsibility in matters of world consequence in Europe, Asia and Africa and ignore our responsibilities to our own sister American continents. I believe that the Associate Minister of National Defence perhaps shares this view and may be giving some indication of the future intentions and policy of the government in this regard, for I find that when in Uruguay as our unofficial observer at the recent important conference held in that country, he is reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of August 24 as having made a number of very important and I think, true statements about the economic and social situation in this fermenting section of the world.

Among other things the associate minister said:

> The feature that struck me was that Latin America seems to be at the crossroads. Either they will advance and achieve prosperity and progress through democratic free enterprise, or some nations —unless they find a solution to their problems— quite easily will fall prey to communist theories and methods.

Then he said that Canada is regarded as an important link with the United States, and then continued:

> Because of our size, they are confident we might understand their problems better.
> But we can never ignore it. Our prestige there is enormous. They need money, but they need even more the scientific training to use their resources.
> They need help in business and industrial methods, and also in cultural affairs. But you can't go to a proud country and say "Let us teach you something". Tact is the most important thing.

We all agree that tact is the most important thing. Certainly the press comments on the speech of the associate minister during his observer's visit to Uruguay in August will leave the government in a hopelessly contradictory position if they do not indicate whether or not there is to be a follow-up of its recognition of Canada's responsibility to those nations in Latin America in an area where we have now seen, in two very important and vital countries, some indication of the growing power of communist influence.

We have a responsibility in terms of our own security as well as a nation in an interdependent world. The statement of the Associate Minister of National Defence places us in the dangerous position of losing respect and our influence among the nations of Latin America, nations which have so cordially and insistently invited us to join their ranks, unless the government pays some official public attention, preferably in the house at this time, to the important statements made by the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Likewise, with regard to another matter, no review of these recent months can overlook the atrocities being perpetrated in Angola. We must not forget that this country is pregnant with possibilities for exploitation by the Soviet union, perhaps on a scale much greater than anything that has happened in any other country of Africa. I wonder, for instance, exactly what our position is. Prior to the adjournment the Secretary of State for External Affairs responded to certain questions of mine with regard to arms and Angola, and there are certain questions now on the order paper to which I suspect we may anticipate replies within a few days.

I have here a clipping from the excellent reporting service of the London Observer referring to an aeroplane with Canadian markings engaged in attacks on native villages. This is a report dated July 22. If the minister's attention has not been directed to it I will certainly pass it over to him. If that report is true, some of the replies that have been given with regard to Canadian arms and Angola seem to be inconsistent with the replies given me prior to adjournment.

There are other matters of great importance. During the discussion of the estimates, as the minister said, we will be afforded the opportunity of expressing our views on some of these questions. Like the minister, I wish to confine myself mainly to the questions of Berlin, nuclear tests and disarmament.

Undoubtedly the central issue before the world today is the crisis in Berlin. At this moment in time it is impossible to state, I believe, what is going to happen there or, indeed, what our policies are going to be. We are in the hiatus period of diplomacy during which study and consultation on the part of the government must inevitably be taking place.

The most alarming aspect of the Berlin crisis is the prospect of the western nations themselves losing their perspectives or our perspectives. We see constant evidence in the daily press and radio bulletins of skirmishes, for instance, between border guards in Berlin using tear gas and water hoses. There is much talk of crisis and a tendency to make ill-considered public statements. The crisis reaction is surely one that we must wish to avoid at all costs.

I wish to say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) that I read with interest his speech to the Canadian Bar Association in Winnipeg the other day. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has already expressed himself in support of the general terms of that speech. In Canada we may have our differences in domestic policy; we may have our differences, and if they exist we should not hesitate to say so, in the field of foreign policy, but the Prime Minister and the government can be assured that the general lines of that speech were expressed in terms to which we give concurrence. That does not mean to say that an exposition of particular details may not elicit a reaction different from that which I have stated on the points which will be exposed, but as to the general direction given by the Prime Minister I think it is important that in this parliament we should let the Soviet union, or anyone else interested, know that there is a much wider measure of unity in our country than those who are ideologically opposed to us sometimes suggest. While the inevitable penalty in the free world is that there are differences of opinion, it would be a mistake for the Soviet union to conclude that on essential and basic points there was not the widest measure of agreement, an agreement that would express itself, I am sure, in support of the general terms of the statement which President Kennedy made when he spoke the other day to his people and to the world on the attitude taken by the United States with regard to this matter.

I suggest that our perspective must be that Berlin is only one aspect of a much larger and all-inclusive cold war. Once again the Soviet union has struck us at a weak point. The Soviet union's over-all cold war strategy is to feel us out, to move from one vulnerable position to the next—Korea, the Middle East, the islands off China, Africa—and the immediate issue is the thing that catches the headlines while the over-all battle is pushed aside. I have encountered some of our own fellow countrymen who quite honestly refuse to concede that the cold war today is just as much an active battle as has ever been fought in the history of man. It is incumbent on us, particularly members of the government with their access more readily and more quickly to exchanges especially with friendly countries, not to become transfixed by panic over the immediate crisis but rather to keep our minds and our over-all strategy on the larger problem facing us.

It is ironic that the perspective on the cold war leads us back to Germany in April of 1945 where advancing units of the American and Russian armies met on the banks of the Elbe near the town of Torgau. This symbolic event has marked the supreme condition of contemporary history ever since. That division of Germany and Europe into Russian and American spheres of influence provided the genesis of the cold war. And so the cold war which began in Germany some 16 years ago out of the results of the second world war now reaches its greatest crisis in that same country.

Whatever the motives of Chairman Khrushchev are I do not know. Perhaps his major aim is a clear acknowledgment from the west of the communist power in the heart of Europe. Certainly he wants recognition of East Germany with full diplomatic status. It is suggested, he wants to make the west back down and retract its words about defending freedom. He wants one more pressure point in the over-all cold war. He wants to test public opinion in the west and to fly a kite because of the increasing sentiment in the west on the part of some who are more and more reluctant to risk a war. In other words, he is perhaps testing our courage. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, he wishes perhaps to stop the embarrassing flow of refugees from East Germany. Some three and a half million people have fled from East Germany since 1949. This represents almost 15 per cent of its population. Ironically enough, as the stream of refugees grew to larger numbers prior to August 13 the tension actually increased in that their numbers increased the embarrassment of the Soviet union. With the latter's tremendous weapon of propaganda they cannot afford to be greatly embarrassed in this manner and we should not be surprised that they are provoked to extreme measures to arrest or mitigate their embarrassment.

It may be that there is a power struggle going on in the Soviet union. It may be that Mr. Khrushchev has his problems at home. It may be that there are great influences behind him originating in the so-called People's Republic of China. Whatever may be the reason, the undoubted fact is that we are face to face with a serious situation, one that calls for the greatest tact and care and display of responsible firmness, if we are going to avoid the cataclysmic consequences of the most terrible experience ever to confront mankind. That is the one thing we have to keep in mind, the consequences to mankind of a world that will be at least partially destroyed and whose civilization would be seriously affected by the consequences that would flow as the result of a nuclear conflict. We in the west must never forget the one, paramount, overriding factor in this day of psychological cold war; that is, that we must never have a nuclear war if that can possibly be avoided. We must think of the innocent men and women of the world who have nothing to do with the formulation of policy. We must think of those who are in no way responsible for this situation except by virtue of their being human beings. We must think of our young people and of the tests they are making of our capacity to resolve this problem. We must also think of the statements they make from time to time that we, an older generation, have made a mess which perhaps only they can correct.

All of this we must bear in mind. Yet at the same time, because of what inevitably confronts us, we cannot fail to recognize that there is a great cleavage between a world that enjoys freedom and a world based upon totalitarian power that denies freedom. This is the terrible dilemma into which we have been placed. Our moral heritage forbids us from starting a nuclear war, yet the side in this historical struggle between tyranny and freedom which first enunciates the abandonment of nuclear war as a basis for diplomatic policy must lose the struggle. This is a central axiom, because if one side eliminates the possibility of nuclear war—and this is the dilemma as I see it—it would be sufficient for the adversary simply to menace severely enough with the threat of nuclear destruction so as to force a negotiated capitulation. We must be prepared, I agree, to go to the limit on issues within the cold war. We must be prepared to do the ultimate concerning Berlin in order to prevent a war over Berlin.

I do not know what President Kennedy told Premier Khrushchev of the Soviet union in Vienna but when the president was making that important journey to visit Khrushchev I did think that he may have sought to establish in the mind of Khrushchev the ultimate intentions of the United States so that there could be no suggestion in history later on, if there is going to be any history, that the Soviet union was not properly warned by its main adversary; and so that no one could say in this period that Russia had been ill-advised, as some historians suggest Hitler had been ill-advised, as to the course the United Kingdom proposed to take in regard to the events that led to the second world war.

The Prime Minister spoke of negotiation in his speech as did President Kennedy in his. I recall the statement made by the Prime Minister in this house before adjournment to the effect that while there could not be negotiations on certain matters and no compromise on essentials, there was an area for compromise and negotiation. I cannot help thinking that while that is undoubtedly the correct position to take, Chancellor Adenauer had views at the time which suggested that compromise was out of the question. Negotiations so far, and understandably because of their very nature, have been fuzzy and not fully defined, partially I readily admit at once because, as the Prime Minister said, to reveal negotiations would freeze our diplomacy, and partially because we are unclear sometimes and perhaps at the moment as to what is actually negotiable.

But let us clear up one fundamental point; that negotiation assumes an attitude on both sides at least genuinely to want to seek the possibility of a solution. If one side has no intention of seeking a solution but is only sitting back waiting for opportunities to make propaganda assaults and to play among the divisions of the western nations, then there is manifestly no certainty of the effectiveness of that kind of negotiation.

I believe personally there is much evidence to suggest that the Soviet union has now no intention of seeking final solutions so we must never allow ourselves, as I see it, to be duped by prospects of grand conferences to resolve all our problems. We have as a precedent the ill fated summit meeting of May 1960. I do not mean by this that we should refuse to have conferences. I do not mean that the President of the United States should have necessarily refused to meet Premier Khrushchev. That is not what I am saying. I am pointing out that we now must surely have behind us sufficient evidence to realize there is no solution to the vital problems of our time merely by conference. But we must always assume that there are grounds for negotiation.

What is negotiable, then? First of all let us clearly state what is not negotiable. Not negotiable, I believe, is the freedom of one single free individual in West Berlin. Not negotiable is one square yard of free men's land in West Berlin. In the field of diplomatic negotiations I support the policies of the government as generally stated. I believe this government in turn, particularly on the basis of the statement made by the Prime Minister, will support our alliance. We will not allow the Soviet union any opportunity of exploiting splits in our ranks because, as I see it, on fundamentals there is no split.

The question of Berlin does not arise in its present context for the first time. We will remember that in November 1958 Premier Khrushchev said that the time had come when there should be a withdrawal from Berlin and that there should be created in that city a demilitarized free zone. We recall too the announcement of Premier Khrushchev at that time that there would be a treaty signed by the Soviet union with East Germany. He called for recognition of East Germany by all nations and particularly the four occupying powers.

Canada has an interest in this matter, although we do not sit in the front seat at the bargaining table, which is not our opposition. Nevertheless we have as vital an interest in this question of Berlin and its consequences as has the United States, Great Britain, France or the Soviet union (a) as a nation among the nations of the world and (b) because of our own legal commitment in regard to situations that could eventuate in modern day Germany.

It must not be forgotten in this context that on October 2, 1954, at London, the western powers of NATO which had met to lay plans for the termination of the occupation of the Federal Republic of Germany and for its incorporation as a state in NATO issued the following declaration, one which will be familiar to the Leader of the Opposition. That declaration is in these terms:

> The security and welfare of Berlin and the maintenance of the position of the three powers there are regarded by the three powers as essential elements to the peace of the free world in the present international situation. Accordingly, they will maintain armed forces within the territory of Berlin as long as their responsibilities require it. They therefore re-affirm that they will treat any attack against Berlin from any quarter as an attack upon their forces and themselves.

On October 23, 1954 Canada and the other NATO members associated themselves with this declaration. Therefore, I say the Canadians, as well as the people of the United States and others, have a stake in the problem of Germany and Berlin. In addition, we have an obligation which arises out of article 6 of the North Atlantic treaty, and which states that an armed attack on the occupation forces in Europe of any party to the treaty constitutes an attack against all parties.

Therefore, we have a vital interest in what happens there, apart altogether from the fact that we are a nation of human beings existing in this very turbulent period of world history.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

In 1959, the Canadian government was confronted with the situation that had been created by the ultimatum given by Chairman Khrushchev in November, 1958. There was a NATO conference in 1959, at which time Canada was represented by the then minister of national defence, General Pearkes. I believe that at that time General Pearkes made a very useful contribution to the solution of that problem. He was commended on his view by the Leader of the Opposition when he spoke in the house some weeks later. We do not know whether at the present time the government has sought to relate to the present situation some of the proposals made at that time by its spokesman in Washington. At any rate, I have seen no public reference to them. I think it might be worthwhile now to recall what were some of the positions taken and proposals made by Canada at that time with regard to a situation which in principle is exactly what we are now confronted with although unaccompanied then by the intensity that characterizes the present situation.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired. Does the committee give unanimous consent for him to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the committee. The Canadian representative suggested methods by which the United Nations might provide the framework for any agreements in Berlin. The Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in commenting on the current situation have sought to emphasize the desirability of a potential role for the United Nations in this situation. First of all it is proposed that the basic role of the United Nations might be to verify that all parties were abiding by the terms of the agreement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whom is the hon. member quoting?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): These are my interpretations of the position taken by General Pearkes on behalf of Canada at Washington in 1959.

Mr. Diefenbaker: General Pearkes' representative?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, by himself. These are the statements he himself made at the council. It was argued that the essential part of any such agreement would be a Soviet pledge binding itself and its associates to permit full freedom of access to West Berlin and the acceptance of a United Nations presence on the lines of communication.

Then, General Pearkes also pointed out that it should be understood that any United Nations responsibility for West Berlin would be complementary to the present rights and obligations of the four occupying powers. These views stated by General Pearkes correspond in some particulars with proposals made on February 12, 1959, by Senator Mansfield. I do not propose to go into Senator Mansfield's proposals. One or two may not be acceptable, but I believe that some of them deserve the careful study of those whose immediate responsibility it is, as members of a government, to find some solution to this difficult situation.

What I have said is all I have to say now about Germany and Berlin. Along with the government, I recognize the seriousness of this situation. I recognize the understandable irritation that all free people of the world must have with the constant succession of events which seem to indicate the success of Soviet union diplomacy. It is no wonder that one hears it being said constantly, when are we going to stop this continuous advancement of the Soviet union. That is understandable when we have to face into this situation. The Soviet union cannot be allowed to go on endlessly interfering with other countries and other people in their determination to see that their philosophy becomes the dominant philosophy and the dominant form of human society.

While this is so, at the same time we have to think of the consequences of actions which would provoke a world nuclear war. It is the balance between that situation and the present one that presents us with the serious problem which confronts us at the moment. The Secretary of State for External Affairs characterized the announcement—it was not by the Soviet union but by the United States itself—of an explosion of a nuclear bomb by the Soviet union as a most tragic situation coming, as it did, before a formal break-up of the Geneva test talks, certainly after some 300 meetings, thus giving the lie to the Soviet union, in the attempt to try to get an agreement on a matter which if successful might have led to the possibilities of a comprehensive agreement on disarmament in conventional and nuclear weapons. It may be that the announcement to commence testing by the Soviet union is intimately related to the Berlin crisis. It may be part of the Soviet union's over-all scheme to create a crisis atmosphere among western public opinion that would force our governments into a move which would bargain away rights and make concessions. I do not believe the Soviet union has been successful in this. Certainly it has aroused even some of the most neutral among the neutral nations.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to the statements of Mr. Nehru and President Nasser, and of course there are statements of other leaders indicating their grave concern with that decision of the Soviet union. But we ourselves cannot escape a responsibility in these matters. The declared position of the Canadian government today as on other occasions during the past twelve months is that we are in favour of a ban on nuclear weapon tests with or without controls. That position of the Canadian government was reiterated today, but I would point out that it is not the position of the government of the United States. Undoubtedly the government of the United States has done everything within its power to arrive at an agreement, but they are in favour of a test with controls above and under the ground.

We are all agreed with regard to the criticism of and the indictment that has been levelled against the Soviet union for the initiative it took in exploding a nuclear bomb in Asia. It is now suggested that possibly another will be exploded in the Arctic. But I should like to know what step the Canadian government has taken to indicate, in the ways that are open, through diplomatic techniques and other methods, our deep displeasure first of all with the Soviet union. That, of course, was done by the Prime Minister in his speech. If I recall correctly—I may be wrong in this—the Prime Minister said that no other form of opposition or complaint had been registered. He may conclude it would be useless. In any event, I hope that at the United Nations we will take our place and indicate to the Soviet union its responsibility not only for the failure of the test talks but for the further regression of progress in the matter of disarmament. But have we intimated to the United States our regret that they found it necessary to carry on tests, even though there is provision for an absence of radioactive consequences because the tests are to take place in the laboratory and underground?

Our position, as stated today, is that we are against tests. While the minister did not say whether or not we are against tests with or without control, we are against tests. I presume the minister was stating the situation as he believes it to be and as he understands government policy. However, if I read correctly the speeches made by the Minister of National Defence, I find a different emphasis. It could be that this emphasis is misunderstood. I have read particularly the speech made by the minister in Toronto the other day. I find it difficult to reconcile the statements made by both ministers with regard to this matter. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said he understood the attitude of the United States is being forced into carrying on these tests as the result of the initiative taken by the Soviet union. I find in that statement a contradiction of what is said to be government policy with regard to a test ban in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs believes.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs did not carry on with the corollary to this problem of banning all tests. No indication was given of the position of the Canadian government with regard to nuclear weapons in Canada. Our position as stated by the Leader of the Opposition is clear. At the present time we do not believe this country should accept nuclear weapons in Canada. What the situation in the future will be will have to be determined by events. It is not because we do not want to see our forces in Canada equipped in the most efficient manner, but because we realize the danger of the diffusion of nuclear weapons. When we think of the situation that now confronts us in Berlin, and assume that that situation passes over without the holocaust that could ensue, our minds should be directed to what could happen if there were more than four powers in possession and control of nuclear weapons.

I note in passing that the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition with regard to nuclear weapons in Canada is to be read with the statement he made on August 5, 1960, which can be found on page 7607 of Hansard of that date. He said:

> If, for instance, the United States needs, and if it can satisfy us that the need is justified, certain facilities on Canadian soil, and if we cannot or do not desire for reasons which seem good to us to ourselves provide these facilities and the services that go with them, then I do not think we should refuse to make the necessary political agreement with our neighbour, as has been done in the United Kingdom. But they should be in clear terms which will always recognize our own sovereign right of ultimate control.
> If such an agreement were to extend to the use of air bases in Canada, as is the case in the United Kingdom, although the agreement there is under reconsideration at the present time, I suggest that any such agreement for the use of Canadian bases, and I think this is important, should only be on the condition that we have complete information about every United States flight from every such Canadian base, and that we have a veto over every such flight off that base if we consider it necessary on policy grounds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the minister mentioned NATO. We must recognize that the weaknesses of the United Nations in terms of its powers of sanction have created a necessity for the freedom loving nations to be bound together in a defensive alliance. Canada had much to do with the establishment of that alliance. This alliance is not perfect, and certainly it does not satisfy us in so far as the pursuit of economic objectives is concerned. We might well contemplate, however, what would have been the situation in the world, in the light of present events, if there were no NATO. I strongly support the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the maximum amount of unity we must have in NATO. I support him with regard to the proposed constitutional arrangement of executive power by four or three of the nations. There must be equality of authority in NATO. I fully subscribe to that view as expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I think we ought to make it clear in the interests of the peace of the world and of the interests of our own security, that we recognize NATO as an essential defensive alliance against agression. There is no condition, and there must be no condition as we see it in this party, to our membership in NATO. Strong political opinion on a very high level in this country was expressed during the course of the summer months as to the kind of condition which should be imposed on NATO if Canadian membership in that organization is to continue. I noticed that a political group that met in this city after the Social Credit party had its annual convention said, inter alia:

> The New Party believes that the extension of nuclear weapons to any further states and alliances threatens disaster to the world. It therefore opposes Canada's troops being supplied with such weapons at home or abroad. At present, except for those nations which have independently developed atomic capacities, neither NATO itself nor its members individually possess or control nuclear warheads. Should they do so, Canada must make it clear that it cannot remain in the alliance.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I take issue with that statement. This statement would be an invitation to the Soviet union to recognize the possibility of NATO becoming disorganized and seriously disunited. There can be no condition attached to the alliance in the face of the present situation that confronts us. I make this statement because I believe, while we must do everything we can to avoid war—I have indicated I believe this strongly and I hope sincerely—we must recognize that perhaps the most effective way of avoiding it is by displaying a measure of common strength, a measure of common strength that has been forced upon us by the aggressive intentions and initiatives taken by the Soviet union.

I should like to summarize my views as to what should be our attitudes with regard to the current situation. First, there should be complete realization of the totality of the Soviet challenge and the retention of power perspective; second, absolute firmness in our declarations of principle and support of freedom; third, to exhibit a mature attitude that is not deliberately provocative and so create tensions which work amongst themselves to produce crises; fourth, the necessity of absolute realism in the terrifying psychology of the cold war. The United Nations must be given an opportunity of increasing service. Its present relative weakness is demonstrated by the secondary position it is taking in these great events that are confronting us. It is playing no direct role in some of the events, particularly those in Germany. We look for an opportunity whereby the United Nations will be given a chance to play a significant role, perhaps as a means of guaranteeing the right of access to West Berlin. I would hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would be prepared to anticipate and meet the kind of attack on the United Nations made last year by Chairman Khrushchev. Such an attack, if it succeeded, would destroy the United Nations as it was envisioned at San Francisco in 1946. It is possible that the Soviet union intends to destroy the United Nations because that body has not served its purposes. One might as well argue that certain nations opposed to the Soviet union might take a similar position if they find that the United Nations does not serve their immediate purposes. What we must do is to see to it that we do not lose the opportunity that has been built up of creating a vast reservoir of knowledge and experience in the existing United Nations. The Soviet union wants to destroy the United Nations as it now is. That is its policy. As was stated by Hamilton Fish Armstrong in a recent number of Foreign Affairs, in a brilliant and valuable contribution, we ourselves no matter what the sacrifice must be prepared to see that the United Nations is carried on.

I have spoken longer perhaps than I should have or intended. Undoubtedly in what I have said I have reflected the difficulty we all have in our desire to avoid nuclear war. It is only by a display of strength, responsibly asserted, that we will in the present scene avoid a nuclear conflict. I am sure that is now the case. War will not serve the cause of the Soviet union. It will not add to the might of the United States. It would simply destroy the effectiveness and richness of man himself and his institutions. This we must avoid. However, we are not going to avoid war by refusing to face up to our responsibilities. We must use the instruments, the only instruments, which we as finite beings know, to provide an effective guarantee against war. We shall not be respected by the Soviet union by being weak. Because of the present armed position of the Soviet union we must be in a position to negotiate from strength. In my judgment only such a position will guarantee what so many people in the world, with the best of intentions, have in mind when they say that we must be prepared to resort to any device in order to avoid the possibility of conflict. Of course we must resort to any device. However, let us do it in a manner that protects the fundamental character of our society, the fundamental principles that govern, in the attempt to safeguard human dignity and preserve peace.

Canada has a responsibility in this matter. We do not sit in the front row at the bargaining table. However, whenever publicly or privately these important discussions are taking place, this government has the responsibility of making sure that the position of Canada is fully known, and that we exert on the Soviet union and others the kind of pressure of public opinion which undoubtedly in the final analysis may prove to be one of the effective means of persuading those responsible for this situation that nothing is to be gained by conflict.

It is in this spirit and with this great concern over this problem that I ask the government to exert its best efforts to bring forward all the sources available to it, and that it consult with every available body in our country. The Leader of the Opposition is perhaps not going to like what I am about to say but I feel that in a situation like this, Canada's role could be an extremely important one. I noticed yesterday that the Prime Minister had a talk with the Leader of the Opposition. There is no man in our country who has greater experience in these matters than has the Leader of the Opposition. The urgency of this situation is such that I make a suggestion and this I do without collaboration, and perhaps in doing so I run the risk of occasioning his displeasure. If the situation is as serious as has been suggested by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by the Prime Minister in Winnipeg, this is no time for irresponsible party division. This is a moment in which to take advantage of every available bit of advice that can be given. With his background and his experience, I know of no one who can give more valuable advice in these matters than can the Leader of the Opposition. In this spirit I hope it will be possible for us to contribute to an era of peace and not one of continuing turbulence.

Mr. Herridge: As usual, Mr. Chairman, I am sure the whole committee listened with interest to the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure it is quite correct to say that he always has the good will and the best wishes of the house in all he tries to undertake in his extremely important office. We in Canada are rather fortunate in the members who have held this office. The previous secretary of state for external affairs was concerned in something that we all hope will develop into a reality in every sense of the word in the days to come and that was when he proposed the emergency force in the Middle East. We in this group hope that force grows into a world police force in the very near future instead of the regional and other pacts that exist at the present time.

The minister said that Canada's role was to do all it could to lessen world tensions. Indeed if I heard him correctly, he made some reference to a remark made by one of the Soviet delegates in a recent conference he attended and which indicated they recognize the fact that Canadians are peaceful people and that our policies are based on our desire for peace. I did not catch the exact words.

Before proceeding I also wish to express our appreciation of the excellent work done by the senior and other officials of the minister's staff. The more one meets representatives of other nations and has an opportunity to talk to them, the more he realizes that we are fortunate in having as our representatives sincere persons working under very ticklish conditions at the present time.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs usually visits his home constituency for a bit of a summer holiday. As a matter of fact his mother is a constituent of mine and he visited there as usual this summer. I always look in the newspapers the next day to read what he had to say. It is reported rather more fully in the Nelson daily News than it would be, say, in the Globe and Mail because he is welcomed as the home town boy who has made good. We recognize that fact.

I read with great interest the speech the minister made in Kaslo on August 13 as reported in the Nelson daily News of August 14. It was a very good speech on the whole, but I must make some reservations. The minister had this to say, in part:

> "There is a great opportunity for our nation. Canada can make a great contribution to mankind as a whole. It all comes back to the individual. In the final analysis every nation can only be as strong as the people in that nation. Whether it be in the Kootenays, at Vancouver, or in the maritimes, the Canadian people, 18 million strong, have an opportunity to serve mankind. It rests with every individual Canadian."

What I like about those comments is that the minister recognizes the value of the individual and the importance of public opinion in the country. He also recognizes the importance of Canadians as individuals as well as governments accepting responsibility in these serious times.

The minister had something to say about nuclear tests. He mentioned that France was the first nation to disappoint the hopes of other nations in the world by insisting on some mole-eyed nuclear tests, as I understand it.

The Soviet union has undertaken nuclear tests in recent weeks. I can say that the members of this group were dismayed at this decision on the part of the Soviet union, particularly after the years of effort by numerous sincere people representing various countries at the many meetings which have been held. We trust this is only a passing phase and is sort of an ebullient exhibition and irritation that can be modified, and a policy that can be changed as the result of continued negotiations and discussions.

We were very pleased to hear the minister place his faith in continued negotiations regardless of the frustrations rather than in belligerent statements and policies. We were also disappointed—as I think were the hon. members of the official opposition—with the United States decision to commence underground tests in the meantime, as I think was stated in the newspapers, prior to the deadline set by President Kennedy with respect to a reply from Mr. Khrushchev. We think this was an unfortunate mistake and, like the hon. member for Essex East who has just resumed his seat, we should like to hear what the government is doing to indicate, I think it is safe to say, general Canadian disappointment and displeasure at the announcement of the United States to proceed with underground nuclear tests. We think the United States would have been in a much stronger position if they had refrained from this action at the present time.

We believe we have to be pretty cool and objective. That is one thing I like about the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as I did about the previous secretary of state for external affairs. We have been very fortunate in that respect. We have had level-headed, moderate-minded people who do not blow off steam in any critical situation. This is very necessary in the world today. We believe we must take a very cool and objective approach to these questions.

The minister mentioned the opinions of people and the responsibility of individuals. I like to find out what people are thinking. I had the opportunity to travel around the Kootenays during the recess. This was somewhat limited by my prior attendance at a recent convention to which the hon. member for Essex East referred and to which I shall refer later.

On one occasion I had the opportunity to address a picnic which over 600 people attended. These people were members of the C.C.F. party and some of them were former members of both the Progressive Conservative and Liberal parties. They seemed to enjoy themselves and seemed to be moving in a progressive direction. I had the opportunity to talk with many of these people and find out what was their approach. I can say that people's attention is directed to what this government does under these circumstances and to what we all do in this House of Commons.

I was very pleased to note their interest. I noticed it came from quarters and from persons who in the past were rather given to taking things for granted. To indicate the attitude of the people I met—and I spoke to dozens and dozens—I can say there is a general feeling in the country that to consider war over the Berlin issue would be tragic and most unfortunate. That is not only the opinion of the people; it is the opinion of a good section of the press of this country.

To indicate this I wish to read from a few editorials. I read first from the Vancouver Sun of August 19. The editorial is headed "Myths" and states:

> It is time to expose the myths that surround the Berlin question, myths that could plunge the world into a final war.
> Prime Minister Diefenbaker might have taken on the unpleasant task of exposing them this week. Instead he devoted his oratorical skill to declaring that the Berlin crisis is forging allied strength and NATO unity to the toughness and temper of Damascus steel.
> This in itself is perilously close to myth. Unity alone does not constitute strength. Chickens huddle together when a hawk passes overhead. As for NATO's strength, it is obviously lacking in Berlin. Our position is dangerously exposed. Strategically, the city is practically indefensible.
> There has been too much talk of unity and strength in recent weeks, too little critical appraisal of the western position on the German question. There have been practically no imaginative or constructive moves by western diplomats.
> The central myth, on which others feed and grow, is that the reunification of Germany is a foundation stone of western policy. This myth should be clearly labelled "Made in west Germany".

We agree with that statement. The editorial continues.

> To our knowledge, no western leader since Anthony Eden has suggested realistic terms for this reunification.
> A unified Germany would be powerful and pro-western. Russia knows this and fears it, and with reason. She was one nation which suffered most from the savagery of German invasion.
> For that matter, is there a unanimous western desire for a reunified Germany? Do nations of west Europe which have suffered German invasion twice in this century wholeheartedly hope for a new and mightier Germany to rise in Europe's centre?
> Western diplomacy can only advance from realism. And the cold truth is that the boundary of the Russian empire will be fixed at the centre of old Germany for the foreseeable future. (Barring an agreement for mutual disengagement of the two main antagonists,—

Which we hope will take place in the not too distant future:

> —leaving a single but neutralized Germany at Europe's centre).
> It is no less realistic that we should recognize the fiction of an independent east German state than that we should recognize the Hungarian, Polish and other governments of territories now held by the Russian empire. We may not recognize the east German regime's right to control their regions. But there is ample precedent for recognizing the Pankow clique as the de facto government.
> Sometime, soon we hope, some western leader will recall Washington and Bonn from the dream which they now seem to share of extending the boundary of the western camp to the Polish border.

Recent statements of German statesmen have indicated this is a final objective of some of the persons in power in West Germany. The editorial continues:

> Why not a Canadian voice?
> Andrei Gromyko, when he was Russian ambassador to the U.N., once remarked that the Canadian delegation frequently said what other people were only thinking.
> Perhaps this is the time for Canadian diplomacy to again adopt this role.

We agree with the concluding paragraph of that editorial. We believe there is an opportunity for the Canadian government to take a stronger position than it has in the past in this connection. I wish to make a very brief reference to Maclean's magazine. These editorials reflect a very widespread opinion amongst Canadians, as I can tell from conversations. This editorial is to be found in Maclean's magazine of August 26, 1961. It is entitled "Berlin. The Crisis that Propaganda Built" and states:

> Canadians don't normally think of themselves as subject to propaganda. That happens to the Russians and the Chinese, the Arabs under Nasser or the Germans under Hitler, not to citizens of a democracy served by a free press. Yet the fact is that we are, right now, targets of a propaganda campaign for which it's hard to find a precedent in peacetime. Its object is to make us believe in a crisis over Berlin.
> For weeks the reports of United States news services have been alterting us to the imminence of a showdown. The western powers are said to be wanting Khrushchev to "keep hands off West Berlin". In the face of "threats" by Khrushchev the west is "standing firm", set to "defend" West Berlin with nuclear weapons if need be.

The editorial continues in a similar vein. I am not going to take the time of the house to read it all. It is quite critical of, shall I say, the almost hysterical approach to this question which one sees if one reads the United States press and which has been reflected to some extent in the Canadian press. If you read the press of the United Kingdom and the press of western Europe you see an entirely different approach to this situation.

We are not underestimating the seriousness of the situation but we do think there has been an attempt to put the thing in the wrong perspective as far as United States citizens are concerned. We think that again the Canadian government can play a very important role here. It has done some good things in the past and in recent days. It has taken very sound action on certain matters when we were not in entire agreement with our friends to the south but which actions have been welcomed by other governments in the commonwealth and other governments in the world generally.

I should like to read now from an editorial written by the publicity director of the Progressive Conservative association of Kootenay West. The minister knows this gentleman quite well indeed. I usually differ with him quite violently on many things. I wish to read the editorial because in walking down the main street of Trail I was amazed to meet people who disagree with this gentleman on most things but who had read this editorial and who said to me, "Here is one thing he said that was right". I suppose I spoke to a hundred people when I was in Trail who made the same comment about this editorial. I am reading it simply to indicate the state of mind of many Canadians under these circumstances. This is what the publicity director of the Progressive Conservative association of Kootenay West had to say, and surely the minister will accept this:

> Let's watch the Germans. It is astonishing with what willingness these West Germans are prepared to place our necks on the block in order that their own comfortable and prosperous way of life may proceed undisturbed.
> The nerve of these people is something to behold. Twenty years ago, they were perpetrating upon humankind atrocities the like of which had never been seen before. Anything the Russians may have done has been kid stuff by comparison.
> These indignant Germans plunged the world into two major wars which have brought democracy as we understand it to the brink of extinction. Now they have the gall to liken President Kennedy, in his reluctance to engage in an all-out shooting war over Berlin, to Chamberlain. They even sent Kennedy a symbolic Chamberlain umbrella. The fact that Chamberlain, in his apparent weakness, gained for the allies a couple of invaluable years in which to organize some sort of defence against Germany seems to escape them entirely.
> In any event, we are quite capable of assessing the significance of current events in Berlin and East Germany without any assistance from the West Germans. As far as we are concerned the West Germans should be invited to button up and right quickly. If we are going to fight the Russians, it will be over something of considerably more consequence to the world than what happens to the West Germans.
> As a matter of fact, there does not appear to us to be any particular issue shaping up in Berlin. Khrushchev has already undertaken that our access to West Berlin is not to be blocked, that our "lawful rights" to be in Berlin at all are to be safeguarded.
> It would be a tragedy if we were now to fall for the guff being peddled by a group of West German malcontents and conspirators who, by virtue of an altogether undeserved measure of allied Christian charity, have prospered so well since 1945.
> Probably we should pull out of Germany altogether and leave the Germans to sort out their own reunification problems. If we did, they would probably start shooting one another the day after. That, however, would be better than sacrificing Canadian lives in a fruitless struggle with the Russians over one miserable Teuton city.

As I say, I differ with the writer on many things but I recognize that we have certain responsibilities. I have read this editorial in order to indicate what a prominent Conservative in my own constituency is thinking and to point out that many people have said to me, "I differ with that man on most things but on this matter he was correct". I do so to indicate a frame of mind which must be recognized. Then we have the view expressed by the chairman of the B.C. power commission, Dr. Keenleyside, who was a deputy minister under the Liberal administration at the same time as the Leader of the Opposition was under-secretary of state for external affairs. I read the following from the Nelson daily News of August 28, last:

> Dr. Keenleyside, who formerly headed the Canadian committee for control of radiation hazards, said, "risking war over the issue of West Berlin is the final evidence of the bankruptcy of our diplomatic policy."
> He added that the west must agree to the permanent division of Germany and grant full recognition to East Germany in a compromise agreement with Soviet Premier Khrushchev. It was obvious that Russia would never agree to German unification when that could mean Germany would be in NATO and armed with nuclear weapons.
> "If the U.S. goes into hysterics over a semi-communist Cuba why should we expect the Russians to agree to the build-up of an infinitely worse threat from a united enemy?"
> Dr. Keenleyside said the west was in "an impossible situation" in Berlin and would have to abandon it sooner or later.

That is Dr. Keenleyside, chairman of the B.C. power commission. Although I do not have them here, the Hon. James Sinclair, a member of the former Liberal cabinet, has also made some very strong statements very much after the fashion of Dr. Keenleyside. In fact, he has indicated that in his opinion it would be complete foolishness for the western world to embark upon a war over the situation that exists in West Berlin. I have mentioned these press items and my conversations with various people to indicate that people are taking an interest in the situation. They are supporting the government in all it can do to prevent anything so tragic and unfortunate as war over an issue which these people are not prepared to admit is a sound one.

The nuclear bomb has made war a monstrous absurdity. Yet some leaders of the west are talking and acting as if the Berlin crisis may have to be settled in the last resort by war. If the Berlin crisis is settled by war, it will certainly be settled for all time, for there will not be a Berliner left alive over whom another crisis could develop. Nor, for that matter, will there be very many Canadians still living to pass on to the blighted generations to come the story of man's supreme folly.

Over 16 years have passed since we helped to end one of the most vicious tyrannies the world has ever known. Let us never forget that Nazi Germany started the second world war and brought total defeat upon itself. We have friends in Germany today, good friends, men who fought the Nazi tyranny with the means at their disposal quite as wholeheartedly as we did under the circumstances that existed at that time. Yet the fact remains and must remain that in our opinion we have no cause in logic, friendship or honour, to go to war now in a futile and suicidal attempt to end the unhappy division of Germany and Berlin.

We have small reason to respect East Germany's communist regime, that shard satellite, more remarkable by its refugees, to whom the minister made reference, than anything else. Yet this regime exists and the more NATO seeks to perpetuate the unnatural state of affairs created in Germany by the second world war the less chance is there of the East German state evolving to a more democratic form of government.

Mr. Khrushchev has stated that unless the western powers agree to an over-all German peace treaty the U.S.S.R. will sign a separate peace treaty with the East German state by the end of this year. At that time Russian supervision over western access to West Berlin will pass to the East German government. Mr. Khrushchev goes on to stress in his statement that the communists have no intention of interfering with western rights in West Berlin or access thereto. Yet over this a tremendous crisis has sprung up. The Americans order a partial mobilization and vote $3 billion for what is still called defence even when there is no real defence in the thermonuclear age. Dr. Adenauer talks as if his nation had been on the side of freedom for generations. Just this week, September 5, General de Gaulle speaks of war over Berlin as if victory there could be bought as easily as at Bizerte.

In the opinion of this group Canada should immediately take the lead in pressing the western powers to conclude a peace treaty with both Germanys. Such a treaty must include ironclad safeguards for the freedom of West Berliners. Such a treaty would necessarily accept the present division of Germany and Berlin and would imply recognition of the East German state.

In this connection we do not underestimate the difficulties. We urge the government to give consideration to promoting the idea of bringing Berlin under the jurisdiction and control of the United Nations as one method of neutralizing this danger spot in western Europe. It is and will continue to be an area of danger.

If the situation continues to exist and the western nations are to face from time to time the danger of war arising from the situation, suggestions have been made that we should even offer to rebuild West Berlin in another portion of the German state. The millions that would cost would be trifling compared with the cost of war and the dangers that would continue to exist unless the United Nations can overcome the situation or make satisfactory treaty arrangements with both German states.

At the same time we urge the government to continue to work for disengagement in western Europe. This is the danger spot. Without doubt this is where the power is concentrated between east and west. We urge the government to give consideration to these proposals.

I wish now to say a word about NATO. With evident relish the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) was kind enough to place on the record in part the policy of the New Democratic party. We thank him for his interest and recognition of the fact that the policies and resolutions adopted by the New Democratic party are of concern to the party of which he is so distinguished a member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of interest, not of concern.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, of interest. I wish to be exact in this respect. I shall read into the record the policy adopted in this respect by the New Democratic party convention. It was arrived at in a democratic manner. There were expressions of opinion and this was the final result:

> NATO has played its part in the maintenance of west European security. However, it has concentrated on a military role and has failed to adapt its policies to the growing importance of the economic and social front in the present world struggle. The New party believes that we should seek a reappraisal and change of NATO's policies and objectives.
> The New party believes that the extension of nuclear weapons to any further states and alliances threatens disaster to the world.

I think perhaps hon. members of the official opposition would agree with that portion of the resolution. I continue:

It therefore opposes Canada's troops being supplied with such weapons at home or abroad. At present, except for those nations which have independently developed atomic capacity, neither NATO itself nor its members individually possess or control nuclear warheads. Should they do so, Canada must make it clear that it cannot remain in the alliance. To relieve tensions, Canada should press for a demilitarized zone in central Europe and for the simultaneous disbandment of the Warsaw and NATO pacts.

I think there would be very little disagreement on that point. It is something for which we should stride more assiduously than we have in the past.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Surely.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. gentleman tell the committee if a vote was taken on this proposal and, if so, what was the division?

Mr. Herridge: Well, it was a matter of great interest but I was not able to opine the count on either side.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Seven hundred to 800, I think.

An hon. Member: There were not that many people there.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Essex East is better informed than members of the group who were present at the convention.

Mr. Drysdale: That would not be difficult.

Mr. Herridge: For the information of the committee there were approximately 1800 delegates present. I have never seen so many people remain seated and attentive as that group during the course of five very warm, humid and trying Ottawa days.

An hon. Member: They were trying, all right.

Mr. Herridge: Ours is a democratic movement. Every opportunity was provided for discussion. There was no division as to purpose or principle. Differences of opinion were expressed as to timing, interpretation, details and so on but these were all resolved at the convention.

Mr. Pearson: Such as in resolutions from the floor.

Mr. Hellyer: Which group do you belong to?

Mr. Herridge: A whisper from my left inquired as to what group I belong to. I was elected as a member of parliament representing the C.C.F. party. I am a C.C.F. member of parliament but at the same time a member of the national council of the New Democratic party. Does that explain the situation?

Mr. Hellyer: Has there been any change in your views?

Mr. Herridge: You see, we have nothing to hide. We do not have to do these things in hotel rooms. We conduct our affairs in the open. We are like the British Labour party. We have wide differences of opinion but it is amazing how we can close ranks when we have to face a common enemy.

An hon. Member: Where is the British Labour party now?

Mr. Herridge: We strongly oppose nuclear weapons of any type in Canada. In that respect the official opposition and members of this group are in agreement.

I was interested in the minister's reference to the commonwealth. I have a great affection for the commonwealth and great respect for the part it can play in the days ahead. I know that the minister shares my view in that respect. The commonwealth is increasing in membership as a result of more and more native states obtaining self-governing status and increasing in influence. We believe that Canada should play a stronger role in the commonwealth. Canada should do something along the line of what is being done by Mr. Nehru who, according to the press, is in Moscow, appealing to Premier Khrushchev with respect to the present dangerous world situation.

We believe Canada should take a stronger lead within the commonwealth and should promote peaceful policies at the present time. We should take a stronger and more independent stand but one that is co-operative in the sense that even if we disagree with our friends to the south, or others, we have the same purpose, the protection of freedom and the maintenance of peace.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herridge: I appreciate this courtesy. I am practically finished. I trust there will be an opportunity for another hon. member of our group to deal with the matters with which I may not have time to deal. I deeply appreciate the rapt attention which the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Pugh) is according my remarks. He has taken a seat close to me in order to listen to my remarks and I consider that a compliment.

We agree with the minister that the United Nations is the hope of mankind. We support the government in everything it undertakes to strengthen the influence, prestige and work of the United Nations. There are those who detract but, as the minister said, imagine what might have happened in the Middle East or the Congo if there had been no United Nations. Those were difficult situations. It is easy to criticize when you have had no experience with situations of that type. I am of the opinion, as I am sure are all the members of this group, that if we did not have the United Nations we would have had the storm of war long before this. The United Nations has played a very effective role. We urge the government to continue to do everything it can to strengthen it and also to build up support for the principle of a United Nations police force so that gradually we shall be released from these regional pacts. In the United Nations we can have a police force to which we contribute for collective security whenever necessary.

I conclude at this point, Mr. Chairman. As I said before, I trust another member of our group will have a chance to deal with some matters that I have not had the opportunity to discuss.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take advantage of this debate to report to the house some of the observations which I made during my recent trip to South America.

It was my privilege to represent Canada as an observer at the special meeting of the inter-American economic and social council at ministerial level which opened at the resort of Punta del Este in the republic of Uruguay, on August 5.

This meeting grouped together delegates of the countries of South America, Central and North America and observers from almost all the nations of the world. This conference was probably the most important event of its kind which has taken place in the history of Latin America and what was decided there may well be the turning point in the sociological, political and economical life of all Latin American countries. At long last, the Latin American countries have realized that they must unite in spirit if they wish to be strong. They appreciate that they must direct their cultural tendencies in the proper channels if they wish to survive. They face the fact of the necessity of increasing their respective productive facilities and their trade relationships if they wish to prosper. The leaders of these countries are particularly aware of the fact that some countries are faced with the choice either of moving forward through the application of the proven methods of democracy which will mean a better way of life and a better standard of living for all citizens or yet face the inevitable upsurge of communism in their midst with all its dire circumstances.

We arrived at Punta del Este on the first day of the conference and we were surprised to find the considerable unrest which animated the 1,500 or so delegates who were crowding all available accommodation in this beautiful resort. We did not know, of course, and we learned much to our amazement, that many political, cultural and business leaders were worried by the influence exercised on the thinking of a great many people by the Cuban actions of the last year and by the Cuban propaganda. There are many who were truly worried that the arguments which were expected to be put forth by the leader of the Cuban delegation might promote certain tendencies which could be disastrous to the necessary unity which is sought by the sound thinking people in the southern hemisphere.

It is most difficult for us in Canada to appreciate that a small island like Cuba, populated by 4 million people, more or less could exercise such an influence on a continent populated by more than 150 million people. But it must be remembered, in order to appreciate the situation, that there are in Central and South America many small nations which have had to live for decades through a series of disastrous revolutions, people who know the horror of famine, of extreme poverty and of economic chaos and confusion.

The people who have nothing are ready as always to throw themselves at the mercy of the first person who offers what may look like benefits or an improved situation. Many have been impressed by the Castro propaganda which claims the success of the revolution and which bluntly declares in the most deceitful fashion that Castroism has brought the golden age to the Cuban island. There are some who feel that what supposedly can be accomplished in Cuba can also be accomplished elsewhere under the merits of the Castro regime. Since the Castro propaganda is based almost entirely on a violent anti-United States campaign, it is rather obvious that if such a doctrine became successful, it could, to a certain extent, isolate Latin America from the North America which we know. It was, therefore, with anticipation and a certain apprehension that the delegates greeted Mr. Clarence Dillon, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, when he rose to make his initial address in the early stages of the conference. It was with much joy and relief that all heard the most generous offer of aid which was made to Latin America by the United States statesman. Even the most optimistic governments were stunned by the magnitude of the aid offered and greatly pleased by the attention which the United States government is giving to the Latin American area.

Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Before I leave the chair, may I remind members of the committee that we resume our sittings at 7.30 p.m. this evening and not 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I had just mentioned that the members, delegates and observers who were at the conference at Punta del Este were stunned by the magnitude of the aid which was offered to Latin America by the United States. I should like to place before the committee a list of the main points of this aid which has been offered. They are as follows:

(a) an undertaking to commit aid on a long term basis by which it is hoped $20 billion of outside capital, public and private, can be injected into Latin American economies over a ten-year period. The target is to achieve an increase in real income of 2.5 per cent per person per year. The United States delegation was effective in giving other representatives the impression that an all-out effort would be made.

(b) recognition that aid must be supplemented by practical measures to raise the export earnings of recipient countries, including a lowering of United States trade barriers to the products of Latin America and a sympathetic approach to commodity agreements and measures for stabilization of prices of basic commodities. In particular, the United States undertook to participate in a workable coffee agreement to be negotiated in September.

(c) offer of a crash program for emergency aid to make an immediate impact in the areas where the social and political situation is most dangerous. Claims on this program must be presented within 60 days and the funds to be allocated are estimated to be in the neighbourhood of $300 million. This is a reflection of the argument clearly brought out in the conference that revolutionary turmoil threatens chiefly the smaller Latin American nations. The objective is to maintain political stability in these areas while long term projects get under way.

(d) concrete demonstrations of the acceptance of planning, a concept to which the United States delegation at the San Diego ECLA conference had earlier given official blessing. This implies more or less an acceptance of the strong possibility that national and multinational economic planning in Latin America often may not act to the advantage of existing United States commercial interests in this area.

The conference then endorsed the principle of co-ordination of national development plans and approved the appointment of a panel of planning experts to carry out this role and to assist in the formulation of national plans, in the acquisition of necessary financing from the inter-American development bank, the United States government and other sources. The planning group, although normally independent for administrative purposes is to come under the secretary general of the organization for American states. This arrangement seems likely to enhance the prestige and importance of the organization.

It was indeed fortunate that the United States could speak and make its offer of aid before the Cuban delegation could make its own declaration. As expected, the speech of the leader of the Cuban delegation, Mr. Ernesto Ché Guevara, was a violent attack on the so-called American imperialism and almost an appeal to all Latin Americans to rebel against the power of their strong northern neighbour. Mr. Guevara cut quite a personable figure at the conference. He was dressed in the well-known Cuban battle-dress suit, had the familiar well trimmed beard, was surrounded by the most horrible looking and presumably armed bodyguards, and put on quite a well rehearsed theatrical performance.

Mr. Guevara is very young. He is only 31. He is quite obviously an intelligent man and has acquired most of his training by intuition. But he has a natural talent for the stage and a definite talent for eloquence. His performance would have been worthy of an Oscar if Oscars were given for such performances. It was dramatic and the audience of 1,000 clearly enjoyed the show that our friend Guevara put on. But the hollowness of his arguments and the obvious efforts which were made to break up the unity of the conference met with the indifference which that speech deserved. It became apparent that all delegates were strongly united behind the position adopted by Mr. Dillon and the United States delegation.

It seems that Mr. Guevara, after he had finished his speech, fully realized that he could not carry on with his initial stand and, as a result, the Cuban delegation became much more co-operative as the conference progressed. It advanced proposals and amendments which made sense and which, at one point, were in fact unanimously accepted. Many delegates, towards the end of the conference, even had the impression that Cuba was willing to conciliate and find a basis for a better understanding with its neighbours. The conference was definitely a success.

What is most gratifying is that during our stay in Punta del Este, we met the representatives of most of the Latin American countries and I am pleased to report that Canada enjoys a position of great prestige in Latin America. There was no exception and the political and business leaders whom we met all expressed their admiration of our country and their wish to establish a closer cultural and economic relationship with our nation.

At a luncheon which was offered to the delegates of the various nations by President Haedo of the republic of Uruguay, Canada occupied the place of honour and it was indeed gratifying to realize that Canada and Canadians are held in such high esteem in South and Central America. It was remarked frequently by many Latin Americans that there is an affinity between Canada and their respective countries. The Argentinians in particular observed that although we are geographically located at opposite ends of the Americas we nevertheless resemble each other from the point of view of size, population, the quality of our industry, the nature of our agricultural products and many other features; and the wish was expressed everywhere for a closer relationship which should prove mutually profitable. This, of course, made us very proud to be Canadians and to realize that the love which we have for our country is shared by so many others in foreign lands.

The conference lasted for ten days and ended on a note of optimism and determination to improve the fate of one and all in Latin America. There is no doubt that the moves that were initiated should prove extremely beneficial to the general and better interests of all American countries. Immediate effects resulting from the crash aid program should be felt soon and if the resolutions adopted are followed to the letter, it is quite reasonable to state that the future looks bright for Latin America. At this point, it is important to emphasize the great differences that exist between the economic structures of North America and those of Central and South America. The methods which have permitted the United States and our own country to grow and prosper during the last twenty five years are almost unknown in many sectors of Latin America or are still in their incipient stages in most countries. For example, banking such as we know it, trading and business practices which are in current use in this country and which have been so successful are unknown or not utilized in many sectors of the southern hemisphere. The use of credit which is the basis of our economic strength is unknown in most of the Latin American countries. Few people in Latin America can, as an indication, buy a home, an automobile or the other commodities of our every day life and be granted the privilege of paying over a short or a long term basis. Money can be borrowed only at the most fantastic rates and investments in many countries are considered insecure because of a raging inflation and of the ever present risk of political revolutions.

The degree of illiteracy is tremendous. It is estimated that in Brazil alone, a country of 70 million people, at least 50 per cent of the population or 35 million people are completely without education of any kind. The degree of poverty as a net result in some areas is almost beyond description and I can say without exaggeration that in order to improve the standard of living of these enormous masses, almost all remains to be done. Latin America needs enormous sums of money; and although the sum of $20 billion offered by United States as aid during the next ten years may appear fantastic at the outset, it is still relatively insufficient to meet the needs of Latin America during the next decade. But what Latin America needs far more than money is the technological methods and the scientific training which have been applied with such success in our northern hemisphere. Latin America does not need money as much as the knowledge of what to do with the money that it will receive. In the name of sovereignty or autonomy, some countries may be reluctant to accept the advice of foreigners or of those North Americans who will try to teach them the proper use of the financial means which will be offered. This could very well be disastrous since this money, if not properly utilized, could well be spent in futile ventures or even fall into the hands of a very few who, as it has too often been the custom, will invest it in foreign lands where the risk of a revolution is small and where the rate on investments can be more secure. Those interested in the future of Latin America should immediately use every effort to convince all Latin American countries of the need to accept the help of those who wish to train Latin Americans in the ways of modern technology and industrial and business practices which have proven so successful. An endeavour in this direction is essential if immediate and long term success is desired. A failure in this attempt will almost inevitably result in the rebellion of the people against the hopelessness of their fate and destiny and the advent of communism. What threatens Latin America is the worst form of communism, the revolution of the people who have not against the people who have; the destruction of all that is good; the rebellion of the poor who blindly will destroy all that stands in their way; the chaos, confusion and bloodshed which accompany revolutions and for us the danger of having next to our shores the presence of millions of people who will distrust and hate. All this has been realized by the delegates and observers who were present at the Punta del Este conference and, in the opinion of many, the hour is quite late. For these reasons and many others, it is quite obvious that the citizens of the free world who enjoy the benefits of prosperity and freedom must try to help these southern neighbours who need a helping hand more than ever before in their long history. This help should be given not only in a spirit of charity but also with the firm conviction that our democratic way of life is right, that it must expand, thus offering a defence against the onslaught of communist propaganda which may reach within this country of ours.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, during our recent trip to South America, it was our privilege to visit the beautiful countries of Uruguay, Argentina and Brazil.

I should like to report briefly on what we have seen during our trip.

Uruguay is a small country of about 5 million people which is rightly considered in South America as a model of democratic life. The republic of Uruguay has a stable government; the democratic principles in which we believe and which are the basis of our existence are exactly those that are honoured in that country. As a result, the country's economy is sound. The value of its currency is fairly stable and inflation is practically unknown there.

The capital city of Uruguay, Montevideo, with a population of over 1 million, enjoys progress, prosperity and a way of life that angurs well for the future.

South of Uruguay, is the republic of Argentina, one of the most beautiful and richest countries in the world. Its soil is fertile and its natural resources plentiful. Undoubtedly, under a sound administration, it will once again occupy the predominant cultural and economic position it once held in our world.

Argentina still exercises a great influence in Latin America and elsewhere but the fact remains that that magnificent and wonderful country was practically ruined under Peron and the nefarious administration which was characteristic of his regime. Today, the majority of Argentines support President Frondesi, a remarkable man who has fully succeeded by his wisdom and inspired leadership in restoring order and prosperity in his country.

[Mr. Sevigny.]

Meeting President Frondisi, we got the impression that here was a man who could restore Argentina's fortune and give back to this extraordinary country the prosperity it unfortunately lost under the administration of Juan Peron and his associates.

Undoubtedly numerous problems are still facing the Frondesi administration, and the worst may well be the inordinate inflation prevailing there and which it will be difficult to control. We were given the opportunity to see what happens to a country where inflation exists and especially how harmful it is to the white collar class and to those with fixed salaries when prices are spiralling and goods getting scarce.

What we have seen in Argentina shows how advisable it is to try and prevent inflation and to protect Canada from that scourge.

Brazil is a vast country with a population, as I said earlier, of over 70 million people. Its population increases each year for, they say its birth rate is 3 per cent a year, which is the highest in the world.

That country has tremendous resources and since vast territories are still unexplored, one can presume that the wealth of that land of promise is even greater than one can conceive.

We had the privilege of visiting the city of Brasilia, a true example of what human imagination can create. That city is indeed a tribute to those who have faith in the concept of modern architecture and civil engineering. Five years ago, Brasilia was a barren plateau scorched by a burning sun. More than $750 million were spent for the construction of that capital city, and that is said to be only a beginning.

More than 100,000 people live in that city. Everywhere, one sees modern streets and ultramodern buildings. If one fault can be found with Brasilia, it may be that it is too modern and that its architecture is somewhat futurist.

Brasilia was selected for both sentimental and practical reasons: sentimental, because that city is located at the very mouths of South America's two great waterways, the Parana, running into Argentina, and the well-known Amazon; practical, in the sense that it was considered wise to erect that city in the very centre of the country, in order to have new industries and numerous villages developed around it.

Rio de Janeiro is still perhaps the finest city in the world, from a panoramic standpoint. There is also in that city an atmosphere of dynamic and progressive activity. Brazilians wish to forge ahead, to progress and to raise their standard of living.

During our stay there, the main topic of conversation revolved around the activities of ex-president Janio Quadros. He seemed to enjoy extraordinary personal popularity. We could feel, however, that sound thinking people were concerned about his leftist leanings, and it is certain that when he decided to award his country's highest decoration to Mr. Guevara, the Cuban minister of economic affairs, his action was resented by a great many people, and the result was to hasten his resignation.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, I have only a few more sentences to finish my speech.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to allowing the associate minister to finish?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, what amazed me during the talks I had with Brazilian statesmen was their desire to co-operate with the western powers.

Communism has certainly no hold on Brazil and we have there allies who want to co-operate with us and to prevent, if possible, the birth of subversive movements in that country where huge illiterate populations are living, which, if they were to be subjected to communist influence, could easily cause a social and economic revolution.

(Text):

On our way back to Canada we stopped in San Juan, Puerto Rico, and we had the great privilege of meeting the governor of the commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Senor Luis Munoz Marin, who is considered, and rightly so, in many circles as one of the great democratic leaders of our times. The governor gave us a wonderful reception and at a dinner which he gave in honour of the Canadian delegation we had the privilege of meeting the members of his cabinet and many other Puerto Rican leaders in the fields of finance and industry.

When Luis Munoz Marin was elected governor of Puerto Rico in 1949 there was very little activity in the island. The degree of illiteracy was very high. Poverty and its allies, that is misery and even crime, were everywhere. The economy was in a precarious condition. Through sound economic management, imaginative and progressive theories, Luis Munoz Marin completely changed the course of events. By offering special advantages to industries interested in the wonderful climate of the island, its vast labour pool and many other advantages, Luis Munoz Marin has in the short space of 12 years attracted over 700 new industries to the island of Puerto Rico. These new industries represent an investment of well over half a billion dollars. These new industries have meant work and employment for the people of Puerto Rico and also an ever-increasing level of well-being.

Schools have been built everywhere and as a result illiteracy has almost completely disappeared from the island. A slum clearance program has been carried out and is being continued, and all over the island can be seen low-cost housing developments where today live in comfort people who for generations had resided in the most abject slums. Magnificent hotels have been built and millions of tourists consider Puerto Rico as the ideal vacation land.

All this has been accomplished through peaceful methods without revolutions and crippling strikes. The government of Puerto Rico observes to the letter the rules of democratic government in which we believe and always strives to co-operate with those who wish to help them instead of resisting progress. What is happening in Puerto Rico through the application of democratic methods which we understand and in which we believe can also happen elsewhere in Latin America, and it is to be hoped that the example of Puerto Rico will serve as a model to other countries in Central and South America.

At this point it may be useful to establish a parallel between what has happened in Puerto Rico and what has happened and is still happening in Cuba. Both islands have the same climate, the same rich soil, the same products, and are populated by people of the same origin. In the one island, Puerto Rico, thanks to the better ways of democracy we see prosperity, expansion, a happy people, a booming industry, millions of tourists and, to sum up, a very bright future. In the other, Cuba, because of revolution, corruption in government and the desire by its present leaders to move to the left we see a chaotic economy, the rule of force and strength, despair and fear, empty hotels, a ruined tourist industry and the distrust of almost everyone in the immediate future of the island.

May I summarize by saying that after visiting Latin America I realize more than ever that, although here in North America we may have shortcomings and we accept the fact that a great deal remains to be done if we wish to move forward toward our great destiny, we nevertheless have managed to achieve success through the application of our methods of government and our search for an ever better and improved standard of living. We have achieved all this through peaceful methods and we have established as the basis of our mode of life the principle of freedom—freedom from fear and freedom from want. We have fought for this freedom and we shall undoubtedly fight again if it becomes necessary to protect it. But in order to protect this freedom we must share what we have with others who need our help and guidance. Our fate will be a better one if the fate of our neighbours in Latin America is also a better one. The people in Latin America believe in us. Let us be worthy of their trust and it may be that in the unity of the Americas in freedom, prosperity and well-ordained progress may rest the answer which we seek to the peace of the world.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested to hear the Associate Minister of National Defence speak on South America and as a result I decided that I would say a few words because Latin America has a special place in my heart. I was only a year old when my parents took me to Brazil. My father owned a coffee plantation there but unfortunately when I was about six years of age a younger brother of mine died of malaria. My mother became panicky, with the result that we packed our bags and went back to Italy, the country where I was born. Instead of selling coffee now in Brazil and probably doing business with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because of the death of my little brother I was destined eventually to come to Canada to sell automobiles.

The story of Latin America today has to be told in the moods of her people as well as in statistics. One cannot generalize about Latin America any more than he can about Asia, Africa or Europe. It is true, however, that the people of Latin America do have certain things in common including ancestry, language and a colonial history, but probably the most important common characteristics are a fierce pride, impatient youth and a craving to break out of the condition of underdeveloped peoples living in underdeveloped lands.

I should like to deal very briefly with certain points relevant to the underdeveloped nature of Latin America as a geographical area. The potential resources of this area are enormous and thus far only the surface has been scratched. The main problem is lack of capital despite the fact that outside private investments and loans have been considerable.

The mineral resources of Latin America constitute her greatest wealth. Oil is abundant especially in the north of South America and in the Caribbean. In the south the resources have not been effectively tapped because of lack of capital and technical know-how. Peru and Chile are rich in copper, Chile in nitrates, Brazil and Venezuela in iron, manganese, coal, gold and uranium.

In agriculture Latin America's production per capita lags behind the rapid growth of population but the soil is rich and can grow sufficient food if farmers are taught how to get higher yields by the use of modern machinery and techniques and if storage and transportation facilities are installed to spread equitably the products of agriculture. One of the greatest dangers is the one crop economy pattern which is so typical in Brazil with coffee, and I know something about that because my father was in the coffee business there. The same thing also applies to other Latin American nations with respect to other crops. Such practices place the nations concerned at the mercy of world price fluctuations. The economic problems of the area are largely a result of the inadequate use of resources for reasons that range from lack of capital through low productivity, dependence on world prices and poor administration to the selfish shortsightedness of governments and business.

Internally the situation is generally one of inflation and skyrocketing costs of living which sap the strength and development capacity of most of the nations of the area. Consequently there are problems of balance of payments which generally are unfavourable, although Latin America's trade with Canada alone amounting to approximately half a billion dollars last year underlines the region's commercial importance.

I should like to deal at greater length with some of the basic political problems of Latin America. The United States secretary of state recently told the council of the organization of American states that an ideology foreign to the western hemisphere has little chance of taking root in Latin America. An article in the April 1960 issue of Foreign Affairs, written by Professor Frank Tannenbaum of Columbia University, gives reason to question not only the American secretary of state's optimism but also the rosy impression left by Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs in his speech of February 10 this year when he said that all 20 republics of Latin America are "imbued with the love of freedom and all are very responsible members of the United Nations". That reference may be found at page 936 of Hansard of that date. Professor Tannenbaum does not even discuss the danger of communism in Latin America, but the situation he describes sounds very familiar to those of us who have watched the pattern of communist revolution in other parts of the world.

According to the Foreign Affairs article to which I referred, Latin America has not developed genuine liberal democracies. The only form of political authority which typifies government in Latin America is personal authority. The only way this personal political authority can be transferred is through violence or death. In any stable democracy there must be freedom of association to organize political parties as alternatives to the party controlling the government. In Cuba, however, and this is typical of Latin America generally, what seemed to be political parties on the surface were not parties at all in our sense of the word. They were merely groups of office seekers in search of a leader who would authorize their misuse of public funds for private ends. Sometimes the forms of democracy have been observed, but only the forms. The real pattern of Latin American history for the last 150 years has been dictatorship, rebellion and again dictatorship. There seems to be little hope of change in this pattern.

Professor Tannenbaum does not draw the clear implications of his study but they are there to be considered by all who have responsibility for the planning of western policy. Mr. Khrushchev has shown that he understands the term peaceful co-existence in an active rather than a passive sense. In the case of Latin America it is entirely likely that Mr. Khrushchev is considering the possibility of shortening the time when communism will, in his words, inevitably triumph. So far it is true that there has been little communist penetration in the region, but if Professor Tannenbaum is correct South America may well be the next continent on the Kremlin's list. The situation he describes is exactly the type of situation in which communism thrives.

For most of the people of Latin America the political choice is not between dictatorship and democracy but is between a dictatorship which looks as if it were endeavouring to give them enough to eat and one which does not give that appearance. If the west wishes to keep Latin America out of the soviet camp it should adopt policies which in the long run will make possible a third choice, namely a system of politics under which peaceful changes of government can take place.

In his speech of February 10 to which I have already referred, the Secretary of State for External Affairs advocated increased trade with Latin America, expansion of cultural relations, the possibility of official visits, and the strengthening of diplomatic relations, but not a word was said about helping the ordinary people of the Latin American republics who are in many cases left or even kept in poverty, ignorance and ill health in homelands which are rapidly becoming overpopulated because no one cares enough to make the considerable effort necessary to lift them from the feudal past to an industrial future.

As the minister said, Latin America is indeed an area in which a great deal more can be done than has been done in the past. I hope that when the hon. gentleman spoke about extending cultural relations he had in mind something that would be of direct benefit to the people as opposed to governments. For example, if we engaged in an exchange of primary, secondary and even university teachers, considerable benefits might well flow to the people of Latin America over a period of years. Similarly there might be an extension of activity in the field of student exchanges to include, with the assistance of scholarships, the children of the less well-to-do in Latin America.

In closing I wish to quote from an article in the March 1, 1958 issue of Saturday Night:

> In a world that tends to see the fight for freedom often in terms of the struggle between the soviets and their chained peoples, the repeated violence in the Latin American republics, as regimes come and go, testifies at least as much to the vitality there of liberty as an ideal as it does to the inability, as yet, of the Latins to find their own answers to political stability.

We might be able to help the peoples of Latin America find some of their own answers to the problems of politics if we concerned ourselves with the basic importance of helping to establish for them a sound foundation of education. It might be said that Canada can do little here. I reply that in education even more than in economics a multiple effect is achieved. After all, Christ taught only 12 disciples but it was not long, as history shows, before the Roman world was Christian.

If we help teach the ways of liberal democracy not only to the people of Latin America but to the Africans and Asians, we may well be doing something for which governments are not noted, namely having due regard for the long term interests of the nation and indeed our entire civilization. I earnestly believe we should consider joining the organization of American states which is holding an empty chair for Canada to occupy.

Mr. Stinson: Mr. Chairman, following as I do the Associate Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for Fort William, I wish to congratulate those two hon. gentlemen on the very helpful and informative speeches they have just made which I am sure will increase the knowledge of hon. members of Latin American affairs. I think traditionally Canadians have looked east and west rather than south, and when they have looked south, many times they have not looked further south than the United States of America. I hope other hon. members will have opportunities to travel in South America and that there will be other occasions for members of the House of Commons to build up relationships and friendships among themselves and people in that continent who are in positions of responsibility.

The first thing I wish to say tonight, Mr. Chairman, is to urge the government to do everything it can to stop further nuclear testing. I must say that tonight my mind is a long way from here and from South America; rather it is in that area of the world where four bombs have been dropped recently and from which area at this very time radioactive dust is drifting to other parts of the world. No matter where that dust settles it can do nothing but harm. I urge the government to do everything it can to stop those tests above the ground, under the ground, or in the laboratory.

The press secretary to the President of the United States of America, apparently speaking for the administration, said that new United States tests were necessary because, as he put it, important advances can be made by further scientific developments. Since the United States already has a stockpile of atomic weapons which it said last week was wholly adequate for the defence of the free world, I cannot see that further testing will do anything but speed up the tempo of the arms race.

There may be many factors in this most complex problem which are unknown to me, Mr. Chairman. I heard the Leader of the Opposition on television the other night. He made his comments in this regard. He said that there might be things of which he had no personal knowledge and therefore, as I recollect his remarks, he did not want to make a dogmatic statement; but I say that the most important thing for this parliament to consider tonight is the steps that our government can take to put an end to those explosions at the earliest possible moment.

I wish to take part in this debate for three other reasons. The first is that I wish to express my appreciation of the services and leadership which have been given recently by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. All of us know of the intense interest which the present Prime Minister has shown in international affairs throughout his public career. He attended the founding conference of the United Nations, and at every session of parliament since that time he has put forward constructive proposals for preventing war and for creating conditions which would help to give the better life to people in other countries who are oppressed or who are suffering because of being without proper food, adequate housing, clothing or educational opportunities.

I thought I had heard the Prime Minister of Canada in his finest hour on September 26, 1960, when he spoke at the United Nations. He made a speech in the United Nations assembly which was unanimously accepted as a brilliant answer to the false accusations of Mr. Khrushchev which had been made the week before. But on September 1, 1961, he made a statement before the Canadian Bar Association which I think the world greatly needed and which surpassed all previous speeches he has made on international affairs. I am sure this speech will have an effect on the course of events.

Some of our critics say that Canada should take the lead among the middle powers. I say that with that speech in Winnipeg the Prime Minister will give the lead to the great powers. On behalf of the citizens of York Centre I wish to express my gratitude to him.

Since parliament last debated foreign affairs the Secretary of State for External Affairs has spoken for Canada on many international problems. These days some persons are so appalled by the immensity of these problems that they think only of the gloomy side of things and talk in generalities. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is not one of those. He has won for himself at NATO, at the United Nations and at Geneva the reputation of being an optimist, but an optimist who believes that optimism can only be sustained if you work hard day by day to find solutions to the problems at hand. This has been the policy followed by our country on disarmament.

Canada must continue to advocate means of bringing about negotiations in the face of the most discouraging conditions. We must attempt again and again to devise means of bringing about negotiations and if the means that are proposed fail we must try again. If members of this parliament advocated any other policy or sought to disparage—and this has been done from time to time—the conscientious efforts made by our foreign minister in this regard how could they explain themselves to their constituents or to their children who see over one third of the national tax revenues devoted to maintaining and equipping armed forces?

I wonder whether any hon. member has had the experience, as I have had recently, of trying to explain to a 13 year old child how it has come to pass that in 1961, having the benefit of all the wisdom and inventive genius of the great minds of 20 centuries, the leaders of the world today are snarling at each other, threatening war and talking about dropping a bomb which would destroy millions of people. All I can say is that when you try to explain this you realize how bad things have become and how important it is that Canada continue to press for disarmament.

The second reason I have for speaking in this debate is that I believe I have an obligation to my constituents to say in parliament what I think about world affairs. In saying this, Mr. Chairman, I am fully conscious of how little I know. The week before last I was in Europe and had conversations there with some Canadian foreign service officers and other people who have some knowledge of European affairs. When one considers what is happening in Berlin and knows that our leaders have the advice of experienced and trained experts one has reason to wonder whether anything one can say can be of any help at all. I think members of parliament have a duty to try to assist the experts. We have better facilities and opportunities for becoming and keeping informed about those problems than most of our constituents have. No matter how complex some of the problems appear we must try to understand them and make suggestions. The right to make suggestions in parliament is a right which is given to very few Canadians. I hope hon. members will forgive me for stating the obvious. I am very much aware of the privilege which is mine in being here and having the right to say what I think about these things. I recall hearing the hon. member for Greenwood speak years ago on this subject, and I have not forgotten what he said. What an excellent example is set by that hon. gentleman for those of us who have arrived here fairly recently.

The third reason I wish to speak tonight, Mr. Chairman, is to make some proposals. The other day I read a statement attributed to Senator J. William Fulbright, who is chairman of the United States Senate committee on foreign relations. He said this:

> I, for one, am not at all certain that the principles and values of western civilization represent the common aspirations of all peoples.

I was surprised to read this because, like the Washington correspondent for Maclean's magazine who used this quotation, I have a deep admiration and respect for Mr. Fulbright and generally agree with the speeches he has made which I have seen in print. Hon. members may be glad to know that I do not propose tonight to give a discourse on the principles and values of western civilization. It does seem to me, however, that if properly defined they do represent the common aspirations of all peoples. What are they? I think the principles are derived from Judaism and Christianity; that there is a God who loves all people and if people understand love and practice honesty and charity they can aspire to a satisfying life. I know that these things are not fully understood by many people in Canada or elsewhere, but I think there is a force which is pressing all of us to live by this principle and a deep-seated desire in all of us to do so.

I think that the values are derived from the ancient civilizations of Greece, Rome and western Europe. What are they? The first, of course, is freedom which I think is the right to think and act without arbitrary control or direction by the government. I think that the other values are companion values to political freedom, which have gradually come into common acceptance with the passage of time. Does freedom not represent the common aspiration of all peoples? Again, we are dealing with something which is not understood by many people struggling each day in Latin America or southeast Asia, as well as many other parts of the world, to get enough to eat and drink. Many of these people are unable to read and cannot be expected to know the meaning of freedom. I think it is one of the innate desires of all human beings. I think, therefore, on this count also Senator Fulbright may be wrong.

It is fashionable in some quarters these days, Mr. Chairman, to say that western countries, especially the United States, in trying to impose their standards and methods have done more harm than good. Books like "The Ugly American" and "A Nation of Sheep" are given a big play. If you do not agree with these books, you are considered a reactionary. Leaving aside the massive economic assistance which has been given by the United States to the newly emerging nations I say, with few exceptions, that government has a good record in its attempt to establish conditions which would give people political freedom.

I think also, as does the Prime Minister of Canada, that the time has come for precise declarations on the part of the non-communist countries of their principles and aims. This must be done and done soon to overcome the phony image of western ideals and the western way of life which is being presented in communist countries and by communist agents in the less developed areas. It will take perhaps a little time to do this, Mr. Chairman, and a lot of conferring with other governments.

But there is one thing Canada can do alone. I propose that the government call, for the year 1962 or 1963, a conference on understanding. Each member of the United Nations should be asked to nominate 50 student delegates to this conference. I suggest that it be held at one of the great Canadian universities and that the Canadian conference of universities be asked to look after the administrative arrangements. I calculate the cost of such a conference as $15 million, which is less than 1 per cent of what this country is now spending yearly on national defence.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know there will be cynics and others throughout this country who will say that this will be nothing but an interesting gathering of students and academics who may enrich their lives to some extent by coming to this country and attending seminars, having conversations and touring about. However, I say it is terribly important that at the earliest opportunity we bring together as many students as possible, especially from those areas of the world in which there are limited educational opportunities, to meet with political and academic leaders in this country. With proper planning this conference could make a significant contribution to understanding. I believe that a wide range of subjects could be discussed. I do not believe it would be difficult to attract a voluntary corps of Canadian university professors and others, and as much would be gained by informal meetings with these people and students from abroad as from the formal sessions. This country has the resources to undertake such a project, and I hope it will attract the imagination and interest of other members in this parliament and the support of the government.

The next proposal I should like to make, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be pleased to hear, requires no money at all from the government. It is a request I should like to make of the businessmen of this country. Hon. members will have read recently in the newspapers about the landing in India, Ceylon and Sarawak of the first contingent of Canadian overseas volunteers, known in Quebec as "Volontaires Canadiens Outre-Mer". Under sponsorship of this private association, 15 young Canadians representing most parts of Canada have undertaken a year's voluntary service in these areas. They receive a small subsistence allowance from the host government.

Where there is a Canadian representative, a contingency fund is administered to meet unusual conditions and, on instructions from the government, the Canadian high commissioners are keeping a watchful eye on the volunteers. I think Canadians can be proud of the fact that these young people are now in the field and have taken up their duties before any members of the Kennedy peace corps have left the United States.

I would not want hon. members to think, however, that the Canadian overseas volunteers have been in competition with the peace corps. The Canadian overseas volunteers are not in competition with anybody. They are not out there seeking honour and glory. Their purpose is to serve in a humble way in industry, agriculture, public administration, commerce or medicine under the direction of the host government, and to promote international understanding and brotherhood by informing themselves and other Canadians of the history, culture, traditions, political and economic life of the people among whom they are working. Two weeks ago, Mr. Chairman, I stood on a dock in London and watched these 15 young Canadian students standing beside the rail of a ship leaving for their areas of voluntary service. It was a moving experience and I am sure that if businessmen who may read this speech can imagine that experience, they will rally to the cause and send in their contributions.

These people, leaving aside opportunities to enhance their financial position and going out into an environment quite alien to that to which they are accustomed and working under conditions which are strange and extraordinary, were prepared to do one year at least of sacrificial service. If we, sitting back here in the relatively easy conditions of the home front, fail to give these young men and women and their successors a reasonable amount of financial support, I say that we have missed a great opportunity to serve the world through them and to serve our own country. Canadian overseas volunteers originated with a suggestion made by Dr. Donald K. Faris, a Canadian of great experience in Asia and now working with UNICEF in India. The chief academic advisers have been Dr. Nathan Keyfitz who is a former director of the Colombo plan bureau and Professor Yves Martin of Laval University. As I have said, a first year's pilot program is now well under way. Its success will depend on the work of the volunteers themselves, but they would not have got out there had it not been for the efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Keith Spicer, whose rare qualities have been brought to bear on every phase of this project. I wish to acknowledge also the work of M. Michel Côté and his student associates at Laval.

The Canadian overseas volunteers undertaking has been commended by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I now call on Canadian businessmen for financial support. It is an investment in young Canada, a modest contribution to people in other countries and a way of promoting good will and international understanding.

On September 19 the next regular meeting of the United Nations assembly will get under way. At the last assembly Prime Minister Diefenbaker said this:

> Let us not leave this place without some hope for mankind. Let us instead say to the peoples that death's pale flag shall not again be raised in war, and that fear shall be lifted from the hearts and souls of men.

A year has passed since that speech was made and now there is greater reason for fear than there was last September. There is not really very much to be cheerful about these days; and so I say this: Let us not leave this parliament without doing something in the international community to raise the hopes of Canadians.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, as this parliament resumes sitting, it does so in an extremely serious state of mind, perhaps more serious than for many years. We are indeed closer to war tonight than we have been at any time since 1945. The statements of the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have given us some indication of the reality of this situation.

The Berlin crisis I think has indeed destroyed one myth. I refer to the belief that we could fight limited wars over matters of vital concern to the great powers. It was some years ago that Mr. Dulles carried through the brink of war strategy in the United States, the strategy of the deterrent. Then the United States changed to a belief that wars could be fought with conventional weapons, that no one would be inhuman enough to bring into action the ultimate in weaponry. However, we now realize that the brink of war diplomacy works both ways, and that we can both blackmail each other with super bombs and with the horrors of our weapons. We have realized with nuclear testing that the threat of nuclear war and the Berlin issue are tied very tightly into one bundle. Tonight as we sit here we realize that one fatal mistake could destroy us that we are indeed but one phone call and one finger away from annihilation. I shudder, Mr. Chairman, when I hear of the extent of the preparedness of the strategic air command, on 24 hour alert, with bombers always in the air and with the possibility of initiating an attack within seconds. I think the tension of this situation is almost unbelievable and perhaps beyond what human capacity can continue to accept. Indeed, one man has suggested it is statistically certain that if these conditions continue bombs will drop and perhaps sooner than we would care to think.

So we stand tonight on the brink, almost totally inured to the statistics contained in the latest book on nuclear war, namely that the United States has the explosive equivalent of 10 tons of t.n.t. for every man. woman and child on the surface of this earth, sufficient indeed to destroy ten times the number of its people. Perhaps one area in which Canada could make some contribution is in continuing to bring before the nations of this world the horror and the atrocity which a nuclear war would create. I think it is time that we took a second look at nuclear war and thought of winning a war or surviving one. Certainly we want to do everything we can to survive and we congratulate this government upon the suggestions they made this afternoon which will come to pass. But let us not make any mistake about the matter; millions will die.

One cannot read the story of the Berlin issue since 1945 without coming away indeed impressed with its complexity. In a sense, it is a matter of our own sins coming upon us. All of us remember in 1945, as the allied armies marched through Germany, there was a suggestion that we should carry through and capture Berlin. Then as a result of change in strategy—and I do not think we need to bother to assign the blame for this change in strategy—it was decided we would not take Berlin. By that mistake, through failure to realize that the strategy at the end of the last war would decide the problems of the post-war period, we have brought many difficulties upon ourselves. However, we cannot rectify our problems in clouds of radioactive dust.

I think there are two things that could bring war, namely the one I suggested, that fatal mistake, and second emotional oversimplification. I think it is important that we should not misuse history. When we talk of Munich in regard to the Berlin issue we are confusing the issue. Certainly when we talk of Poland, we are doing nothing to foster an understanding of this situation. Would that the issues were so clear as the blatant militarism which brought about the invasion of Poland, even though that indeed would bring upon us the holocaust we desire to avoid. Here we have a situation which has no real precedent in history. We have a divided city, one half cut off by 100 miles of territory from the political entity which is its rightful state. The worst thing we can do is to try to reduce this complexity to an emotional catch phrase such as to rescue the west Berliners from Russian tyranny or, on the other hand, guard the socialist people's state from western imperialism. The worst thing also that we can do is to inject into this political situation the heart-rending problems of the east German refugees. I know all of us are concerned; indeed perhaps some of us are even heartbroken about the situation of these people. However, we have no right to expect that West Berlin can be continued as a means of subverting the east German government. If it becomes a matter of helping to oppress people by our foreign policy we are going to be in serious difficulties indeed, as this will mean real war.

We have much to answer for in Angola, in South Africa and French North Africa. The only way we can help these people on the other side of the iron curtain is by a long and continuous process of working toward peace and convincing the U.S.S.R. that the heavy hand is less and less necessary. That alone is the final answer.

Therefore Canada's role must be to bring the powers together. We must negotiate and it must be done quickly. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs was very wise when he said that one of the things that has certainly confused the problem in West Berlin is the fact that an election is going on and you have each of the politicians of West Berlin and west Germany seeking to sell their electorate a bill of goods that they indeed are going to protect Germany's interests and unite their peoples. Even Mr. Khrushchev suggested that things will be much better after September 17, as our own Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested. But we must bring them together to negotiate before the area of negotiation disappears. We must bring both sides closer and closer together. The area of negotiation is becoming less and less. The national pride of each one is being bound up within certain terms and certain items of any negotiated peace treaty and it may come to the point where every concession becomes appeasement, where every agreement becomes seeming treachery. Again, we must bring the powers together to negotiate. We must do so because this period of crisis and tension puts power into the hands of the very group we should fear most.

We tend to think of Russia as a monolithic state very much like Nazi Germany. The two do not compare. Mr. Khrushchev is not Hitler. He does not have the power. The Russian people are not the German people with the historical background of the German people nor are the doctrines of communism those of nazism. They bear little relationship when you come down to actual analysis. There is cut and thrust to their politics and a constant striving for power. We encourage the military elite of Russia to ascendancy, when we pose as intransigent.

I think perhaps the greatest disaster of the U-2 incident was that we placed the men we should fear most in control of the Russian state. We must come down to essentials.

What has Mr. Khrushchev actually said; what has he promised? It is very easy to say we cannot trust what Mr. Khrushchev says. But if we come to that point, really what we are saying is that there is no answer but pushing the button. Mr. Khrushchev, in his answer to President Kennedy's speech, said:

> Following from the international law which cannot be disregarded, I should like to repeat once more that by concluding a peace treaty with the German democratic republic we do not intend to infringe upon any lawful interests of the western powers. Barring of access to West Berlin, blockade of West Berlin, is entirely out of the question.

That is the statement of Mr. Khrushchev himself. Are we going to war because we will not recognize a state which exists? Mr. Trygve Lie, the former secretary general of the United Nations, suggested once that the Korean war was brought on by our refusal to recognize red China. Are we going to war to perpetuate a myth that we are determined to create a united Germany? Are we going to war to bolster the national pride of either the United States, which is coming out of the fiasco of Cuba, or because of the injured pride of the U.S.S.R. which is somewhat reluctant to accept the fact that refugees are leaving the socialist heaven of East Germany? Are we going to war to maintain a status quo which we ourselves do not accept, in terms of West Berlin and a recognition of East Germany? I think these are the essentials which we as Canadians must bring before the nations of the world by negotiation.

As I drove down here this morning I was impressed, as was the hon. member for York South, by the very fact that in spite of all the technological advances and the magic which we can now perform with the human mind we cannot seem to solve these human relationships. I could not help feeling, perhaps emotionally, as I drove past groups of children who stood on the side of the highway waiting for the school bus to come, what a tragedy it was that we as members of parliament were driving down here to discuss war and the possibility of war.

Once again we must negotiate. We must find the area of fear, of blind, unreasoning terror on both sides. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that NATO was set up as a defensive organization—and it was. We agree with that and we agree that it has played a real part. But surely he would admit that the line between defensive and offensive really does not exist.

When Mr. Khrushchev or any Russian citizen hears Mr. Adenauer speak of a free and united Germany, when he sees German troops and remembers the effects of two world wars; when he sees I.R.B.M. bases being erected, can he possibly regard this as defensive? On the other hand when we see the resumption of nuclear tests we cannot see this as defensive at all and we cannot see how it can be regarded as a method of keeping the peace. We must seek out the areas of fear. We must find a neutral zone in Europe. We must separate the powers in this one area which can bring conflict.

Canada has every right to play the role of mediator; to take more and more action. Why? Not just because she is a middle power, but because she alone is geographically in the middle. We need time. We need time desperately. Canada's role can be that of cooling the tempers. It is amazing to look back over the last 10 years and see problems which were at the time insoluble. We can look back at the situation in the Middle East. I can remember reading articles that this was an insoluble problem; Egypt was determined by its foreign policy to annihilate the Israeli state and would accept nothing else. The Israelis were a nation with modern western weapons and were determined to expand, and there could be nothing but war which would eventually lead us into total war.

Because of a Canadian solution; because Canada took the initiative at one point we have not achieved a long term solution, because we cannot find any long term solutions, and I agree wholeheartedly with the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he says the tension will rise and fall like a barometer. But we can at least seek time.

I can remember Cyprus. We remember the atrocities committed day after day on British soldiers who were killed by Greeks and Turks. Last week we found Archbishop Makarios standing forth in the role of a man of moderation. We forget that these solutions stopped war and that these solutions at one point would have been branded as appeasement by one side or the other.

When the Korean war took place, at one point the United Nations decided they would unite Korea, and anything else at that time was going to be regarded as appeasement. We determined that we would not have war by allowing the use of certain weaponry or the bombing north of the Yalu river and some of the military plans of those who were in that theatre of war. We have achieved a solution; we have not had general war. This is not a time for standing on the sidelines and cheering. I was concerned when I heard the Prime Minister's first statement regarding the use of Berlin as strengthening NATO. I was much heartened by his second statement in his Winnipeg speech. I am waiting to be enthused by a dynamic, unprecedented crusade to achieve peace.

We have not only those on the other side to fear. I become concerned when I hear statements by—I will not call them warmongers, because they are men who honestly believe they are serving the west and democracy in the best way. But when a man says that we may have to strike first, as General Thomas Power of the United States strategic air command has said, or "I submit you will not deter a war unless you have the capability to start a war", I become concerned about our side too. In this crusade we may have to step on a few American toes but we will be their best ally—

Mr. Drysdale: What about Russian toes?

Mr. Pitman: And even Russian toes too—if we save both of them from the irrational minority within their own nation. There should be a crusade to convince Mr. Khrushchev that his fears are groundless. I think our own Secretary of State for External Affairs has done a great deal in this particular area. We must show that we are ready for the alternative to military competition which is economic competition. Of course, the suspicion of at least part of the communist world is that we do not want that kind of competition, that we are not ready for it. I believe it will require sacrifice, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested, but it will be the sacrifice of giving more and more aid, a greater percentage of our gross national product, of giving more opportunities for education, in other words of raising the level of the two thirds of the people of the world who go to bed hungry every night to the point where communism is not in the least attractive.

This will require courage, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested. It will be the courage to believe in the good intentions of our seeming opponents, not necessarily the courage or rather the foolhardiness which leads us into high temperature incineration, waving a flag and screaming slogans. This other kind of courage may be even greater. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested, it will require a faith that will move mountains, maybe even a faith and a good will which may in the end move even the Soviet tyranny in the direction of the west. Time is on our side and time is what Canada must fight for. The Russia of Khrushchev is not the Russia of Stalin. It has moved in our direction and we must continue to encourage that move.

There are other issues to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs and his department must give great consideration even though they are overshadowed by the present threat of Berlin. There is the recognition of communist China and bringing this issue before the United Nations. We in this corner believe that this must come, that there must perhaps be two Chinas. Otherwise we can have no real disarmament and, indeed, as the hon. member for Essex East suggested, it may well be that pressure is being exerted from the Far East. It would be well for us to attempt to relieve that pressure. It may mean that we must criticize our allies when necessary.

I was greatly interested in the remarks made about South America. This indeed is a problem on our own doorstep and one with which we must come to grips very soon.

I too believe we must have faith and the place where that faith can best be placed is in the United Nations. We must build up and support the United Nations as Canada and the Prime Minister have done by supporting the secretary general to the last ditch. We must build up the strength of the United Nations by making it in fact a police force. There indeed is where our faith can best be put.

Mr. White: Mr. Chairman, I think the house has listened with a great deal of interest today to the speeches made by various members on external affairs and can be proud of the considered judgment they have displayed in this field. I cannot apply that comment to the last speech to which we have listened. If comfort is going to be taken from that speech it will be in Moscow and not in Ottawa. I would ask the Canadian people to read, mark and learn the aims and ideas of the New party if this is an indication of their left wing thinking. I seriously commend to the Canadian people sober second thought with regard to the speech to which we have just listened.

All history is written for our learning and yet we fail to take a proper interest and learn the lessons from it that we should. How soon we forget the lessons of history and how little we heed them. Today we heard of neutralism and of 25 nations meeting in Belgrade that have not committed themselves either to the west or to the east. It came as a great shock to those 25 nations when the three-year nuclear test ban was broken. They were horrified. How soon we forget Hungary, Tibet and other places in the world. How soon we forget the promises that were made two or three times in our lifetime only to be broken when the time was propitious. Eventually all nations must choose. There will be no neutralism if a war should come, which God forbid.

Nehru's neutralism received a rude shock when Tibet was attacked, a peace loving neighbour that had never transgressed against any of the other Asian peoples. All they desired to do was to live in peace with their neighbours but that did not prevent them from being overrun. We should not forget that. I was glad, as I am sure were the house and the people of Canada to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs announce, as we have all known before, that Canada stands for peace, and also his references to the strenuous efforts that have been made by Canada and Canada's representatives to maintain peace in a troubled world.

Events of the past few days have only served to emphasize the conditions that have existed since the end of the war in 1945. An armed and jittery world jumps from one crisis to another. I ask hon. members, has Canada, has the western world created any of these crises? The answer is no. Let hon. members turn their thoughts for a moment to Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Korea, Laos, Malaya and Tibet. Berlin, of course, has always been a source of annoyance since the close of the war.

Let us not forget or fail to understand the march of events. Two world wars indicated that the United States of America tried to evade entanglement in those conflicts up to the eleventh hour. Why? Because they were a peaceful nation. They did not want to be involved in war. That has been their history. I say this because they are a peace loving people. They are our neighbours and we probably know them better than any other nation. The last resort, as far as they are concerned, is war. I hope the whole world will realize this. Consequently they and the western allies are being pushed on all fronts as never before.

Berlin at the moment—and I emphasize those words "at the moment"—is the powder keg. We well remember that the western world has always had its quislings, traitors and collaborators. We still have them with us. Let us not forget those who in the past days would sell their country to an enemy.

Last week there appeared in the London Free Press and I assume in other Canadian newspapers the words of a Canadian who said that Berlin was not worth the life of one Canadian. I say that is not the issue involved. If we were to sacrifice Berlin, would that guarantee peace in the world? I say it would only guarantee another crisis and then another crisis would follow as inevitably as night follows day. If surrendering West Berlin would solve the world's problems and Russia's demands would cease, possibly we could agree; but surrender does not carry that guaranty.

Earlier today reference was made to the mass migration of people from East Berlin to West Berlin. This is a revelation to the world if it will but heed. It is to be noted that there is no great rush on the part of people from West Berlin in seeking entry into East Berlin. This points out how valuable freedom is in the eyes of many people. They are prepared to leave their homes and sacrifice all they own to seek freedom under a western regime. If the east has so much to offer, why is there no trek from west to east?

Through the inspiring statement made today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and through the excellent speech made in Winnipeg last week by our Prime Minister Canada's position, its role and the course it should follow have been made abundantly clear. I advise all hon. members to read and re-read that speech in which the Prime Minister outlined the course we should follow. Canada has an important date with destiny if we can interpret to the east and the west the true nature of the problems facing us. Canada can be of tremendous service to the world in its search for peace. We are without territorial ambitions, without prejudices and we understand both our American neighbours and the people of the United Kingdom.

In addition we are a member of that loosely knit community of nations known as the commonwealth. The commonwealth is pledged to aid in every possible way the search for peaceful solutions. Today we hear much loose talk about colonialism, but within the commonwealth more nations have achieved freedom than through any other individual means. I do not refer to an enforced colonialism such as we see in Latvia, in other Baltic states and elsewhere. Having achieved freedom these new nations have decided of their own free will to remain within the commonwealth. I again ask all Canadians: does appeasement pay? We can go back in history and we find that history answers: "No." I again ask: Would surrender in Berlin eliminate world crisis? Again history replies that it would not; in fact, as I mentioned before the changes of increasing the incidence of crises would be greater.

May I remind the committee that all NATO nations are pledged under the United Nations charter to settle international disputes peacefully, with security and justice. NATO is not an offensive organization but is designed purely for defence. Last fall the United Nations was under fire from the Soviet bloc. It was challenged as it has never been challenged before. I believe this gave to the free world some indication of the ruthlessness of the cold war in which we are engaged.

It is interesting to note that during the founding convention of the New Democratic party held recently a motion was moved that would have had the effect of urging Canada to withdraw from NATO. This motion did not pass, but I point out to the committee that those elements are still within that party and constitute its vociferous, radical, left wing supporters. I ask whose friends they are and who is encouraged when they advocate such a move. Surely not the west.

I wish to deal briefly with NATO and NORAD, one an organization for the defence of Europe and the other for the defence of North America. As I mentioned, the challenge to the leadership of the United Nations was never so evident as it was last fall. Destroy the United Nations and what has the world to depend on for peaceful solutions of world problems? In spite of its obvious value the United Nations has been made a sounding board for political propaganda. The unprecedented attack on the organization last fall is an indication of the desire of the Soviet bloc to destroy the organization.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has worked unceasingly for disarmament at Geneva, at the United Nations and on every conceivable occasion. How can we continue to negotiate in good faith when solemn agreements are reduced to mere scraps of paper? In spite of this the minister reiterated today Canada's desire to negotiate in a calm, dispassionate spirit with a view to finding constructive solutions to our problems.

In 1945 the United Nations charter was signed by 55 nations. As was mentioned earlier, our Prime Minister was present at that meeting in San Francisco. Today there are 100 members of this organization. If the institution is to survive and serve mankind of necessity changes will have to be made.

NATO was born as a result of the Czechoslovakian coup of 1948 and arose from the fear that Russia could and would march across Europe. One of the objectives of NATO has not yet been realized, the social, political and economic understanding among NATO nations.

Ever since the portfolio of the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been held by the present minister he has stated and restated Canada's policy that we are against nuclear testing, with no strings attached.

After three years of agreement Russia suddenly commences nuclear tests. Why, I ask. To create an atmosphere of fear. Fear is probably the greatest phychological weapon in the hands of the Soviets and the timing on their part has been excellent. If we cannot continue to agree on nuclear tests how are we to agree on disarmament? The Prime Minister led the way in suggesting to Canada and to the world to avoid hysteria, to be calm, to endeavour to understand the grave implications, the threats aimed at Berlin and at Germany, to be reasonable but to be firm. Would retreat improve our position? Experience and history answer no. It would only serve to show the world that our pledged word to protect the rights, which the United States, the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R. gave in 1945 and reiterated after the cessation of the blockade of Berlin in May, 1949, meant nothing; that these guarantees were of no avail and that we were not prepared to back them up. The Canadian people should consider our solemn pledges and the disastrous results of repudiation.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech concerning South America. The winds of change are blowing. The world envies the progress of Canada, the Americas and the west. Strangely, however, some governments somehow fail to realize that through freedom of the individual, through democracy, through the ability of the individual to enjoy the fruits of his labour, Canada and the Americas have achieved this high standard of living in fewer than three centuries. I think this is fundamental. The individual should be free and when he is free he has an opportunity to enjoy the fruits of his labour without molestation from governments.

I now wish to say a word or two about foreign aid and some other aspects of external affairs. With respect to external aid, Canadians generally approve our foreign aid policies. However, I am of the opinion that a greater number of Canadians are now questioning the effectiveness of our foreign aid policies. Canadians are generous. They approach external aid as a Christian problem but they are also beginning to ask, what have we to show for our external aid dollar? They do not believe in a Colombo plan that extends into perpetuity, I have believed in and advocated increased aid for education. How can this best be accomplished? I am of the opinion that technical education can best be carried out in the recipient countries, but that the other types of education are probably given to better advantage when the student of the recipient country is brought to Canada. I am being rather general in this, but I am of the opinion that that is the most effective method and I am hopeful that an increase may be possible in student exchange in this field of extending education to foreign lands. To those hon. members who are particularly interested in this phase of external affairs I would recommend the report of the external affairs committee where this problem was gone into in detail.

How can the rank and file of the citizens of new nations in Africa and elsewhere achieve a higher standard of living? Dams and other tangible things are spectacular but do they reach the needy people of those countries?

As I said earlier, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech concerning South America. I am a realist and I ask how can 18 million people increase appreciably the living standards of the teeming millions living in abject poverty in other countries of the world? Unless the governments of those particular countries are prepared to co-operate and help—I know our government is—unless they are prepared to make it possible for those people to enjoy the fruits of their labour, then anything we may do may be, I fear, in vain.

Prior to this century slavery guaranteed to a few a high living standard and a subliving standard and hard labour to the others. Democracy is the opposite of this, and freedom is the answer to those problems.

I am going to add a further word about the commonwealth. I view with a certain amount of alarm and misgiving recent developments within the commonwealth. Without condoning the actions of any one country within the commonwealth, may I say the stage is being set for interference in the internal affairs of a sister nation on the part of commonwealth countries. This could wreck the commonwealth. Nothing would please the Soviets better. The commonwealth, as I mentioned earlier, is the greatest single force for peace in the world. Let us endeavour to maintain and strengthen this commonwealth and commonwealth understanding. Let wisdom and understanding prevail. The dilemma or problem of today is freedom on an orderly basis.

I have mentioned just in passing the organization of the American states. I want to compliment the minister who in his wisdom decided to be cautious and to await events. A few short months have shown the wisdom of that policy. Cuba and the Dominican Republic are in turmoil. South America is feeling the winds of change. I was interested in hearing the minister point out the vast untouched resources in South America that are there awaiting capital and labour to work out the salvation of the people. That is all our people had when they came to this country three, four or five generations ago. They had nothing else but hard labour, diligence, saving and perseverance. This is what built up the high standard of living of this country and it can do it for other countries if the governments of those countries make it possible for the people to do so. However, when the vast majority of those people are not able to enjoy a fair share of those resources through their labour, the stage is set for communism. Governments should be aware of this fact and so arrange their internal affairs that the people of those countries can participate in and enjoy some of the resources that are on their doorsteps.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, at the commencement of his remarks I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs twice referred to the fact that we are meeting under circumstances of grave crisis. Crisis is a time of both calamity and opportunity. I think that this situation is very dangerous, and the situation with which we are faced in Berlin is precisely that. It is fraught with calamity and also with very great opportunity. Besides having courage, faith and sacrifice, these imperishable virtues, we need also imagination. We would hope that Canada may have a part in the creation of a solution of a situation that is dangerous and threatening to the world.

Dr. John MacMurray, speaking at Queen's University, said this:

> Freedom is our nature. But our nature lies always beyond us and has to be intended and achieved. The obstacle lies in our fear and the craving for security which expresses it. So at every crisis we are faced with a free choice between freedom and security. If we choose security, and make that our aim, we lose freedom, and find in the end that security eludes us. If we choose freedom, then we are debarred from aiming at security; for that would mean imposing our bondage upon others. If we choose freedom we may find the security we do not seek,—

I think perhaps that is helpful to us at this time. Our only safe course is the course of freedom, freedom for those people whom we have pledged ourselves to support. We can consider no other course.

Some of the members, and I remember particularly the hon. member for Kootenay West, referred earlier today to some conversations he had had with constituents this summer. My own experience was somewhat similar to his. I found there were numbers of people, men I respected and curiously enough people who were Conservative in their political point of view, who took the view that Berlin was not worth the candle. Why should we be interested in a tiny place on the map 110 miles behind the iron curtain, north of Czechoslovakia and very close to the Polish border? I was interested to note that the people who expressed these views happened to be veterans either of world war I or world war II, and in most instances world war I. It occurred to me that perhaps hatreds of years gone by and the experiences gained in war had to some extent coloured and influenced thinking on this matter.

I have heard other suggestions. I heard a suggestion from the engineer of an important industry in the town in which I live. He suggested that a bold approach might be made through a nation such as ourselves to have Berlin established as a subsidiary headquarters of the United Nations. I heard a number of competitors in the closed Canadian chess competition this past week say no, Berlin is vitally important. We know middle Europe and we know the reaction of many people behind the iron curtain to any abandonment of the present position in Berlin. All these factors influence us at this time. We cannot fail to remember the various steps of appeasement that were taken prior to world war II aimed at security, which did not achieve security at all but brought us into total war. Surely, with these matters in mind we must take the position that there can be no other course for us but to support fully the position to defend Berlin against any attack.

On the other hand, let us be fair and reasonable and have perhaps a more open mind than has been displayed at all times by our great friends and relatives to the south of the line. I am reading now from an article by Dr. Louis Fischer entitled, "The Soviet-American Antagonism". This article was written in July, 1959.

> In the last ten years a million east Germans have escaped into West Berlin. During 1958 alone 240,000 east Germans fled into West Berlin. We know the figures because when they come into West Berlin they report for relief and for transportation to west Germany, and they are counted. Of the 1958 fugitives, 200 were university professors; 3,100 were school teachers; and 1,200 were physicians, dentists and veterinarians. It is reported that east Germany has been recruiting Czech and Polish physicians for their hospitals. The exodus from east Germany via West Berlin is continuing at the rate of 20,000 a month.
> This river of human talent is not only a serious drain on east Germany with its 17 million inhabitants, it is the worst kind of propaganda mark for communism everywhere in the world. It disrupts the stability of the east German regime. The freedom to escape is a freedom; and a totalitarian regime cannot tolerate such a freedom.
> That is why Khrushchev wishes to close the escape hatch; to sew up this rent in the iron curtain.

This man who has been a recognized student of this situation, who lectured in New York, tells us that the situation from the Russian point of view has become exceedingly serious. We ought to recognize this. Doubtless in the past two years the situation has become even more aggravating from their standpoint.

A little farther on this article says another thing that we might consider of interest. Again, I point out that the author is speaking of the situation two years ago. He says:

The west is not going to withdraw from West Berlin. Some are frightened by this prospect. But it is well not to panic. Stalin tried to take West Berlin in 1948; and when he was stopped by the western airlift, he did nothing. The Chinese communists have tried to take Quemoy and Matsu, to which I think they are entitled; but when they met opposition, they stopped. Khrushchev, in February 1958, created a Turkish-Syrian crisis in his experimental laboratory; but when nobody flinched, he did nothing. At the time of the Suez crisis, Moscow threatened to fire missiles at Great Britain. Go back to the time of that threat, the actual date and circumstances; I think it was a bluff. In any case, when the Americans actually landed in Lebanon, there was no Soviet countermove.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that if we stand firm it may be that there will not be a war. In any event, stand firm we must. On the other hand, we have to realize that this is a serious problem, a problem which has been irritating a great power, the Soviet union. It is a situation which surely has been irritating some Germans, while it has been a matter of great satisfaction to many others. Perhaps Canada is the kind of country that can give to the consideration of this subject some greater flexibility than is possible for a major power like the United States. This penetration, so close to Poland, runs north of Czechoslovakia and could be a tremendous opportunity. Surely, the only answer to getting out of this dreadful situation of cold war is a penetration of a character that is not going to disrupt and cause trouble but is eventually going to work out in some happier relation. It seems to me that our non-nuclear troops have to be there and take whatever position we have to take at this time in order to see it through. Then this thing, God willing, will work itself out.

In this situation we have to be capable of self criticism. I am not satisfied we always have been in the past few years. Governor Stevenson spoke of self criticism as being the most important matter for a democracy. He called it the secret weapon of democracy. There has not been enough self criticism of ourselves and when I say that I mean, of course, ourselves and our neighbours.

There are certain facts that we should remember here. In the long history of affairs between Russia and Canada, with the exception of the Bering sea dispute of a number of years ago I think there has not been anything in the nature of armed conflict between our countries. This nation of Russia came into being by revolution in 1917, the year of my birth. It is a very young nation. Hon. members will recall all the irritations they have suffered, including attack by western powers, non-recognition, etc. We of course do not agree with their philosophy and we must oppose them on many counts. However, I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs this question. In these negotiations that take place, can we dare to forget the fact that Russia, in world war II sustained losses in casualties equal to the total population of Canada, that they fear Germany today and that there are realistic reasons why our attitude should be wise and considered? If a man as able as the one who spoke to me, and who is held in high regard in the Conservative party in my riding says to me, "No; these Germans are people who presented problems to the world in the past and we must watch them", then having him in mind, one who served in the Canadian forces in two wars, as did all the principal speakers in this debate, I would say that we must have some earnest sympathy with the Russian position and we must tread carefully and work with them to see whether there is not some possibility of reducing this situation to more favourable terms.

We must remember that this great nation we love—and I refer to the United States—was actually the author of the bomb, the nation that for its own purposes and in its own wisdom, dropped the bomb and destroyed two great Japanese cities. This is the nation which sent the U-2 flights over Russia not so very long ago and which under a dedicated and idealistic young president invaded Cuba. We are their best friends, and we are their best friends if we are honest friends and if we are prepared to assume slightly independent views.

It seems to me passing strange that we have an administration that was swept into power in this country very substantially through taking the position that there were certain respects in which Canada was adversely affected by the United States in economics and business, but when it comes to this important area of international affairs, they take the view "Wherever you go, we will go too and we will do exactly what you do". We are not serving the best interests of our best friends the Americans by taking a subservient role of such a character. I think this is a moment demanding truth. I think that rudeness between Canada and Russia, whether by speeches in the United Nations or anywhere else, does not serve any useful purpose at all. I think we must pause and consider that with all its recent scientific and technical achievement Russia has not received one kind word of congratulation or praise from our side. There has not been one case that I know of in Canada where any courtesy or kindness has been shown to Russia or any Russian dignitary. We almost look the other way if a Soviet personage passes through our country. We recognize that these are people that may destroy us. But the only way in which to defeat this dreadful situation that is building up, with strontium 90, this radiation hazard that may affect future generations even if war does not come, is by penetration, by some measure of understanding, by being as good neighbours as possible. We have heard so many speeches delivered in Canada that they have almost become cliches about our role as the golden link between Britain and the United States and at other times between the United Kingdom and France. This has been the role that we like to talk about as being the destiny of Canada. Is it not possible that our great destiny may be to become a hinge between the neighbour to the north and the neighbour to the south. I think this is not impossible if we think widely and broadly in terms of the future. I do not like to hear remarks passed critically, as they have been at various times—I am not referring to tonight but at other times—of Prime Minister Nehru. I would feel that in the field of international relations when Canada pulls far away from India we are going to be in trouble. I agree with the proposition that perhaps there cannot be serious interference by one commonwealth state in the affairs of another.

There was reference tonight to Archbishop Makarios of Cyprus. I remember a conversation I had some years ago with the then secretary of state. At that time I was quite exercised about the Cyprus dispute and was asking questions of this man of importance in world affairs. I asked him about Cyprus and why we did not take a stronger position with respect to Cyprus. I well recall the answer he gave me at that time. He said, "Yes I can understand your feeling about Makarios but I believe the only way you can win these people is by understanding them, by giving a bit. By yielding here and there. If Britain yields at the right time with regard to Makarios I think that one day Cyprus will be part of the commonwealth. Going back to what was said by the hon. member who preceded me, I think the fact is that at the sad moment when South Africa was read out of the commonwealth the new nation of Cyprus under Makarios came back in. With goodwill, understanding and patience all things are possible. We must be flexible. We must realize that hatred of other people is not going to add anything at all. There is another point I wish to make. A few years ago in Kingston there was an opportunity to hear a man by the name of Rudolph Pechel, a distinguished editor and publisher in Germany. He was one of the freedom fighters. He pointed out that it was extremely difficult for the Germans to get any kind of support in resistance to the Nazi tyranny from any source at all. He said that people did not want to believe that there was a resistance movement in Germany. He concluded his remarks in the Charles Dunning trust lectures, by saying that we should keep this matter in mind when we consider the youth of eastern Europe. Surely this is one of the factors why Berlin is significant, because of our link with these people who need hope. May I briefly refer to something that has been said by our good friend Alastair Buchan. He speaks with authority of this critical moment when military instruments, while still a reality of political conflict, have taken on a life of their own and have become a separate source of tension and danger. This, of course, is well handled by the article of Kenneth McNaughton in "Canada Must Get Out of the Arms Race". We earnestly congratulate and support our distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs for his leadership and tenacity and his assurance that we will continue in this position. I hope our resistance to atomic weapons becomes inflexible. Surely the only way in which to resist this nuclear force is with moral force and with gallant troops who are prepared to take their stand with conventional weapons alone and to meet the challenge wherever it comes as free men, symbols of a large United Nations family. May I conclude with these words of Alastair Buchan, the distinguished son of a beloved governor general of Canada. He said this:

> —we are on the edge of a fundamental change in the world balance of power as it has existed in the last 15 years, and that the axis of world tension is about to shift from "East-West" to "South-East—North-West," or even to "North-South". If so, there is no time to be lost, given the inevitable time lag in the adjustment of governments and policies to reality, in seeking to identify the areas of common interest with the Soviet union. It would be one of the major tragedies of world history if two powers the size of Russia and the United States were to remain locked in a position of implacable hostility because of their inability to overcome the barriers raised by competing military technologies after the political basis of that hostility had been transmuted into something approaching a common cause against new dangers.

Surely our only possibility of hope in Canada is that we will come through this crisis; that men will experiment with their new toys and will mature and learn to love one another. Our position must be one of dignity, courage, flexibility and understanding. It should not be that of the honest broker, because we are not that important. Perhaps one course in external affairs would be to take a man like "Rocket" Richard and give him a few thousand dollars to take his friends on a tour of Russia.

After all Russia, this common enemy, is the country we admired a few years ago. It is the country of Tolstoi, Chekhov, Dostoyevsky, the country of music and art. We must remember that nothing is impossible. Just 21 years ago we had another enemy, and before that again we have had other enemies. We now face a crisis, a calamity and an opportunity. We may emerge, with our respected Secretary of State for External Affairs playing a creative part in the solution of the horrible and fearful problem which faces the world today.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to talk about a trip I made last year. As a member of a Canadian delegation, I went to Tokyo for the 49th conference of the international interparliamentary union.

After the conference, my wife and I, accompanied by the hon. Senator and Mrs. Dessureault, went to Taipeh for a visit to Formosa. It was the first time that a Canadian member of parliament visited Formosa.

We were given a hearty welcome. During the few days we stayed in Formosa, we were able to visit this beautiful island. We found that a total and complete freedom prevails there, unlike the situation in red China where persecution exists and where many missionaries, both Catholic and Protestant, as well as from other denominations, have given their lives, having been killed, shot or imprisoned.

In Formosa, we met Generalissimo and Madame Chiang Kai-shek. We were greatly impressed by everything we saw but what struck me most during that trip in the Orient were the land reforms which were instituted both in Japan and in Formosa without any persecution or bloodshed. Those land reforms bear a marked contrast with the ones which were carried out in red China where communes were organized by means of persecution.

Mr. Chairman, I am speaking in my own name and my observations are in no way binding upon the government, but I must admit that I was surprised to notice that Canada has no embassy in Formosa while free China has had an embassy here, in Ottawa, for many years.

There is some talk these days about Canada's recognition of red China. Some members have mentioned it. As for myself—this, again, merely reflects my own opinion—I would not be in favour of Canadian recognition of communist China, as we believe in opposite principles. We are associated with friendly countries, we fight for peace and freedom. That is why I feel we would be discouraging other nations, especially those of southeast Asia, if this country were to recognize red China.

I was quite surprised to see those 12 million Formosans make every sacrifice and labour for peace in order to reconquer their mother country at present under the yoke of a dictatorial government.

I think it would be unfortunate if this country should recognize communist China. We must prefer the Washington leadership to that of Havana. Besides, if we recognized red China, our relations with the United States would become rather shaky.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a few minutes to state some of my reasons for opposing the recognition of red China and its admission to the United Nations.

1. There is not one provision of the United Nations charter that has not been violated by red China.

2. That country has not yet made peace in Korea with the United Nations forces. It is impossible for the United Nations to accept a government with which, under international law, it is still at war.

3. Red China is supporting in all southeast Asia the case of North Viet Nam. Attacks on Viet Nam were made by that country as well as raids in India beyond its border.

4. Red China is charged before the United Nations with committing genocide in Tibet.

I think it is impossible to accept within an international organization dedicated to the promotion of peace among nations by means of negotiations and not war, a country whose chief states that the only power is the power of the gun.

Because of historical circumstances, the Russian empire with its Soviet colonies is a member of the United Nations and already their foundations are being shaken by propositions which would bind that organization hand and foot.

When Mr. Boland, chairman of the general assembly, broke his hammer calling him to order, Mr. Khrushchev stated himself that it was a symbol of the weathering of the United Nations.

If with the presence of the U.S.S.R. at the United Nations deliberations are already pointless, it is not desirable to admit a country like red China. If red China were admitted to the United Nations, I believe it would mean the end of that organization. I am in favour of an international organization that renders tremendous service to all nations, especially through its subsidiary organizations such as UNESCO, FAO and WHO.

I cannot see how we can admit red China to the United Nations, for it would be a terrific blow to free China, which has always respected the charter of the United Nations and which is constantly threatened by red China. By admitting communist China, the U.N.O. would bring about its own destruction. It would mean the prelude to a first class funeral for the United Nations organization which would have been the first to depart from the spirit as well as the letter of its charter.

Hon. Senator Dessureault and myself have immensely enjoyed our visit to Japan and free China. We were in a position to realize the importance of Formosa to the countries of southeast Asia. In my opinion, the defence of Formosa is not only vital to the survival of free peoples, but also necessary to check communism in southeast Asia. If, by any chance, Formosa were not supported, I think we would lose much and that all countries in southeast Asia would fall prey to communism.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make those few personal remarks as a token of gratitude to the government of free China that welcomed us so kindly.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention originally to intervene in a debate of such importance and I do so with considerable temerity. I do so not as a statesman, not as one who is learned in the field of foreign policy but as an individual Canadian who has gained most of her information through the public press, through pronouncements made by this administration and by those of other countries and from news stories. In the intervening period of adjournment I attempted to ascertain from the people with whom I came in contact both in my riding and elsewhere the feeling of the Canadian people with respect to the crisis in Berlin, which was really little more than a small cloud on our horizon when we left this green chamber in July and which has grown horrifyingly to such proportions and to such an evil colour.

I cannot say that during the weeks of adjournment I have been able to find unanimity even among my own people, much less among the many other people throughout the country to whom I have spoken. Therefore I do not attempt to speak for all Canadians, for all of the people of my riding or indeed, Mr. Chairman, even for a majority of them.

There is no question that this debate into which we are launched on the first day of our return has within it the seeds of the most critical discussion that has taken place not only during this session but in this parliament and perhaps in any other parliament. Rather than the debate ending with too few people intervening, I would hope that most members of the house would attempt to search their consciences and to give the government what it deserves, their best view with respect to their opinions and the people's opinions. I do not approach this matter in a partisan way. Survival or failure to survive is not a question of party politics. Indeed, in many ways it is not even a matter of nationalism or internationalism. Perhaps those who serve in this parliament and in other parliaments or congresses of the world have now to deal with the most important problem of all.

May I humbly associate myself with the remarks of many of those who have already spoken and particularly with those of the hon. member for Leeds. For us in Canada who have never felt bombs rain on our heads, who have never seen children without heads or arms lying in the streets, who have never seen our public monuments and our homes lying in rubble around us, for us in Canada, some of whom have worn a uniform but the majority of whom have learned about these things through news reels, films and from the press, it is easy to be rigid. It is easy for us to say that some place we will draw the line and stand and fight. I would think that many Canadians of my generation who once wore their country's uniform are prepared once again as Canadians, regardless of ethnic background, regardless of the part of the country from which they stem, to don the uniform of the Queen if their country calls them; but with what cold horror they would do so. I do not think they would do so this time with the feeling that there would be something of peace that could be won.

I recall when the first atomic bombs appeared on the scenes toward the end of the last war and first came into our common lexicon. Many people ignored them and said that in the last war the horror of gas was not used and mankind would never stoop to use atomic warfare. Yet here we are today four years from the time when we began to see what we could do with nuclear power for peaceful uses, four years this month from the time when the U.S.S.R. put its first sputnik into space. We have come the full cycle in a few short years in this country and the world, to the point where what we are actually discussing is whether those who sit in this chamber and those they represent will be here a year from now.

There are those who say with respect to the question of survival that there will always be some who will survive and they can start again. The essence of this debate with respect to Berlin must come down to this. Do we risk our future, the future of everyone in the world, the uncommitted nations, the committed nations, those millions of people in the world who do not even know that there is a Berlin much less that there is a crisis over it? Must we decide now which it will be? In my very humble opinion, Mr. Chairman, I think not.

This afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs made a brief statement and I must confess that to begin with it was disquieting to me, because the things for which he said Canada stood were things with which I think there would be no quarrel. He said that Canada stood for peace, for doing away with nuclear weapons, for banning tests, for supporting the United Nations and for supporting our treaties, including NATO. I would think that no country and no individual in a country could in fact disagree with those statements. So I was dissatisfied, as I think many in the country might be dissatisfied, to think that here was no leadership, here was no banner unfurled, here was nothing decisive.

In the past few weeks Canadians have become more and more apprehensive. What will be done? Most of us who are in parliament have had telephone calls and letters and are approached on the streets. Will there be war? What is it all about? How did it come to pass? Where are we going? There is an old Scottish air, "I know where I am going". I think most individuals like to feel that they know where they are going and all individuals like to feel that their government knows where it is going and where it is leading its people.

So at first blush at least I think the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs today may have been received coolly and with disappointment in the country. But even in the few short hours since then it may have been borne in upon Canadians, and will be if all members participate in this debate, that it is not so simple to say, "Here is what we stand for; this we negotiate and this we will not."

Earlier today the hon. member for Essex East did say that in our view some things with respect to Berlin are not negotiable, and when I say "our view" I mean a Canadian view and perhaps a western view. We will never be false to ourselves or other free men around the world. I do not think anyone now in Canada would choose that its leaders should be false to that principle. It is not enough to go into a grocery store and to have someone who is worried about the future of mankind say, "I will not defend that German city, I will not defend Germany, I fought once to destroy Germany". There are echoes in this country from people who said, "I will not fight to defend Britain." It may be that another time we will have those who will say, "I will not fight to defend France, I will not fight to defend the United States."

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Luckily or not, we do not have to answer that question any more because there is no longer any question of fighting to defend Germans, or a tiny city or even part of a city that happens to lie inside East Germany. What we are asked to stand up and be counted for is where we stand in the matter of freedom.

Freedom is a word that is much maligned. It perhaps means different things in the mouths of various men and women. Mr. Khrushchev in his speeches says that he stands for peace and freedom, and I suppose he does.

The greatest and most critical danger that we now face is something which the orientals call a possibility of loss of face. It is possible that the two protagonists, the United States and Russia, will adopt a rigidity of position in which one or the other must, willy-nilly, cause a war. It does not matter whether the war commences with nuclear weapons or whether it arises from someone on one side of the border using a hose and someone on the other side using a gas or smoke bomb. I think everyone is conscious of the fact that it does not matter how the conflict commences. The United States once felt that it was better to bring an end to the holocaust of world war II by using a nuclear weapon and it appears likely that in the event of another conflict one of the two parties would feel justified in doing the same thing. Whether war begins with sticks and stones or even with mere insults it will lead inevitably to a war that will destroy all humankind. We must not let this happen.

Prime Minister Nehru speaking at a recent meeting referred to the uncommitted nations. He said only what all men know, that Canada is kidding itself if it says it can alter present circumstances, if it takes the position that it can push the parties apart and make them decide the way it wishes them to. Mr. Nehru cannot do it on behalf of India nor can our Secretary of State for External Affairs on behalf of Canada.

Perhaps the greatest thing we can do is this. We can search our consciences to determine where we stand and, knowing this, be firm. Then as a nation, through our administration and its Secretary of State for External Affairs, we must do everything and anything to keep open the door to negotiations. It may be that we ourselves cannot effectively contribute to negotiations. It may be that we ourselves cannot offer guidance that will lead to the successful settlement of the problems under negotiation. Perhaps at this stage our only position is to keep fluid the situation, keep open the door, keep the parties meeting at all costs.

We know that at one time Japan and the United States were meeting, yet war broke out. It appears from the events of the past week which saw the resumption by the U.S.S.R. of nuclear testing that the moral indignation of the world may not really be enough to forestall the end for all of us, but while the two nations are negotiating the chances are relatively slender that the end will come. Therefore, perhaps the policy enunciated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon was the wisest kind of policy in that the hon. gentleman did not take a rigid position except in terms of that for which Canada stands. He did not say what Canada is against. The minister was careful, discrete and cautious. Mr. Chairman, I am not careful, discrete and cautious. I am a different type of person. It was for this reason that I chose to listen to the debate this afternoon and did not intervene.

I have listened to and spoken with the people of Canada whose understanding of the facts confronting us is perhaps imperfect but whose emotion and feelings will have to lead them to follow their leaders in this administration or another or hold back. The people with whom I have spoken feel that perhaps the best Canada can do is not to permit the boat to be rocked, not to permit the door to be closed.

Perhaps we thought in Canada a few years ago that, with our increased status in the past 20 years or so as a large industrial nation, one recognized internationally, we enjoyed and could maintain a position in which everyone would listen to us. We have told ourselves over and over again that this was the case. Our leaders in the universities, in politics and in other fields have assured us that we are not a colonial power and never were and therefore we are the rightful people to lead the uncommitted and non-colonial free nations.

I heard one hon. gentleman refer this evening to Canada's destiny. He spoke of manifold destiny and of viewing the future with alarm. These are imported terms and really mean nothing. No nation has a destiny that is preordained. The nation has what the guts and blood of its people cause it to have. At every course there is a turning for nations as there is for individuals. Sometimes, as a great poet once said, they also serve who stand and wait. Perhaps what is necessary for Canada now, Mr. Chairman, is to stand waiting as a nation holding open the door. Perhaps at this time we should not call for a definite flaming policy to follow. Perhaps part of our maturity lies in the recognition that we are largely a Christian nation which believes it has right on its side and in not seeking to impose our will on others. Perhaps we should only ask those we have befriended in the past in war and peace and those we are prepared to befriend in future, whether they lie to the north, south, east or west, to join hands and continue talking in an effort to seek constructive settlement.

It may be that the people of Canada will find their destiny, in this hour at least, not in shooting or in standing toe to the line and daring others to cross it, or in rattling sabres, or in increasing military might, or in deciding to prepare ourselves for a great war, or in hiding our people in holes in the ground, or in deciding to use a bomb, but in deciding that the whole moral and spiritual force of this country must be brought to bear in an effort to keep open all avenues of negotiation. Perhaps all we can do is to assist in having the protagonists in this gigantic struggle continue negotiations. We must do all that we can to prevent the increase of tension that can lead to inevitable destruction.

The thoughts I have endeavoured to express may be viewed by some as muddled thinking. There are those who call on the government to give us not just a policy but a detailed plan of action involving means by which we can impose our policy on the world. There are others who take the position of saying, let us become neutral; let the big boys decide this one; we will survive or perish with them. Let us be this link of which the hon. member for Leeds spoke, this linchpin, I think Mackenzie King called it, at a time when Britain and the United States were engaged in an equally critical struggle. Let us be the linchpin between the two forces and let us pray God, Mr. Chairman, that nothing breaks asunder that linchpin.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether you will call it 10.30 o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: We will continue tomorrow with the discussion of the estimates of external affairs.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

SOUTH AFRICAN WITHDRAWAL FROM ILO

Question No. 271—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

What are the reasons that Canada abstained from voting on a Nigerian resolution calling on South Africa to withdraw from the ILO, as reported in the press June 23?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

The Nigerian government delegation to the ILO conference submitted a draft resolution condemning the policy of apartheid in South Africa and proposing that the governing body advise South Africa to withdraw from the ILO.

Canada has made clear its disapproval of apartheid and its hope that this policy may be modified. It is not likely that such a modification can be brought about by actions calculated to force South Africa out of international bodies, thereby further isolating it from the international community and from changing ideas and world conditions. Thus in the United Nations general assembly Canada opposed the imposition of economic and other sanctions against South Africa, but supported a resolution which emphasized, in a moderate and responsible way, the widespread international concern over apartheid. Similar considerations would seem to apply to the Nigerian proposal in the ILO.

In the resolutions committee and in the plenary session of the international labour conference, Canada supported that part of the resolution condemning apartheid but abstained on the resolution as a whole, which called for South Africa's withdrawal from the international labour organization.

In addition to Canada's general position on this matter, there are other important considerations having a particular bearing on the situation as it arose in the international labour conference. First, there is no provision in the ILO constitution by which a member state can be forced to resign. Second, the Nigerian resolution might well serve as a precedent for similar resolutions seeking the withdrawal from the ILO of other countries whose political and economic policies are considered objectionable by some members. Third, South Africa has ratified a number of ILO conventions, but as a non-member country is not subject to the disciplines and responsibilities inherent in ILO membership, its withdrawal might not be in the best interests of the South African workers.

ANGOLA—CANADIAN PROTESTS AND ASSISTANCE

Question No. 272—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Is the government prepared to express publicly and forcefully the horror of the Canadian people at the brutal measures of repression being practiced by the Portuguese authorities in Angola?

2. Has the Canadian government given any assurance to the Portuguese government that Canada stands ready to assist in creative programs for the welfare of the people of Angola?

3. Is the Canadian government prepared to aid the tens of thousands of Angolan refugees who have been forced to flee to the Congo?

4. Is the Canadian government assisting in United Nations efforts to aid these refugees?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. The government, through its support of general assembly resolution A/RES/1603(XV) of April 22, 1961, has expressed its concern about the situation in Angola.

2. The Canadian government is awaiting the report of the United Nations sub-committee on Angola and in the light of that report will consider what further action might usefully be taken.

3. No international appeal has been launched for the Angolan refugees to which the Canadian government has been asked to contribute.

4. Angolan refugees in the Congo are receiving assistance from international organizations such as UNICEF and the league of Red Cross societies. The Canadian government makes an annual contribution to UNICEF as well as other United Nations organizations in the Congo, and contributes indirectly to the league of Red Cross societies.

CANADIAN MILITARY AID TO PORTUGAL

Question No. 273—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Will the government assure the house that there will be no sale or transfer of Canadian arms or other military equipment to Portugal while present Portuguese policies persist?

2. Is the government fully satisfied that none of the military assistance provided by Canada to Portugal has been of even indirect assistance to Portugal in her military operations in Angola?

3. If not, what steps are being taken to ensure that Canadian military assistance already supplied to Portugal is not directly or indirectly to support Portuguese military operations in Angola?

4. Is the government fully satisfied that none of the Portuguese airmen trained in Canada under Canadian mutual aid have been sent to Angola?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. Canadian policy in respect of the supply of mutual aid to its NATO allies, including Portugal, was stated by the Prime Minister on June 22 in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Essex East, and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on June 28 in reply to starred question No. 431.

No shipments of Canadian mutual aid equipment have been sent to Portugal since November, 1960. There have been no commercial sales of munitions to Portugal in the last two years. As far as future mutual aid shipments or commercial sales are concerned, these will be determined in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time such requests are received.

2 and 3. The Canadian government cannot, of course, maintain physical control over disposal of mutual air equipment once title has passed to the recipient country. If, however, it became known to the Canadian government that mutual aid equipment was being used by a receiving country in such a way as to contravene the understanding mentioned in the Prime Minister's reply of June 22, the government would have to review its position regarding the supplying of mutual aid to that country.

4. No information is available.

CAPE BRETON—EMPLOYMENT IN NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 283—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. How many men were laid off on May 30, 1960, in the Cape Breton Highlands national park from each of districts 7A, 7B, 15 and 8 respectively of Victoria county, and how many of the men laid off from each district were married?

2. Why were ten single men employed in districts 7A, 7B, and 15 and none in district 8 as recorded in the answer to question No. 252 at page 6686 of Hansard?

Answer by: Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. None.

2. We are most anxious that there should be maximum employment opportunities in the area. To this end and to spread the available work among as many as possible in the local labour force, we have adopted the practice of changing the work crews from time to time. When the last rotation was made there were, I am advised, a number of single men living in districts 7A, 7B and 15 of Victoria county, some with dependents, that were in need of work. I am advised this was not the case in district 8.

HALLS HARBOUR, N.S.—FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

Question No. 287—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Have any funds been provided through any vote of the Department of Public Works for expenditures at the public harbour at Halls Harbour, Kings county, Nova Scotia, for any of the last four fiscal years?

2. If so, what amount of such funds has been spent, and in what year?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes.

2. 1957-58, repairs to west breakwater $2,059.87. 1958-59, repairs to west breakwater $864.44. 1959-60, repairs to west breakwater $617.17.

In the present fiscal year, funds were authorized for driving test piles and undertaking repairs. To date, approximately $24 has been expended in this regard.

ELEVATOR OPERATORS, PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Question No. 289—Mr. Lessard:

What are the names of the elevator operators hired between July 1, 1957, and July 1, 1961, who are still being employed as such at the present time in the parliament buildings, including the buildings known as the east and the west blocks?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

Elevator operators are not hired specifically for the parliament buildings but may be moved about between government buildings in Ottawa as required. The following were engaged as elevator operators between July 1, 1957, and July 1, 1961, and are now working in the parliament buildings including the east and west blocks:

Name	Date Appointed
P. Lafleur	24-2-58
G. Jacques	2-5-58
J. Blanchfield	8-8-58
J. L. N. P. Carrier	16-10-58
W. Thompson	27-10-58
G. Quinney	9-2-59
J. Greene	4-5-59
J. Dewitt	29-12-59
H. Perron	4-3-60
E. Carron	17-3-60

Friday, September 8, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF SATURDAY SITTINGS FOR TWO WEEKS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house is aware, on May 8, 1961, as reported at page 4494 of Hansard, I made a motion with regard to the extended sittings of the house, as follows:

That on Saturday, May 13, 1961, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the session the order of business and procedure shall be as for Thursday, a government day.

I think there has been general agreement that a continuation for the next two weeks, in any event, of Saturday sittings would not be necessary. We have to think of the welfare of those connected with the administration of the house. Discussions have taken place among representatives of the government, the opposition and the third party in this matter, and I am very happy to say that an agreement has been arrived at.

We are now dealing with a most important matter, the question of external affairs, to be followed by the estimates of defence, and the house has shown an anxiety and a desire to proceed with these two very important matters without delay. Under normal circumstances on Monday and Tuesday there would be a motion to go into supply in order to open up the other four departments that have not yet been opened up. There has been agreement that the motion will be made and the departments will be opened up on Monday without debate, thereby enabling the house to proceed unbrokenly with the business before us, which concerns all of us. The attention paid by hon. members of the house and the manner in which the debate was conducted yesterday indicate the desire of all to do everything possible to meet the situation that we face.

In view of that agreement with respect to going into supply I move, seconded by Mr. Churchill:

That the operation of the provision of the resolution adopted by the house on April 24 last concerning Saturday sittings, which reads as follows: "Saturday: 11.00 a.m. to 1.00 p.m.; 2.30 to 6.00 p.m." be suspended for the next two Saturday sittings and that when the house adjourns today and on Friday next it shall stand adjourned until the following Monday at eleven o'clock a.m.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the procedure which the Prime Minister has outlined and the motion which has just been put to the house is quite agreeable to us. Indeed, it has been the subject of discussion among all parties in the house. The reading of the motion, Mr. Speaker, reminds us that it was as far back as April 24 when we changed our rules to permit these long hours, including Saturdays, and that in turn reminds us that during this time the house was sitting, the staff and officials who serve the house have been working under very great pressure indeed, and very effectively in spite of the pressure.

I think, among other things, this motion will serve to relieve that pressure. In the terms in which it has been put before the house it will not, I think, slow up or postpone any of our deliberations. Perhaps, by giving us a little more time on Saturday, if we are not engaged in other activities on Saturday afternoons, it will permit us to prepare for the debates in the subsequent week. We are entirely in favour of it.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): The members of this group wholeheartedly support the proposal made by the Prime Minister for this change in our procedure at the present time. We believe it will do something toward promoting the efficiency of parliament by giving members a little more time to do the things that are necessary. We believe it indicates some rather belated consideration of the staff, and it will also be to the welfare of the gentlemen and others who are members of the fourth estate.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the further matter mentioned by the Prime Minister might be made the subject of a unanimous order at this time so there will be no uncertainty on Monday when the sixth supply motion is called. I understand that the house is prepared to order that when the sixth supply motion is called on Monday next it shall be disposed of without amendment or debate.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Question of Privilege

PRIVILEGE

MR. STARR—CONGRATULATIONS ON BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF COLONEL R. S. MCLAUGHLIN

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I rise on a question of personal privilege, and I shall be very brief. I do wish to bring to the attention of the house the fact that today marks an event in the life of a great Canadian, a Canadian who has been a pioneer in the automobile industry in Canada. This man has been philanthropic and generous to his native city of Oshawa and to Canada as a whole in an endeavour to better the life of his fellow Canadians. He has contributed a great deal to the development of Oshawa. He has set up a foundation for the medical training of Canadian doctors abroad. A further outstanding contribution has been the financing of the mechanical engineering building at Queen's University, Kingston.

These are only a few of his many contributions. I refer to Colonel R. S. McLaughlin of Oshawa who was born at Enniskillen, Ontario, on September 8, 90 years ago today. I am sure that those who have been acquainted with him, as friends and in business, wish him health, happiness and many more years of life.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, while the procedure is somewhat unusual, the minister having taken the initiative in this matter I should like to associate the Liberal party with the tribute paid today to Mr. Sam McLaughlin, the founder of the McLaughlin Motor Car Company, who has had some 74 years of association with General Motors Corporation and the McLaughlin Company in Canada.

Representing as I do the constituency which is more widely engaged in the production of automobiles than any other section of our country; in view of the fact that there is a General Motors plant in Windsor, and in view of the fact that there is as well in that city the Ford Motor plant and the Chrysler Corporation plant, I am happy to join with the minister in extending a tribute to Mr. McLaughlin today. He is a great Canadian who has performed valuable services to his country and to his company. I hope that on his ninetieth birthday it will be possible for the government to announce some decision to implement the Bladen commission report.

VACANCY

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I hereby give notice, pursuant to section 10 of the House of Commons Act, that a vacancy has occurred in the representation of the House of Commons for the electoral district of Waterloo South in the province of Ontario by reason of the death of William Anderson, the member therefor.

TRADE

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce if he can explain to the house the delay in bringing to a conclusion and formalizing the uranium contract with the United Kingdom, and in the allocation of uranium under that contract, in view of reports that workers in the uranium centres are being let out because of this delay.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce left with me the following information which constitutes a reply to the question. On June 29 last, in reply to a question from the Leader of the Opposition, the Minister of Finance stated that following the departure of Sir Roger Makins, representing the United Kingdom atomic energy authority, arrangements were being made for continued discussions at the official level. Following these discussions certain proposals and counter proposals have been exchanged with regard to price and other conditions. At present we are awaiting the views of the United Kingdom authority with regard to the latest proposals.

Mr. Pearson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the seriousness of the situation will the government take every possible step to impress on the United Kingdom authority the desirability of concluding these arrangements at the earliest possible date?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that will be done.

PUBLICATIONS

ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—REPRESENTATIONS BY U.S. GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I apologize for giving short notice. I address this question to him because of newspaper reports to the effect that these representations were made to him. Will the minister inform the house whether the United States government has made representations officially to the Canadian government protesting the recommendations of the royal commission on publications? If so, what action does the government propose to take?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, that is a question which I think would be more properly addressed to the Prime Minister as leader of the government.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I then direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall take the hon. gentleman's question as notice. I shall look into the record and ascertain the present position with respect to the representations made by the United States, and will then advise what course may be followed.

I might say that whatever representations are made, we are making the fullest study of the recommendations of the O'Leary commission. When we are in a position to advise the house as to the course to be taken thereon or with respect to any portion of the report, the house will be made aware of this.

INDUSTRY

SHIP OPERATING AND SHIPBUILDING—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. On May 12 he announced a new policy with respect to government assistance to Canadian ship operators and shipyards. When will particulars relating to the administration of this plan be approved and tabled?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a draft of those regulations has been prepared and was ready about a month ago. This draft was sent to the various shipowners' and shipbuilders' associations for their comments. We have received quite a lot of correspondence on the matter. A final draft has been submitted to the cabinet, and this draft will be tabled in the house on Monday.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question. Did he, under the powers conferred upon him by the Canada Shipping Act, authorize the entry into Canada of a ship called Vacationland, a Detroit ferry boat, for the express purpose of operating a ferry service between Father Point and Baie Comeau?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It has been the practice of the Department of Transport to refuse entry into Canada of any vessels more than 10 years of age. With respect to vessels that are between five and ten years of age, a survey of the situation is made and, according to special circumstances, some of those vessels are accepted in Canada.

That is the situation with respect to the Vacationland, which is a very powerful icebreaker. The ship has been lying in lake Michigan. It was for sale, and a group of Canadians from the Rimouski area formed a company and bought that ship which is well suited for this type of ferry service between Father Point and Baie Comeau.

This ship is a full-fledged icebreaker. According to the experts of my department and the people in the trade she is extremely well suited for this type of operation.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask the minister another supplementary question. Can he explain to the house how he reconciles this policy with the government's new assistance policy, which was announced to the house ten months ago, the object of which was to encourage the building of ships in Canadian yards on an occasion such as this?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I have just explained why we have accepted this ship. It was built at a cost of $5 million. It was for sale for $1 million. In the circumstances it was the best type of ship available and perfectly suitable for the job. I think it will do a tremendous good for the welfare of the industry and commerce in that area.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I also ask the minister a question. Do the regulations which are to be tabled on Monday include regulations having to do with assistance in building fishing vessels, which the minister announced at the same time and which, if I remember correctly, he said would be considered mainly by his colleague the Minister of Fisheries?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue the following question. In the light of the reply given to me a moment ago by the Minister of Transport, that a Detroit ferry boat is being imported into Canada, can the minister tell the house whether the taxes payable to his department have been waived in this case, and if so, in what amount?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have not the details here at the moment. As far as I know, no such action has been taken. But I will make inquiries and advise the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPLENISHMENT OF FUND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to either the Acting Minister of Finance or the Minister of Labour. In view of the finding of the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission, tabled in this house yesterday, that the unemployment fund will be down to its last penny early in 1962, is the government now in a position to say what steps it proposes to take to replenish that fund so that the rights of workers under the unemployment insurance fund in Canada, particularly those who are unemployed, will not be prejudiced?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I shall bring this question to the attention of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we have an Acting Minister of Finance—and I appreciate the circumstances under which he has assumed this responsibility, and in view of the long journey of the Minister of Finance—may I ask the acting minister whether he is in a position to make a statement with regard to a matter which is of such vital concern to thousands of workers in this country?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am in a position to give an assurance to the hon. member and to the house that this government as always will safeguard the rights of the workers and the citizens of this country.

COMMUNICATIONS

QUEBEC—REPORTED COMPLAINTS RESPECTING TELEPHONE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Has the minister received any complaints from public authorities of L'Assomption, Repentigny, St. Charles, de Lachenaie, and even Joliette, regarding the shocking attitude of the Bell Telephone Company toward my constituents who are subject to discrimination?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have actually received complaints to that effect. I have also received a lengthy correspondence from my hon. friend from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, and I have forwarded those documents to the board of transport commissioners.

REDUCTION IN TRANS-ATLANTIC TELEPHONE RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the house whether the completion this autumn of the new trans-Atlantic telephone cable owned jointly by Canada and the United Kingdom will have any effect on trans-Atlantic telephone rates?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the president of Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation is today releasing to the press an announcement respecting a 25 per cent reduction in telephones rates from Canada to the United Kingdom which will come into effect on November 1, the expected date of the opening of the new trans-Atlantic multichannel, multipurpose cable.

This reduction has been made possible owing to the successful operations of C.O.T.C. as well as anticipated lower operating costs of the new system, which will also provide the additional capacity necessary to carry the increased traffic which is expected to be generated as a result of lower charges.

I might add that for the time being this reduction is limited to calls to the United Kingdom, but discussions have been initiated with European countries with a view to including them in the area to be covered by lower rates.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST BY FISHERMEN FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he has yet made any reply to the communication sent him by the Newfoundland federation of fishermen on August 24 and, if so, could he give the nature of the reply to the house or make it available to hon. members?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Speaking from memory, Mr. Speaker, I am not certain of the identity of the communication to which the hon. member refers, but I will look into the matter and assure myself that we are referring to the same thing. My impression is that he is referring to a communication to which I have replied, but I will make certain of this point and reply further to his question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I might assist the minister by pointing out to him that I was referring to the document from the general secretary making an appeal for federal assistance.

INCOME TAX

PRAIRIE PROVINCES—RELIEF FROM PAYMENTS ON FORCED CATTLE SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. The minister is aware of the severe drought in sections of the prairies and the necessity on the part of many ranchers to reduce their cattle herds. Will the minister give early consideration to the formulation of regulations whereby farmers and ranchers may be relieved of income tax payments arising from the forced sale of such cattle, on the understanding that revenue from 1961 drought sales will be reinvested in replacement stock when climatic conditions improve?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member was good enough to send me notice of his question this morning. This is a matter which has been under consideration by the government, particularly by my colleagues the Minister of Agriculture and the acting minister of national revenue during my absence. Correspondence has been exchanged and studies have been made. I think the feeling at the moment is that there are sufficient existing provisions in the Income Tax Act to deal with any problem which may arise. The specific point to which the hon. member refers would involve a change in the act itself. The matter is under study, and the government is giving every consideration to the problem.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POINT EDWARD NAVAL BASE—WAGE RATES OF PREVAILING RATE EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of a recent letter addressed to the Minister of National Defence and signed by Murray MacKay, recording secretary of lodge 1667 of the international association of machinists at Point Edward naval base in Sydney, would the minister state whether he will have an investigation made into the wage rate structure at the naval base for prevailing rate employees, to ensure that the wage rates are at least brought into line with those of private industry in the vicinity?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): I did receive a letter from Mr. MacKay on September 1, and I noted that copies of it had been sent to the leaders of the other two parties in the house. Mr. MacKay's representations have been referred to officials of the department for investigation.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED AGREEMENT RESPECTING USE OF MARGINAL LANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I intended to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, but since he is not here I shall ask his parliamentary secretary to take it as notice.

In view of the difficult social and economic conditions of the agricultural class, will the minister inform the house as to whether he will soon make a statement about the act relating to the agreements pertaining to the development of marginal lands, employment opportunities in the agricultural districts, etc., in which he would indicate the financial arrangements he proposes to submit to the provinces?

Mr. Pigeon: Ask Mr. Lesage about that.

(Text):

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of the hon. member's intention to ask this question. I will take it up with the minister and have it answered as soon as possible.

FINANCE

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—INQUIRY AS TO CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask whether the government has received any communications since July 12, 1961, from representatives of the international monetary fund criticizing or questioning this government's action in forcing down the exchange rate.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course that question in the form in which it is asked is not proper for the orders of the day.

Mr. Chevrier: Who decides that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman will place that question on the order paper in the regular way an answer will be given to it.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Speaking on a point of order may I say this. Surely the suggestion of the Prime Minister is one that cannot go without some comment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the Prime Minister refused a question on a point of order, of course it would be open to an hon. member to discuss the point of order. However, I think the practice is well established that the government is not obliged to answer a question. If it objects to a question and requests that it be put on the order paper, as was done by the Prime Minister, it seems to me that procedure is within the practice we have followed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure we will not disagree with you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister is within his rights.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should hear the hon. member for Essex East because it seems to me—

Mr. Lennard: We do not.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member for Wentworth will bear with me, because a point of order is involved in objecting to a question on the ground that it is unsuitable for the orders of the day. I could deal with the matter on either point, and I think I should hear the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course Your Honour is correct in saying that it is the right of the Prime Minister or any other minister to withhold a response to a question. However, that is not the point in issue. The point in issue is that the Prime Minister stated that this was not a proper question to ask on the orders of the day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a proper question. In any event, it is not for the Prime Minister to tell this house what is proper. That is the responsibility of the Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. gentleman that I never appropriate to myself the position of Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman does so frequently. I simply pointed out that this was not a proper question. It is not dealing with a matter of immediate moment. It is a matter of detail and, being a matter of detail, it should be placed on the order paper.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PART TIME EMPLOYEES—REPORTED OFFER OF SICK LEAVE AND HOLIDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, at the end of the first part of the session the hon. member for Kootenay West put to me the following question:

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

In view of the minister's statement in the house on July 11 that the civil service commission has followed the policy of granting regular leave to full time civil servants only, would the minister care to comment on the fact that as far back as ten years ago the civil service commission advertised positions or part time stenographers in the Ottawa papers and offered sick leave and holiday benefits?

This is my answer. In my statement on July 11, 1961, regarding paid leave for part time employees, to the effect that the government has followed the policy of granting regular leave only to full time civil servants, I should have made a distinction between persons regularly employed part time on a set time basis of so many hours per day, or for example on a half time basis, as opposed to persons employed sporadically from time to time on what is known as a casual basis.

In the former cases it is the policy of the government, and this includes the civil service commission, to grant regular leave—vacation, sick and special—on a basis which is scaled proportionately to the number of hours worked. It is true, therefore, that a half time stenographer receives one half the normal leave credits. She would, therefore, receive three weeks annual leave, or fifteen days, but would be paid for half her fifteen days only or, in total, one half of fifteen days' pay. On the other hand, in those departments which have employees engaged on a sporadic or casual basis, it is not the practice to grant leave benefits.

As already reported on July 11, this whole matter is now being studied by the civil service commission.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

LAKEHEAD—REQUEST FOR TELEVISING OF WESTERN FOOTBALL GAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. My question arises out of complaints from many people at the lakehead against the inability of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to provide telecasts of the big four football games from the east. Can the minister inform the house whether the C.B.C. can arrange that the football games of the western conference be made available to CFCJ-TV, which would offset the disappointment over the failure to televise the big four football games for the benefit of the people of the Thunder Bay district?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as I think the house knows, the responsibility for this situation rests with the football leagues and the private television network. The big four games were contracted for by a private network or a private television station and that matter is closed. The western conference games were purchased by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I might say, incidentally, that the corporation offered far more for the big four games this year than ever before, and when they were purchased by a private station the C.B.C. offered to recoup the private station the amount which it was out, but no negotiations were possible.

The western conference games were purchased. Then, knowing the interest of the hon. member and the people of the lakehead in western conference football, negotiations were entered into in order to see whether it would be possible to televise the western games at least at the lakehead. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was informed, so I am advised, by the football unions in question that the lakehead came within the jurisdiction of the big four, and that no television could be permitted under the circumstances.

COVERAGE OF SPEECH BY PRIME MINISTER TO BAR ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question based on information I have to the effect that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was prevented from giving complete or thorough coverage to his appearance a week ago at the Canadian Bar Association meeting in Winnipeg because a private television station had tied up the event. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has given consideration to ensuring that in his public role he does not become an exclusive performer for any segment of the communications industry.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman often asks involved questions, but I must say that is the most involved one he has ever produced. I do not know about the premise or the basis for the premise. I therefore cannot give any answer to the rest of the question. All I know is that there were in front of me a number of broadcasting appliances. Whose they were and whence they came, I do not know.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister not feel that he is given sufficient consideration by the broadcasting and television interests in this country?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would be the last to object, for I know the hon. gentleman will find out when he has something worth while to say, he will always receive full coverage.

TELEVISION

TORONTO—REPORTED TRANSFER TO U.S. OF INTEREST IN PRIVATE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of National Revenue is now in a position to answer the question I asked him yesterday about this extremely urgent matter of turning over a large part of the control of the private television station in Toronto to United States interests?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday I think that is a question that I should approach carefully in order to avoid shocks. However, I will try to give a reply Monday or Tuesday after I have had consultations.

TRANSPORT

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—REQUEST FOR STUDY OF PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Now that the Prime Minister has had the opportunity of studying the statement made recently by the United States authorities to the effect that they intend to proceed with the Champlain-Richelieu waterway cut-off without waiting for Canada, can the Prime Minister say whether the government has decided upon a policy in this matter and whether he intends to set up a board of engineers to study the economics of this program?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I am not mistaken a very similar question was asked yesterday and was taken under consideration.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. gentleman was kind enough to send over the clipping in question. I think he deserves an answer in view of the courtesy he showed yesterday and again today. I read the particular article. It was a statement made by a commentator in a dispatch in a Montreal newspaper on July 22. It was to the effect that the United States authorities intended to proceed with the Champlain-Richelieu cut-off.

I have heard of no indication that the United States government intends at this time to undertake any works of construction on that part of the waterway which lies within the United States. I might add, with reference to the further question asked by the hon. member, that on May 24 the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) asked me a question respecting this matter and I pointed out that the appropriate departments were then continuing their study of the project. That review is of a continuing nature and has been in progress for some time. I also pointed out that when, following that examination, a decision was made as to the proper course to be adopted in connection therewith, the house would be made aware of it immediately.

Mr. Cardin: Does the Prime Minister mean that the house will be made aware of the reports on the survey now being made by the engineers in the different departments?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that question is asked in such a kindly way, as of course it has to be, because it has about it certain implications that would deny my giving an affirmative answer.

SOULANGES CANAL—STATEMENTS AS TO FEDERAL DISPOSAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Bourbonnais (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question. Could he tell us whether he received an answer from the Quebec department of game and fisheries with regard to the offer made to him on July 6 last concerning the cession of the Soulanges canal.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did receive a letter yesterday from the minister of game and fisheries of the province of Quebec, in which he agreed to all the terms suggested by the federal government with regard to the transfer of the Soulanges canal to the province of Quebec for the nominal sum of a dollar.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

CABINET MINISTERS' TRAVELLING EXPENSES—TRIPS ABROAD ON GOVERNMENT BUSINESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In doing so I wish to thank the hon. gentleman for making the return which he promised before the session adjourned. I refer to those returns that had not been made, in compliance with the orders of the house.

I wish to ask the Secretary of State whether he does not think it would be possible to expedite return No. 15 regarding the travel expenses of ministers, which was passed on November 30, and return No. 22 giving the names and expenses of persons sent outside Canada, which was also passed on November 30. I would also ask the hon. gentleman whether he does not think this would be a particularly opportune time to make these returns.

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, at the end of the first half of the session I believe the hon. member asked me to table all the returns. Yesterday we tabled a list of the returns standing as of that date. However, some of the returns to be tabled require the authorization of the provinces because we have to produce the correspondence with some of them.

With regard to the specific numbers mentioned by the hon. member, I will make inquiries and table them as soon as possible.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS

CANADA MEDAL—INQUIRY AS TO AWARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Now that the Canada Council has come forth with medals honouring outstanding Canadians, has it altered the Prime Minister's attitude toward the famous Canada Medal originated by Mr. Mackenzie King and as yet unawarded?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that any question connected with Mr. Mackenzie King should be directed to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I thank the Prime Minister for the advertising.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FORMOSA—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC MISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether, in view of the suggestion made last night, it is the intention of the government to establish a diplomatic mission in Formosa.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

76. Departmental administration, $6,924,915.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I am sure all members of this house feel that yesterday's debate was a splendid one, conducted in a mood of great seriousness in keeping with the urgency and gravity of this hour in mankind's history. Naturally most attention was given to Berlin, where the iron curtain has now become a physical thing symbolic of those great, deep differences existing today in respect of the political and civil rights of man.

I was, nevertheless, impressed with the fact that a good many members gave thought to other areas of the world as well. Sometimes we tend to concentrate on the major and immediate crisis and allow another one to develop with which we have to deal at a later time. I thought the Secretary of State for External Affairs made one of his greatest speeches. In a brief, simple and straightforward statement he set the record straight on NATO, on the commonwealth and especially on the United Nations and Canada's support of and faith in that great organization.

If I may be pardoned a personal expression I may say that the president of the United Nations assembly is today in my constituency in the province of Prince Edward Island. If it were not for this important debate and my duties in the House of Commons, I would be there to greet this distinguished man as he comes to that most beautiful part of Canada to discuss today's most important events and, I hope, to get a little rest in our beautiful province. Like the Secretary of State for External Affairs I, too, hope that the U.S.S.R. has not lost its sensitivity to world opinion.

As the Charlottetown Guardian said the other day:

> It poses a new threat to world survival which the U.N. must deal with at its regular general assembly session this month; and therein lies the last hope that the reaction to its appalling significance will cause a change in Kremlin strategy before it is too late.

All of us are deeply concerned lest war descend upon us, for we know its terrors. We know how utterly it would destroy us all. In many ways it is this awareness of the awfulness of war that makes diplomacy so difficult. There is always the danger of forsaking strength and steadiness in our horror of what may happen, and these are the essential ingredients of successful diplomacy. I noted that the hon. member for Kootenay West said that no Berliners would be left alive if the issue were settled by war, and God knows that is true. But how long would freedom itself live if we gave in in the face of the threats that emanate from the Soviet union and continued to cave in in future confrontations?

I am always a little uneasy when I hear the expression, is Berlin worth fighting for? Is this remote and distant city worth pushing the crisis to its ultimate? None of us thinks it would be a good idea to fight because the old idea of war is completely out of the picture these days. Yet I can never forget those inane utterances of Neville Chamberlain when he referred to Czechoslovakia as "that remote and unknown country". We cannot think in these terms any more. Of course we must make every possible exertion to avoid war. Indeed, I think the minister was right when he said we will have to exert ourselves more than we have heretofore. Perhaps it is my Calvinism that causes me to be most impressed when he calls for great physical and moral courage. I think it is very appropriate to the needs of the present day and hour. I think we will have to prepare ourselves for a harder road. We should be ready to recognize that, as the minister said, perhaps we have had enough of the soft life.

In my maiden speech in the house I quoted a brief, succinct passage from that wonderful newspaper the Christian Science Monitor, in which it was stated:

> We prefer a tax cut we think—to a satellite or a missile—until the Russians have one. And then the heart searching begins.

Well, soul searching and heart searching were never more needed than in this moment in mankind's history.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak briefly about an area which I have discussed during external affairs debates in previous sessions. I was honoured to be one of the Canadian observer delegation to the special inter-American economic and social conference held in Punta del Este. I am deeply grateful to the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the government for appointing me as a member of that observer delegation. My status was such that I had to observe with both eyes, because the delegation itself was an observer group. I should like to express my personal thanks to the leader of that delegation, the Associate Minister of National Defence, for the many courtesies shown me. He gave the delegation splendid leadership and I was proud of the fact that in all his contacts he made a great impression and won friendship for Canada.

I think the visits of Canadian leaders to South America are most important. While there I heard many references to the recent visit of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as well as to the visit of the previous secretary of state for external affairs, the late Dr. Sidney Smith. I hope the Prime Minister himself will be able to go down to that part of the world in which he is held in such high regard by the people who stand for the great things for which he has stood throughout the whole of his public career.

In today's world the southern hemisphere is vital, not so much in this direct kind of explosive contact we discuss when dealing with Berlin but in that socio-political economic contest in which Mr. Khrushchev has promised to bury us. In that struggle the lands and peoples south of the equator are tremendously important. I think they are aware of the importance which they now hold, and they are doing much to help themselves. They realize, I believe, that they are at the crossroads in their historic development.

I have said before, and I reiterate, that this government deserves compliments and commendation for what it has done to strengthen our ties with Latin America. New missions have been opened, and now we are about to be represented in every single nation in the Latin American world. The appointment of the observer delegation to Punta del Este was most deeply appreciated. I heard that on every hand. The new contacts that are developing, the visits that are taking place, are all to the good. I think it is in our interest to do more of this. I believe we must press for closer and closer contacts, especially in the technical and academic fields.

I was very pleased with the references made by the hon. member for Fort William in this connection. He was almost born in one of the Latin American states and might have become a deputy in Brazil had he stayed there a little longer. Last session I spoke of the beginning of the Latin American institute at King's College, Halifax, the oldest university in Canada. There is great hope in this, for there is a fine program developing there. I should like to see a program of scholarships similar to that in which Canada gave such great leadership in connection with the commonwealth scholarship plan.

There is one more question to which reference has already been made in this debate, and that is membership in the organization of American states. For a long time, indeed for 15 years or more, I have held that Canada would be well advised to become a member of this hemispheric association. I am more strongly convinced than ever that this is the right course. There was one time, many years ago, when we were not wanted. Of course we were technically ineligible then. This situation has long since passed and, publicly and privately, we have been invited to take our place, to occupy that vacant chair which someone in a spirit of optimism had actually built in 1912 when the Pan-American Union building was opened in Washington. We have had the invitation from President Kennedy. However, some years before, that distinguished American Senator Vandenberg issued an invitation in very fine words which now come to my mind. He said:

> By every rule of righteousness she is eligible to this association. By every rule of reason we should wish her here. I should welcome the final and total new world unity which will be nobly dramatized when the twenty second chair is filled and our continental brotherhood is complete from the Arctic circle to Cape Horn.

Among the Latin Americans I was privileged to meet at the conference at Punta del Este I found complete unanimity in the view that Canada would be most welcome. They would be very happy to have us take our place among this group. I am not the first to report with respect to this unanimity. This has been reported by much abler persons than I, and notably by the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself in recent statements.

Should Canada join? What will we get out of it? Perhaps we should also ask what we can contribute to it. I observed that the minister spoke yesterday about the essential need of continuing the ingredient of idealism in our foreign policy. We would greatly strengthen the organization of American states, the oldest collective security organization in the world today. We have much in common with the Latin American countries now forming its membership. We have a colonial past. Our colonial problems and difficulties were different from theirs and we met them in a different way, but suffice it to say that we had our problems and dealt with them in our own way, finally emerging with independent status. Another similarity lies in the fact that our country was settled by Europeans many years ago, and we have close continuing ties with the European continent.

We, like many countries in Latin America, have great natural resources requiring a major effort to effect their development. We have, however, something which not all and indeed not many Latin American states have. We have a long record of political stability. Indeed, between the years 1935 and 1957 I thought we were becoming too stable in our political life. We have a history of settled, orderly government. We also have technical know-how. Canada is a country with a mature economy and an advanced technology. We have the very things which the nations south of the Rio Grande require so desperately in these difficult times.

I wish to deal now with the advantages that could accrue from our joining. This is no place to discuss the prospects of improving our trade with Latin America, but let me say I am firmly convinced that there is a great potential for expansion in that part of the world. As another advantage I should mention that we would strengthen the western alliance by strengthening the organization of American states. We would improve our contacts and relations with people who wish to be our friends. During the few years I served as a delegate to the United Nations I became thoroughly convinced of the basic friendship between Canadians and Latin Americans. That friendship is extremely important, especially at the United Nations in the light of what has happened with respect to the membership pattern there.

The old arguments against our joining are now passé. There were those who used to argue that our joining would work to the detriment of the commonwealth in some way, that the two were incompatible. The commonwealth has now developed into a new form. There is greater freedom among the members. I think it not impossible that before too long we could have two commonwealth states in the organization of American states. The British West Indies federation might well be a member of both bodies in the very near future.

There is another argument which always disturbs me. Some have argued that there is a danger in joining, that we might find ourselves having to side with the United States against the Latin Americans or side with the Latin Americans against the United States. Someone yesterday in the debate used the word "subservience". I have witnessed the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his dealings with some delegations at the United Nations. While I should not like to use the word "stubbornness" in relation to the hon. gentleman, I have never found him guilty of subservience, nor have I seen him hesitate to disagree when he thought it was proper and in Canada's interest to do so.

The Prime Minister of this country needs no suggestions concerning the proper exercise of Canada's independent role in world affairs. The Prime Minister set the record straight in that famous Dartmouth College speech which he made shortly after he became Prime Minister. The argument of subservience is out of date. Indeed it is contemptible. Canada can differ when it feels there is a point of difference. We are free to agree not because the United States is rich and powerful and we are afraid to disagree, but because in the issues that face the world today we find ourselves in agreement with United States due to the fact that it is on the side of right.

I heard this thought brilliantly expressed by my friend the hon. member for Parkdale when he spoke in my constituency not long ago. Sometimes I feel there is too much anti-Americanism on the part of the would-be intellectuals of the country, the Gamaliels of the press gallery and the general reportorial group. Often this negative sentiment is passed off as Canadian nationalism. I believe this is scarcely the time to indulge in anti-Americanism. It is very easy to find flaws in the record of a country which bears the burdens of world leadership. In the nineteenth century the favourite intellectual exercise was twisting the lion's tail; now it is plucking the feathers from the eagle.

I think these dark days are hardly suited for indulging in such activities. We have to recognize that while we have long since reached the stage where we are capable of asserting and do assert our independence, when the chips are down Canada and the United States are on the same team. I shudder when I hear Canadians equate the aims of the U.S.S.R. with those of the U.S.A., and with a fine impartiality say "A plague on both your houses; we will step on the United States' corns and Russia's corns, too".

There were bad days in the relations of the United States with her southern neighbours. I suppose they were at their worst at the time of Theodore Roosevelt and reached their highest level under a United States president of the same name. The United States has learnt much during the course of its relations with its Latin American neighbours and during the course of its relations with Canada as well. President Kennedy in his recent program, alianza para el progresso, advanced an imaginative, forward looking program designed to improve relations through united leadership as opposed to United States supremacy. Yesterday the Associate Minister of National Defence described the tremendous contributions the United States has been prepared to make—in raw, physical terms, a contribution of $20 billion—to assist Latin America, which perhaps with some justification has felt a little neglected in recent years as Washington has had forced upon it crisis after crisis to which it has had to give its immediate attention.

I was tremendously impressed by the performance of Mr. Dillon, the chief United States delegate at the inter-American conference. He began his opening speech by quoting a statement of the Cuban liberator, Jose Marti, who said:

> We Americans are one in origin, in hope and in danger.

Mr. Dillon went on to say:

> We meet today in fulfilment of the concept and brought together by our common origin, fired by our common hopes, determined to conquer our common dangers.

Although there are great differences between us and many of the peoples of Latin America and indeed of the United States, we have so much in common that we cannot say, we dare not say, that what happens there does not affect nor concern us because verily it does. As ambassador Adlai Stevenson said:

> We cannot look for strong brothers in arms against a common enemy as long as any of our fellow American nations are sapped by stagnation and social decay.

Or as the Associate Minister of National Defence expressed it yesterday:

> Our fate will be a better one if the fate of our neighbours in Latin America is also a better one.

To advance, to strengthen this area will make for a better world and strengthen the causes to which we have dedicated ourselves. Happily we are in a position to help. I am convinced that we will do so on an ever increasing scale. It has not been the Canadian attitude to fail in our responsibilities to the world.

In this particular part of the world to which I have been giving my attention in these last few minutes I think the opportunity is great, the challenge is great, but happily we are able to meet both. I would hope we shall go further in this direction than we already have gone, and that here will be one area in which this struggle in the future, if we have a future, will be resolved in the right way for the right causes and on behalf of the right people.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, following the recent incidents which occurred in Berlin and the resumption of nuclear tests by the U.S.S.R., the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) informed us yesterday of the various measures which the government has decided to take, such as increased military forces in Canada and Europe, the establishment of a recruiting and training program to facilitate civil defence in our country.

Quite contrary to his usual optimistic mood, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) yesterday summarized his slightly pessimistic opinion in these words: We are on the brink of nuclear war. It still remains to be seen to what extent the steps taken by the government and the statements made by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs will satisfy public opinion in Canada.

At the end of the speech she made yesterday, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) expressed some disappointment in the very limited review made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I am inclined to share her disappointment since I feel the time would have been most appropriate yesterday for the Canadian government's spokesman to state very clearly the government's policy concerning external affairs, in view of the present problems.

In my opinion, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) brilliantly stated yesterday the views of the official opposition. He made various suggestions to the government and I hope the latter will take them into serious consideration. I think—in fact, I am quite sure —that the government will appreciate the spirit in which those suggestions were made because, at the end of his speech, the hon. member for Essex East called for united action on the part of all Canadian political parties to deal with the serious problem we are faced with concerning national security. I am sure that his appeal will meet the approval of all Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, the present tension over Berlin does not result from a new problem. Last year, a few colleagues and I had the opportunity of following the deliberations of the NATO parliamentary association and we visited NATO's Canadian military bases and refugee camps in West Berlin. Following that trip and the talks we had with west Berlin local authorities, we had the impression that the Berlin question would one day give rise to the tension we experience today. That problem is not the only important one on which the east and west are divided, but it is definitely the most crucial and capital one; indeed, if there is a strategical point in the world where the western countries must not retreat, it is in west Berlin. The western world's position concerning Germany and Berlin has been clearly stated and it must be forcefully reiterated. I quite agree with the government on this point, but once that position is taken, nothing should stand in the way of negotiations even if a solution of the problem seems hard to find today because of the Soviets' uncompromisingness and insincerity.

In fact, what is the problem? There are in Berlin 2.5 million Germans who are anti-communists and whose sympathies, culture and economic ties lie with the western world.

Because of their affection for democratic countries, I feel that we have an undeniable obligation to see that they are not overtaken against their will by the communists. But in spite of its importance, I think that we can consider the Berlin crisis as a symbolic factor in this fight between eastern and western ideologies.

Therefore, that is the reason why I say that the present issue is much more important than the Berlin and German problems. Let us never forget that if the communists claim to be the defenders of a world wide doctrine, should we weaken on the Berlin issue, the Russians' hunger would not be satisfied.

Communism aims to engulf the yellow race, the black race and the white race—Asia, Africa, Europe and America. The final aim of communism, let us never forget it, is not merely a local victory or a continental victory, but complete domination—communist dominion over the world.

In addition, I feel that if we consider and think over what happened since the end of the last war we will be realistic enough to admit that, and that being admitted, there are two questions we can ask ourselves. What is the position the western world should take in the light of such a crisis, especially after the resumption of nuclear testing? Should we take a rigid stand on the Berlin issue and keep our ground firmly, even though we may run the risk of starting a war? Second, what position should a country like Canada take when faced with problems of a scope much beyond its strength?

Before answering the first question, I should like to read a few lines of a speech delivered by Mr. Khrushchev a few months ago—less than a year ago—before the supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R., on January 14, 1960. It will be seen from this statement which seems very clear that even Mr. Khrushchev admits that nuclear warfare between two countries who have nuclear weapons is meaningless. I quote:

> Let us suppose that a state or a group of states succeed in preparing and launching a surprise attack against a power which has nuclear weapons and rockets. Could the aggressors, by a single blow of the nuclear weapons, destroy all the installations for the launching of rockets within the borders of the attacked power, even if they succeeded in keeping their attack undetected? Certainly not.
> The state who is suddenly attacked, assuming it is a large enough one, will always have a possibility to retaliate with equally powerful blows. We take into consideration the fact that our country is surrounded by foreign military bases; that is why we are installing our launching sites in such a way as to insure a second and a third line of defence. The fact that our territory is enormously large makes it possible for us to decentralise our launching sites and to hide them well. We are building a system by which it will be possible whenever one of our answering devices is put out of order, to operate a second one and to hit our objectives from reserve positions.

And Mr. Khrushchev concludes as follows:

> All this is indeed enough to cool off any psychically normal person, and the men who are responsible to the world and who have its destiny at heart.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure no sensible man would think a nuclear war might mean victory for the victor, in the sense given to that term until now. And, in the light of the passage I read a moment ago, it seems that Khrushchev himself has understood that the introduction and use of nuclear weapons have utterly upset the very notion of war. That quotation from Khrushchev's words is, in my opinion, additional proof of the fact that, in order to manage to survive along with communism, we must negotiate from strength, this being the only language he can understand.

Does that mean that, after having clearly established our positions, as in the case of West Berlin, we must uphold them without entering into negotiations? Of course, that would be a very serious mistake. I was listening, some time ago, to a remarkable interview on "Close Up", of Mr. Walter Lippmann, an American newspaperman who is much listened to and has had several talks with Mr. Khrushchev. On that program, the following question was put to Mr. Lippmann: Now that the die is cast over West Berlin, that both sides have clearly established their positions, what should the west do about the German problem? And Mr. Lippmann replied:

(Text):

> Well I think that the next step is one which involves a change in our basic approach to the German problem. We have taken the line conventionally that everything in Berlin is as good as it could be from our point of view, that any change in this situation of Berlin would be for the worse, therefore we must stand firm and stand pat. That's Dr. Adenauer's view. Change nothing. Fight—threaten to fight if anything is changed.

Later, Mr. Lippmann, though admitting that we should not basically change our position as to west Berlin, says that as a result we are in a disadvantageous position. He goes on to say:

> We should take the position that the freedom of Berlin, in the sense of their ability to govern themselves, to live their own life, to keep their physical and economic and spiritual and political contacts with the western world, cannot be touched. We won't negotiate about that. But the legal basis and the statutory rights that go with that are negotiable. They never were negotiated. The thing is all a clutter of catch-can things made by generals and various people and we ought to say to them—I would like to see the position of saying to Khrushchev, "We don't like Berlin the way it is; we want to improve it, and if you can negotiate with us an improvement we'd be very interested."

(Translation)

Negotiations should therefore certainly be pursued, even if the main problem cannot be settled. Following an agreement, it would be possible to meet and settle the corollaries to the main question and we also, perhaps, might ask for the status quo to be maintained in the Berlin matter, even if it were only for one year.

I even think that, in this attempt at negotiating so as to relieve world tensions, the western nations should take more considerable and marked action than they have in the past. We should prove to the whole world and convince more particularly the non-committed nations, that the western countries want to solve their problems with the east in one way and one place only, that is, at a conference table.

I think we can agree, and there is nothing wrong with doing so, that our propaganda has not always been a happy one in this respect. We know that the western countries have no imperialistic views and do not aim at conquest, but I think that our propaganda has too often been deplorable, which gave rise to some doubts in the minds of too many people, more particularly in the non-committed countries, and those doubts should not exist considering the generosity of the western countries, first of all the United States and Canada.

I believe that Canada can play an important part in this respect among its allies. Let us recall this country's action in the Suez crisis. The former secretary of state for external affairs, who is today the Leader of the Opposition, had, on behalf of a sovereign Canada, taken a position, unimpaired by any inferiority complex. We may recall that results were in keeping with our attitude, and that considerable prestige was earned by our country. This answers in a way the second question I was asking earlier today.

What attitude should be taken by a country like Canada? I believe that we should as we did for Suez, take any position which to our mind, could promote world peace, considering not only the higher interests of Canada but of all the free nations.

As far as the renewal of nuclear tests is concerned, we should obviously condemn the U.S.S.R. without reserve, as we must also regret, if not blame, the American attitude in this matter, though the American nuclear tests are to be made underground and will therefore not endanger the life of individuals by radioactive fall-out.

To my mind, there is no people in this world, including the Russian people, who would favour those tests. When the Soviets decided to break the lull of a three year agreement in order to continue their nuclear tests, we had an excellent opportunity to expose that country to world opinion, but I think this should have been done before the only proper court, that is, the United Nations.

This is a field where a country like Canada can play an important part. But in addition the government should have a clearly defined policy on this issue. It may be difficult to blame others for making those tests when it is possible that the results they obtain may find a use in our own country by the stocking of nuclear warheads on our launching bases. Therefore we should have a clearly defined policy in connection with the use of nuclear warheads. In my opinion, this procrastination on the part of the government prevents us to a certain extent from playing our due part on the world scene in that respect.

Mr. Chairman, here in Canada we have regard for the basic principles which are essential to men of all countries if they want to develop harmoniously and live in an atmosphere of freedom. Our way of life is essentially dependent on other spiritual values not on atheistic materialism.

In his speech, Mr. Khrushchev as I said a moment ago also made the following statement on which I want to comment. Mr. Khrushchev said a few months ago before the supreme Soviet:

> The U.S.S.R. will produce more coal, more steel and more oil than the United States within ten years from now.

Commenting on that statement, Mr. Spaak, the former secretary general of NATO had the following statement to make:

> I do not believe in totalitarianism nor in historical materialism. There is only one thing we can do and it is to remain true to our essential principles and to accept within our countries as well as outside our boundaries the consequences of that loyalty.

And what he added was actually the truth:

> The problem is not to know who produces the most, it is to know what one does with the wealth thus gained, what kind of society one organizes and what sort of hope is given to the people.

It is here, Mr. Chairman, that democracies have a huge advantage over communism. That freedom of action and thought that we are demanding for the men of all countries and all races, explains the greater economic failure of the soviets, a failure and a fiasco they are unable to hide. That is why hundreds of thousands of men, women and children, at the risk of their lives, want to cross communist borders to enjoy an atmosphere of freedom within the western democracies.

I think that there lies one of the capital issues connected with the Berlin problem. That is why we must be ready to enter any proposed negotiations and also at the same time maintain a strong stand on the principles at stake, because this issue, let us never forget it, is mortgaging the future generations to come. Therefore we must do all in our power to save the sacred heritage we shall transmit to those who will follow in our footsteps.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Chairman, the fifteenth session of the United Nations opened in an atmosphere of tension and controversy resulting from the presence of the leaders of the two opposite blocs who wanted to bring forward before the general assembly all the problems that the international community must face today. Colonialism, nuclear tests and disarmament have been some of the main issues which have contributed to sow among the delegations a fever of threats and provocations that could imperil the peace and security of nations.

Fortunately, free nations had state leaders who, with energy and frankness, have unmasked the contradictory and ironical stands of the leaders of the satellite countries who seemed to have undertaken to sabotage the fifteenth meeting at all costs.

Among these courageous leaders, I should like to mention the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, on that occasion, made a speech indicating clearly to our allies how we must reply to the leaders of the countries under the communist regime and how we must successfully defend the philosophy of the nations anxious to live in a true democracy. That day, we were proud to be Canadians and to be governed by a leader with such distinction on the international scene.

The fifteenth session was also characterized by the entry of seventeen new nations into the organization. That was a political revolution with hardly any precedents in history. This sudden eruption, on the international scene, of a great many African countries, in full economic, social, cultural and psychological transformation, will bring about a radical change in political data and definitely influence the evolution of the rest of humanity. By asking for the recognition of their prerogatives and the granting of the status of sovereign countries, these newly created nations immediately indicated that they were determined to play an important part on the international scene.

While I was at the United Nations, I had the opportunity of working in close co-operation with the representatives of those new countries and I soon realized the importance of their presence within the international community.

In my opinion, the immediate consequences of their presence are the following:

1. The number of small powers has increased with the result that the latter have made new efforts to unite in a spirit of co-operation to discuss their common problems at the diplomatic level. That does not necessarily mean that the presence of a solid bloc composed exclusively of African countries was felt at the United Nations, but the discussion of certain problems most definitely took on different aspects because of certain new characteristics brought by those new African countries.

2. The presence of those new nations also had an influence on the activities and the procedure of the general assembly, because it was difficult to forecast the fate of a resolution due to an increased number of votes which could be cast in favour of the east or the west. The results of the vote on the membership of communist China is an indisputable example.

I should now like to say a word about the French-speaking African countries. Of the 28 African countries which achieved independence, 17 were former French colonies and 14 of those 17 countries gained their sovereignty in 1960. It goes without saying that the importance of those states may seem secondary from the points of view of population and economics, but it should not be forgotten that each of these new states has a seat at the United Nations assembly, can cast its vote and express its views on all international problems. Most of the French-speaking African nations which were given their independence in 1960 are small countries whose population varies from 1 to 5 million. They are still getting assistance from France and have signed with the latter mutual aid and assistance treaties in the commercial and economic fields.

All those states are faced with urgent problems and Canada, as a bilingual country, must absolutely look into their needs and offer them a charitable and brotherly hand.

Last June, I went to Ruanda-Urundi as a member of a United Nations judiciary mission; I met with the aboriginal people of that country and I acquired a first-hand knowledge of their difficulties. I spoke with African leaders who expressed their fears about the future of those countries. Even though the Belgian authorities have carried out extensive material realizations in that territory under trusteeship, those people will still be in great need after they have achieved independence. In my opinion, the most urgent problem is the establishment of an administrative machinery. Africa's future depends on the training of its public officials, teachers, doctors, civil engineers and technicians of all kinds. From the point of view of education, we must strive to help those countries train enlightened leaders by developing education at the high school and university level. It is here that outside help will be necessary; it will include the provision of an ever increasing number of teachers and the establishment of scholarships for the formation of an elite capable of ensuring Africa's future.

The African leaders greeted with enthusiasm and gratefulness the Canadian government's decision to help financially the French-speaking countries of Africa.

You undoubtedly recall, Mr. Chairman, that on April 24, 1961, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) announced that the government was setting up a training assistance program for the benefit of French-speaking African states, by providing grants of $300,000 a year.

On that occasion, the Secretary of State for External Affairs had this to say as recorded on page 3930 of Hansard:

> The countries to which the scheme would be directed are vitally preoccupied with the serious task of improving their educational facilities and with expanding educational opportunities for their peoples. They have repeatedly expressed their need for scholarships abroad for French-speaking students and for French-speaking teachers in their own countries. Because of our genuine interest in their welfare and progress and because we share a common language with these new states, Canada is in a unique position to render the type of assistance required. It is therefore the intention of the government to ask parliament to appropriate the funds necessary for this purpose once details have been worked out with the provincial educational authorities.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), congratulating the government on this move, added the following which appears on page 3931 of Hansard:

> In addition, I am particularly glad that the government has decided to confer with provincial authorities regarding the program it intends to submit.

However, I was sorry to learn recently, Mr. Chairman, that the Quebec government had not yet given any answer to the offer made by the federal government.

If there is a government that should support such a proposal, it is the Quebec government, the source of French culture in our country. I urge therefore the government to renew its offer to the Quebec government and, if need be, to remind that government of its responsibilities as concerns African aid.

I congratulate Canada for having shown leadership in this field because already the communists are launching a psychological attack in an effort to convince the new African states to join the communist ideology.

Our ambassador in Paris, Mr. Pierre Dupuy, reminded us of it last fall following a goodwill tour he made on behalf of Canada in those African countries when he said:

> Communist propaganda constantly reminds Africans that in 1917 Russia was an underdeveloped country and that it took less than 50 years to make it into one of the most modern powers. Then why not follow its example?

Mr. Chairman, they also claim that the western parliamentary system is the result of a century of evolution and that it could not provide young and vigorous states with the authority, the decisiveness and the efficiency they need. Finally, they use the old and too well known slogan about colonialism. The degree of penetration of those arguments varies according to the intellectual and political maturity of the listeners. It is easy to influence certain African people with well illustrated pamphlets and periodicals. In Ruanda-Urundi I myself have seen some of the pamphlets illustrating industrial, agricultural, social and cultural progress made in the U.S.S.R. and communist China.

Youth in particular receives special consideration from those groups. No opportunity is lost of recruiting the most intelligent and understanding minds to take them on organized tours of communist countries. Thousands of scholarships are offered to students and others of those emerging countries. It was for them that the friendship university was recently founded in Moscow.

So, I urgently call on all freedom loving peoples to assist Africa before it gives in to communist pressure. It is true that Africa's future will require all kinds of capital but, still more, it will depend on the benevolent understanding of its problems by its genuine friends. The worst mistake, we are told time and time again, would be to try to transform the African continent into a new America or Russia.

Africa, as we know, has a personality of its own, an originality richly endowed with human virtues. External contributions will be valuable to it to the extent that they will allow it to develop its own consciousness and reveal itself to the world at large.

As Mr. Dupuy also said, Africa is showing us the marvellous phenomenon of having survived in the midst of a turmoil of creative and destructive forces, of vegetal and animal forces, as are no more to be found anywhere else on our planet. But it did more than survive. It has assimilated those forces, it has given them a rhythm which now inspires its art, spirituality and its whole life. And it is thus contributing to the greatness of our common civilization.

So, no wonder that in many of those African states external policies are mainly based on the problems of concern to Africa in general. The greater number of new African states are first of all concerned with their own problems. As exceptions to that rule we might mention Mali and Guinea, which are taking an active part in the discussion of more general matters of international interest.

African states frequently meet to adopt certain stands. In fact, they met recently at Monrovia and at Casablanca, where African chiefs took the opportunity to strengthen the friendly relations that must exist between their countries, as well as to determine the policy to be adopted in the United Nations in regard to colonialism, the Congo, Algeria and all the other matters of concern to their continent.

African states of French language already exert a moderating influence within the Afro-Asiatic bloc in the United Nations. They are not in general interested in taking side in the cold war or in following the Afro-Asiatic group when the latter decides to launch an open attack against countries still practising colonialism. However, they have already supported moderate resolutions to put an end to colonialism. Above all they especially strive, and I repeat "especially", to establish friendly relations with the Canadian delegation and with other bi-cultural countries.

In concluding my remarks on this particular subject, I wish to indicate briefly the decisions taken by those new African countries:

1. They gave vigorous support to the admission of Mauritania to the United Nations.

2. They acted as mediators between France and Algerian nationalists.

3. French-speaking African states opposed the apartheid policy of the government of the Union of South Africa.

4. Concerning the Congo, they supported the recognition of the Kasavubu delegation before the general assembly.

Finally, it is to be noted that they played an active part in the deliberations of certain commissions. For example, I emphasize that my friend Mr. Ernest Gassou of Haute-Volta has been appointed commissioner to supervise the legislative elections in Ruanda-Urundi and that Guinea, Senegal and Mali are all members of the United Nations control commission in the Congo.

The fifteenth session of the United Nations has been called the African session. That is why the discussion of the problems of territories under trusteeship and under mandate were the object of very special attention on the part of the fourth commission.

I had the honour of representing Canada on that commission and I should like to report briefly on the most important discussions that took place there.

The most important resolution supported by Canada concerning the territories under trusteeship was a pressing appeal to the administering powers urging them to give administrative experience to the natives in all sectors of public administration, avoiding every discrimination, so that those territories would have an administration already set up when they reach independence. That resolution was heartily welcomed by the African states and only a few nations still steeped in colonialism opposed it.

A problem which, I think, was very difficult to work out was the future of Ruanda-Urundi, a country under Belgian trusteeship. Let me outline the situation, so that it will be better understood.

Serious disturbances broke out in Ruanda in the fall of 1959. Their cause was the strife for the provisional leadership of the country between the tribes, one called Tutsi, a class of feudal tradition, and the other called Hutu, which had always been the servants of the Tutsi and representing 85 per cent of the population. The Muami, an African term applied to the king of Ruanda, who had left the territory a few months before, identified himself with the Tutsi tribe and his return is, of course, opposed by the tribes who wish to retain power.

Having heard the testimony of the political parties, the fourth commission advised both parties to work together towards the national reconciliation of the country, in order to give it an adequate preparation to independence anticipated for 1961.

After a long discussion, the commission passed two resolutions on Ruanda-Urundi. The purpose of the first resolution was to invite Belgium, the administrative authority, to grant an unconditional amnesty to all political convicts, in order to bring about a climate of understanding and of reconciliation.

Moreover, the resolution advocated that a round table conference be held by all the political parties of the country, United Nations observers being present, and that afterwards the United Nations supervise the legislative election for the independence of the territory which was anticipated for 1961 as I have mentioned a moment ago.

The second resolution recommended the return of Muami to Ruanda and, for that purpose, the institution of a referendum in order to seek out the opinion of the people on that matter.

When I went to that country, my task was to supervise the amnesty called for by the first resolution, and I must say that the judicial commission of the United Nations has enjoyed, during its work, the closest co-operation on the part of Belgian authorities.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt, but it being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Chairman, when the house took recess this morning, I was explaining the purpose of the judiciary mission sent to Ruanda-Urundi by the United Nations. I was saying that when a United Nations resolution was submitted, the administrative authorities were ordered to grant unconditional amnesty to the political prisoners of 1959 in the territory of Ruanda-Urundi. Our commission was entrusted especially with the revision of the rulings of the special courts established on that occasion by the administrative authorities. At the conclusion of my remarks this morning, I stated that in accordance with the United Nations resolution, we succeeded in releasing practically all political prisoners who had been jailed following the 1959 uprising. However, I must admit that the release of those political leaders had a disastrous effect, since it gave rise to new disturbances between the tribes. At the present time hundreds of people are killed in that territory every week.

I fear that Ruanda-Urundi will one day be the scene of bloodshed. I do not wish to imply that Belgium is fully responsible for those troubles, but I feel that the United Nations should in the future take a closer look at the social and political conditions prevailing in those emergent countries before giving them their political independence and sovereignty.

Another matter which engaged the attention of the fourth commission concerned the holding of a plebiscite in the south and the north of the Cameroon.

The result of that plebiscite conducted by a United Nations representative showed that the north of the Cameroon wanted to join with Nigeria while the south of the Cameroon wished to unite with the Cameroon Republic, recently created.

The validity of the plebiscite was questioned by the Cameroon Republic on the grounds of fraud and discrimination in the running of the referendum by the United Nations representative and by Great Britain which was the administering authority of the territory. The Cameroon Republic was asking in particular that a committee of the United Nations be set up to investigate the irregularities of that referendum before North Cameroon could be permitted to join with Nigeria. That debate, in my opinion, was one of the most stormy of the fourth commission. Events reached such a climax that during the debate, the delegates of the Cameroon Republic left the meeting with a large number of African representatives and France accused the chairman of showing bias in conducting the proceedings.

On that occasion, the Canadian representative made a very moderate speech, while strongly supporting the report of the United Nations commissioner concerning the holding of the referendum. Canada however refused to support Great Britain's resolution because that would have seriously impaired our prestige with the African countries.

The general assembly adopted the resolution acknowledging the validity of the United Nations referendum by a two thirds majority.

Those are the most important events which marked the fourth commission and especially the second part of the fifteenth session.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to emphasize the devotion and work of the hon. members—government members as well as opposition members and the third party members—who came to New York. I wish to commend the devotion of the government officials who attended that meeting.

The prestige of our country at the United Nations is excellent. For that we are grateful to the parliamentary secretary to the minister (Mr. Nesbitt) and more particularly to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) who has a way of asserting himself by his frankness, his loyalty and his tenacity in the discussion of international problems.

The Canadian resolution on disarmament was supported by many delegations, 18 to be exact, because the minister was able to prove to other nations that disarmament is not the business of great powers alone, but that all countries who wish the well-being of humankind must tackle that question to find a quick solution.

In the international sphere, Canada has become an emancipated power which must not be content to act as a negotiating agent between countries, but must stay in the forefront in order to find solutions to world problems.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, Canada is now exerting a beneficial influence in the international community, because all nations understand that we have no colonial past nor any territorial ambitions, but that our sole desire is to save from definite peril the principles of freedom and real democracy, in trying to develop among all peoples of the world the cult of spiritual values, which alone can give this very disturbed world the guarantee of a lasting peace.

(Text):

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, yesterday, in what I thought was a very impressive contribution to this discussion, my colleague the hon. member for Essex East reminded us that it was 22 years ago on that very day that this House of Commons was called into session to ratify and confirm a declaration of war against, not the German people, but against Nazi tyranny and Nazi aggression. In his very thoughtful and realistic examination of the situation today the Secretary of State for External Affairs informed this committee, and I quote his words, that "the world is hovering on the brink of war". These words were repeated by a man who will have far more to do with the waging of war, if not with the making of the peace, than the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Today that man, Mr. Khrushchev, according to press reports, in Moscow when he said "mankind is on the brink of another military tragedy" which is his way of saying the same thing. We are on the brink of a war which we have been saying to ourselves for years in unthinkable. Everybody is thinking about it now.

In August, 1914, in the realm of opinion and of emotion, war was not unthinkable. Indeed, at that time—and many of us will remember our reaction to the developing circumstances of that month which seems so long ago now—war exercised almost a horrible fascination for many people who knew nothing about it except in terms of the charge of the light brigade or the thin red line. It was that reaction which endangered peace in 1914 and made war perhaps inevitable at that time. There was just enough of that feeling 22 years ago, that war was not unthinkable, to ensure that it happened. If we had felt in the 1930's that war was not only thinkable but likely in view of the policy of Hitler and his Nazi gang, if we had felt that it was thinkable and probable we might not have had it; we might have stopped it. If we had stopped it then we might not be talking about it today.

I think, Mr. Chairman, one danger which we face in the world today is the very opposite to our popular reaction far back in 1914, because we know now that war is so horrible that it literally is unthinkable with the 100 megaton continental destroyer bomb which Khrushchev boasts he can make; and perhaps he can, and also the Americans. If it is so ghastly, then let us not think about it. This is the kind of reaction you get in some quarters in the summer of 1961, the kind of reaction which is reflected on a United States magazine cover which I looked at the other day on which in very black type were the words "Pigskin Preview" and underneath, in smaller type, "Berlin Crisis".

The Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated yesterday, and quite rightly, that the situation is tense and serious. There was in his speech—and I am certainly not criticizing him for this—none of the optimism, dogged and determined optimism, that he has shown in the past. At times he has chided us a little for being too pessimistic, and I am certainly not chiding him for being too optimistic in those days because optimism with endeavour is a good foundation for international activity. Now we are facing a serious and tense situation. He said quite rightly that we should face it in this country and in other countries with cool consideration, neither with despair which would be wrong, nor with panic, which might be fatal. In this situation all of us in this house would wish to approach this subject and subjects related to it on a plane far above that of partisan politics or parliamentary tactics, because it is this kind of situation which emphasizes that there are so many stronger things that unite us than divide us. National unity is essential and I believe is possible in times of national or international crisis.

At the moment the centre of our fears is the city of Berlin, but there are other areas of tension in the world, and our fears in the past ten years have switched from one area of tension to another. While we are concentrating on Berlin and all that it stands for at the moment we also have to worry about—I am sure the government is not unaware of this, especially the Secretary of State for External Affairs—Southeast Asia, Laos, North Africa, Algeria, Tunis and Cuba on our own hemisphere and Tibet in Asia. All these tensions in a sense are related to each other, and the drama and the tragedy of the crisis shift from one to another. Now it is Berlin which is the centre of the current crisis of a recurrent cold war.

All of us have been listening to a great deal of talk about this current crisis. Over the air, in the newspapers, from official reports and official statements we get an analysis of what is wrong and what is right and what is going on, and we get analyses of the analysis; we get interpretation, and we get interpretations of the interpretation. I think perhaps all of us get sometimes a little foggy and confused as to what is happening and what can be done to prevent its deteriorating into war. All this talk, in my view, especially the words which emanate from communist centres, is too often what Father Pire, the distinguished Belgian priest, and the recipient of a Nobel Peace Prize, once called the dialogue of the deaf. At times the words used do not mean anything, often not even to the people who utter them, certainly not to us who have to listen to them because many words now have no value. That coinage has been debased when words like peace, democracy and non-aggression can be used in the language of communism to mean something exactly the opposite to that which has always been their natural meaning and significance. Mr. Khrushchev, in a message to the French government on September 5, just two or three days ago, is quoted in the press as saying this:

> The people of West Berlin must themselves determine the social-economic system of their city and enter into free relations with any state.

That sentiment, Mr. Chairman, is irreproachable. It is equally irreproachable when it is applied, as it should be applied, not only to Berlin but to East Germany and to all other peoples under foreign domination. Yet, if these words represent the policy of Khrushchev's government and his own personal attitude, we ask ourselves, where is the crisis in West Berlin? He says that the people of West Berlin must themselves determine the social-economic system of their city and enter into free relations with any state, or presumably group of states. So what is the crisis about?

The crisis is not resolved by words like this because we in the west do not take such words at their face value, so deep is our distrust and our fear, with good evidence on which to base that distrust and fear, and because words like that have been contradicted by the same man in other speeches not very long before the one I have just mentioned. It was Mr. Khrushchev, was it not, or some representative of Mr. Khrushchev—I am not sure which—who said not long ago that the Soviet government would not be the first to resume nuclear tests. I think Mr. Khrushchev said that again recently in an interview with Mr. Sulzberger of the New York Times.

How can you reconcile that kind of contradiction and how do you get any comfort out of such reassuring statements as the one I have mentioned, especially in the face of some less reassuring ones that appear in the papers today? This is another indication of the gulf that divides us. Perhaps Mr. Khrushchev himself would say, "Oh, well, we are not the first to resume tests", because France, one of the founding and important members of NATO, itself started nuclear tests after he, Mr. Khrushchev, had made his earlier renunciation of tests.

It is because of this feeling that the principles which Mr. Khrushchev has embodied in these words, applied to the situation in West Berlin, and meant no doubt to be reassuring to us, are not reassuring. We must get some concrete assurance in a form that is more effective than words that the principles themselves will be observed. To put it brutally and frankly, we have no faith or little faith in what he says, especially when it is contradicted by what he has said previously and by what he is doing while he speaks.

So we look for some other assurance that will embody and protect these principles, and in the case of Berlin we have had one now for a good many years, as all members know, in the four-power agreement of 1945. The situation which is accepted in that agreement covering Berlin and also a divided Germany, is an anomalous one as we look at it now. It seems to me, with that hindsight which makes everything so much easier, that it was a very foolish agreement indeed to have entered into. But it was a very formal one. The conditions that existed at the time it was entered into, and this may help us to understand why it was done, were very different from what they are now. At the present time, it is unnecessary to underline the fact, there is no good will, no co-operation, no desire to implement this agreement any longer on the Soviet side nor has there been for some time past. In fact, the Russians have made it quite clear to the world that they are determined to alter the present situation in Berlin, to alter that earlier agreement by which the west Berliners were guaranteed freedom and the western allies were guaranteed rights.

Mr. Khrushchev made this perfectly clear at the end of 1958, I believe it was, when he said frankly what he was going to do and he even set a time limit within which he would do it. Our position on the western side, a position that I think has been rightly taken by the governments concerned, is that we cannot admit that agreements of this kind can be abrogated by force or the threat of force. It would be, of course, the very negation of international diplomacy. It would make good international relations impossible. It would create an impossible situation if the west yielded to this kind of atomic blackmail, as it has been called. It would set up a kind of chain reaction. We would go from pressure to pressure and yielding to yielding until we would not know where it would ends. As the French proverb says: "l'appetit vient en mangeant".

Surely we have learned since 1914, Mr. Chairman, that peace is not ensured by surrender to blackmail. Indeed, war is sometimes made inevitable by such surrender. So we ask ourselves: Is there no choice then between the impossible alternatives of suicide or surrender? There must be. But I do not think we will save ourselves from this situation and others like it by merely relying on armed force to avoid a choice.

We have to be armed in the west. Unilateral disarmament would be an invitation to catastrophe, but armaments themselves will not do the job. The dilemma with which we are faced, this awful choice, which some people through oversimplification of the problem, try to force on us, of suicide by atomic war or surrender by yielding to atomic threats; this necessity, as some see it, of relying primarily, if not exclusively, on arms to avoid a choice; this dilemma and the impossibility of resolving it by arms alone, have been very well put by professor Hugh Seaton Watson in what I thought was a very wise book entitled "Neither War Nor Peace". I quote a paragraph from that book, where he said:

> One may agree that it would indeed be better to accept communist domination or any other form of totalitarian tyranny in the hope that with the passage of time later generations may restore liberty rather than see the whole human race destroyed, but this is not in fact the alternative that faces the governments of the west.

Or, I might interpolate, the peoples of the west. He goes on:

> The choice is not between the certainty of destruction of the human race and the certainty of communist domination but between the possibility of destruction if the west retains atomic weapons and the certainty of Soviet domination at least of Europe if the west unilaterally renounces atomic weapons.

Then he adds this sentence with which I think all of us will agree:

> If the alternative is put in this form most non-communist Europeans and Americans would prefer the risk to the certainty.

We have heard it said more than once in this debate, Mr. Chairman, that there are people in Canada who say—I know I have talked to some of them who have spoken along these lines and there have been letters in the press expressing the same view—"we will not fight for Berlin or for Germany". To use the words used by the hon. member for Kootenay West in his speech, that would be a monstrous absurdity. I think he put it that way, and it would be a monstrous absurdity in one sense. Many of us have no cause to love those elements in German society which were responsible for the war of 1914 and the war of 1939. It seems to be almost unnatural to line ourselves up alongside those people some of whom—but only some—were responsible for what happened from 1933 to 1945. But Mr. Chairman, surely this is the wrong approach to the problem and represents a misunderstanding of the position. We would not in any event be fighting for Berlin any more than we fought for Korea or for Danzig. We would only, if we were obliged to do so, be resisting aggression, fighting for a principle or fighting for a freedom which is not limited to any one small area of the world.

If we put the problem in those other terms, that we would be fighting for the Germans, we will get into nothing but misunderstanding and trouble. As a matter of fact, if after 1919 we had shown more understanding of those forces in Germany which were just as much opposed as we were to Kaiserism and all it stood for, and if after 1919 we had given the Social Democratic regime in Germany more support and more understanding, we might not have had to fight Nazi aggression and Nazi tyranny in 1939. Therefore, we surely do not want to do anything, by ill considered observations about Germany and about Berlin either, which would discourage those in Germany who are now governing a democratic republic.

As I have said then, the alternative in certain contingencies to resistance against aggression, if that were forced—and it is the only kind of resistance we would be taking part in—would be to surrender to force or the threat of force backed up by nuclear blackmail exploiting our fears. In that case we would have become the captive of our fears by giving in; just as we would become the victim of our fears if we took panic action. I suggest then, Mr. Chairman—and I do not think there will be any disagreement with this statement—that we in the west cannot yield to force or blackmail. As it is so often put, we must stand firm. But as Walter Lippmann mentioned in his column this morning and it has been said by others previously, standing firm is not the same as standing pat. We must realize—and I believe the government does so—that the present situation in Berlin and in Germany created at a time when circumstances were far different than they are today, is not going to last indefinitely and that change will come. In the period between the two wars we used to talk a great deal about the necessity for peaceful change; and it was resistance to peaceful change from 1919 to 1939 that had something to do with the catastrophe of 1939. So change will come. But it must be change not brought about by force and not brought about by betrayal, which I think is a far better way of putting it than by saying we must not give in to appeasement. Force today in terms of armed action, which would mean nuclear war, cannot reunite a divided country any more than force of that kind today can liberate people from the ruins which that kind of liberation would bring about. Surely there must be another and a better way. This necessity for eventual and peaceful change—and I return to it—surely is shown by the very nature of the earlier agreements that were made. At the time they were made those agreements were not intended to be permanent even by those who made them inasmuch as they visualized the eventual reunification of Germany through co-operation between the occupying powers and Berlin as the capital of a united Germany. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we must be realistic about this situation. I think the German feeling for unity must be respected, of course. However, that does not mean that we should give any encouragement to any German feeling for reunification by force or action which would risk imminent war for such unification. Nor does it mean that we should ignore or encourage our German friends and allies to ignore the problems of the eastern boundary, the Oder-Neisse line or the problem of Polish and Russian fears and susceptibilities which are very real and genuine. These susceptibilities are understandable in the light of the human and material destruction these people have suffered in wars from German invaders. I think also, in order to be realistic, we must realize that a Russian rejection—because that is what it is—of a non-communist united Germany, which to them would be anti-communist, in association with NATO and the west, is strong and it is opposed by equally strong western insistence on the right of Germany to remain in NATO for defence and indeed for European development; and we are not likely to weaken on that score. That is a dilemma and I cannot now see any way out of it. We are going to have to live with it as we shall have to live with many unpleasant things for some time. However, the problem now is to prevent this dilemma from deteriorating into a crisis and the use of force. All this means that Berlin as a problem cannot be isolated from the German problem and from the whole problem of relationships inside the cold war.

[Mr. Pearson.]

When we talk about the necessity of negotiating these matters, we know that it will take a long time. I do not think we in the west should refuse, for instance, to consider the possibility, as part of a general settlement, of disengagement or pulling back of the forces from the east and from the west. I think that this is a negotiable matter. Very respectable western leaders have put that suggestion forward in the past, including Sir Anthony Eden. It is negotiable but it is certainly not negotiable on Soviet terms as we now know them and it is not negotiable either at the expense of the freedom of any section of the German people. I do not know whether or not the whole position of our collective security arrangements in Europe are negotiable because I do not have all the facts in order to enable me to come to a judgment on that matter. However, I know or at least I am sure in my own mind that the proposals put forward in the New Democratic party resolutions dealing with this particular matter are not those to which I could subscribe. I read one sentence from these proposals:

> To relieve tensions Canada should press for a demilitarized zone in central Europe.

I think that is arguable and certainly should be looked into. But then it goes on to say this:

> To relieve tensions Canada should press for the simultaneous disbandment of the Warsaw and the NATO pacts.

That puts these two collective security arrangements on exactly the same basis. It assumes that if NATO and the Warsaw pacts were abrogated the results would be equal, in terms of security. We know, surely, that this is not the case and disbandment of NATO would be the abandonment of free peoples. The break up of NATO would mean that its democratic members would be split apart and collective action would go.

What would the break up of the Warsaw pact mean? Perhaps nothing at all. Perhaps it would be almost as simple without the pact as with it for the Soviet government to control and determine the action of the armies of the present members of the Warsaw pact. Therefore to have these two organizations on the same level of importance so far as international security is concerned, and to suggest that their simultaneous disbandment would not prejudice the situation in any way to our disadvantage seems to me to be entirely unrealistic and indeed dangerous.

If the existing guarantee of Berlin, which goes back to 1944, is a shaky one in present circumstances, I suspect it will become even shakier when the responsibility on the communist side for carrying it out is transferred, as it is going to be transferred, to an East German communist government as a result of a peace treaty made with that government by the Soviet union. Because after that time so far as the Russians are concerned it will be the responsibility of the East German satellite under Soviet domination to observe the stipulations of that agreement.

This would mean a transfer of authority and a recognition of East Germany as an independent, sovereign state by a great many nations, particularly the communist states in the world. A great many of them have already given this recognition. This would perhaps mean a deterioration of the situation. It might mean additional dangers, but I cannot myself think this is a matter over which there need be war.

The Prime Minister in his speech at Winnipeg, to which I have already referred, asked a rhetorical question in that connection. I think it was a good one. I cannot quote his exact words but it was to the effect: "People say, is the recognition of the east German government, is that alone the kind of thing that should result in a crisis which would involve war?" I do not think so. After all, we recognize in fact, if not in law, what the Minister of Agriculture calls the Chinese democratic republic and we do business with it. Perhaps we will find ourselves doing business shortly with the "East German democratic republic". I would hate to see the western powers adopt an intransigent position on that particular point. But they have the right, of course, to do what can be done and must be done to insist that this transfer and this recognition shall not affect the rights and freedoms of the people of West Berlin or the rights of access to West Berlin by those who now have them.

Under this change, so we are told, the allied forces would still have the right to be in Berlin and the right to get to Berlin. Their presence there is still the symbol of the freedom of the people and the symbol of western rights. I think it would have to be preserved. And we now have in Berlin an increase in western military strength following the deterioration of the position there after the closing of the boundary and as a prelude to the transfer of all authority to the East German communist republic through a peace treaty with that government.

We now have additional western soldiers there. We have those soldiers armed and equipped and facing East German soldiers who are armed and equipped. We learn from the newspapers and from the picture magazines that they are only a few feet apart. They are pointing guns at each other. The other day there was a water cannon fired and there was a reply by a tear gas bomb. One cannot help having nightmares over the possibility of something else being exchanged across that tense and nervous border. Unless there is some way in which that situation can be stabilized these people will continue facing each other at 10 paces, which is usually the prelude to a duel.

What can be done about this? If the guarantee we have, and which we are entitled in the west to insist upon because of the freedoms that it gives the people of West Berlin, is shaky, and if it is getting shakier, and if it is creating these tensions which might explode any minute, is there anything we can do by negotiation to stabilize the position without giving away any essential rights?

I come back to the proposition which I have made and which others have made in the last few weeks, and indeed the last few months. I remember talking about this when Mr. Khrushchev said sometime ago that he was going to have a peace treaty on a certain date with East Germany and after that there would be trouble if there was not some change made on the western side.

An alternative form of guarantee which I think is negotiable and one which I think has the best chance of working out—although I do not underestimate the difficulties—would be the United Nations replacing the existing agreement with a formal international guarantee; with a United Nations police force inside Berlin and United Nations police forces on the access routes to Berlin to secure that guarantee.

I know the United Nations has had a pretty rough time lately and some of the hopes, and indeed some of the faith people had in the ability of this world organization to help guarantee international peace and security and to provide the kind of international force behind international law which would strengthen peace and security have disappeared in the unhappy developments of the last year or so.

I know the Soviet union—the minister spoke about this yesterday, and other hon. members have spoken about it—has given at least an indication in its attitude at the United Nations that it is not now too concerned whether or not the organization survives. Perhaps I had better put it in this way, that it is more and more insistent that if it is to survive it will be in a form that will be acceptable to the communist world. That means in a form that ensures there will be a communist veto over every activity of the organization from the secretary general down. I refer to the now famous troika theory of international organization. But this danger to the United Nations does not surely alter the fact that we should work even harder to strengthen it. This is an opportunity to that end.

I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has already given a strong indication of his loyalty to this organization, will desire to make it stronger in the interests of peace. I am sure he will do what he can to strengthen it in this connection.

Somehow, perhaps through the "mobilization of the middle", the United Nations must be brought in to guarantee the freedom of West Berlin within the context of Mr. Khrushchev's own statement, about which he should continually be reminded. The United Nations could also guarantee the rights of access of the western powers to Berlin.

This could be done through a United Nations police force. Perhaps it would be possible to transfer some of the United Nations police force from Palestine until we had a separate group for this particular purpose. Perhaps it would also be possible to strengthen the presence of the United Nations in Berlin, by moving some of its activities into that city. I read this morning a letter in the Montreal Gazette which mentioned the idea of moving into Berlin of some of the European activities of the United Nations. United Nations agencies could be moved into Berlin and it could become a centre of international activity. Geneva is already becoming crowded, so some of the European activities and agencies of the United Nations and those concerning the Middle East, could be transferred into Berlin. It should become a permanent centre of United Nations activity. This might create a situation in Berlin over which it would be more difficult for communist powers to ride roughshod than if we have two or three thousand allied troops behind a wall there.

I would hope that this idea could be pursued at the forthcoming general assembly. The important thing, surely, is to remember that the present situation itself is not permanent in Berlin or in a disunited Germany, but also to remember that any changing of that situation by force will provoke resistance which might mean war. There should be no doubt in anybody's mind on either side that this might happen. Then, we would have to start finding another way, making a change at this time, which 10 or 15 years from now would become inevitable in any event. We must use the United Nations for this purpose.

Now, I admit that all this has been made more difficult by the recent announcement of the resumption of nuclear tests. Every member of the house who has spoken in this debate, Mr. Chairman, has mentioned this unhappy development which represented, I think it is fair to say, a cynical betrayal by the Soviet union of the hopes which up until a few months ago at least we had placed in the possibility of a united front in this one aspect of disarmament. This is a phase of disarmament to which the Soviet union itself, in years gone by, attached the greatest importance. But now, and I do not think I am putting it too strongly, they have used it for blackmail by terror.

I do not know—I ask—whether any protest has been made by the Canadian government to the Soviet union, except in public statements, over this resumption of nuclear tests and the torpedoing of the Geneva conference at a time when the positions, on paper at least, were coming closer together.

If I have any criticism of the technique of disarmament negotiation as exemplified by this Geneva conference, and it applies to other disarmament meetings going back 10 or 12 years now, it is that we in the west allow ourselves slowly and gradually to be pushed into positions we would not accept at the beginning. By the time we get to a position of acceptance, then something else happens and the Soviet union refuses to accept the new position. A very good example of this is what has been happening in Geneva in the last few months. The last offer which was made, if it had been made a year ago, would have been an infinitely more difficult one for the Russians to refuse than when it was made a few weeks ago. This is an unhappy development, then, which is making negotiation more difficult. But it makes such negotiation more essential than ever before.

There is another aspect of this problem which has been mentioned by more than one speaker, and it is a growingly important aspect. I refer to the influence that can be brought to bear on this whole issue by what are now known as the uncommitted countries. I was at an unofficial, private conference in Oxford a few days ago at which there were many delegates from the uncommitted countries. But, they never talked of themselves as being uncommitted but as being representatives of the third world. What can this third world do to redress the balance between the powers of the west and the east? The Belgrade conference was an interesting indication of the possibilities and limitations of this new force in the world.

It is true that the resumption of tests by the Russians did, in a sense, if I may use a colloquialism, take the heat off the attack on colonialism which otherwise would have dominated the discussions at Belgrade. It is true also that this conference in Belgrade did take some action, as a third force, in trying to get the situation solved, as they saw the situation, in Moscow and in Washington. If such a result was achieved in Belgrade, I think we owe a great deal to Mr. Nehru, as one additional contribution he has made to peace. In all the talk about colonialism, neo-colonialism and the iniquities of western imperialism that came out of that conference, Mr. Nehru had as much reason from past history to join in that talk as anybody else, but it was his cool, calm voice which pointed out that the danger now is not colonialism, it is destruction. I think he got that conference to take a line which it would not have otherwise followed if he had not been there. Perhaps this great man, one of the great men in our contemporary world, could be persuaded to take a lead at the forthcoming meetings of the United Nations to mobilize this feeling in the middle powers that humanity is not going to be permitted to be destroyed by the great powers. I understand he is going to Washington soon, and I hope he will also be coming to Ottawa on this visit.

There is one factor in this mobilization of the uncommitted nations which we cannot ignore. That is their underlying suspicion of what they still call colonial imperialism and neo-colonialism. I learned last week as I have learned on so many occasions in the past, that to many of these countries who have recently gained independence, colonialism is thought of in terms of conquest and occupation from across the sea, of racialism and discrimination. But this kind of colonialism, what is known as salt water colonialism, is on the way out. The pro-consuls have departed or they are going. There is no danger to free peoples from them now except in one or two areas of the world which are a little behind the times. The balance of good and evil that came from occupation by imperial powers across the water, can be left to history to decide. Perhaps it should be forgotten today in the face of this greater and immediate danger.

Furthermore these new peoples should realize that while that old type of colonialism is on the way out, there is a far more dangerous form of colonialism which is, up to the present, still on the way in. I refer to the colonialism not of imperial forces going across an ocean but in legions moving across a border in the service of communist imperialism and destroying old nations and old civilizations. The nature of this new imperialism was made quite clear by Mr. Khrushchev at the communist congress at the beginning of this year when he said, and communist doctrine is now officially established along this line, that it is the right and duty of communist powers, communist parties and communist peoples throughout the world to assist others in the struggle for liberation. This is his way of referring to these wars of which the communists approve. It is that spurious doctrine that has caused Russians and Chinese to cross borders and destroy ancient and civilized societies.

I know that at the forthcoming meeting of the United Nations assembly we will be facing, as we have been facing in the past, resolutions condemning colonialism. The Prime Minister made a strong speech last year on this subject. After these speeches have been made and when the resolutions are being discussed in committee, that is the time to try to alter these resolutions to make them convey the right meaning of colonialism. We must insist on that kind of discussion, making sure all nations are made aware, as we are aware, of what the new colonialism means.

Before I conclude, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word about NATO because the minister and others have said a great deal about it. I should like to refer to the influence of NATO on these developments, what NATO can do and what NATO is not doing. I recall that a year ago in this house I talked about NATO and made a plea for a stronger NATO. I was rather gloomy about some of the prospects for NATO, and I talked about it being at the crossroads. I was chided by the Secretary of State for External Affairs for being so pessimistic. Everything I have read about NATO in the last year has confirmed me in my anxiety. If the members of NATO do not get closer together, they are going to get farther apart. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that this is a defensive alliance. Of course, it is a defensive alliance to us but it is not to those who are opposing us—at least, so they say. We are told that NATO must be kept strong, and that is true. However, in this difficult situation strength is more than military strength. It is also unity.

But what worries me about NATO, and I have no doubt it worries the Secretary of State for External Affairs too, is the disunity that appears now in the co-ordination of foreign policy among NATO members.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that there cannot be any smaller directorate inside NATO to tell the other NATO members what they should or should not do. I agree there must be equality inside NATO in that area even though there cannot be equality of power or responsibility. But if there is to be that kind of equality there should be a much greater effort made than has been made in the last ten or 15 years in NATO to co-ordinate and unify the foreign policies of the members of NATO before a crisis develops.

A spokesman of the government, I think the Prime Minister, said after the meeting of the foreign ministers of the three main western powers in Paris last August, that this showed how great the unity of NATO was in the face of threats from the Soviet union. Unity in the face of threats is always an immediate result in our coalition. But that meeting also showed, if the reports I read were at all accurate, that while there was this kind of unity against aggression there was also disunity on how that threat of aggression should be met. I think we must somehow do more than we have in the past to unify foreign policy of the NATO members or we will not be able to co-ordinate defence policy and stand united against aggression.

In this connection I wish to repeat what my friend the hon. member for Essex East said about a sentence in the resolution of the New Democratic party with respect to NATO and foreign policy. That sentence has been placed on the record before, but I wish to repeat it:

> The New party believes that we should seek a reappraisal and change of NATO's policies and objectives.

I have no quarrel with that. We should always be reappraising and re-examining NATO's policies and objectives and I have made that statement myself more than once. The resolution goes on to state:

> The New party believes that the extension of nuclear weapons to any further states and alliances threatens disaster to the world. It therefore opposes Canada's troops being supplied with such weapons at home or abroad. At present, except for those nations which have independently developed atomic capacity, neither NATO itself nor its members individually possess or control nuclear warheads.

I think that is true, except for the United States, the United Kingdom and France. The following is the part of the resolution with which I do not agree. It reads:

> Should they do so, Canada must make it clear that it cannot remain in the alliance.

In other words, should any of the other members of NATO accept nuclear warheads either nationally or presumably under NATO control, Canada must make it clear that Canada cannot remain in the alliance. For instance, if the Netherlands inside NATO accepted nuclear warheads under Netherlands control or presumably under NATO control, Canada should withdraw from the alliance. I wish to make it perfectly clear that our party does not subscribe to any doctrine of that nature. We do agree, however, that there must be made a much greater effort inside NATO in the field of co-ordination of foreign policy and planning in the future than there has been in the past; that collective policies in NATO must be worked out in advance to the greatest possible extent rather than left at times to the impulsive reaction of individual members. There is a weakness here which should be corrected in the planning inside the alliance.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, the blocking off of East Berlin by the east German government was foreseen by the governments represented in the NATO council. It must have been obvious that this was going to happen before long. The communist leaders told us it was going to happen. If that is the case, were plans made inside NATO to meet that particular emergency when it occurred? Mr. Khrushchev told us about it in 1958, but when it happened one received the impression that it took the western alliance by surprise. In saying that I appreciate that I do not have all of the knowledge and facts and therefore I do not speak dogmatically on these matters.

We know at this moment that the attempted blocking off of access to Berlin may occur, the attempt is likely to be made; I put it no higher than that. Have we in the NATO alliance agreed plans to meet that blockade or will we react impulsively after the emergency situation develops? You can put this particular exigency in frightening concrete terms if you so desire. What do we do now in the western alliance if a convoy is stopped by the east German forces on the access road to Berlin or if a plane is forced down in the corridor to Berlin? If that should happen, has NATO an agreed policy as to what should be done? Have they made clear to the other side what is likely to happen if it is tried? If we are going to resist this sort of thing because it is aggression by force, have we enough force in NATO in Europe to ensure that it can be made effective without—and this is the terrifying prospect—falling back on nuclear retaliation. Surely that is the most critical question that faces the world at the present time and it is focused right on this particular situation in terms of this particular possibility.

Of course, I am not asking the government to tell the committee what action the NATO governments are proposing to take in a situation of this kind. I am asking whether the NATO governments are looking ahead and planning to take united action in such an emergency so there will be no temptation on the part of any single government in NATO to take impulsive action under pressures which perhaps may not be wise.

As I have said outside the house I am without knowledge of all the facts and am therefore not being too critical of this, but I think the United States reaction the other day in resuming nuclear tests was obviously taken under great pressure—congressional or pentagon, or both, I do not know—but it was taken at a time when, if it could have been put off for a few days or weeks, the United States might have made a great impact on the political cold war at the forthcoming United Nations assembly. Because that action was taken under pressure perhaps some of that advantage has been thrown away. I hope, therefore, if we have to face these emergency situations in the future—and I have just mentioned two of them—we will be considering and planning in advance what course we will take and it will not be left to any power to act quickly and perhaps, because we are all human, impulsively, when the emergency takes place.

What is required as the minister pointed out so well yesterday is wisdom and calm resolution as we face these awful situations. What is required is a policy planned and agreed in advance. What is required is the avoidance of sudden policies which, if you like, throw us out into outer space without having made any provision for diplomatic re-entry. What is required is the avoidance of impulsive, panicky, sudden reactions. What is required is a policy which weighs all the risks and opportunities; which establishes the price to pay for peace without the loss of freedom; which realizes what nuclear war means but also makes clear the risk of surrender to the threat of it. As someone said yesterday speaking in the debate, we will not be respected by being weak. That is true, but we will not be respected either by being panicky or rash as was also said yesterday.

As the minister pointed out, a great deal of sacrifice and effort will be required over a long time, sacrifice and effort as never before. As the Pope reminded us yesterday in a statement from Rome, peace is not a luxury. Creative peace has to be bought and paid for by those who wish to enjoy it. That kind of peace is worth a very high price. Perhaps I may be pardoned for quoting what I said on this very point as far back as 1951. I said this:

> That kind of peace is worth paying for. The military dangers which threaten the free world at many points are so grave that we will all have to pay a substantial price to protect the peace we value.

This was ten years ago. I continue:

> We will have to rearm in co-operation with our allies. We will have to pay for rearmament through heavier taxation. We will have to work harder. We will have to forgo some of the luxuries to which we had looked forward. I am sure that Canadians will not complain of these sacrifices when they remember the cause in which they are made.

I went on:

> But there is one price which we will not pay even to secure peace. There are some things we value even more than peace. We will not pay for it by sacrificing our own freedom or the freedom of other countries.

I do not believe that we will have to pay that price. I cannot believe it. Have the resources of man, man's mind, man's heart, man's soul, sunk so low that we will have to pay that price for the avoidance of planetary destruction?

President de Gaulle said on September 5 —and I must say I did not think too highly of those particular words:

> War whatever it might bring to the west, would certainly result in the complete overturning of the Soviet regime.

It will do that, but it will result in far more than that, the destruction of vast areas and peoples of this planet, the overturning of much more than the Soviet regime. A nuclear holocaust over Berlin at this time—and we are talking about that; we are told we are on the brink of it—would be grotesque in its absurdity; it would be complete in its consequences and it would be all embracing in its destruction. This must not happen. And so I say, Mr. Chairman—and as I conclude I come back to where I was a few moments ago —let world opinion, expressed through the United Nations, on the eve of this assembly, declare that it will not happen and take action to prevent it by the mobilization of world opinion in the assembly of the world. Canada can play and has played a good part in this kind of mobilization. I am sure that Canada will play a good and strong part at the forthcoming assembly in the mobilization of opinion to reject extermination. Therefore, let us return then to the United Nations in this crisis and let us return to the force which, with all its weaknesses, it can exert. I have never seen this put in better words than these, and as I conclude I may be permitted to read them. They appeared in the Saturday Review under the name of Norman Cousins. This is what he said on this point:

> The vital alternative—

That is to national suicide or national survival—

> —is a massive attempt through the United Nations to relate the crisis of Berlin to the larger crisis facing the world. That larger crisis is represented by the absence of effective law in the relationships of nations, and the likelihood of aggression in a situation in which nations are allowed to decide for themselves what their security requires.
> Mr. Khrushchev has warned that he will not be intimidated by what the United Nations may decide. If this is the case, then this should be the central issue, rather than Berlin alone. If the Soviet wishes to take the position that it is stonily opposed to any attempt to settle differences among nations on the basis of world law and world will, then the entire human community should consider the implications of this fact. In any event, the issue of Berlin is not just whether the United States is right or the Soviet union is right. The issue is whether the contending nations have the right to proceed without regard for the lives and opinions of others. Mankind is involved and mankind has a right to be consulted. There can be no more hideous arrogance than is represented by a policy that involves other peoples without their fullest participation in any determination.

Not until the United Nations is made central in any attack on the Berlin problem, and not until the power of world public opinion is tapped, can we or anyone say that the only alternative to Soviet intransigence in Berlin is nuclear force.

You may say, Mr. Chairman, that this is vague idealism. Well, perhaps it is, but surely it is the only kind of thing in the long run, which can save us from annihilation. Last night the hon. member for Niagara Falls said that "Canada has no preordained destiny." Our destiny will be what we deserve and work for. Well, Canada has no preordained destiny; neither has the world. Our destiny in the world is what we make it, and we can make it today, if we so desire, one which will make possible the good life for all people beyond the dreams of all previous generations, or we can make it a wasteland of ruin and destruction. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, and I conclude with his words, "We are on the brink".

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I regard it as an honour as well as a responsibility to take a part, however small, in this debate which deals with matters of such inexpressible gravity. We have just listened to a speech from a highly respected member of this house who has experience beyond almost any of us in external affairs. He talked plainly with no attempt to conceal the gravity of the situation we face.

As I listened yesterday to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has worked so assiduously on these questions since he took on his present job and has come to know so much of the world, I was struck with the fact of the grave words he used. I should like to quote a few of them because he is calling on us to make efforts and sacrifices such as we have known in the past. In fact he calls on us as possibly having to do things that we knew only in wartime. We have never learned, so far as I can discover, that the state deserves any service in peacetime such as we gave in wartime. I should now like to read a word or two from what the minister said yesterday as to the challenge we face. He said, as reported in the Globe and Mail of this morning:

Perhaps we have had enough of the soft life anyway. But the road ahead is certainly going to be hard and there will be tension for a long, long time. We might just as well face that fact. From Canadians courage will be required, both physical and moral, and sacrifice, and I believe above all, a return to our deep abiding fundamental faiths. If we face this challenge we will win through.

I also wish to refer to the speech made last Saturday, I think it was, by the Prime Minister to the bar association because I welcomed so greatly what he said then. It seemed to me he gave a very much needed lead all over the world when he said quite frankly that we could not expect everything we wanted. He said that we should not expect to gain all our ends. Any final solution he said, is bound to contain "certain elements distasteful to the west" as well as "features unpalatable to the U.S.S.R." One of the things I want to say today—I hope perhaps it may win some hearing—is that I think we have got into the habit of dividing the world into two kinds of people, people who believe in the capitalist system and are good and people who believe in the socialist or communist system and are bad. I think this is a wholly artificial and even childish attitude.

Within the last generation we have worked twice with the Russians in wartime, and were we glad to have them. It almost seems a perversity of fate that we now find ourselves in the position in which we are. Nevertheless I hope we will never despair and I see no reason to despair. Even today there comes some encouragement. I think the interview between Khrushchev and the United States journalist, Sulzberger, shows that there is more than a ray of hope. If Khrushchev had said, "We can smash you all to pieces and we are going to be sitting pretty", I would have been worried. I have not read the full text but I understand Khrushchev said, in effect, "We will both be smashed up". That statement seems to me a great step forward.

I always have it in the back of my mind that Khrushchev, like everyone else in such a position, may be doing a certain amount of bluffing and that he may even occasionally have a quiet laugh at the consternation he is causing. After the interview he gave to Sulzberger, no one will make me believe that he is going to push off with all the chances that pressing the button would carry.

I am not going to attempt to discuss high political questions or questions of strategy. I am not sufficiently versed in them and I think they have been dealt with adequately. All I aim to do today is to say some things which perhaps may win credence as to what the ordinary man should be doing at this time and where people who are not in government, who are not in diplomacy, just ordinary guys, you might say, living their lives, come into the picture. I should like to speak along that line.

I like to look back. I was thinking today of the irony of the situation. I, unfortunately, can look back to 1914. I remember how we thanked God for the Russians. I remember what terrible anxieties we went through when they cracked up in the winter of 1917. As I read the lives of the leaders of those days I realize that I did not understand the terrible strains they were under in the winter of 1917-18 before we had the great German attack in March. That was our experience with the Russians and it was the same again in the second world war after a false start, if you like. Nevertheless, you will remember what Churchill said about them when they entered the conflict. He said in effect that he might not approve of everything they did but they were good soldiers and we were glad to have them. That is a free paraphrase of what he said but that is its effect and we certainly were glad to have them.

Then we came to the time after the war and we encountered ideological difficulties which were so great, and which we have allowed to become so decisive. I sometimes wonder whether we have needed to allow them to become so great. I am going to make a great confession. I have socialist friends. I go and have dinner in their houses. Apparently there are certain kinds of socialists who are not respectable but I do not think their viewpoint prevails too much in our Canadian thinking. As I read United States publications, however, I sometimes wonder where their tirades are taking them.

I think we should remind ourselves that we are talking about ideologies. For some centuries the Protestants and the Catholics tore each other to pieces. They were all good Christians but they were busy tearing each other to pieces. They do not do it so much now. We have learned how to live together and I think we have got to learn something from that experience so far as our relations with the Russians are concerned. In my opinion it is terribly important that we should. My friend asks me if that includes Presbyterians. I realize that Presbyterians are a tough breed but I think it does. I think there is a basis of reasonableness in a Presbyterian if you pursue it far enough.

Mr. Nowlan: It is a long pursuit.

Mr. Macdonnell: Well, between the Baptists and the Presbyterians it may be about 50-50. I want to introduce a word which I understand has become almost a naughty word in the United States, the word "coexistence". Apparently it has now come to mean almost the same as appeasement which, of course, was a very naughty word in the 30's particularly. I want to take the word "coexistence" and ask hon. members to consider what it means. We know, of course, what it means, literally. In plain words it just means living together.

I was interested to find that that great historian Toynbee, who surveys the centuries in the same way most of us look back on last week, makes this comment which I think is worth reading. It is quite short and I believe it is profoundly true. He said:

> Now for the first time in history the whole human race has been united on the military plane.

That, I suppose, is true and if it is true it is a truth that affects all of us profoundly—the whole world united on the military plane. You can go on from that and argue that in view of that fact there is only one thing for the world to do and that is to become united on other planes. At any rate, in the meantime surely any sensible person is entitled to say "coexistence".

What does coexistence mean? First of all I think it means that we recognize that we are not always in the right. In my opinion that is important. We are extremely critical of the Russians now because they make rather devastating remarks about us, our way of life, our society, and what they are going to do to us, but let us not forget that for a long time, particularly after the first war when socialism and communism were young, we were very high and mighty. We proclaimed to the world that they never could succeed and in fact we treated them with a good deal of disdain. It is not altogether surprising that they take a critical view of us. Nevertheless, do not forget that even after all that, when the second war came and common sense prevailed we urged them to join us and they did join us and were of great help, as we know.

I feel that coexistence implies two things. As I have tried to say, it implies give and take. As the Prime Minister said, it does not mean that we should always get our own way. It does not mean that we think we are always right. In his speech I thought the Prime Minister was very wise in abandoning the pretense that everything we did was right and that if there were negotiations we must get everything and give nothing. I am not at all sure that he has not already had some influence in the world diplomacy as a result of that speech.

I am glad to see that Khrushchev, whatever his motives are, is again suggesting negotiation and also, as I said a moment ago, he is not pretending that if the ultimate evil came Russia would come out of it easily. As I said, coexistence implies two things, the first being give and take. In the second place, it implies that we believe that there are certain good things that the other people have, certain things from which we can learn, certain things which our way of life can get from them, certain ways in which we can associate happily with each other. I feel there should be far more of that kind of thing than there is. Suppose you could imagine such a state of affairs, as the thought which occurred to me this morning, that a group of mad men got into power in Canada and in the United States and set out to bring the two countries to war. I think the citizens of Canada and United States would sit back and laugh at them. I know that is a fantastic suggestion but I am only making it because it seems to me we should not pretend to ourselves that there is no use having anything to do with the individual Russian, that he does not count.

There was a popular play many years ago involving a little principality on the north-west frontier of India. A highly sophisticated and educated Cambridge man—there are educated Cambridge men—was the head of the principality. A brutal and horrible religious ceremony was going to take place. One of his Cambridge friends said, "Surely you are not going to stand by and let that kind of thing happen". "Look", he said, "even the most absolute monarch depends on the consent of the governed. My rule would not last 24 hours if I tried to stop it." That is what he said and I am not at all sure there is not a basic truth in it. When people say that the Russians are ready to rebel it is never very convincing to me. Incidentally, if I may digress for a moment I should like to refer to a very interesting letter which I commend to everyone in this chamber. It was from a man in Moscow. It was addressed to the Globe and Mail which was sporting enough to publish it. It was quite an attack on the Globe and Mail or an editorial in the Globe and Mail. As I remember it, the editorial was headed "The Servile State". In any event the word "servile" was in it. I took this article to the publisher. I did not see him but I left a message for him congratulating him on publishing the editorial and saying, "I want you to read that editorial. I think you will find a good many things in it for you and me to answer". This letter was reasonably written and was really an attempt to answer the suggestion that in Russia they were being tyrannized over and that they hated what was happening. I do not think we can believe that is the situation. You cannot give the figures as to Russian increase in production, as to what they have done in the realm of science which we used to jeer at not so many years ago, without having the feeling that these are people of great achievement.

What I wish to say and to get across is what can be done by the ordinary man. We have in this country many people who know a great deal about Russian civilization. I think of the people who are interested in music, in the ballet and in art. They know a great deal about those matters. They surpass the rest of us, including myself, who know almost nothing about these matters. Should we not face the situation if we believe in coexistence. As it was put by a friend of mine the other day, it is a question of coexistence or no existence. That remark is worth thinking about. I wish I had thought of it myself. If that it true—and I am speaking of the ordinary citizen—we cannot leave public relations just to the few hard pressed people who are bearing the heavy burden of government.

When you come to think of what should be done you may say, "Well, is anything going to be done?" The answer is, no, nothing is going to be done unless we are greatly concerned. Speeches have been made in this house which would indicate that those who made the speeches would be ready to do a great deal.

A few things that can obviously be suggested that should be done of course, are that the universities should do much more for Russian learning, that we should have more Russian music, although of course, we have a great deal. We are already playing games with Russians. The drama, of course, is a common feature. The other thing, of course, is the press. We should know more about Russia. Our press should do more, our radio should do more. I come back again to this very simple argument: Do you believe that over the years we need to practice this coexistence? You may say that it is extremely difficult at the moment when the Russians seem to spend most of their time proclaiming that we are warmongers. I admit that it is extremely hard to put up with that sort of thing when we know how unsound it is. But then it seems to me that it would not need tens of thousands of people coming here but rather it would need only a reasonable number of intelligent Russian tourists coming to this country to find out that all this talk about our wanting war is crazy, and that this propaganda is crazy. I understand that in some of the eastern countries, when television got out there and they saw for the first time the kind of life that we were really living here, they were no longer content to put up with the kind of economic existence they were having. I mention that matter merely because I am trying very hard to suggest what can be done by the ordinary person who goes about his business, who is a decent fellow to live with and who would probably think that he could no more have influence on what is happening in Russia than he could fly to heaven. But I suggest that these things could be done and should be done; and that once we could get across the idea that the people in Russia and the people in Canada are not so very different, it might have its effect. My mind went back today to those lines by Rudyard Kipling with respect to Tommy Atkins. Tommy is soliloquizing:

> For it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' "Chuck 'im out, the brute!"
> But it's "Thank you Mr. Atkins" when the guns begin to shoot.

Then somewhere else he makes Tommy Atkins say:

> We ain't no blood red 'eroes
> And we ain't no black guards too
> But single men in barricks
> Most remarkable like you.

That is a trivial thing to introduce into this solemn assembly but somehow or other it seems that if we could get across the idea that these people in Russia are people very much like ourselves and if we could somehow have it brought home to us in the press and so on, I believe it might have some effect.

These are trivial and rather obvious thoughts that I have tried to express. The only excuse for them is that I believe that not one tenth of 1 per cent of the people in the country at this time have ever thought there was any duty on them to take any part. They thought that it should be left to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition who know about these things. It is true that they know about these things and are doing the best they can. However, it seems to me that the ordinary Canadian citizen is deeply concerned in this matter and that he has a duty to find out if there is anything he can do about the matter. I suggest with some confidence that our universities, churches, newspapers, theatres and ballet could do something, if somehow we could get across to them the idea that they are great makers of public opinion, that here is a job to be done and that coexistence is not a matter for a month or a year but is a continuing matter. It is a matter of a way of life and particularly when we consider the countries that are on balance. I think it was Chester Bowles who recorded that some Indian statesman had said to him. "You people in the west are on trial. It is going to be a question whether you or the communists can do most to help with economic problems in the underdeveloped countries. Don't you people lose out". I sometimes think of what we would feel like if some fine day we found that India had decided to incline the other way. However, that is another matter and it is no time to be introducing it now. I have been glad to have a small part in this debate.

Mr. Nugent: In this debate some distinguished speakers have taken part. The subject is the gravest one that I think the house can face. As a rather humble backbencher I venture to speak in the hope that I may add something to the debate. By way of preface I may say that I intend to be somewhat critical of western foreign policy as it has been followed for some time. I am not entirely convinced that I am correct and that everyone else is wrong. However, I am much buoyed up by that theory of argument that if I am wrong, then perhaps the right policy will be shown up and be proven even more right by contrast with it. I feel that I must be critical because, in my opinion to date, western policy has not been too successful. There are two pieces of evidence I think that back me up in this opinion. One is the present world situation in which we are on the brink of war. The second is the fact that over the last few years communism, a system that we have despised, hated and fought so strongly against, has been able to make such great inroads and such great progress in the rest of the world.

First, as to the matter of brink of war or the situation today, may I say this. I have been alarmed by some of the speeches made in the house and by speaking with some people across the country who talk so calmly about the possibility of war. Every time you mention the possibility of war they seem to give you the answer, "Well, what are you going to do? Give in to the communists?"

I do not think it is a simple matter of one or the other. I think that either one is unthinkable. Of course, the task of diplomacy today is to make sure that both are avoided. However, I do believe—and here is where I differ with many of my friends—that the possibility of war today is worse than communism.

Frankly, what we fear about communism is that were we to become subjected to that system we would lose so many of those things we treasure so much; our freedom, our democratic system and all those wonderful things we have been able to gain in modern civilization, mostly because we have had the benefits of that system.

However, I do not think we gain much by comparing the present situation to the days before the last world war or by talking about appeasement. If there were a war today we would lose much more than we could possibly lose to the communists. If there were a war I am convinced there would be no vestige of civilization left in the world. If humanity could survive at all, I think the disruption of ordinary life would be so great that there would be no type of ordered government whatsoever and we would have the most horrible of all situations in human affairs, complete anarchy. All that would straighten out that situation would be a regimentation so tight and so severe that communism would be benevolent in comparison.

Surely we cannot take so lightly the possibility of our blind fight against communism leading us into a danger of something even greater, talk about it or even think about the possibility. Surely it is the time to stop and look. Instead of merely saying, "What nasty fellows those communists are", we should say, "Have we done everything we can to protect ourselves and the rest of the world from this frightening holocaust that threatens us?"

I am buoyed up somewhat in my critical attitude by the thought that today there are some 25 uncommitted nations in the world which refuse to join what I call the anti-communist bloc; which are not on our side in the cold war. Surely if after the amounts of money this house has voted, after the extreme gestures of generosity made by the western world toward new and emerging nations, the amounts of money poured in on foreign aid and programs of one type and another, those 25 nations are still unwilling to join us, it could be just possible that our conduct and our character have not been so blameless and so spotless that we should not look critically at ourselves.

I firmly believe that perhaps the most basic error we have made is in being anti-communist first and pro-democratic second. We have seen examples of this in the manner in which some tottering regimes have been bolstered up in the Far East, for instance, where the first test seems to have been. What is the position of these people who are fighting for power on each side in this country? Which group is the most anti-communist? Which group would make the greatest contribution to our side in terms of power against the communists?" Then we pour in the money.

Surely the question that should occur to the minds of Christian, democratic people, should be, "How best can we help these people to achieve those things that they lack? How best can we help them secure a form of government that will give them the most they can obtain of those things that we treasure most?"

I suggest it has been this course of conduct, this indiscriminate choosing of allies that has caused some of the uncommitted nations to be somewhat sceptical of our methods and to appear downright ungrateful for such assistance as we have given them.

Today I think that Russia is afraid of us, as we are afraid of her. There is no doubt in my mind, having looked at the type of immigrants of various races from around the world that we have in this country, that basically the citizens of Russia, Japan, China, Poland or Britain are not that much different.

[Mr. Nugent.]

I think it is not just the western world and the citizens of their countries that are deathly afraid of war, but the citizens of all countries around the world.

I suggest that if those uncommitted nations are suspicious of our methods and our actions when we have been trying to help them, surely it should be understandable why Russia, which has been the object of our anti-communism, should find herself so unwilling to believe we are at all sincere in our protestations for peace and our saying that we do not mean her any harm. It seems to me there are a few common misconceptions which, while they may have been mentioned now and then, are not taken seriously enough into consideration or do not underly our thinking if we are really trying to find a peaceful solution.

First, the hon. member for Greenwood mentioned coexistence. It is a peculiarity of the thinking today, in the United States particularly, that to mention the word "coexistence" puts one sort of into the appeasement class or that of a fellow traveller. Let us look at it very realistically. The communists are there in many countries. Their system is well and firmly entrenched. They are extremely powerful.

There is more than that. There is no doubt that they have the solid support of a large segment of their population. In fact, we can see no reasonable hope that in the very near future they are likely to be overthrown. They are there. They are strong. They are going to remain there unless they can be overthrown by force of arms and, as I said before, I think that any question of overthrow by force of arms means we will be out of the frying pan and into the fire. It cannot be done without destroying us all.

Therefore peaceful coexistence is the only existence there is. It is not an alternate form of action; it is the only possibility. Therefore we must do all we can to try to relieve the tension which might destroy us all. Certainly if we are going to live in peace with our neighbours it would behove us to have a foreign policy more in keeping with our Christian, democratic principles than merely an anti-communist line.

I am all too familiar with an American saying which seems to underly much of their thinking. It was almost a battle cry before the last world war. That saying is, "Make the world safe for democracy". In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, there can be no more dangerous expression. Democracy, by its very nature, can never be safe. It is an idea of government, an ideology. As such it is always going to be under attack by all other ideologies. In fact, by its very nature, in order to work properly it must always allow all other ideologies full scope and full discussion. Our concept of democracy is not a symbol which can be put up like a flag and held just so. Our concept of democracy today may be vastly different from that which may evolve in 20 years time. Anti-communist policy tends to make our policies all become rigid, and a democracy that becomes rigid leaves itself without its own greatest defence, the fact that it is pliable and can bend to meet all emergencies.

Democracy cannot stand still. It cannot be solid and unbending. It cannot become so dedicated to something like anti-communism that the ordinary citizens in the street are afraid to talk about our way of life in comparison with the communist system. Once we start to do that, we lose any chance of improving our own system. When we lose any chance of improving our own system, we give a chance to the communists whom we are trying very hard to defeat. It seems strange to me that whereas communism is supposed to be a very rigid thing it has throughout the world evolved and changed enough to enable it to keep ahead of us. We have had many manifestations of the extent to which anti-communism will go in our country and the harm it can do to democracy. One example, for instance, is McCarthyism. We can lose, by our own anti-communist struggle, that which we are trying to preserve for ourselves.

We want democracy because it gives us a freedom of action, freedom of speech, freedom of choice and religion. The more we try to channel our efforts into a policy which can only be based on fear and hatred of communism, then the more effectively do we strangle those things which are finest in our own civilization. I believe that in the present world situation not only is it possible for the west and the east to have a war that can destroy civilization, but that any country which has a sufficient stockpile of nuclear arms and the means to deliver them can stand on its own two feet. I do not believe the United States needs any backers in its own defence. Who would dare attack her? There would be no possibility of winning such a war because certainly the amount of destruction would be far greater than any possible gains. Consequently, the United States must feel quite safe standing on its own two feet. The United Kingdom and France are in the same situation.

When we are trying to explain to these uncommitted nations, or in fact to Russia, that our alliances are only defensive alliances and not aimed against Russia, we can at least understand why the Russians fear those alliances. Living in this country as we do and knowing our fellow citizens so well we sometimes forget that while we are perfectly sure of our motives and our aims, while we know we have so much that we need not look with greed on anyone else's possession, while we have been treated so well by nature and have had so few real enemies, most peoples in the world have not had the advantage of growing up as we have. They cannot take our aims and motives for granted as we do. They cannot even judge them as critically as we do. When I say it is difficult for them to look at our alliances and realize the purpose is only defensive and not offensive and that, for the reasons I have just explained, one country can stand alone and we have banded together for defensive purposes, I mean that even on the basis of western reasoning we can understand why there would be confusion.

I think we too often forget that there are language barriers and other differences in the way in which these people have grown up and lived, differences in the meaning of a word. When one adds all these things together one finds there is a basis for understanding that at least the Russians might have a very real fear of us. There is no doubt, I think, in the minds of most members of this house that we are afraid of the Russians. We have heard their pronouncements about spreading world communism. We do know that they have tried to infiltrate other countries. We do know we have reason to fear communists and the spread of communism. Surely we can understand, therefore, that if we are afraid, they are honestly afraid. If both sides are afraid of a world war, then fear is going to be the complicating factor in negotiations which, while not making it impossible, will make it most difficult to arrive at any solution to our problems.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the western world now has more than sufficient arms and armaments to destroy the Russian world ten times over. I cannot forget that at the end of the last world war we were subjected to V-2 attacks from Germany that were fairly accurate. This was at a time when rockets were practically unknown and there was only 1,000 pounds of t.n.t. in the warhead. Since that time we have had sputniks which have gone into space around the moon. Surely, there cannot be much doubt that there are probably enough intercontinental ballistic missiles stockpiled on either side of the iron curtain to blast the other half of the world. I suggest it is not necessary, therefore, for us to continue to pile proof upon proof of how strong we are and how determined we are.

If, as I suggest, the most difficult factor in negotiations is really fear and not this truculence, then we are only piling fear upon fear.

Could we not afford to make some real gesture by unilaterally dropping some part of our armanent and saying to Russia, "Here, we will start this way." I do not believe we would be exposing ourselves to that much danger. I think we need to show in very concrete form which even the most complex oriental mind can comprehend that our purpose is not aggression. I feel this is part of the reason we have been unable to sell some of the uncommitted nations on our story, and why we do not have the full support of the well meaning nations in the world.

What we have failed to understand is not just the Russian mind but the minds of the members of the new nations. The Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned that these people were too busy with their own problems. This may be one way of putting it, but I should like to say that their problems really should be our first preoccupation. Their welfare and democracy have not been developed as they have in this country. They must strive for such development. They cannot equate, as some people seem to, the concept of the defeat of communism with the gaining of democracy. Those who fought in world war II know that there are other menaces to democracy. Not long ago we fought a war against the Nazis. There are in existence in the world today dictatorships of various kinds. I am sure the United States should have learned a lesson from Cuba, the lesson being that when you have one bad master you do not really fear the possibility of another as much as you fear the one you have. If we are to really achieve peaceful coexistence we must get rid of some of these misconceptions in our thinking.

I do not believe Russia wants war. I started out by saying that the communists have been making great progress without war. I am sure they realize as clearly as we do that war will mean not gain but only destruction. Therefore, since they appear to have such confidence in their system, I honestly believe they would really like to achieve and maintain peace, although perhaps peace on their terms. We do not aid the cause of peace by striving with all our might and bending all our energies in an anti-communist drive. We have not been successful in anti-communist campaigns. There is only one course for us to follow and that is for us to be pro-democracy. The purer democracy is the stronger it will be and the safer we will be. Many of my colleagues have suggested that this is a highly idealistic approach. They say that is all very well but we are dealing with a very nasty fellow. All I can say is that this has always been said any time a danger to democracy has reared its head.

I am one of those who happen to believe that the purer we keep democracy the safer we are. The more above criticism we keep our own actions—the more Christianlike our actions—the less chance there will be of making enemies and certainly there will be less distrust of us. We have to have peaceful coexistence or no existence as was just said. We must begin by removing as much of the fear as we can. Part of the task before us is to remove distrust which can be removed if we are more devoted Christian democrats. I hope that our foreign policy may start to be more prodemocratic and less anti-communist, and I am sure we will have fewer communists.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, it is with a certain amount of trepidation that I rise to take part in this debate because it is my misfortune to follow in the debate such political giants and eloquent statesmen as the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the hon. member for Essex East and the Leader of the Opposition.

Yesterday in his calm, cool and collected manner, the minister gave us a most graphic picture of present day world conditions. The hon. member for Essex East who followed, although in different words, made a no less sincere effort to warn Canadians and the people of the free world of the dangers we now face. The Leader of the Opposition whose knowledge of foreign affairs is beyond question delivered an outstanding address which greatly impressed the committee and will, I am sure, impress all Canadians. All hon. members who have participated in the debate have contributed a great deal in placing on the record the thinking of Canadians.

Before entering the chamber yesterday I read an article written by an eminent journalist and reporter who is read by most hon. members of this committee and whose opinion is highly valued. I wish to quote a portion of the article:

> It may be that Canadian foreign policy debates fail to impress because few, if any, of the participants have anything of real importance to say. Canadian foreign policy is often a pale reflection of foreign policies devised elsewhere.

Upon reading that portion of the article I was led to expect that I would not be impressed by the debate but I have no hesitation in saying that I have been greatly impressed. Previously I was inclined to feel that probably our foreign policy was dictated by others and by circumstances beyond our control but after hearing the masterful addresses of those who have preceded me in the debate I have altered my thinking. This debate impressed me as I am sure it did all hon.

members of the committee. Undoubtedly it will impress the millions of Canadians who are carefully watching to ascertain what foreign policy Canada is following.

The author of this article attempted to guess what was going to happen. If he had regard for Canada's obligations as a full-fledged member of NATO, as a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations and as one of the bastions of the free world then certainly he would have known that our foreign policy could not be completely original because it must have regard for and be co-ordinated with the lines of the policies of our allies and associates. On the other hand it is by no means a pale reflection of policies devised elsewhere. What we have heard expressed in the debate is a dynamic, purely Canadian policy dictated by the difficult circumstances that presently exist.

There is another aspect of the debate which greatly impressed me as I am sure it did all Canadians. We saw a spectacle in this house which is a rarity, and which appears only on infrequent occasions. I refer to the fact that we have a bipartisan foreign policy. I hope I am using the right word. It was a spectacle which I had not had the privilege of seeing since I had the honour of coming to this house in 1957. It was a spectacle where the government and the official opposition, in spite of their political differences, closed ranks in time of crisis. All of those who spoke before me agreed with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that we do live in a time of crisis. However, it is regrettable that we have not a tripartisan foreign policy, since there are still a few people who would scrap the policy we are Canada declare its complete neutrality, have following, who would scrap NATO and have Canada betray its allies, its friends. Oh, what a comfort it would be to those who threaten our freedom.

Neutrality is a very attractive word, Mr. Chairman. I have heard it outside this house. But history teaches us otherwise. Did neutrality pay off in the last war to countries such as Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway and others? Some people in Canada, intentionally or otherwise, misinterpret the objects and aims of NATO, why this organization was created and on what basis. Why was it necessary 10 or 12 years ago, and why is it necessary today. This country knows, and every member of the NATO organization knows, why this alliance was created. It was created purely for defensive purposes and it stands on those aims today. Let us recall history; let us go back, Mr. Chairman. It was created to stem the tide of communist dictatorship which inundated central Europe and threatened to complete the conquest of the whole of western Europe. If NATO had not come into existence it is almost a certainty that there would not be a free nation in Europe today in the sense that we understand freedom. Those behind the iron curtain understand freedom differently; they understand democracy differently, but I wager that there would not be a free nation in Europe today. And yet we have people who say "scrap NATO", or who ask Canada to get out of NATO. I know hon. members will agree with me; I know I am making a correct statement.

NATO is a defensive alliance. Does it threaten the red empire? Let us look at the facts. Neither NATO nor any one of its member nations has ever in the past 10 or 12 years since its inception displayed any imperialistic designs on each other or on the red empire behind the iron curtain. Neither NATO nor any one of the member nations of NATO has, in the words of Mr. Khrushchev, "threatened to bury" the communist ideology. However, we have heard from the mouth of the great comrade Khrushchev that he was going to bury us. He made that statement in the United States, but he included us as well. Oh, how he would like to break up the friendship that exists between our two great countries.

We have not made any plans to, and it is not our policy to bury the ideology which is foreign to us, which is unpalatable to us, which is disgusting to us and which we do not wish to accept. Each member of NATO pledged itself to come to the assistance of the other only if attacked, but not to attack first.

I think the Soviets are right when they say that Canadians are peace loving people. All the peoples of every free nation in NATO are peace loving and want peace. They are striving for it. NATO does not threaten the peace or security of the great red empire. There is no incident in history which shows that we threaten the red empire; it is not in our planning. Each member—this includes Canada—knows what threats communism poses to its very existence, to its way of life, to its democratic system of government, to its system of justice and freedom of religion and the press.

I cannot understand how the Soviet bosses believe that NATO is a threat. They warned Greece against allowing certain manoeuvres in the Mediterranean. They threatened to take certain repressive actions if Greece did not get out of the NATO alliance. But NATO does not build 15-foot walls to keep its people in even if they wish to go behind the iron curtain. Look at the thousands and thousands who have crossed the line at the risk of their lives and have abandoned all their worldly possessions to cross into West Berlin. Let us not forget the thousands and thousands of refugees who have found a home in Canada, who refuse to be repatriated, who refuse to go back. Is there not a reason for this? Have we any such situation in our NATO organization? Why, Mr. Chairman, the NATO organization has been so accommodating that some people think it has gone too far in trying to allay the fears of the communist empire. It has gone so far as to write off the peoples who are behind the iron curtain and who were once free. There is nothing in the policies of NATO to free or help these people to gain their freedom. A typical example, probably the best of all, is the Hungarian uprising in 1956 when not even a finger was raised in defence of these people who were crushed by Russian tanks. The same fate will await any other peoples who dare to rebel against the regime set up by Moscow.

In the opinion of many, NATO may rue the day that it did not adopt as one segment of its policy the freeing of these enslaved peoples. Mr. Khrushchev dares to talk about colonialism. We have become very complacent. We would be so happy to be left alone that we are not concerned about any enslaved nation. We go along with Mr. Khrushchev, with internal domestic policy of the Soviet union, and it is none of our business. We may rue the day that NATO did not threaten the dismemberment of the Soviet union and its great empire, but NATO is a stumbling block in the spread of that godless ideology and it is that stumbling block that hurts. It is not fear that we are going to attack them. We are a strictly defensive alliance. We would not condone or approve any overt action by any of our allies that would start a shooting war. We are a peace loving nation.

I know that colonialism is in the minds of the newly liberated countries as they have been called. Mr. Khrushchev is certainly fostering a spirit of hate, a spirit of revenge in those lands even against so-called benevolent oppressors such as the British empire. But how about his own empire? There is only one head of state so far who has dared to raise his voice on behalf of the enslaved peoples of Europe. That head of state is the head of a member nation of NATO, and he did so in New York on September 26, 1960. I refer to that great address by the Prime Minister of Canada to the United Nations. May I be permitted, Mr. Chairman, to quote a portion of his address. It was reported in the newspapers but I think it deserves to go into the permanent records of parliament.

> Indeed in this assembly the membership is composed in a very considerable measure of the graduates of empires, mandates and trusteeships of the United Kingdom, the commonwealth and other nations. I pause to ask this question: How many human beings have been liberated by the U.S.S.R.? Do we forget how one of the post-war colonies of the U.S.S.R. sought to liberate itself four years ago, and with what results?

It is almost five years ago now.

> I say that because these facts of history in the commonwealth and other countries invite comparison with the domination over peoples and territories, sometimes gained under the guise of liberation, but always accompanied by the loss of political freedom. How are we to reconcile the tragedy of the Hungarian uprising in 1956 with Chairman Khrushchev's confident assertion of a few days ago in this assembly? Mr. Khrushchev said: "It has been and always will be our stand that the peoples of Africa, like those of other continents striving for their liberation from the colonial yoke, should establish orders in their countries of their own will and choice." That I accept, and I hope that those words mean a change of attitude for the future on the part of those he represents.
> What of Lithuania, Estonia, Latvia? What of the freedom loving Ukrainians and many other eastern European peoples which I shall not name for fear of omitting some of them? Mr. Khrushchev went further and said: "Complete and final elimination of the colonial regime in all its forms and manifestations has been prompted by the entire course of world history in the last decades." There can be no double standard in international affairs. I ask the chairman of the council of ministers of the U.S.S.R. to give to those nations under his domination the right of free elections.

All the Prime Minister suggested was giving these people the right of free elections. What did he receive in reply? Desk beating with the boot of the dictator, and the Soviet press with the attitude of a mad dog raked the Prime Minister of Canada over the coals, criticized him and said that it was none of his business, that it was purely a matter of the domestic policy of the Soviet union.

What objection could anyone have to free elections in any one of these states? We are not concerned about what form of government Yugoslavia might choose. We would not be concerned about what form of government Poland, Roumania, Lithuania, Bulgaria and other such countries would establish within their own boundaries as long as it was done through free choice. We would like to know whether Czechoslovakians would vote in favour of the communist regime and to remain as a satellite or colony of Moscow. We would like to know the opinion of these peoples with respect to the domestic policy of this great empire, a domestic policy with which we have not tried to interfere and as to which Mr. Khrushchev says it is none of our business.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. In order to permit the house to proceed to consideration of public and private bills pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave for the committee to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house as the case may be.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR APPLICATION BY TRUCKERS TO TRANSPORT BOARD ON COMPETITIVE RATES

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-39, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity this afternoon to move the second reading of Bill No. C-39, an act to amend the Railway Act, the explanatory note of which states:

> The purpose of this amendment is to provide that representatives of the trucking industry shall have the right to make application to the board of transport commissioners for the disallowance of a competitive rate when they consider that such rate has subjected motor vehicle operators to an undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage.

From these explanatory notes that are contained in the bill one might come to the conclusion that this amendment was strictly in the interests of the trucking industry. However, that is not the main purpose of the bill, which is to provide protection for the public interest in regard to freight rates. I say that because the railways in 1957 started some substantial rate reductions by way of what are called truck competitive rates or incentive rates. In some instances, in the western incentive rates that were put into effect in 1957 by the railway, those reductions amounted to as much as 75 per cent of the rate that was then in effect. It is to be realized that it was the advent of truck competition that brought about those reductions. Of course, there should be no objection to the public benefiting from those reductions. However, I think we want to have the safeguard that the railway is not going to be allowed now to reduce the rates to an uneconomic level and therefore put out of business the very firms which brought about these freight rates reductions in the first instance. That is something that has happened very notably in one section of the trucking industry, and I am very conscious of this matter, coming as I do from the province of British Columbia.

The trucking industry started up in the business of hauling automobiles from the plants at Windsor and Oshawa out to Vancouver and they brought about substantial reductions in the cost of bringing an automobile out to Vancouver and to other parts of British Columbia. Then the railways were allowed to enter into agreed charges which practically eliminated that section of the trucking industry. Some 50 firms started up in that business and, as I say, brought about substantial reductions in the cost of moving an automobile to Vancouver, and they were eliminated by means of the agreed charges. In other instances, other parts of the trucking industry are threatened by these incentive rates and truck competitive rates.

The act at the present time—and I refer to section 334 of the Railway Act—contains certain safeguards. It provides that the railways must charge compensatory rates and that they must not go beyond the cost to the railway to move those goods. However, in the various hearings that have taken place over the years it has been clearly established that, with the number of competitive and incentive rates that are now coming into effect—and I know that a number of years ago there were 30,000 of them—and in the establishing of those 30,000 rates, the railways had beeen questioned some three or four times by the board of transport commissioners as to whether or not those rates were compensatory. They were only asked for information on those three or four occasions. It did not appear to me or, I think, to most of those involved in the hearing, that this was causing any substantial hardship to the railways. However, the Canadian National Railways in particular have protested very strenuously against these restrictions, as they call them. In fact they asked the present royal commission on transportation to eliminate any such restrictions so that they would not be required to show that their rates would be compensatory and so that they could in effect charge any rates they wanted to charge.

In actual fact the railways already have full scope for setting rates to meet their competition and rightly so. I am sure that we would not want to put the railways in a position in which they could not meet their competition. But in view of the large subsidies that are being paid by the Canadian taxpayers to the railway, I feel that we want to have some safeguard in order to make sure that the railways are not engaging in unfair competition. That is why I suggest that this amendment is necessary.

On the face of it, if two industries are on equal terms of course free competition itself would ensure the lowest possible rate to the consumer and that is the ultimate result we want to attain. However, the conditions as between the trucking industry and the rail industry are not equal by any stretch of the imagination. For one thing, the resources of the railway are far beyond those of the average trucking firm. Even though trucking firms have grown to be a great deal larger than they used to be, they certainly cannot compete with the financial resources of the railways. They could not afford to sustain a loss over a period of time as a railway could do. The railway could charge a low rate from point A to point B for a few months and eliminate truck competition or do as they have been doing over the past year or so, namely buying out trucking firms which are put in an untenable position and are unable to continue. The trucking industry is also faced with that kind of competition; it is faced not only with rail competition but with the competition of the truck lines that are now being acquired by the railroads. I have here a letter which I think went to most members of parliament. It is from a trucking operator in Winnipeg, namely Reimer Express Lines Limited. It is dated June 29, 1961, and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Browne:

Did you know that East-West Transport Ltd., a crown owned, financed, and subsidized truckline, is one of the biggest rate cutters in the business? They are charging rates without regard to operating costs. If this continues, they will succeed in putting taxpayers out of business with remarkable speed.

In view of the apparent losses East-West has had since the Canadian National Railways purchased it, I thought this would be of interest to you.

It is signed by D. S. Reimer, vice president and general manager. As to the part to which he refers there, namely the apparent losses of East-West Transport, this was confirmed in the committee on railways, air lines and shipping when there was produced last year by the hon. member for Port Arthur a document which indicated quite clearly that the trucking operations of the Canadian National for the most part had suffered a substantial loss. It was only the inclusion of one large firm which had made a substantial profit which was able to bring them into a position where they said they did not lose any money in their over-all trucking operations. However, the fact is that several truck lines owned and operated by the railway were engaging in competition with private enterprise and were operating at uneconomical rates.

In this country we have always stressed the benefits of private enterprise. I think we are getting into a dangerous situation. This matter is of concern, of course, to the general public because I am sure that no one in this country wants to see private business put out of existence and replaced by government operated businesses, especially under unfair conditions such as those. It is of course of great concern to people in the management of trucking industries who have invested their money and to the private citizens in this country who have invested their money in the trucking business which brought about lower freight rates to the people of Canada. They feel they are being discriminated against in the manner in which they are being treated. Of course, the matter is also of great concern to the employees of the trucking industry, of which I might say there are some 90,000. I believe most members of parliament have received representations from some of the unions of the employees of the trucking industry in the last few days. I recall receiving some of them myself last year. In fact, I think I read into the record of Hansard some of the resolutions that had been passed by the various teamster unions across Canada at that time. I went on to point out that the railways and the trucking industry are not on equal terms when it comes to competition because in this fiscal year the railways will receive some $91 million in subsidies from the federal government. In addition to that, Canadian National Railways had a deficit of some $67 million, which is also paid by the Canadian taxpayer. That makes a total of $158 million being paid out of the federal treasury to the railways.

I feel sure that under those circumstances every hon. member of this house would want to ensure that this money is not being used to provide unfair competition with a private enterprise in this country, especially when we consider the fact that the freight rate reductions I have spoken of would never have been brought about without the advent of trucking competition.

I think if the railways are now able to establish that they can cut their rates by as much as 75 per cent we are entitled to ask what kind of rates they were charging before. If they can now cut their rates by 75 per cent and find them to be economical what was the justification for the kind of rates they were charging before? Why should they now be allowed to put out of business those firms which brought about reductions up to that amount?

In many instances there even seems to be some doubt as to the justification for these rates to meet the competition, although that is one of the terms of the Railway Act in section 334, as I have pointed out. That section states that the railways must establish that the competition exists, rates are compensatory and are not lower than necessary to meet the competition.

I have here an article published in the Financial Post of June 3, 1961. It makes a comparison between truck rates and railway rates on certain new incentive rates which had been published by Canadian National Railways at that time. The article says:

> Trucks only handle freight shipments up to about 45,000 pounds. Even at this truck-load limit, the new railway incentive rates are as much as 20 per cent cheaper.
> But when certain commodities are heavy and not bulky and, say, 100,000 pounds can be loaded into a boxcar, the railways' new rate could be 50 per cent less than a trucker's "good" rate.

There would seem to be a reduction far below what is necessary to meet competition. Nobody is going to object to the fact that the public will benefit by lower freight rates being in force, provided this is done on a reasonable basis. However, I suggest that if the railways are cutting rates by anything from 50 per cent to 75 per cent, it needs a good deal of explanation to determine why they find it reasonable and economical to cut them to that level. What assurance will we have that if they force their competition out of business they will not immediately put the rates back up and we will find ourselves in the same position as before?

Throughout the years the argument has been put forward that it does not matter too much if a few trucking companies are forced out of business because it is easy for them to start up; there is not a great capital expenditure involved. It has been said that if one company goes out of business, another one will start and we will soon have the same protection. However, I submit that is not the case any longer, because to operate a transcontinental trucking business today does not involve the kind of trucking operations we had in Canada a number of years ago. A number of years ago a man could start up with one or two trucks at a minimum cost and was able to go into business. There are substantial licensing conditions at the present time. One must have a communications system across Canada, such as teletype, in order to control the operations over the vast distances these trucks must now travel. A truck operator must have depots and terminals across the country at which to service his vehicles and in which to store the goods. In addition, the cost of motor vehicles has increased very tremendously since the early days. The large trucks that run across Canada today cost $40,000 a unit.

Therefore one can see it is not so easy as it used to be to start up and get into the trucking business. Even if one is able to meet all the licensing requirements which are in force today, and all the other conditions, he must still raise a very substantial amount of capital. I submit that the argument which has been used in the past is not valid at the present time.

I believe that at the present time the board is limited in its powers to regulate the industry because of the fact that so many rates are being dealt with by the board. Even though they have the power, of their own volition, to investigate rates, there simply is not the time to investigate each one. It is only when a complaint comes before the board that they are really able to deal with that rate.

At the present time the trucking industry is not in a position to appeal to the board of transport commissioners. This was established quite clearly in 1957 in connection with the western incentive rates which, as I said, reduced rail rates by as much as 75 per cent. For the first time the trucking industry became seriously alarmed at the assault the railways were making upon them and appealed to the board of transport commissioners. Before the board went ahead to hear that particular case they decided the trucking industry was not a party under the Railway Act and therefore had no right of appeal to the board of transport commissioners.

The argument has been put forward in some quarters that the trucking industry is not regulated by the board of transport commissioners and therefore should not have the right of appeal. I suggest that is not a valid argument because most of the other people who already have the right of appeal to the board of transport commissioners do not come under that board either. Yet that argument has never been used against them.

The provincial governments, for instance, have the right of appeal to the board of transport commissioners, and a shipper has a right of appeal to the board. Shippers are not controlled by the federal government, and certainly the provincial governments are not controlled by the federal government. In fact if there is any argument at all in that direction it favours the trucking industry, because whether or not the federal government exercises control over the trucking industry, it is in fact the responsibility of the federal government to regulate that industry. This was decided by the privy council in 1955.

The federal government does not choose to exercise that jurisdiction as fully as it might by virtue of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act. The federal government constituted the various provincial boards in Canada with federal powers for the purpose of controlling the trucking industry.

I submit that if this is the way the federal government chooses to regulate the trucking industry, that is not the fault of the industry and certainly should not be any bar to its being heard before the board of transport commissioners. It seems ridiculous that this industry, which is the industry mainly affected by decisions of the board of transport commissioners, should have no access whatsoever to that board.

This bill is similar in nature to one passed by the house in the first half of the session. That bill dealt with agreed charges. At that time all parties unanimously agreed that the trucking industry should have the right of appeal in regard to agreed charges. I submit that the same considerations exist in regard to competitive rates. Because of the vast financial resources of the railways and, as I have pointed out, the subsidies being paid to them by the federal government—that is, by the Canadian taxpayer—I believe it would certainly be in the public interest that the trucking industry should have this right of appeal.

I can assure the house that my purpose in presenting the bill is to insure that the public will have the lowest possible freight rates. I have no objection whatever to seeing that the railways lower their rates to the lowest possible economic level. In those fields where they are able to operate at lower rates than the trucking industry, then they should be able to have that business, provided they can operate economically at those rates. I think we want to ensure that we are not going to be paying money out of the federal treasury in the form of subsidies or paying annual deficits in order to have the money used to set rates at uneconomic levels.

By the same token, where the trucking industry is the most efficient operator and can operate at the lowest rate to provide its service for the public of this country, then it should be able to have that business and not be cut out of it by unfair competition. I am sure the house will agree with all these considerations. Certainly it is only a very minor consideration that is being asked in this bill. Before any change can or would be made by the board of transport commissioners, it would have to be clearly established that the railroads were doing something not contemplated by the present legislation. In other words, before the board would make any change in any rate or hamper the railways in any way, there would have to be a violation of the existing law.

Surely, it is not too much to ask that the trucking industry, which has done so much to bring about lower freight rates in Canada, should have the right of appeal. I know this is something which has always found favour in both the House of Commons and the other place when it has come to protecting the rights of people and industries in general. Hon. members have always felt these people should have the right of appeal. I am sure the house will want to give consent to the passage of this measure in order to protect the public and insure the lowest possible freight rates in Canada as well as the most efficient transportation system we can have.

[Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill because I believe it to be in the best interests of justice as applied to our transportation system. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) upon bringing this matter to the attention of the house at this time, as well as upon his able presentation. If there is one subject upon which the members of this house are agreed, it is the importance of cheap transportation. This amendment, if adopted, will give an important branch of the transportation industry recognition that it exists for the purpose of serving an ever increasing number of Canadian people. It should, therefore, no longer be looked upon as an unimportant adjunct to our older established methods of transportation, namely the railways and lake shipping.

The trucking industry, from a very small beginning in the twenties, has now attained a status of considerable proportions, with an investment in excess of $1 billion and carrying more than one hundred million tons of merchandise. The Canadian trucking associations of Canada in their submission to the government last June emphasized that the rapid growth of the country and the spectacular progress of technology during recent years had profoundly changed the structure of Canadian transportation services. A serious problem has been created of adjusting transportation policies to meet the new situation created by the public demand for a more efficient and up to date transportation service, such as having goods delivered to your door.

In the first volume of the report of the royal commission on transportation the transformation of the Canadian transportation set-up was summarized in the following words, and I quote from page 26 of that report:

> Since the end of world war II, the transportation environment in Canada has been transformed from a monopolistic one, very much dominated by the railways, into a highly competitive one in which a number of different modes of transport are vying actively for the available traffic ... the consequences of this evolutionary development in terms of growth in the systems' capacity, efficiency and conditions of service have been, as we have emphasized, of substantial benefit to the country as a whole.

I wish to submit, Mr. Speaker, that the four maritime provinces, through their transportation commissions, expressed similar sentiments, adding that competition between the different forms of transportation is highly desirable. The trucking industry, therefore, should be considered with the other types of transportation media as the instruments of national policy. The proof of the importance of modern motor transport is found in the entrance of both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways into the trucking industry. They are now in it in a big way, having purchased two of the largest truck lines in Canada doing business from coast to coast.

All this bill provides is the right of appeal to the board against any discriminatory rates, and the right to be heard in open court. I am particularly keen on the passage of this bill because the lakehead cities of Fort William and Port Arthur are approximately 850 or 900 miles from Toronto and 420 miles from Winnipeg. As a result of the distance between the heavier centres of population, we have never received due consideration from the railways in so far as fair freight rates are concerned. I can give an example of this discrimination. The freight rate on canned goods shipped from Chatham, Ontario to Fort William is $1.57 per one hundred pounds. When a wholesaler in Fort William ships these canned goods to Geraldton or Marathon, there is a charge of $1.37 per one hundred pounds for a journey of approximately 200 miles. As I say, this came about as a result of the horizontal freight rate increases that occurred during the last ten years. It was this policy of horizontal rate increases which damaged our chances to compete with other parts of the country, and which worked to our considerable disadvantage in comparison with the eastern parts of the province of Ontario.

This unfair policy, which we hope the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation will remedy in due course, has had the effect of turning shippers to and from the lakehead to motor transport for some of their needs. It is because of these cogent reasons that northwestern Ontario has suffered more than its share from unbalanced freight rates which, directly or indirectly, everyone must pay. Higher freight costs, I submit, have a direct relationship with higher than average unemployment.

I think we should preserve the competitive spirit in Canadian transportation. The government should preserve competition as it battles cartels and combines. An independent trucking industry should be given an opportunity to compete and survive for the benefit of all Canadians. The passing of this bill will at least give the trucking industry a chance to speak and fight for itself, from which in the end no one would suffer but rather each would enjoy the fruit of his labour.

(Translation):

Mr. J. J. Martel (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is read for the second time, I should like to point out to hon. members some considerations which made me support this legislation. As did the hon. member who preceded me, I shall commend the mover of the bill, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) who, I think, is sincerely concerned in the trucking industry, as he, indeed, proved to be when a somewhat similar legislation was submitted—as he mentioned a few moments ago—i.e. when Bill C-33 was brought forward in the first half of this session and, as we may recall, was passed unanimously by the house.

I have no intention of repeating what other hon. members said before me about trucking, but, as they stressed, that industry is constantly gaining in importance in this country. It should therefore, to my mind, certainly have at least the opportunity of competing on equal terms with the National Railways or the Canadian Pacific Railway company.

I believe it has already been proved in various ways that the railway companies are competing unfairly with the truckers in Quebec and throughout Canada. I shall mainly deal with the matter with regard to the province of Quebec. Obviously, such competition sometimes puts the trucking industry in a somewhat precarious position. It is known that the National Railways are subsidized by the federal government, and that they use these amounts in a way prejudicial to the trucking industry, because the truckers have to face a heavier competition when the railways are resorting to what could be called unfair practices by lowering their rates below cost price.

We must not forget that truckers pay income tax, that they pay taxes and contribute their share to the federal treasury, and further that in the end that money is used to create difficulties for them.

Obviously others tell us that railways and railway employees also had to face competition from truckers especially in the last few years and since the first world war.

Now, this amendment proposed in Bill C-39 will enable each group, the trucking industry on the one hand and the railways on the other hand, amending as it does clause 334 of the Railway Act, to submit representations to the board of transport commissioners in order that their views may be to known.

I support the bill because it will permit free competition between the operators of the various means of transportation we have in this country.

I feel, as was pointed out by previous speakers, that we must protect the interests of the general public in the whole country. Therefore, if some areas of the country have obtained rate reduction on account of the competition from truckers, I feel that it should be admitted that railway freight rates should not be set below cost and this in order that competition may be fair.

If the freight rates or the railway rates are below cost, they necessarily threaten the trucking companies already doing business in the country, and since the railways, and particularly the Canadian National Railways, have deficits and it is the government which pays those deficits, I feel that the situation is unfair for truckers.

Furthermore, I know that the trucking industry has already made representations to the federal government on that matter, as did the Quebec trucking industry which, last autumn, forwarded a brief to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) to set out its situation and even its opposition to any additional subsidy to the C.N.R.

All those questions are under consideration. Several have already been thoroughly dealt with by the government and others will be considered.

I therefore believe that it would be wise to pass this amendment so as to let the trucking industry put forward its views to the board of transport commissioners when they argue that the railways are competing with them in a discriminatory or dishonest way by abnormally cutting their transport rates.

For these reasons, I shall vote in favour of the bill.

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I will take but a few minutes to say that I wholeheartedly support the bill introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) under which the trucking industry will have a right of appeal to the board of transport commissioners regarding charges agreed upon by the Canadian National Railways or other railway companies and the shippers.

What I know of the trucking industry, I know from the submissions that were sent to us by the Quebec trucking association, but I believe the problem is the same in the nine other provinces.

I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I had the opportunity in the past to discuss that matter with him, and I know that he has a thorough knowledge of this serious problem which, I can safely say, threatens our country's trucking industry.

As was pointed out by a previous speaker, we adopted in this house, not very long ago, a bill guaranteeing some fundamental freedoms in this country. I feel that if a decision is taken by such a responsible public agency as the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, those who might fear encroachment of their rights should be entitled to appeal before those who have rendered a decision.

The Quebec trucking association, through the medium of Mr. Camille Archambault, has submitted to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer), several briefs of which copies were circulated among us. In my opinion, it is time the government should take action in this particular field.

I do not want to be a hypocrite and say that I will vote in favour of the bill, because I strongly suspect that the question will never come to a vote. My only purpose in taking part in this debate is to make it clear to the government that there is a serious problem in the trucking industry and that it rests with the government to introduce in this house during the present session or the next, a bill to remedy the situation that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway dealt with so efficiently.

The trucking industry employs thousands of Canadians, and revenues of taxes levied from Canadians should not contribute to the ruin of several companies engaged in this type of business in our country. If the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada issues orders or gives rulings which are or could be prejudicial to the trucking industry, it seems to me that under the bill of rights we have adopted, the representatives of that industry should have the right to air their grievances before the board.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay our proceedings, but I would urge the government to take this problem into consideration once more, as it has undoubtedly done in the past, and to take concrete action either before the end of the current session or at the beginning of the next one.

(Text):

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, like other hon. members, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) on bringing forward Bill No. C-39, a companion piece to his Bill No. C-33, which this house passed unanimously before the summer recess. I trust that the house will do the same with this bill, but I hope it will not meet the same fate that seems to have overtaken Bill No. C-33 in the other place. It seems to be rather unfortunate that bills sponsored by private members of this house do not get very far in the other place. In spite of the unanimous support for Bill No. C-33—and the members of the opposition who spoke in favour of that bill have spoken in favour of Bill No. C-39—it still sits in committee in the other place and no one knows when it will be reported out of committee. This I think is the wrong way for the other place to treat legislation which has been passed by this house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I should intervene and remind the hon. member that it is not in order to criticize the actions of the other place.

Mr. Broome: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not criticize the actions of the other place. I will let them speak for themselves.

As I have said, the bill under discussion is a companion piece of Bill No. C-33. Bill No. C-33, which was referred to by the sponsor, gave the right to trucking associations under the Transport Act to appeal to the minister. This bill gives trucking associations the right to appeal to the board of transport commissioners. In the special committee on government owned railways, air lines and shipping, the president of the Canadian National more than once mentioned the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was an expert in this field of transportation so far as the trucking industry was concerned. I think that we who have listened not only to his explanation of and reason for this bill, but also to his explanation of his previous bill can well understand that he has done a great deal of research and study. I know myself that he attended hearings before the board of transport commissioners. He also attended hearings in the other place. This is not by way of criticism at all, but he did attend hearings in the other place when the previous bill was under study. The point which was made which impressed me tremendously was that the board of transport commissioners do hear briefs and representations from provincial governments. They will hear representations from individual shippers or from an organization of shippers but, under the present legislation, they will not hear briefs or representations from those people who are most affected, namely a competitive shipping medium.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway had mentioned the fact that those incentive rates have been as much as 75 per cent lower than previous agreed charges or previous statutory rates. It does appear to me that if there was that much profit in the carrying of traffic—under the law the railways must not give an incentive rate or an agreed charge which is not compensatory; under the law the railways must make money on the rates they charge—if they could drop the rate 75 per cent, then we may ask how accurate is their costing, how accurate is their analysis of their own expenses. Perhaps they do not know what it costs to carry freight. As we were told in the special committee, a representative of the railway simply sits down with the manufacturer and agrees on a charge right across the board. This is fine. We are all for cheaper transportation in this country of tremendous distances, but we are not in favour of the elimination of competition because this will not bring cheap transportation. It will end in very expensive transportation charges.

There must be regulations. There must be regulation of the trucking industry in the same way as there is regulation of the railroads. It seems to me that the delegation of this responsibility to the individual public utility commissions of the ten provinces is not the proper way to regulate the trucking industry when you consider its importance in the over-all transportation scheme of this country. A change must be made, and it would be better if this change were made in the way of government legislation introduced to take care not only of the railways but of other forms of transportation as well. There should be a bill to amend the Railway Act or the Transport Act. It would be much better for the government to introduce this legislation and it would not bog down in the other place.

In regard to incentive rates, it seems to me there is a possibility that an argument might be made to bring in the bill of rights because the bill of rights refers to:

> The right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law.

Certainly, a businessman operating a trucking business is operating his property, and if he has built up this business and then a government sponsored competitor goes to his customers and offers rates which are not compensatory but are offered with the idea of driving this man out of business, is it not a fact that he has been deprived of the enjoyment and the use of his property? This is the nub of the problem, whether the rates charged are compensatory. This is the point the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has made time after time. There is no guarantee that those incentive rates are compensatory. There can be no guarantee unless an investigation is made. As he pointed out, out of some 30,000 rates allowed over the last period of years not more than ten have been investigated.

Those were investigated only because complaints were made, but complaints cannot be made by the people who know best whether the rates are compensatory. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this bill will be of advantage to the railways themselves, because it is not doing the railway any service for the board of transport commissioners to agree to rates which will cause the railways to lose money, and in so doing also wreck a competitive business.

From our work on the special committee we know that over the last three years $5 million has been voted each year for the acquisition of truck lines by the Canadian National system. We do not know whether the prices paid were right. We do not know about the operations of these companies. We do not know how profitable they have been. We do know, mainly by reason of the work by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne), that they have not been as successful under railway operation as they were under private operation. This may well change in the years to come, but there must be control and regulation. It comes down to that.

Ever since confederation we have had control and regulation of transportation costs whether the transportation has been by railway or is now by truck, pipe line, air freight or what have you. In this particular field we are Balkanized into ten different nations, ten different provinces, each with its own regulatory body and with no body governing interprovincial trade. It does seem to me that the hon. member has done a service to the house and to the country by bringing this condition to the attention of the house.

Mr. J. S. Speakman (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to support strongly Bill No. C-39. I should like to read the provision because I think the operative words in the bill should be emphasized. They are:

> If an association or other body representative of the motor vehicle operators of Canada or of a province thereof considers that a competitive rate has subjected the said operators to an undue, or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage, the said association or other body may apply to the board—

I emphasize those words. The bill simply seeks the right for these people to apply to the board. It does not bind the board in any way to give a favourable decision. It simply gives a part of our private enterprise system the right of appeal against a discriminatory practice.

I do not think anybody in this house and possibly no Canadian would deny that Canada still needs its railways. We need them so much that we will not deny their very great need at this time for financial assistance from the public purse. When the railways first came into existence in Canada they performed a great service. They knit what was then raw, unsettled land into a great nation, a nation which will become greater. But surely in 1961, over 70 years later, there is a need for a wider and more diversified transportation industry and less of a need for the monopoly which the railways have enjoyed for all these many years.

We need our trucking industry. We need it more each day. Certainly in the province of Alberta, other western provinces and in in our new northern areas which are opening up the need for the trucking industry is as great today as was the need for railways 70 or 75 years ago. Surely then we should not deny them the right simply to apply to the board with regard to unfair or discriminatory practices. All the bill seeks is the right to apply to a board created by the federal government for a fair hearing and possible correction of what might be an unfair practice.

We in the west look at what the trucking industry has done. It has brought perhaps the greatest period of prosperity to Canada and certainly to the province of Alberta since 1946 and 1947 that we have ever enjoyed. It has brought to us and helped to maintain and expand our oil industry. Without the trucking industry we would have no oil industry as we know it today. We might have another Turner valley but not an oil industry which stretches from the United States border up into the Arctic islands. This industry has brought to western Canada and Canada generally enrichment of our economy and surely we should not deny those who are active in the industry the right to apply to one of our boards if they are being unfairly or unjustly treated.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) mentioned that there are 90,000 Canadians employed in the trucking industry. So far as their right to employment is concerned, surely they are entitled to this protection, the right to apply to the board if they are being discriminated against. Surely in this country, which we like to think is one of the freest in the western world, the right of monopoly should not be upheld.

In his introduction of the bill the hon. member also mentioned a trucking company which was acquired by the crown-owned railway. I should like to remind the house and particularly the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) that some time before the summer recess I asked the minister a question which has not yet been answered. It had to do with East-West Transport Limited lowering its rates and being the greatest offender in the industry in lowering rates to what is probably an uneconomic level in an endeavour to force upon Canadian business and the Canadian people a monopoly in the transportation industry.

As I say, this bill simply seeks the right to apply to the board of transport commissioners for protection of an industry that has been built up from an infant to a very efficient operation which is becoming larger all the time. The trucking industry is not asking for a monopoly. They are simply asking for the right to appeal against monopoly. May I call it six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Six o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the house leader could give us as much of a preview as possible of the expectations of the government for next week.

Mr. Churchill: The preview, subject to change if circumstances so require and with adequate consultation and notification, is as follows: On Monday we will continue with the estimates of the Department of External Affairs followed by the estimates of the Department of National Defence which might commence Monday and certainly would be carried on on Tuesday. On Wednesday the estimates of privy council, which are under the direction of the Prime Minister, would be before the house. It is not the intention to bring forward any legislative matters next week.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it that the Prime Minister's estimates would be the first item of business on Wednesday and I assume that if they were finished we would go back to national defence or whatever other department was under consideration.

Mr. Churchill: I think that will be the arrangement for next week, the estimates of external affairs, national defence and privy council and, if they are completed, the Department of Defence Production.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, September 11, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that consequent upon notification of a vacancy in the representation, given in this house on Friday, September 8, 1961, by the hon. member for Welland, and pursuant to section 10 of the House of Commons Act, I have addressed my warrant to the chief electoral officer for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member in the electoral district of Waterloo South.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROCUREMENT OF NEW JET TRAINER

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it has been decided to procure a jet basic training aircraft for the R.C.A.F. The new aircraft, the Canadair-built CL-41, will replace the piston engined, propeller driven Harvard trainers which have been in service in the R.C.A.F. for more than 20 years.

The R.C.A.F. has been considering the introduction of a basic jet trainer for several years, and has tested and evaluated most of the training aircraft available in the western world. The introduction of a basic jet training aircraft will enable the R.C.A.F. to provide all-through jet training. The great majority of the pilots are trained for initial duty with the Canadian air division in Europe and the R.C.A.F. air defence command in Canada. Squadrons in both these forces are soon to be equipped with ultra high speed and high flying aircraft, and it was considered essential that future pilot trainees be introduced to both high speed and high altitude flight at the earliest possible stage in their training.

The new trainer will not only introduce the pilot to these aspects of flight early in his flying training but will also enable him to have a greater amount of jet flying experience before he is introduced to operational aircraft.

The CL-41 is the newest and most modern jet trainer available. It is powered by a turbojet engine and, like all modern aircraft, has a tricycle undercarriage. It is pressurized and has an altitude capability of 44,500 feet. The CL-41 speed range is from 65 knots to speeds in excess of 400 knots. It is equipped with an automatic ejection seat. The instrumentation and performance characteristics of the CL-41 will greatly facilitate transition to operational aircraft, and will enable the R.C.A.F. to produce more efficiently the skilled pilots required to fly modern high performance aircraft. The new trainer will enter service in 1963.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING POSSESSION AND CONSUMPTION OF INTOXICANTS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-124, to amend the Indian Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, this bill follows upon the unanimous recommendation of the joint Senate and House of Commons committee on Indian affairs which was presented on July 8, 1961, with respect to the possession and consumption of intoxicants, or liquor as they are commonly referred to. The bill seeks to put into effect that unanimous recommendation by placing the native Indian people in the same position with respect to rights and responsibilities as other Canadians regarding liquor off the reserve, and seeks to allow for liquor on a reserve after the majority of the members of a particular band have voted in favour of it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE OF FARM-STORED WHEAT

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-125, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Mr. Herridge: Explain.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to take another step forward to bring about full equalization in respect of grain delivery opportunities to western producers by enabling the Canadian wheat board, if it felt it necessary, to purchase grain stored on farms.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Proposed Legislation

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING AMOUNTS AVAILABLE FOR LOANS AND RESEARCH

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1954:

1. To increase from one billion five hundred million dollars to two billion dollars the maximum charge on the consolidated revenue fund for direct loaning by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation;

2. To increase from five million dollars to ten million dollars the maximum charge on the consolidated revenue fund for housing research and community planning;

3. To increase from fifty million dollars to one hundred million dollars the maximum charge on the consolidated revenue fund for loans for university housing projects;

4. To increase from one hundred million dollars to two hundred million dollars the maximum charge on the consolidated revenue fund for loans for municipal sewage treatment projects.

Motion agreed to.

NATURAL RESOURCES

LEGISLATION RESPECTING ADMINISTRATION OF WESTERN SCHOOL LANDS

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confirm certain agreements entered into between the government of Canada and the governments of the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, dated 13th July, 1961, 13th July, 1961, and 14th July, 1961, respectively, respecting the administration and control of natural resources in those provinces in order to vest those provinces with full power to administer and dispose of the school lands and the school land funds referred to in the said agreements.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

TELEVISION SERVICE, MADAWASKA AND VICTORIA COUNTIES, N.B.

Motion No. 159—Mr. Robichaud:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the board of broadcast governors or the Department of Transport or the Minister of National Revenue and all other persons concerning the granting of a licence for a television satellite or a rebroadcasting station to provide television service to the French-speaking population of Madawaska and Victoria counties in New Brunswick.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this of course should be an order for return, as it covers several departments and does not involve a time limit. I have correspondence in my office in regard to this matter received during the past four years. I now have a file approximately a foot thick, and wonder whether this motion could stand until I have had an opportunity of discussing the situation with the hon. member with a view to shortening it.

Motion stands.

AIR TRANSPORT

C.P.A.—APPROVAL OF FLIGHT FROM WESTERN CANADA TO LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport in connection with the decision of the government to allow Canadian Pacific Airlines to fly between western Canada and London. Must the British government give its approval to this decision, and if so has this been done?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, following the decision of the government my colleague the minister of external affairs has received an aide memoir from the British government requesting further information and pointing out certain facts. This government is at the present time in the process of supplying this information to the British government.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Was the United Kingdom government consulted before this government announced its decision in so far as the new air route was concerned?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, we have followed the necessary practice and procedure which must be followed in such circumstances.

COMBINES

MEAT PACKING—RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING DISSOLVING OF MERGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister inform the house what action the government is taking following the recommendation of the restrictive trade practices commission that the government seek a court order to have a merger in the meat packing industry dissolved, or prevent further mergers taking place?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): As the release which accompanied the report when it was made public states, the minister is considering what further action should be taken in the light of the report, in accordance with the usual considerations that have to be kept in mind.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Can the minister say whether it is anticipated that action will be required by parliament to prevent such mergers taking place?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, it would be quite impossible and I think improper for me to comment on that until such time as a decision is reached on whether there is any contravention of the present law in the facts disclosed in the report.

INDUSTRY

SHIP OPERATING AND SHIPBUILDING—PRINTING OF REGULATIONS IN "VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the Minister of Transport indicated that he would be tabling the regulations respecting shipbuilding in the house today. Has that been done simply by sending them to the Clerk? If so, would the minister consider, in view of the great interest in these regulations, asking the house to have them printed either in Votes and Proceedings or in Hansard of today?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to move that these regulations be included in Votes and Proceedings of today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Have they already been tabled?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house concur in the suggestion that the regulations mentioned by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate be printed in today's Votes and Proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

OIL

OFF-SHORE LANDS—INQUIRY AS TO CONFLICT OVER JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the known desire of the minister to promote the spirit of goodwill among nations, governments and individuals, and in view of the fact that the government of British Columbia is reported awarding exploration rights to a million acres of offshore oil land to 12 companies, in opposition to the federal governments claim to jurisdiction over all off-shore acres, will the minister inform the house whether he has been able to effect a reconciliation of views with respect to this constitutional enigma?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments concerning my conciliatory abilities, but I think the subject matter to which he referred in his question would have to be decided by the courts.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question; I am not very quick on the draw this morning. Can the minister inform the house whether the government of Canada intends to take the initiative in bringing this matter before the supreme court?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, on the advice of the legal officers, has administered these territories on behalf of the government on the basis of the opinion that the sea bed and subsoil resources are vested in the crown in the right of Canada. This applies not only to the lands under territorial waters but also to the continental shelf. Any reversal of that position would depend upon the advice of the courts.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED EMERGENCY ARMY HEADQUARTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether he feels he is in a position to answer this question. If he is not in a position to answer today he may take it as notice. Can the minister pinpoint those target cities in Canada where it is proposed to establish emergency army headquarters, as was announced by the minister in his statement on Thursday last?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be in the public interest to make a statement as to exactly where those various headquarters are located at the present time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Everybody is going to know them.

AIRPORTS

FORT WILLIAM—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT OF RUNWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Owing to the lack of necessary runway modifications, I am informed that T.C.A. will not operate Vanguard aircraft through the lakehead. Is the minister in a position to advise the house when the necessary improvement of runways at the Fort William airport will be carried out which will enable the more modern and larger aircraft to serve the lakehead area?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to give an answer to my hon. friend tomorrow or the day after.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REPORT OF DR. CLARK—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Along with his many other duties has he had time to complete his study of the Clark report and, if so, what action will be taken as a result thereof?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the study is still going on very, very seriously.

Mr. Pickersgill: Very, very slowly.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister tell the house whether we may expect some announcement by the minister before the end of the present session of parliament that the study has been completed?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Whenever there is anything to be made public concerning the study of the Clark report it will be announced in the house.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO SHORTAGE OF SKILLED WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Matheson (Leeds): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question. In view of the recently reported sharp decrease in immigration and the large emigration of skilled workers from Canada last year, can the Minister of Labour advise the house whether this trend has further aggravated the shortage of skilled workers in Canada?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would have to look into the situation in order to answer that question. If the hon. member will put his question on the order paper I will be glad to supply the information for him.

[Mr. Badanai.]

INDUSTRY

S.S. VACATIONLAND—INQUIRY RESPECTING IMPORTATION OF FERRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he has had an opportunity to look into the question which I put to him on Friday.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I do not have the answer ready. I will deal with that tomorrow.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST BY FISHERMEN FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked me if I had replied to a communication sent me on August 24 by the secretary treasurer of the federation of fishermen of Newfoundland.

I replied to this letter on September 7, telling the secretary of our concern over the low fish catches and the fire damage over considerable areas, and also that the St. John's office of my department is carrying out a special statistical survey, the information from which should be available by Friday of this week. I also informed him that on Monday of next week, September 18, the chairman of the fisheries prices support board will be going to St. John's to discuss these problems in detail with the federation of fishermen, the provincial authorities and others. I also said that at the present time I do not consider it necessary to set up a formal committee, but such may be desirable after I have received the full report.

I should add that my colleague the Solicitor General and the hon. member for St. John's East have also been in communication with me regarding the urgency of this situation and have requested my continued sympathetic consideration of the problem.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to put a supplementary question. Can the minister assure us that the government will give to this problem the same urgent consideration that is being given to the short crop because of the drought in western Canada, in view of the fact that the conditions are exactly similar?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think it is fair to say that this government gives sympathetic consideration to problems on a basis of equality regardless of where they arise in the country.

PUBLICATIONS

ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—REPRESENTATIONS BY U.S. GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the hon. member for Kootenay West inquired regarding representations respecting the O'Leary commission report having been received from the United States. On August 4 the United States ambassador acquainted the government with the views of his government in this regard.

SUPPLY

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Chown in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

111. Departmental administration, $1,911,211.

LEGISLATION

The Speaker of the Senate—

190. Allowance in lieu of residence, $3,000.

PRIVY COUNCIL

312. Payment, notwithstanding anything in the Financial Administration Act or the Senate and House of Commons Act respecting the independence of parliament, to each member of the Queen's privy council for Canada who is a minister for whom no salary or allowance in addition to the allowances under section 33 and section 44 of the Senate and House of Commons Act is provided (the acceptance of which shall not render such member ineligible or disqualify him as a member of the House of Commons) of a salary of $7,500 per annum and pro rata for any period less than a year, $7,500.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

453. Departmental administration, $2,550,941.

The Deputy Chairman: We will now proceed to the consideration of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, vote No. 76.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

76. Departmental administration, $6,924,915.

Mr. Mandziuk: When the committee rose at five o'clock on Friday last I had just completed my remarks concerning the Prime Minister's challenge to Russia to allow free elections in the countries under her domination, and the undiplomatic reaction thereto. Today we are bombarded with propaganda which is beamed at us and is intended to scare us into complete inaction. This propaganda gives us the impression that the whole western world, and the NATO countries in particular want war. We are told everyone wants war except Russia. Russia resumes nuclear tests, and we are told it is because of the threats to her security from the western world.

However, this propaganda makes no mention of the three years of fruitless effort by Great Britain and the United States to reach an agreement on the control or abolition of such tests. During those three years there have been 340 meetings and 340 "nyets" to every proposal made by the western powers. This propaganda machine makes no mention of the failure of the ten-nation disarmament commission, of which Canada is a member. This commission, too, failed because of the "nyets" to every proposal by the western powers. We certainly deplore Mr. Kennedy's decision to resume nuclear tests, but who should stand condemned by the world for having resumed such tests first and who, in the last few days, has exploded about half a dozen such bombs?

What is our hope for the future? Canada has made every effort to date, and the Canadian government is pressing to take every step in order to secure world peace. What appears to be the last resort is the charter of the United Nations, whose primary purpose is the maintenance of international peace and security. The Prime Minister said on September 1, while addressing the Canadian Bar Association in Winnipeg, "We must be ready to make use of the United Nations".

The setting up of the United Nations is the world's second attempt to ban wars and guarantee peace and freedom for all peoples. The first attempt in this century consisted of the league of nations. The league of nations redrew the boundaries of the various nations of the world; it freed some nations while it enslaved some others. But imperfect as that international organization was, it was scuttled by the two greedy conquerors and dictators, Hitler and Mussolini.

The United Nations today faces a like danger. What evidence of that have we? We have evidence in attacks upon the Secretary General of the United Nations, Dag Hammarskjold; an intention to neutralize or completely destroy the prestige and powers of that great office which the United Nations at its inception gave this official. Second, we have no financial or moral assistance from communist bloc nations to support our efforts to keep the peace in other parts of the world. I have in mind the Gaza strip and the Congo.

There is a feeling in the country that world tension cannot be settled by two individuals, even if a meeting between Mr. Kennedy and

Mr. Khrushchev should come about. What guarantee have we that this arrangement would last? We must still go back to the United Nations, because if this great body cannot assure peace in the world, nothing else can.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, since coming to parliament in 1949 I have always followed the debates on external affairs with the utmost interest. However, not until today have I had the temerity to participate in a debate on foreign policy. I had no intention of entering this debate until last Friday, when I was impressed by the point made by a number of hon. members that the situation which faces us today is so grave that every hon. member has a responsibility to his constituents and to his country to put forward whatever ideas he may have on this subject.

To my mind the present world situation is analogous to two young people in hot rods rushing toward each other at terrific speed, each trying to make the other "chicken out". In such a situation the least we can expect is an accident. I do not pretend to speak for my constituents. I do not know how they feel about the present world situation. It is my opinion that most of them are not too well informed on what is going on in the world at large, and I know that many of them are too busy fighting fires and too concerned with eking out a bare existence to be able to give much thought to these matters. I rather suspect that this applies to the majority of people in my province, and perhaps throughout the nation. It is probably true of the majority of the nations in the Soviet bloc and of the three billion inhabitants of the world whose fate lies in the hands of those few people who have to work out the relationships among various nations. Our constituents for the most part are content to leave these matters to us, and they look to us for direction and leadership. In my opinion that is all the more reason why each one of us in this parliament should make whatever contribution we can.

Several hon. members have referred to the need for a critical analysis of western foreign policy. I should like to make it clear that the views which I am about to express are entirely my own. Looking back over the years since world war II it is very apparent that, with one or two exceptions, western policy has been dictated by events, and the events have been dictated or engineered by Moscow and Peking. This is an indisputable fact and we would do well to ask ourselves why this should be so.

[Mr. Mandziuk.]

In my opinion there are several reasons, and I think it behoves us to take an honest look at them and do what we can to correct them. Western policy has not been forward looking, in my opinion, because it has been too much concerned with preserving the status quo. This kind of thinking has coloured western policy by a mental attitude that is based on what I believe is a false concept, which is that everything would be all right in the world if all other peoples and nations were only just like us. This kind of thinking has blinded us to our own faults and failures; it is responsible for our self-righteous attitudes, our apathies, our indifference to the exploitations that have gone on in other countries, and the superiority complexes which we have developed and which are so apparent to other nations.

It seems to me that we in the west have very much to be sorry for in our dealings with other nations, and we should realize that our failures and weaknesses have contributed to the crisis with which we are now faced. In that regard we must bear our full share of responsibility. This should be a very humbling thought.

Perhaps this same mental block has blinded our diplomats to the basic fact that the present social order cannot endure in its present form. In the words of the poet, "The old order changeth, giving place to new". When one thinks of it, the present social order is not a very good one, when we realize that two billion human beings go to bed hungry every night. It is not even a very good social order for many Canadians.

There are many in my own province and particularly in my own constituency who are going to be faced with a very lean and hungry winter having regard to the bare necessities of food, shelter and clothing. It does not have to be that way. There is in the world enough for everybody's needs. However, we have not had the will to come to grips with the evils that prevent an equal distribution of the necessities of life. Hence there are in the world today two billion people who are not satisfied with the present order and who desire a change. There are also a number of committed communists who are dedicated to changing that order. There is therefore no doubt at all in my mind that change must and will come. The status quo cannot be preserved. The only question is this. What kind of new order shall we have in its place? Will it be an order shaped by the forces of communism, or will it be shaped by what we call our democratic ideas and values?

The democratic forces in the world today are numerically weak. Of the three billion people who inhabit the world, more than one billion are behind the iron curtain and subscribe to the communist way of life. Another one billion are undecided and uncommitted, and they are not satisfied with our present order. Neither are they satisfied with the order which the communists present as an alternative. Then there are some three quarters of a billion people who profess some form of allegiance to democracy, but most of this is lip service. We do not really practice what we preach, not even in this parliament.

I think one of the reasons we are faced with this crisis today is that the west has not faced up realistically to these facts. It is true that we have tried to modify the capitalist system to various forms of a welfare state or some sort of socialism. However, the trouble is that these are but different forms of materialism, and the materialism of the left is no answer to the materialism of the right. Neither does it provide a satisfactory alternative as the basis of a social order. But in a clash between these two, the materialism of the right is too soft and too self indulgent to withstand the discipline of the left. A new order must be built at some date, and it must be built on moral values. If we do this, the material needs of life will fall into their proper place and take care of themselves.

It seems to me also that another reason the west is so much on the defensive is that we have never bothered to understand what an ideology really is. We shun the word, and when we use it we seldom do so in its proper context. The communists have an ideology. What does that mean? It means first of all that they have an overriding world objective, and they have summed it up in a very neat phrase, namely that the Soviet internationale shall be the human race. The conquest of the world is their overriding objective. Not only have they an objective, however; they have a global plan and a global strategy for achieving it. In addition to that, they have an unswerving dedication and commitment to attain that objective. No sacrifice is too great, whether it be of money, material or even life itself.

What is the west's overriding objective? What plan do we have for the world? What strategy do we have? To what are we committed as individual Canadians or as a nation? We know that Mr. Khrushchev is committed to the victory of communism. The Berlin crisis is just another thrust for world power on his part, and it is the greatest one yet.

However, if we are realistic I think we must expect more and even greater ones to follow. He has many objectives. The present objective, of course, is to mobilize our fears. That is objective No. 1. Objective No. 2 is to focus our attention on the Berlin issue itself, apart from the true issue of the survival of freedom throughout the world. It is true that his testing of the atom bomb is having some results in preying on our fears and building up the kind of pressure that tends to push us into negotiations which he so dearly desires.

Perhaps we shall have to do it. However, let us not fool ourselves. Any attempt to negotiate with Mr. Khrushchev on his terms or to discuss his aims on his terms will be a victory for Mr. K. Personally I do not see what basis exists for negotiation with Mr. Khrushchev or any of the communists. They do not believe in God. They subscribe to no moral code. They stigmatize religious faith as the opiate of the people. Lenin himself has declared that foreign policy must be based on dodges, tricks and untruth. Mr. Stalin has confirmed this declaration, and Mr. Khrushchev has done so as well. What basis then exists for negotiation? What value can we place on any agreement which might be arrived at? In his resumption of atomic tests Mr. Khrushchev himself has already proved to us how little reliance can be placed on his word and his pledges.

It seems to me, then, that at best negotiation could be but a salvage operation or some form of delaying tactics. At worst it could be a compromise, and there should be no compromise with evil. I think this points up another defect in our western policy or our western attitude toward foreign policy. There is about it too much of what I would call Micawberism. We are always waiting and hoping that something is going to turn up which is going to relieve tension and provide a satisfactory way out of this fatal clash between the two ideologies.

However, if we are honest with ourselves we should know that nothing is going to turn up. The objectives of the communist world today are the same as they were 40 years ago. They change their tactics from time to time and they change their strategy, because they are flexible to the various changes in the world situation. However, there has never been any change in their long term objective. Mr. Khrushchev has made that fact abundantly clear on many occasions. Even if something happened to Mr. Khrushchev himself there would still be someone with the same objective, to take his place; or if Russia by any chance could be won over we would still have the Chinese republic to deal with.

I think there is another alternative which should be explored which so far has not been mentioned during this debate. That alternative is for the west to take the offensive. I have never seen a victory won through a series of retreats. However gradual and slight the retreats may be, they are nevertheless retreats. On the other hand, when Mr. Khrushchev has been faced with positive alternatives he has been forced to retreat. I therefore feel the west should assume the offensive in demanding first the unification of Germany, and second, a free vote supervised by the United Nations for all the satellite countries which have been swallowed behind the iron curtain.

I suggest we should not stop there, but should then call upon Mr. Khrushchev and his counterpart Mao Tse-tung to unite with the west in building a new world order free from fear, want and greed. This should be a new social order which under God will make for better human relationship, for unselfish co-operation, for cleaner business, cleaner politics and for the elimination of political, industrial and racial antagonisms. Surely this is an opportunity through which the west can seize the initiative and issue a challenge to the communist world. If order is ever to come out of chaos in national and international affairs some nation must at some time produce new leadership free from the bondage of fear, rising above ambition, and flexible to divine guidance. Such a nation would be at peace within itself and a peace maker within the international family.

Mr. Chairman, it is my conviction that Canada can be that nation. If we as members of parliament, to whom the people are looking for direction and leadership, possess the moral courage to speak out and say what we actually believe, and the guts to stand up and fight in order to give those things to our nation and the world, then Canada might well lead the world out of its present chaos.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, this morning I should like to confine my remarks in this debate to two subjects. I should first of all like to make some observations regarding the future of United Nations, and second concerning the present crisis in Berlin and NATO.

First of all regarding the United Nations, during the last few years there have been many changes, as all members appreciate. Having had the opportunity and honour of attending the United Nations in various capacities in the last number of years—I first went there as a parliamentary observer, at which time the hon. member for Essex East was vice-chairman of the delegation—I can assure you the changes have been many. When I attended its deliberations originally something over 50 countries had membership in the United Nations, while there are now almost 100.

Accompanying this change in the membership of the United Nations have been a great many attendant problems. I think all will agree that the United Nations is the best organization that man has been able to devise to date, and that it must continue its operations in the future.

There are many dangers which confront the United Nations at the present time. There are many faults which exist in the United Nations itself. However, I suggest there is no advantage in acting like an ostrich, with our heads in the sand, pretending these faults do not exist. I suggest the best approach is to recognize them and attempt to correct them.

The first and principal danger to the United Nations is the present attack by the Soviet union in respect to its organization. I suggest one does not have to look far to see the reason for this. The United Nations has quite clearly on many occasions frustrated the ultimate designs of the Soviet union. It was quite clear at the fifteenth general assembly last year that one of the principal objectives of the Soviet delegates was to destroy or at least emasculate the United Nations organization. This was attempted in several ways, first of all by personal attack on the secretary general, Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, and second by suggesting changes in the structure of the United Nations.

The personal attacks on the secretary general were not successful last year. Toward the end of that general assembly, I believe in March, a vote was taken, the details of which are not important but which in effect turned out to be one of confidence in the secretary general, with the only delegates voting against him being those of the Soviet bloc. I feel safe in stating that so far these attacks upon the secretary general by the Soviet union and satellite delegates have been unsuccessful.

However, that does not mean they will not be successful in the future, because the Soviet union, as I am sure all members know, is a very determined country. Time does not mean the same thing to Russians as it means to the people of the west. We are accustomed to accomplishing objectives within a matter of months or a few years. On the contrary, the Russian concept of time certainly appears to be much different. There is ample indication that the Russians are prepared to wait five, ten or fifteen years, and perhaps longer, to attain their ultimate objectives. Last year no horses were spared, so to speak, in making these attacks upon the secretary general. Even when misprints appeared in United Nations documents Soviet delegates suggested they were manifestations of the inefficiency of the secretary general. That is an example of the type of thing which occurred last year.

The other principal method employed by the Soviet delegates involved attacks upon and suggested changes in the structure of the United Nations. The suggested changes gained certain sympathy among other delegates to the United Nations chiefly because of the great enlargement in the number of organizations within the United Nations and because they had not expanded as perhaps they should have. I will have more to say in that regard in a few moments.

The suggestion by the delegates of the Soviet union involved a tripartite leadership or "Troika", a three headed affair much like Cerberus in mythology the three headed dog who guarded the gates to Hades. This suggestion sounded very logical, there being one head from the west, one from the Soviet bloc and one from the neutrals, whoever they may be. Under this set-up there would be three secretary generals each with a veto power. Recently, Mr. Khrushchev informed Mr. Sulzberger that was not the meaning of the suggestion. However, in view of Mr. Khrushchev's recent statement that the Soviet union would never be first to resume nuclear testing, I do not think much weight can be placed on his undertakings.

The effect of a three headed organization for all branches of the United Nations is pretty obvious. The secretary general's duty is to implement resolutions passed by the general assembly. In regard to the establishment of three secretaries general, I do not think I need go further than point out that the difficulties would be almost insurmountable in view of the difficulty experienced on the part of one secretary general in implementing some resolutions in the past. If we had three secretaries general attempting to implement resolutions, I suggest the Russian delegates would be successful in accomplishing their intentions, and completely stultifying the work of the United Nations. If this three headed monster were to be duplicated in all branches and organizations of the United Nations, I suggest the chaotic results are very obvious.

The Soviet union has not succeeded so far, but that does not mean it will not succeed; because the election of a new secretary general comes up before long and the Soviet union, with veto power in the security council, will not agree to the appointment of a secretary general. They can hold up the appointment until they get their own way or partly their own way, and that is a very great danger to the United Nations at the moment.

The second matter I mentioned in this regard is the question of United Nation's finances. This has become most serious. Last spring the United Nations came within hours of closing its doors because financial arrangements could not be made. Probably the public is not aware of this, and I should like to take a few moments to deal briefly with the subject.

The legislative processes of the United Nations are somewhat different from those in this parliament or elsewhere. You have the strange situation in the United Nations that the general assembly can pass a resolution and it will be accepted by a two thirds majority, but at the same time there are no financial arrangements to carry out the resolution. The arrangements are made in advance each year by the fifth committee reporting to the general assembly. This peculiar arrangement, where resolutions are passed with the finances to carry them out not provided for, has caused a great deal of trouble in the UN. The particular difficulty in this regard has to do with the peace-keeping arrangements of the United Nations. The United Nations emergency force in the Middle East has had its problems. The trouble is that those peace-keeping arrangements are not regular budgetary items in the UN. Arrangements were made to provide finances for the United Nations emergency force, and those were not contributed to by all the countries. The Russian excuse was that it was an illegal undertaking, and they have never contributed.

The present peace-keeping arrangement of the United Nations which has been in the public eye a great deal is the question of the Congo. Again we ran into the problem of how to finance this particular arrangement. To date the results in the Congo have been a great success for the United Nations. That force cannot be continued unless some permanent financial arrangement is made. In this regard and it is no secret at all, that France has said she will not contribute to this arrangement, and so have certain other states. The Soviet union, of course, says it will not, and certain other countries have also said that they will not contribute to it because they felt the money required was too much, they could not afford it. Many other reasons have been given.

It is a very serious matter, Mr. Chairman. If permanent financial arrangements cannot be made for the UN it will not be able to carry out its peace-keeping function. If this is not done the United Nations might just as well close its doors. If I may say so, Mr. Chairman, last year this temporary disaster was averted thanks to Canada. We came very close to having to close the doors of the UN. The secretary general had used up all the cash on hand to carry on the Congo operations and he had borrowed from various other UN organizations. A temporary arrangement was made.

At the present time, again thanks to the initiative of Canada, a 15-man committee representing 15 countries is studying the whole question of how to provide finances for the UN operations, including the operation that is going on at the present time, but it is going to be a very difficult problem to work out. Many countries feel they cannot afford it, and other countries will not contribute because they have no desire to see the United Nations succeed in these fields.

There is a great danger here again. It is well known that the United States and certain other large countries have agreed to "pick up the tab", so to speak, for a number of these efforts. Of course many people feel that that would play right into the hands of the Soviet union, because if western countries finance those operations then the Soviet can turn around and say, "He who pays the piper calls the tune, and we told you so all along." This is something that I think should be avoided. Every country in the United Nations should contribute its own reasonable share to the conduct of those operations of the United Nations.

Now, strange as it may seem, a number of countries of the United Nations are not worried about certain large western countries footing the bill. The representative of one country, I shall not say which one, said to me, "Well, we do not see anything wrong in the United States paying the bill for this United Nations operation. After all, they supply the money and we supply the ideas". The remark was not made in jest; it was made in all seriousness, much to my surprise. But this is a thing we have to watch. In any event, the financial question before the United Nations is a very serious one, and something which should be watched with the greatest care.

Another great danger to the United Nations is the question of expansion of the councils. I refer to the security council and the economic and social council. The security council consists of 11 members, five of them being permanent and six elected, of whom three are elected each year. The economic and social council has 18 members. These councils have not been expanded since the United Nations first came into being.

As I have already pointed out, we now have almost 100 countries in the United Nations. Naturally the newer countries of Asia and Africa feel that they should have adequate representation on those councils. The western countries, Canada included, have taken the lead on various occasions to try to expand those councils or inflate them in some way to provide quite adequate representation of Asians and Africans without giving up seats already held by the countries of Latin America, the western world, and so on. The Soviet union has steadfastly refused to permit expansion of those councils on the ground that it will not agree until the credentials of the representatives of the Peoples' Republic of China have been accepted by the credentials committee, and in effect communist China has a seat in the UN.

At first glance you would think that the Asian and African countries in the UN would be irritated by the Russian stand, refusing to give them adequate representation on those councils, but I have found at the United Nations that things are not always what they seem. Instead of being annoyed at the Soviet union over this, those countries have exerted great pressure on the west to dilute western representation on the councils and give up seats to the Asian and African countries. As a temporary measure this may seem reasonable, but again Soviet intransigence is evident. On the last two or three occasions temporary compromise arrangements have been made to give additional seats to the Asian and African countries at the expense of western representation. I think the Soviet union know this very well. By continuing to refuse to allow expansion of those councils they are being very effective; their objective of reducing the number of representatives of the west and of countries friendly to the west on those two councils is being achieved. This is something that should be watched with the greatest care.

Of course the western countries which dominated the United Nations when it was first formed no longer do so. It used to be that the Soviet and some of her allies and friends from time to time came close to mounting what is known at the United Nations as a "blocking third". That is, any important resolution before the general assembly must have a two thirds vote. Now the situation is that very often the western nations have dfficulty in acquiring a blocking third for resolutions put up by Asian and African countries, and often supported by the Soviet union. You may say, "What do you want with a blocking third?" Resolutions put up from time to time by other countries may be very good, but from time to time some of those resolutions are by no means the wisest, and this brings in the next two points that I should like to touch on briefly. I refer to two broad influences which are at work in the United Nations all the time. One is the anti-colonial influence and the other is the cold war influence. These two influences seem to permeate virtually every debate and every resolution at the United Nations.

Anti-colonial feeling we can all understand. Every one of us can understand why people in Asia and Africa should have a strong anti-colonial feeling which reflects against the western powers. That we can understand, but often this influence is not manifested by means of logic at all but rather by emotion. In due course this situation will probably clear up, but at the present time it presents a very serious danger to the United Nations.

I should like to give a brief example of this influence. There is a resolution before the United Nations involving a plan put forward by the United States called, I believe, "Africa, a plan for economic and political development". This emphasis on this plan has been somewhat altered to overemphasize political development, and the particular emphasis has been that of setting target dates for the independence of a number of new states. On the face of it that sounds fine, but for very obvious reasons—for instance, to avoid a situation such as arose in the Congo—it is not desirable to set a specific date until the people in the area are able to take over the government of their country themselves.

The United Kingdom, of course, has been remarkably successful in this field, and it has been explained at the United Nations that the matter of target dates is not directed at the United Kingdom but rather at certain other countries. That may well be the case but once target dates are fixed they must be accepted by all and these are very impractical for the reasons I have pointed out. A number of countries in Africa and elsewhere have pointed out to me privately that they realize this is an impractical idea, but one of the less responsible countries has brought it forward and these governments naturally have to pay attention to the views of the electorate at home or, if there is no electorate, the people who live in the country. The result is that one country in Africa makes a matter an emotional issue on anti-colonial grounds and these other countries virtually have to go along, even though they really do not think the idea is sensible or practical.

That is the type of thing we have to watch there. A great many of the resolutions at the United Nations have become more and more dominated by emotional feeling rather than by logic. I think this is a matter that will clear up in due course, but at the present time it is a very great danger.

Together with the growth of the organization itself, we also seem to have had a growth of long, repetitious speeches and other things. This again will have to be dealt with, and perhaps some time when the United Nations organization is streamlined it will be possible to do something to restrict the number of times a person can speak in a debate. This will have to be worked out, but the present practice tends to bog down the work of the United Nations. People tend to lose interest, and I am afraid that sometimes a very bad appearance is presented to the public whose support is necessary for the continuance of the United Nations. I am sorry to say also that some countries seem to have personalities representing them whose views do not always accord with those of their governments. There is a tendency for a number of so-called personalities at the United Nations to put on shows of exhibitionism which certainly in no way assist the United Nations.

The last thing I should like to mention in this regard is the question of the cold war influence. Again, this is an influence that interferes with virtually every subject that comes before the United Nations. You will find that the cold war always creeps in in some way. You will find that some countries always vote one way and other countries always vote the other way, while a large number of countries will never stand up and be counted at all. We have seen some evidence outside the United Nations recently of how a number of neutral countries have behaved. I wonder what would have been said by some of these countries if the United States had been the country to start nuclear tests again, but when another country did it nothing much was said in that regard.

I have other comments on the cold war influence which I will make later. As I have pointed out, a number of countries will not stand up and be counted. It has been said that Canada and a number of other countries should lead a crusade for world peace and get things started. For goodness sake, no one has tried harder to do this than the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Let me give one example. Last year Canada had a moderate, sensible resolution concerning disarmament before the United Nations. Hardly anybody disagreed with its substance even publicly, although one or two said privately that they could not agree publicly although they agreed privately. When we tried to get a vote on it we could not do so, because such a large number of countries felt that the Soviet union did not approve and therefore they would not even vote on whether a vote should be taken on the resolution.

That is what you encounter at the United Nations. It is very frustrating to find that many countries will not do anything unless it has the approval of both the United States and the Soviet union. I do not wish to present too gloomy a view of the United Nations, but I think these are home truths that must be faced, and if the organization is to succeed we must find some way to get around these difficulties.

In the remainder of my remarks I should like to deal briefly with the question of the present crisis in Berlin and the subject of NATO. In particular I should like to refer to the stand of the New Democratic party on this subject. As everyone knows, this is a matter of great importance to everybody not only in Canada but in the world, and for that reason I think the political parties of Canada should make very clear what are their stands. The stand of the government party is quite clear, as is that of the official opposition, and they are substantially in agreement. The New Democratic party does not seem quite as clear or quite as certain.

There are a number of things I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members, and perhaps they will be clarified later by one of the members of the New Democratic party. In a nutshell, their policy would seem to be NATO if necessary but not necessarily NATO. The stand of the New Democratic party has been set forth quite clearly in party resolutions and by the hon. member for Kootenay West in his remarks in the house.

In this regard I think it is quite important that everyone should realize fully what the stand of those who support the new party has been in the past. I do not like going back into ancient history. There is no point in doing that, but if you do not go too far back into the past, say only to the end of world war II, I think such references are in order. I should like to refer to an editorial that appeared in the Montreal Gazette on January 24, 1955. It is headed "Canada's Bevanly Host", which is a reference, of course, to other things in the past. The editorial refers to the policy of the then C.C.F. party and reads in part as follows:

> In fact, varying degrees of opposition have appeared within the C.C.F. to nearly every step taken since the end of the second world war to resist communist expansion.
> When the Marshall plan was inaugurated, it was officially condemned by the Manitoba convention of the C.C.F. as being "framed to provide capitalists with markets, rather than to help the people of Europe".
> When the United States supported the Atlantic pact (out of which NATO has grown) the provincial convention of the C.C.F. in British Columbia passed a resolution opposing "any further expenditures on arms". After the Korean war broke out, the C.C.F. premier of Saskatchewan, Hon. T. C. Douglas, said that the United States was trying to use the United Nations to protect the interests of certain oil corporations, notably Standard Oil. Under such circumstances the people of Saskatchewan were being called on "to send their sons to be slaughtered in foreign fields."

I think it is appropriate to put these things on the record. I believe people are entitled to know just what they are.

Referring to the policy of the New Democratic party, I recall that the hon. member for Kootenay West put this on the record at pages 8077 and 8078 of Hansard for September 7, 1961. The appropriate part of the quotation is at page 8078, and reads as follows:

> It therefore opposes Canada's—

This refers to nuclear weapons.

> —troops being supplied with such weapons at home or abroad. At present, except for those nations which have independently developed atomic capacity, neither NATO itself nor its members individually possess or control nuclear warheads. Should they do so, Canada must make it clear that it cannot remain in the alliance.

He went on to say that Canada should press for a demilitarized zone and certain other things. I believe these remarks have been dealt with adequately by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Essex East. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee with repetitious remarks. However, I should like to say that the government's view on this matter was made clear at the United Nations last year, in remarks made by myself. I should like to put on the record a brief quotation from these remarks, which were made during the debate in the first committee in relation to the Irish resolution concerning the dissemination of nuclear weapons. The quotation is as follows:

> ...if no steps are taken toward disarmament—if, indeed, we do not have even a beginning to serious negotiations on this subject—no country will be content to sit by in the hope that good will alone will prevent the widespread dissemination of the weapons. For our part, I must say quite clearly that Canada would not be able to accept this state of affairs for very long. We have worked and we will continue to work with every resource at our command to achieve an agreement on disarmament which would include provisions to deal with the frightening problem of nuclear weapons. If, however, there is no significant progress in this field in the immediate future, we will reconsider our position on the temporary measures which are proposed in this resolution.

I understand, therefore, that the policy of the new party is that under no circumstances must Canada ever be supplied with nuclear weapons for its troops at home, abroad or for NATO. The government stand on this matter has been made quite clear. At the present time we say no, but if events should take place in the world that might require these weapons then the government would have to give reconsideration to that position. To belong to an organization like NATO, which is a defensive organization against the pressures of the Soviet union, and say we will belong to this organization only so long as certain arms are not acquired by it is like using that old expression: "Mother, may I go out to swim? Yes, my darling daughter; hang your clothes on a hickory limb, but don't go near the water." To put it another way, the situation would be the same as if one's neighbour were attacking you with a shotgun and the father said, "My son, go out and defend the family back yard, but don't use a shotgun because it might cause some damage to the trees; use a bow and arrow." This is substantially what this policy means.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but his time has expired.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a very few more remarks to make—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the committee would want the parliamentary secretary to conclude his statement.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the committee give its unanimous consent to allowing the parliamentary secretary to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nesbitt: I should like to express my thanks to the committee for permission to continue. I will try to make my remarks very brief.

In this regard, I should like to refer very briefly to the remarks of the hon. member for Peterborough. I do not wish to be accused of taking the hon. member's remarks out of context, and I shall most certainly attempt not to do that. However, there are one or two observations made by the hon. member which are pertinent. On page 8090 of Hansard for September 7 of this year I find the following statement:

> However, we have no right to expect that West Berlin can be continued as a means of subverting the East German government. If it becomes a matter of helping to oppress people by our foreign policy we are going to be in serious difficulties indeed, as this will mean real war.

Regardless of the interpretation one might put on that particular observation, I think it is safe to say that it would seem clear, in my mind at least, that the hon. member for Peterborough feels the western nations are in some way trying to oppress the poor people of East Germany who, of course, have no means of defending themselves. This may be a wrong interpretation, but I feel it is the one that must be put on these remarks. Later on the same page the hon. member is reported to have said:

> Mr. Khrushchev is not Hitler. He does not have the power.

I do not know about that. Perhaps the hon. member's source of information is different from mine, but it would certainly seem to me that Mr. Khrushchev has a considerable amount of power. Then on page 8091 the hon. member is reported to have said, referring to NATO:

> We agree with that and we agree that it has played a real part.

He used the past tense. Perhaps nothing was meant by putting this in the past tense, but I feel no other interpretation can be put on those remarks but that NATO has been valuable in the past and will not be of much value in the future. A little later on the same page the hon. member is reported as saying:

> On the other hand when we see the resumption of nuclear tests—

He is referring to NATO.

> —we cannot see this as defensive at all—

I find difficulty in following that reasoning in view of the fact that it was the Soviet union, as everyone knows, that resumed the testing. I think everyone would agree that it would be the rankest folly if the United States authorities felt tests of a certain nature, underground ones, should not be carried out if the Soviet union were gaining a military advantage by its renewed tests. These remarks by themselves perhaps are not too important, but I think they do reflect a state of mind which must exist among a number of members of the new party. The hon. member has specifically designated himself as a new party man and not a member of the C.C.F. I believe, therefore, the public is really entitled to further clarification of the actual stand of that party. Certainly the impression one would gather is that, to say the least, there is only lukewarm support for NATO's past performance, and if the chips were down there might not be very much support at all.

Remarks were made by some other hon. members referring to Canada in two ways. One reference was to Canada's role as the linchpin between the Soviet union and the United States. Another was that Canada should be the waiter at the door holding the door open for the two to go back and forth between each other's dining rooms. While I do not for a moment question the sincerity of these suggestions, I think there is a certain misconception. The misconception is that Canada is a neutral country, and I should hope not in the connotation "neutral" has acquired lately. We are a member of NATO. Under the present circumstances I do not really know how anybody could expect the Soviet union, for instance, to accept Canada as a linchpin or neutral country in some sort of negotiation between the United States and the Soviet union. Canada is not a neutral country. I do not think Russia would be prepared to accept us in that role, any more than we would be prepared to accept Rumania in the same role. This misconception that Canada is neutral is something that I think goes back to past history.

As I understand it, at the time the Leader of the Opposition was making his very famous and excellent contribution to the United Nations, Canada and Norway were among the countries which played a very active part in negotiations at that organization. At that time the membership of the United Nations was relatively small; it was about half the size it is now, and was very heavily dominated by western nations. Countries like Canada and Norway had the reputation of making good, sound, sensible suggestions. At that time the Soviet union was undoubtedly prepared to have Canada make certain suggestions.

However, the picture is quite different now. There are all these new, independent countries in the world, and a great many of them have varying degrees of neutralist views ranging to the extreme. These are the countries to which the Soviet union now looks, I think, rather than to ourselves; because clearly we are a part of NATO and it is very difficult for us to retain this role any longer in view of changed world conditions.

I do not think there is very much point in any of us living in a fool's paradise and thinking we have this position when in fact we probably no longer have it. I am not suggesting that Canada's good offices and Canada's suggestions are not acceptable at the United Nations. They are; very much so. At the United Nations our advice is constantly sought on many things. However, I do not think we still have the public role that perhaps we had a number of years ago, for the reasons I have suggested.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Niagara Falls, when making her speech the other night, made reference to the Scotch song, "I Know Where I'm Going". The hon. member suggested that perhaps we do not know where we are going. I may agree with that to a certain extent. But certainly the Soviet union knows where it is going. Ever since 1919 the ultimate objectives of the Soviet union have been abundantly clear. They are communisation of the world. There has never been any denying that. It is quite true that the paths to attain that objective change as circumstances change from day to day and year to year, but the ultimate objective is the same.

I remember one little conversation I overheard in New York between two delegates, who of course shall be nameless. One delegate was teasing a delegate of the Soviet group countries. He said, "I hear you are having a little trouble with China lately". This was last fall. The other delegate said, "Yes, that is quite true; we are having a little argument with China. But I do not know what you are happy about, because after all the only argument is the best way to liquidate you people". I think frankness such as that is at least something that can be appreciated.

Dictatorships always have the advantage of being on the offensive. Democracies always have to move more slowly. We are on the defensive. The Soviet union has a planned objective and everything is directed toward that objective. They do startling and dynamic things. Certainly the leader of the Soviet union at the present time has all the showmanship abilities of the late P. T. Barnum; there are no two ways about that. Also, the speed with which the Soviet union acts and what it does are impressive and appeal to a great many neutralist countries.

It is no use fooling ourselves about this. The Soviet union, because of its achievements and quick action, gets a certain amount of fear, but it also gets respect and a certain amount of admiration from these neutralist countries. It has always been the same through history when there has been a society that is aggressive and dynamic. That has appealed to some people.

As the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo pointed out a few minutes ago, this is something we have to make clear to this country and to all the western world. It is no use just saying, "The Soviet union is wrong and we are right". These neutralist countries are not buying it. The Prime Minister has repeatedly pointed out on different occasions that the west must get a positive plan to sell to the rest of the world. As yet this has not been taken up. I hope that Canada, under the leadership of the Prime Minister, will continue to press for this and that the west will come up with a dynamic policy that will be bought by these other countries. It is no use just being on the defensive all the time, because if we are, I am afraid the ultimate results are clear.

Let me again refer to the question of Berlin. One hon. member said, "It is no use going to war over Berlin". That is quite true; it is not, over Berlin. I remember, as I am sure other hon. members of the house remember, the years 1936, 1937 and 1938. We saw Hitler coming along. First it was the Rhineland, then Austria, Czechoslovakia and Poland. It was not over Poland as such that Britain and France went to war with Germany. It was because the line which could not be crossed had to be drawn. I remember at that time we said "We have learned our lesson this time. We will never let it happen again." Ever since world war II we have seen nothing but this same attitude, the peculiar idea that we can appease dictatorships. Instead of appeasement, however, all we do is whet their appetites.

We have seen this all through history since the dark ages. It happened in Great Britain when the Danes were attacking the coast of Britain. It was thought that the Danes could be bought off with gold. Well, the Danes took the gold and came back the next year for more. We are facing the same kind of situation now. In the experience I have had dealing with representatives of the Soviet union I have found they are tough and very practical people who will try anything if they think it will succeed. I thoroughly agree with the view expressed by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that in the present situation we must be tough, but calm and resolute, and we must not panic. This is something the Soviet union understands and respects. If we keep our powder dry and remain firm in our stand I think negotiations can succeed and will succeed.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to participate in this debate at the present time. However, the remarks which have just ended have made me rise. In the first place I wish to express my personal good wishes to our Secretary of State of External Affairs. I believe all Canada realizes the heavy burdens that are resting upon him. When he leads our delegation at the United Nations next week and for the weeks thereafter I believe all Canadians will wish him every success in his endeavours. I hope the men and women associated with him on behalf of our nation will exert their greatest efforts to reflect the attitude and policies that our minister has put forward on so many occasions in the past.

I very much regret that I noticed a considerable divergence of view between the speech just concluded by the parliamentary secretary and the attitude and views that have hitherto been expressed by the minister himself. I hope this is going to be looked into. I know the minister has appointed a new man to replace the hon. member as the deputy leader at the United Nations. I hope the man now appointed to be the deputy leader of the Canadian delegation will very honestly, sincerely and fairly represent the attitude of the minister in the dealings he will necessarily have from day to day with the representatives of other nations.

I believe in essence the hon. member for Oxford attempted to paint the world situation as a contest between capitalism and communism. I am glad this is not the basic conflict in the world of today, even though people in Moscow and in Washington would like to make it such. The vast majority of the world's population of today believe not only in political democracy, but also in economic and social democracy. These people outnumber the people in the communist bloc and in the bloc that is dominated by the United States of America. I predict that eventually these people who are interested in economic and social democracy in addition to political democracy are going to win the day. I hope they can win the day without the holocaust of nuclear war that either the communist or the capitalist world may attempt to launch in the world.

I think the hon. member for Oxford ought to do a bit of homework. He spoke at length on the external affairs policy of the new party. I assume he meant the New Democratic party. As his source of information he used an interpretation placed on our external affairs policy by the Montreal Gazette. May I inform him that the New Democratic party does not own the Montreal Gazette. It is more likely than not that the hon. member's own Tory party owns the Montreal Gazette. May I say that this is a very poor source of information as to what our foreign policy is.

The hon. member attempted to brand us as neutralists. We are not neutralists by any stretch of the imagination. In the world of today democracy could not survive without the ardent support the social democrats the world over are giving to the cause of political democracy. However, because we wish to extend political democracy, the capitalists of the world love to smear us and brand us as neutralists, pro-communists and all the other names they can invent.

The hon. member spoke of our policy on NATO. I will admit that our movement has reservations about NATO. If NATO is going to be nothing more than a mere tool in the hands of the Pentagon; if NATO is going to desert those in western Europe who believe in democracy then the earlier we get out of NATO, the better. Many of the delegates at the United Nations have repeatedly expressed to me their disappointment at what is happening to the NATO organization. The people who believe in democracy in Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Germany and France have severe reservations as to the course that is being pursued by NATO. Canada could help its allies in western Europe if, to use the term used by the hon. member, the Canadian government had the guts to stand for what the Canadian people believe in instead of echoing, time after time, the intentions and the aspirations of those who rule the roost in the Pentagon.

NATO has played a most useful role in our history. However, may I remind the government that acts of aggression have been committed within the past five or six years by member nations of the western world in greater number than those that have been committed by members of the communist bloc. I am unwilling to forgive the communist bloc for those acts of aggression. I know they have occurred, and they are unforgivable. But those that the capitalist world have committed are equally unforgivable. Today across the line in their magazines it is openly admitted that the United States government intervened in the affairs of the Cuban people. At the time the event occurred we were expected to believe that our ally and, as I still say, our good neighbour to the south had nothing to do with the attempt to overthrow the government in that other nation. However, today their magazines gloat over their effort, and are beginning to analyse the reasons for their failure.

We will continue to support NATO if NATO is going to abide by its original intent, namely to act as a brake against potential communist expansion in western Europe, as was originally intended, and not as an instrument to launch a nuclear war. If it is going to act as a brake against potential communist expansion in western Europe, and if it is going to help to establish a little more economic unity in the western world, we will continue to support it. But let us make no mistake about the matter. The moment that NATO begins to adopt nuclear weapons—

Mr. Jones: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Regier: —our movement and, I am sure, the Canadian people with us will oppose NATO. NATO was never intended to be an organization that might be responsible for blowing the whole world to bits. We say that no Canadian should be equipped with nuclear weapons either here or abroad. We say that nuclear weapons should never be permitted either on or above Canadian territory.

I should like to ask the government this question. How much truth is there in the newspaper reports I read yesterday to the effect that United States planes loaded with nuclear weapons are flying regular operations above Canadian territory? We at one time had an assurance from this government that for each and every such single flight a specific permit was required and was granted by the government of Canada. Does that situation hold good today? The Canadian people would like to have an answer. We had only a few days ago a report or a listing of the number of occasions on which nuclear weapons were accidentally almost exploded.

Mr. Jones: There was no accident about the explosion of nuclear weapons in Russia in the last few days.

[Mr. Regier.]

Mr. Regier: We recognize the fact that the Russians have them, that the Americans have them and that the French have them. However, what we say is this. Let not any more of us have them. We have enough of them in existence in the world. What possible useful contribution could Canada make by adding to the existing amount of nuclear weapons the world has today? Already there are in the hands of the great nations of the world from 10 to 20 tons of t.n.t. for every man, woman and child in the world. Hence what useful contribution can we make, except an attempt to be big shots on the world scene? The Canadian people do not appreciate this sense of haste. As the Prime Minister has said, this is a time for brakemanship. These sabre rattling speeches in this House of Commons serve no useful purpose whatsoever. Washington and Moscow do not even listen to them, because they do not have to listen.

We ought to take a different attitude and approach. We ought to express our regrets and make it clear that we will defend the political democracy, which was won for us by our forefathers at such heavy cost, with our lives if necessary. However, to go beyond that position with appeals to military power on our part; appeals to individuals who believe they can survive a nuclear war; appeals to armament manufacturers, and appeals to a limited number of Canadian people, makes no useful contribution to the cause of world peace.

In respect to Berlin—and I am pleased that the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo identified his attitude in this regard as being his own and not the official attitude of the Liberal party—that hon. member suggested we must work toward the reunification of Berlin. I believe I know something about the philosophy of the German race, and I will make this prediction. With a reunified Germany today we will have a Germany tomorrow seeking not only revenge but the re-establishment of the old glory of the German reich, as it was once known, and the world will once again be thrown into a war.

I certainly agree that the people of Germany ought to be reunited if this can be done by peaceful means. However, I suggest the situation in Berlin is not now a threat to world peace of the magnitude painted by the United States press. No leading statesman has yet claimed an intention of bringing West Berlin under communist domination. No leading statesman has claimed that access by the West Berliners to East Berlin and East Berliners to West Berlin ought to be blocked. On the contrary, there has been an offer to guarantee access.

I suggest we should supply the initiative in this regard. We should state that past history has shown us we have reason to doubt the word of communism, and that pledges have not always been kept. We should state that we are unable to afford the further risk of a broken promise regarding the availability of access, and it must therefore be made to the United Nations, allowing that organization to ensure continued liberty in West Berlin so that in the event the communist state breaks its word it will then have offended not only the west but this world organization, with the result that the whole world will know the reliability of promises made by a communist regime.

The real issue in Berlin is the reunification of Germany, and the Canadian people state that the reunification of Germany is not worth fighting a world war for, with all its consequences. The people of Canada are unwilling to go to war for the attainment of a reunified Germany. They are willing to go to war if necessary to defend political democracy, but that is not the issue involved. The issue involves a close alliance between Washington and Bonn, and the Canadian people realize this in their hearts. That is the basic issue, and Canadian people ought to be informed of it.

If the west desires to make a useful contribution to world peace let it be stated to Russia that it will pull out of West Germany if Russia will do likewise in respect to East Germany, allowing the German people to settle their own problems. The borders could be guarded by the United Nations. Let it be further stated that such a reunified Germany should be forever without armaments. This was done in respect to Austria, and I suggest it can be done in the case of Germany.

I suggest the western world made the worst possible mistake when it agreed to rearm West Germany. When that was done it caused the postponement for possibly many years of any possibility of the reunification of Eastern and Western Germany, because in all logic the communists cannot be expected to withdraw their forces from East Germany as long as the forces of the west are stationed in West Germany and, even worse, as long as West Germany is growing in military might with an increasing attitude of aggressiveness as far as international forces are concerned.

I suggest our position is very clear. We are prepared to defend political democracy, but are not and never have been prepared to defend the interests of the international cartels; the oil monopolies, the chemical monopolies and those other monopolies with head offices in the United States of America. We believe with the peoples of Israel, the Scandinavian countries and social democratic forces of the world over, that we can only build world peace if war is avoided, because if war comes no one will build anything.

I was very much heartened by the words of a spokesman of the Conservative party, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona who is reported at page 8136 of Hansard of September 8, 1961 as follows:

> Therefore peaceful coexistence is the only existence there is. It is not an alternate form of action; it is the only possibility.

Hon. members in this group say hear, hear to that statement. It will not be the world of the west or of the east, but a new world in the event of a nuclear war, and that hon. member's statement epitomizes the basic policy of our hope.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the events of the last few weeks have added a seriousness to the manner in which debates are conducted in this house. This was apparent in the contribution made by all hon. members who have voiced their views as to the ways to peace. In particular I want to refer to the Leader of the Opposition, who along with the hon. member from Essex East placed before the committee his views on this very important matter in a way that was in keeping with the responsibilities that rest on all of us, including the government of the day.

I am going to resist the invitation given by the last hon. gentleman to enter at this time into controversial things, since there will be an opportunity later on to deal with some of the matters to which he referred and also some of the references by other hon. gentlemen of the New Democratic party, who as a result of the changes that took place at a recent convention find themselves in a position difficult to explain; for the policies of March, April and May on NATO, as enunciated by the responsible leader of the former C.C.F. party, have gone through a metamorphosis that makes it somewhat difficult for those hon. gentlemen to square their consciences of May, June and July with the practical results of the changes that took place during that historic meeting. All I can say is that had we followed the advice given by the leader of the C.C.F. in those months in regard to NATO, in the light of the changes that have taken place I can see now how wrong we would have been. However, it is not of that that I intend to speak today. I am going to discuss in general something of the situation that faces us and something of the problems that we as members of parliament must meet.

I repeat what I said a moment ago. The thanks of the committee are due to all hon. members for the way in which they dealt with this very important question not only of West Berlin but of the world situation generally and the several things referred to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in outlining matters for the consideration of the committee. I am not going into the field of defence today, or of measures that are being taken for national survival. These will be dealt with when the departmental estimates in which these matters are dealt with come before the committee. I want to say further in that connection that I appreciate the co-operation of the opposition and the attitude taken by all members of the opposition in permitting the motion for supply to go through this morning without debate in order to ensure that there would be no delay in the discussion of those questions of national and international importance that face us today.

I thank the Leader of the Opposition for the contribution he made in answering some myths that have achieved widespread circulation during recent weeks. One of them is that Berlin is a crisis that propaganda built, a view expressed by one or more journalists or pundits in various parts of Canada. The other is that Canadians are the victims of propaganda to make them believe there is a crisis over Berlin. The Leader of the Opposition dealt effectively with those who hold that view. In his attitude and in that of the hon. member for Essex East they gave an indication of the seriousness with which they view the international situation, and the need of each and every one of us to make the best contribution possible without regard to political considerations.

The Leader of the Opposition made some reference to a speech I made recently before the Canadian Bar Association, and gave general approval thereto. I can only say that this is one time I most heartily reciprocate the words he used, when he stated that he thought I struck the right note. In order to keep in harmony with that attitude, I say of him as he said of me that in his speech in the house the other day I thought he struck the right note.

While differences are bound to occur between government and opposition, differences which are a vital necessity of democratic government, there does come a time when issues transcend political considerations, and this is one of those times. All of us have as our purpose and our aim the maintenance and the preservation of peace. Those of us who have responsibilities would like to do that which we are often asked to do, go into detail in regard to matters, when if we did that the result would be to deny that freedom of consultation which is of the essence of the relationship that must prevail among the free nations.

My opinion, and I think the attitude of the house, has been that this is an hour which demands moral strength and courage. Panic is the refuge of weakness. Confidence can be a weapon of peace. Communism breeds on fear and weakness. When I hear criticism of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization I sometimes wonder whether those who criticize realize that if it had not been for the defensive strength of NATO we might very well not be here today. That is how important NATO has been as a defensive organization, and how necessary it is today.

The ideals of democracy and peace in my opinion can best be served at this hour by showing the Kremlin that we will not sit back and allow the world in which we believe to be swept aside by the acceptance of those things that deny every principle of freedom for which we stand. We must at the same time speak words of measured carefulness so that nothing will be said which will add to the fires which today are burning.

Mr. Chairman, in the past two days the house has maintained that principle, that each and all of us have to speak and must speak our views. That is the essence of democracy. Some of us will have to go back on some of the views that we have expressed in the past. That is of the essence of democracy too. Though I do not often do so, I speak now of a colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and of the contribution he has made since assuming that office, a contribution outstanding and worthy of the sacrifice made by those of his generation who served with him in the first war. He believed in the United Nations, and in the United Nations and outside he built a structure of peace with disarmament. He carried the fight in the United Nations and at Geneva. That is why his speech the other day to me carried the conviction that comes from one who is speaking with the experience that he has had.

I see that some say he retreated. There is no retreat when one acknowledges that the idealism that he has expressed has not been accepted, and has been interpreted by the Kremlin and those associated with the Kremlin as a sign of weakness rather than of greatness. Some say he is too idealistic. Idealism has its place, Mr. Chairman, and if the free world sacrifices its idealism to godless materialism there will be little to choose between communism and democracy in 50 years, whatever the result may be of the world contest. With all his heart, with all his devotion to the principle of disarmament, and with all his hopefulness that the clouds on the international horizon would be dissipated, in the light of recognition of the terrible danger of a nuclear war he told the house that we in the free world were on the threshold of potential world disaster.

That causes us to re-examine some of the principles of Canada's foreign policy which, in the light of the discussions that have taken place during this debate, indicate an area of agreement between the government and the opposition, with the opposition having at all times not only the right but the duty to point out, while agreeing with the objectives, what changes should be made that would be beneficial.

Canada's foreign policy can be summed up in three short paragraphs: First, continuing support for a strong and effective United Nations without which peace cannot be achieved, while recognizing that changes in the charter such as were indicated by the hon. member for Oxford ought to be made in the light of the experience since 1945. Second, the need of a strong and effective North Atlantic Treaty Organization, with which I will deal later. Finally, and I speak now for the government in this regard, we believe in the extension and development of a strong commonwealth of nations, believing that no other association throughout the world has a greater influence for good. Indeed, the adherence by its members to its principles, though unwritten, denies the acceptance of communism.

The position we are in today, and when I say this I speak of the attitude of some Canadians and others, is brought about as a result of the process of confusion and propaganda which is of the essence of communist philosophy. The communists deceive people into believing that the existing crisis was created by other nations.

There is no disagreement between the government and the opposition, Mr. Chairman, that the crisis was created by Khrushchev for his own purposes, just as he has created crises throughout the years. If it is not Korea it is Vie Nam. If it is not Vie Nam it is Berlin, and so on. There is no crisis of our making in East Berlin. We have not stirred up any crisis. Some say to me: "How can Canada consider doing anything else but bending the knee to Khrushchev over a paltry city of 2.5 million?" I quite understand the sentimental and emotional plea behind that. The sacrifice of 100,000 Canadians cannot but bring that emotional reaction if the broader situation is not examined.

This is a larger question than West Berlin, a greater problem than its people. There is the pledged word of the western nations that the people of West Berlin will not be sacrificed, their freedom will not be destroyed; that the rights of access into West Berlin shall not be discontinued. Berlin has become the tangible symbol of a global difference between communism and the forces of freedom. The U.S.S.R. would endeavour to restrict the problem to a divided Berlin. Berlin is more than an isolated outpost. Khrushchev knows that he has already sealed off ingress and egress to West Berlin from East Berlin. He has done that because he realized that the outcome in connection with Berlin will determine, in a considerable measure, the future of freedom everywhere in the world.

When one walks in the streets of West Berlin it is difficult to realize that to thinking people everywhere in the world this small island, as it were, surrounded by communism, represents to the free world, as it represents to the communist world, the axis of the struggle as between communism and freedom. It is not a question of the reunification of Germany, as was mentioned here this morning. We are not dealing with that question. We are dealing with the pledged word of the free world. If we ever get the reputation amongst the uncommitted nations of the world that are standing with us that our word, under seal, means no more than a passing fancy, then indeed will Khrushchev have won the greatest victory communism has ever achieved.

One has to follow the course he has taken since the adjournment of the house, and it has been an interesting course. From time to time he has spoken the soft, sweet words of peace. These were followed by threats as to what would happen. One moment he is the smiling Khrushchev; the next moment he is engaged in his terror campaign. It is difficult to understand why he chose a time just before the Belgrade conference opened to announce the resumption of his nuclear testing program. Perhaps his purpose was to make the neutrals fearful that if they were critical of the U.S.S.R. they would be in danger. Why did he take that course? Well, he must have been preparing for some time because we were told today, I believe, that the fifth and sixth atomic explosions had occurred. Is he about to announce the production of an anti-missile missile following a short period of testing?

It is interesting to note that some of those who speak the loudest regarding the stand of Canada and the free world have been so silent in their condemnation of Khrushchev and the stand he has taken followed by his action regarding nuclear testing. He has placed the lives of people everywhere in the world in jeopardy. He has done so cynically. He said his purpose was, in effect, to let the people of the world realize their position and their danger. I find it difficult to understand, as did the Secretary of State for External Affairs, why the Belgrade conference did not make some outstanding declarations on this subject. I find it difficult to understand how they reacted so tepidly to Khrushchev's gross contempt of human safety.

The United States is now proceeding with testing. I have my own views in this regard. I can only say one thing. I hope that no action will be taken by any government belonging to the NATO organization without consultation in advance of that action. I realize that, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has pointed out, they could take no other course. It is not for me to say that one would have hoped that having delayed for three years during the moratorium, a delay of the same number of weeks might have been helpful in the mobilization of world opinion.

What is Khrushchev's attitude? I am often told that if we could only try and be reasonable, how different things would be. Was there anything unreasonable in the request made by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the President of the United States that there be no testing in the atmosphere? Testing in the atmosphere, the cause of the deleterious nature of fall-out, should have been the last thing undertaken. There could have been tests underground. Mr. Khrushchev declared on Saturday that nuclear testing could be ended only by western acceptance of Soviet proposals for a German peace treaty and complete disarmament. What association is there between nuclear testing and a German peace treaty?

For the last year and a half the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been doing everything possible, as I said a moment ago, to bring about international agreement on disarmament. The Leader of the Opposition pointed out there were 300 or so meetings held in Geneva. There was hope. I remember the last time I talked to Prime Minister Macmillan. He said, "I think we are going to secure a continuing moratorium and indeed an agreement on testing." If we had been able to achieve that, we would have gone a long way, because we would have established that in this narrow field, inspection and control would operate in an experimental stage as a preparation for the larger field of disarmament whenever disarmament comes.

Mr. Khrushchev called on the United States and Great Britain to meet in settling the main problems of our times, general and complete disarmament. He said, "Let us seek seriously, in good faith, a solution of the question of concluding a German peace treaty so as to arrest in good time the sliding of states into the inferno of a rocket nuclear war". In other words, "I believe in negotiation", says Mr. Khrushchev. He says, "I will keep what I have and then I will take what you have or part of it". That is not the principle of negotiation.

What has his attitude been since last July, when the house last met? He has been moving to higher and more aggressive peaks of threat and intimidation week by week. It is very interesting to read the communist manifesto. I am not going into details with regard thereto, but I suggest to hon. members that they read the text of the Soviet party's draft program for the next 20 years. Hitler took 1,000 pages in "Mein Kampf". Khrushchev takes less than 50 pages, and he places before the world the blueprint of the architect, in which be builds a house for all mankind, with the U.S.S.R. having the only key to the premises.

It is well to read what he says. It reveals the cold ruthlessness that is apparent in the breaking of his nation's word by the resumption of tests. Today one hon. member said this is not a contest between capitalism and socialism. I immediately rise to say that in so far as communism is concerned it would bring about all its changes by revolution, infiltration and the destruction of the will to resist. This is what the Soviet party's draft program says:

> The great October socialist revolution ushered in a new era in the history of mankind, the era of the downfall of capitalism and the establishment of communism. Socialism has triumphed in the Soviet union and has achieved decisive victories in the people's democracies; socialism has become a cause of practical significance to hundreds of millions of people, and the bearer of the revolutionary movement of the working class throughout the world.

Then it goes on to say:

> The socialist revolution in European and Asian countries has resulted in the establishment of the world socialist system. A powerful wave of national liberation revolutions is sweeping away the colonial system of imperialism.

One does not have to sort out these passages:

> The victorious workers and peasants lacked knowledge of state administration and the experience necessary for the construction of a new society. The difficulties of socialist construction were greatly increased by the fact that for almost 30 years the U.S.S.R. was the world's only socialist state, and was subjected to incisive attacks by the hostile capitalist environment.

Then it says again:

> Socialism has done away forever with the supremacy of private ownership of the means of production, that source of the division of society into antagonistic classes. Socialist ownership of the means of production has become the solid economic foundation of society. Unlimited opportunities have been afforded for the development of the productive forces.

Then it also says:

Under the leadership of Lenin it worked out a plan for the radical transformation of the country, for the construction of socialism. On the basis of a thorough scientific analysis, Lenin elaborated the policy of the proletarian state for the entire period of transition from capitalism to socialism. He evolved the new economic policy (N.E.P.), designed to bring about the victory of socialism.

And so Khrushchev goes on. He says that within this generation the Kremlin will have succeeded everywhere in the world in bringing about the changes that are set out in that manifesto. He also indicates that coexistence means the acceptance by the free world of the will of the communist world.

I think all of us are agreed as to the seriousness of the events of recent days. What should be done? There have been a number of suggestions made, all of them helpful. I am not going into a detailed analysis in any way of the matters that were referred to by the hon. members who spoke, and in particular those questions that were propounded by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Essex East. I am, however, going to say something regarding the possibility of the United Nations having a larger place in an endeavour to bring about a settlement of this problem.

There are some things the United Nations can do; there are others it cannot do. The United Nations is limited by the fact that Berlin is part of the peace settlement with Germany and is therefore, under the charter, reserved for consideration by the victorious powers. However, if the four powers decide they would like the United Nations to play a part, then there are roles the United Nations can play. There is the question of safeguarding the maintenance of peace; and where the peace is threatened, if the mapority of the United Nations decide that this is being done by the U.S.S.R. or by any other nation, the matter could be brought before the United Nations. Mr. Khrushchev said in his interview with Mr. Sulzberger of the New York Times that he is not averse to United Nations discussions if the big four agree.

Various suggestions have been made. One is that the whole of the city of Berlin could be placed under the trusteeship of the United Nations, with access guaranteed by a U.N. force. There have been suggestions that the United Nations should be moved from New York to Berlin. Speaking for myself, I may say that suggestion has no appeal. The suggestion has been made by Senator Mansfield to which reference was made by the Leader of the Opposition. Other suggestions have also been made.

I think the time has come when consideration might be given—and the United Nations might give consideration thereto—to the internationalizing of the city of Berlin under the United Nations, with its status to continue under United Nations presence. I realize that this suggestion would not receive the support of Mr. Khrushchev. However, it at least would bring about a step forward in the assurance that if negotiation failed, the United Nations would have something to which it could give its attention. It would require uncontrolled access by the west. It would also require a willingness on the part of the four powers to agree.

Someone has said that matters like this should not be discussed in advance of election campaigns in other parts of the world. I believe this is a serious enough matter that it should be discussed, if only for the purpose of directing the attention of mankind to a possible solution before it becomes too late to do so. As I said in Winnipeg and now repeat, Canada being one of the smaller nations, a member of NATO and of NORAD, with its record of sacrifice it has a right and a responsibility to place its views before mankind. After all, if the decision is left to four nations, without any suggestions having come from the smaller nations, the moral responsibility will rest on the governments of the smaller nations for having failed to advance their views.

There is one thing I wish to point out. I read that one of the pundits said that in the course of my Winnipeg speech I had not revealed the points which would be subject to negotiation. I can only say that I have never known any success to be attained by revealing in advance of negotiations the stand you are going to take. However, that does not mean that the stand should not have been determined upon. That does not imply either that the government of Canada, in its desire for peace, has not made a number of important suggestions which, in the perspective of the future, can be revealed.

The possibility of developing a role for the United Nations as a means of achieving a solution to the Berlin problem must necessarily be carefully examined. In the past the United Nations has made notable contributions to the peaceful settlement of disputes.

In point of fact the potentialities of the United Nations in this connection have not been ignored. This suggestion on my part regarding the United Nations is not new. I would point out that on March 19, 1959, in answer to a question by the Leader of the Opposition in which he inquired of me whether I would give a report about the conversations that had just been completed with the Prime Minister and the foreign secretary of the United Kingdom, as found at page 2049 of Hansard of that year I stated as follows:

Our talks were largely in the nature of an exchange of information and a review of the German and Berlin problems and of the various proposals for a settlement of those problems now under study in western capitals and in NATO. I should emphasize that neither Mr. Macmillan nor I attempted to crystallize any British or Canadian position on specific questions under discussion. However, I might add that it is my belief that the United Nations might play some significant role in the solution of the Berlin problem, and that this phase deserves further and more careful study. I think it would be generally agreed that it was clear there was no essential difference in the British and Canadian assessments of the world situation or in the basic aims and policies of our two countries with regard to the complex questions of Germany, Berlin and European security.

I do not think I can add anything more to what I have said. I know the Leader of the Opposition, with his great experience in these matters, will realize that I can go no further than the outline I have just given the house.

At that time the Leader of the Opposition said this:

It is particularly gratifying to hear the Prime Minister say that there may be a way in which the United Nations can, in due course, play a part in this Berlin situation in a manner which would be helpful to peace and security.

Then, speaking in the house on April 7, 1959, as found at page 2294 of Hansard of that year, these words:

By way of contributing to this process of clarification Canada offered a few suggestions concerning the problem of Berlin.

That reference is to clarification of the joint NATO viewpoint arising from the NATO ministerial meeting which was then taking place in Washington and at which the then minister of national defence, Hon. George Pearkes, V.C., represented Canada. I continued:

In the Canadian view no agreement can be acceptable to the west which places in jeopardy the security of West Berlin or the freedom of its citizens.

That view was expressed two and a half years ago. I continued:

It is also the Canadian view that the NATO countries could not accept a solution which might endanger the ties between the Federal Republic of Germany and the other countries of western Europe.

Since then from time to time representations have been made. Indeed, I might return to the words of General Pearkes when, reporting on the conference on April 8, 1959, he said this as reported at page 2344 of Hansard of that year:

It is unnecessary for me to elaborate on what the Prime Minister has said, though I would call attention to the statement he made about the suggestion which was advanced by the Canadian delegation that in some manner the United Nations might be able to assist in the solution of the Berlin problem.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Later he stated:

Further study has been given to the possibility of the United Nations playing some part, and suggestions were made at the meeting as to how the United Nations might contribute something to the solution of the problem. I pointed out that we in Canada were anxious that consideration be given to ways by which the present arrangements over Berlin could be strengthened, either by supplementary or substitute arrangements. I pointed out that the Prime Minister had made his statement as of March 19, and then I went on to say that I would doubt if the United Nations could play a useful part unless a four power agreement had first been reached. I suggested that a settlement involving the United Nations need not be weaker, and conceivably might be more stable, than the present position in which the powers are now in Berlin by right of conquest. Although the effective introduction of the United Nations into the Berlin situation could probably be accomplished only through the agreement of the four powers, it could serve to engage the interest of other governments in the freedom and independence of Berlin in a way which no agreement reached solely among the occupying powers could do. Accordingly I suggested it would be worth while for the permanent council to study the possibilities of a role for the United Nations in the application of a solution to the Berlin problem, and an assurance was given that a full study would be made by the permanent council of the suggestions which were put forward.

I would also point out that there was an occasion when the United Nations did endeavour to be of some assistance in connection with Berlin, but it was not very successful. That had to do with the committee of the United Nations which was set up some 10 years ago.

On September 1, I stated: "The charter of the United Nations declares the primary purpose of the United Nations to be the maintenance of international peace and security. It must be ready to make use of the United Nations". As recognized by the hon. gentlemen speaking for the opposition, there are a number of complicating factors, not the least of which is the question of the timing of any United Nations involvement.

The United Nations could, to begin with, exercise the function of promoter of an agreement on the Berlin problem by providing a focus for world opinion, which could have the effect of impelling the powers directly concerned to settle their differences by negotiation. Second, the United Nations could, if the powers concerned could be persuaded to agree, act in various roles as observer to verify that any new agreement reached was being fully implemented in accordance with its provision. Third, the United Nations could be assigned the more difficult task of operating an international regime in Berlin.

The problem is one of selecting the role which is most likely to contribute to the settlement of the Berlin problem in particular circumstances. This means essentially that the role of the United Nations must be related to developments in negotiations toward a settlement. The four powers have primary responsibility in Berlin, and must first enter into direct negotiations. There are some indications at the moment that there is a reasonable prospect of there being negotiations. When I speak of a reasonable prospect, I am not speaking in anticipation of possible success, in view of Mr. Khrushchev's intrinsic position. If direct negotiations succeed might there be a possibility of providing a role for the United Nations, perhaps as guarantor of the agreement reached.

It is important to remember that the effective introduction of the United Nations into Berlin could only be done by agreement of all the four powers. I need not say that this may not be easily achieved. Whatever the difficulty might be, I think the little powers and other nations to be affected by the outcome of the Berlin problem have a right to an opportunity to be heard and to place their views clearly before a forum of most of the nations on earth. Furthermore, I can think of the possibility of the United Nations role being that of an observer in the city, or a supervisor on the access routes. Consideration of this possibility might facilitate negotiations and, if the idea were implemented, it might provide a stabilizing element in what is bound to remain a sensitive area throughout the years.

Those in general are some of the suggestions that I place before the house in regard to this question. The particulars of others are so sensitive in detail, if I may use that word again, they cannot be brought before the house, much as I would like to do so.

I now come to something else. What should the United Nations do in the world today? I listened to the hon. member for Oxford. He spoke with the authority of four years of representation of Canada, and effective representation. I have heard it said that no member of any of the delegations had a wider acquaintanceship and friendship than he. He gave us something of a picture of the United Nations.

Over and over again we listen to Khrushchev babbling about imperialism and colonialism, picturing himself, the leader of communism, as the exponent of freedom for peoples who are under domination. The Belgrade conference made a number of recommendations and suggestions, among which are the following:

> Imperialism is weakening. Colonial empires and other forms of foreign oppression of peoples in Asia, Africa and Latin America are gradually disappearing from the stage of history... In the same way, the peoples of Latin America are continuing to make an increasingly effective contribution to the improvement of international relations.

This article then continues as follows:

> All this accelerates the end of the epoch of foreign oppression of peoples, but also makes peaceful co-operation among peoples, based on the principles of independence and equal rights, an essential condition for their freedom and progress.

Further on in this article appears the following statement:

> The participants in the conference solemnly reaffirm their support to the "declaration of the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples," adopted at the fifteenth session of the general assembly of the United Nations, and recommend the immediate unconditional, total and final abolition of colonialism and imperialist domination in all its forms and manifestations.

A little later on they again reiterate this. I am surprised they do not include eastern Europe.

I recognize that there are many who would say that is something which should not be dealt with. Mr. Khrushchev unilaterally wants to set aside agreements entered into with regard to Berlin which were part of a general settlement between the victorious and the vanquished. I should like to see the United Nations given an opportunity of declaring its opposition to the type of imperialism which he has placed upon one hundred million people not only in eastern Europe but in other parts of the world.

When the Belgrade nations declared their belief in the right of peoples to self-determination and independence, and the free determination of the forms and methods of their economic, social and cultural development, I should like very much to have seen that declaration include the U.S.S.R. Why it was not included I have no idea. But there is a field in which I think we in the free world, in the United Nations, could place in proper perspective the arguments advanced by Khrushchev in this regard. Indeed I regard a stand such as this as one that would do much good, although I know there are others who say we must leave that alone. Why should the free world always be on the defensive? Unfortunately, because of our desire for peace, many of the things which ought to have been said have not been said. While we debate that stand in the interests of the maintenance of peace, Khrushchev continues to push forward inch by inch and mile by mile all over the world.

I am going to conclude by saying something about NATO. I think that by his threats and recriminations in the last few months Mr. Khrushchev has done much to bring about greater unity in NATO than ever before. I pointed out earlier, as did the Leader of the Opposition, that the countries in NATO are equals and that there is need of full and complete consultation. I repeat what I said earlier. I hope that never again will one of the member nations of NATO act without consultation with the other members of NATO.

The Leader of the Opposition was one of the committee of three in 1956. At that time responsibility was given to that committee to consider ways and means of putting principles about consultation into practice. That report which still serves as a useful reference document on the problem of consultation recognized the difficulties when it stated in paragraph 17:

> North Atlantic political and economic co-operation, however, let alone unity, will not be brought about in a day or by a declaration, but by creating over the years and through a whole series of national acts and policies, the habits and traditions and precedents for such co-operation and unity. The process will be a slow and gradual one at best; slower than we might wish. We can be satisfied if it is steady and sure.

Then, in paragraph 40 we find the following:

> One of those limitations is the hard fact that ultimate responsibility for decision and action still rests on national governments.

The Canadian government has consistently recognized the importance of consultation and the process of co-ordination in the alliance in the interests of greater unity. It has consistently urged that the alliance should adapt its machinery to changed circumstances and I have expressed the view that this can be accomplished within the existing framework of NATO. We believe that NATO's unity and strength derive from and will continue to derive in a large measure from a principle of equality of membership. Consequently we have opposed the formation of political blocs or directorates within the alliance which can only have the effect of weakening its unity and purpose by establishing some members in a preferred or dominant position in relation to the others.

When I was in Europe in November, 1958, I was able to make Canada's views clear to members of NATO at that time. It was almost simultaneous with the suggestion that a triumvirate should be set up. I said we would not accept it.

We have also urged that in its review of long term planning NATO should review the principles of consultation with a view to better co-ordination of allied policies. Recognition was given to these principles at the last meeting of NATO foreign ministers in Oslo, attended by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, for the first time when agreement was reached on the main objectives which are to guide consultations and co-ordination of policies in NATO. The most important of these principles is "to achieve a common policy on subjects of direct concern to the alliance as a whole." Progress is being made. In these critical days the NATO council is meeting regularly through its permanent representatives to fulfil its responsibilities but there is still room for improvement. I think I will say no more on that.

I think I ought to point out that while the committee of which the Leader of the Opposition was a member made certain recommendations and some changes have taken place, as yet we have not arrived at that point where consultation is as complete as I would like to see it.

With regard to the other questions that have arisen, they will be answered in detail by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As Prime Minister, I have always followed the course of not interfering with the ministers in the discharge of their responsibilities except that in regard to foreign policy I have followed the tradition of the United Kingdom, that the Prime Minister must take a particular interest in that field of national activity on which the safety of the state so largely depends.

If we could only plan internationally to meet all of the changes of attitude and the circuitous courses followed by Mr. Khrushchev, things would be much simpler. The Leader of the Opposition asked whether there was any planning, any consultation regarding the sealing off, or any anticipation of the sealing off of ingress and egress between East Berlin and West Berlin. I frankly tell you I do not think that was anticipated. However—and I am answering him in this regard—there is planning and consultation to cover potential emergencies as they may arise with respect to western rights and responsibilities in Berlin. I cannot, of course, disclose what action NATO governments propose to take if the Soviet government or the East Germans attempt to block off access to Berlin. It would, however, be a mistake to imply that on this vital matter western interests are dependent on improvisation at the time of or after the time of the event. The occupying powers, specifically the United States, the United Kingdom and France, have special responsibilities to ensure maintenance of access for their troops stationed in Berlin, and for their supplies. Under the North Atlantic treaty and subsequent declarations of the NATO council all members have certain responsibilities in respect of Berlin.

The Leader of the Opposition implied that there might be a tendency to wait upon events improvidently before deciding on courses of action. I can tell the house that at the last NATO meeting in Oslo Canada took a leading part in urging the necessity of effective defence consultation on plans to meet contingencies which might arise in the Berlin situation. The United Kingdom, the United States and France are keeping the other members of NATO regularly informed of progress in their planning against various contingencies which are seen as possibly arising over Berlin, and the government of Canada will continue to ensure that there is no slackening in the effectiveness of this consultation and planning.

This is no time for pessimism, Mr. Chairman. Equally it is not a time for optimism. Throughout the years all the free world has faced dire dangers. I remember in the fall of 1916 visiting the British House of Commons just prior to the change of administration and hearing the then prime minister, one of Britain's greatest, I think, the Right Hon. H. H. Asquith, say that they had passed through the gravest difficulties. A few weeks later I heard Lloyd George make his first speech as prime minister of the United Kingdom. I was one of seven Canadians who had that privilege. I might be asked how I happened to get into the gallery. As a matter of fact, Sir George Perley was on the troop ship returning to his job as high commissioner and he said that if at any time in the future there was anything I wanted I should get in touch with him. It was not many weeks before I did. I said, "I want a ticket to the gallery". He said, "That is a lot more difficult to secure than almost anything else you could ask for". I said, "That is what I want, that is what you promised me". I can tell you, Mr. Chairman, that is what I got.

I heard Lloyd George's speech and I have always remembered it. He had the power, the imagery and the command of language necessary for such an occasion. He compared the situation then to his boyhood days when he used to look toward the west with a mountain immediately in front of him. He wondered what was beyond that mountain so finally he climbed it and there was another mountain ahead. He said, "I knew that somewhere beyond there was hope for the world". I believe that today. I believe that if the free world will but stand firm, resolute and determined and at the same time not stubbornly unresilient to the necessities that are brought about through change, we shall come out of the Berlin problem stronger in the things of the spirit than ever before; for, as I see it, if we follow a course of defeatism by giving up our principles, we shall have laid the foundations for a future frightful to contemplate.

Communism does not understand any other principle than power. Communism does not believe in an immortal being who determines the course of mankind, even though sometimes taking generations to do so. We do, and if we do our part now without permitting ourselves to be intimidated I think there is a possibility that we shall be laying the foundations for a new relationship between the communist world and the world of freedom, a relationship which cannot be hoped to be attained if we capitulate to the degree Khrushchev asks us to. If we give up our principles, what have we to live for in the years ahead?

I remember that in the dark days of 1917 Quiller-Couch wrote a novel about two men who opposed one another, one of whom believed in the things of the spirit and the other of whom ridiculed such beliefs. The one who believed in the things of the spirit gave up his principles in order to defeat his opponent. He did. He won and when he had achieved victory there was no difference between him in his victory and his opponent if he had been successful.

I know there are some who say that they think the things of the spirit should not be considered. We are right in the stand we are taking in this matter. It is not only a question of the people of West Berlin although we gave our pledge there and must keep it. It is a question of whether we shall allow Khrushchev with intimidation and threats to push us back and back to a point where we have nothing but our past to look back on. If there is to be a future, if mankind is going forward to higher and better things, the things of the spirit are as important to nations as they are to individuals. It is in that spirit that I hope the free world will stand, prepared to make those changes which the realities demand but not prepared to sacrifice the principle in which we believe, the principle of the right of people to live under law even though the rule of law is not effective internationally.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to speak a second time in this debate, but I think now is the proper time to speak up and make the position of this party on one particular issue quite clear. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the majority of speakers and I listened with interest, as I am sure we all did, to the speech just concluded by the Prime Minister. I was interested in his sort of re-analysis of Canadian foreign policy and his indication of support of the United Nations. He knows our attitude in that respect. He referred to the government's policy with respect to NATO. I will not say anything more about that now because we will have something to say about it when the defence estimates are under discussion. He also referred to support for the commonwealth. I know the Prime Minister knows that we in this group, as I have said on numerous occasions, have a great affection for the commonwealth. We believe it can play an even stronger role than it has played to date, as an institution, if it is utilized.

However, I rose particularly to mention this Berlin issue. I want to be quite clear that I understand the Prime Minister's remarks correctly. We were listening to him carefully and at one point we understood him to indicate that it was the government's position that if there were any change in the status of West Berlin, or a war, that we were honour bound in this country to support war. Am I correct in that interpretation?

Mr. Diefenbaker: What I said was this. If perchance, and all of us hope to the contrary, war came, we would become a participant because of our relationship, our undertakings and our pledges in NATO.

Mr. Herridge: I want to make it quite clear that we in this group take the firm position that we cannot support the position that a world war should come over Berlin. We trust that negotiations will prevent it. This is our attitude toward the situation in West Berlin, and we believe it is the attitude of the majority of Canadian people as indicated by the press, by numerous publications and some hon. members here. We believe this position has been indicated to some extent by the speeches in this house, the speech by the hon. member for Leeds, by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, the hon. member for Niagara Falls and others. I am sure that this government will do all that is within its power to work for negotiations to have the problem settled through the utilization of the institution of the United Nations.

I do once again want to emphasize the attitude of the Canadian people. We feel very strongly on this question, Mr. Chairman. The Prime Minister took a somewhat different attitude from that of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. I give the hon. member great credit for a very courageous stand. He said, when speaking on September 8, as recorded at page 8136 of Hansard:

> First, the hon. member for Greenwood mentioned coexistence.

I thought the hon. member for Greenwood made an excellent speech.

> It is a peculiarity of the thinking today, in the United States particularly, that to mention the word "coexistence" puts one sort of into the appeasement class or that of a fellow traveller. Let us look at its very realistically. The communists are there in many countries. Their system is well and firmly entrenched. They are extremely powerful.
> There is more than that. There is no doubt that they have the solid support of a large segment of their population. In fact, we can see no reasonable hope that in the very near future they are likely to be overthrown. They are there. They are strong. They are going to remain there unless they can be overthrown by force of arms and, as I said before, I think that any question of overthrow by force of arms means we will be out of the frying pan and into the fire. It cannot be done without destroying us all.
> Therefore peaceful coexistence is the only existence there is. It is not an alternate form of action; it is the only possibility. Therefore we must do all we can to try to relieve the tension which might destroy us all. Certainly if we are going to live in peace with our neighbours it would behoove us to have a foreign policy more in keeping with our Christian, democratic principles than merely an anti-communist line.

I thought the hon. member made a very courageous speech on that occasion. I should like to quote from an editorial in the August 29 issue of the Vancouver Sun. It is entitled, "The Dreams and the Facts."

> "We are in an impossible situation over Berlin and our refusal of de facto recognition to east Germany is a position we shall have to abandon sooner or later."
> Dr. Hugh Keenleyside said it. It would have sounded even better in the mouths of some western statesmen who permit themselves only to think it.
> In public, spokesmen of the west still pay lip service to daydreams. Daydreams are more pleasant than facts, but not as useful in diplomatic bargaining.
> One dream: Russia will permit free elections which would result in East Germany joining the west.
> The fact: Russia won't give it up. She fears a reunited Germany. So do many people of the western world.
> Dream: We shall pretend the east German state isn't there. Perhaps it will wither away.
> Fact: The puppet state can be kept alive by Russia as long as she feels she needs it. Since we have rearmed West Germany, that is likely to be a long time.
> Dream: All that is necessary is that the west show a united front in West Berlin.
> Fact: It is a poor place for a front line. It is a western island more than 100 miles inside the Russian empire. Military experts say it is indefensible.
> Dream: Khrushchev wouldn't dare start a war.
> Fact: Khrushchev doesn't need to. He plans to sign a peace treaty, 16 years delayed, and give East Germany control of the West Berlin access routes.
> Dream: We can fight our way in.
> Fact: No one has shown how, except by launching a nuclear war which would result in certain destruction of Russia and the United States and perhaps everybody else too.
> There is nothing new in these facts. No spies risk their lives for them. They are as well known in Moscow as in Ottawa or London.
> Yet it is on such facts, as restated by Dr. Keenleyside Saturday, that western nations must build a policy designed to preserve West Berlin and peace.
> Here, Canada could give a lead. But we are silent, while Washington's emotional cries about sacred honour fill the air.
> Must Prime Minister Diefenbaker continue to stifle the calm and reasonable voice which Canada could interject into the Berlin affair?

Then, we find a former colleague of the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Essex East taking the same point of view as members of this group. I quote from the Vancouver Sun of recent date, the Hon.

James Sinclair, former minister of fisheries in the Liberal government:

"Why any Canadian should die for the people who created Belsen, Buchenwald and Auschwitz is beyond me".

So said James Sinclair, former federal fisheries minister and veteran foreign observer.

Sinclair, speaking from his north Vancouver home, said that he believed the best thing that has ever happened in Europe was to have the most war-like nation divided in half.

"Germany has started two wars in this century, and the Eichmann trial has reminded people just how the Germans behaved," he said.

He said he would rather see West Berlin absorbed by East Germany than another war.

"Even with a communist take-over in Berlin the West Germans of that city would still be living, which is more than we can say for the six million Jews that they sent to the ovens and gas chambers," he said.

The article goes on to say:

Sinclair termed the east-west division of Berlin an incredible blunder, adding: "When you make such a stupid blunder you cut your losses and adjust."

Then, a former minister of national defence, Hon. Ralph Campney, defence minister under the Liberal government, said:

If the price is to lose Berlin or have another war then there shouldn't be war.

But he said that the true issue is more than just Berlin, but rather the mistake made when the city was divided after the second world war.

"These mistakes should be corrected," he said, "by negotiation and compromise, and while Berlin might be lost to avoid another war I think there will eventually be a permanent division between east and west Germany."

Then Premier Douglas, the leader of the New Democratic party, has this to say:

If the east Germans cut off access to West Berlin after signing a separate peace treaty with Russia the matter should be dealt with by the United Nations.

He said Canada should make it clear to her NATO partners she isn't prepared to go to war over Russian recognition of the east German government.

"This is the real problem," he said, "whether or not the western powers are willing to recognize that East Germany exists."

"The only reason they're avoiding it is to please Adenauer in his dream of a reunified and rearmed Germany," said Douglas.

Douglas said he believes the west is working itself into a state of hysteria over the matter of access to West Berlin.

"Yet," he said, "there is no suggestion that the East Germans will cut off this access."

He said the west should come to some kind of terms with East Germany.

I took the time to read those editorials because they are receiving a great deal of support in British Columbia. Only today I received a letter from a retired squadron leader, a holder of the distinguished flying cross, in which he said, "I back you people up 100 per cent". I have received several letters of this type from men who served in the forces in world war I and world war II.

I rise to re-emphasize the point of view of this group and to say again that we are behind—

An hon. Member: We know your point of view.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad the hon. gentleman does. At least we state it and give it expression. We are behind this government in all it does and we are behind the Secretary of State for External Affairs in all he does to explore every avenue and to give some leadership in this direction to other countries. We should not follow on the tail of the United States, but should use our British commonwealth connections toward this end. There are many countries in the commonwealth who take the same stand as this party and who go arm in arm with Mr. Nehru and other leaders in the commonwealth who act with some moral force in the world to exert some influence at this critical time so that negotiations will continue.

I know how we all feel about the attitude of the Soviet union and how dismayed we were with the resumption of nuclear testing, and so on. We are all agreed about that. No one thinks more of freedom than the members of this group. I say that if freedom is to be maintained in the world today and if peace is to be maintained; if we are to develop civilization for the days ahead which will provide us with peace, and the majority of peoples in the world with a decent standard of living, it will come from that force which does not believe in capitalism or communism as it exists today but believes in democratic socialist principles applied through a Christian expression of life.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, it was a great privilege for me to hear the speech made by the Prime Minister to the bar association in Winnipeg, the theme of which was that the fullest discussion and negotiation must take place before we can have any thought of war. I feel very humble today in speaking after the very great address given by the Prime Minister. However, I have always taken an interest in international affairs and in my maiden speech on May 29 I referred to this part of the speech from the throne:

My government will continue to make unremitting efforts to assist the peaceful solution of international problems and in the accomplishment by patient negotiation of a substantial measure of disarmament.

In referring to that passage I quoted a report appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of May 15 under the headline "Montgomery Feels Canada Should Lead Free Crusade". I quote from that report:

It seems to me Canada is in a unique position to provide robust world leadership. Your nation cannot be charged with the stigma of colonialism; you're lucky that way. You have a very good amalgam of French and British blood; that's good. It is quite clear to me that the nations of the world are looking to Canada for a lead. That is a fact. I am not saying that to please you. I would like to see Canada develop a foreign policy of its own, not tacked on to someone else, and give that lead.

I believe Montgomery is a man of great experience. He is a man who knows about wars and he is a lover of peace. He has taken an independent attitude on world problems and Canada might very well heed his advice.

I was very much touched by the reference made by the Prime Minister to our great Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has devoted so much of his time toward the maintenance of peace and disarmament. However, the Prime Minister stated about our worthy Secretary of State for External Affairs that in the opinion of the Kremlin his work showed weakness, instead of greatness. I think the battle for peace and disarmament is not ended; it must be sustained, and the more so when the need is greater.

Napoleon once said—and he was a man of war, as everyone knows—that even in war moral power is to physical as to three parts out of four.

Mahatma Gandhi relied only on moral power and he was able to obtain, by his passive resistance, the freedom and independence of India. Nehru today has nothing more than moral power to offer the world, yet both the west and the communists are competing for his approval and are shrinking from his disapproval.

As I said before, it was a great privilege for me to hear the speech made by the Right Hon. Prime Minister to the Canadian Bar Association on September 1. I feel that Canada should never be committed to war by proxy. The key to our participation should never be left to those who dropped atomic bombs on Hiroshima or Nagasaki. Canadians want Canada to be free, not a mere appendage to our southern neighbour. Canadians have faith in the logic and humanity of our Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs. We cannot give a proxy to either NATO or NORAD. We cannot abdicate our right in advance to keep us from maintaining or breaking the peace.

I should like to quote a few proverbs and sayings in connection with war. Franklin said:

There never was a good war, or a bad peace.

General Grant of the United States said:

When wars do come, they fall upon the many, the producing class, who are the sufferers.

There is a German proverb which says:

A great war leaves the country with three armies—an army of cripples, an army of mourners and an army of thieves.

[Mr. Regnier.]

Wellington said:

Men who have nice notions of religion have no business to be soldiers.

Wellington also said:

The next dreadful thing to a battle lost is a battle won.

Fielding said:

War is the sink of all injustice.

Tertullian said:

In disarming Peter, Christ disarmed every soldier.

We are presently suffering from a recurrent attack of war virus. This virus thrives on the thirst for conquest, thirst for turmoil and the innate ferocity and barbarism of man. Any student of history well knows that all wars have been futile in their results. I well recall in 1940 listening to a lecture by a professor of history at the University of Manitoba, Professor R. O. MacFarlane. He was also chairman of the royal commission on education in Manitoba and gave very great service in this respect. He stated at the time we were at war with Germany that after the war we would become the allies of Germany in a war against Russia.

This is what happened. Probably 20 years from now we may be allied with Russia in a war against China. If we could get all our scientists to study the history of mankind from the very beginning, I think they could through the use of computing machines, tell us the date of the next war. In my opinion, this is how human nature works. It is like that of the lemmings which periodically go and jump in the sea, driven by we do not know what. It seems to me that human nature is almost the same and that war will come. It is said that war is unthinkable, but I believe it is possible and I believe that we should really prepare for it.

How futile was the bloodshed in the past when one considers that the nation we have bombed and whose nationals we have killed by the thousands is our best friend today and that the nation we helped to defend is our deadly enemy today. How futile was our participation in such carnage when we realize that the avowed object of our participation was the defence of Poland and that one of the first provisions of the peace treaty provided for the enslavement of Poland. How naive were the leaders of the world who made the peace that divided the city of Berlin one half of it free and one half of it enslaved. Wars breed more wars. We won the war but we lost the peace.

The war spirit is a disease of the mind and of the heart caused by the lack of the love of God and the abandonment of Christian principles. The lesson of history teaches us that today's friends will be tomorrow's enemies and that our objective of today will be altered tomorrow and perhaps be completely reversed. One should never be the aggressor, no matter what the provocation. No loss of prestige or, as the orientals say, loss of face, can be a sufficient reason to go to war. If we went to war for Berlin, Berlin would be destroyed and therefore the purpose would be non-existent. If we go to war, no matter what we do, history will show that we did not settle the question on Berlin.

I do not wish to leave the impression that I am opposed to war preparations because the old saying of the Romans si vis pacem, para bellum has always been true. I know that we must prepare for our defence. When I say that, I like to think of what was told to Canada at one time—it was on August 31, 1955—namely that there were two fronts to defend, the military front and the home front. We have acquitted ourselves very well with regard to that part that dealt with the military front but only now are we going to do something worth while for the home front. I scrapped a couple of pages of my speech because I was going to be very severe with the Liberal party. When I came to this house in 1958 and questioned the then minister of national health and welfare, he told me that under the Liberal regime they had prepared for a million casualties but they neglected to do anything to prevent those casualties. Either they wanted to justify the expense by not providing for doing away with casualties or they wanted to encourage some of their business friends by buying a great deal of material. At least it showed that they expected that it was possible to have a million casualties. I think there is no excuse for having done nothing about civil defence. I should like to express my great satisfaction in the announcement that we are going to train 100,000 men by groups of 25,000. I think this is a very good beginning. I want to reserve my comments until I get the full details of this organization. I have here the August number of a book called Pageant. In it there is an article entitled "Inside Russian Civil Defence". It took five years for Khrushchev who started that activity himself when he took power in 1955, the time when we were told that the time to act was now. I understand the civil defence organization was completed in Russia in 1960. Instead of commenting I am going to read this article fully. It is found at page 6 and is by Henry Jordan. He says this:

Our program has been muddled, and our attitude fatalistic. But the Soviets give every citizen years of intensive training. Should we be doing likewise? Here is the first, complete report on the little known Red plan for survival.

Do you know what "fallout" is made of? Why it spreads? How to gauge the "delay period" after a nuclear bomb burst—the time it's still safe to be outdoors?

Do you know what kind of clothing will fully protect you against residual radiation? Or how to rid your kitchen utensils easily of dangerous radioactivity?

Being unable to answer these and other such questions makes you a definite risk in the age of nucleonics. But, as you are no doubt aware, you're in a vast and mostly excellent company: perhaps 98 per cent of us in these 50 states.

You may not consider knowing the answers to these questions of very much importance to your life. You, along with most Americans, may consider all civil defence activity a hopeless exercise in futility. We have been told by various philosophers, statesmen and some scientists that a nuclear war would finish our civilization if not life itself, turning this world into a ball of poisonous ashes—a cosmic monument to man's folly—no matter what our precautions or preparations.

Perhaps so. But it may surprise you to know that a few thousand miles away in the Soviet union every factory worker, high school senior, subway conductor, plant manager and housewife is able to answer the questions cited in his sleep—and many more besides.

As our intelligence men know only too well, all Soviet citizens from 16 to 60—upwards of 135 million people—have six years of the stiffest civil defense drill behind them. With only the bedridden and insane excepted, they were required to attend classes and were taken out on field exercises to learn in theory and practice how to survive war in the age of the fiery mushroom cloud and radioactive fallout.

The leaders in the Kremlin obviously hope that our interest in civil defence will continue to be desultory, that most of us will continue to believe —despite governmental exhortations—that we cannot survive a nuclear war. Soviet Premier Khrushchev himself has repeatedly uttered gloomy predictions that a war of rocket-propelled H-bombs would leave no victor, only total destruction.

But there are experts who warn that Khrushchev is no more sincere than Henry L. Menckens mournful undertaker "conducting a $900 funeral." He would not draft every man, woman and half-child for army-type drills every 12 or 18 months, spend badly needed funds, manpower and materials on anti-nuclear shelters, anti-fallout masks and decontamination equipment, unless he considered the "unthinkable" war a possibility after all—and that measures could be taken to reduce the toll.

What is the exact nature of Soviet civil defence preparations? Is there anything we can learn from them? Should we be taking similar steps?

On the following pages, Pageant presents the first comprehensive report on Soviet civil defence ever put before the American public. The information comes from many sources—secret Soviet training manuals, military periodicals, intelligence reports, interviews with escapees.

What emerges is a picture of a nation systematically being readied for the ultimate horror of a nuclear war. The story may well shock many Americans out of their business as usual mood. It contains information vital to an understanding of the basic political battle of our times.

Probably nothing characterizes DOSAFF, the Soviet civil defence organization, more tellingly than the fact that all its activities are classified defence secrets. (The initials stand for Dobrovolnoe Obshchestvo Sodeistviia Armii, Aviatsii i Flotu or: "Volunteer Society for Assistance to Army, Air Force and Navy.") Appropriately, DOSAAF was in the administrative grip of the Soviet secret police until 1953, when an organizational shuffle put it under the Ministry of Internal Affairs. But experts on Soviet affairs point out that the shift changed nothing—95 per cent of the Ministry's work concerns secret police activities.

Informed observers believe there are two major reasons for the secrecy surrounding Russian civil defence. First, the Soviet leaders do not wish to alarm other countries into setting up similar survival programs. Second, they do not want anyone to draw the conclusion that the Soviet preparedness drive could mean planning for war, not peace.

Yet it was Khrushchev himself who violated the secrecy rule a few years ago. Then he boasted to a German newsman of how formidable the Soviet union was, and how her rockets would obliterate all enemies without great cost to the Russian people, who were made safe from nuclear horrors by the largest civil defence program in the world.

"After I took over, I brought up the cadres of permanent civil defence workers to twenty two million, most of them demobilized army personnel," Khrushchev declared. And this was not an unlikely figure, considering that in World War II DOSAAF's hard core, recruited from a far smaller population, was made up of 25 million people.

The reactivation of DOSAAF Khrushchev spoke about goes back to 1955, when he succeeded Georgi Malenkov as actual head of the Soviet state. Surely a thermonuclear war would be costly, reasoned Khrushchev. But with sufficient preparation on the civil defence front, Russia's losses could be minimized, while the overconfident Western world would be effectively destroyed.

Civil defence therefore headed the list of Khrushchev's new projects. He ordered an immediate "mass attack"—the popular Soviet term for crash program. Within a few weeks, of his assuming power, directives were issued and Russian adults and adolescents of both sexes—by Soviet count, 83 per cent of the population—"volunteered" for DOSAAF civil defence courses.

Simultaneously, millions of training pamphlets were turned out. They dealt with the nuclear facts of life—gamma rays, "thermal storm," and what could be learned from observation of the fireball and mushroom cloud of H-bomb blasts.

The training courses of 1955, the first of several, ran ten class hours mainly devoted to theory. This was supplemented by field exercises in decontamination and first aid held on week ends and Sundays, the number depending on local needs.

At the conclusion of the course, each trainee was required to appear before a board and take a stiff exam on his knowledge of civil defence procedures. Low marks resulted in a return to class for further training. High marks earned DOSAAF's students certificates, brass badges, and hints of job promotion.

Whatever other ends the DOSAAF drills served, they helped strip atomic war of some of its awesomeness. General Boris Olisov, commander of the Red Army's Corps of Engineers, made a revealing comment about this in the usual upside-down Kremlin fashion:

"The western imperialists keep magnifying the danger of nuclear war", he wrote in Red Star the Soviet Army newspaper. "Their plan is to frighten, bully and blackmail other nations into submission. But this will get them nowhere as far as the Soviet goes. Her people have lost all fear of nuclear attack, thanks to systematic training in all aspects of civil defence".

Elsewhere in the article, the general hinted about the nature of future DOSAAF drills.

"You can't get to know all about civil defence in one day or one course. Yet, as our trainees are finding out, the simple, old fashioned rules hold true even in this age. Jumping into a ditch raises a man's chances to outlive a nuclear blast ten times. A ditch is still man's best friend."

What did the millions of DOSAAF students learn? I interviewed a former trainee who had escaped to the west.

First of all, he revealed, the hazards of nuclear war were consistently minimized—often sensibly so. Fallout, the DOSAAF teachers lectured is literally "trash"—dust and debris. When one of the big bombs goes off, a violent updraft sucks tons of liquefied, vaporized earth, stone and metal skyward to heights of 100 thousand feet and more. This debris is "hot"—highly radioactive.

Rather quickly, the vapors and droplets solidify in the thin, cold air of the upper atmosphere and "fall out". While they are still tumbling downward like myriad specks of dust, the ground, even in the immediate blast area, is entirely free of radioactivity.

This is a last, desperate period of grace during which it is still safe to leave shelter, gather up one's family, fight fires, or give and get medical attention.

Depending on weather and wind, the period of "dead time" may last 50 minutes or eight hours. Then, when the first fallout fragments set Geiger counters clicking, people will take cover.

"Even a roof of cardboard can save your life," the DOSAAF textbook informed students. "But just as radioactive dust must be prevented from touching your skin, it also has to be kept out of your lungs. The cheapest face mask equipped with a cloth filter will do an adequate job. If you have no mask, breathe through a damp handkerchief.

In a further attempt to take the terror out of nuclear war, DOSAAF training put great emphasis on the fact that fallout is as perishable as a snowflake in the hot sun. Scientifically this is entirely correct. Ten hours after a bomb burst, all the rampaging, life-destroying radioactivity loses 90 per cent of its strength. Before two weeks are up, life in a city can gradually resume, since radiation by then will be down to one tenth of 1 per cent.

Advanced Course

In 1956, at the close of the short Russian summer, DOSAAF again beat the drums to call all citizens for a second round of survival lessons. Classes started without delay. This time the emphasis was on practical matters, like Olisov's ditches.

Millions of citizens drilled in practice digging. They set fire to huge trash piles and put them out again, timed by instructors' stopwatches. To limber up still further, they were taken, regardless of health, on 20-mile marches, so-called "exercises in emergency evacuation."

Evening classes tackled "how to" matters: How to keep food and water supplies from absorbing poisonous radioactivity, for example (by sealing out dust). How to rid kitchen utensils of dangerous radioactivity (by washing with soap and water). How to rid oneself of "hot" fallout (by washing and more washing).

In the vast Russian hinterlands, DOSAAF instructors stressed problems of the sod and barn.

With animals, by and large, they told students, proceed as with humans. Make sure they are under cover when fallout starts. If radioactive matter gets on their hides, scrub them with soap and water. Should their eyes turn red—irritated from looking at the bomb's fireball—rinse them with DOSAAF's special eyewash.

What if the earth itself gets a dose of ionizing poison? Wait for rain to settle the dust. Then plow the hot trash under. Chances are it won't bother you again. Each rainfall will wash the hot debris deeper while time scatters its radioactivity.

The second DOSAAF training course also covered weapons not mentioned before: poison gas and bacterial warfare.

[Mr. Regnier.]

Instructors lectured about plagues, pests, infected lice, bacillus-derived botulism toxin (so powerful that a thimbleful could make New York City's entire water supply too deadly to drink), and how to detect germs by use of a biological detector kit. Poison gases were dealt with just as thoroughly —how the various kinds act, how to identify them, what protection is available, how to give first aid and how to de-gas a building.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McLennan): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman I was reading an article. It would not take me more than a few minutes to complete reading two more pages. I wonder whether I could have the full article incorporated in Hansard?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McLennan): Does the committee give consent to the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McLennan): Does the committee give consent to the hon. member to have the article printed in Hansard?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not in accord with our practice to incorporate an article in Hansard. Now that I have intervened, I think the hon. member would be permitted to read it. But, just to put in the article is against our practice. A table is different. If we started to allow hon. members to put in articles some hon. members could put in my speeches and this would be objectionable.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether this other issue has been settled. Did I understand the hon. member for St. Boniface requested that the article be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Mr. Regnier: Objection was taken to that procedure. I think the hon. member for Essex East asked that I be allowed to complete reading the article instead of having it printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My point is that the suggestion that an hon. member should be allowed to put on the record a portion of a speech or commentary without the words having been read would be contrary to our practice. I have never seen it attempted. Tables are different. Now that there has been this intervention, I think the hon. gentleman ought to be allowed to read the article.

Mr. Regnier: I think there is no objection—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member is going to read it, not just table it.

Mr. Regnier: I continue:

At the end of the second course—a total of 22 class hours and much field work—the final exam was supplemented with a practical experiment to emphasize the lessons learned. Every trainee was forced to spend 30 minutes in a room filled with chloropicrin, a lethal world war I gas that has a habit of penetrating seemingly tight masks.

Children Too

A third DOSAAF course started in mid-1959 and lasted into 1960. It required 14 class hours and again a locally determined number of week ends and Sunday sessions. The scope of its curriculum is reflected in the variety of questions students were asked in the final examinations. To mention only a few:

"What are the effects of 125 roentgen units of radiation on unprotected people (a) after one hour; (b) after 12 hours?

How do you put a breathing mask on a wounded person in 30 seconds?

What medical self-help procedures are available in case of (a) atomic, (b) gas, or (c) germ attack?"

Trainees able to answer 80 such questions received a somewhat cryptically inscribed badge: "Study in Air Defence."

The DOSAAF program does not forget children. They, too, have training to undergo. From the age of six they were required to attend lectures that told them of death rays you can't see or feel; insects that spread plagues; Geiger counters; how to tie on a gas mask; what to do when (a) one parent or (b) both parents are killed. Children who knew their lessons well were awarded shiny brass buttons with the imprint "Ready for Defence."

Concrete Mathematics

The ability to live through a nuclear conflict is not only a matter of knowledge. The Russians are well aware that it is a matter of solid radiation-proof shelters also.

As intelligence sources have pointed out, an entire government city has been under construction for some years seven miles from Moscow. It is now being rushed to completion. Hacked out of primeval rock, this emergency Kremlin is buried 1300 feet below ground level. It is designed to take a direct hit by a 20-megaton hydrogen bomb—the equivalent of 20 million pounds of t.n.t. Stores food, fuel and oxygen will be large enough to last through a two-year siege.

Thousands of smaller shelters are now being readied throughout the country—shelters calculated to take anything but a direct hit. There are also the deep subways of Moscow, Kiev, and Leningrad, designed years ago as bomb shelters as well as transport facilities. And a law passed in the 1930's made it mandatory to equip every new building, small family dwellings included, with bomb shelters of steel-reinforced concrete.

Obviously there is some civic delusion in this pretense that any kind of shelter could be a match for H-bombs. But basically, the leaders in the Kremlin are as exact in their calculations as business machines.

Stripped of essentials, Soviet survival mathematics go like this: In a war, 50 to 100 nuclear bombs will drop on Russian soil. Where they hit, shelters will be smashed, all life extinct.

But immediately outside the impact area and beyond it, thousands of shelters will be intact, and, provided fallout precautions are taken, people will survive.

This viewpoint, of course, is no Soviet exclusive. It is shared by many American experts, and by organizations which have carried out critical surveys of this country's defence postures in recent years. Among them are the collective authors of the Rockefeller, Gaither, Johns Hopkins and the National Academy of Sciences reports, which called for an immediate crash program in shelter construction.

But while our "reports" gathered dust and we did little or nothing, the purposeful men in the Kremlin pushed the construction of shelters for all. By the end of 1960, intelligence sources inform us, the program was completed—one U.S. expert called it the most extensive shelter program in the world.

And now that every Soviet town and crossroads had its shelter, DOSAAF in early spring of 1961 launched still another ambitious drill program, billed as "exercises in shelter management."

The typical Soviet big-city shelter, with a capacity of 2000 persons, is a mass of steel and concrete set deep underground. It is equipped with blast-proof steel doors, emergency exit tunnels, air-filtering apparatus, its own water and power systems, detection devices for radiation, gases, and microbes, and enough food and compressed oxygen to last two weeks, the time necessary for radio-activity to drop to tolerable levels.

These shelters are engineered to withstand a nuclear bomb burst a few blocks away. Shelters in places unlikely to come under direct attack offer proportionately less elaborate protection. Those in rural areas, where fallout is the only worry, are little more than dugouts lined with lumber and roofed over with tin or scrap lumber.

"Two feet of dirt piled on the roof," DOSAAF instructors tell their classes, "will filter out 99 per cent of the fallout radiation."

A parallel features of the present drill is "evacuation exercises," and thereby hangs an interesting Soviet policy reversal.

All through the years, implacable regulations had called for city populations to stay put in case of war, allowing for certain exceptions.

But under recently decreed rules, only essential manpower stays behind. The vast majority—perhaps because of improved transportation—will be evacuated, first to staging areas 25 to 50 miles beyond city limits, then to Russia's vast, safe back country, along routes dotted with fallout-proof way stations.

In an atomic war, shelters or not, the dead in Russia would pile up. Estimates on the probable extent of the casualties are available. Last year, a Soviet military attache, toasting his way through a diplomatic dinner in Paris, let slip what he said was the Red Army's guess: two million dead.

"A bargain," he added. "During World War II we lost twenty five million."

Off-the-record American computations of Soviet losses, based on the probable numbers of targets and bombs involved, are remarkably close to the talkative Soviet official's two million.

But what would American losses be? Based on the current state of our civil defence preparations, if war came tomorrow our casualties would be 62 million dead and 24 million wounded.

The statistics of this carnage represent the result of dispassionate calculations by some of our best qualified experts. In the summer of 1959, the blood-chilling estimates were submitted at congressional committee hearings called by Representative Chet Holifield of California.

The official reaction was silence—tantamount, in the view of some observers, to an endorsement of the estimates and a tacit acknowledgment that one half of the nation would be maimed or slaughtered in any future atomic war.

The official Soviet position could be summed up like this: A well-informed, properly trained people who know the worst and the best about a disaster situation are not likely to lapse into hysteria and self-pitying thoughts of doom and surrender, or even simple resignation to fate.

Khrushchev must have had this in mind when a few years ago he commented with blunt cynicism: "A nuclear war will drive the capitalist population into insanity. Only the people in the communist countries will hold up well. They know what to expect and are fully prepared for it."

To "prepare" us, we have our own "DOSAAF," in the OCDM—office of civil defence mobilization—headed by director Frank B. Ellis and forming part of the executive office of the president.

Unlike DOSAAF, OCDM has been accused of being in a state of suspended animation from the start. Critics have claimed that it dozed through one cold war crisis after another, and that it was not even shaken up by the roaring fireball which leapt into the Siberian sky on August 12, 1953, heralding the birth of the Soviet H-bomb.

Coupled with official lethargy, of course, has been that of the American citizen. Attempts to arouse him to support of a civil defence system have met with almost universal failure. Part of the trouble, too, is that officials have admitted both publicly and privately that our defence program is inadequate.

Director Ellis of the OCDM as late as last April characterized the American civil defence program as "completely inadequate". Ellis pressed a demand for a program almost tripled in size—and emphasized his seriousness by threatening to resign if funds for the expansion were not forthcoming. He was opposed by both the director of the budget and the president's special assistant for national security affairs; other administration projects, they said, had greater priority for funds.

The Kremlin, however, is never in doubt as to the day and age we live in and plows industriously ahead with large-scale, costly defence plans. Their reasoning seems to be that "the bomb" is here to stay, something to live with, and if possible to survive.

DOSAAF promises its students that they will be able to straighten out a radioactive city in no time at all. Streets, roofs, and house walls will be cleansed of radioactivity by teams with fire hoses. Since fallout is only dust made radioactive, decontamination of dwellings will amount to little more than a thorough spring cleaning. Soviet citizens are told they should do the job in tight clothing, gloves and breathing masks.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McLennan): Order. I wonder whether the hon. member could indicate how much more he has.

Mr. Regnier: I believe I have three or four short paragraphs. I am sorry to inflict this punishment on the committee but I think it is very important to publicize civil defence in general.

When they are done with the job, the efficient DOSAAF will pick up the clothing and wash it free of radiation in one of its decontamination laundries.

Eyewash for Ivan? Is it really all that simple and innocuous?

No, it certainly isn't. DOSAAF glosses over many difficulties, but that is only customary with patriotic literature. Yet it is an undeniable fact that DOSAAF's relaxed views on fallout are shared by many American and British experts.

In some instances, the agreement is word for word. Some official DOSAAF publications are simply plagiarized versions of western works.

The works of Dr. Willard F. Libby, Nobel prize winner, former member of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission and a prolific writer on the atom, have been repeatedly pirated by the Russians.

No friend of the Soviets and an unwilling DOSAAF author, Dr. Libby nevertheless shares DOSAAF's views on fallout. Time and time again he has stated in scientific periodicals and before congressional committees that what some have said of the danger of fallout is immensely exaggerated.

More than 160 bombs—both atomic and hydrogen, including some of the largest and "dirtiest"—were set off between 1945 and 1958. Yet, as Dr. Lloyd W. Law of the national cancer institute told a congressional committee, the resulting fallout "was no more likely to produce cancer than two cigarettes a year".

For wearers of watches with luminous dials, Dr. Libby pointed out an interesting comparison: The radiation received from such a watch dial amounts to 40 units a year—as against one unit from thermonuclear bursts in an average year of testing.

That is the end of the article. I wish to thank the committee for putting up with my reading of this long article. I did not finish more than about one third of my speech but as I understand I can speak twice I will take a breathing spell and I may continue after another member has spoken. It took five years for Russia to complete its civil defence program. I should like to compliment the government for starting what one might call a crash program in civil defence and I think we will need all of five years with an accelerated program.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be too critical of the hon. member. In fact, I should like to commend him for drawing the attention of the house to what is going on with respect to this very important problem of civil defence in other countries. It is important that we should know about these matters, but I think that the committee has been very lenient and I hope this will not be considered a precedent for hon. members to read into the record very lengthy excerpts. If we were to adopt that practice and if it were extended, Hansard would be filled from time to time with articles drawn from sources outside the house. When the hon. member started to quote I did not realize that the quotation would be as lengthy as it was, and I hope he will not proceed later to complete the quotation from the document to which he has referred the committee. I thought that he would rather draw our attention to the source material and perhaps then summarize the gist of it. I hope that this will not be treated as a precedent for the reading into the record of long articles published outside the house. I think this goes contrary to the established rules of the House of Commons and would lead us into an adoption of a system which perhaps prevails in some other areas but is not normal in our parliamentary system.

Item agreed to.

79. Canada's civilian participation as a member of the international commissions for supervision and control in Indo-China including authority, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, for the appointment and fixing of salaries of commissioners, secretaries and staff by the governor in council, $224,810.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In his speech the other day the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not touch on the situation in Laos. In view of the importance of this situation in the context of current international problems confronting us, and as Canada is a member of the reactivated international truce commission in Laos, I am sure that the committee will expect a statement from the minister with regard to the situation in that turbulent little country.

When we last met in this house in regard to matters on which the minister had an opportunity to make some comment, he was about to leave for the Geneva conference. Since that time the conference has met from time to time, and in so far as one can judge from what has transpired, no real progress has been made. The minister had taken a proper position with regard to supplying the commission with equipment essential for the prosecution of the assignment given to the commission, of which Canada is a member. We would like to have from the minister a report as to whether or not it has been given the kind of assistance, the necessary equipment, to enable it to discharge its functions properly.

The more fundamental question as to whether there has been an effective cease fire is another matter about which I think the committee would expect a report. Then, there is the still more important question of whether or not the conference is going to be able to achieve the purpose hoped for by the United States, the United Kingdom and other countries, namely, a truly independent and neutral government. Not much progress on that point seems to have been made. I noticed the other day that the vice premier of communist China, or perhaps it was Mr. Chou En-lai himself, who seemed to indicate that it was ridiculous to assume that in Laos there could be a truly independent neutral government. He indicated rather there would be a government that would express the wishes of the people, and that the consequence would be that it would be a government made up of individuals who did not support the position of the west, who did not really maintain a neutral position, but were closer to the communist orbit than any other.

In any event, this conference that is taking place does not give me, at least, any particular confidence in its outcome, although I would hope that the situation were otherwise. This problem of Laos has been with us for some time. It certainly has taken an aggravated form within the period of the last eight months, although ever since the Geneva accord of 1954 it has been a problem of concern not only to the United States but to all peace loving countries. One would wish that the west had shown the same foresight as hindsight, because what had been urged upon the United States in 1956 is now accepted by that country as the kind of condition it would like to see prevail. It is regrettable that that position could not have been taken earlier. In this particular instance, it is only right to say that strong representations were made by western countries, including Canada, as to what was the wisest course to take in Laos.

We cannot forgo the view that, just as Berlin is now engaging our attention, once that problem is resolved we might find turbulency and a critical situation developing in a new form in Laos. Now that we have an opportunity to review what is being done at the conference in Geneva, it would be well for us to anticipate in every way possible an arrangement that would avoid the kind of situation which could eventuate, that is another crisis on which the communist world would be prepared to hang its hat. We know of the infiltration that is going on from North Viet Nam under the direction of Ho Chi Minh, and the kind of obstruction that is coming from another communist area in Asia.

This is a situation in which we have an interest, as one of the nations. It is one that engages our specific interest because we are a member of the international truce commission. I would be grateful to the minister, as I am sure the committee would be, for an up to date report as to what is happening in Geneva. What is the situation with regard to discharging our role in accordance with our mandate as a member of the commission?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the situation with regard to Laos is not as bad as the hon. member for Essex East has indicated, although one would be foolish to predict just what is going to happen. For example, I believe the monsoon season is now drawing to a close and the result may be an increase in military activity. The presence of the truce supervisory commission, of which India is chairman and Poland and Canada are members, has helped considerably to keep to a minimum the conflict in that unfortunate country.

Mind you, the commission has not yet received adequate equipment. There have been offers made, for example, recently by the royal government side and that particular picture is not as bad as it was a few weeks ago. I think the communists would like to see the commission have as little power and be just as ineffective as possible. On the other hand, throughout, we have taken the position that the commission had a job to do and that it should be given the tools with which to do that job. It has been impossible for the commission to visit any spot where there has been actual fighting or which could be described as a danger spot. However, representatives of the three parties in Laos are meeting quite regularly. Sometimes the commission is allowed to sit in; sometimes it is not allowed to do so.

There seems to be a great deal of patience exercised on all sides. The hon. member, from his experience in the Orient, will agree there is not much use trying to be in a big hurry in that part of the world. Patience is one of the main requisites to getting along.

I have the utmost admiration for the way in which the Canadians on this commission have been functioning in Laos. We have about 26 officers and men from the Department of National Defence and eight or 10 from the Department of External Affairs under Mr. Mayrand, who is our ambassador to Italy. I have been very pleased with the job they have done under most trying conditions. Canada in that part of the world is making a splendid contribution.

In Geneva, in the meantime, the 14-nation conference is working on a declaration of neutrality for Laos and on a pact which will establish the proper controls. For example, it will deal with getting outside fighting troops away from the country, the importation of arms, and that sort of thing. They have practically agreed upon a declaration of neutrality and are now working on the other document, which will be longer and a great deal more difficult to conclude.

The hon. member should not feel that progress is not being made. I should be very reluctant myself to be sitting in Geneva participating in all these discussions, because there have been a great many of them and there has been a tremendous amount of frustration. But Mr. Chester Ronning, our high commissioner in India, Mr. Paul Bridle, our ambassador to Turkey, and Brigadier Leech of the Department of National Defence, have been carrying on there day after day and week after week and considerable progress has been made.

I am hopeful it will be possible within the next few weeks for the 14-nation conference to reach agreement with regard to Laos. I cannot guarantee that will be the result, because the whole question may blow up. But there is considerable hope that a settlement will be reached. If that is the case, this may be the first field in which something worth while has been accomplished for the last many months.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the minister is optimistic as to the possible conclusion of the conference that is under way in Geneva. I do not wish to say much more about the situation in Laos except that I feel the minister's optimism, understandable though it is, nevertheless is not a realistic appreciation of the situation in that sector.

Of course the minister has an advantage that I do not possess. He is aware of the latest exchanges and the nature of all the discussions in Geneva. But it seems to me we ought to take a very realistic view of what is happening in the whole of Indo-China. While there may be a declaration of agreement on the question of the kind of neutrality that is to prevail regarding government in Laos, it would surprise me very much, in view of the record there and the infiltrations that are taking place via North Viet Nam and from across the Chinese-Burma border, if we can conclude that there have as yet been placed before us those guarantees which would give us the conviction that the solemn undertaking of those ideologically opposed to us will be observed. However, only time will tell.

The situation in Laos is not unrelated to what is taking place in South Viet Nam particularly. I take it that the truce commission continues to operate in Cambodia. While perhaps there is no great expense involved in the maintenance of the international truce commission in Cambodia, some justification ought to be given for its continuance. I am not saying it should not be continued, but when we talk of Cambodia we cannot overlook the forebodings of the former head of the government, Prince Sihanouk, who I believe has since resigned, repeating what he has done on other occasions. His apprehension as to what is likely to eventuate from the kind of discussions that have taken place in Geneva indicate that this is a theatre in which we could have increasing trouble in the future.

We hope this will be avoided, but in our survey of what is going on in the world it seems most desirable that we should at least have some idea of the dangers that lurk in that sector, not only because of its effect in Cambodia, Laos and North Viet Nam, but because of the ultimate consequences throughout southeast Asia.

One can very well see what would happen if by a process of attrition Laos were to go by the board. Then Cambodia might go and there would be an increasing strain upon the kind of defence that South Viet Nam would be able to put up against the forces of Ho Chi Minh. Then the consequences for Thailand and ultimately for other Asian countries like India are all part of the process which we must inevitably take into account in the kind of world in which we are living. Does the minister wish to say anything about the truce commission, particularly in North Viet Nam?

The United States government has apparently been able to satisfy President Diem of its intention to increase its assistance to that country in various forms. What does this further assistance mean in terms of further obligations on the part of the international truce commission? Is there any prospect whatsoever of the truce commission in this country being called upon to liquidate its operation in the foreseeable future? I am not advising that; I am merely inquiring. I ask this question because I feel, as I am sure the minister does, that this is one of those areas where we can anticipate an increase in responsibility and concern.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Essex East is unduly pessimistic.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Realistic.

Mr. Green: He speaks of South Viet Nam falling, Cambodia falling, Laos falling, Thailand falling, Burma and India falling. They may. I cannot guarantee that they will not. But if I were foreign minister of the Soviet union I think I could record a much longer list of countries in which the Soviet union is not doing so well and where they should be shedding a lot of tears.

In my judgment, on the western side there is too much inferiority complex about the Russians; that they are always outsmarting us and we are always behind. This is not the case at all. They make a great many foolish mistakes. They made a very foolish mistake last week when they started nuclear testing. That is just one example of how foolish they can be. They make mistakes in southeast Asia just as they make mistakes everywhere else. We have made mistakes in southeast Asia also. However, the fact is that in Laos, while the situation last May was extremely serious from a military point of view when this convention first met in Geneva, today it is very much better. It is just possible that the three parties in Laos will be able to agree on a government. It may not be the kind of government the west wants; of course it will not be. However, it will probably be the kind of government that the Laotians want; and after all, that is the main test. I think we must look at these problems in these other countries, from that point of view.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I agree with that statement.

Mr. Green: As to Prince Sihanouk, the hon. member for Essex East says, "Oh, when we get a government, it will be a pro-communist government and the whole thing is terrible; we are just going to lose out right down the line". Let us try to be a bit more optimistic than that. We are going to have to face tensions of this kind not for a day or for a week but perhaps for ten years, 15 years, or 20 years and I think we must be a little bit more optimistic in our approach.

The hon. member mentions Cambodia. I think the head of state there resigned only as prime minister. I think he is still head of state. I refer to Prince Sihanouk. He is a very good leader. He was largely responsible for the conference taking place at all in Geneva. He went there and made a very statesmanlike speech in opening the conference. If things really work out in Laos it will be at least partially as a result of the leadership he gave. We have a skeleton commission in Cambodia. I do not know that they are needed there but Prince Sihanouk has asked that they remain. They are a great help in keeping peace in that country and in preventing either the communists or the western side from interfering, and he wants the commission to remain. He is extremely friendly to Canada. We have made a splendid contribution in that country and we intend to leave our representatives there as long as that situation continues.

In Viet Nam the commissioners deal with both North Viet Nam and South Viet Nam. They go over and visit the communists every once in a while and they come back to Saigon. We have plenty of trouble with that commission. The Polish representative and the Canadian representative do not always agree. Sometimes the Indian representative agrees with us and sometimes he agrees with the Poles. There have been many awkward situations but we are getting along and South Viet Nam has not fallen. I think the government of South Viet Nam is probably stronger now than it was a year ago. We are hoping that gradually this position will be worked out. In North Viet Nam, and South Viet Nam, Canada again is making a great contribution. It so happens that our commissioner there is Mr. C. J. Woodsworth, the son of J. S. Woodsworth, the founder of the C.C.F. party and he has been doing an excellent job.

These posts in southeast Asia are very difficult ones for Canadians. A fairly large group in the Department of External Affairs and in the Department of National Defence have now had service there. I believe this is one of the areas of the world in which Canada can help a great deal. We are not doing this under the United Nations. These commissions are in there as a result of having been set up at the Geneva conference in 1954. However, regardless of the fact that they are not United Nations commissions they are doing a good job. I realize that most of the reports from the region are full of woe and sadness and to the effect that everything is going to pieces. However, the world has not gone to pieces yet. It may do so next week but it has not done so yet. In the meantime, let us keep our chins up.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure that we all admire the minister's optimism. I suppose that a foreign minister must have optimism. However, I think it is the duty of an opposition, in the face of an optimism that is thought not to be fully realistic, to point out the situation as one sees it. I am not suggesting that the government of Canada or the minister, by their diplomatic efforts alone, can correct the situation. Obviously no one has made that claim. I am simply saying that from my own analysis of the situation—and I have been in the terrain and know the personalities involved—I do not share the confidence which the minister has in the situation.

He will recall having complained in this House of Commons, and properly so, about the inadequate air equipment, and the like, of the commission for the prosecution of its assignment which was, among other things, to see that there was a cease fire. Even at this late date the minister has indicated to the committee that there is a continuation of this problem of inadequate equipment. That situation, of course, arises not because Canada or the minister wants it to be the case but because there is on the part of someone a lack of co-operation which makes the work of the commission ineffective. I think the minister gave the basis for the complaint that exists, namely that the Soviet union and others are not interested in seeing an effective operation by the commission. That, of course, in itself is a serious matter. What I am saying is this. While one must not overstate a case, it is the duty of an opposition to anticipate. In this particular area we are seeing an operation that is causing concern and it will continue to do so unless there is an improvement through future developments. As long as the parties are talking in Geneva I do not suppose much that will be fundamentally damaging will eventuate.

All I am saying is that the protracted discussions indicate the importance of Indo-China in the continuous effort of communist penetration taking place. I am not saying that we are losing at every point. I am not saying that the Soviet union is gaining at every point. I am not saying that it has not its adversities, drawbacks and failures. Of course it has. But what I am saying is that in this particular area, one of the vital areas in Asia, we are confronted with a situation which is part of these various crises which confront us from time to time. Now it is Berlin. Tomorrow it will be somewhere else. Some day I am sure this particular situation will be another one about which we shall be registering our complaint against a policy of increasing illegitimate spheres of influence on the part of those who wish to impose the communist way of life on the rest of the world. I am not blaming the minister. I am not blaming the government. These are situations that have causes beyond the power of any one government to resolve. However, I do not believe that the situation in Indo-China is one that warrants the optimism of the minister. The minister will recall that two years ago he told us in this House of Commons that great progress was being made in disarmament. He did almost everything he could in that field, of course. We all know that. However, no great progress is being made in disarmament. It is well that we should look realistically at the situation so that we are not fooled by policies which may lull us for the moment but which eventually only play into the hands of those who se purpose it is to cause us to be complacent.

I speak thus not by way of criticism of the minister or of the government but to point out what I believe the real assessment of this situation should be.

Mr. Green: I am very glad the hon. member tried to prove his case by referring to the question of disarmament. The idea seems to have been circulated that I am down in the dumps in regard to disarmament and have given up hope. Nothing could be further from the truth. I think the actual fact today is that because of the increased tension over Berlin and because of these nuclear tests millions upon millions of people around the world have decided their lives are in danger particularly from radiation. I believe the results will be a much greater urgency to the bringing about of a disarmament agreement at the next session of the general assembly of the United Nations than there has ever been before. There is not much point in giving up because that will not help anyone. What we want to do is stop this nuclear arms race which is becoming steadily faster.

While the unaligned countries at Belgrade last week may not have gone all out in their criticism of the Soviet union for conducting nuclear tests, their judgment in so doing has been to a degree backed up by the fact that within a very few days the United States announced its intention to conduct a nuclear test.

I have here a resolution passed by the unaligned countries on disarmament which reads as follows:

The participants in the conference consider that disarmament is an imperative need and the most urgent task of mankind. A radical solution of this problem, which has become an urgent necessity in the present state of armaments, in the unanimous view of participating countries, can be achieved only by means of a general, complete and strictly and internationally controlled disarmament.

As I said the other day there is a new disarmament plan which I think is very important, and which may well make quite a difference to this whole situation. There will be an opportunity in New York within the next few weeks to mobilize world opinion against this nuclear arms race.

I do not wish to do any boasting here today but from the time of the second world war Canada has taken her full part in trying to bring about disarmament. Certainly during the last two years we have been in the forefront in taking action of this kind, and I believe there is a reasonable chance that there will be some success at the coming session of the general assembly. Certainly we will do the best we can to mobilize world opinion on this question.

It is very heartening to realize that we have the support of both opposition parties. I know there is not one member in this house on the government side, in the Liberal party or in the New Democratic party, who will not be behind us in this effort. I am not suggesting we will succeed. After all, Canada is not running the world yet, but we will do what we can. I hope there will not be a lot of Jeremiahs and crape hangers here in Ottawa, not only in the House of Commons but in the press gallery as well, continually ridiculing what we are trying to do. This issue may involve the whole future of civilization and it is much too serious a proposition to have doubting Thomases all over the place. For goodness sakes, let the duly elected leaders in Canada sitting here in the House of Commons realize that fact. If people outside wish to do a lot of calamity howling, let them do it, but here we must keep our chins up and do the best we can to meet this situation.

I have a report of a speech made by general of the army, Douglas MacArthur, in Manila early in July which gives me great encouragement. General MacArthur in my judgment was the outstanding military leader of the last war. First of all he defended the Philippines and then fought his way back and throughout gave wonderful leadership. There has probably never been a better general in the history of warfare. The following is his statement:

General MacArthur said the advances in military weaponry have destroyed the possibility of war being used as a means for settling international differences. He said that if global war could be outlawed "it would mark the greatest advance of civilization since the sermon on the mount".

If there is one thing the peoples of the east and west share, it is a desire for peace, he continued. But, he added, the constant acceleration of the preparations for war may, without specific intent, precipitate "a cataclysm of destruction".

General MacArthur said the world's leaders "must have sufficient imagination and courage to translate the universal wish for peace".

That is the aim of the Canadian government.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think anyone would wish to underestimate the importance of the minister's determination and optimism in this matter of disarmament. While the difficulties seem to be greater than they were, I do not think any of us fully realize that as difficulties become greater, there is more incentive to greater action for their removal. There is no doubt about that in our minds. Of course we have to be realistic as well, and the words used by General MacArthur, which have just been quoted—the fact that nuclear weapons have destroyed the possibility of war—merely meant they have destroyed the possibility of war in the minds of sane persons in the sense of war settled nothing. But the minister himself told us the other day that we were on the brink of nuclear war and destruction. That is why some of us feel a little depressed about the situation, as the minister no doubt does himself, not as a reason for sitting back and doing nothing, but as a reason for moving forward in an attempt to do more. I know the minister and our delegates will do what they can at the United Nations along these lines.

The specific item with which we are dealing has to do with Indo-China and control of the commission there in Laos. In this regard it is not easy to be optimistic about progress. The minister has referred to the difficulties of acquiring equipment to assure the function of the commission. I find it impossible to believe that this can be an insurmountable difficulty. If the will to make progress is there, there should not be much trouble finding equipment. Canada could itself supply the equipment which is required for this commission. The difficulty in respect to equipment, I am sure the minister will agree, has been manufactured or at least exaggerated by those who have other reasons for holding up progress in this matter. What worries us on this side, as I am sure it worries the government, is the possibility of these discussions in Geneva being used as a screen behind which the communists can build up their strength in Laos so that when the time comes to break up the discussions it will be very hard to get them out of Indo-China and Laos. That is what worries us.

Mr. Green: As I pointed out to the hon. member for Essex East it was very difficult to get them out last May when the conference commenced. It cannot be harder to get them out than it was when we met in Geneva then, because the situation today is a great deal better than it was at that time.

This whole area may blow up. I cannot guarantee for a minute that it will not, but I think there is a reasonable chance that some settlement will be worked out.

Mr. Pearson: We hope the minister is right.

82. Relief and repatriation of distressed Canadian citizens abroad and their dependents and for the reimbursement of the United Kingdom for relief expenditures incurred by its diplomatic and consular posts on Canadian account (part recoverable), $20,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister say whether or not there is any Canadian property formerly owned by Canadian religious bodies that has been taken over by the government of Cuba and for which no compensation has been paid?

Mr. Green: Is the hon. member for Essex East referring to properties in Cuba?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. My hon. friend will recall that before the summer recess a group of religious sisters left Cuba on arrangements which the minister and our mission there had been able to effect. I did read afterwards that the convent which they were occupying had been taken over by the government of Cuba.

Mr. Green: I do not think that was a Canadian order; I think it was a Spanish order. We have had no complaints from Canadians about the loss of property in Cuba. We have had no complaints from religious bodies.

Mr. Chevrier: A community of nuns has come back from Cuba quite recently. I understand they have property there. What has happened to it?

Mr. Green: We have had no requests in connection with any such property.

Mr. Chevrier: Are there any Canadian missionaries in Cuba now?

Mr. Green: There are a few, and they are doing splendid work.

83. Canadian representation at international conferences, $321,500.

Mr. Jones: I should like to make a couple of remarks in connection with this vote for Canadian representation at international conferences, particularly in view of some of the comments that were made earlier today and in the past few years. I think it is necessary that our representatives at international conferences, particularly in their relations with the communists, understand one of the elements of the struggle which is going on.

I think it is quite obvious from what the hon. member from Kootenay West said today when he characterized the problem of Berlin as being a crisis over Berlin that apparently he does not appreciate what the real crisis is. It certainly is not over Berlin, it is over the struggle between the communists and the democratic world.

We have now the new leader of the New Democratic party, the premier of Saskatchewan, vacillating in his advice to the country. Two years ago he said we should be in NATO. A year ago he said we should be out of NATO. Now he says we should remain in NATO only as long as NATO does exactly what we say. This sort of advice betokens lack of understanding of the serious challenge which faces us from the communist forces.

There is one thought that I should like to place on record in regard to our general approach to the communist challenge. In the last few years great emphasis has been laid on the western responses to Soviet initiative. Often one hears that the west is losing the propaganda war, and assertions of a like nature, implying the conclusion that if we lose the propaganda war we will have lost to communism. I want to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, it is my view that no one can seriously contend that we are losing in the realm of ideas. Certainly, there has not been a single country in the world which had adopted communism by a free vote. There is not one government in the world which has had the misfortune to fall to the communists which has ever given its people the opportunity to vote itself out of communism. These are very well known facts but their significance to the communists is perhaps not as fully appreciated in the non-communist world. We sometimes think that by stating these facts the communists will feel abashed. In truth they do not feel abashed at all and the reason they do not feel abashed is to be found in the basic fundamentals of their creed. The communists basically do not hope to achieve their end by persuasion. They do not hope to achieve their end by argument. Communism, and this runs all through their creed, is based on force. Hon. members recall Lenin's statement on this subject:

> Communism is the dictatorship of the proletariat, unrestricted by law, and based on force.

This has continued to be basic communist doctrine right down to the present time. The recent draft summary of the program of the communist party of the Soviet union which was sent to all members by the U.S.S.R. embassy in Canada restates the emphasis on force in several ways throughout its pages. I should like to draw attention to a statement on page three of this draft summary. It reads:

> The practice of the world's greatest revolution and socialist transformation of society that has achieved unprecedented heights of development and advance, has confirmed the historic correctness of Leninism and dealt a smashing blow at the ideology of social reformism.

In other words, they say revolution is the means which has proved to be triumphant and it has dealt a smashing blow at reform, evolution, and that they say confirmed the correctness of the earlier statement of Lenin that I quoted.

Communism is based on force. It gains power by force. It maintains its power by force. This is an assertion with which most people will readily agree. The corollary of this does not find such ready agreement. The corollary is simply this, that propaganda, persuasion, though of importance in the communist armoury, is nevertheless of secondary importance in their thinking. They use force when they can get away with it. They use threats of force when they think that force itself is too risky and they use propaganda in between times, sort of like the ball players of a ball club talking it up until they get the ball again.

I submit there is importance in recognizing that propaganda to the communists is secondary and is not used chiefly for the purpose of proselytizing but rather as an adjunct to force, that propaganda with them is secondary to force, secondary to threats. Threats of force in undermining the will to resist of anybody who opposes them may not seem significant, but I think it is, and it probably explains Hungary and the recent nuclear explosions in Russia. The Prime Minister described those latter explosions as being contemptuous of world opinion and that statement could have been made about the earlier use of force in Hungary. In fact, as the communists' opportunities for gaining adherents diminish in the world, as they will in the western world and elsewhere where living standards are rising very rapidly, they will be able to rely less and less on propaganda. The old rallying cry of the communists used to be: "Workers of the world unite; you have nothing to lose but your chains". Obviously this cannot be so these days. This is the very point where the communists have failed most miserably, in helping the common man. It is the workers they have failed chiefly above everybody else. Here in the second decade of the second half of the twentieth century the standard of living of the Russian people, for example, and the others are even worse, is far behind ours, behind that of the United States and of western Europe even though they have greater natural resources, more people and more land than Canada and the United States.

I should like to remind the committee that there was something in Russia before 1917 and that other nations have rebuilt since 1917 to a far higher standard of living than the Russians have. The communists have failed to help the ordinary people. I think this is emphasized dramatically when one realizes that a person on unemployment insurance payments in this country gets more than the majority of working Russians—a person in receipt of social aid gets more than employed Russians.

Not only have the communists not been able to feed and clothe their people by twentieth century standards but in addition they have not given them freedom either. I suppose you could imagine somebody throwing back their phrase to them and saying, "Communists of the world join in free enterprise; you have nothing to lose but your chains". They would have a better opportunity to do so, of course, if they could get out of their countries, but the point I want to emphasize is that they have failed most significantly in the very areas of human endeavour where success would have helped them to persuade. They have deliberately concentrated their efforts in fact in those areas of human endeavour which help them to intimidate, threaten, bully and enforce by force communist rule. They have in fact placed guns before butter, fear before food and force before freedom. These things are of the essence when you consider dealing or treating with them, when we send our representatives abroad in order to meet the communists at international gatherings and when we try to lead them along the path of reasonableness.

I was much impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood the other day when he said that if we stick to it long enough perhaps they will lose their stimulus to aggression. We must stick to it in the meantime and never forget that at this time as in the past they rely chiefly on force. Therefore we must remain strong while we shift our response to their propaganda from the day-to-day meeting of their propaganda utterances to an exposition of communism and an assertion of the positive values of the way of the western world in providing that happy combination of prosperity and freedom which it has been our good fortune to enjoy.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, does vote 83 cover all the international conferences to which we go during the year, including United Nations meetings? Does it cover all the expenses for Canadian representation?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: So the total rental we pay for accommodation at all our conferences during the year is $18,000. Is that correct? I am looking at page 181 where the details are given. They show that last year travelling expenses of Canadian representatives were $255,000. Presumably that included not only their travelling expenses but also their meals, accommodation and so on. Then there is a figure for rental of $18,000. Does that cover rental of all the space we use at all international conferences including the United Nations assembly, where I suspect we have to take a good deal of space in hotels?

Mr. Green: In the case of the delegation to the United Nations, for example, they would use the regular office of our permanent representative, and this rental of $18,000 apparently is only for odds and ends of accommodation. For example, in Geneva we have a villa for an office now. It is not half as good as it sounds. Various nations have villas in the suburbs. The grass is very long and there is a cow in the next field. I presume that this $18,000 would cover accommodation of that kind.

Mr. Pearson: But it does not cover hotel accommodation for delegates at meetings?

Mr. Green: No.

86. Gift to commemorate the sesquicentennial anniversary of the republic of Mexico, $3,500.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister tell us what was the gift given by Canada to commemorate the sesquicentennial anniversary of the independence of Mexico?

Mr. Green: It was a splendid totem pole from British Columbia.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am surprised that a totem pole from British Columbia cost $3,500. I do not think we should measure our gifts in dollars but I notice that the next item, the gift to Nigeria, bears a higher amount. I am not complaining about that but I should like to know what that gift was.

Mr. Green: The gift to Mexico was on the occasion of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of their independence. The gift to Nigeria was for their independence day and it consisted of Canadian books.

Mr. Pearson: Does the minister know what has happened to the totem pole?

Mr. Green: I know we have had a lot of trouble arranging to get it carved. I think it is not yet finished.

External aid office—

88. Salaries and expenses, $525,923.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this is a vote of $525,000 for the external aid office which is an increase of $70,000 over last year. Could the minister tell us something about the work of the office and whether it has succeeded in co-ordinating and bringing together all the activities of the government in so far as their administration is concerned in the field of international economic assistance?

Mr. Green: External aid formerly was divided among several departments, namely, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Finance and the Department of External Affairs. A committee of senior civil servants studied the situation and reported that it would be much more efficient to have one external aid office reporting directly to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. That was done last fall.

There was a great deal of work in setting up the office, but I am very pleased with the way in which it has been functioning. As the Leader of the Opposition knows, Mr. Moran is the director general of the external aid office. He came from a posting as high commissioner in Pakistan. I think there is excellent work being done.

Mr. Pearson: I do know Mr. Moran and I think he is a very good man for this particular post. I know how efficient he is. I think it is an improvement over the previous situation to have the foreign aid co-ordinated in one office. This should make for efficiency and also for economy of administration.

Am I to take it that because of this development, which I think is a good one, all the recommendations to the government for foreign aid, the allocations for foreign aid, the responsibility in so far as officials are concerned for negotiations on those allocations, now go through this office to the minister and from the minister to the cabinet? It is all centralized in that way?

Mr. Green: There is an advisory board made up of the representatives of the three departments I have mentioned. Then, they make recommendations through the director general.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This would be a convenient item on which to say something about the principle involved in foreign aid. Canada has, of course, been a member of the Colombo plan from the very beginning. Since that time we have extended assistance to the West Indies, to certain countries in Africa under the special commonwealth African aid program, and we have likewise provided technical assistance under United Nations operations, and in other ways have given assistance to underdeveloped countries. There is a drive now under way, as the minister of course knows much better than I do, in the United States in particular, for increasing contributions on the part of nations that have been giving aid and nations that have not been giving assistance to underdeveloped countries. The President of the United States in his address in this house and in his inaugural speech, emphasized the growing awareness of the United States of the necessity for assisting underdeveloped countries on an increasing scale.

The United States government has, indeed, been seeking to persuade, and publicly, countries like West Germany and Japan to take a greater interest as donor countries in assistance to underdeveloped areas. I have recently been examining a publication prepared by Professors Millikan and Rostow, both of M.I.T., the latter now being one of the president's advisers, in which this whole problem is pointed up in an emphatic way. Their thesis is, of course, that in the light of the gross national product of certain countries, not enough assistance has been given by such countries to underdeveloped areas. The minister undoubtedly knows this publication. If he does not know it, he certainly knows the kind of thinking that now prevails in certain quarters, particularly in the United States.

Included among the countries regarded as not playing their full role is Canada. Canada is listed, I think, even below West Germany among those countries that did not give of their gross national product in proportion to other countries. This idea is going to receive increasing attention. It seems to me that it would be helpful if we could have from the minister some indication of the government's thinking in this particular. I am not seeking to be critical of the government because this program had its genesis under another administration. Looking at this problem objectively, I think one would want to know what recent thinking has meant. Are we going to make a real attack on poverty outside our own borders as well as at home. There has to be an increasing realization by countries who have been assisting underdeveloped areas of the need for an increase in the amount of their contributions.

The hon. member for Greenwood, of course, in the speeches he has made in this house has given us a lead, although he has not particularized the extent of the assistance we should provide in anything like the way Professors Millikan and Rostow have. We are all familiar of course, and the hon. member has helped familiarize us with the thinking and writing in this regard of Miss Barbara Ward who feels that the technique used in giving assistance under UNRRA might be used. In this way the total amount of foreign aid that is practical could be reached. Now, we are far short of her total figure. I am not now arguing for any particular figure for Canada, but it does seem to me, in the light of the thinking that is now going on particularly in the United States, we will not be able to escape a careful re-examination of the problem of foreign aid.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to finish the train of thought I had just before the adjournment. I had just concluded indicating what appeared to be the attitude being taken, particularly in the United States, with regard to increasing, perhaps on a more rationalized basis, the assistance now accorded by well-known donor countries to underdeveloped areas.

I had said that in recent publications which obviously support the administration in the United States it has been suggested that certain countries, in relation to their gross national product, were not bearing a proportional responsibility for assistance to needy countries.

I do not believe, given all the facts and having in mind the various headings under which assistance is given both here and in other countries, Canada need feel it has shirked its responsibility. But I believe this matter is going to compel itself more and more upon us, as well as on other nations. We all recognize that in the interdependent world in which we live one of the instruments by which peace will be maintained, short of aggressive intentions and acts, will be by recognizing that other countries have to be given an opportunity to enjoy a higher standard of life through improved literacy, stimulus of the productive processes of their economic systems, and the like.

It is not without significance that one finds, apart from governments, writers, students and zealous individuals reminding us that in this kind of world we are indeed our brother's keeper and that only by recognizing this fact will we be able fully to contribute to the existence of peace in the world.

The crash program offered to Latin America by the President of the United States, for instance, is only one example of the new thinking, the shift in emphasis and the leadership that is being provided. I mentioned declarations made by various leaders in different areas. I single one out, not because he is the only one to have done so but because his pronouncement was the last one of great significance. I refer of course to the recent declaration of Pope John XXIII in his encyclical, in which he reminded not only his own adherents but the people of the world of our common responsibility to help other countries.

This is a problem which is not as easy of solution as many people suggest, because we have problems at home, as have other countries. We have unemployment; we have other problems of a domestic character that demand attention. It is not easy for governments, in the face of such difficulties, to discharge what I know the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada recognizes as an essential direction that Canada must pursue.

It is true that we paid special attention recently to the request that came from the Prime Minister of India with regard to an accelerated form of assistance to the third five-year plan of India. In that connection we recall that Miss Barbara Ward, who has written so knowingly and brilliantly on these matters, has suggested that in the interests of world peace priority should be given by the donor nations to assisting India in the herculean task that lies ahead in the prosecution of her third five-year plan.

Canada has joined with the United States, and I believe the United Kingdom and France, in providing further assistance to India in this regard. That of course was a step which we commended in this house. I know, in the examination of this problem, that particularly in the United States, again, considerable attention is being paid to the methods employed in the administration of the funds being provided for needy countries.

Professor Galbraith, now the United States ambassador in Delhi, recently wrote a useful memorandum which I think is made public in the Foreign Affairs magazine. He outlined that there was not only a need for recognizing the increasing magnitude of this problem and the responsibility thereby imposed on countries like Canada, Great Britain, France, West Germany, Japan and others, but it was also necessary to realize that while these funds would be necessary on an increasing scale to assist underdeveloped areas, some tighter form of administration should be employed to make sure the best use was being made of the assistance given. He lists priorities of regions of the world or of countries in those regions. For instance, he mentions that much money could be wasted by ignoring the lack of certain factors in certain countries that require assistance. I am sure the minister has borne in mind all of these things. He is undoubtedly much more fully aware of them than I am. However, I mention them because I believe we are now entering a new era of assistance to underdeveloped countries.

Over the week end I noticed that the President of the United States is about to invite, so it is said, a prominent and able financier in the United States to take charge of a program of foreign aid assistance of that country, based on recommendations which have been made by Mr. Labouisse who has done so much in the United Nations when on loan from the United States state department, and now serving his country in Washington. The plans envisaged, according to the report, flow from his recommendations. They support the thinking that I detect in suggestions made by Professor Galbraith and others. In any event I am sure the minister will be the first to recognize the importance of this kind of effort in confronting the terrible situation that faces mankind at the present time. Altogether apart from the exigencies and the dictates of their own foreign policies, the western countries particulary, through the Colombo plan, have shown an objective interest in assisting other countries. We have been an original member of the Colombo plan organization for some time but, as I see it, we are now entering a new area of legitimate pressure to take an added load of responsibility. I am sure that the government is giving this matter careful consideration.

In making the remarks I have made today on this subject I have not had in mind any basis for criticism. I realize only too well the difficulties involved. However, it would be reassuring to know from the minister at first hand in this House of Commons, what the government's views regarding these matters are, as I think large sections of our people are interested in this problem. Does it share the general view taken by the present administration in the United States? Does it share the view that an examination should be made of the extent of contributions made by various countries as stated in the publications I have mentioned? What is the expectancy of trying to meet these further suggested contributions that are being proposed by so many private individuals like Miss Barbara Ward and more particularly by those in office today in countries that have been providing this assistance to underdeveloped areas? This is a problem that I know is not easy of solution. However, it is one we face and one from which we cannot shrink; and I am sure it is one that, over the years, will indicate the appreciation we have had of the nature of the problem which faces mankind at the present time.

Mr. McGee: I should like to raise on this particular item a few points having to do with the external aid office. Some of what I have to say will be in part repetition of matters I raised during the deliberations of the external affairs committee. However, before I begin, I cannot resist saying that I am waiting with fascination, after this afternoon's discussion, to find out whether the hon. member for Essex East has decided whether he is an optimistic pessimist or a pessimistic optimist. I hope he will let us know what his choice is in this regard before the conclusion of the discussion this evening.

I should also like to say that I congratulate the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the type of leadership they have provided in this whole debate and in this whole period of crisis and international tension that is upon us. It is refreshing to find a clear and concise statement of policy being made and being heard and understood by the people of Canada.

Having said that, one can hardly avoid mentioning the hon. member for Greenwood when one is discussing external aid. The service the honourable and distinguished gentleman has rendered to this house in the last few years in espousing the cause of the effectiveness and in fact the necessity of aid to the underdeveloped and uncommitted countries of the world cannot be overestimated or too highly praised. However, in these last few years—and I feel I am getting to be a bit of a bore on this subject—I have been trying without too much success—and I must add quickly "with some success"—to extract from the Department of External Affairs and in particular from the external aid office some visual representation of the program upon which Canada has embarked and proposes to embark in the future, something which can be taken by those of us who served on the committee and those of us in the house who are interested in this phase of external affairs and by means of which we can—and I suppose I am obliged to use the word—sell this program, this idea, the urgency of this type of thinking and the type of foreign aid program we have, not only to our constituents but to the people of Canada at large. There are many of us on the committee and there are other members in the House of Commons who are willing and anxious to do this missionary work. The minister has done a tremendous amount, as has the Prime Minister, the hon. member for Greenwood and others, in carrying this message in a general sense to the people of Canada. However, there are those of us who are willing and anxious to help in this work and we are most anxious to get the material which we can take to interested groups in our constituencies. I shall have something more to say later about the type of material I have in mind. It would be helpful if this program could be accelerated and this material could be placed in our hands with as little delay as possible.

During the discussions on the foreign aid vote in the committee on external affairs the witnesses before the committee, and Mr. Moran in particular, underlined the difficulties and the complexities that confront any government, particularly one in the northern hemisphere, in providing the type of aid needed in the form in which it is required by the recipient countries. There are difficulties of having available here the type of expert required with the type of expert knowledge which has the highest priority in the system of needs established by the nation requesting this assistance. This provides not only a challenge to the foreign aid office itself but to our universities and in a larger sense to our business and industrial communities. The type of expert assistance required in many foreign aid areas can only be given by those expert individuals urgently required by industry and business in general in this country. I suggest this situation provides a further challenge to the industrial community of this country.

These industrial communities are now faced with competitive price and production challenges and are responding to urgent government requests to meet the increasing competition for our traditional markets. We have already seen evidence that there is progress in this regard. However, the challenge must not only be to serve our national interest but to relinquish from time to time these skilled individuals in order that they may move to those underdeveloped countries to perform the tasks which must be accomplished there. From my personal experience in dealing with many individuals in this country there is an expressed desire to participate in this aid field. As was indicated during the committee hearing, many individuals have the desire but not the skill or, on the contrary, have the skill without the desire.

[Mr. McGee.]

I suggest there are two facets involved in the solution to this problem. The first lies in the need of a long range program of the type we have heard announced in the United States by President Kennedy, encompassing a five year term of foreign aid. This program has been successful to a certain degree and is certainly a long range plan which will not be terminated after two or three years before its effectiveness has been accomplished.

The problem with which we are faced regarding this aspect of our program has reference to the expert assistance most required by recipient countries, which for several reasons is not available for one, two or more years. I feel that in addition to the sense of urgency which exists among the personnel of the department there should be a sense of urgency in respect to co-operation by other departments of government.

The public accounts committee discussed the Canada council scholarship program. That is something which will be under way over a fairly long period of time. However, there is a choice with respect to sending experts abroad to recipient countries or bringing individuals from those countries to Canada for training. I will have more to say regarding the problems involved here, but this is a challenge we must meet.

The Canada council has through its scholarship program offered great assistance to many individuals in the field of culture, but there is one individual studying fourteenth century wills in England. While this may be a tremendous advantage in the way of cultural development I suggest there must be a system of priority and emergency regarding the designation of the types of fields to be undertaken. Certainly in this world of today, faced with the compelling challenge of communism, the emphasis should be switched from the study and interest in fourteenth century wills to engineering, tropical agriculture and other faculties which lend themselves to humanitarian aid to the underdeveloped countries which is, after all, a long range challenge to democracy. There should be co-operation in government activities to assist in the training of individuals in logical and effective skills in order to help in the development of these countries.

Regarding the method of communication of this message to Canadians at large on as extensive a basis as possible, it is my understanding there are five thousand students from Asia, from Africa and the West Indies studying under one auspices or another in Canada, and who upon their graduation return to their respective countries. I suggest this is one area which represents a real challenge to Canada.

It has been stated today and on previous occasions during this debate that the west always responds to the activities of the communists—the communists act and we react, having lost our initiative. I suggest in a sense it could be argued that we have lost our initiative in the same way a dog has lost initiative until the flea bites him. However, I feel the problem is more profound than that.

It seems to me in this area a unique opportunity is provided for Canadians particularly around university cities. As I have indicated, there are approximately five thousand young men and women coming to Canada from Africa, from Asia and the West Indies and other similar areas. It is the flavour of democracy which they acquire during their experience here which will be of greater value to Canada and certainly to the cause of democracy generally than perhaps many of the millions of dollars spent in other ways, of which we will hear more later this week.

These young men and women will return to the countries of their origin and will become beyond any shadow of a doubt the leaders and members of the corps surrounding the leaders which will guide their respective nations to their ultimate destinies in the coming generation.

This surely represents a challenge to Canadians which I am sure has already to some degree been accepted by groups who are actively sponsoring students in this country. The universities as well as other non-university organizations have done a great deal in this field through providing facilities by which those individuals can meet with Canadian students. I feel that much more can be done in this direction by inviting these students from the universities into our homes and communities in order that they may see something of democratic society rather than strictly classroom activity in Canada.

I am proud to say that when this question was raised in the external affairs committee an important statement was made regarding the necessity for co-operation and assistance of the Canadian public at large, and that when I returned to my constituency, having contacted six or seven organizations and outlined the magnitude of the problem, I discovered each and every one of these organizations either undertook to bring the problem to the attention of their executives or, as my own service club indicated, something is being done in this regard at this present time. I feel this is of tremendous advantage in showing these foreign students something of the fibre and character of our democratic society.

As I suggest, this is being carried on by university women's groups, women's auxiliary groups, church groups, service clubs and others. I am convinced there are many others who would co-operate and continue to do so in the same way after being convinced of the necessity and importance of this type of progress.

As I have said earlier, this field represents a challenge we as Canadians certainly can accept. By continuing the good work in this direction, already to no little extent commenced, we can provide the bulwark of education in democracy and counteract the propaganda on the part of the communists. The flavour that these young people take home with them will not only represent the flavour of Canada but that of democracy as well. It is unfortunate that in certain cases we have failed in the past. I hope by offering an example without naming the particular location it will help to underline the problem without incurring any criticism.

It is a fact in recent years a girl student from Pakistan spent three full academic years winter and summer in one of our major Canadian cities. At no time in that three years had she been invited inside a Canadian home. I leave it to the hon. members to ask themselves this question: had they been in a similar situation and studying in a foreign land what would be their opinion after three years of that kind of treatment?

Mr. Morris: I am sure hon. members will have taken careful note of the remarks of the Associate Minister of National Defence and one of the members for Queens, Prince Edward Island, on the first item of these departmental estimates, which derived in part from their recent attendance as observers at the meeting of the inter-American economic and social council at Punta del Este. What I have to say on this item is to be very brief and is intended in no way to be competitive with the suggestions they made with respect to the deepening and broadening of Canadian contacts with Latin America. However, I did feel that the want of some reference in the debate on the estimates to another area in which Canada has had deep and abiding connections might all unintentionally be taken as an indication of lesser concern among Canadian members of parliament. I refer to the West Indies.

During the past few years Canadian aid to the West Indies has operated under a program of assistance which was set up to cover the period from April 1, 1958 to March 31, 1963. The sum of $10 million was allocated by the government for expenditure during this period. A major part of this money, about $6 million was spent on two ships requested by the West Indies for interisland trade, the Federal Maple and the Federal Palm. The Federal Maple is now in service in the West Indies. I had the pleasure of seeing her arrival in Port-of-Spain less than a month ago. Other projects under the Canadian aid program include the spending of a million dollars on the construction of a dock in St. Vincent. Equipment for harbour facilities is being provided for several of the smaller territories. As Canadians we shall also be carrying out a natural resources survey in Dominica and we shall be providing some $50,000 worth of equipment for a technical school in the lovely island of St. Christopher.

In the area of technical assistance a wide variety of experts from Canada has been sent to the West Indies. Their interests have covered a very wide range, from banking to teaching, and from postal service to public works, particularly in the field of housing. On the other hand, trainees have been sent to Canada for experience in public administration, in fisheries and in other fields of public endeavour. These are all in addition to the students qualifying for scholarships under the commonwealth scheme.

At the present time a joint survey is in progress in which Canada is participating with the United Kingdom and the United States to ascertain further needs of the smaller territories of the West Indies which have now set May 31, 1962 as the target date for their independence and their achievement of dominion status.

We in Canada intend to use a substantial portion of this aid program of $10 million, about $1½ million of it, in assistance to the smaller territorial islands which compose the West Indies. The University College of the West Indies has been promised assistance. This will take the form of a residence for engineering students.

May I make this earnest suggestion to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has the highest regard for and interest in the welfare of the West Indies as he has in other areas and urge him to take into consideration the possibilty of a further program of Canadian helpfulness to the West Indies within the concept of commonwealth brotherhood.

Speaking as a private member, may I say I do not personally favour a fixed term or a fixed amount. I suggest that probably it is not within the Canadian tradition to travel about the world with a satchel full of money. Probably it is not within our competence and it is not our style. I think a better program would be one in which we would give a firm and clear assurance to the West Indies that, in the interest of our historic connection, of our common bond of government philosophy, government practices, government ideas and ideals, within the framework of our commonwealth brotherhood, we will not hesitate to bring before parliament measures originating in the West Indies, suggestions created in their own area, on which they desire our further assistance.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, Canada's record in the field of external aid has been excellent from the start and in my judgment it continues to be properly described by that adjective. Mind you, in some ways we are an underdeveloped country. There is quite a difference between the capacity of Canada and that of some of the older countries, such as the United States, West Germany and the United Kingdom, to provide aid of this kind.

I was a little surprised to hear that some United States writers had been pointing the finger at Canada and had been saying that she should contribute more. That is not a very effective way of getting results. I would point out that I think that the Canadian aid has been quite a lot more effective in gaining friends for Canada abroad than has been the case with aid from some of the other nations which are now being a little critical of us.

We have been spending a great many million dollars each year for aid and I think that those payments have been supported by Canadians from coast to coast. Since I have been minister in this department I have heard very few complaints about Canada supplying aid.

Naturally we would like to get more money for the external aid office. The more money we can get, the better, because it makes our position much easier. We are able to make bigger fellows of ourselves and win more friends for Canada. But you know where the money comes from and we can only get so much.

Hon. members might be surprised to hear of the different ways in which we give aid. For example, under the Colombo plan there is an amount of $50 million a year, which is $15 million more than the former government gave—

Mr. Hellyer: There has been some inflation since.

Mr. Green: —for aid to Burma, Ceylon, India, Indonesia, Malaya, Pakistan, Viet Nam, Cambodia, Laos and indirectly to Thailand under the Mekong river project, and in addition there is technical assistance under that plan. Then there are the Canada-West Indies aid program, the special commonwealth African aid program, the commonwealth technical assistance scheme, the commonwealth scholarship and fellowship plan in which Canada is providing one quarter of the thousand scholarships which are given throughout the commonwealth, the United Nations expanded program of technical assistance to underdeveloped countries, the United Nations special fund, the United Nations technical assistance training centre at the University of British Columbia, the Indus basin development fund, the international development association, the international bank, the international finance corporation, the general fund of the international atomic energy agency, the Manitoba technical assistance scheme, which is a new scheme in which the federal government and the government of Manitoba are co-operating, and educational assistance to French speaking Africa. That is quite a list of schemes under which Canada is providing aid.

We try to provide this aid in an efficient way. There is not a great lot of ballyhoo about it and no great publicity campaigns but I suggest to members of the committee that it is very effective and that Canada has no reason whatsoever to feel ashamed of the effort she is making in this worthy field. We will do our utmost as time goes on. There is no question of the government's not being anxious to help in these different fields. For example, we are now giving consideration to a type of Colombo plan in the Caribbean area. This would include not only the West Indies Federation but, probably, British Guiana and British Honduras. I do not know whether we can work that out but we would like to initiate some plan of that type.

It is very helpful to have the submissions made by hon. members in the house. These always have some influence with the finance department, and I am very grateful for the suggestions that have been made by members who have taken part in the discussion of this item.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I have already exposed the house to two or three speeches on this question and I shall not weary hon. members tonight. I shall be very brief but I did not want to miss the opportunity to put in my oar, however briefly.

I was happy to hear the recital by the minister of the things we are doing and which we know are worth while. I do not need to be told that the government is sympathetic. It is fair for us to remind the committee of the addition made to the Colombo plan and it is also proper for us to remind ourselves that the Secretary of State for External Affairs sometimes needs assistance in getting the moneys he would like from some other ministers whom we know and respect and whose duty it is to act as watchdogs. Accordingly I want to put on the record two or three things which have been said before, which are obvious but true, which are compelling and which if we disregard I believe we shall rue the day.

There are, of course, three obvious arguments which we have heard again and again for aid to underdeveloped countries. For the moment I am thinking about the east, India and the other countries of that area. First of all, there is the humanitarian argument. If these people were going to bed hungry just across the road from us we would not go to bed until we had done something about it. Second, there is the political argument which is that it is tremendously in our interests, indeed, it is vital to us, that these underdeveloped countries shall develop economically under free institutions and not under communist institutions. What we would feel like if we heard tomorrow morning that India had decided to proceed from now on under communist institutions I do not like to think. Then there is the third argument, the economic argument, which some people rather deprecate because it sounds as if we were doing it for our own interests. I have no objection to doing something in our own interests as long as it is in the interests of other people too.

I want to give two illustrations to show what can happen as a result of foreign aid. They have both been given in the house before. One is the case of a project under the Colombo plan to which we contributed $37 million. It is worth saying again and again, for the benefit of those people who think that such sums represent barrels of dollars shipped abroad, that of that $37 million 95 per cent was represented by Canadian employment. In other words, 95 per cent of what we sent was Canadian goods or services.

The other thing I should like to reiterate and which I do not think can be said too often has to do with what happened in 1946 when we lent $1¼ billion to Britain. At that time the then minister of finance used as his strongest argument the point that we were going to finance people who would make purchases from us. This they did in a big way. A very large percentage of that $1¼ billion was used to buy goods in Canada.

I have one other thing I want to say. When the matter of aid is brought up I often find people saying that the money is misused, that there is corruption and lack of wisdom, and that really what we should be doing is simply sending out teachers and so on. That of course should be done. I welcome what the hon. member for York-Scarborough said tonight. It was really heartening to hear what he had to say about the way his projects were taken up. I just want to make the point that we here can do so much to help ourselves as well as others by this project, by sticking to it, by feeling that it is part of our job and by feeling that unless we go through with it not only the other people concerned but we ourselves are going to suffer.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this vote gives us the opportunity to discuss the general question of external aid. Perhaps by spending some time on it we may save time on the details of international economic assistance which are included in the following votes. I must say that I have some sympathy with the minister in his desire to discharge his obligations and the obligations of Canada in respect of international economic assistance. I know that he will get more trouble from the Department of Finance and the Minister of Finance than he will from the opposition in this regard because, however idealistic a view we take about our obligations in this matter and what we ought to do, we come up against the exigencies of domestic affairs and the desire of the Minister of Finance to balance his budget. As a result, these considerations of domestic policies, and this does not apply to any particular government at any particular time, perhaps have an effect on what we can do in the field of international economic assistance. There is always a relationship between what can be done in Canada for people who need help and what can be done for people in Pakistan who need help.

But the fact remains, Mr. Chairman, that in world opinion we are considered, and indeed we are, a fortunate, developed and rich country with a very high standard of living. We are expected, therefore, to play our part in bringing about a situation in the world where we will not have rich countries and slum countries, developed countries and underdeveloped countries. I do not know whether or not the minister agrees with me, but I have found that the use of this word "underdeveloped" in respect of countries that we are trying to assist economically can lead to serious trouble. Some of these countries that are now economically poor in relation to ours are far more developed in some other ways than we are. Some of these countries we are privileged to assist in the field of industrial development now had civilization long before we were even in North America.

When we talk about underdeveloped countries, therefore, we are thinking only of material underdevelopment. The fact remains, and I think statistics will show this, that in spite of the assistance which the richer countries have been able to give to some of the poorer, the gap between the richer and poorer countries rather than being remedied or lessened in the last 10 or 15 years, has perhaps increased. This is a sad commentary on planetary development. We still have, therefore, in our own country an obligation, along with other countries, to do what we can to change this process and to lessen that gap.

I have recently, Mr. Chairman, been attending a private and unofficial meeting at Oxford university on the subject of tensions which arise out of development. At this conference the majority of the members were from Asia and Africa, from what we call the materially underdeveloped countries. I found it extremely interesting to listen to them talk about their economic, their development problems and the tensions that arise out of these problems. They feel that we in the western world, in what they consider to be the more developed and more fortunate countries from an industrial and economic point of view, can do much to help them sort of leap out of their situation into one which I suppose it has taken the western countries a thousand years to develop. They want to do it in a few years, to leap out of a subsistence economy into an economy which will provide them with television sets and what they consider to be the advantages of a material civilization. They are going to try to do that in 25 or 30 years, and it has taken other countries 600 or 1,000 years to do it.

They are not going to be content with the slow progress of industrial development we have had to face in the western world over these generations. They do feel, whether or not they are right, that we owe them something in this regard because most of them were colonial countries. They have a feeling that what they call the imperialist colonial countries of the west, somehow or other held them up and if it had not been for colonial occupation they might have made more progress. I think that is a very dubious doctrine, myself, but that is the way they feel. They expect this help from us, therefore.

I got the impression, not only at this meeting but at other meetings I have had—the minister I think must have acquired the same impression—that the value of the kind of assistance we are giving them in these estimates, and for the year 1961-62 we are providing $61,122,445 of help, is not to be determined by the number of dollars we are making available but by the spirit and understanding we show in relation to their problems. I think Canada has achieved a very good reputation in this regard, not merely because of or primarily because we have been able to help them through this appropriation, but because we have shown in Asia and in Africa, an understanding of their problems and sympathy for their difficulties. You cannot estimate the value of this in dollars and cents. We give them this help, not charity. They are very sensitive about that. If we give them the feeling we are doing something to help them, we do not get very far. It is not a matter of charity at all. They are very suspicious, and I am sure the minister knows about this, about help that is given to them in terms of the effect it will have on their association with us in the cold war.

We have made a good deal of progress in this regard, I think, in the last five or ten years, as I think the United States has. Economic assistance of this kind, if it is related to the cold war, is not going to do any good at all. The United States has had some rather disillusioning experiences. They have poured hundreds of millions of dollars into a country, and at the end of that time have found themselves more unpopular than before they gave anything at all. I think we have learned from that. I do not believe we can keep cold war considerations entirely out of economic assistance. I do not believe we could be expected, in Canada any more than in any other country, to give assistance to countries if that assistance is likely to be used against us politically. However, we cannot expect to get any results from economic assistance which is given to countries because we hope that by giving that assistance they will line up with us in the cold war. I think we have made a good deal of progress in the last few years in that regard. We help these countries because it is a good thing for us to do, it is a good thing for the peace of the world and because the world is one. Indeed, the world cannot exist half poverty stricken and half an affluent society.

In these discussions we have had during last week and which we have had previously, and the minister has attended a good many of them, there has been a good deal of argument as to how this assistance can best be given. Some of the items that follow this item deal with bilateral economic assistance and some of them deal with multilateral economic assistance. The general impression I got from talking to the representatives of what we call the receiving countries is that they would like to get their assistance on a multilateral basis so that there will be no suspicion of political strings attached. This is the reason we should undertake, whenever we can, to channel assistance through multilateral agencies, not by direct bilateral deals. I think, as realistic people, we must understand that while that is the ideal there is no possibility of the United States, for instance, and the United States is the greatest source of assistance in this field, channelling most of its aid multilaterally or through the United Nations. I think we have to accept that fact, that in a good many situations the most effective, the most practical way of doing it now is by government to government. In that kind of operation, we can only hope that there will be a minimum of political strings attached.

I think, as I have said, we have made a good deal of improvement on that account in the western world in recent years. I recall arguing, at this particular meeting, with one of the African delegates on this question of strings attached. Unfortunately, most of these representatives of new countries recently emerged from colonial status are unduly sensitive about this question. They are almost morbid in their sensitivity about this. Every time they accept something they have the feeling that perhaps there is a string attached to it. However, it is not difficult to point out to them that if you get any kind of help from anybody in any situation, there are strings attached. If you have a private loan from a bank there is a string attached. We who are contributing countries should do what we can to make as certain as possible that the aid we give will be used for constructive purposes. We do this in the Colombo plan because there are strings attached to our aid under that plan. But they are only that the money we give will be constructively used. Because we discuss this with the receiving countries there is no feeling of suspicion attached to that particular string.

As one of the African delegates said to me a couple of weeks ago, "It is bad enough to have aid with political strings attached, but it is much worse to have political strings without any aid." Perhaps that is true, but I think we have got through that stage now. We used this approach continually in our discussions. I cannot think of any better way of providing assistance, apart from the United Nations, which is the ideal way of doing it than through such schemes as the Colombo plan. But there are limitations of practicability which we have to accept as realistic people to multilateral help. However, apart from the United Nations the best way of giving this help is through projects, procedures and mechanisms such as we have worked out under the Colombo plan arrangements. There we have a kind of multilateral arrangement with bilateral conversations between the receiving and distributing countries.

We had a great deal of discussion about this in Oxford a couple of weeks ago. I do not think the Colombo plan countries who have received aid from the contributing countries have ever felt at any time there was any string attached to that aid which was not justifiable. I think that is the way it should be done.

Reference has been made to the fact that we are not doing as much in Canada as we should. Perhaps no country at the present time is doing as much as it should. At this particular meeting in Oxford we did not pass any resolution but there was a feeling that every contributing country should give one per cent of its national income for international economic assistance. If we relate our contribution of $62 million to our national income we are well below that 1 per cent. I think that is a desirable objective toward which we should work. I do not know whether my hon. friend from Essex East will agree with me on this, but I am not too much impressed with the fact that we should have a level of 1 per cent right across the board. After all, we have the principle of graduation in income tax, and I think those who are the richest should accept greater obligations than those who are not quite as rich. But I have no doubt in the world that we can do more.

This is not a political matter because more is being done now than was done a few years ago. Our income has grown and so has our contribution to economic assistance. However I think we can still do a great deal more and I think we should do more, because after all $40 million, $50 million or $100 million which is wisely spent in international economic assistance in the right places at this time might do more to increase stability and security in the world than spending $100 million or $150 million on some forms of arms defence.

Therefore without criticizing the minister or the government in what has been done I express the hope—and I feel quite strongly about this—that perhaps we can do more in the future than we have in the past in making this contribution, not so much to assist other countries but to assist ourselves; to assist security and stability in the world. I wish the minister well in his conflict with the Minister of Finance in this field.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I had intended to say a few words along the line just expressed by the leader of the official opposition. There is no necessity for me to take the time of the committee to repeat what he has said, except to say that we wholeheartedly support the remarks he has just made with respect to external aid and his suggestions with respect to our actions in the future.

I have just now returned from a reception given by the high commissioner for New Zealand. Strangely enough, I had an opportunity to talk with several representatives of countries interested in this type of aid from Canada. What the leader of the official opposition said is quite correct. I have heard it repeatedly. They very much appreciate our methods in this respect. They appreciate the fact that there are no strings attached and they are willing to co-operate with us to make certain the money is expended to their best advantage. I think our record throughout the world stands very well and in this respect I think the department has carried on the traditions of this country very well indeed.

I think it was a very good move to bring this type of assistance under the administration of one head, that is, external aid. I think it has brought together the loose ends and will make for even greater efficiency in the future. In conclusion I wish to say that, like the leader of the official opposition, we hope we can continue to do more and more in this respect. I say this because we believe this type of assistance and a program of co-operation builds good will within and without the commonwealth and is the sort of sound foundation to lay for the building of peace in the future.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 88 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter I wish to raise before vote 88 carries. I referred to it last Thursday when speaking on the first item of the debate that began that day.

I mentioned then that when the Associate Minister of National Defence was attending the recent conference in Uruguay as an official observer from Canada he had declared publicly that there was a necessity for extending economic aid to Latin America. I am not now suggesting a program, but when a minister of the crown takes publicly a position, I think it is incumbent upon him or his colleagues to indicate if he reflected government policy.

I believe that what the minister said a moment ago about the extent of our assistance was right. I think Canada is performing very outstanding work in the field of assisting economically underdeveloped areas. I observe the admonition of the Leader of the Opposition who so correctly stated that he thought we perhaps misrepresented the situation when we simply referred to underdeveloped countries.

The Associate Minister of National Defence made some very important observations. He said, for instance, as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail on August 24, 1961:

> —Latin Americans need help financially and technically to keep them from going communist.

He said, inter alia:

> Their sympathies are with us now... We should keep it that way.

Then he said:

> The feature that struck me was that Latin America seems to be at the crossroads. Either they will advance and achieve prosperity and progress through democratic free enterprise, or some nations —unless they find a solution to their problems—quite easily will fall prey to communist theories and methods.

These are very important words. They would be important from the mouth of any public man, but when they issue forth from one who holds a position in the government of Canada I think they call for comment in this house. Was the associate minister indicating that the Canadian government has plans to join with the United States in its program of economic assistance? It may be that we have to look at those areas in the world where we can give assistance. There certainly is a limit to what countries can do. I have certainly not suggested that we have reached that limit; I have simply pointed out what the Associate Minister of National Defence said. In addition to the important matter of assistance to Latin America, it raises another matter that is not unrelated. I have suspected that one of the reasons why the government was not prepared to join the organization of American states, altogether apart from the initial contribution involved in such membership, was that there would inevitably flow from it some pressure to extend to Latin American countries a form of economic assistance that is non-existent now as far as Canada is concerned. When this matter was discussed in April the Prime Minister had indicated that when the departmental estimates were before the house, it would be given an opportunity of expressing its views. One drew the inference that the government at that time would indicate what its intentions were with regard to joining the organization of American states.

Twice in this house, namely last Thursday and last April, I have stated—and the Leader of the Opposition last April expressed his view as well—that the time had come when we should join the organization of American states. The mere joining of that organization does not in itself create any obligation on our part to extend economic aid to Latin American countries. That is something that we must consider in the light of our responsibilities toward these and other countries. However, it seems to me that some time before this item is passed the minister might find it convenient to indicate what the government's intentions are with regard to the kind of declaration made by his colleague the Associate Minister of National Defence and whether or not the government has reached a decision with regard to what might be regarded as a corollary problem, namely the proposal that we have obligations to countries in the sister American continents as well as to countries which are joined with us for defensive purposes in other organizations and with whom we are associated in the United Nations for the purpose of trying to mitigate the causes of war and to preserve world peace.

There is in this country a strong body of opinion that believes strongly that, because of our ties with Latin America culturally, in terms of language, religious community of interest and other common participations, we owe to them and to ourselves an affiliation such as that which would come from membership in the organization of American states. I would put it on a political ground, namely that the problems of our hemisphere are now giving evidence of increasing acuteness and possible danger that will affect us as well as the United States. We have a special point of view and a special interest which, notwithstanding the difficulties, it seems to me could be discharged more effectively by our accepting that responsibility. That responsibility in itself does not necessarily mean embarking at this time on programs that may be regarded as being beyond our financial capacity.

I simply make one further observation in this regard. Whatever reasons there were in the past for non-participation or for non-membership, they do not seem to exist today. Commonwealth considerations or the attitude of the United States certainly are no longer valid reasons. Indeed we all recall the suggestion—and I am not now speaking of the propriety of it—made by the President of the United States in this House of Commons with regard to our membership. I am not saying that the President had no right to make that statement but I would have thought that, unless the matter had been cleared with the Canadian government beforehand, a more effective way of persuading us to join the organization would have been to refer to it possibly in talks privately with the minister over the tea table, if that is the kind of thing the minister has when he meets with a president around a table. In any event, I think this is an important matter and in view of the statement of the Prime Minister it would seem to me that there ought to be some declaration forthcoming from him.

Mr. Matheson: Before this item passes may I ask the minister another question, namely whether the devaluation policy of the government in any way affects the real value of our aid to these countries.

Mr. Green: The answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Leeds is no, Mr. Chairman, because the bulk of the money is actually spent in Canada. The hon. member for Essex East rather surprises me because he has become such a great enthusiast for Canada joining the organization of American states.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Inspired by the leadership of the hon. gentleman a year ago.

Mr. Green: He is the one convert I have made to this policy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And the member from Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Green: For 22 years I sat over there on the opposition side and not any kind of move was made by the Liberal government. However, in the last couple of years they have begun to grow enthusiastic. Perhaps they are learning, after a quarter of a century.

During these last two years we have been moving to strengthen Canada's relations with all of the Latin American countries. I think this has been a very important policy. The hon. member for Essex East referred to the statement made by the Associate Minister of National Defence who led a Canadian delegation to the meeting of the inter-American economic and social council held in Uruguay last month. That council was called together in order to consider ways of promoting economic growth and social development in Latin America. Our delegation has come back with very helpful information about Latin American conditions and in addition has made further friendly ties with all of the countries of Latin America. Had there been a meeting of the organization of American states this year we would have been represented by an observer delegation. That meeting was to have been held in Quito in February but it has been postponed indefinitely. When it takes place, however, a Canadian delegation will be in attendance.

In addition to that, we have decided to apply for membership in the United Nations economic commission for Latin America. This commission was established in 1948 by the United Nations in order to assist in raising the level of economic activity in the Latin America area, to strengthen economic relations between the countries of the region and other countries of the world and to carry out technical assistance programs in that area. Besides the 20 republics of Latin America, its membership includes the United States, France, the United Kingdom and the Netherlands. The West Indies and British Guiana have become associate members and British Honduras has applied for the same status. Membership would provide a specialized forum in which to watch Latin American trade, policies and practices and a possible way to influence those countries away from protectionism and bilateralism, it will permit Canada to participate in the formation of policies for the area and possibly place us in a better position to supply capital goods to the mutual benefit of Latin American countries and Canadian industry. It would also facilitate the search with other American nations in the appropriate bodies for solutions to the growing problem of raw material prices and production.

We have no plan under which we make bilateral contributions to Latin American countries. However, they do benefit under United Nations plans.

No record is kept of what proportion of Canada's contributions to those funds is used in Latin America but through that channel there is help given. There is also some help given in the way of scholarships by the Canada council and by the national research council. I would be very pleased in this field as well as in the general external aid field to be able to do a great deal more than we have been doing up to the present time. In my view there is another field in which help is being given and that is through the Export Credits Insurance Act. For example, arrangements have been made for guaranteeing payment for a big shipment to Chile. Some months ago there was a similar arrangement made for the export of steel rails to Mexico. Help of this kind is given and, incidentally, I think that kind of help should be included in the 1 per cent figure that the people in the United States talk so much about. They include everything they give in their 1 per cent figure and we can justifiably include guarantees of this type as well in that figure.

In so far as diplomatic representation is concerned, we have extended our diplomatic relations in Latin America. On Saturday I hope to sign an exchange of notes with the Guatemalan ambassador to the United States by which our ambassador in Mexico will be accredited to Guatemala. This will leave only one Latin American country with which Canada does not have diplomatic relations, namely, El Salvador. I think within a matter of months we can make a similar arrangement for representation in that country.

Another method by which contacts have been increased is by exchange of visits. Our own Prime Minister visited Mexico City, returning a visit by the President of Mexico. I have visited in Argentina, Chile and Peru. There has been also the recent visit of the Associate Minister of National Defence. On November 27 the president of Argentina is to come to Canada where he will pay a visit lasting three or four days.

I suggest we have moved very rapidly, certainly in comparison with any movements made by the Liberal government to strengthen ties with Latin America. In due course the curiosity of the hon. member for Essex East with regard to this question of joining the organization of American states will be satisfied. However, I point out to him that one of the least effective ways of persuading Canada to adopt a policy is for the president or the head of state of another country to come here and tell us what we should do, no matter if it is done with the best intentions. Even when it is done in that way it is not the best way to get results, and I am rather surprised that the hon. member would suggest that we should at once have jumped through the hoop when the President of the United States made this suggestion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He has not been in politics as long as you and I have.

Mr. Green: I suggest that is going quite far in advocating policy, but I do not think President Kennedy meant to interfere.

However, I explained some months ago that we thought this was a policy in respect of which the Canadian people should have an opportunity to consider; to see what they thought of it. There is greatly increased interest in the whole question as a result of President Kennedy's speech. Perhaps it is in the wrong way, but certainly it is increased interest. I think today there is more interest being taken in this question in Canada than there has been in the last 25 years, and there is an opportunity being given for public opinion to build up and, after all, in some cases that is not a bad idea. Certainly we do not have to rush into new policies. This would represent a major change in Canadian foreign policy. I feel it will be of great value to have the Canadian people realize just what the implications of such a move would be.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we are not asking the minister with a view to having the association jump through the hoop merely on the suggestion of the President of the United States that it would be a desirable jump. Nor are we asking him to rush into this. As a matter of fact, long before the President made the statement in this house, the minister's predecessor had us at least half way through the hoop three years ago. The minister is now saying that what we have to do is give the people of Canada a chance to think about this matter. We must find out how they feel about it, giving the Canadian Institute of International Affairs an opportunity to tell us what to do, and that in due course we will make up our minds. While we all grow, I hope, in wisdom and stature in this particular situation, the opposition's interest has I think increased, but the minister's has lessened. The minister used to have very definite views about OAS. I must say I was impressed by his arguments of those days in favour of a particular course and assumed that when he had the responsibility he would implement the particular advice he gave us then. I think there is a good deal to be said for closer association with the organization of American states. We have made our position very clear on that point.

The minister has pointed out there have been other forms of closer association with Latin America. That is quite true. Diplomatic representation of Canada in this part of the world has grown; as it was always intended that it should grow. In the years after world war II we opened embassies and legations in various parts of the world, and the Latin American states were always on the list. But it was always a question of priority and finding the money in the Department of Finance, as well as the people to man the new posts. It is a good thing that representation in Latin America has developed. I think we are all in favour of that development. It certainly is a good thing that the minister and, of course, the Prime Minister can go down to Latin America to cultivate close and friendly contacts with the leaders of those governments. But there is this question which is predominant now in the public mind regarding the actual association of Canada with this particular western hemisphere organization. In consideration of this in the past I admit some worry about membership which meant some responsibility in the development of the organization because we were joining a lot of international clubs at that time. I think there was a limit at that time to what we could or should do, but circumstances have changed. There is now the fact that we are so worried about the establishment of communist bases on the western hemisphere and the feeling we have that the United States should be careful before it reacts too rashly to such a development. If we are to give the United States this kind of advice, as we did and rightly during the Cuban mix-up, and if we are to interest ourselves in these developments, then I think we have to take our responsibility in the organization which is concerned with these matters namely the organization of American states.

In his recent visit to the conference in Uruguay—and reference has been made to that—I think the Associate Minister of National Defence performed two very useful services. According to the press he stopped a revolution in Argentina, and he also brought home to us the importance of doing what we can in the richer countries to assist the poorer countries in Latin America; otherwise there is going to be very serious trouble down there. I thought that perhaps, in the light of that particular report by the Associate Minister of National Defence, the minister and the government had made up their minds to take responsibility without waiting for the report from the Canadian Institute of International Affairs and would now associate Canada with the organization of American states.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to ask the minister this question arising out of his remarks. In referring to ways in which we had contributed aid in South America he included two items of assistance. I have one in particular in mind. He included as an item of assistance the insurance contract made under the Export Credits Insurance Corporation legislation. I am quite sure he did not intend that result to flow from his remarks. I have particular reference to the $12 million contract of assistance where capital goods were supplied to Chile. I think the minister will be very quick to agree with me that the purpose of that legislation was to enable our producers and manufacturers in Canada to compete more successfully with the producers in other countries that have the production capacity; and that from the point of view of the recipient country the benefit to them from our having this long term insurance or guarantee of the seller's contract is very little indeed because had they not got it from us they would presumably have got the capital equipment from another country. I would hope the minister would take a moment to correct any impression that may inadvertently have been created by his remarks that was not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Green: I think this is done under section 21, of Part II of the act. In recent months this has been used in effect to help not only the Canadian firm but also the recipient country by giving extended credit which it could not get otherwise. In each of the cases I mentioned there was quite a large element of helping out the respective governments of Chile and Mexico. The same plan has been used with other countries, some of which are getting Colombo plan aid. It is not just a case of helping out a Canadian firm. It also helps the recipient country.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not want to leave it there. The minister will recall that when his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce was putting this legislation through the house he said that the purpose of it was—and the wording of the act will support this—to assist the Canadian producers to compete with the producers in other countries. It was in no sense a form of aid to recipient countries which might require assistance in developing their own economies. I think the matter should be clarified. There is a matter of government policy there because what the minister is now claiming for section 21 of the export credits insurance legislation is something very different from what the house was led to believe when the legislation was put through and what I believe the legislation itself contains as its set purpose and objectives. I would hope that the minister would look further into the matter so that there will not be two views of the government that appear at least superficially to be in conflict on this point.

Mr. Green: I am sure the minister to whom the hon. member for Ottawa West referred, if he were here, would agree with me that the act was intended to serve both purposes.

Mr. Herridge: I was very interested in the discussion with respect to Canada joining the organization of American states. We in this group fully appreciate the caution with which the government is proceeding in this direction. There are political, financial and other implications that have to be seriously considered. It is not as simple a matter as it appears on the surface.

The minister said that this period of consideration would give the Canadian people an opportunity to discuss the question and express their views, and so on. Before the government makes a final decision in this connection will it give the house an opportunity to discuss the question and the members an opportunity to bring to the attention of the minister the opinions of the Canadian people they happen to represent in the various constituencies.

Mr. Green: I think if and when such a step were taken it would be debated in the house. There would be a resolution or motion; I am not just sure what form of procedure would be followed. I think the hon. member can take it for granted that there would be an opportunity for discussion.

Contributions to international economic and special aid programs—

89. Colombo plan, $50,000,000.

Mr. Pearson: I believe this is a vote for the Colombo plan. The only question I should like to ask on the appropriation is this. As the minister knows, when the Colombo plan was established, it was designed primarily for capital assistance and to make it easier for those countries which were being helped to help themselves. I have the impression, and there may have been circumstances which made this necessary, that over recent years the proportion of capital assistance has been declining in relation to the proportion of consumer assistance. Can the minister give us the figures for the Colombo plan which would bear on that particular fact?

Mr. Green: Any move in that direction has been because at least some of those countries, for example, India and Pakistan, which get between them $40 million of the $50 million, have pressed for commodities. They have done that for some years and they are pressing again this year. Mind you, the proceeds of the sale of those commodities are used on other projects, for example, hydroelectric projects, or various works of that kind.

Mr. McIlraith: Before this item carries will the minister advise the committee as to how much of the $50 million aid under the Colombo plan is made up of capital goods that go directly into the production for developing the economy of the recipient country. How much of it is made up of consumer goods? Of the part made up of consumer goods how much of that in turn is accompanied by an agreement for the provision of counterpart funds to be used in the development of the economy of the recipient country and how much of it has no strings attached at all?

Mr. Green: About half of the $50 million is expended directly on capital projects, about one quarter on wheat and the other quarter on such things as aluminum, copper and other commodities of that kind. The proceeds from the sales of wheat and metal and other commodities are used as counterpart funds for other projects in those countries.

90. West Indies assistance program, $1,500,000.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the position of this program? I saw in the press this week, I believe, that the West Indies Federation had accepted delivery of one of the ships. I think it was the Royal Palm which was built at the Port Weller drydocks. Is there any other assistance over and above the additional ship that is being given and what is the position with respect to that ship now? When will it be completed and when will it be delivered?

Mr. Green: The first ship, which has been named the Federal Maple, is now in operation in the West Indies. Over the week end I read in a West Indies magazine of the initial trip of this ship to the various islands. The other ship, which is called the Federal Palm, is now on the way to the West Indies. In addition, there will be technical assistance by way of provision of Canadian experts, $206,750, training of West Indians in Canada, $34,250, the development of deep water docking facilities at St. Vincent island, $950,000, the provision of port handling equipment at eight islands of the federation, $450,000, a survey of the natural resources of the island of Dominica, $50,000, and The University College of the West Indies, $700,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This vote shows a decrease of $3,760,000. We all know the reason for the decrease, but having in mind, for instance, the initiative that is taken in providing assistance to certain West Indies countries where the problem of economic underdevelopment characterizes the situation and bearing in mind, for instance, the kind of speech we had from the junior member or senior member from Halifax, has the government any plan to keep this form of assistance to the West Indies at the present level for next year, for instance? When we talk about assistance to these areas, unless there is some explanation a reduction of this sort possibly will be misconstrued in certain quarters. I would be interested to know whether the government has in mind further forms of assistance to other countries that do need it.

Mr. Green: The provision of $10 million was by way of a gift to the West Indies in order to help them when they got their independence. It was never designed as an annual payment or a payment every three years or for any set period. What will be done in the future has not yet been finally decided. Some time ago I referred to the possibility of a Colombo type program for the Caribbean area but I am not yet sure just what steps will be taken.

Mr. Pearson: On this vote I would merely wish to express the hope that something more could be done. I think that we in Canada have a special interest in and perhaps even some responsibility for the West Indies as they achieve independent status. They are perhaps as close to us as any other member of the commonwealth, or will be geographically, when they join us. I think we can be expected to take a special interest in the development of this area. Presumably, as I have read, they will be joining the organization of American states and perhaps any assistance we could give to them would be within the context of hemisphere assistance.

I think it would be a very good thing if we could concentrate some of our aid in respect of this new member of the commonwealth, as we hope it will be. It will be no use for the minister to say that we did not do anything at all in our day because in those days the West Indies islands were colonies and they got their help from the colonial development fund. But now that they are becoming independent they have a special claim on us. I know that every country in the world has some claim to help from Canada but perhaps the West Indies have a special claim to our assistance and our understanding.

91. Special commonwealth Africa aid program, $3,500,000.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, with respect to vote 91 and possibly vote 92 I should first of all like to say how pleased I am to see this new item of $3,500,000 this year for special commonwealth Africa aid. I should like to ask the minister how this amount is broken down. As hon. members know, I had the honor of attending the commonwealth parliamentary conference in London earlier this year. The African delegates pointed out their desperate need for educational aid, for teachers, for courses of education in Canada and for agricultural training, all of which we in Canada can offer. Canada is a country with much that we can give to these new nations. Canada is a country greatly admired by them because of our achievements. It might be of interest to hon. members to know that in the country of Basutoland there is one university which was founded by the Roman Catholic church of Canada and is maintained by them. I think that Canadians should be very proud of the fact that in Basutoland there is a university founded and maintained by Canadians.

These African delegates pleaded with me to bring to the attention of the Canadian government their need for educational assistance and agricultural development. I would hope that the government through the minister would not only continue this amount but increase it with special emphasis on those things which they so much need.

Mr. Green: The purpose of this vote is to provide economic and technical assistance to commonwealth countries in Africa. The plan was agreed upon in principle at a meeting of the commonwealth economic consultative council in London in September, 1960. Each contributing country will arrange its aid directly with the recipients. There will be an annual review by the commonwealth economic consultative council. Canada has offered to make a total of $10½ million available over three years beginning in the fiscal year 1961-62. As the hon. member has pointed out, the vote this year is for $3½ million or one third of the total amount to be made available. The intention is that the major part of Canada's aid will be contributed to independent members of the commonwealth in Africa or to those approaching independence.

We have already agreed to carry out an aerial survey of part of Nigeria at a cost of about $1.35 million over a two-year period. In addition, 17 technical advisers have been recruited, of whom 10 are already in Africa and eight more will be recruited shortly. Numerous additional requests are being investigated. We have 27 teachers in Africa altogether, 25 technical trainees in Canada and 53 students in Canada. I think the 53 include students coming here under this plan and also the commonwealth scholarship plan. We are currently discussing a number of specific requests for the building of schools, road programs and assistance in the medical field.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin raised this question because I have a particular interest in another university in that area of the country. I refer to the one at Roma in Basutoland where Father Odilon Chevrier, a namesake and cousin of mine was for some years the rector of the university. I say the rest with some hesitation because I recall that when I was a boy my father set up a bursary or scholarship for the education of the first negro priest in the Catholic church. His name, I remember quite well, was Raphael Mohasi. He was ordained and has since passed away. Ever since that time coloured priests have been educated by virtue of that scholarship and have joined the ranks of the Oblates who are at the university in Roma. I felt that when the hon. member raised the question I might refer to this personal matter and I should at least pay tribute to the tremendous work done by the Oblates of Mary Immaculate at that university.

As the minister knows, they have a university here in Ottawa and their work in Basutoland specifically has been one not only of magnitude but has been a tremendous contribution to the inhabitants of that area. If there is any assistance that is going to the other university I am sure the minister, as well as the government, will want to give consideration to both of these universities.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, under this plan the assistance is arranged from government to government and not from the Canadian government to any individual institution. Now, if an application is made through the colonial office by these people in Basutoland we would be very glad to consider it. We have not felt we could start dealing with individuals or individual institutions in any one of these countries.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think it should be noted just in this connection that not only is the government giving assistance, but the Oblate fathers themselves are doing work in Canada through Reverend Father Breault, who happens to come from my constituency and who is the Vicar-General in a diocese in Basutoland. Canadian citizens are helping by their contributions towards the assistance of a very worthy project in this particular area. In addition, therefore, to the vote that we are providing tonight, it should be noted as the hon. member for Laurier recalls, that assistance is being provided by Canadian citizens. I can say that the Vicar-General, who happens to come from my constituency and who is engaged in collecting money to assist in the building of this area, is doing very excellent work. I strongly support the tribute that the hon. member for Laurier paid to the university, of which he is so distinguished a graduate and which my own son is attending.

Item agreed to.

93. Commonwealth scholarship plan, $1,000,000.

Mr. Chevrier: I wanted to ask here for a statement by the minister as to how much of this million dollars has been spent and how it has been divided as between the various universities.

Mr. Green: During the last fiscal year there was about $300,000 spent. This year, we expect to spend the full million dollars. The students are in universities from coast to coast. I do not have a roll of them with me this evening. We can get that information for the hon. member and I shall be glad to see that it is sent to him. Apparently a roll was tabled in the external affairs committee.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you. I note that according to the supplementary estimates the amount paid for educational assistance to independent French speaking African students is only $300,000. The minister announced this in the house some time ago, and I think the house was quite happy with the announcement because it was a step in the right direction, which everyone welcomed. I am not rising to criticize it in any way, but certainly to point out to the minister that perhaps he will want to see that there is a greater relationship between the two amounts spent than there appears to be in this amount of $1 million to the $300,000 in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Green: In that connection, I think I should point out that the million dollars is for students in the commonwealth, while the $300,000 is for students who are not in the commonwealth but who are in the French community.

Mr. Chevrier: I realize that but my remarks still hold in connection with the relationship between the two. I think the minister should give consideration to the relationship between these two votes.

Mr. Slogan: I should like to say a word about item 93 because I am a great believer in scholarships whether they are on a local level, whether they are exchange scholarships between various universities in Canada or exchange scholarships between universities in Canada and foreign universities or whether they are Canada council scholarships primarily in the cultural field or scholarships such as we are considering here under the commonwealth scholarship plan. I know, as one whose own education was assisted to a large degree by scholarships, of the economic assistance they provide. However, in this case I think we are more interested in the human relationships which stem from students visiting other universities being able to mix with the students, see how others live and think.

I should like to associate myself in extending congratulations to the government on this increase in the amount of money being expended for these scholarships in the coming year. This is certainly money well spent. There is only one matter I should like to raise. It arises out of a little story I heard when I was at the United Nations. Apparently some of the members of the commonwealth are being offered scholarships in the Soviet union, and there is the story of the Nigerian student who was the son of a prominent Nigerian family. This student went to study in the Soviet union. The reason I mention this story is that I sometimes wonder whether we utilize to the full our capacity to influence these students to our way of life, or the students who leave Canada to go abroad. I wonder whether we leave with them the impression that they have a moral obligation to be good ambassadors for Canada.

In this instance the young Nigerian student was practising boxing in the gym and unknown to him a picture was taken of him in a fighting position. This picture then appeared on a poster which proclaimed that this young negro from Nigeria had come to the Soviet union to learn about the great things going on there so he would be prepared to break the chains of slavery in the colonialized country from which he came. I think this is dishonest of course, and I use this illustration only to demonstrate the extent to which even in a case such as this the communist nations are utilizing their methods of propaganda.

My words are not directed primarily to the government but also to the universities themselves who make the selections, and to individuals who participate in this program. I think perhaps we have not utilized to the full our capacity to associate with these students coming to Canada from coast to coast and tried to demonstrate to them our way of life and our mode of thinking and, more important than that, why we live and think as we do.

Similarly, I think we should emphasize to all the people we send abroad that there is indeed room for them to be good ambassadors for Canada, as I am sure most of them are, because in their interrelationships at the university stage they are at a point in their lives when they are forming philosophies of life, and so forth, and these students coming to Canada and studying in our universities, then going back to their own native countries and assuming positions of leadership, will no doubt be very impressed with what they see and hear in Canada. Their way of thinking will also be influenced. They will then assume positions of leadership in their own countries. I think this influence can be increased to a very great extent and I hope hon. members who have anything to do with the program will keep this point in mind.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to say a few words to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) for having put an amount of $300,000 at the disposal of the French speaking African countries to help them in the field of education. That step is a great improvement since, under the previous administration, no funds were provided for French Africa.

I would strongly recommend to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) to bring pressure to bear on his friend, his leader, Mr. Lesage, so that the latter may give a reply to the federal government's offer to work jointly on the carrying out of a $300,000 educational assistance program for French Africa. That project was prepared by the Department of External Affairs.

Speaking of the commonwealth, people seem to think that there are French speaking people only in French Canada but there are some also in Mauritius which has a population of 650,000.

When he was passing through Montreal some time ago, Mr. Laventure, minister from Mauritius, said that his country was a member of the commonwealth and was asking that scholarships be granted, if possible, to the French people of Mauritius, so that those commonwealth citizens could attend Canadian universities.

I therefore submit this request, because Mauritius is a member country of the commonwealth and has a French speaking population of 650,000.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 93 carry?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether students who come here from other countries to study are allowed to work here in the summer time in order to augment their incomes and help to defray their expenses?

Mr. Green: In most cases they get work, which is of help to them in their courses. They get work perhaps in a government department or in some private organization.

Mr. Hellyer: The reason I asked this question, Mr. Chairman, is because I am of the opinion, perhaps erroneously, that there is some prohibition which prevents foreign students who are studying here accepting jobs.

Mr. Green: With regard to students who come here under the aid program, I think most of them get work. If they come here on their own, of course they have to be dealt with by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would look into this matter, take it under advisement and see whether a broad policy could not be worked out. I know there might be some objection to this because there are so many Canadian students who have difficulty now in obtaining summertime employment. It would seem only fair that if we encourage students to come here from all around the world we should allow them the same opportunities as our own students to accept gainful employment in the summer months.

It seems to me we would expect the same consideration for our students studying abroad. I think we would expect reciprocal arrangements. I would urge the minister to consider this matter, and if remedial regulations are required, to take the matter up with his colleagues in order to see what can be done.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I do not imagine the Secretary of State for External Affairs would expect that at all times he would receive from this house complete endorsation or complete approval for his policies. However, as one who had the privilege last year of being an observer in the delegation to the United Nations general assembly I wish to say that we could not have a finer attitude on the part of the minister than he always displayed to hon. members of the opposition who were there as observers.

I recall the first time he appeared in New York after my arrival. I think this will be of interest to members of parliament on both sides of the chamber. The minister has a high regard for members of parliament and their attitudes to external affairs. Because of this he said to me, "Won't you sit on my right, Bill?" That is something I have cherished in my recollections. However I do not think I moved from my modest place away down the line.

With all his expert advisers, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has a very high regard for his colleagues in the House of Commons. I wish to thank him for the privilege of being associated with him during the last session of the general assembly and for the courtesies he extended to me notwithstanding the fact that perhaps sometimes we do not agree on all points.

99. Contribution to the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees in the near east, $500,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is an item that has come before us now for some time year after year. It represents one of the great unsolved international social and economic problems of our time. Some one million refugees are covered in this particular area of activity. UNWRA or, as it is called, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine, provides assistance for this number of people. Over the week end I noticed in the New York Times that Joe Johnson of the Carnegie foundation has been sent by the government of the United States to look into certain aspects of the problem. Perhaps I am wrong in saying that he has been sent by the government of the United States. Perhaps he was sent by the United Nations. In any event, that gentleman who has spent so much of his time on international problems has been sent to take a look at this particular question, the solution for which does not seem to exist at the present time. I wonder whether the minister is in a position to say what his expectancy is with regard to this matter. I know that it is an extremely difficult one. It certainly depends upon circumstances beyond the control of this nation. However, having seen these refugees in some of their camps in this area and knowing how they feel, knowing of their embittered state and how almost inhuman the situation is, altogether apart from what may be the provocations, I would say that we cannot go on endlessly with this problem existing. The longer a solution is delayed, the more difficult the problem is going to become. Canada has borne its share of the cost of maintaining UNWRA. However, I am sure the minister would expect an opposition at this time to inquire what progress is being made in providing a solution to this situation and what steps towards ultimate humanitarian liquidation are likely to eventuate.

Mr. Green: I am afraid this problem is quite a long way from final solution. At each session of the general assembly of the United Nations the whole situation is thoroughly canvassed and various remedies are proposed. However it will be some time yet before we get this matter settled. One of the hopeful features has been the training of the young refugees. For example, last year we gave $1,500,000, I believe it was, in flour. The proceeds from the sale of that flour were used to build technical schools. I believe there was one school in Jordan and one in Lebanon. At these schools the refugees who are in a condition to take training are taught a trade. I think this is one of the most hopeful features of the whole situation.

Item agreed to.

103. Contribution to the program of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's science committee in an amount of $117,840 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1960, which is, $115,262.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister tell us about this vote and precisely what it seeks to do? I note that there is a slight reduction from last year, namely $9,000.

Mr. Green: This vote is for a science fellowship program. The funds are distributed to participating countries in the form of fellowships on their pro rata contribution, no nation receiving more than 15 per cent of the total fund. Had the cost sharing formula remained unchanged for 1961, Canada's dollar return would have been $120,750. It is not yet known, however, to what extent this will be affected by the adoption of a new cost sharing formula.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister this question, although perhaps I should know about this matter? What is the North Atlantic Treaty Organization science committee? What does it actually do apart from providing these scholarships?

Mr. Green: The main purpose of this program was to set up combined research by the different countries of NATO but evidently as yet it has not been as successful as was hoped when it was founded. Hence it involves merely these fellowships.

Item agreed to.

105. To provide the international civil aviation organization with office accommodation at less than commercial rates, $247,789.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask the minister whether the ICAO building in Montreal is going to be used at some time in the future exclusively for international civil aviation purposes. I understand that T.C.A.

are looking for other quarters. I was wondering whether it is the intention of the government to use that building and all its floor space for ICAO purposes exclusively.

Mr. Green: Unfortunately I am not in a position to answer that question. We merely pay the rent for ICAO in this building. I believe that the question comes under the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Benidickson: Who owns this building? Is it not a Canadian government building?

Mr. Green: I believe it is owned by the Canadian National Railways.

International joint commission—

109. Salaries and expenses of the commission including, subject to the approval of the governor in council and notwithstanding the International Boundary Waters Treaty Act, as amended, payment of salary of the chairman at $17,500 per annum, $108,885.

Mr. Chevrier: There are two matters that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister here. One of them concerns perhaps the most important commodity in the world, the commodity of water. As the minister appreciates, the United States and Canada are using more and more water for industrial and consumption purposes—more particularly industrial purposes—than ever before. I am concerned at the moment with the water levels in the port of Montreal. They have been discussed at some length by the authority but more particularly the situation is expressed in a report prepared by the Montreal port council in which some fear is expressed regarding the water level. This report is signed by the chairman, R. L. Dunsmore. There are two short references in this report to the water level which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. The first of these references reads as follows:

In the light of the low water levels last fall in the harbour, the criteria concerning water use priorities in the St. Lawrence river and lake Ontario established for the opening of the seaway were examined. It was noted that there were new rights of flood control, and water for hydro-electric power and navigational purposes up river from Montreal, and that the criterion concerning Montreal harbour water levels guaranteed only pre-seaway rights.

I doubt whether that is the juridical position, but whether it is or not makes no difference. The point is that there is fear in Montreal because of the lowering of the water level of the harbour.

It is further stated in this report as follows:

A ten thousand c.f.s. diversion means a drop of nearly half a foot in lake Ontario and at Montreal harbour.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The reason I bring this matter to the attention of the committee is that there is a clear obligation on the part of the government of Canada to see to it that water levels both upstream of the power development project in the international section as well as downstream in the St. Lawrence River is protected for navigation. That was clearly set out in the order of approval dated October 29, 1952 by the international joint commission.

Let me just place on Hansard the section which deals with that obligation and responsibility on the part of Canada, which reads as follows:

The works shall be so planned, located, constructed, maintained and operated as not to conflict with or restrain uses of the waters of the St. Lawrence river for purposes given preference over uses of water for power purposes by the treaty, namely, uses for domestic and sanitary purposes and uses for navigation, including the service of canals for the purposes of navigation, and shall be so planned, located, constructed, maintained and operated as to give effect to the provisions of this order.

In other words, notwithstanding the works on the international section, the first priority which must be granted and be given by the government of Canada is for the uses of domestic and sanitary purposes, and then next navigation, over and above power.

The international commission, having that in mind, established under this order a board of control to be known as the international St. Lawrence river board of control. The purposes and objects of that board were to make sure that the downstream interests as well as the upstream interests should in no way be affected.

Here I would like to pause to inform the minister that I believe the international joint commission has done a commendable job of work either through itself or through the board of control which I have mentioned.

On July 2, 1956, it issued a supplementary order of approval which deals with this matter, and which sets out what should be done in order to protect upstream and downstream interests. Perhaps I may just put the three recommendations of that order on the record. They are as follows:

(i) A range of mean monthly elevations for lake Ontario of 244 feet (navigation season) to 248.0 feet as nearly as may be; and

(ii) Criteria for a method of regulation of outflows and levels of lake Ontario applicable to the works in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river; and

(iii) Plan of regulation No. 12-A-9, subject to minor adjustments that may result from further detailed study and evaluation by the commission;

The board of control working under the authority of that order has issued two volumes, one and two, dealing with the regulation of water levels of lake Ontario. The reason I bring this subject to the attention of the minister is that at least the essential parts of this new plan 1958-A, have been put into operation. It is contained in this document and is a very detailed plan. I do not understand it and should like to say that it is an extremely difficult plan to understand.

However, I should like to draw to the attention of the minister the final recommendation contained in section VIII on page 43 of this volume, which is a part of the report to the international joint commission by the international St. Lawrence board of control. It reads as follows:

> The board recommends adoption of the foregoing plan designated 1958-A, as the initial operating plan for regulation of the levels and outflows of lake Ontario having in mind that certain revisions may be necessary in the light of further studies and operating experience.

I am pleased that provision was included in this plan, namely, that certain revisions may be necessary in the light of further studies and operating experience. There is no doubt now that the plan, while on the whole it has worked satisfactorily, and while it is a difficult thing to control the level of outflows from lake Ontario, with all due respect to those who have prepared it is not working in the interests of navigation in the port of Montreal.

The port's council so found and the engineers who have studied the situation down there similarly think it is necessary to store a larger quantity of water in lake Ontario for the protection of downstream interests than is being stored at the present time.

I do not bring this situation to the attention of the minister in any critical way because, and I repeat, I think the international joint commission and the board of control have done a tremendous job in regard to a most difficult problem. I bring it to his attention because of its importance not only to the protection of upstream rights, but because of the necessary protection of downstream rights.

I understand that the power interests have a representative on the board of control. That is not the case in so far as navigation is concerned. I understand the reason for that is that since navigation is a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of the federal government it has been thought that the international joint commission and the Department of Transport would protect the rights of navigation. I have no doubt it is the intention of the Department of Transport to ensure that the interests of navigation are protected, but I bring this situation to the attention of the minister because of the report of the Montreal council. I should like to ask the minister to bring this fact to the attention of the international joint commission so there will be no lowering of the water level at the port of Montreal, because the slightest lowering of this level as a result of works and upstream ports, may be costly from an economical standpoint to the development of the port of Montreal.

Mr. Green: Since I come from one of Canada's leading ports myself I have been greatly concerned about this problem, particularly last year. I do not know that it has been so pressing in the summer of 1961. But the procedures and principles for determining release in the future are under consideration by the international joint commission at the present time. The international St. Lawrence river board of control is taking a review of plan of regulation 1958-A, to which the hon. member for Laurier has referred. General McNaughton announced that this review is being made when he appeared before the standing committee on external affairs on June 14 of this year. It is expected that in due course the commission, in the light of the board's review, will report to governments on what alterations, if any, should be made in the plan of regulation. We have this situation very much in mind. I am hoping that it can be solved to the satisfaction of the city of Montreal.

Mr. Chevrier: The other matter that I wanted to discuss, and I will do it as briefly as I can, is one that also comes under the international joint commission. It is one that has been discussed in the house from time to time. I will not deal with the subject save and except in so far as it refers to the international joint commission. I refer to the important development of the Champlain-Richelieu cut-off. I mention it from an entirely different angle because, as the minister has seen in the press recently, there is a general feeling in the United States that they should use their internal canals to a far greater extent than they have in the past. It has been stated on more than one occasion that it is the intention of the United States to do one of two things. First, to develop the Richelieu river from lake Champlain into the St. Lawrence river at Sorel or second, into the port of Montreal by way of an overland route, and from thence to use the St. Lawrence seaway that has been developed so that navigation can be continued to Chicago and down the Illinois and the Mississippi to the ports along the Gulf of Mexico. Therefore, there would be a use of the United States ports on their internal canals, either by the route which I have mentioned or the other alternative which is under serious consideration in the United States, namely the deepening of the New York state barge canal.

They have gone so far as to say that whether Canada determines this or not they intend to go ahead and develop that route. If, as it has been stated in congress and elsewhere, they develop the New York state barge canal rather than use the St. Lawrence seaway by way of the Champlain-Richelieu cut-off, then I believe that serious consideration should be given by the government to the harm that might befall the economy if the whole eastern part of the seaway were by-passed by traffic in that manner.

The deepening of the New York barge canal would cost infinitely more money than the development of the Champlain-Richelieu cut-off. Recently a statement apeared in La Presse of July 15, 1961, which I have here, in which the inertia of the federal government is attacked for the lack of consideration of the Champlain cut-off.

I said at the beginning that I did not intend to get into a contentious debate and I do not think it should be done at this stage. What I bring to the attention of the minister is this. It seems to me this whole matter can be avoided if the government will only set up a board of engineers to consider making surveys of a waterway from the international boundary downstream to the St. Lawrence river. If that is done—and I understand it can be done at very little cost—then at least we shall be co-operating with the United States interests.

I have also learned that the United States corps of engineers have started surveys on their side of the line and have obtained a great deal of information in so far as Canadian conditions are concerned with reference to locks, bridges, and the depth of water. Therefore, I only repeat here what has been said from this side of the house, namely that the government give additional consideration to the establishment at very little cost of a survey to ascertain where the most economical route would be because five of them have been found as alternative routes by the international joint commission in its interim report of 1937, and, next, the economics of this project.

The international joint commission dealt with it at some length in the interim report. There are two volumes which I have in my possession. In this interim report they asked that they be given jurisdiction in this matter when the St. Lawrence seaway had been completed. As the minister knows, the seaway has been in operation since 1959. It seems to those who have studied the question that the time has arrived to ask the commission to continue its work which was interrupted in 1937.

Mr. Green: This question is under study by the several departments of government which are concerned but as yet we have had no report on that study. I am very keenly aware of the interest being taken in the whole project.

Mr. Chevrier: May I just add this. I know a study is being made by the several departments of government, but I have kept away from that. I am bringing to the attention of the minister the fact that the body to deal with this matter will be the international joint commission. I am not saying that it is, because I would not want to do the slightest thing that would dissuade the government from going ahead with this study. But since the international joint commission had it under consideration previously it may well be that it is the proper and logical body to deal with this matter at this time. If the government should come to that conclusion even before the report has been received from the interdepartmental committee I am sure it would be doing a great service to the Canadian people, in the light of what is happening in the United States at the present time.

Item agreed to.

Contributions to international economic and special aid programs—

Bilateral economic aid programs—

512. West Indies assistance program—further amount required, $390,000.

Mr. Benidickson: What is the nature of our arrangement with the West Indies on this type of vote? My query was, does it include practically all of the West Indies as we know them and what are the terms of the bilateral economic aid program into which we are entering?

Mr. Green: This is part of the $10 million which was provided in reality as a gift on the occasion of the West Indies Federation gaining its independence.

Item agreed to.

516. Assessment for the United Nations Congo ad hoc account for 1961 in an amount of $3,080,733 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of May, 1961, which is, $3,044,150.

Mr. Benidickson: This is a very large amount. Would the minister care to make any comment having regard to the troubles that apparently still exist in the Congo?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this is a good example of the high cost of getting results in the Congo. The United Nations operation in the Congo, which is known as ONUC, was established by the security council in July, 1960. The secretary general was called upon to furnish wide-scale assistance, both military and civilian, to the Belgian Congo, which became independent on June 30 of last year.

To meet the initial costs of the Congo operation he relied heavily on his authority to borrow from the working capital fund and the reserves of the special fund and the expanded program of technical assistance. At the first part of the fifteenth session of the general assembly last fall the secretary general presented estimates for the Congo operation for the last six months of 1960 in the amount of over $66 mililon. The United Kingdom, the United States and Canada agreed to waive reimbursement for certain claims in order to reduce total costs of the operation to be assessed. In accordance with a decision by the cabinet, Canada waived some $600,000 representing initial airlift costs. We took and are still taking a very active part in the airlift to the Congo. As a result of these special contributions, the general assembly approved a budget of $48.5 million for assessment on members. It took no decision on the 1961 Congo costs until the resumed session of the general assembly in March and April of this year. The secretary general's estimates for 1961, which were submitted just prior to that resumed session, totalled $135 million. The advisory committee recommended that this amount be reduced to $120 million for 1961.

At the close of the resumed session, the general assembly adopted a resolution authorizing the expenditure of $100 million U.S. for the first ten months in 1961 and the general assembly will be required to consider the costs for the remaining two months of 1961 at its session which begins on September 19.

Canada believes that a decision of the security council which entails financial commitments imposes a mandatory obligation on members to pay. In the discussions on the financing of ONUC, Canada pressed these views but was forced to agree to compromises by which ad hoc accounts for ONUC were set up for 1960 and 1961. The resolution setting up the 1960 ad hoc account contained a paragraph which noted that the expenses were an obligation on all members in accordance with article 17 (2) of the charter. The resolution creating the 1961 ad hoc account, however, was watered down and while acknowledging the Congo costs as expenses of the organization it omitted reference to the legally binding nature of the obligation to pay.

The Congo expenses are assessed according to the regular scale of assessment of the organization. As a result of voluntary contributions by the United States, however, certain members with low assessment rates and in receipt of technical assistance were made eligible for rebates. The amount of these rebates in 1960 was 50 per cent but the formula was revised for 1961 to give up to 80 per cent rebates.

The Canadian government has indicated Canada's strong support for the United Nations operation in the Congo from its inception. All the political considerations point to the necessity for continued Canadian support for United Nations action in the Congo. Early payment of the Canadian assessment for the 1961 costs is particularly important in order to give the organization much needed funds to keep the operation going in the face of a threatened heavy deficit resulting from the failure of certain members, particularly the Soviet bloc, to pay their assessments. For this reason the Canadian assessment for the 1961 Congo costs is included in the first supplementary estimates for 1961-62.

On the basis of the regular scale of assessment Canada's share of the $100 million costs of the operation in 1961 up to the end of October, that is, for the first ten months, is $3,080,733 U.S. This estimate provides for a contribution in that amount converted at the current rate of exchange.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the minister for his explanation although if he looks at the language and having regard to the amount of money involved I think he will recognize that the language is somewhat loose when it refers to an estimate as of May, 1961. Even one month's expenditures are consequential so it would be important to know whether the cut-off date is May 1 or the end of May 1961.

Mr. Green: The significance of those words is that the figure is based on the exchange rate as of May, 1961.

Mr. Benidickson: At the first or at the end of the month?

Mr. Green: We may need more money. We may need to come back for further money with the Canadian dollar down in value.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Green: May I just thank the members of the house and particularly members of the two opposition parties for their co-operation in getting these estimates through.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that we proceed now to the consideration of the estimates of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Churchill: I think, Mr. Chairman, that we might rise, report progress and commence the Department of National Defence tomorrow.

The Deputy Chairman: Is that the wish of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business will be for tomorrow and Wednesday?

Mr. Churchill: We will start tomorrow with the Department of National Defence. Depending on the progress made, we will see what will be done on Wednesday. It may be that we should take up on Wednesday the estimates of the privy council dealing particularly with the emergency measures organization. Perhaps during the course of tomorrow we might confer and see what is the best thing to do.

Mr. Chevrier: May I just ask this additional question? I was under the impression, perhaps wrongly, that when the business was announced on Friday it was indicated that on Wednesday we might deal with a statement by the Prime Minister on the emergency measures organization. I think there are some of us who would like to be here to listen to that statement. Is there any change in that?

Mr. Churchill: I have not heard of any change, but I thought it wiser to leave it open.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Prime ministers have moods.

Mr. Churchill: The Prime Minister will advise us tomorrow whether or not he wishes to go ahead on Wednesday.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

A—Department—

76. Departmental administration, $6,924,915.

77. Representation abroad—operational—including authority, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, for the appointment and fixing of salaries of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff by the governor in council, $11,271,043.

78. Representation abroad—construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings, works, land, equipment and furnishings, and to the extent that blocked funds are available for these expenditures, to provide for payment from these foreign currencies owned by Canada and provided only for governmental or other limited purposes, $1,377,900.

79. Canada's civilian participation as a member of the international commissions for supervision and control in Indo-China including authority, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, for the appointment and fixing of salaries of commissioners, secretaries and staff by the governor in council, $224,810.

80. Special administrative expenses including payment of remuneration, subject to the approval of the governor in council and notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, in connection with the assignment by the Canadian government of Canadians to the international staff of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (part recoverable from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization), and authority to make recoverable advances in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of the share of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization of such expenses, $44,136.

81. Official hospitality, $45,000.

82. Relief and repatriation of distressed Canadian citizens abroad and their dependents and for the reimbursement of the United Kingdom for relief expenditures incurred by its diplomatic and consular posts on Canadian account (part recoverable), $20,000.

83. Canadian representation at international conferences, $321,500.

84. Grant to the United Nations association in Canada, $12,000.

85. Grant to the Canadian Atlantic co-ordinating committee, $2,500.

86. Gift to commemorate the sesquicentennial anniversary of the independence of the republic of Mexico, $3,500.

87. Gift to commemorate the independence of Nigeria, $10,000.

External aid office—

88. Salaries and expenses, $525,923.

Contributions to international economic and special aid programs—

Bilateral economic aid programs—

89. Colombo plan, $50,000,000.

90. West Indies assistance program, $1,500,000.

91. Special commonwealth Africa aid program, $3,500,000.

92. Technical assistance to commonwealth countries and territories other than those eligible for assistance under the Colombo plan, the West Indies assistance program or the special commonwealth Africa aid program, $120,000.

93. Commonwealth scholarship plan, $1,000,000.

Multilateral economic aid programs—

94. Contribution to the United Nations special fund in an amount of $2,350,000 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1960, which is $2,298,594.

95. Contribution to the United Nations expanded program for technical assistance to underdeveloped countries in an amount of $2,150,000 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December 1960, which is, $2,102,969.

96. Contribution to the operational budget of the international atomic energy agency in an amount of $52,020 U.S. notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1960, which is, $50,882.

Special aid programs—

97. Contribution to the program of the United Nations high commissioner for refugees, $290,000.

98. Contribution to the United Nations children's fund, $650,000.

99. Contribution to the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees in the near east, $500,000.

100. Contribution towards the refugee program of the intergovernmental committee for European migration, $60,000.

Special aid programs—

101. Expenses in connection with Canada's participation in the world refugee year, additional to those provided for in vote 648, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1960, for the completion of the tuberculosis refugee program, $50,000.

Other payments to international organizations and programs—

102. Assessments for membership in the international (including commonwealth) organizations that are detailed in the estimates, including authority to pay such assessments in the amounts and in the currencies in which they are levied, notwithstanding that the total of such payments may exceed the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1960, which is, $4,709,895.

103. Contribution to the program of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's science committee in an amount of $117,840 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1960, which is, $115,262.

104. Payment to the international civil aviation organization in part reimbursement of compensation paid to its Canadian employees for Quebec income tax for the 1960 taxation year, $11,500.

105. To provide the international civil aviation organization with office accommodation at less than commercial rates, $247,789.

106. Contribution to the United Nations technical assistance administration training centre at the University of British Columbia, $10,000.

107. Grant to the international committee of the Red Cross, $15,000.

108. Grant to the commonwealth institute in an amount of £500, notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1960, which is, $1,375.

B—International joint commission—

109. Salaries and expenses of the commission including, subject to the approval of the governor in council and notwithstanding the International Boundary Waters Treaty Act, as amended, payment of salary of the chairman at $17,500 per annum, $108,885.

110. Canada's share of the expenses of studies, surveys and investigations of the international joint commission, $52,000.

481. Additional advance to the working capital fund of the world health organization in an amount of $17,949 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1960, which is, $17,556.

A—Department—

508. Representation abroad—operational expenses —further amount required, $199,555.

509. Representation abroad—construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings, works, land, equipment and furnishings—further amount required, $44,600.

510. Gift to commemorate the independence of Sierra Leone, $5,000.

External aid office—

511. Salaries and expenses—further amount required, $87,054.

Bilateral economic aid programs—

512. West Indies assistance program—further amount required, $390,000.

513. Educational assistance for independent French speaking African states, $300,000.

Special aid programs—

514. Expenses in connection with Canada's participation in the world refugee year, for the completion of the tuberculous refugee program—further amount required, $60,000.

Other payments to international organizations and programs—

515. Contribution to the program of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's science committee—to increase by $61,400 U.S. the amount of the contribution provided for in vote 103, main estimates, 1961-62; the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of May 1961, is, $60,570.

516. Assessment for the United Nations Congo ad hoc account for 1961 in an amount of $3,080,733 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of May, 1961, which is, $3,044,150.

Contributions to international economic and special aid programs—

Special aid programs—

606. Purchase of flour to be given to the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees in the Near East, $1,500,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, September 12, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF NATO SECRETARY GENERAL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have with us in the gallery today the secretary general of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Mr. Dirk Stikker, who is making his first official visit to Canada since taking over his present responsibilities in April. This is not the first time he has been in Canada. His first visit goes back to 1946, and in the intervening years he has been here on more than one occasion. As the house knows, Mr. Stikker has a long and distinguished record in the field of foreign affairs. He was foreign minister of the Netherlands from 1948 to 1952. My colleagues and I greatly appreciate the opportunity he has given us of discussing with him not only the problems of NATO but generally of the international situation today.

I feel that I speak for all hon. members in welcoming Mr. Stikker and in expressing to him the hope that under his direction the alliance will continue to develop its strength and unity, and that the greatest possible use will continue to be made of the NATO council for intensive consultations on the critical issues currently facing the NATO partners. On behalf of the house I extend to him a warm welcome.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I on behalf of the opposition join very warmly in the welcome the Prime Minister has extended to the new secretary general of NATO, who is paying his first visit to Ottawa in this capacity. I do so officially, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of a party which has supported and will continue to support a strong and united NATO as a bulwark of defence and peace. Perhaps I might be permitted to say that I also do so personally as an old friend and colleague of Mr. Stikker.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we welcome Dr. Stikker to the gallery, as we have in the past welcomed representatives of other important organizations. We are certain that Dr. Stikker will be interested to learn the opinions of Canadians on various public issues with which he is connected as well as of members of the house. We have read in the press certain statements attributed to Dr. Stikker. With some we are in hearty agreement; with others we have certain reservations. These opinions also will be made known in the course of the coming debate.

We join with others in welcoming to our gallery this distinguished gentleman who in the past has played an important role in many organizations and in particular in the organization for European economic co-operation.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

STATEMENT ON FALL-OUT RESULTING FROM RECENT TESTS

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement on fall-out resulting from the resumption of nuclear tests by the Soviet union. Since the first test explosion on September 1, my department's network of 24 air sampling stations located across Canada has continued to provide regular material for analysis on a daily basis. From the results obtained, it now appears that effects of the Russian testing program have been observed at some of our stations.

For example, on September 7, the reading for Edmonton showed a fresh fall-out level of nine disintegrations per minute per cubic metre of air, a value which was about 30 times higher than the levels observed for this station during the past several months. This is the most significant increase recorded for samples received to date, although a value of four units, or 15 times higher than normal, was observed for Winnipeg on September 8, and a value of one unit or three times higher than normal for Calgary on September 7.

As I have previously indicated to the house, the significance of all radioactivity data from the health viewpoint can only be assessed on the basis of average levels for a reasonable period of time, perhaps up to a year. The observations we have made in the air monitoring program have consistently shown large fluctuations from day to day, and it is interesting to note that the level observed for Calgary on September 8, the day after the high reading, was back to normal.

Nuclear Fall-out Results

In attempting to interpret the present situation I think it is appropriate to refer to the recommendations of the international commission on radiological protection, which provide the basic data for calculating the maximum permissible level for the public at large. From these data, a level of 6.6 units has been derived. In this connection it is important to realize that the calculations imply continued exposure at this level throughout a lifetime. Short duration increases above this limit are not considered to be of serious public health concern.

Furthermore, it is of interest to note that measurements of fall-out levels in air were made during and subsequent to the extensive weapons testing programs of the fall of 1958. These data were collected by the national research council as part of Canada's contribution to the international geophysical year project. Nine of the observing stations were located in areas now served by our present program, and for these stations the highest over-all monthly average reached a value of 6.88 units in February, 1959. During the same period, however, individual daily results were as high as 38.1 units. Six months later, when my department's program began operating, the monthly average had dropped to 0.85 units and it has subsequently continued to decrease to the point where the over-all monthly average for July, 1961, was 0.29.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the house will want to examine carefully the announcement on radioactive levels given this morning by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is evident from the statement of the minister that his announcement is of great significance. An indication of an increase in levels following recent test explosions is something that cannot be ignored in this or any other country.

We are fortunate in Canada in having a testing system, which I believe we owe largely to the late Dr. Cipriani and Dr. Watkinson, one that can take its place with any similar system in any country of the world.

The minister did not tell us whether the increased radiation was of a character which would warrant our concluding that there was a substantial increase in the danger to human health. We do know that the best scientific opinion as of 1956 suggested that for the population at large the concentration of radioactive strontium should not exceed one tenth of that permitted to the small number of persons employed in radioactive industries. But we have not been told by the minister whether the dangers from these levels are to be compared with the dangers that flow from traditional uses of materials from which have emanated dangerous radioactivity over the years. In any event, the minister's statement is a forceful demonstration of the undesirability of nuclear testing at this time.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare is a further confirmation of the opinion of mankind generally that the resumption of nuclear explosions was a mistake and is against the best interests of the people of the world no matter in which country they reside. The evidence presented this morning is a clear indication of the dangers that flow from a continuation of such weapons testing, and would indicate that once again in Canada there may be evidence, as was the case a few years ago, of some contamination of food.

This demonstrates once again the need for Canada and other nations to pursue a policy of support for an international agreement that would prohibit the testing of nuclear weapons. We think this is an indication that those members both in the government party and in the opposition who are so strongly in favour of the abolition of weapons testing should redouble their efforts.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—APPEARANCE OF DEPUTY COMMANDER ON TELEVISION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether Air Marshal Roy Slemon, R.C.A.F., deputy commander of NORAD, appeared recently in Washington with General Kuter, the commander of NORAD, on the ABC-TV show "Issues and Answers"? If so, did he make his appearance with the knowledge and consent of the minister?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): I received notice of this question shortly before coming into the house. No date was given for the program in question; thus I am not in a position to state whether or not Air Marshal Slemon appeared. I have asked the R.C.A.F. to get a full report in connection with all appearances Air Marshal Slemon may have made.

Mr. Pearson: The report is for a week ago last Sunday.

STATEMENT AS TO PROPOSED EMERGENCY ARMY HEADQUARTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East asked this question:

Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether he feels he is in a position to answer this question. If he is not in a position to answer today he may take it as notice. Can the minister pinpoint those target cities in Canada where it is proposed to establish emergency army headquarters as was announced by the minister in his statement on Thursday last?

I understand the question to mean the location of alternate army headquarters which were set up, and which I had stated had gone into operation on August 24. From reading over this question I take it that what the hon. gentleman is really interested in is the target area headquarters, a different thing entirely. These, of course, must be made known to the municipal and provincial authorities and, as a result, I am quite pleased to give the answer to that question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope the whip will note that.

Mr. Harkness: These target area headquarters will be put into operation in the coming months. They are located near principal cities. These sites will be manned by military personnel, who will work closely with both municipal and provincial authorities in controlling search, rescue and re-entry operations in areas that may be attacked. In most cases the new target area headquarters will be located some 20 to 50 miles from the major cities.

Thirteen of the projected 16 sites have been selected. They are as follows: Windsor for Halifax, N.S.; Camp Gagetown for Saint John, N.B.; Camp Valcartier for Quebec City, Que.; St. Jerome for Montreal, Que.; Almonte for Ottawa, Ont.; Newmarket for Toronto, Ont.; Chatham for Windsor, Ont.; Dunnville for Niagara Falls, Ont.; Portage La Prairie for Winnipeg, Man.; Wetaskiwin for Edmonton, Alta.; Olds for Calgary, Alta.; Camp Chilliwack for Vancouver, B.C.; and Duncan for Victoria, B.C.

Other sites for the cities of St. John's, Newfoundland, Hamilton and London, Ont., have not yet been decided. They will be announced in the near future.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in asking another question I wish to thank the minister for this information. May I be assured that the most careful consideration has been given to the selection of a nearby community for the purpose of bringing the city of Windsor in Ontario within the context of this program?

Mr. Harkness: I think the hon. member for Essex East and all other hon. members may be assured that the utmost care is being taken in order to secure the best possible sites to serve as headquarters for re-entry and rescue operations outside of each of the major cities.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURE

DROUGHT CONDITIONS IN WEST—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the widespread crop disaster in the prairie provinces and the demand by farm organizations for special action by the government, including a demand by the farmers' union for a $5 acreage payment, can the Prime Minister say when the government will be announcing a policy? Is he able to indicate whether or not some assistance will be provided for hard pressed farmers?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I know something of the situation in western Canada, and also of the extent to which drought has seriously reduced the production of grain and thus the income of the western farmer. The house will recall that on two previous occasions the government acted to provide an acreage payment which the hon. gentleman rather ridiculed. However, I find that the small farmers throughout the west are very well pleased with the action taken.

Having regard to the interest this government has taken in this question, the house can be assured that when a decision is made as to what shall or shall not be done it will be made known to the house immediately.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question. Can I take it from the Prime Minister's statement that the government is considering doing something more than the $1 an acre payment, which was ridiculously low?

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I can say is that, no matter what the government does, the hon. gentleman always says, "More, please".

INDUSTRY

TIN—REPORTED SALES FROM GOVERNMENT STOCKPILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Has the government initiated steps towards the disposal of reserves of tin at St. Paul l'Ermite, Assomption county? If so, what are the results of that transaction?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the government has had on hand since the Korean war six million pounds of tin which it has started to dispose of; according to the report I had on September 1, 643,000 pounds were sold at a price of $115 per 100 pounds.

On the orders of the day:

S.S. VACATIONLAND—STATEMENT RESPECTING IMPORTATION OF FERRY

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The other day the hon. member for Laurier asked me a question about the S.S. Vacationland, following a statement by my colleague, the Minister of Transport. I can tell the hon. gentleman that I am advised that the S.S. Vacationland arrived at Port Colborne about 45 minutes ago for steamship inspection, and that no discussions have taken place with respect to taxes in any way whatsoever.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

TORONTO—REPORTED REMARKS BY LOCAL MAGISTRATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I wonder whether the minister has any comment to make on a news dispatch from Toronto indicating that when sentencing Michael Fakarie to ten days for making improper advances to girls at the Canadian National Exhibition a magistrate remarked that the court list contained no Anglo Saxon names on charges for indecent assault. The question is, how can the magistrate be impartial in the administration of justice—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it seems to me his question relates entirely to the administration of justice or the administration of the Criminal Code, which is not the responsibility of the Minister of Justice, but of the provincial authorities.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN MERCHANT NAVY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he received a brief from the Canadian brotherhood of railway, transport and general workers in connection with the establishment of a Canadian merchant navy, arising out of the subsidization policy which he announced in the house some time ago? The question is this. Has the minister had an opportunity of studying the brief, and what conclusion has he come to?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had an opportunity to study the brief, but I will do so some time today.

[Mr. O'Hurley.]

TELEVISION

TORONTO—REPORTED TRANSFER TO U.S. OF INTEREST IN PRIVATE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate last Thursday concerning a story appearing in the press to the effect that a very substantial interest in the private television station in Toronto is to be transferred to United States interests, may I say this. The board of broadcast governors recommended that approval of this application be deferred in order to provide the applicant with an opportunity to receive offers from experienced Canadian broadcasting interests. Further consideration will be given to the matter by the board on September 25.

PARLIAMENT HILL

EAST BLOCK—INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACTOR'S SIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works and appeal to his aesthetic sensibilities. Does the minister consider it proper for building contractors to disfigure the east block on parliament hill by the erection of a large advertising sign, particularly in a location where the Prime Minister's office is situated and at a time when parliament is sitting?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I shall be happy to deal with this matter of urgent and national importance. It is customary for contractors to have signs erected. It is a good thing in order to have material directed to the site. However, before they erect a sign on parliament hill they must obtain our permission. In this instance no permission was obtained, and as a consequence the sign is being removed.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear it.

AIR TRANSPORT

T.C.A. AND C.P.A.—INQUIRY AS TO MERGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister indicate whether negotiations are going on for the purpose of effecting a merger of Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian Pacific Airlines?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that has raised a great deal of speculation. At the present time an interdepartmental committee is studying the situation of major air lines in Canada. This interdepartmental committee has made an interim report to the cabinet, and the report is under study.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

232. Departmental administration, $3,455,378.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, this is the first opportunity I have had of presenting the estimates of the Department of National Defence to the committee. I appreciate the privilege. It gives me a very welcome opportunity to speak on the important subject of our military security. But before I do so I should like to say a word about my very distinguished predecessor in office, General George Pearkes, V.C., now His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia.

I have had the privilege of a long acquaintanceship and close friendship with George Pearkes, extending back to the early 1920's. I served in the first Canadian division under his command, and we entered parliament at the same time. He is a distinguished soldier who rendered signal service to Canada during the first war, between the wars, and throughout the second world war. His interest in and concern for the defence of Canada was demonstrated throughout his years in parliament and particularly as minister of national defence for nearly three and a half years. He is a great gentleman and a great Canadian, and I am sure we all wish him well in his present distinguished position.

I do not think anyone would deny that we are living in times of great stress. Important and far reaching changes are taking place in many parts of the world; new nations are emerging, resulting on occasion in violence and bloodshed. But overriding all other considerations is the open threat of the Soviet union to eventually achieve world domination. This threat is being implemented on many fronts, economic, political, ideological and military. To combat it requires counteraction in all these areas.

Today, however, I intend to deal with the military threat to our national security. That it continues to exist was made very clear by the Soviet premier earlier this year, when he warned of the consequences which would follow if nations tried to resist the communist move to world wide acceptance of this organization of society. I might add that Mr. Khrushchev went on to say that one of the means for preventing a new war is the development of peace fronts throughout the world, including pacifists of all political beliefs, and through a policy of peaceful coexistence—as defined by him, of course, meaning acceptance of communism. This policy, he said:

> —facilitates the activities of the communist party and other progressive organizations of the working class in the capitalist countries, makes it easier for the peoples to combat aggressive war blocs and foreign military bases and contributes to the success of the national liberation government. The policy of peaceful coexistence is, thus, so far as its social content is concerned, a form of intense economic, political and ideological struggle between the proletariat and the aggressive forces of imperialism in the world arena.

I think that reinforces what the Leader of the Opposition said a day or two ago to the effect that words have been debased, and they no longer mean, in the Soviet lexicon, what they mean in ours.

In recent weeks, of course, we have been confronted with a series of threats with regard to the Berlin situation. I shall be referring later to the steps the government has taken in the light of the present international situation.

The government's defence policy has two objectives; first, to maintain peace by preventing a third global war; and second, to prevent subjection to a foreign power. Everything we do in defence is devoted to attaining these two purposes.

We believe they can best be attained by a system of alliances, and thus we have been strong supporters of, and have been taking and will continue to take our full part in, making NATO, NORAD and the UN effective. History has shown that had the coalitions that won the last two world wars been in existence and firmly united before the wars, those wars might well have been avoided. When in 1948 it became apparent that the west was again faced with a situation where one by one the countries of Europe might fall under communist domination, the formation of the North Atlantic treaty coalition was the logical step to take. Canada pressed for this action and has firmly supported it since then. It is the cornerstone of our defence policy.

Working as a member of a group of nations is an art that is not easily acquired. To play an effective part, individual nations must show that they are prepared to accept their responsibilities and to make sacrifices, sacrifices in money, men or risks. Only so long as the will of the individual members remains steadfast will the coaltion be strong and its will to stand together be abundantly clear to any would-be aggressor. Canada must, therefore, maintain her proper share of forces committed to NATO, and show to her fellow members and to any possible opponent a determination to stand with the coalition against any aggression.

If membership in NATO demands some abrogation of national freedom of action, it has advantages that far outweigh any drawbacks. The strength of the union is the sum of the strengths of the individual members, and the total strength of the west thus marshalled is formidable indeed. Individual members do not have to maintain a balance of all the forces that go to make up modern military power. Individual members can contribute to the whole those forces that best suit their national circumstances. Canada, for example, does not attempt to provide strategic bombers, intercontinental ballistic missiles or fast carrier task forces; yet the NATO organization has the necessary forces in these categories.

I think one of the difficulties which many people experience in their thinking on defence is that they tend to think of Canada particularly as a nation which in their view should be in a position to maintain a force of all kinds, which at the present time is a complete impossibility.

A very important part of the NATO philosophy is the reliance on the retaliatory nuclear forces maintained by the United States and the United Kingdom. Canada does not contribute directly to these forces, but she does make an important contribution to ensure that the major portion of these forces remains effective. By this I mean that through the maintenance, together with the United States, of the early warning radar lines and the anti-bomber defences, she is ensuring that retaliation would be of such an order as to cause equal, if not greater, destruction on the territory of those responsible for launching an attack on this continent.

In North America, a regional area of NATO, the defence against air attack is a single problem. It cannot be separated into parts by boundary lines or limits of territorial waters. This fact was recognized during world war II, when joint plans for defence were drawn up and co-ordinated between the United States and ourselves. After the war, when it became apparent that there was an increasing risk from the air, further closer collaboration in planning took place. Eventually, because of the increasing speeds of aircraft and the resulting shorter and shorter reaction time, consultation and co-ordination were too time consuming, and it was decided to form a joint headquarters to control the air defence forces of the two partner nations so as to make the most effective use of the very short warning time available to the defences.

NORAD has been attacked as an organization wherein Canada might lose some element of sovereignty. Theoretically I suppose any international agreement involves some loss of sovereignty, but I do not consider that there is any significant loss of Canadian sovereignty involved in the NORAD agreement. The Canadian forces remain under Canadian command. Only operational control is exercised by the joint headquarters of NORAD, and there is no intrusion of United States forces or United States authority in areas that were not already provided for under the former co-ordinated arrangements.

I would like to stress again that the NORAD agreement is a purely defensive agreement. Military action can only be taken if North America comes under attack from the air. In other words, it cannot by any conceivable circumstance start a war. The commander in chief of NORAD is responsible to the Canadian and the United States governments through their respective chiefs of staff, and these governments can and do exercise control over the planning and operating procedures and actions that NORAD takes.

Our contribution to the United Nations is, I think, well known. We have substantial forces in Egypt, and our servicemen take part in a number of truce commissions and supervisory bodies in various trouble spots in the world. In the last year, of course, we have taken on the additional responsibility of providing some 300 army and air force personnel to the United Nations force in the Congo.

I have just given a broad outline of our general defence policy. Before going on to some more specific matters I should like to briefly mention some opposing ideas which have been put forward from various quarters.

As an alternative to the collective security arrangements we have entered into, other proposals have been put forth, in many cases after genuine and sincere consideration, generally motivated, I think, by the very real fear of nuclear attack on Canada. Some have suggested unilateral disarmament. Presumably the thinking is that if Canada were completely disarmed there would be no provocation for attack. This theory, of course, ignores history; it ignores our geographical position, and it ignores the stated policy of the Soviet. I submit that it is completely unacceptable to Canadians as a whole. It would neither ensure our security nor enhance our reputation in the eyes of the world. To suggest that such an action would have a profound effect on Russia, China or any other communist regime displays a naïveté that is beyond reasonable comprehension.

In talking or writing about defence policy, many people have become so obsessed with equipment matters—in other words the kind of aircraft and armaments available—that they have come to look upon these as the main features of defence policy rather than as one of the means by which basic defence policy is carried into effect. The type of equipment secured depends on the strategy being followed to implement our defence policy and on the tactics which it is believed we will have to employ. Essentially this means that our forces must be equipped to give them the maximum possible mobility and flexibility. It requires that they be equipped with weapons comparable to if not better than those of a potential adversary. It is the policy of the government that our forces should not be required to face a potential enemy with inferior weapons.

Inevitably there will continue to be much argument about the various items of equipment supplied to the services, or which various people think should be supplied to them. Contrary to the statements which have frequently been made that the services, particularly the army, have chiefly old and obsolete equipment, they have in fact been supplied with an almost completely new range of equipment of all kinds.

Three weapons systems—the Honest John surface to surface missile, the Bomarc anti-aircraft weapon and the CF-104 aircraft—being obtained have a nuclear capability, but I should like to make it clear that their military role can in no way be compared with such strategic nuclear weapons as are maintained by the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet union. Defensive weapons with a nuclear capability may be required to maintain the credibility of the deterrent, and in the event that the worst happened would be required to provide an effective defence against Soviet aggression. A considerable lead time is necessary for the provision of any such weapons, amounting in most cases to two or three years or more, and it is only prudent to obtain the weapons systems now so that they will be available and our forces trained to use them. The situation is much the same as that of a man living in a lonely cabin in the woods who fears he may be attacked by a bear. He does not wait until the bear actually attacks him to buy a rifle, but secures it beforehand and has it ready in the event of need.

The Bomarc will form part of the defences we must maintain against the manned bomber as long as there are potentially hostile aircraft in existence that could be used against us. A bomber, if unopposed, is by far the best and most effective way of delivering atomic weapons, and it is necessary therefore that we maintain a defence against such a threat as long as it is in existence. We do not know how many long range missiles of adequate accuracy the Russians possess, but we do know that the number is limited. On the other hand, it is a fact that they do have a considerable number of manned aircraft in operation, and should an attack be decided upon it must be presumed that these aircraft would be used.

That was the reason for the decision to improve our air defence by the acquisition of the Bomarc surface to air missile, new heavy radars and the SAGE control system. That was also the reason for the agreement concluded with the United States calling for the acquisition by the R.C.A.F. of 66 F-101B interceptor aircraft. The F-101B is considered the best two place interceptor for service in NORAD today. Five squadrons of 12 aircraft will be formed, one each at Comox, B.C., North Bay and Ottawa, Ontario, Bagotville, Quebec, and Chatham, N.B. Squadrons will be converted progressively with CF-100's being withdrawn as each squadron commences conversion.

As part of the agreement the R.C.A.F. will take over the operation and maintenance costs of 11 Pine Tree radars now operated by the United States air force and the maintenance costs of a further five radars now manned by the R.C.A.F. but financed by the United States. The take-over of the 11 radars will be carried out progressively, and present plans are that the program will be completed within a two year period. Canada also assumes financial responsibility for the five radars now manned by the R.C.A.F. as from the date of the agreement.

One other aspect of the agreement relates to the production of the F-104 aircraft by Canadair for our allies. This is a matter not strictly within the purview of the Department of National Defence but it does emphasize, I think, the important part this aircraft has in the over-all equipment policy being implemented by several member nations of NATO.

Other aircraft recently being taken into service or in production will materially strengthen the capabilities of the R.C.A.F. New transport aircraft, including the long range CC-106—the Yukon—the C-130B and the medium range CC-109 will not only increase the over-all air transport capacity of the R.C.A.F., but will also greatly facilitate the movement of Canadian army personnel and equipment to whatever part of the world a requirement exists for our forces.

Canadian production of the CF-104, the aircraft selected to replace the Sabres now being flown in the No. 1 air division, is proceeding according to plan, and this aircraft will enter operational service in 1962. As was announced in 1959, it was selected to meet a specific NATO requirement. It is interesting to note that since then several NATO countries, including Germany, Belgium and The Netherlands, have announced their intention to procure F-104 aircraft. These three countries will all use the F-104 in three roles; as a fighter bomber, an all-weather interceptor and for tactical reconnaissance. It is also expected that Italy will obtain a number of F-104 aircraft, and apart from the NATO countries Japan intends to equip its self defence air force with the F-104. In fact, the F-104 has turned out to be the nearest approach to standardization of aircraft within NATO which has been achieved to date.

For a number of years now the Royal Canadian Navy has been developing methods to combat the submarine menace which exists off both our western and eastern shores. This threat has been further aggravated by the development of the missile capable of being launched from both the surface of the water and under the surface. Continuous improvements have been made to our naval vessels, one notable achievement being the variable depth sonar, product of our own Canadian research teams. This year authority has been given for the installation of helicopter platforms on a number of our destroyer escorts, and additional helicopters will be obtained for anti-submarine duties from these ships. In May last the navy took delivery of the submarine H.M.C.S. Grilse which has been lent by the United States navy. The procurement of this submarine, manned by Canadian naval personnel, will enable our anti-submarine forces on the west coast to get valuable and essential training in the months and years ahead. Ships and aircraft on our east coast for a number of years have had the same facilities provided by submarines of the United Kingdom navy.

The three army brigade groups in Canada, together with members of the reserve forces, have in the past year, in addition to their normal field exercises, been undergoing intensive training in survival operations. New survival equipment has been issued, and the recent exercise Tocsin '61 proved that while a lot remains to be done, great advances have been made in a short space of time in this important aspect of national survival.

The operations of the defence research board are, I think, well known to members of the committee, and I do not intend at this time to outline in detail its various activities. However, I should like to say that within the concept of collective security the board is an essential component of our defence structure. The importance of the place which defence science holds in present day and future planning cannot be too strongly emphasized. Without the advice of a competent and knowledgeable research organization it would be impossible to arrive at sound decisions on military questions in which the technical factor exerts a major influence.

In the development of new equipment and new techniques we must work closely with Canadian industry as a whole. Awareness of this has led the government to authorize the defence research board to develop an extended program of defence research in industry with a primary view of building up and maintaining a more adequate level of defence research capacity. The Department of Defence Production will be co-operating with the defence research board in selecting the research objectives for this expanded defence industrial research program.

I should now like to refer to the decisions the government has taken recently with regard to the deterioration of the situation in Europe. Since the house adjourned in July the international situation, especially with regard to Europe, has been the cause of concern to all nations of the western alliance. The announcement by Premier Khrushchev that the Soviet union intended to sign a separate peace treaty with Eastern Germany, coupled with military preparations taken by the communists, has led Canada and her allies to make a serious study of the implications of the Soviet moves. The decision of the Soviet union to resume nuclear weapons testing, followed by the recent atomic explosions, leaves little doubt in our minds as to the threat that faces us today. The Soviet ambassador to Canada is quoted as saying that the purpose of the resumption of such tests is to "jolt the allies" into agreement on disarmament. He might have added that such agreement is to be on communist terms and communist terms alone.

Following the conference of foreign ministers of the United States, France, Great Britain and Germany, the NATO council met on August 8, and as a result of this meeting the members unanimously agreed to consider measures they might take to bolster the overall NATO forces. Although Canada has lived up to her commitment to NATO in the past, the Canadian government after fully considering the matter decided to take certain action to further strengthen our contribution in Europe, and at the same time to increase the effectiveness of the forces committed to NATO in Canada and to step up the national survival program. Although announcements have already been made in this regard it would, I think, be useful to give a general summary at this time.

In so far as our national survival program is concerned, it has been decided to partially man emergency headquarters and warning centres in Canada; to stockpile and disperse certain stores; to accelerate the purchase of national survival equipment; to speed up the nuclear detonation and fall-out reporting system; to expedite the warning siren program and the survey of existing fall-out protection; and to carry out, as the Prime Minister said earlier, a national survival exercise later this fall to test the effectiveness of the program as a whole.

With their present strengths the regular army and the militia cannot supply the necessary personnel required as a result of the increased activity in the national survival program. To improve this position the government has approved a plan to increase, in the shortest possible time, the number of people trained to take part in survival and rescue operations should the need arise. It has been decided to train up to 100,000 men in the militia on special courses, each lasting six weeks. Approximately 25,000 will be trained on each course in existing military armouries across the country. As an example, training in the eastern Ontario area will not be limited to Ottawa but will be conducted also in Cornwall, Pembroke, Kingston, Peterborough, etc., all the places where military armouries exist and there is sufficient enrolment to justify a course.

Emphasis throughout will be on the teaching of subjects essential for national survival. There will be sufficient basic military training to provide the discipline and response essential to the control and effective employment of such a force on operations. Recruits will be trained with regular militia units in their home districts, and on completion of their courses will be given an opportunity to remain with the militia.

All trainees will be enrolled on a continuous call-out basis during the period of their course. They will receive normal pay with subsistance allowance in lieu of rations as given to a regular army recruit private of single status, that is $108 a month pay and a subsistence allowance of $65 per month. Standards of enrolment will be somewhat modified to permit acceptance of applicants between the ages of 18 and 50 years, married or single. Physical requirements based on the pulhems profile will not be as stringent as those now in force for the regular army.

The first course is scheduled to get under way before mid-November. For each course of 25,000 a training staff of approximately 2,700 officers and N.C.O.'s will be required. This staff will be found through existing instructional staff for the army survival operations and from militia officers and N.C.O.'s and former regular army personnel called out on a voluntary basis for the duration of the program. Any deficiencies which may exist after calling on these three sources will be made up from the regular army. The administration of the program will be based on the existing militia structure.

In so far as our commitment to NATO is concerned, we are determined to make it perfectly clear that we fully support that organization. Over the past few years we have been strengthening the brigade group in Europe by modernizing and increasing the quantities of the brigade weapons. As an example, the armoured component of the brigade has been increased from squadron to regimental strength. Despite the increase in weapons and equipment, it was not considered necessary to make a corresponding increase in manpower. However, in a period of tension, and of course this is a period of tension, it is necessary to provide additional personnel to units in the field to ensure that they can, without delay, meet all their commitments on a 24-hour basis. The retention in the brigade of the first battalion of the Black Watch has already been announced. It is now proposed to strengthen the brigade group in Germany by the immediate addition of 1,100 men, of whom 300 are being allocated to man the surface to surface Honest John missile battery and to operate the reconnaissance helicopters which are being added to the brigade group.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The minister's time has expired. Will the committee give unanimous consent to permit him to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to thank the committee, Mr. Chairman. Initially the men to meet these requirements will be provided from existing units now in Canada. I might say that the first 400 men to strengthen the brigade will sail for Europe on the 22nd of this month, to be followed by a further 400 about a week later.

The strength of the R.C.A.F. air division in Europe is to be increased by 250 men. This will provide, amongst other things, an increased ratio of pilots to aircraft, thus improving the operational readiness of the division. In so far as the Royal Canadian Navy is concerned, we have a commitment to NATO for the provision of ships and aircraft in the event of an emergency. Our ships are at present manned at an average of 86 per cent of full operational complement. It is intended that immediate action be taken toward manning all operational ships at full strength. This means the addition of some 1,750 personnel in naval strength.

A further decision has been made to increase the air transport capability of the R.C.A.F. It was planned that with the introduction of the long range Yukon aircraft, the North Star transport aircraft would be phased out of service. However, a squadron of these aircraft is now to be retained, thus enhancing the long range operations of air transport command. The extra manpower required involves some 500 personnel. To man the Pine Tree radar sites being transferred from the United States to Canada during the next few months without reducing other activities being undertaken by the R.C.A.F., an additional 490 personnel will be needed.

As a result of the increased manpower requirements, authority has been given to raise the strength ceilings of our forces in Europe from 12,000 to 14,000, and of the regular forces as a whole from 120,000 to 135,000.

I have already referred to the R.C.N. and R.C.A.F. requirement and the increase in strength of the fourth brigade group in Europe. In addition, it is proposed to maintain an immediate reserve of 1,500 men in Canada for the fourth brigade group, who will be available for immediate dispatch, with their documentation and so on, completed, to strengthen the strategic reserve forces of the army earmarked for NATO and to provide additional army personnel for national survival operations. Immediate steps are therefore being taken to recruit an additional 1,750 personnel for the R.C.N., some 11,600 for the Canadian army, and 1,140 for the R.C.A.F.

The estimated cost of these programs in round figures during the current fiscal year is $6 million for the survival measures, plus $25 million for the special militia training of men to take part in survival and rescue operations, and $12 million for the additions to the regular forces including the strengthening of the NATO forces overseas. Part of this cost can be met from the estimates now before the house. The net addition to defence spending when all adjustments have been taken into account will be in the order of $35 million. A question was asked the other day as to what the cost would be in a full year. The estimated cost of the measures I have mentioned for the year 1962-63 will be $62.9 million. For subsequent years it will be $55.3 million.

I should emphasize that the action we have taken should not be construed as indicating an alarmist attitude or any belief in the inevitability of war. Rather it indicates our recognition of the present critical international situation, our belief in NATO, and our determination not to succumb to the threat of force no matter how awful that threat may appear. By taking such an attitude in consort with our allies it is our belief that the chances of war are diminished. It is not we who have resorted to sabre rattling and military threats. Premier Khrushchev has deliberately chosen to make an issue of the Berlin situation, has threatened the use of force unless we come to agreement on his terms, and has ignored the welfare of millions of people by resuming nuclear weapons testing. In the face of such threats of our national security, I think the committee will agree that the steps taken by the government are fully justified.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that some hon. members will be a bit disappointed, as I was, in the minister's statement. After commencing with a lecture to persons unnamed for spending too much time in discussing military hardware and not sufficient time in discussing over-all defence policy, he then proceeded to do just that. In fact his statement was a rehash of departmental administration, of many of the bits of information already contained in the blue book, and of the announcements made the other day by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence. The statement contained very little, if anything, which was new or of interest to the committee.

I presume, Mr. Chairman, that although it was stated in different terms today by the minister, the objective of Canada's defence policy is still, as it has been in the past, to be an instrument of our foreign policy. It should be, therefore, organized for and dedicated to the maintenance of peace rather than the waging of thermonuclear war. Because of our relatively small population and military capacity, we must continue to work with the other members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to achieve our goal. Our interdependence is such that we must consider western strength and capability as a whole before we can intelligently discuss what contribution Canada should be making to collective security; because, as the minister stated, we each make a contribution and the total strength of the alliance is equal to the sum of the individual contributions.

The struggle between the east and the west has been described as a protracted conflict. Not only is it protracted but the spectrum of the conflict is very broad, including competition in the economic, psychological, political and military spheres. Generally speaking, and subject only to a few happy exceptions, the west has been lagging in the various areas of conflict except its ability to deter an all-out, direct thermonuclear attack. Even here the Russians have been narrowing the gap. They do not have the offensive power of the United States, but they are catching up. In addition, the fact that in a direct attack the Russians would strike first adds an equalizing factor to the deterrent equation.

The United States, realizing that in order to deter direct attack it must have the capacity to accept the first blow and still have enough potential to inflict unacceptable damage on the Soviet union, has embarked on a accelerated program designed to increase the invulnerability of its atomic striking force. They have embarked on a number of measures to achieve this goal. First of all, there is the Polaris submarine missile capacity. This is probably the most effective measure yet undertaken because the submarine, even though its location may be known at one moment, can hide from Soviet detection; and the deterrent capacity which it contains, and it is a very real deterrent capacity, is not vulnerable to Soviet attack.

In addition, the United States has embarked on an acceleration of the Minuteman program. As is known to the committee, this is a solid fuel intercontinental ballistic missile which will be installed in well dispersed hardened sites and later will be placed on mobile railroad cars so that its whereabouts will be unknown to any potential enemy. Then, too the Skybolt missile program has been accelerated. This is an air to ground missile with a relatively long range of 1,000 miles or so. It too is a solid fuel nuclear ballistic missile which carries an atomic warhead. It is to be carried by the B-52 bomber and by the British V bombers. Additionally, the United States has increased its capacity for an airborne alert and also its capacity for the 15 minute ground alert.

All these accelerated programs, Mr. Chairman, have been designed to make sure, to underline, the effectiveness of the United States to deter aggression, to deter a strike from the Soviet union. They have also improved their warning system. This is necessary if a ground alert is to be effective. As is well known, the first part of the ballistic missile early warning system is in operation, and the other parts will get into operation shortly. The Midas satellite system has been accelerated, and it is designed to provide a greater warning, perhaps of the order of 30 minutes, to the United States strategic air command.

All these steps combined increase the protection of the United States striking force and its ability to deter Soviet attack. I can say from experience, Mr. Chairman, having seen something of the strategic air command and of the steps it is taking, that it still has an overwhelming capacity. It is formidable. I know it has the capacity to blow the Soviet union off the face of the map. I think the Soviet union, too, is aware of this. I am convinced also the United States has and will keep its retaliatory forces up to date. They will not allow them to become out of date, and they will disperse them and make them invulnerable to attack as they feel required to do.

While Russia has been making giant strides toward narrowing the gap between its striking capacity and that of the United States, the west has been much slower in applying itself to the much greater gap between its conventional capacity and that of the Soviet union. The west does not have an adequate deterrent to moderate provocation. It does not have the conventional non-nuclear capacity to deter limited wars. Many people have been pointing out this inadequacy for some time. First of all, some of the more enlightened military officers did so. In most cases theirs was a minority opinion. When General Maxwell Taylor of the United States proposed this viewpoint it was considered radical and probably not correct. Now, at long last, this viewpoint is being accepted in official circles, and the United States has taken official notice of the deficiency in conventional strength and has included some remedial action in its current crash program.

President Kennedy stated the case well in his special message to congress on March 28, 1961. At that time he said:

> The strength and deployment of our forces in combination with those of our allies should be sufficiently powerful and mobile to prevent the steady erosion of the free world through limited wars; and it is this role that should constitute the primary mission of our overseas forces. Non-nuclear wars, and sub-limited or guerrilla warfare, have since 1945 constituted the most active and constant threat to free world security. Those units of our forces which are stationed overseas, or designed to fight overseas, can be most usefully oriented toward deterring or confining those conflicts which do not justify and must not lead to a general nuclear attack. In the event of a major aggression that could not be repulsed by conventional forces, we must be prepared to take whatever action with whatever weapons are appropriate. But our objective now is to increase our ability to confine our response to non-nuclear weapons, and to lessen the incentive for any limited aggression by making clear what our response will accomplish. In most areas of the world, the main burden of local defence against overt attack, subversion and guerrilla warfare must rest on local populations and forces. But given the great likelihood and seriousness of this threat, we must be prepared to make a substantial contribution in the form of strong, highly mobile forces trained in this type of warfare, some of which must be deployed in forward areas, with a substantial airlift and sealift capacity and prestocked overseas bases.

The President backed up his policy statement by action with specific recommendations to implement the policy. These included the following, and I may say that the lettering is my own:

A. Expanded research on non-nuclear weapons. I hope the President:

> What is needed are entirely new types of non-nuclear weapons and equipment with increased firepower, mobility and communications, and more suited to the kind of tasks our limited war forces will most likely be required to perform.

B. Increased airlift capacity. The appropriation put before congress was more than double the existing appropriation.

C. Additional amphibious transport to increase the speed and capability of sealift capacity.

D. Helicopters, rifles, electronics and communications equipment.

E. Development of an advanced tactical fighter emphasizing non-nuclear capabilities.

F. Modification of the F-105 tactical fighter to improve its capability to handle conventional armament ordnance items and to increase its suitability for airstrips of all types of areas.

G. More personnel and training.

This new emphasis on increasing western capacity to deter or if necessary wage limited war is a complete vindication of the change in direction suggested by the Liberal party in this house a year ago. President Kennedy's recommendations in March, 1961, read like a catalogue of the suggestions we put forward as a consequence of a redirected policy.

An hon. Member: He must have read them.

Mr. Hellyer: I think he did so. I feel it is unfortunate that the Canadian government has not yet seen the light. Now that we have a new Berlin crisis on our hands we see some evidence of token repentance. We hope it is not deathbed repentance. Now at the insistent urging of its allies the Canadian government is sending token reinforcements to its brigade group and air division in Europe. One might wonder what additional contributions we were asked to make. One might wonder about the connection between our lack of ground forces in Europe and the Berlin crisis.

Our lack of conventional strength there is well known to Mr. Khrushchev. It is also well known to Mr. Khrushchev that as the common market is enlarged, and as it becomes stronger, Europe is gaining in strength politically, economically and militarily. He also knows that finally the western allies have agreed to build up their conventional strength in Europe. Taking all these factors into consideration, he may have decided that now is the strategic time to cause trouble and see how far he can press without running into absolute opposition from the NATO alliance. However, if we had been stronger on the ground in Europe the crisis might never have arisen in the first place.

The government has announced that 1,106 additional troops will be sent to our brigade in Europe. It has indicated that 300 of these will man the Honest John artillery.

Mr. Harkness: No; 235.

Mr. Hellyer: I beg the minister's pardon. We have not been told what the remainder will be occupied in doing. We would ask the government to tell us specifically what function they will perform, and how in fact they add to the fighting effectiveness of the brigade in Europe. We concur in that decision, but we deplore the failure of the government to provide modern equipment for the brigade. It has not been supplied with the mobility and firepower it needs. This is the situation notwithstanding the minister's brave words in many of the speeches he has made across the country. It has none of the light aircraft which are available such as the Otter, Beaver, and Caribou. Other armies have them, even other armies in Europe. However, the Canadian army has none of them.

On recent trips to the United States, visiting their army installations, it has been a matter of pride that the United States army relies to the extent it does on the excellent series of light aircraft manufactured by the de Havilland company in Toronto. United States army personnel just naturally assume that the Canadian army would be well equipped with these first class Canadian products. They can scarcely believe that such is not the case. Indeed, they are not the only incredulous ones. On one recent trip three of my Conservative colleagues also could not believe that the Canadian army would not be equipped with the Caribou aircraft. They were reluctant to take my word for it, but they accepted information supplied by a Canadian liaison officer. It is humiliating, Mr. Chairman, that we have such excellent equipment available but not available where it is needed, in the field with our forces.

As a sidelight here I might be permitted to say that this trip to which I was just referring was one during which parliamentarians of the NATO countries visited United States installations as guests of the United States congress and government. It was a most fascinating as well as instructive trip. We visited installations of the marine corps, the army, the navy and the air force. We saw a fairly wide spectrum of United States installations, and were given an insight into their capacity and plans. I should like to say for myself—and I am sure I speak for my colleagues on the other side of the house as well, including Mr. Chairman—that we appreciated the courtesy which was extended to us, as well as the hospitality. The Americans are wonderfully hospitable people. They treated us with great respect and great deference and made the trip as instructive, pleasant and congenial as possible. We are extremely grateful to them for the opportunity that was presented to us.

Similarly, our army has not been equipped with helicopters. Goodness knows the suggestion has been made often enough. As found in Hansard at page 7525 for August 3, 1960, the then minister of national defence—and I join the present minister in his tribute to the former minister, who was a special friend of mine and a man for whom I had the greatest respect—Hon. George Pearkes had this to say, referring to the recommendations of the special committee on defence expenditures:

> The committee also recommended giving consideration to the provision of helicopters which would increase the mobility of the brigade. We have that matter under consideration and it is just a question of when funds are to be made available, because I believe that helicopters will certainly increase the effectiveness of that brigade.

The army itself seems to be enthusiastic about the idea of obtaining helicopters. I quote part of a dispatch from camp Gagetown, New Brunswick, by Dave McIntosh, dated July 11, as follows:

> The army wants some 40 of these helicopters and 40 transport types, but the government has not yet approved expenditure of the some $40 million required for this purpose.

It is true that some light reconnaissance helicopters are included in this year's estimates, but to my knowledge there is no provision for the heavier transport types which are required for moving troops and equipment on the battlefield.

So it is also with the personnel carrier. The Bobcat program has been slowed to a crawl. Instead of being accelerated and providing the desperately needed equipment to our brigade group, the government has done its best, and its best has been pretty good, to postpone necessary expenditures for budgetary reasons. The same story applies to a broad band of needed requirements; no money, no equipment. No money, that is, for the most important equipment. Some has been found for less useful projects.

The point is that the armed forces are starved for the type of equipment they require to do an effective job. It is a matter of regret and of deep concern that the appropriation for equipment for this fiscal year is the smallest since the post-Korean build up. It has been said that we have the best clothed and best fed forces in the world. It is not possible to say that their equipment is the latest or the best. We were told by the minister in his statement today that it should be; that their equipment should be second to none, but the fact is that their equipment is not the best. It is second and inferior to equipment they might face in the hands of their enemy.

Now we are advised that the armed forces are to be augmented by approximately 15,000 men of all ranks, but there is no corresponding increase in the appropriation for equipment. On the contrary, one wonders how the new personnel can be paid with the funds referred to by the minister. He has told us that only $35 million will be required for the balance of the year. According to the blue book the cost of military personnel for 1961-62, including operations and maintenance, is approximately $10,000 per man. On a proportional basis, therefore, the annual cost of 15,000 additional men would be $150 million, and that is before any allowance is provided for equipment. As more than six months remain of the fiscal year, either the government does not expect its new program to be very effective or it has not made adequate financial provision.

There is also the cost of training the 100,000 civil survival recruits and providing equipment for them. I will leave further discussion of this subject until later. In passing however, Mr. Chairman, I might say that I agree with the minister's statement today that there remains a lot to be done. His was the understatement of the year.

Our whole concern here is one of direction. The government is not putting proper emphasis on developing mobile forces capable of assisting in the deterrence of limited war or, in the event one should be waged, of containing it before it spreads into a major conflagration. It continues to place far too great an emphasis on weapons systems which are not needed to deter direct attack, which do nothing to deter limited war, and which are relatively useless in the event of an all-out war. The minister said in Toronto:

> Here in North America the major component of the threat to this continent is still the manned bomber regardless of what many of our so-called experts are claiming.

I would refer the minister to a book entitled "War and Peace in the Space Age" written by Lieutenant General James M. Gavin, who has this to say:

> In conclusion, in the missile-space age the earth will become a tactical theatre, and combat in space will have begun. Missiles will be the dominant form of firepower and air mobility will provide the key to tactical success in land warfare. Through air mobility we must discover the innovations that will give us the margin of advantage we need to win in land combat.

An hon. Member: When will that happen?

Mr. Hellyer: If Lieutenant General Gavin is correct, the minister is wrong on two counts. First of all the Prime Minister has told this house the missile is replacing the manned bomber as the main threat. The minister is now living in that unenlightened era of about four years ago. Second, if air mobility is needed in the field, the minister is missing the boat because his troops do not have any; and according to most of the experts, including Lieutenant General Gavin, they require it. I should like the minister to give more reasons why he and his government have delayed so long in providing this essential equipment.

It is interesting to note that in the long list of priority items presented by President Kennedy to congress on March 28 last there did not appear one of the major items on which the Canadian government is relying. Not one American penny for the Voodoo, the F-104, the Bomarc or the Honest John. The Canadian defence department has become a pawnshop for second hand American hardware.

Now we are being prepared for the introduction of atomic arms into Canada. The campaign to wear down the resistance in this house and in the country has begun. Speeches are being made by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of National Defence which lead us to believe that the introduction of these weapons is inevitable. The commander in chief of NORAD was brought to Toronto to make a speech which would frighten the Canadian people into submission. At this point, Mr. Chairman, I think I should raise the question of the propriety of the Canadian government asking General Kuter to come and make a speech designed to do the government's political chores. I think if the government has any policy in which it firmly believes, it should state the case and accept the responsibility without trying to palm it off on military officers.

Our position in this respect is the same as we announced last year. We still feel that atomic weapons in Canada are unnecessary at this time. We feel they are redundant. We do not think they add anything to the security of Canada, and we think they provide no protection for the strategic air command. In his speech at Toronto the minister gave as one of the reasons for continuing the expenditure of large sums of money on these weapons systems the fact that they provide some protection for the deterrent, for the retaliatory striking power of the United States strategic air command. This position was valid four years ago; it is not valid now. It was valid at a time when the bomber was the only threat to the North American continent. It is no longer valid.

The present situation, as the minister knows and as he should be expounding instead of having it done for him, is that if the Russians were to start a war now; if they were to embark upon a direct attack, they would not do so unless they had enough missiles to cover every American strategic air command base on the North American continent. That is fundamental. It would be suicidal—it might be suicidal anyway—for the Soviet union to start a war even by sneak attack if they did not have sufficient missile capacity to wipe out every strategic air command base in the first hour or so of the conflict.

The United States understands this. That is the reason for the accelerated programs to which I referred earlier in my speech. That is the reason the United States is stepping up the Polaris program. That is the reason they are going to accelerate the Minuteman program and alert more strategic air command bombers. They know that 30 minutes after war starts any SAC aircraft which is not off the ground will not be able to get off the ground.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. Will the committee give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hellyer: I thank the committee for its co-operation. The minister should understand the point I have just made. This is at the heart of the United States strategy now. They know they will not have time to call pilots in after a war has begun. The only thing they will have with which to strike back will be those components of the retaliatory force which are invulnerable in the event of attack by missile in the first few minutes of conflict.

The minister's strategy is four years old. He is still living in the "aircraft only" age. He has not projected himself into the missile age. Perhaps he has received some wrong advice from the department. If he has he should overcome it, because that is what he is paid for, and I hope he will do it without too much delay.

There is one element of the SAC retaliatory force I omitted to mention. If the hardened missile bases did not receive a direct blow within the first few minutes of attack they would have a period of two or three hours before any bombers would reach their location, during which time the missiles could be launched toward the Soviet union. If they were not launched in that period of time they would have no opportunity whatever.

This is the sum and substance of the United States strategy. Under these circumstances our Bomarc, even if it had any utility whatsoever, and our defence mechanisms other than warning and reconnaissance do not in fact protect the deterrent. They may do other things, but they do not accomplish this end.

For this reason we continue to believe that it is not worth while to put Canada into the atomic club, into the group of atomic nations, when the advantage of having atomic weapons on Canadian soil is so negligible. We reserve the right to reassess this position if at any time in the future the west should be successful in developing a really effective anti-missile missile. That would change the picture considerably. At the present time, however, there is none, and we are basing our policy on the facts as they exist.

In respect to atomic arms for NATO, our position there, too, is the same as that announced in this house last year. We believe that the first and primary emphasis should be on the building up of conventional strength in NATO, the building up of the capacity to deter limited aggression, and the building up of a flexible response. We believe this is the first priority. Second, we have taken the position that if atomic weapons of the defensive type are required as a second line of defence in NATO we would not object to Canadian forces being so equipped if these weapons came under NATO collective control. We take this position with the knowledge that if we had sufficient conventional strength to stop any Russian attack for days or weeks, there would be adequate time for consultation and for the decision to be made. The Leader of the Opposition, if he has an opportunity to participate in this debate, will elaborate on the political aspects of NATO co-operation and on the control of weapons within the NATO alliance.

In respect to our contribution to the United Nations, this party is proud of it. We are proud of the part our leader has played in making the United Nations a useful vehicle for international intervention. We hope that Canada's role in this field will increase. We hope that the usefulness of the United Nations in settling and arbitrating international disagreements will increase. We believe that we in Canada should support and build up those types of mobile tactical forces which are most effective for that type of job. This is the policy we put forward.

I shall leave until later the discussion of the role of the individual services and some of the equipment items that have been ordered for them. I feel that they can be better dealt with when the specific relevant items have been called.

The whole purpose of the change of direction which has been suggested from this side of the house is to increase the effectiveness of Canada's contribution. We know we have to remain a member of the alliance. We know that the alliance is only as strong as the sum total of all contributions of the member nations. We do not think the Canadian contribution at the present time is adding very much to that collective strength. We feel that by a change in direction and by placing greater emphasis on the deficits in our collective strength we can make a much greater and more useful contribution.

There are side benefits, as well. There is the benefit of using in most cases equipment which can be designed and manufactured in this country, which will provide employment for Canadian workers. But this aside, the real purpose of our policy and the reason we urge a reconsideration on the government is this. We feel the government should stop wasting its money on Bomarc missiles and ten year old concepts. We urge it to enter the missile age, to accept the facts as they exist, and to attempt to make Canada's contribution to collective defence a useful and constructive one.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, it is with considerable trepidation that I rise at this point to participate in this debate. The committee will realize that my participation is due to the absence of the hon. member for Vancouver East. I am sure all hon. members of the committee join me in wishing him the best of health and in trusting that he will soon recover and resume his place in this chamber.

I am aware that members of the opposition are at the greatest disadvantage in discussing the question of national defence and related subjects. Naturally there is available to the minister information which cannot be made available to those on the opposition benches. I therefore think it behoves us on this side of the house to perhaps apologize in advance if through misinformation or lack of information we should be led to say anything which on the basis of the minister's knowledge is grossly unfair and which, because of the requirement of secrecy, he is unable to answer.

Although, as I have said, I rise with trepidation and some concern, I am heartened by a statement attributed to a United States defence strategist, Mr. Walter Millis, who said:

> The ablest students of the subject are either in complete contradiction or in a state of frank bewilderment.

Mr. Pugh: Like the last speaker.

Mr. Pitman: I am not commenting on the interjection which has just been made by an hon. gentleman on my left.

This is the first opportunity the house has had to discuss the question of life and death in relation to the problem of national defence. There is no problem which appears to generate more emotion. There is no subject in respect to which clear, cold logic is more necessary. I think many of us sitting here will agree that the differences of opinion are not between those who are loyal and those who are disloyal; rather the division is as to how this loyalty and love of country can be best expressed. It is not a difference between those who want war and those who want peace. We on this side of the house are fully confident that those who sit to the right of the Speaker's chair are as determined for and as desirous of peace as we are, but rather there is a serious difference regarding how war may come in the 1960's and the kind of war it will be. Although we on this side speak a great deal of peace we do not stand with a great moral case and look down upon those who are seeking peace in other ways. That is not the difference in any way. We believe wholeheartedly in the good intentions of all hon. members.

Third, it is not a difference between those who are pro-American and those who are anti-American; rather we may have two views on how we can best be the allies of the United States of America. Surely, Mr. Chairman, it is not a debate in which such words as "pacifism" or "neutralism" have any place, because it is not a difference of neutralism versus active alliance; rather it is a difference as to by what form of international participation—"participation" is a word which I think all parties in the house accept—Canada can best make a contribution.

As I stand here I recognize that men of all parties have played an active role in the fighting for freedom which has taken place in this century; therefore this is a question on which the motives of all hon. members should never be questioned. We have all wanted a peaceful world. We may be divided on the means by which this peace can be obtained.

There are many approaches to the subject of preventing war. No doubt the most popular one is the historical argument—and it is a very telling argument in so many ways—that if we had maintained our alliances, if we had kept our weapons in the 1930's, we would have prevented the march into the Rhineland, and we would have prevented the march into Austria, Czechoslovakia and Poland. If we had kept our weapons we could have stopped world war II and the world would have been saved from the scourge of universal conflict. This is always a very popular concept, that history repeats itself; that we can avoid the mistakes of the past by heeding the warnings of the past.

Well, one historian has been very cynical, and has said that the only thing we learn from history is that we do not learn anything from history; but I think we can learn a great deal from history as long as we do not try to force patterns which do not exist; because the irony of mankind's story is that history never repeats itself.

The belief in the 1920's and 1930's was that if the world forsook arms it would be another way of finding peace. We believed that if we had set up a League of Nations we would have stopped world war I. In the 1920's and 1930's we would have stopped world war I but we failed to stop world war II. The difference is that in the 1960's it is quite possible that our policies may be directed at stopping world war II, but the dreadful question is whether it will stop world war III. Indeed, an aroused America and the presence of weapons in the 1930's would have prevented the march of Hitler but the problem, of course, remains, what are we to do in 1961? We may hope that the solution of the 1930's will stop us from the wars of the 1960's, but I have not quite that great confidence that it will; because we exist in a new world of new weaponry, of new patterns of events, and only new solutions will have any effect upon those patterns of events.

Just briefly I should like to quote from Sir John Cockcroft, who said in 1957:

> It is clear enough already, however, that our civilization can be destroyed in a night—

Probably it can be said at this time that our civilization can be destroyed in a few minutes. I continue:

> It is clear enough already, however, that our civilization can be destroyed in a night if ever these great forces are released for our destruction. This presents the human race with the greatest challenge it has ever had: to co-operate in disarmament and so to banish the threat which now hangs over the whole world.

I realize, of course, that this government has played a great part in its attempt to bring about disarmament. This is a problem which we face. I think our defence policies and our external affairs policies must be dovetailed, must indeed be the same, and that anything which takes place in defence must in no way compromise or interfere with what is taking place in the Department of External Affairs in preventing war; because surely this is the end of our defence policy. A former minister of national defence said in this house last year that the primary aim of our defence policy must be not to win war but to prevent war. He certainly would be supported by General MacArthur who said that it is a form of mutual suicide, and the entire effort of modern society should be concentrated on an endeavour to outlaw it.

Will you call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned for lunch at one o'clock I had opened my remarks by suggesting that the end of defence policy is always the same for all parties. The security of the Canadian people, security of life and property and also, as the Minister of National Defence pointed out this morning, freedom of the Canadian people. We are as concerned with the quality of life as we are concerned with life itself. I attempted to point out that no defence policy can be found in 1961 by looking at the past, by assuming that we can stop a third world war by means by which we could have stopped world war II because, as one great historian and theologian, Reinhold Niebuhr, has put it, this is the irony of human history. It is not that we wish war; it is simply that we cannot make the intellectual jump to keep us sufficiently ahead of events to prevent a new pattern from emerging which will bring war while we are trying to decide on how to deal with the older pattern.

So too in respect of weaponry we have become enamoured of the weaponry of the past. As the hon. member for Trinity suggested this morning, we are four years behind and perhaps in our basic concepts we are even further behind. A look at past wars will convince us that the first few months of every war have been fought with the weapons of the preceding war. We tried cavalry in world war I and the Maginot line in world war II, and we are still trying to defend against manned bombers in 1961. In spite of the fact that manned bombers are certainly the most accurate form of attack, none the less these are not the weapons which in my opinion will be used in any war which might begin within the next few years. Indeed, I understand that the accuracy of the long range missiles which the Russians are developing was such as to mean a degree of error of two or three miles, but that margin of error has been cut down tremendously over the last number of months. So in a real way we are bound by the past and we even talk about past events, but so far as an all-out war in defence of the North American continent is concerned there is no defence. We are confusing the word "defence" with the word "deterrent", and we in Canada can play virtually no role in the realm of deterrence.

No more can we talk of winning the war. This is entirely irrational. I think the Minister of National Defence was quite right this morning when he said that we should not be motivated by fear, but I think we should be basing our defence on a realistic and rational realization of what the stakes really are and what kind of war we are really going to be fighting. I think it is rather important to know that each of the 16 missiles on each of the five Polaris submarines has more power than all the bombs dropped during the last war.

There seems to be a peculiar notion in some circles that this is going to be a limited nuclear war and that only a certain number of bombs which we know Russia and the United States have will be dropped, but surely this is a strange strategic concept. Surely when this war begins it will have to be an all-out war for the first few seconds. All the power of the opposing side will have to be destroyed; because if this is not done the subsequent attack by the opposing power will be such that it will bring about certainly most unacceptable damage to the country which originally launched the attack.

The United States has suggested that one and a half thousand megatons dropped on the United States would kill 49 million people, with only 263 bombs dropped. We know that the U.S.S.R. has 20,000 megatons capable of being dropped on the United States, and only 9,000 would be needed to wipe out all life. These are only a few statistics, but I think we should all know the stakes not in order to increase fear but in order to know exactly what we can do in this kind of situation.

Not only is it impossible to compare the policies of the past and the lessons of the past, but it is irrelevant to compare the role which Canada can play. In world war I Canada played a magnificent role in the forefront of the western front; indeed, she was the pride of the western front. In world war II we played an extremely important role, not as dramatic but as valuable. In world war III we will find ourselves in a world of two giants and we, as one author has put it, will be peeping between the legs of these giants. We will virtually have no role whatever. In other words, to put it in the vernacular, we are out of this league. We should therefore try to ascertain where we can best make a valuable contribution to the peace of the world.

It was in recognition of these facts, that we can no longer expect the old weapons will be used or that our role will necessarily be as it was in the past, that the New Democratic party has tried to base its belief once again on a defence policy that will guard the life and property of the Canadian people as well as the freedoms and liberties of the Canadian people. It must be a policy which will take into account the uniqueness of our present situation.

We stand on two premises. The first is that we should do nothing in defence which will limit our activities in the area of diplomacy in seeking out a real peace. Yesterday the Prime Minister talked of the Secretary of State for External Affairs as the idealist. We in this corner feel the minister is a realist in terms of the kind of world in which we live. He is determined that war will not take place; and that must be our basic policy, to prevent war. It makes it very difficult for us to be enthusiastic proponents of disarmament if we accept nuclear arms or if we are so two faced about it that the other countries do not know whether or not we are accepting them. We cannot fight to limit the nuclear club, so to speak, to those who have the weapons now if we give any indication that we wish to join the nuclear club. We have heard of the big threat in the production of atomic weapons whereby countries, perhaps 25 in the world, will be able to arm themselves with these weapons. This is the area in which Canada must make a real contribution, to keep nuclear weapons out of the hands of more nations. It is for this reason I suggest our defence policy must in no way compromise the activities of our diplomats in this cause.

The second premise on which we have based our policy is that Canada is a middle power in size, in population and in opportunities. We cannot, like Stephen Leacock's hero, jump on a horse and ride off in all directions. We feel it is not possible for us to go in even one direction. But we feel that by going in too many directions we could lose all direction. I think the Minister of National Defence would agree with this proposition, that at certain times it might mean more to the security of the life and property, to the security of the freedom of the Canadian people, if we were feeding the people of southeast Asia rather than providing a certain kind of missile. It is for this reason we say that our participation must be a directed participation, not a directionless participation; one that has possibilities for Canada as a middle power.

As we have said, the significant fact is that the really big league defence is the deterrent. The deterrent has reached the area of the overkill. We have heard some interesting information this morning about the extent to which our friends south of the border have been carrying on their program of deterrents. Canada can play no vital role in deterrents.

The problem is, where can we play a significant role? We believe that this area is the field of foreign aid. We can play an important role here, and we must not allow our activities in the area of deterrents to destroy that role.

This morning the minister used a very interesting example. He said we should not wait until the bear is ready to attack before we buy a rifle. We would all question the sanity of any person who waited until the bear was ready to attack before he bought a rifle. We would also question the sanity of a person who made no decision about shells when he bought the rifle. This situation exists in Canada today. We do not know what the shells are going to be in terms of this rifle. We are told that the weapons we have bought are practically useless without nuclear warheads, the reference being to the Bomarc and the CF-104.

Well, is it possible that we are waiting to let propaganda, to let the effect of the weapons themselves, make the decision for us? Are we going to have a clear-cut position taken by this government, one which can be debated in this house; because it will be clearly impossible to debate the possibility of acquiring nuclear weapons when the time arrives. There will be no time to discuss or debate the subject at that time. Of course the whole example breaks down badly. A better example might be that of a person who buys a bottle of nitroglycerine to throw at the bear so he can blow himself up and the bear at the same time. One cannot claim to compare nuclear weapons with a rifle in terms of a war.

We believe, then, that there are three kinds of war. The first is one which will start by mistake, and that is why we are wholeheartedly behind the activities of the man we refer to as a realist, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in his attempt to continue efforts at disarmament. Second, there is the war that might be started by the two great powers. If this war comes I seriously doubt whether Canada will have any part to play whatever. It seems inconceivable to me that the decisions which will have to be made in consequence will provide time for consultation with the NATO allies, and particularly Canada. It will require secretiveness in terms of manning the submarines, the intercontinental ballistic missiles and so on, to such an extent that this war will be decided by a very few men on a very limited part of the earth's surface.

As this debate goes on we would hope to have the opportunity of looking at this blue book of national defence in the light of a possible nuclear war between the great powers and seeing what these deficiencies are. This is something which will be carried on if this debate continues. We can detect, with the D.E.W. line and reconnaissance aircraft, but we do not feel that the D.E.W. line and this reconnaissance is necessarily a part of our NORAD arrangements.

But there is a way in which Canada can make a real contribution in terms of a limited war, the kind of war which has been breaking out so often. Since the end of the second world war there have been some 30 of these limited wars. We have many young nations arriving on the scene. All of us know that during the first years of nationalism, aggressive tendencies very often come to the fore. This is the area in which we feel the defence policy of Canada can play a part. We should have a mobile force capable of taking police action in other areas of the world where these situations might arise.

We feel there should be a reappraisal of Canada's defence policy, a reappraisal of the determination to prevent war.

We feel that we must leave NORAD. We feel we should have an expanded foreign aid program. We have suggested 2 per cent of the gross national product, not because we are being unrealistic in terms of Canada's possibilities but because we are trying to be realistic in terms of the need. This need has been mentioned by the Associate Minister of National Defence and other members, notably the hon. member for Greenwood. We want to cut down in our defence expenditures in areas where we feel there is waste in terms in the kind of war which Canada will be undertaking if the possibilities should materialize. It is rather frightening to realize that in the cost of war, or of preparing for war, mankind is spending at least $120 billion a year. If we could spend that amount on peace we could bring up the income of each person in China, India and Pakistan. We could double their income. We could provide adequate housing for 240 million people in underdeveloped nations. We could give the three billion hungry people food and medical care.

Mr. Jones: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question just in order to clarify the stand he is setting forth on behalf of his party? Is he advocating that we dismantle our military defence forces and turn all the money into foreign aid? Is that what the hon. member is advocating?

Mr. Pitman: No, that is not what I am advocating. I suggested that we should be selecting areas where we are playing no part whatsoever. I think the Bomarc missile is a very good example of an area where we could very well be spending something on foreign aid. We have suggested no nuclear weapons on Canadian soil.

Mr. Jones: May I ask a further question for the purpose of clarification? I understand that our expenditures for Bomarc bases run in the area of $15 million. Is that the amount of change the hon. member is advocating, or is he advocating some greater change?

Mr. Pitman: I have been advocating a change in other areas, but I have certainly not suggested the disbanding of the military forces. If the hon. member will wait until I have finished I am sure that position will become evident.

We suggested there should be no nuclear weapon on Canadian soil because it adds nothing to deterrence. It does not defend us, and we lose immeasurably in our moral force. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that we must have faith and courage. This is an area where possibly faith and courage will be very necessary.

I should like to read a short editorial or a short excerpt from an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail of May 4, 1961:

> Canada's two Bomarc bases will be ready within a few months to launch their missiles against hostile bombers. During this interval we can expect increasing pressure to tip the Bomarcs with nuclear warheads. Proof of this pressure is found in parliamentary debates like that on Tuesday when the external affairs minister, Mr. Howard Green, said a decision to acquire nuclear warheads depended on progress that is made in the next few months toward disarmament... Already the defence minister, Mr. Douglas Harkness, has declared that the full potential of Bomarc launching sites cannot be attained without nuclear warheads.
> Lieutenant General Robert M. Lee, vice commander of United States air defence command, having no need to worry about elections, has stated flatly that Canada's two Bomarc bases are useless without atomic warheads.

He also goes on to point out the seriousness of any such stand.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether the hon. member would give the date of that quotation.

Mr. Pitman: Yes, the date was May 4, 1961. The heading of the editorial is "Ban the A-Bomarc".

I have here an editorial which appeared in the Toronto daily Star of May 11, 1961:

> The nuclear arms now being considered by the Canadian government are warheads for the Bomarc anti-aircraft missile. The Bomarcs are for use against manned H-bombers—a declining threat. They are useless against intercontinental missiles.
> "They will contribute precisely nothing to our safety in the event of a nuclear war," says Maj. Gen. W. H. S. Macklin, former adjutant general of the Canadian army...
> Our obvious interest is to do all that a middle power can do to prevent a general holocaust. Renunciation of nuclear weapons would serve that end, whereas acceptance of them would sabotage the crusade of external affairs minister Green for world disarmament.

I think that is a position which we in this party can accept. We also accept the suggestion of the development of a brigade of troops which we can keep in areas where limited wars are taking place. I think we were all heartened by the suggestion of the Prime Minister yesterday and of the Leader of the Opposition the day before that this was a role for the United Nations. Would it not be extremely valuable if we could go to the United Nations session when it opens and suggest that we have a brigade ready to move to the Brandenburg gate, to take part in the guarding of the access roads or in the prevention of any activity there which might create a nuclear war? Would it not be worth while if we could join, possibly with a member from the eastern bloc or possibly with a member from the neutralist bloc, in providing those forces? We have done it previously and, as one person has put it, this was our finest hour at the United Nations. Is it not time that we began to work in that direction once again?

We were also interested in the remarks made by the Minister of National Defence with regard to the defence research board, and we shall be discussing some of the matters under that head as time goes on. Is it not time that we had a peace research institute, as suggested by a scientist in the Oakville area, Mr. Norman Alcock, within the Department of National Defence? So long as we have hundreds of men seeking to find methods of creating armaments and only a few in the area of disarmament dealing with peace, we have very little opportunity to bring the scientific approach to the area of peace as well as to that of war. Could it not be independent of our national government but subsidized by the national government and working along with the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Pitman: I thank the house very much for this opportunity. I shall be only one or two minutes more.

The Deputy Chairman: I should put on record the consent of the committee, if the hon. member does not mind. Does the committee give its unanimous consent to give the hon. member additional time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pitman: For example, we are very much concerned about accidental war. Is there no possibility that we could have scientists working in areas which would help us to provide a means of guarding against this happening? I think all of us have been concerned that at SAC headquarters there have been situations in which the screen detected something but they were not sure what it was, and it later turned out to be a flock of geese. We are concerned that such a very small thing might very well touch off a nuclear war. Could we not have some means of providing scientists with an opportunity of doing research into ways of stopping war, even in the area of psychology as well. We are concerned as to what effect disarmament would have on our economy. Surely a defence research board working for war could well be set off by a peace institute working for peace.

I have attempted to put forward a very general pattern of the New Democratic party's program in view of a new and frightening world and in view of the weapons of annihilation. Canada should not be fearful but rather should be determined to play a role in an area in which she can have some effect. We can do very little or virtually nothing in the area of deterrence of all-out war. We can play a role in deterring a limited war, in taking police action within the United Nations structure or of taking police action in such areas as Berlin; extending our foreign aid programs; a defence policy exhibiting our desire for peace and placing weapons for peace in the hands of those who are to seek peace at the negotiation tables of the world.

These are the hopes of all parties, that we can find a policy which will bring security and freedom to the people of Canada.

We certainly hope that the defence of our nation will be looked after with efficiency, but we are concerned even more that it should be looked after in the light of the new events, the new kind of world in which we live, and with the new policies which must be adopted.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great care to the speeches which have been made during the initial stages of this debate, first of all by my colleague the Minister of National Defence, and then by the critic of the official opposition and my good friend the hon. member for Trinity. I have also listened with care to the most interesting speech just delivered in this committee by the hon. member for Peterborough. I should like, with your permission, Mr. Chairman, to start my remarks in French and then to continue in English.

(Translation):

First of all, I should like to tell members of the committee how much I have been considering myself privileged, since my appointment to the position I now occupy in the Department of National Defence, to serve with two highly distinguished colleagues.

I should like first to salute my excellent friend and colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) who, after a remarkable military career, has added to his talents of a born politician those of a very competent administrator.

I should like also to salute the Hon. George Pearkes, who is now occupying the exalted functions of lieutenant governor of British Columbia. The Hon. Mr. Pearkes has also had a most remarkable military career. All those who are familiar with army life see in him the greatest contemporary Canadian soldier. As a cabinet member, he showed outstanding talents as a politician as well as an administrator. I know that he is carrying out very efficiently the important duties entrusted to him, and I wish him many years of happiness and great success in all his endeavours.

In the statement he made before the committee, the Minister of National Defence clearly defined the situation which is facing us. In the course of my remarks, I will try and avoid any unnecessary repetition of the arguments he put forward. I feel however that it might be useful to acquaint members of the committee with my personal views on military matters under review in this debate. I should also like to reply to the criticisms made by our learned friends of the opposition, concerning the military strategy and tactics used at this time by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Chairman, it is most unfortunate that in 1961 we should still find it necessary to speak of defence and worry about events which are happening in a foreign land and which threaten us with a third world war. It would have been logical to think that after two horrible wars which tore our civilization and caused millions of deaths, countless sufferings and incalculable destruction, mankind would have come to realize that wars are useless and that it is only in peace that can be found progress, prosperity and salvation of future generations.

It would seem that the sacrifice of those who gave their lives on the battlefields of the world where they fought with enthusiasm and conviction, should have been acknowledged with something else than the war threats which are hovering over the world today.

But we have to admit that mankind did not learn, and today more than at any time in its history, this earth of ours is threatened by the most terrifying cataclysm that be, a nuclear attack, if it should ever take place.

And yet, it seems that the ideal for which our fathers and brothers fought in two successive wars was an ideal of truth and justice. The various nations should have realized that happiness and our very civilization lie in the pursuit of that ideal. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, is there in the world anything more beautiful than this freedom we defended on the battlefield in two consecutive wars? Is there anything finer than this freedom of speech, of thought, of religion, of expression, this freedom to choose freely our own way?

Is there anything finer than freedom? How is it that half the world, instead of realizing the blessings of freedom, is now attempting to spread communist theories which can only lead civilization to the most unfortunate and cruel slavery.

Anyone who has travelled in the underdeveloped countries of the world realizes that this democracy in which we believe and our principles of life are the best, and that it is through the observance of those principles that we have succeeded in attaining our present standard of living which is rightly considered as the highest in the world today.

Those who appreciate the extent of our development should readily understand that happiness and progress are to be found under the democratic system and that they should give up these communist theories which, as I just said, can only bring chaos, confusion and disorder to the peoples of the world.

But let us face the sad facts: what we have to cope with in 1961 is a struggle between two ideals. Our ideal, the one which we feel is the only noble and fine one, is that of true democracy as we know it; our opponents' ideal is that of communist expansion throughout the world. Unfortunately, both sides have at their disposal extremely powerful weapons and we must live with—we come back on that point in each of our speeches and that thought is with us at every moment of the day—the possibility of this abominable catastrophe of a nuclear attack.

In the advent of a nuclear war, the aggressor would most definitely have an advantage.

It is obvious that if the attack is violent enough, he will be able to cause incalculable damage to the attacked country. Yet, on the other hand, the aggressor is not without knowing that practically as soon as he attacks there will be retaliation and that he will be destroyed and even wiped off the face of the earth. Therefore, nuclear war can only lead to the complete ruin of civilization, to the end of the world.

It is indeed because of the sheer horror of such a possibility that we find some comfort despite the problem facing us. We do believe that mankind will not agree to exterminate itself; but rather it will realize that a nuclear war can but lead to the worst disaster and that in such a war there will be neither victor nor vanquished. For that reason, we are led to believe that such a war will not happen. A comparison may be made between what happened at the outset of the second world war and what is taking place today.

At the beginning of the second world war, both sides had in their possession arms which were extremely powerful, such as poison gas and bacteriological weapons. But the thought of how horrible would be gas warfare or germ warfare made both sides hesitate to use them, and in fact they were not used. Similarly, we do believe today that nuclear weapons will not be used and that the world we know and the generations to come will be protected from the awful disaster which would result from nuclear attacks.

We must recognize that mankind has known many wars, that man apparently has yet to realize the blessings of peace, and so we can suppose that there may be other wars which, even if there are no nuclear bombs dropped, will be just as dreadful and will result in a greater bloodbath than the ones we have known during the disasters of 1914-18 and 1939-45.

We know that our opponents have at their command enormous forces, powerful armies equipped with the conventional weapons we know of, that is a mighty artillery, tanks and a well trained infantry. And for that reason, it is imperative that we should have, in the face of danger, such weapons and also a well equipped army, a navy formed of most modern units and an air force with a capacity to strike or to resist any attack.

This is why it is necessary, in 1961, to deal with those defence problems, to appropriate enormous amounts in order to be well prepared, and to remember the proverb of Juvenal, the Latin philosopher who said: Si vis pacem, para bellum.

I agree with the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) who deplored a moment ago, the fact that it is necessary today to spend large amounts to defend ourselves or to counter-attack when in fact it would be so much more preferable to use that money for more useful purposes, to improve conditions in economically weak countries and even to foster prosperity, well-being and progress in our own countries.

All sound-thinking men are of the same opinion and would like to see come to an end that arms race, those enormous war expenditures. But all sound-thinking men are also aware of the fact that a single moment of weakness on our part, such as disarmament at a time when our opponents seem to arm themselves, could very well bring us total disorder and lead us to ruin. The best proof of the truth of what I just said is that if the world was saved from the horrors of a third world war it is in fact due to the power of that organization we call NATO, which succeeded in preventing a third world war since its founding 12 years ago.

Here in Canada, regardless of political parties, we want peace. We are wishing for it, as those men of 1914-18 and of 1939-45 wished and yearned for it. But, like them, we shall fight if necessary, because, like those who fought during the last two wars, we know that our way of life is the best and that the freedom we enjoy is still man's greatest gift.

Our soldiers, in the first world war, fought with the utmost courage alongside their brothers of allied nations; it is thanks to their sacrifice that peace prevailed, and it is also thanks to what they did that we succeeded then in protecting man's freedom. Their successors, those who fought from 1939 to 1945, showed an undaunted courage on the battlefields. We owe an enormous debt to those soldiers who, at the cost of their lives and of countless sufferings, fought for freedom. We wish that our efforts to safeguard that peace for which they fought become a tribute to their gallantry and the recognition of their sacrifices.

We shall take all means at our disposal, alongside our colleagues of the other NATO countries, to preserve that peace so hardly won.

We hope that Providence will enlighten the minds of men and protect us from the disastrous consequences of a nuclear war.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, I listened with great care to the remarks which were made in committee by the hon. member for Trinity. Although I share many of the hon. member's views and believe that certain of the points which he described are worthy of consideration, I feel that other parts of his speech are not quite related to the facts, and I should like to advance certain corrections to some of the statements which he has made. The hon. gentleman did not mention today that Canada has no defence policy.

Mr. Hellyer: I should have. It was an omission.

Mr. Sevigny: That is a view that has been expressed many times by the hon. member, and he has kindly expressed it again just now. To say that Canada has no defence policy is rather silly for it is equivalent to saying that NATO has no defence policy this for the simple reason that the defence policy of Canada is based on decisions which have been taken over the years at the NATO conference table, decisions which have been arrived at only after lengthy and most careful consideration. Canada is a partner in the marvellous association of NATO which has done so much since its inception 12 years ago to preserve world peace.

Each member nation has a definite role to play in NATO, a role which has been determined according to the capabilities, abilities and resources of the individual nation. It is this role which is allotted to each nation, and which is played individually but for the interests of the collectivity which forms NATO, and which represents the strength of this organization. NATO is truly the only organization which stands between the way of life in which we believe, namely the democratic way of life, and the onslaught of the forces of communism which threaten the world today. Therefore to say that Canada has no defence policy is equivalent to saying that NATO has no defence policy, and is almost an admission that it is useless to try to defend ourselves against the forces which menace us.

We in Canada have a very definite defence policy. We have an army which plays a specific role within the NATO forces and in the shield forces of the European continent and elsewhere where our men are requested to serve. We have a navy which plays with distinction and great efficiency a definite role in the war which is continually being waged against the danger of a submarine attack. We have an air force which plays many roles. In Europe with the F-104 plane it will act as a strike reconnaisance group in the No. 1 air division which is over there. It plays a most essential and still most necessary role of interception here in Canada against the possibility of attack by enemy manned bombers. It also plays a role in locating enemy submarines which could threaten our shores, and it trains itself continually so as to be able to destroy those submarines which may attack our country at some later date.

The defence research board plays a role of primary importance in the scientific world. Achievements of considerable importance have already been realized by the defence research board, and it is reasonable to suppose, in view of the great efforts which are being put forward by all its members, that it will carry out this useful role in the defence of our nation and the world that we know.

The hon. member for Trinity asked a few questions and made a few statements during his remarks which seemed rather strange to us. For instance, he hinted that the Americans had based their most recent defence decisions on the Liberal program which was enunciated at this rather sad performance which took place in Ottawa this last January when the Liberal party held its convention. It seems to me that the major items of policy which were contained in the speeches made by the hon. member for Trinity and others who expressed themselves at the convention were to scrap almost all the methods of defence that we have at the present time and actually almost to leave the defence of our territory to our great and powerful southern neighbours. I fail to see the resemblance between policies adopted and enunciated by the President of the United States and the other American leaders and the policies announced during that Liberal convention.

The hon. member for Trinity mentioned the fact that he was in doubt concerning the use which would be made of the 1,100 men who will be reinforcing our overseas brigade within the next few weeks. It seems to me that the answer is a very simple one. Those men will go to Germany in order to reinforce our brigade thus making it a stronger and better fighting unit, if this is still possible. I mention this last part since it is well known in Europe that the best fighting unit among the land forces in the shield force of NATO in Europe is this Canadian brigade. When I visited the SHAPE headquarters in France approximately a year ago it was indeed most gratifying to hear the generals from all nations voice their admiration for the quality of our Canadian soldiers, for the ability of their officers and for the levels of training which are being achieved by this truly remarkable force which is our Canadian brigade overseas.

It was mentioned by the hon. member that this brigade is not equipped with sufficiently modern weapons. This is rather strange, because once again when I was at SHAPE over a year ago it was mentioned by one and all that the other nations of NATO were envious of the quality of training of our Canadian brigade. It was frequently said that they possessed weapons which are of equal if not greater power than the ones with which the other nations are equipped.

It was mentioned also by the hon. member for Trinity that it was too bad indeed that the brigade over there was not equipped with helicopters. Well, he knows perfectly well that helicopters have been ordered for reconnaissance purposes and that the brigade leaders are quite satisfied with these arrangements.

The hon. member for Trinity mentioned the Bobcat program, and said it was at a standstill. Nothing could be further from the truth. On the contrary, the Bobcat program is being pushed forward as rapidly as possible, and is definitely on the move. The hon. member should know that the development of such vehicles is a long and slow process. For example, he should know that the British started to develop a vehicle more or less like the Bobcat at an earlier time than we did, yet their development program is far behind our own Bobcat schedule. I repeat, this program is going forward as quickly and as efficiently as possible.

Where the hon. member found the figure of $10,000 per man which he mentioned I do not know.

Mr. Hellyer: In the blue book.

Mr. Sevigny: The true fact is—and he can verify this if he wishes—that the figure is much closer to between $5,000 and $6,000 per man than to the figure he mentioned. He also talked about mobile weapons, without explaining exactly what he meant by "mobile weapons". Let me tell him this, and again he can verify this if he wishes. It is a fact that our brigade in Europe, as well as the other brigade in Canada, are quite mobile and equipped with the most modern conventional equipment that can be procured under present conditions and at the present time.

Then he talks about the threat of an attack by missiles. I agree with him that such an attack would indeed be a dreadful thing if it ever occurred and there is no doubt, as we all admit, that some day the missile threat will replace the manned bomber threat that faces us today. But there is one thing which the hon. member has not mentioned and that must be mentioned. There is at the present time and there will be for some time to come a definite threat of an attack by enemy manned bombers equipped with the most lethal weapons, and because of the presence of this threat it is considered by the NATO forces, by the NORAD command and by all sound thinking persons interested in a sound defence of this country and the northern hemisphere that we must use all possible weapons at our disposal in order to destroy the threat of these manned bombers which may still attack our shores.

Possibly the hon. member has not read what we have read, but it has been published many times in recent months that not only is the supposed enemy still flying bombers but it is still producing these bombers, and until such day as we are assured that there is no threat from a manned bomber attack we consider it our sacred duty to have suitable defences against these bombers. These suitable defences are found in the existence of the three detection lines and in the presence of the interceptor planes which we have put at the disposal of our air forces.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but I must advise him that his time has expired. Is it the wish of the committee that he be allowed to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sevigny: Perhaps you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, to thank the committee for their consideration in allowing me to continue. I was most surprised when I heard the hon. member for Trinity say that it was the government of Canada that had asked General Kuter to speak in Toronto. General Kuter did not speak in Toronto at the invitation of the Canadian government. He was invited to speak there by those in charge of the international air show. The distinguished commanding officer of NORAD made a very fine speech indeed on that occasion and I am quite sure that he did not advocate the arguments which appeared in the manifesto of the Liberal party at their recent convention. I am also quite sure that he did not share the views expressed in the house only this morning by the hon. member for Trinity.

Along with the other member nations of NATO we are trying at the present time to build up our conventional strength simply because we know that our enemy will be impressed only by the strength of our forces and by the determination which will be shown by NATO and the forces of the member nations to defend our way of life, to defend the freedom in which we believe at all costs and in all parts of the world.

The hon. member for Trinity finally accused us of not doing enough. He said that we were not trying to build up our forces by the purchase of equipment manufactured in Canada which, by being produced in Canada, would provide employment for our people. This again is false. On the contrary, the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production are trying by all possible means to encourage our Canadian industries whenever it is possible to do so. We are doing this constantly and at all times and the best proof can be found in the production program of Bobcat vehicles, trainer aircraft, and so many other necessities.

Once again, as is the custom of members of the official opposition, the hon. member for Trinity tried to hint that there was no such thing as a defence policy for Canada. He tried to create the impression that there was only confusion in the defence department and no spirit of decision anywhere in the minds of those entrusted with the responsibility of national defence. As I said a moment ago, to say that Canada has no defence policy is to say that NATO has no defence policy since our policy is an integral part of the general NATO defence policy. To say that there is confusion and indecision in the minds of those entrusted with the care of national defence in Canada is actually casting a slur on the competence and devotion of those officers and men who are performing such a marvellous job in the service of their choice here in Canada, and elsewhere in the world.

I do not hesitate to say that we are indeed privileged to have such dedicated, competent and able men as leaders of our respective services. These men are well trained. During long careers they have given proof of their ability. The many decorations they have received and the long succession of promotions which mark their careers indicate the degree of confidence which they have enjoyed from their superiors and from the various leaders of government who have actually had in their hands the destiny of the nation during the last two or three decades. These men deserve the confidence of those who serve under them. They deserve the admiration, which they have, of those who serve with them. I do not hesitate to say that we are indeed privileged in Canada to have such distinguished leadership in all branches of our services.

If the worst should come, and if we have to fight again, I do not hesitate to say that we shall once again win the battles of tomorrow just as we won the battles of yesteryear, and this for many reasons. The main reason is that we have right on our side and that right in the days of tomorrow will triumph as it has always triumphed in formers years. We shall win again because I believe that here in Canada as elsewhere in NATO, we have the finest possible leaders and also because we have here in Canada and in the allied armies men who are determined to preserve at all costs this way of life which is ours and this freedom which we cherish almost more than life itself. Let us hope that the horrors of a nuclear war will never be present in our lives, and that God will guide the minds of men towards the road to peace.

Let us hope that the days of conventional war may also be at an end. It may be that there is still enough humanity and justice in this world for men to realize the futility of wars and to accept that only through peace can we make any real progress as free men.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, the announcement of Mr. Khrushchev that the Soviet union had resumed testing of nuclear weapons is having consequences which, at the moment, can be assessed as being of far-reaching effect in dashing the hopes of mankind for a peaceful settlement of differences between the Soviet and the western powers. It would almost appear that they have slammed the door shut on future efforts to maintain an honourable peace. The leader of the Soviet union is acting like a spoiled child who is losing an argument and turns to violence to put his point across. His resumption of nuclear explosions in the atmosphere has shocked not only the west but the entire world. The "ban the bomb" groups who raised their voices here in Ottawa earlier this year, as well as in other places on every possible occasion, suggesting that if the west gave up nuclear projects peace would suddenly descend upon the world will now surely have to change their thinking. I wonder how well they would fare if they were to parade their banners before the Kremlin in the same manner as they paraded before the parliament buildings last spring?

A question now arises about the right of one nation to contaminate the atmosphere around the entire globe with radioactive fallout. The sober statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare this morning pointed to the grave danger to which people everywhere are being exposed. If Mr. Khrushchev continues these uncontrolled explosions he will go down in history, if any history books remain, as having committed the greatest crime of all against humanity.

The explosive international situation which has taken a serious turn during recent weeks has given national defence priority over any and all other subjects for serious consideration by the government and by parliament. Indeed, the statements of the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defense, indicate that the whole question of national defence has become one of great urgency. It is a pity, however, that the government did not foresee this urgency earlier in the year. Had we taken the necessary measures at that time to put Canada's defence effort in proper perspective, we would now be in a better position as a middle power to offer the most effective effort in the defence of peace. We believe in a permanent international police force under the United Nations. Canada should maintain, equip and train mobile forces with air and sea transport for the United Nations.

The statement of the Prime Minister on Thursday last promised new defensive measures which will increase our armed forces for overseas duty as well as speed up the program for civil defence. I, for one, will not quarrel with a frank appraisal of our present inadequate facilities for both defence and survival. All I have to do is look at the almost total absence of armoury facilities in Fort William, a city of 45,000 and serving a rural population of an additional 10,000 to be reminded of the inadequate facilities.

In about 1920 an armoury was established on the premises of an old departmental store building located on one of our busy business streets. This building served until world war II, when the city turned the Fort William hockey arena over to the federal government to provide the space required by the exigency of war, then in its third year. This building served as an armoury until 1958, at which time it was condemned and torn down. Fort William has been without an armoury ever since.

I should like to point out to the minister the highly successful army unit which was served by the old armoury. They were the 18th medium battery, Royal Canadian Artillery; the second 4th field ambulance which was to sustain the 4th field ambulance unit serving overseas. It was from the personnel of this regiment that the 35th technical squadron and a provost unit were formed. For the purpose of showing the value of an armoury at Fort William I am going to enumerate the units using that facility at the time it was closed down. They were the 118th medium battery, Royal Canadian Artillery; the 17th medical company, Royal Canadian Medical Corps; the 35th technical squadron, Royal Canadian Engineers; the provost unit, Royal Canadian Provost Corps, the highly efficient units of sea cadets, army cadets and air force cadets.

A movement for a new armoury was initiated immediately after the building was condemned by the fire marshal for the province of Ontario. In 1956 the prairie command gave top priority to this building, and I am informed it was near the top of the list in the Department of National Defence. The significant reason this request failed to materialize was the abandonment of the 67th as a regiment. However, in 1959 a petition for a new armoury at Fort William was signed by 5,000 responsible property owners of the city, supported by the Fort William city council, the chamber of commerce and the Canadian Legion unit of the area, and it was presented to the then minister of national defence. The city of Fort William made an offer, which still stands, of a suitable site free of charge. This site was approved by the prairie command which had jurisdiction of the area at that time.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I wish to stress a few irrefutable reasons why the establishment of an armoury in Fort William should not be delayed. Fort William is the granary of the continent and merits special consideration for army protection as it is vulnerable to attack from many directions. Fort William has always had a strong military organization and the nucleus is available for a renewed effort to recruit a new unit.

Decentralization of military and emergency measures organization forces is considered essential. Fort William is located in the centre of Canada, ideally located for a training and operational base.

The cadet movement is particularly strong, but requires a proper armoury in which to train our youth. Recruiting is slow, for the absence of a central location and adequate equipment discourages not only the officers but also the potential cadet.

Fort William is interested in organizing a mobile unit as part of the emergency measures organization. This is required to support our survival plans, and will do much to encourage our citizens to take an active part in protective planning.

The debate on the issue of national defence has amply demonstrated that at present the Canadian armed forces lack strength and equipment for any effort Canada may be asked to perform on behalf of the United Nations in the interest of peace. Whether we like it or not, and ruling out the probability of a nuclear war which to sane people everywhere is unthinkable, we are faced with a prolonged chilling cold war, and it is the duty of this parliament to see that our conventional forces are built up to full strength. We need men and equipment, and the facilities to train our manpower.

There are in our midst some well intentioned men and women who believe that we should not spend money on armaments, and that our tax dollar would be better spent in building schools and hospitals. The uncomfortable facts, however, are that we cannot indulge in the luxury of neutrality. This has been tried before by some European nations, and to their sorrow. Who would believe for one minute that, if the Soviet union were involved in an all out war with the United States, Russia would respect our neutrality?

Those who advocate a neutral position for Canada are simply trying to avoid unpleasant facts in the hope that they will vanish in the wake of wishful thinking. At the same time, it would be a mistake to believe that a strong Canada should have nuclear weapons for its own defence and the defence of the alliance. These weapons should be left in the hands of those now in possession of them.

Notwithstanding the belief expressed by some members—and some people believe it—that the old weapons would be obsolete and no good in a future war, that money spent on conventional arms is money wasted, that only nuclear weapons would be used and that as a result humanity would be wiped off the face of the earth, I should like to remind those people that in world war II poison gas was not used by either side. In spite of the fact that both sides possessed enormous supplies of poison gas capable of exterminating whole armies, gas was not used. Why?

It was not used because both sides knew the terrible consequences of poisoning whole populations. I therefore believe that in the event of a clash over Berlin the knowledge of total annihilation will prevent the touching off of a nuclear war.

Canada's contribution and influence as a member of NATO can best serve by playing a role fitted to her capability such as that of having Canadian troops employed as part of any United Nations emergency force anywhere in the world. I was very much pleased to hear the Associate Minister of National Defence say that the Bobcat program will be implemented. I understand that the Canada Car plant at Fort William will have an opportunity to share in its production. I hope that situation will come about. In any event it is a vehicle which we should have not only for our own use but for that of our allies, and some of the underdeveloped countries which could make use of this particular vehicle. However, with all the sincerity at my command I suggest that we should not fall into the temptation of confining the building-up to a much too small and poorly equipped force. A highly mobile, well equipped and highly trained army and air force capable of meeting commitments to North American defence and to NATO and commitments to security forces of the United Nations should be established. We should be prepared to spend the money for national defence in a manner consistent with the right to call ourselves an independent nation.

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Chairman, I came to the house today prepared or hoping to be prepared to answer the biting and fundamental criticisms of our defence policy that I expected would come from the other side of the house. Unfortunately, having listened to the speeches from the other side of the house, I find myself a little bit at a loss. We have heard from the hon. member for Trinity a discussion of hardware which was very much along the lines of his speech last year. There did not seem to me to be any real discussion of policy.

We have heard from the hon. member for Peterborough the latest policy of his group. I must admit that it is difficult to come to grips with the defence ideas of the little band sitting to your left, Mr. Chairman, because of course they have a great variety of policies. In the last year they have been in and out of NATO like a drunk in a revolving door; and from what was said today, it is a little bit difficult to gather, whether actually as of September 12 they are in favour of Canada's participation in NATO or not. We heard the hon. member for Kootenay West the other day quoting the resolution of his party as adopted at their convention and which seemed to give lip service to participation in NATO but said that Canada alone, one of 15 nations, should change the whole purpose and direction of that organization. This, of course, is one of the penalties of alliances, that no one nation can control completely the direction and the policies of the organization. But I think it is fair to say that Canada has had and will continue to have a very large influence on the policies of NATO. Those influences have been constructive and have worked toward a strengthening of the organization and an increasing of its effectiveness.

The Minister of National Defence this morning outlined Canada's policy. There was criticism from the hon. member for Trinity when he said that the defence policy should be a part of our external affairs policy.

Mr. Hellyer: An instrument of it.

Mr. Chambers: I imagine the minister left that sentence out of his speech simply because he felt it had been said so often and had been made so obvious as to become a cliche. Obviously our defence policy flows from our general national policy toward the world situation and toward other nations in the world.

The minister said—and I should like to repeat it because I think it is most important—that our objectives are two in number. Many people these days who discuss defence start somewhere away on down the line in methods, but you cannot develop any effective policy in any line unless you first consider what you are trying to do. Therefore I should like to emphasize the two parts that sum up our objective—prevention of war and the maintenance of freedom. If you try only to consider the first you will get a policy very different from the one you get if you realize the necessity of maintaining both objectives.

It has also been said that the major instrument of our policy is NATO. It seems to me that one of the things that cannot be emphasized too much, although in the last few days it has been said frequently in this house, is that the great virtue of NATO is that it works. Let me recall to the minds of those who question the efficacy of NATO what the situation was in Europe before that organization was formed.

Hon. members will recall that Czechoslovakia had recently fallen to the communists. It will be recalled that the communist forces in some of the western European countries were so strong as to give great cause for concern. One did not know from day to day what might happen in Italy, and even in France we were uncertain. One can date from the formation of the NATO alliance the halt of the communist advance westward across Europe. One can also date from the formation of this alliance the rehabilitation of the countries of western Europe. This involvement by the United States, Britain and Canada in the affairs of Europe gave to those countries and to the people of those countries the courage, confidence and realization that they were not alone in their troubles that allowed them to rebuild after the ravages of the second world war.

Anyone who stands up in Canada today and says we should abandon NATO, in almost any circumstances, has an obligation to bear in mind the accomplishments of NATO and has an obligation also to recommend some other arrangement which would give us and our friends and allies the degree of security that has been provided by that organization.

There are those who say we should abandon NATO, NORAD and our other defence alliances because then our prestige at the United Nations, our prestige among the neutral countries of the world, would grow. In other words they advocate a defence by moral suasion.

Let those who consider that to be a responsible policy for the Dominion of Canada think of how much effect moral suasion had on Mr. Khrushchev when he ordered the resumption of nuclear testing. How much influence has the moral suasion of the Belgrade group and the pleas of Mr. Nehru, who personally went to Moscow? How much influence has that had on the continuation of these tests which, as we have heard this morning, may have the most disastrous effects if carried on long enough.

It seems to me that when we consider a policy to protect ourselves against the depredations of communism in the world we must rely on something more concrete than moral suasion. In fact we must rely on creating a situation in the world wherein they will not dare to start a war.

We know from the writings of their leaders and from the speeches of Mr. Khrushchev and his predecessors that it is a belief held by the communists that they have a historical right to take over world society. We know also, because this too they have told us, that they believe the end justifies the means, that they are justified in achieving their ends by any means, military, economic, subversive or whatever.

Our first duty in the west, then, is to create a situation wherein they cannot achieve these ends by military means. This is the strategy of the alliances to which we belong particularly that of NATO. Once again let me point out that the great virtue of this strategy is that it works.

I should like now to pass for a moment to the question of air defence. The hon. member for Trinity last year and again this year put forward the view that there is no necessity for a defence against manned bombers because manned bombers are obsolete. The hon. member may be correct, but I wonder whether the gentlemen in the Kremlin have heard about it.

Mr. Hellyer: Would you give the source, please?

Mr. Chambers: I have not the page here. I got it last year and I can get it again from the speech of the hon. member this morning. We also know from the press, from the accounts of the Moscow air show not long ago, that there did not seem to be much evidence in that display of sabre rattling that the Russians had abandoned manned aircraft. In fact, of course there is a change from manned aircraft to missiles, but what so many people, including my hon. friend from Trinity, seem to forget or overlook is that these changes do not take place overnight. They cannot take place overnight. Because some missiles exist which might be used in any attack upon North America, and very probably would be used in any attack upon North America, this does not mean that should such an attack come—or should such an attack be considered, which is perhaps the better way of putting it—it would be necessary at the present time, to the best of our information, for the Russians to plan on using a considerable number of manned bombers.

Thus if we can create a defensive situation on the North American continent where they can have no confidence that a sufficient number of their bombers would get through to accomplish their mission, they can take no rational decision to attack. No doubt there will come a day when the threat of the manned bomber can be ignored. Figuring out the intentions or possible plans of a potential enemy is not an exact science but to say that because there are missiles we should abandon defence against the manned bomber is tantamount to saying that because there are high explosive artillery shells we should abandon the steel helmet. We have to try on this continent as in our global strategy to create a situation whereby it will be impossible for our potential enemy to take a position to attack. The defence of the deterrent against manned bombers is part of the arrangement to do that.

There has been a great deal said on the question of mobility and particularly the mobility of the 4th Canadian infantry brigade group in Germany. I think it should be emphasized that this brigade is completely mobile. That is to say it has within its own resources the capacity to move itself. I remember that some time ago I was visiting the brigade. I had to leave one morning at about 7.30. Various arrangements were made to get me to an airport. When I got up at about 6.30 I found that three quarters of an hour before a surprise exercise had been sprung on the brigade by higher command and they had been ordered to move. Within three quarters of an hour the brigade which had been sleeping and which had no warning, had completely disappeared from the area. All the men had embarked in their vehicles and had moved off in tactical formation. To me this indicates a very high degree of mobility indeed.

We are told we must have forces ready to serve the United Nations. I believe the hon. member for Fort William said we did not have any such forces. This, of course, is utter nonsense. On each occasion when we have been called upon by the United Nations Canada has produced the forces that were requested. In fact, all of Canada's forces, particularly her army, are in a practically constant state of readiness for the United Nations. Their equipment and vehicles are ideally suited to participation in any emergency that might arise. As I said this has been demonstrated both in the Gaza strip and the Congo. The forces being used so effectively there are not equipped differently from the rest of Canada's armed forces. As hon. members well know we have increased our capacity to transport our forces by air to any part of the world. It should be borne in mind that these United Nations tasks do not usually require heavy weapons. It is almost inconceivable that a situation would arise in which the United Nations would call for a force to make an assault landing or an airborne attack on some area in the world. Therefore I think it can be truly said that with respect to the type of forces that the United Nations are liable to call for, Canada is ideally equipped to supply them when the time comes.

It seems to me that one of the reasons people in this country occasionally advocate such impractical ideas in relation to our defence is that the consequences of a failure are so much greater today than they have been in the past. If one of our twin objectives, as I mentioned earlier, is to prevent war, the failure to achieve this objective would lead to the most terrible consequences, but this being so, it is no answer to the dilemma to say that like the ostrich we should therefore put our heads in the sand and say we will have nothing to do with it.

I believe it was the hon. member for Peterborough who said that a conflict between the United States and the U.S.S.R. would have no effect on us at all. I would say to the hon. gentleman we would certainly be affected and must therefore do all in our power to prevent it. Surely the way to do that is to do what Canada has always done, to live up to her international obligations and maintain the reputation she has built because she has lived up to her international obligations. We must not throw up our hands in despair and say that this problem is too big for us, that we will leave it to the big boys, that we will leave it to the United States or to the United States and the Soviet union and that we will concentrate on foreign aid. Foreign aid is a good and necessary measure and in my view it is part of our defence, in a manner of speaking, in that economic and ideological war that goes on under what might be called the umbrella of the nuclear threat. But the first obligation of the government of Canada in the area of defence is to do everything in its power for the security of the people of Canada. This we have done and this we will continue to do to the best of the ability of this country.

As the minister said, we have recently decided on an increase in our contribution to NATO in the form of additional men for both the air division and the brigade in Germany. These in themselves will be valuable additions to the forces in western Europe; but more than that, it seems to me, they are a restatement of our faith in that organization and our realization of the necessity for it. Once again we have said to our allies: we stand with you in the defence of freedom and here is the earnest of our pledge. It is a cliché, if you wish, but never has it been more true than today that we will stand together or separately we will fall.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman:

> In my judgement, a Liberal is a man who ought to stand as a restraining force against an extravagant policy. He is a man who ought to keep cool in the presence of Jingo clamour. He is a man who believes that the confidence between nations begets confidence, and that the spirit of peace and good will makes the safety it seeks. And, above all, I think a Liberal is a man who should keep a sour look for scaremongers of every kind and of every size, however distinguished, however ridiculous—and sometimes the most distinguished are the most ridiculous—

These are not my words, sir; these are the words of Winston Churchill. It is not enough that we always speak and think in defence matters in terms of contention. It surely is necessary that we have something in the nature of a goal and a purpose. What is somewhat disturbing to people on this side of the house is the fact that when the Minister of National Defence is in the house the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not, and when the Secretary of State for External Affairs is in the house it appears that the Minister of National Defence is not.

You will forgive us, sir, if in thinking in terms of defence—

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member does not want to be incorrect or unfair. I should like to point out to him that I was here practically throughout the entire debate on external affairs.

Mr. Drysdale: Facts never bother the Liberals.

Mr. Pearson: What about the other half of the remark?

Mr. Harkness: The Secretary of State for External Affairs is busy today with Dr. Stikker and this afternoon the president of Iceland is coming in.

Mr. Matheson: I accept the fact that I must have been in error. I did notice on a couple of occasions that when the Secretary of State for External Affairs was speaking the Minister of National Defence was not present. I withdraw the observation of course but I made it for another reason. It appeared very clear to us that the policies expounded so clearly by the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not appear to be in harmony with many points in the policies expounded by the Minister of National Defence. May I say this. We have heard something in the last few days.

[Mr. Chambers.]

Mr. Kindt: May I ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. Matheson: At the end of my speech I will be happy to answer any questions.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): The hon. member for Leeds has the floor. If he wishes to yield to the hon. member asking the question he may or may not do so. I believe he has indicated he does not wish the hon. gentleman to question him at this point in his speech.

Mr. Matheson: May I say that today we have had words which seem to substantiate the fact that what we have is defence policy by proxy. It appears that the policy is always formulated in NATO headquarters or in some other headquarters. What we are interested in is that there be something in the nature of Canadian policy with respect to national defence.

I think I made myself rather clear in the external affairs debate when I asserted the need for a strengthened military machine armed with conventional weapons and ready to meet challenge wherever it comes in the free world. Freedom is threatened but there are other factors that have to be considered. I should like to quote a few words from an article on foreign affairs by Sir Anthony Eden called "The Slender Margin of Safety". He said:

> Since 1940 the Western European powers have voluntarily agreed to the independence of 18 different countries with a population of more than 600 million people. During the same period the communist countries have brought under their rule 12 previously free countries with a population of more than 120 million.

One of the things we have to consider at this time is the nature of the type of leadership which Canada may very reasonably be expected to provide for those people who have been brought into freedom. This by no means must be by virtue of what is so contemptuously referred in this house on different occasions as neutralism. May I quote from the memoirs of Mr. Truman who said:

> We laboured to construct a weapon of such overpowering force that the enemy could be forced to yield swiftly once we could resort to it.

This remains the thinking of the speakers on the government's side, as has been demonstrated in this debate. I continue with the quotation:

They recommended further that it should be used without specific warning and against a target that would clearly show its devastating strength.

And so on. I continue:

Four cities were finally recommended as targets: Hiroshima, Kokura, Niigata, and Nagasaki.

Then, he heard about the bomb being dropped and he said:

I was greatly moved. I telephoned Byrnes aboard ship to give him the news and then said to the group of sailors around me, "This is the greatest thing in history. It's time for us to get home."

We read the news item which appeared in the Ottawa Journal which came out a few minutes ago and which referred to the extent of nuclear fall-out.

I should now like to quote a few words in French from Montesquieu:

(Translation):

If I knew something was helpful to my country and prejudicial to Europe or helpful to Europe and prejudicial to the human race, I would consider it a crime.

(Text):

A man who now enjoys the position of United States ambassador to the United Nations namely Adlai Stevenson said:

There are those who say that disarmament is impossible until political settlements have been reached and confidence restored. I disagree. I believe the nuclear arms race with weapons of mass destruction is a new element and in itself a cause of tension. Fear will not vanish until the arms race is arrested.

I think it is rather important that some matters of great moment, matters of national defence be discussed at this time. May I refer to the information which was gathered together for the special committee on defence expenditures in 1960. It was produced by the then minister of national defence, General Pearkes. This is what he said:

No one nation can afford a unilateral defence. Canada's defence effort must not be viewed in isolation but rather as a contribution to the combined deterrent of the western alliance. Our defence expenditures are not providing complete protection but in combination with others, they are contributing to the over-all effectiveness of an insurance against possible aggression.

With this I think we all agree. However, I think it has got to be more than that. NATO is composed of many different nations of many different backgrounds and of many different possibilities of service. I should now like to refer to an article which appears in the bulletin of the atomic scientists. It is called "The Future of Western Deterrent Power", by Alastair Buchan, and was published in 1960. He speaks about the considerations inherent in being a non-nuclear alliance member, and says:

The first step would involve a negotiation, possibly prolonged and difficult, to determine the considerations which should govern the siting of the land and water-based Polaris or other solid-fueled missiles which will replace the existing bombers. Should they be sited in Germany? Almost certainly not for sound political reasons affecting relationships within the alliance and with Moscow which most intelligent Germans accept. Should Norway be asked to reconsider the refusal to accept nuclear bases since her terrain is ideally suited to their dispersal and hardening? Again probably not for equally sound reasons concerned with the delicacy of the political balance in Scandinavia. Should they be sited in Britain? Yes. In Benelux? Probably. In France? Yes.

This is the opinion of Alastair Buchan whom many of us knew rather well. He recognizes that in NATO there will be different functions and purposes. I remind this committee that only one nation with the background and the potential for the development of the atomic bomb refused as a matter of principle to do so, and that country was Canada. The fact that we live in close proximity to the very powerful and beloved neighbour to the south enables us to speak frankly to this great nation. We are able to furnish military equipment and personnel of absolutely the best type and quality possible, men who are prepared to take their stand in danger spots but without nuclear arms. We recognize that behind the NATO shields there may be nuclear support, but our troops should be men of courage with manifestly no offensive purposes at all. The principle behind them is to defend the peace. This is the most important cause to which we can contribute.

We should like to see in Canada something in the nature of a clear, enunciated, articulated policy. There is some suggestion that we are not in favour of NATO. This suggestion is ridiculous. After all, we remember the occasion when the University of London granted an LL.D. degree to the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. The citation referred to him as the chief architect of NATO. We are proud of NATO. Our fear is that NATO may get off the rails. We must have confidence in NATO. Then we will be able to say, "We will march wherever you lead." There are powerful forces in NATO and there are weaker forces in NATO, and we have got to be in the position of being what Toynbee has referred to as a dominant minority in NATO, a creative minority, a minority that is prepared to try to have an effect and influence on the lives of the people of the world at large. I believe this is the only way that this dreadful holocaust can be avoided.

With respect to NORAD, I should like to refer to a book which in some circles is not popular. However, I believe we must read it and read it very carefully because the man who write it is a well informed, knowledgeable and respected member of the press. I am referring to the book, "Peacemaker or Powder-monkey", written by James M. Minifie. He has this to say:

NORAD had been mentioned at cabinet level during the last months of the dying Liberal government of Louis St. Laurent. But it had not reached the stage of cabinet decision. Although Mr. Pearkes appeared to have been under the impression that the preceding cabinet had agreed on NORAD, this was almost certainly not the case. It was the child of the new Conservative government—as unlikely an offspring as could have been wished upon an administration which had made a fetish of Canadian independence and had run a spectacularly effective election campaign, not indeed on anti-Americanism, but on a pro-Canadian nationalism which NORAD made nonsense of . . . a nation which has put part of its forces under foreign command in a two-way deal with a vastly more powerful neighbour has lost its independence. Canada has become a military satellite of the United States sun. The hard-won power to decide on peace or war has passed from Ottawa via Washington . . .

I submit that we do not yet know the extent to which we are in fact a satellite of the United States in this important regard. There have been hints and suggestions that there are at the present time nuclear armed aircraft under United States command which are patrolling Canadian skies. We do not know the facts. We are left in ignorance and I am sure the Canadian people at the present time are quite ignorant of what is happening. I say, sir, with all respect to some people on the other side whom I regard as close friends, that this is typically Conservative in its approach. It represents the attitude which says that we should not decide for ourselves.

If any hon. members would care to do so they can go to the parliamentary library and look at the debates that occurred in the year 1910 on the naval bill. You will remember how cries of treason rang through the chamber when Laurier said that we should have a navy of our own, that we should build it, that we should produce a flotilla and should decide what we were going to build although it would, of course, fit in with the British picture. There were Conservative members in the house in those days who rose and said, "No, definitely not". Their position was that it was improper for Canada to do this, that we should simply ask England what amount of money they wanted and then give it to them and let them spend it. I think that is not the typical view of Canadians generally.

If you want to take another illustration of the same thing, there is the argument relating to military command. Can we in Canada decide to govern our own forces? In the Chanak incident of 1923 Mackenzie King said Canada would not necessarily go to war on that matter over Turkey and in the result he perhaps saved Britain from serious and disastrous consequences. If my friend on my left will contain himself for a minute, I should like to refer to a little book which has been cited all over the world. It is entitled, "Democracy in World Politics". It is very elementary, particularly so in the light of all the gadgetry and hardware that have been the subject of discussion today. The author has this to say:

If violence breaks out, the play of this principle helps to limit the breakdown to the minimum needed to defeat aggression and, above all, to restore the peace. If a nation uses force in aggression against its neighbour, that neighbour and its allies, and indeed the entire free community, acting through and within the principles of the United Nations charter, may justifiably use—in fact have an obligation to use—collective force to repel that aggression. This does not, however, give them a moral licence to attempt, by the use of overwhelming and unlimited force, to destroy completely the aggressor society.

This is developed to some extent in this book. There is a very simple proposition put forward with which all of us who have anything to do with the police courts are familiar. The law discussed is the law of assault and the author says:

The doctrine that only a limited use of force, proportionate to the circumstances and strictly necessary to accomplish specific objectives, can be justified as self-defence is, I think, inherent in the principles of natural law. Certainly it is basic to the domestic law of all civilized peoples.

Then he refers to the judgement of Mr. Justice Martin of the Saskatchewan court of appeal in the case of MacNeill and Hill and quotes these words:

While the law recognizes the right of self-defence, the right to repel force with force, no right is to be abused and the right of self-defence is one which may easily be abused. The force employed must not be out of proportion to the apparent urgency of the occasion.

Then he quotes the Canadian Criminal Code, section 66:

Everyone authorized by law to use force is criminally responsible for any excess according to the nature and quality of the act which constitutes the excess.

Then he goes on to refer to the case of State v. Cephus, a well-known American authority, and follows that with our English authority, Halsbury's Laws of England. He then refers to the Encyclopedie Dalloz which expresses the French law to the same effect. Then he comes to the conclusion to which I have referred, that if violence breaks out the principle of limited force limits the breakdown to the minimum needed to defeat aggression.

Mr. Drysdale: You would need a big police force.

Mr. Matheson: I would be glad to answer questions—

Mr. Drysdale: It is not a question; it is an observation.

Mr. Matheson: With respect to the observation about a police force, may I refer to something that may appear strange in a defence debate. Perhaps one person who never intended to exert great influence on the commonwealth but nevertheless did so more than anyone else in the world was Mahatma Gandhi, and I should like to read a few brief lines respecting him:

Naked little Hindu fakir,
Vexing to the powers that be,— Praying, spinning, scheming, fasting,
How absurd to such as we.

We never understood his wisdom,
Suddenly the tragic end.
Pistol shots that stirred the nations,
All mankind had lost a friend.

Stripes to him and to his children,
Weary years in British quod.
Dusty miles to briny ocean.
Raised on earth a child of God.

Fractious world beset with sorrows,
Searching for what's brave and true,
Hover closer, gentle Bapu
We need aid from such as you.

I think the situation right now is such that we in the western world need something of the personality of Gandhi. We cannot apply Gandhi's method to the particular situation confronting us. Any person who suggested such a thing would be foolish, but would it really be foolish to think of Canada taking these principles that are bold and brave and acting on them with our conventional weapons as and when the need arises and protected by the shield of NATO and our NATO allies? In a situation such as Berlin today we have a battalion, such as that of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, the Black Watch with their pipes, or there are the R.C.R.'s whom I saw performing tremendously at Fort Henry a few days ago. Is this the type of thing that might appeal to the imagination of the world? We Canadians have taken on a great many assignments. We have in this house right now people who participated at Ypres and at the Somme and at so many other places. There was the Dieppe raid. Some of these things were foolish ventures. I think it is not at all unreasonable to say that in our Canadian army today we have men of idealism and courage who are prepared to assume the risk inherent in conventional weaponry. But we are not getting frank answers on this score. We are getting the old answer that the soldiers must have the best equipment possible.

I put it to the house that this is no answer and that we have not frightened Russia at all. Maybe Mr. Truman was able to frighten Japan a few years ago but the Russians are in a different position. There is only one thing greater than nuclear force and if I may refer to a speech made at the University of Oslo by the author of the book to which I have referred, Mr. Pearson said in that speech that ideas can also be explosive. I think this is something that we have got to bear in mind.

The person who wrote this book on the principles of defence was not absolutely naive and ignorant about war. He participated in the first great commando effort in the world, the Gallipoli campaign in 1915. It involved something like 120,000 British troops and there were 50,000 dead when it finally failed. The force was made up of British, Australians, New Zealanders, Gurkhas and many others and he brings to this subject the experience he had in those days and the war years that followed. He will recall that in those days, all troops did not do the same thing, just as all troops did not do the same thing for the British eighth army. You could not feed them the same way, you could not arm them the same way. They had different roles. My friend the hon. member for Edmonton West will recall that the Gurkhas would do things at night that his loyal Edmonton regiment troops would not do. They had special skills. In the role that I have suggested our Canadian militia could serve magnificently. We have a good record, a record of not being a dirty army. We have always had this reputation and that is a role we have to preserve.

Now, referring to the particular problem before us, there is an important article written by Pierre M. Gallois entitled, "New Teeth for NATO". In this article he recognizes the four stages in depth in which NATO defence can be developed. Conventional weapons at the front, a second nuclear shield until at last we finally go across the seas with the possibility of intervention by strategic air command. We suggest that we take the courageous role of world peacemaker and be on the spot, be there with the weapons we can carry, such as light artillery and things that are mobile.

In the publication the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, there is an article by Senator Saltonstall entitled, "Western Military Strength and Security." In this article, he says:

> There are two permanent issues concerning the defence posture which have a particularly important relationship to the philosophy of deterrence. These are: (a) the strengthening of weapons and equipment suitable to fight in situations of limited conflict, and (b) the efforts to bring about dependable agreements on weapons tests, arms control, and eventual disarmament.

I quote from the article at another point:

> Secretary McNamara commented there had been a tendency since the end of the Korean war to emphasize the nuclear capabilities of limited war forces. Although such use is essential, the Pentagon is careful to point out, the non-nuclear capability of conventional forces is stressed in the current plan in order to provide greater versatility.

Then, the author says:

We must take care ... lest by building up our own security we perpetuate and encourage a nuclear arms race.

With all that written by Senator Saltonstall, we agree. In an article written in London by Ritchie Calder entitled, "The Non-Nuclear Club", there is a reference to Professor Blackett, who was a distinguished naval officer in the first war. This article is contained in the bulletin of the atomic scientists. Professor Blackett is quoted as follows in this article:

In fact, I can see no plausible way in which the European defence community can survive either with its own jointly owned nuclear forces or with individual national nuclear forces. I feel that the present situation, with an American safety catch on all its nuclear weapons, wherever situated, is much more stable than either of those alternatives. However, to keep it stable, it is essential that Britain renounce her own nuclear forces, otherwise their spread to other countries will never be checked.

Later, this author says:

... his position, and that of many others, including service experts, arises from the fallacies manifest in present NATO strategy.

We have Britain with nuclear arms and we have France with nuclear arms. Do we want to extend these to everybody? May I refer to John Gellner's publication, "Problems of Canadian Defence". His air force record is well known to this committee and he says:

In brief, the belief is widespread that the threat of nuclear weapons does not deter the enemy from waging war, but only from waging nuclear war. This would in itself be an important result, but not under present circumstances when the west is inferior in manpower and armaments required for conventional war.

Obviously this is the line our defence policy should take.

Then, referring to General Charles Foulkes we find in his article "Canadian Defence Policy in a Nuclear Age" that he said:

It should be constant Canadian policy to make our armed forces available for United Nations service and even to declare that they will be used only for purposes consistent with the U.N. charter.

At another point, this article states:

It appears doubtful if there is any real advantage in Canada's becoming a nuclear power and having its own deterrent, or even manufacturing Canadian requirements of tactical nuclear weapons.

Then, the author says:

Therefore, we should refrain from action which would encourage any widening of the nuclear club's membership, even though we should realize that the permission of the United States will be required to use nuclear weapons and also that such an arrangement may prove militarily inconvenient.

Then, he concludes:

I am convinced that in the world today we have gone so far in the production of force and in making it so readily available that I seriously question the use of force as an instrument of policy.

There is another article to which I should like to refer as being really the basis of our Liberal defence position, although I think our view was arrived at independently. This is by Henry A. Kissinger and is entitled, "Limited War: Conventional or Nuclear? A Reappraisal". This author's experience in the United States defence picture is well known, and he says:

Safety resides in mobility ... Accordingly, a great premium will be placed on small, self-contained units of high mobility.

Later in this article, he says:

Nuclear weapons, it is contended, are not a substitute for manpower.

Then, later we find this:

Conventional defence provides the best means of preventing the occupation of threatened countries.

Then, he says:

Few of our allies possess nuclear weapons. Those that do have emphasized the retaliatory and not the tactical aspect of nuclear warfare. Public opinion in most allied countries has mobilized against nuclear weapons by a variety of agents. ... In these circumstances, it will become increasingly difficult to concert a strategic and tactical doctrine that is accepted by the alliance and maintained with conviction in the face of Soviet pressure ... If it relies entirely on a nuclear strategy, its vulnerability to nuclear blackmail both before and during hostilities would be considerable.

... The years ahead must therefore see a substantial strengthening of the conventional forces of the free world. If strong enough to halt Soviet conventional attacks—as in many areas such as Europe they could be—conventional forces would shift the onus and risk of initiating nuclear war to the other side.

That, sir, is in essence what our position is. Gandhi was able to free 400 million people from what he regarded as the imperialistic yoke by taking advantage of the fact that people would not fire with conventional weapons on a group of unarmed people with a single purpose to live a life of freedom and peace. If we have conventional weapons and have the courage to put our gallant people in a place where they can preserve peace, I put it to you that the moral effect of this is going to be so overpowering that many of these uncommitted people who know our background and many of the people behind the iron curtain who wish they were on our side, will take a stand with us. The opening of a book entitled, "The Nation's Safety and Arms Control" by Arthur T. Hadley, which has been recently well reviewed, contains this opening sentence:

Every citizen looking at the nuclear world must have more than a fleeting wish that modern weapons could be limited or abolished.

And as a final word the author concludes:

This book has been an arms control tour of the kilo-megaton age ... hopefully, the need for secure weapons and non-nuclear answers has been established both as imperative for American security and as a first step toward arms control.

I believe that every person comes to this house dedicated to do his very best for the people of this great country we love. One does not come here without much effort and much sacrifice. There are no traitors in this house. We believe earnestly in the good work of this department and the good work it has done in the past and will continue to do. I must tell the minister that I have watched his army in different parts of Canada. I think he has a magnificent army, small though it may be. This is a vitally important matter, the development and preservation of peace. We have to make sure that nothing mars our role or our effectiveness. I hope that as we consider our responsibilities in NORAD we will watch very carefully the extent to which we get pushed into a role that is no longer a defensive role.

(Translation):

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, while I rise to take part in this debate, I do not pretend to be an expert on international politics or in the field of military or civil defence, but I want to express the concern that Canadians have felt in their hearts and minds because of recent developments, and more particularly because of the Russians' decision to resume nuclear tests.

I was astounded by the fact that for more than a year—and we have the evidence today—while negotiations were going on in Geneva about a final nuclear test ban, when western and other free countries represented at those conferences were discussing with sincerity and honesty, Russia was not of the same mind because, according to experts, it takes months to prepare an atomic blast.

Only a few days ago, Mr. Khrushchev made a threat which he accompanied by an imperative gesture as usual, and since then, the Russians have exploded six atomic bombs. Thus, while discussions were still going on in Geneva, while sincere and free countries were working together to put a stop to those nuclear tests, the Russians were secretly and dishonestly intending to resume them, and they have just proved it by exploding six atomic bombs.

Mr. Chairman, the Canadian people are greatly concerned, of course, and we are presently going through dark days, not only because of the material consequences of those explosions, but also of the distrust that is spreading among nations.

That spirit of distrust, a venerable old man has painted it out very well in his recent encyclical letter Mater et Magistra. I should like to quote a short passage of John XXIII's encyclical:

It can thus be understood how individuals and nations are getting more and more convinced of the urgent necessity of understanding and co-operation. However, it seems that men, especially those who shoulder the heaviest responsibilities, are incapable of causing the one and the other. The reason for that incapacity lies not in science, technology or economics, but in the lack of mutual trust.

A little further, John XXIII states:

The lack of mutual trust is due to the fact that the activities of men, especially those who bear the heaviest responsibilities, are inspired by different or radically opposed concepts of life. Unfortunately, some of these concepts do not take into account the existence of a moral order, of an order which is transcendent, universal, not absolute and of equal value for all. It becomes therefore impossible to meet and to fully agree, with all security, in the light of a same law of justice accepted and followed by all. It is true that the word "justice" and the phrase "the requirements of justice" continue to be used by everyone; but that word and that phrase have for each one a different or contrary meaning.

Indeed, there are between the Soviet bloc and the alliance of western free countries two basic differences in their concept of life. While we in the free nations, the Christian nations, the western nations, are trying to establish peace for the triumph of spiritual values and the installation of the rule of God over His creatures, our opponents are looking for peace—at least they say so—but only through a search for material and materialistic aims, without any belief in the spiritual values, without any belief in the dignity of the human being.

That is the real trouble in our hearts, and it is in such a climate of distrust, which becomes increasingly troubling, that we have all these important discussions in international organizations.

It must be said to the credit of Canada and of the present administration that they wish to pursue and promote negotiations in order to lessen that distrust. Furthermore, this government is to be credited—and this needs to be said—in the face of communist ideas spreading across the world, for embodying in its legislation that fundamental assurance and very concrete expression of human rights and freedoms. We cannot repeat it too often: those rights and freedoms are, initially and in final analysis, of God's creation.

That is the fine example the government has given the whole world by its bill of rights. In the pursuit of its activities, it recognizes man's dignity, the Canadian citizen's dignity, that of any citizen of the world, and it is yearning for peace in order to ensure the triumph of spiritual values and the recognition of God's rule over His creatures.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock I do now leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

THE CUMBERLAND RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY AND THE SYDNEY AND LOUISBURG RAILWAY COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. S-19, an act respecting the Cumberland Railway and Coal Company and the Sydney and Louisburg Railway Company—Mr. MacInnis—Mr. Chown in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 5—Application of provincial statutes.

Mr. McGee: Before the bill is passed I wonder whether I could ask the hon. member who is sponsoring it whether the matters that were raised in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and about which there was some minor doubt in the minds of some of the members have been clarified, and whether we may have an assurance that no other impediment relating to these discussions has arisen in the interval?

Mr. MacInnis: In answer to the hon. member's question all I can say is this. A number of questions arose before the standing committee on this bill. At that time I thought that every question raised at the time was answered to the complete satisfaction of myself and of other hon. members who may have a particular interest in this particular amalgamation in so far as it concerns our part of the country.

It will be recalled that Mr. McGregor was present at the meeting acting in the interests of all the union men involved, and he himself was quite satisfied with the proceedings.

Clause agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

JEAN GEORGE LIPSMAN

On the order:

Second reading of Bill SD-1, an act for the relief of Jean George Lipsman—Mr. McCleave.

[Mr. Allard.]

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, may I ask leave of the house to stand all the divorce bills on order paper 161.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether in this instance we might not follow the practice proposed to the house and agreed to on March 14 by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) relating to the consolidation of these bills under one order. I have just counted the pages and there are some 27½ pages of divorce bills. I think we could perhaps agree to consolidate them all under one order and then upon, say, 48 hours notice list them separately when it was desired to proceed with them on a particular Tuesday. This would save a great deal of printing, paper and so on and would not in any way be an impediment to proceeding with the bills whenever it is desired to proceed with them.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I seem to recall being in the house on the date mentioned by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and there was in fact an order of this house that the bills be so consolidated. I should like to ascertain from any hon. member just what happened to that order of the house, and why was it changed to produce the result we sought to avoid in the first place?

Mr. Speaker: If I correctly understood the previous order of the house, it was that the divorce bills be consolidated in one order and not be printed until notice was given that they would be proceeded with. That notice was given by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) some time recently—I think, just before the adjournment—and resulted in the listing on the order paper of all the bills which now stand for consideration.

It is agreed, then, that the previous order be reinstated with respect to these divorce bills so there will be no need to print them until notice is given by the chairman or deputy chairman of the committee requesting that they be listed again?

Mr. McGee: To clarify that point, Mr. Speaker, may I inquire whether any time limit was set. Was it one day before, two days before, or what were the conditions surrounding the change?

Mr. Speaker: I think sufficient advance notice was to be given to make it physically possible for the printing to be accomplished when that was contemplated. Is it agreed that the previous order of the house to this effect be reinstated?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT LOANS TO CATERERS TO TOURISTS AND RETAIL MERCHANTS

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. C-46, to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act—Mr. Benidickson.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may this bill in the name of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) stand, please.

Mr. John Pallett (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think arrangements were made by the hon. member moving the bill and the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell, Carleton) that it be dropped because government legislation already passed has embodied this or even gone further than the bill contemplates.

Mr. Chevrier: I was not aware of that.

Mr. Speaker: Then order No. 1 is passed.

Mr. Pallett: Dropped.

Mr. Speaker: That is the effect of the legislation already passed.

Bill dropped to bottom of list.

CANADA FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND APPLICATION TO CIVIL SERVICE

The house resumed, from Friday, December 2, 1960, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howard for the second reading of Bill No. C-9, to amend the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act (Crown Bound).

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to say at the outset that I intend to be very brief as I am sure there are many hon. members who would like to take part in the debate on this very interesting subject.

I think this is the third occasion upon which this bill has been introduced by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). I am happy to say that I feel he has been sincere on each occasion in introducing the bill. However, I must admit that he has failed to convince me of the necessity for this bill at this particular time.

The hon. member proposes to ask for an amendment to section 3 of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act whereby the act binds Her Majesty in right of Canada and servants and agents of Her Majesty.

I think it would be wise for us very briefly to review what the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act provides. In short, it provides that no employer shall discriminate in so far as the employment of employees or the terms or conditions of employment are concerned because of race, national origin, colour or religion. It also applies, of course, to hiring agencies and to trade unions, whereby it states that trade unions shall not discriminate against its members or prevent potential members from becoming members of the union.

This bill is a very short one. It merely seeks to make the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act apply to the crown and crown agencies. However, I would remind the hon. gentleman that crown corporations are already taken care of and must apply this act in all their dealings with employees. At the present time crown corporations come within the ambit of the act.

Section 3 of the act reads as follows:

This act applies to and in respect of employment upon or in connection with any work, undertaking or business that is within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada, including, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing, (m) the employment by any corporation established to perform any function or duty on behalf of the government of Canada of employees.

This bill would make the act apply to employees of of Her Majesty in the right of Canada. We may thus eliminate crown corporations because they have to abide by the act as it now stands. I firmly believe that the federal government is living up to the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act all along the line. I know it is the duty of the unemployment insurance commission not to practice discrimination on any grounds of race, national origin, colour or religion. I also realize that the Department of Public Works has inserted in its contracts a clause that takes care of this matter. A similar clause is inserted in all supply contracts that are entered into by the government. I am therefore convinced that the Canadian government is fulfilling its duty in applying in all its departments the principles of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. The province of Ontario has a similar act and I feel that other provinces are doing an excellent job in promoting fair employment practices.

I am proud to say that I come from a municipality where no discrimination is exercised in the hiring of employees. I therefore feel that the bill as introduced by the hon. member for Skeena is unnecessary at the present time.

If the hon. gentleman will pause to reflect he will realize that a special committee was set up to study the Civil Service Act. During the meetings of that committee this very question was considered by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell). As reported at page 521 of the minutes and proceedings of the committee dated June 20, 1961, the hon. member for Carleton had this to say:

> Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I ask the leave of the committee to revert to clause 33. The members of the committee will remember at the meeting of Friday, April 21, that there was presented to us a letter from the Canadian Jewish Congress in which they asked that there be inserted in the Civil Service Act a non-discrimination clause. That matter has had some consideration especially as to where, if such a clause were to be placed in the act, it should be placed. The advice of the draftsman is that if such a clause is to be inserted that it be inserted in clause 33.

The committee accepted an amendment in these words:

> The commission may in relation to any position or any class or grade prescribe qualifications as to age, residence or any other matters that in the opinion of the commission are necessary or desirable having regard to the nature of the duties to be performed, but in so doing the commission shall not discriminate against any person by reason of race, national origin, colour or religion.

This amendment has been inserted in clause 33. The committee has reported to the house. If this is passed by parliament the very thing the hon. member for Skeena seeks to accomplish in introducing Bill No. C-9 will be attained. Since the introduction of his bill the bill of rights has been passed by parliament. The bill of rights will also accomplish what the hon. member for Skeena wishes to see brought about by the amendment as outlined in Bill No. C-9.

I believe I have covered most of the main points on the bill before us. I agreed with the general principle of the bill in that it calls upon the government of Canada to introduce provisions relating to the abolition of discrimination which I am sure we all wish to see eliminated in our land. I believe that the government should be bound by all the laws it applies to its citizens. I feel that the purpose of Bill No. C-9 will be well taken care of when the amendment to clause 33 of Bill No. C-71 relating to the Civil Service Act is adopted and passed by parliament.

I am unable to support this bill at this time for the following reasons. First, the hon. member who introduced the bill failed to give sufficient cases in which the government is not living up to the provisions of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. Second, I feel that the federal government is now providing equality of opportunity without discrimination on the basis of race, national origin, colour or religion. Third, I feel that the provisions of Bill No. C-9 will be well taken care of when the amended Civil Service Act is passed. Fourth, I feel that what the hon. member seeks to accomplish by this bill has already been accomplished by the introduction of the bill of rights.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, may I say I am in complete agreement with many of the remarks made by the previous speaker. I think that all Canadians, whether we are referring to private employment practices or employment practices in relation to the government or crown, have no patience with and absolutely abhor anything which smacks of discrimination. I appreciate that we can speak only of our own particular areas. Whether with respect to government employment matters or employment practices in private enterprise, I am proud to be able to say that I have never seen anything in the nature of discrimination in the area I represent. I know of no incident of this kind in the past either in relation to government or private enterprise hiring.

I do not say this in a holier than thou attitude and I do not say this in comparing ourselves with other nations, but I feel that Canadians in general—although there are some notable exceptions—can be very proud of their history. I repeat that with some notable exceptions Canadians are able to look with great pride at their past in this regard. Canadians in general do not tolerate discrimination on the basis of race, national origin, colour or religion. We see this in the field of education and in many other areas.

The Canada Fair Employment Practices Act came into effect on July 1, 1953. As has been pointed out, in general outline the act states that no employer can discriminate with respect to colour, race, national origin or religion. The general terms of the act also prevent an employer from using a hiring agency to obtain the same end. The general provisions of the act relating to trade unions state that no trade union may bar an individual from membership on grounds of discrimination. The act does not allow a trade union to expel a member or employee on grounds of discrimination.

It has been said that the bill before the house asks that its provisions be made applicable to the crown. I can only say I agree with the previous speaker. The sponsor of the bill before us this afternoon seeks to attain an end. Nobody within or without this house can quarrel with that end. In all sincerity, I say that what we are discussing is the means to attain that end. We are all against discrimination. All Canadians are against it no matter how or where it exists.

I was interested to read that in speaking for his party the sponsor of this legislation said that so often the sanction for many laws was a state of mind. Perhaps he meant that so many of our laws come into being by custom and by tradition. I find it a little strange that a member representing the socialist party and speaking about socialist doctrine should advance such a theory. I have always thought that the socialists feel you can legislate for a state of mind.

Mr. Howard: This shows how mistaken you are.

Mr. Grafftey: I make this reference only in passing. I underline the fact that I feel the end result of this legislation can be best attained by a revision of the Civil Service Act itself.

Again I say that nobody wants discrimination. It has been pointed out time and time again that in relation to civil service hiring practices there has never been a case of discrimination. If anybody inside or outside this house has any doubt in his mind in this regard he should bring it immediately to the attention of the government. I repeat that there has never been discrimination in relation to race, colour, religion or national origin with respect to government hiring of personnel. Therefore I ask this very simple question. Why in essence is the bill so described before the house this afternoon? I do not doubt its sincerity. Yet, when one realizes that there has never been any discrimination one wonders why this particular bill is before us. We agree that it is seeking a very desirable end.

It is admitted that in 1942 there was a question about colour in a civil service questionnaire. I am not quite sure of the kind of questionnaire it was. I am not going to admit, state or even imply for a minute that discrimination was involved but since that date the question has been dropped.

The civil service commission today, as in the past, is following a policy of non-discrimination. This goes without saying. If there is more than a modicum of doubt in anybody's mind perhaps it is only right that we should be discussing this most important matter in the Canadian House of Commons. I repeat what I said. If there has ever been a case of discrimination in relation to government, then it is the duty of the citizen or the member who has knowledge of it to bring it to the attention of the government. To our knowledge discrimination has never been knowingly practised. There has never been such a case.

If Bill No. C-9 is to be passed it occurs to me that the penalty section of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act would likewise need amendment. If we should pass this act today we would inevitably see that many anomalies would arise.

I have pointed out the fact that a revision of the Civil Service Act itself would be the best way to attain the ends desired. Apropos of the questions that have been asked in the past by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Spencer), we must come to the point and ask ourselves what could be the effect of the proposed bill? It could give the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) authority to deal with complaints concerning discrimination in employment which in all other respects is subject to the civil service commission and to the Civil Service Act. We know the jurisdiction of the industrial inquiries commission appointed by the Minister of Labour. I therefore come back to the point I brought to the attention of the house previously, namely the fact that the civil service commission reports directly to the house and not through the minister. For this reason, if we proceed as proposed by the hon. member for Skeena, we could quite conceivably be setting up a great conflict in jurisdiction. I reiterate that which I have repeated time and time again. The desired results could be and should be brought about by an amendment to the Civil Service Act.

Another thing I should like to draw to the attention of the house relates to some of the general provisions in the bill of rights. The right of the individual to liberty comes in clause 1 of this bill. The right of the individual to liberty comes in part I of the bill of rights. I think it is obvious to all hon. members that the principle of fair employment must apply equally to all Canadians. I realize only too well that I am arguing in a very indirect fashion at this time, but liberty must have economic aspects. Many members on both sides of the house have brought up this question time and time again. The liberty to be employed fairly should apply equally to all Canadians. I think I am not letting my imagination run away with me when I say that these provisions of the bill of rights have a direct bearing on the question we are discussing this afternoon.

I should repeat that which I said at the beginning of my remarks this afternoon. It almost seems unnecessary to put written legislation in such detail on the statute books because the principles of non-discrimination are written so largely within the hearts of the Canadian people. Because such provisions are provided in the bills of rights and because the civil service commission actually is following a policy of non-discrimination and because these ends can better be achieved by amendments to the Civil Service Act I do not think we should accept this bill.

The hon. member for Skeena said he had made numerous phone calls to members of the civil service commission or to members of the civil service in this regard and they had told him that perhaps this was not the case. My opinion is, after speaking to members of the administration, that is the official point of view, and that these ends would better be achieved by amendments to the Civil Service Act.

I might be considered to be straying from the subject but I know that if some hon. members opposite run true to form I will be classed among those who are said to be talking out the bill. Such is not the case. In the hour between five and six o'clock very often bills are not passed but I believe that the private members' hour is a most valuable one because much information is put before the government and many views are aired which eventually bring about good legislation.

I have discussed my point of view in relation to a most important subject. Just because I am not in favour of the immediate passage of the bill as it now stands, I hope no one will feel that I tolerate discrimination in any shape or form. I simply do not believe that as the bill now stands it will help to correct the situation, one which I believe the government can perhaps correct in a better way through the amendments I have discussed. In my opinion the bill seeks to correct a situation which exists only in the imaginations of certain members and other people. If you see discrimination in any particular instance, point it out. I believe that you will not find it in the past or present and I sincerely hope, as a Canadian, that you will never find it in the future.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to speak on Bill No. C-9 and also to express sentiments which I hold on the subject of non-discrimination. It is my view, as has already been said by the speakers who have preceded me, that there is no feeling on the part of anyone that there should be discrimination.

Having said that, it is my view that Bill C-9 serves no useful purpose. It is unnecessary. The matter has already been taken care of. There is no case or example of discrimination in the civil service before us and therefore I find it impossible to support the bill. I might add that a similar bill has been before the house for debate on three different occasions and each time advanced by the same sponsor. I have checked the records and I find that no other member of the C.C.F. or new party group other than the sponsor has spoken on the bill. I am wondering whether he has any support from that corner of the house for this measure.

I have already indicated that existing legislation covers the situation. If that is true, and I shall attempt to show that it is, I wonder why the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has insisted on bringing this bill forward on so many occasions. I should like to ask him what his motives were in bringing the bill forward.

Mr. Howard: Motives of decency.

Mr. Kindt: I wonder whether there are not deeper motives behind the bill, whether it is not perhaps designed to win votes in his riding or to gain some particular end that he is seeking to achieve. He has not disclosed these things and we can only surmise. However, I will take the bill just as it is and speak on this subject because in my opinion it is important. I am in agreement with the principle of non-discrimination and, as the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) said, good should come out of this debate. Each speaker will have an opportunity to express himself and from that some good is bound to come.

I should like to quote from the speech made by the hon. member for Skeena on February 19, 1960 when he introduced a similar bill. As found on page 1271 of Hansard, he said:

> The bill which is before the house is very short. It merely seeks to make the present Canada Fair Employment Practices Act applicable to Her Majesty, her servants and agents of Her Majesty, or, in effect, applicable to the civil service and to employees in the government service. This, of course, does not suggest that with regard to the employment of civil servants there exists at the present time any such discrimination because of the factors that I set out earlier. In fact, I think I can say without any contradiction or any qualification that no such discrimination enters into the employment of candidates for the civil service.

Note these words from the mouth of the sponsor of the bill:

> In fact, I think I can say without any contradiction or any qualification that no such discrimination enters into the employment of candidates for the civil service.

He says there is none and yet he wants this particular measure applied to the civil service. For what reason? The present Civil Service Act is designed to take care of the problem if it should arise. The hon. member did not refer to any particular case. If the hon. member could point to some incident where an individual had been discriminated against by the civil service authorities or by some department of the government then we would have a case before us and something to debate and get our teeth into. But here we are talking in the abstract. We are being asked to pass a piece of legislation and make it applicable to the civil service when it has no particular applicability. We are not correcting anything. There is no case before us to show there has been any discrimination within the civil service. I should like to refer to the Civil Service Act, chapter 48 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. Section 19 reads as follows:

> Except where otherwise expressly provided, all appointments to the civil service shall be upon competitive examination under and pursuant to this act, and shall be during pleasure; but no appointment, whether permanent or temporary, shall be made to a local position within a province, and no employee shall be transferred from a position in a province to a local position in the same or in another province, whether permanent or temporary, until and unless the candidate or employee has qualified by examination ...

In section 25 we find the following:

> 1. Competitive examinations shall be held by the commission to establish lists of persons eligible for appointment.
> 2. Such examinations may be written or oral or in the form of a demonstration of skill or any combination of these, and they shall be of a character fairly to test and determine the relative fitness and ability of candidates actually to perform the duties of the class to which they seek to be appointed, and any investigation of training and experience and any test of technical knowledge, manual skill, or physical fitness that, in the judgment of the commission, serves to this end may be employed.

In other words, the situation seems to be working very well under the Civil Service Act as it now stands. These examinations are open to everyone. There is a clause in the act which entitles war veterans to a preference, and I am sure everyone agrees with that. The Civil Service Act cannot be construed as containing any discrimination. The very essence of non-discrimination can be read between the lines in all parts of this act. Having worked as a civil servant for the federal government for a short time myself, I realize that what every civil servant wants is security. He wants to have good working conditions and he likes to be doing a job that he feels is important. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill were enacted it would do nothing to assist the present civil servant in the discharge of his duties or improve his life as a civil servant. In other words, the passage of this bill will not benefit present civil servants.

The purpose of the bill, therefore, must be to provide for non-discrimination in the hiring of new civil servants. On a previous occasion the sponsor of this bill made a statement that it is not possible to legislate against the state of mind. I thoroughly agree with him on that point. It is impossible to legislate to cover the way in which a person will act when he is acting as a result of a state of mind. In other words, his intolerance or discrimination may be the result of acting by intuition. Certainly the bill which is before us would not help in preventing that individual from acting according to his state of mind. If this bill were enacted it would not prevent intolerance or discrimination. I think a better approach to the situation would be from the point of view of education. In this way people can be shown that we are all created equal and that, given the opportunity, each one performs different skills equally well.

In drawing my remarks to a close, I want to say again that in so far as this bill is concerned the matter is already covered by the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. This act takes care of the problem in so far as industry is concerned. The Civil Service Act takes care of the problem in so far as civil servants are concerned. If a revision of the Civil Service Act is to be undertaken, perhaps this matter could be referred to the committee dealing with the matter and, in this way, the question of discrimination could be given proper and thorough consideration.

I have already made the point that it is not possible to legislate in connection with a state of mind. Another point is that no evidence has been brought forward to indicate there has been discrimination in any particular segment of the civil service. In my view, this fact relieves the house of any necessity for taking immediate action. I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I must, because of the unnecessary aspect of this bill, cast my vote against it at this time.

Mr. Joseph Slogan (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to participate in the debate on this Bill No. C-19. At the outset, I may say I am in favour of the provisions of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. However, my position on the bill before us this afternoon is along the lines of the positions of previous speakers we have heard today. I may say I am rather disappointed that the sponsor of this bill did not see fit to make a statement at the commencement of this debate to bring us up to date on his views on the bill. I am disappointed also that no other member of the C.C.F. has taken part in the debate thus far, especially since they are now members of the New Democratic party and their views may have changed somewhat from those previously held. It is disappointing also to see that the Liberal party has not participated in this debate. I suppose the members of that party feel the bill is rather superfluous because the interest they are showing is very small. I believe there are only three members of that group sitting in the house at the moment.

However, since the sponsor of the bill has not made a statement, I think the words he used in introducing the bill, as they are found at page 1270 of Hansard for February 19, 1960, might be usefully repeated. He said:

> The Canada Fair Employment Practices Act came into effect on July 1, 1953 and, in short, it provides that no employer shall discriminate in so far as the employment of employees or the terms or conditions of employment are concerned because of race, national origin, colour or religion. The act also prevents an employer from using the facilities of a hiring agency which discriminates on grounds of race, national origin, colour or religion, and it provides, further, that a trade union shall not discriminate against its members or prevent potential members from becoming members of that union, and that it shall not expel them from the union on grounds of race, national origin, colour or religion. The act also prevents a trade union expelling a member because he lodges a complaint under this particular measure. Procedures are described, and penalties are provided for infringement.

As I stated at the beginning, I am wholeheartedly in favour of this act as I am sure are most of the members of this house. The hon. member who preceded me mentioned that the sponsor of this bill had indicated that he had no knowledge of any discrimination within the civil service to which this bill is primarily directed and he gave a quotation. I should also like to give a quotation, but a different one. It is from page 477 of the debates of the House of Commons of the session of 1960-61, volume 1, and is as follows:

> I am quite sure, and there is no shadow of a doubt in my mind—and I am sure there is no shadow of a doubt in the mind of anyone in this house—that the intent of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act is followed by the civil service commission in its function of employing people. I am also quite sure that no discrimination exists on these bases whatsoever.

Therefore I believe the sponsor himself has admitted that the bill is rather superfluous. As the hon. member who preceded me has stated, if there were in the civil service any examples of discrimination, he certainly could have a basis for arguing for and supporting this bill.

As I stated, the chief purpose of this bill is to extend the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act to bind Her Majesty in right of Canada and the servants and agents of Her Majesty in right of Canada. At the present time I believe that crown corporations are also covered under this act. Section 3 (m) reads as follows:

> 3. This act applies to and in respect of employment upon or in connection with any work, undertaking or business that is within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada, including, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing, . . .
> [Mr. Slogan.]
> (m) the employment by any corporation established to perform any function or duty on behalf of the government of Canada of employees.

Therefore this bill seems to restrict itself primarily to the civil service and I should like to make some remarks in this connection. As has already been stated by most of the members, I believe the civil service commission has always followed the policy of no discrimination. I do not believe they have ever transgressed the principles that are laid down in the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act in so far as race, colour or religion are concerned. Any difference in treatment of applications can be attributed to national origin which has been imposed by requirements of the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

As has already been stated by a number of those who have spoken, the civil service commission have seen fit to modify their application forms where it has been found that any of the questions contained therein do not comply with the provisions of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. I believe they are always vigilant in this regard and that wherever possible they remove any question which may carry any hint of any discrimination in hiring for the civil service of Canada.

There is one thing that I should like to bring out. If this act were to come into effect the situation would be this. In essence, under the provisions for the review of infringements I believe there is set up an industrial disputes commission or industrial inquiry commission and that the recommendations of this commission may be made final and binding through orders issued by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). In other words, at the present time any infringement of the Civil Service Act would be dealt with by the civil service commission which reports directly to parliament and not to any minister. Thus any disputes which may arise are removed from any political influence. If this act were to come into effect it would in essence place the binding decision with respect to any dispute in the hands of the minister. Knowing the Minister of Labour whom I consider to be a good friend and for whom I have a high regard, I might say that in some instances the decision he might reach might be even more just than one that could be reached by the civil service commission. None the less, to me it is strange that the sponsor of this bill would wish that this happen. I am sure that he would be one of the last ones to deny that the civil service commission should be completely free from any act of political interference or jurisdiction.

As I have stated, there is a modification of terms in the application forms of the civil service commission; and I believe that the act which is being revised at the present time will perhaps go even further in changing some of the requirements for admission to the civil service. I am thinking particularly of that specification which limits applicants to British subjects with five years residence in Canada. It is my own hope—and I hope my feeling is shared by members of the government—that perhaps this requirement can be changed in order to give Canadians any preference that may be given under the act.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

232. Departmental administration, $3,455,378.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned the debate at five o'clock, I was just about to state that Canada is quite right in promoting negotiations to the extreme limit in view of the international issues to be settled.

But those negotiations should be effected, as was stated by several members who preceded me, firmly, wisely and with unity between members of the alliance. And that unity which the allies must strengthen further will only be achieved by greater mutual confidence. Now, that confidence will not be generated in isolation, but in co-operation and by a co-ordination of all efforts.

That is why I submit that the stand of this government in respect of such organizations as NATO and NORAD is the wisest stand possible. For instance, I think that in view of this collective defence, the 14 NATO nations will have to draw more closely together to establish among themselves that mutual trust which will enable them to form a solid bloc so that negotiation can be as efficient as possible with regard to the objectives to be achieved.

Since the Soviet government resumed its nuclear tests and since our southern neighbours decided to counter with similar tests, though theirs are underground and laboratory tests, the Canadian people shiver with apprehension and wonder what this country has in terms of civil defence.

Before coming back here for the second part of the session I found that several citizens from that fine riding of Sherbrooke, which is perhaps not familar to you, Mr. Chairman, but which, like many other ridings in this country, is composed of peaceful Canadians who want only to prosper in the sun in all dignity and freedom, were worrying about what they should do for their protection in the event of a nuclear attack and with regard to the damaging effects of strontium 90, of which a fall-out has again been noted following the resumption of the tests.

According to the information secured, we know that an order in council was enacted in May 1959 which resulted in a general revision of the duties and the powers relating to civil protection.

That order in council provided that it would be up to the Department of National Defence to set up a warning system for the public, to determine the site of nuclear explosions, to make an estimation of the damages and of the number of victims, to control, supervise and carry out the return operations into the stricken areas, and to give emergency support to municipal and provincial authorities for the maintenance of law and order. The Department of National Health and Welfare was given the responsibility of helping municipalities and provinces set up plans providing for medical and public health emergency services as well as plans for emergency housing, emergency food supplies and welfare.

Through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has been entrusted with the maintenance of law and order, as well as the control and the direction of traffic in case of emergency. Finally, through the emergency measures organization, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has assumed the responsibility for co-ordinating the planning of civil protection at the federal level, for helping provincial and municipal authorities in the preparation of security plans and for keeping in touch with provincial governments and other countries in the matter of civil protection.

In addition to the foregoing, other government departments have emergency duties to perform in fields that normally come under their jurisdiction.

For instance, in a state of emergency, the Department of Agriculture, would advise farmers on what they should do to protect their cattle and their crops against radio-active fall-about. The department of Labour and the unemployment insurance commission would look after emergency control of labour and the Department of Defence Production would set up a skeleton organization which would attend to essential supplies.

On the provincial level, organizations have been established which correspond in general to the federal E.M.O. Those provincial units are concerned with planning for the uninterrupted operation of government at the provincial level; they also help in the implementation of plans to ensure the survival of local communities.

Even though emergency planning involves numerous problems, major progress has been made these last few years, and especially during the past months, as far as the implementation of the plans to guarantee the maintenance of government and the survival of the people in case of emergency.

Already the federal government has started the building of regional headquarters where, in the event of a nuclear war, parts of the federal and provincial governments could operate.

As far as communications are concerned, an organization called the national emergency telecommunication organization has been set up in order to insure the security of communication systems, to provide for replacement routes in danger zones and to stockpile mobile and stationary equipment.

The Department of Defence Production has made considerable progress in the establishment of its war supply agency and it has opened a number of regional offices throughout the country to help in that matter.

In the field of transportation planning, the establishment of skeleton organizations in the provinces is recommended; their task would be to control the use of commercial highway transportation in time of war.

The Department of National Health and Welfare is actively working towards its objective, which is to stockpile medical supplies in premises scattered throughout the country. About $10 million were provided to that end and a number of improvised 200-bed hospitals are to be placed at the disposal of the provinces for emergency cases.

The Department of National Defence has made great progress in the setting up of a warning system for the public with the installation of sirens in key locations and the establishment all across the country of warning centres with a full-time staff.

The drawing up of fall-out shelter plans for private homes has been one of the main undertakings of the federal E.M.O.

The organization also looks after training and frequently offers courses both in various areas and at the civil defence college in Arnprior, maintained and administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Those courses have been attended by federal and provincial representatives, and also by mayors and reeves of several hundreds of municipalities in Canada. In Sherbrooke, the municipal authorities recently selected Colonel Sarto Roy to attend those courses.

Contacts between this organization and local civil defence organizations are also provided for otherwise.

To sum up, I should say that very great progress has been accomplished in the field of emergency measures, and this is why we are able to conclude that the Canadian population has every reason to have confidence in the present administration of this country. The vision of our leaders and their carefulness should lead us to do so.

Before closing my remarks, I should like to put one humble suggestion to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) which might also be put to the cabinet as a whole. It has to do with civil defence. Could not the Department of National Defence and the government consider the possibility of including in their winter works program the development of underground parking lots in municipalities where the population is more than 25,000? Such a project would achieve two objectives. In the civic field, it would alleviate parking and traffic problems in larger cities. In regard to civil defence, those underground parking lots, suitably organized from the standpoint of health and food services, would, in my humble opinion, accommodate adequately the people who would have to take cover in case of emergency.

(Text):

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, the minister reminded us this morning that this was his first presentation of the estimates of the department since he assumed the most important portfolio of Minister of National Defence. I should like to begin my remarks by extending to him my very best wishes on this very important occasion. I should like also to join with him in the tribute he paid to his predecessor whom we all respect as a gallant soldier and as a gentleman and whom we still remember with a great deal of regard and affection.

The minister told us this morning that we are living in a time of stress. He referred particularly to the threat of Soviet domination and the threat of force to attain that domination which overshadows us at the present time and which is indicated in the resumption of the testing of nuclear bombs.

It has been interesting to hear some hon. members draw a parallel between the use of nuclear weapons and the use of gas in the last war. In my opinion a true parallel cannot be drawn. It is true that both sides in the last war had the capability of using gas and of engaging in bacteriological warfare, yet neither side actually did so. Both sides refrained; but that I think was because each side was waiting for the other to start. If we are going to draw an exact parallel with respect to nuclear warheads we must somehow come to a decision in regard to the use of nuclear tactical weapons. While our parallel is based mainly on our thinking about strategic nuclear weapons, the line between tactical nuclear weapons and strategic nuclear weapons is very thin and it is getting thinner with every new scientific development. Therefore, unless we do come to some understanding and agreement about the use of nuclear weapons for tactical purposes, then it is quite possible that the parallel will break down and one side may be tempted to use tactical weapons with nuclear warheads to offset the disadvantage of inferior numbers.

The minister told us also that this threat of Soviet domination was being implemented on many fronts. He listed the economical and political, the ideological and the military fronts. He told us that to combat it counteraction was required in all these areas. To my knowledge this is the first time that any minister has openly acknowledged the importance of the ideological factor and the need for ideological counter-measures.

Hon. members are well aware of my interest in this aspect of national defence; therefore they will understand my disappointment that today the minister chose to confine himself solely to the military aspect of our defence policy. It is well known that the military leaders of the U.S.S.R. and the Chinese republic put the ideological factor first. To them this is paramount and everything else, including economic policy and strategy, military policy and strategy and political manoeuvres, is subordinated to ideological considerations.

In the debate on the estimates of this department last year I made extended reference to this matter, as can be found in Hansard of August 5, at page 7619, and I do not intend to repeat what I said on that occasion. I merely wish to call to the attention of the minister the words of Air Vice Marshal Traill, who said:

> The war of arms, if it comes, is an extension of the ideological war. At the higher levels, military and ideological strategy are one. Together they form the strategy of this world conflict. If we wish to survive it is madness to consider one in isolation from the other. The enemy is very clear on this. He is equally prepared to take an ideological or a military initiative, to use an ideological or a military weapon.

Since these words come from such an eminent military authority, I think they should be given very serious consideration. I ask the minister to do this and I express the hope also that he will have something more to say on this important subject later on in this debate. At the same time I should like to compliment the minister on the ideological awareness which he has displayed on several occasions since taking office. That awareness is evident also in the statement he made this morning in his reference to the ideological implications of unilateral disarmament and of peaceful coexistence which, in my opinion, is an effective answer to those who urged coexistence upon us in the debate which took place a few days ago.

We have Mr. Khrushchev's own words about peaceful coexistence, and I should like to put them on record at this time. Mr. Khrushchev has spoken a hundred times on peaceful coexistence. The most precise definition he has given of it appeared in a speech he delivered at Novosibrisk some time ago. He said:

> Peaceful coexistence must be properly understood. It represents a continuation of the struggle between two social systems, but a struggle carried on by peaceful means, without war and without interference in the internal affairs of other countries. For us it is an economic, political and ideological struggle, not a trial of military strength.

The plain fact is that peaceful coexistence does not mean peace but struggle, and we would do well to follow the minister's lead and explain this to our people at every opportunity.

The minister also told us this morning that the cornerstone of Canada's foreign policy was collective security based on a system of alliances as signified by NATO, NORAD and the United Nations organization. He pointed out:

> The strength of union is the sum of the individual members.

And also:

> Only so long as the will of the individual member remains steadfast will the coalition be strong and its will to stand together be abundantly clear to any would be aggressor.

These two statements which I have quoted in the reverse order from which the minister made them point up the need for a positive unifying force in NATO. At present we are unified in NATO mainly by fear, by fear of the threat that faces us, but fear is never satisfactory as a source of unity, as we know from our experience in the last world war. Many nations then bound themselves together and called themselves united nations but as soon as the immediate threat disappeared the unity disappeared along with it. In my opinion maximum unity cannot be attained until we have worked out a clear-cut ideological objective which will challenge the communist and non-communist world alike.

Last year I advocated the setting up of an ideological strategy board which I outlined on page 7623 of Hansard, and I again ask the minister to give consideration to this suggestion.

All hon. members regardless of party will find themselves in full agreement with the two objectives outlined by the minister this morning, namely peace by preventing war and the prevention of our subjection to a foreign power. To these I should like to add a third objective, namely that we should work together to create a new moral climate from which a true and lasting peace can result. In the debate that was concluded yesterday we heard something about the lessons of history. The lessons of history teach us that peace never follows disarmament. That was the lesson of world war I and world war II. True disarmament can only follow a true peace and a true peace can only result from a climate which develops out of the practice of moral values.

Although general objectives are convenient for the purpose of making a brief summary or for giving a broad outline of policy, I feel it would be more helpful and certainly more conducive to an orderly debate if these general objectives could be broken down into a number of specific objectives. For the benefit of the committee I have listed a number of objectives which in my opinion should comprise a defence policy for Canada. I should like to place them on the record in the following order:

1. To maintain a strong, healthy and sound economy capable of withstanding economic attack and of providing at the same time a strong economic base for a total defence effort.

2. Within the limits of manpower and economic capacity, to make the maximum contribution of men, machines and weapons for the defence of Canadian territory by land, sea and air against any aggressor.

3. To defend the Canadian people against ideological penetration and aggression.

4. To develop and maintain the highest possible morale both among the armed forces and the civilian population; to develop the will to resist aggression, to survive and to win.

5. Within the limits of manpower and economic capacity (a) to make the maximum contribution to the continental defence system of North America through NORAD; (b) to make the maximum contribution to the defence of the rest of the free world through NATO; (c) to meet our commitments and obligations to the United Nations organization and to increase its effectiveness.

6. To maintain a fully mobile force of the order of a brigade group that can be put at the disposal of the United Nations to help extinguish small brush-fire wars before they can develop into big ones.

7. To develop and maintain an adequate program of civil defence, including defence against nuclear flash and fall-out, together with the necessary organization of personnel and equipment to make it effective.

8. To promote the fall-out shelter as the symbol of our will to survive.

9. To offset the "Maginot line" psychology engendered by defence thinking, planning and training and by means of ideological training to enable both service personnel and civilian population to go on the offensive and take ideological initiatives. This is the only area where offensive action is possible but it is a most vital one.

10. To maintain a proper balance of manpower and materials as between defence requirements, including defence industries, and civilian requirements so that the one will not undermine the other or impair the economy as a whole.

11. To achieve the best defence value for every defence dollar.

12. To preserve—I think this is most important—the prestige and honour of service in defence of one's country as one of the highest and noblest professions.

While there might be no disagreement with the general objectives stated by the minister there might be room for disagreement as to specific objectives and the methods by which they may be attained. In particular, I think there is room for disagreement as to the means of making the maximum contribution. It is open to question whether Canada's maximum contribution can be made best through more up-to-date and efficient equipment or through increased manpower as the minister advocated this morning.

I think there is also some room for disagreement whether we are really getting the best value for the defence dollar. Certainly when we look to the role of the navy there is room for doubt, in spite of what the minister told us this morning, that we are really getting the best defence for our tax dollar. It is true that the minister is going to man the navy to full strength but those destroyers are not capable of dealing with the type of submarines now possessed by the enemy. Certainly if we are going to place emphasis again on the use of conventional weapons we must think more about the conventional role, and the types of warships that we have at the present time are not very useful in this regard.

I think that the government should give more consideration to the use of hydrofoil vessels for naval purposes, as they are now developed to the point where they can deal more effectively with submarines and can be used for the rapid transportation of troops and equipment. I think possibly we should also be thinking about the use of killer submarines.

There is no doubt in my mind that we cannot obtain the maximum value for the tax dollar until our services are completely unified at the top operational level. Here I wish to point out that I am not talking about the kind of unification we have had so far which has resulted in an increase in personnel rather than a decrease. While I am on the subject of the tax dollar, I should like to draw to the committee's attention the parallel of Sweden. Sweden is a small country with a population of 7.5 million people. Her defence budget for 1960 was the equivalent of $550 million, Canadian, and that is comparable to an expenditure for Canada of $1,320 million. This year we are spending something of the order of $1,600 million.

For Sweden's $1,320 million, this is what the people get. They have an army of 250,000 troops, 14 divisions of first line troops; an air force of 1,000 first line aircraft, most of which are interceptors and ground attack fighters. For the navy, Sweden gets approximately the same number of ships as the Royal Canadian Navy, but uses only about one third the number of personnel we do. They will soon have included in their navy 33 modern submarines, some of which have anti-sub capabilities.

In so far as civil defence is concerned, for an expenditure of about $200 million, Canadian, in 1958 and declining to $55 million in 1960, the Swedish government is providing the nation with civil defence measures which include not only warning, information, fall-out shelters, evacuation plans, and re-entry organizations but also blast shelters in literally every city over 50,000 people. Over one half million Swedes have been given intensive civil defence training in one role or another. Every new building in Sweden includes a fall-out shelter costing about 2 per cent of the over-all construction cost. People living in older buildings pay toward the cost of public blast shelters which are nearby for their use.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was the cost for 1960?

Mr. Carter: It was $200 million in 1958, declining to $55 million in 1960. I think when you compare what Sweden gets for her defence dollar with what we, in Canada, are getting for our defence dollar, the discrepancy is very apparent.

It is evident from what the minister said this morning that the government has reconsidered and reversed its stand on the threat from manned bombers.

Mr. Chambers: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Carter: I have only five minutes left, so I would rather wait to the end. If I heard the minister correctly this morning, he said:

> The bomber, if unopposed, is the best and most effective way of delivering atomic weapons. It is necessary, therefore, that we maintain a defence against such a threat as long as it is in existence. We do not know how many long range missiles of adequate accuracy the Russians possess, but we do know the number is limited. On the contrary, it is a fact that they have a considerable number of manned aircraft in operation and should an attack be decided upon it must be presumed that these would be used.

Now, in my opinion, this view stands out in sharp contrast to what we were told two years ago, that the threat of manned bombers was decreasing and, in fact, had decreased to such an extent as to justify the destruction of the Avro Arrow which to many Canadians, I think, was a symbol of Canadian achievement. The armed forces are being trained in an operational role in which we hope they will never have to be employed. There is also a peacetime role which is now, and always will be, necessary. I should like to think that our armed forces form the backbone of our nation. We have seen in recent years how countries like Pakistan and Burma have had to fall back on the military forces when their democratic processes broke down. Only a few weeks ago we saw Brazil probably being saved from communism by the positive action of their military forces.

Now, the real strength of any nation is national character. I should like to close by quoting the words of Mr. Edison, a secretary of the United States navy in 1940, who said as follows:

> There is one ingredient in national defence which transcends all others. It is born of the hearts of our people and it may be called national character. Without character and a deep-seated moral armament bred into the fibre of our citizens, no matter in what walk of life they may perform their civil tasks, there will be little worth defending. The navy is responsible for the training, welfare and discipline of its personnel. But these are few. A hundred and thirty seven million others—

That was in 1940 and today he would say a hundred and eighty million or a hundred and ninety million others.

> —must know why their country lives and is worthy of living.

I think if we can instill in the minds and hearts of our armed services personnel the thought that they have a role as the backbone of our country, then that will go a long way towards restoring the prestige and honour of service which the armed services used to enjoy and which made it one of the noblest and highest professions.

Mr. Chambers: Will the hon. member permit a question now? I was wondering if the hon. gentleman, in his comparison with Sweden, was advocating that our armed services be paid at the same rates of pay as Sweden's?

Mr. Carter: Well, I think that is a false comparison. The Swedish forces are paid on a scale which enables them to enjoy a standard of living comparable to that enjoyed by our forces.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I consider it a great honour and privilege to take some small part in this debate on the subject of Canadian defence. I take a great personal interest in Canada's defence and am not ashamed to stand and speak about it because I was a volunteer in the last great war. I do not relish the thought of a third great war. Nevertheless after reading the newspapers and hearing reports from abroad, I could not be sure that the third great war has not already started. We certainly have got to the point in international blackmail where it is hard for a man with red blood in his veins to sit idly by while our children and our children's children are poisoned from the skies in a cynical fashion. If the Russians do not know that this is a war against humanity, then it is time every free man in the world stood up and said what it is. Whether we have to retaliate in kind now or later, we do not know. We pray it may never come.

Let me take you back a thousand years or so for a few moments because if there is any use in reading history, it is to try to learn some of the lessons which history has to give manking. I take you back to the days of Ancient Greece. Ancient Greece was a medium sized nation like Canada, these people were by and large simple, decent people who like to work in the lumberwoods and to sail the seas. They were in short industrious and free men. A great nation called Persia wished to extend her empire into Greece. Amongst the Greeks in those days, as in Canada today, there were many well meaning persons who hated war and who preached pacifism, tolerance and brotherhood; and well they might do so. But this did not deter Persia. Persia amassed an army of 10 million men. She moved down on little Greece and as she came, city after city offered gifts of earth and water which were the symbols of subservience. Athens, the greatest of Greek cities, was civilized. She liked ease, luxury and pleasure. She had those things. She was offered a dishonourable peace and refused. The few who wanted to fight marched against the Persian host and those who did not want to fight waited at home. The few who fought, won. The Persian king could not understand his defeat and he asked those around him why Greece did not fall. Nobody could answer him. I think I can answer him. I think that character won and will always win.

The challenge today is the same as it was 3,000 years ago. We face this same disaster, if you like to call it that. But we do not have to go down to defeat. A bully and a slave never fights like a free man. I will go further than that and say that if you can convince this bully that you intend to fight like a free man, the chances are that you will never have to do so. I think that world war II started not in September of 1939 but at Munich. I hope that world war III has not already started. If it has not already started, I think it is time that all free men stood together and that they make it clear where they stand.

Some hon. members in this chamber have suggested getting out of NORAD. Why get out of NORAD? We cannot get out of NORAD. They say we lose sovereignty by being in NORAD. If we are not in NORAD we lose everything. There is no choice. Those who say we give up our sovereignty should read history as well. Let us go back once more for a lesson from Greek history. Athens, which was the greatest city in Greece, gave up leadership to her hated sister city Sparta in the war because she thought Sparta could carry arms better than she could. Victory was won again because Athens put freedom ahead of pride. As a Canadian I put freedom ahead of the pride of Canadians and say that if our great neighbour the U.S.A. has the armed strength to deter nuclear war and the conventional strength to fight a conventional war, then I am going to be morally strong enough to stand beside them and for a short time share sovereignty with them. I am not afraid to share sovereignty with people who have never waged an aggressive war. Slow as they were to come into two wars which they did not start, they helped us in a magnificent fashion to finish them. I am not one who is afraid that even in a nuclear war or in a conventional war the slave nation which is Russia can whip the nation which is with us in our struggle to remain free.

To get down to hardware, may I say this. I have always stood for Canada being strong at home and generous abroad. She cannot be strong at home without the hardware. However, there is a limit to the price we can pay for the hardware. Those who argue about the value of the CF-105 and the CF-104 might well consider that when you are buying a child a rattle, if the rattle is made of diamonds and gold it cannot be afforded by a middle sized nation like us. I think the 104 aircraft is equal to if not superior in many ways to the 105. I have taken the trouble to go and see it. Our airmen have tested it. The airmen are glad to have it and I am proud to have some small part in providing them with this magnificent weapon. This weapon will also be built in Canada. It will be built by Canadair in Montreal. I would urge hon. members to go down there and see it being made. It is a magnificent weapon.

To those hon. members who say that this government has no defence policy, I say they are not abreast of the times. This government has and has always had a defence policy. That policy is to provide our people morally and physically with the weapons with which to defend freedom. However, we must do it within our economic structure. We are also going to build training planes in Canada. This is going to help our economy. It is going to balance our economy and add payroll to our working force. It is a proper and well thought out policy.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I know where I stand, I know where my government stands, and I know where the great majority of the people of Canada stand. I welcome what has been done as far as the government has gone. I can only hope that we expand our idea of national service and tell the young people of Canada and the old people also what it means to be a Canadian and that the price of freedom cannot come too high.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, this is the first opportunity I have had since I have come to this house to enter a debate on Canada's national defence policy. I value this opportunity although, as do most other modest members, I shrink from it as I come to the responsibility of criticizing the defence policy of the government with little in the way of formal preparation. I make no apology, however, for the fact that my service during the last war was in a women's service and that it was only as an enlisted woman. Perhaps it may seem peculiar to those who sit in this chamber and who had high rank to know that a sergeant also thinks about what may happen in the future of her country. But I make no apology, Mr. Chairman, because, as have most people in Canada, I have been spending the past several years in particular with an increasing awareness of the discussions in the popular press of what was happening through the Department of National Defence in an effort to maintain a defence of Canada. May I say that in the past four years it has been a record indeed worth watching. I think it has indicated, as did the announcement this morning by the Minister of National Defence who has been unkindly called the minister of national pretence, the almost pathological penchant of this government for guessing wrong. We have seen what happened less than a year ago where a spokesman of the Department of Labour and indeed the Prime Minister announced to the country that unemployment was not a problem because it would go with the snow. Through 1961 we watched a deepening recession. We watched the growing number of unemployed. We found that finally the government came to acknowledge that there was in fact an unemployment problem in Canada and feeble efforts were then made to right the situation.

Perhaps even more important was something heard by hon. members who were in this chamber a year ago, when the Minister of Finance brought down his budget. The minister said it would be a tremendous gamble for Canada to be involved in any program of devaluing the dollar. Then we saw him completely swallow his tail a few months ago and come out with a program for the devaluation of the dollar.

Mr. Hicks: A successful one too.

Miss LaMarsh: That remains to be seen. In defence as well we had the Prime Minister on February 20, 1959, announcing to this house, as reported at page 1221 of Hansard, that because the experts—nameless then, as now—had indicated that the day of the modern, long range bomber was over, the proudest achievement which Canada had ever made, the production of the Avro Arrow, was to cease at once and would be no more.

The government then launched upon probably its most ineffective policy, the defence of Canada through two Bomarc installations. It was incredible to me then, as it is now, being out in the country, to read in the press of this murder most foul. This involved not only the destruction of the jobs of the people then employed at that plant, the almost desolating of the area and the loss to Canada of a magnificently trained team, but also the destruction of a weapon into which a great deal of money had gone and which at that time appeared superior to anything elsewhere in the world.

Perhaps even more incredible was the cutting of the body into small pieces and the burying of it deep. But in this as in other matters, as William Shakespeare once said, "Murder will out". The Arrow will come back to fly again and to show the people of Canada that what this government has done again has been to take the wrong path. I do not suggest that this particular aircraft can be resurrected. The plant and the personnel are gone. The government in this one particular, at least, did a complete job.

That was an aircraft which meant more than just a piece of hardware not only to the pilots who might be flying it but to the people of Canada. It was an aircraft which was specifically designed for the needs of our forces. This was a crown corporation set up to create a piece of weaponry to the specifications of the department. It was an all-weather aircraft. It had a speed which, with the completed engine, would have been 1,500 miles an hour. It was able to climb and to operate at 75,000 feet.

Mr. Chambers: How long could it stay in the air?

Mr. Hellyer: Not as long as the parliamentary secretary will.

Miss LaMarsh: It was a weapon which would have made Canada at this particular date more capable of defending herself than she is today. The Globe and Mail, which is not always a supporter of this government, published an editorial on February 21, 1959 called "The Beginning—and the End". The editorial was with reference to the demise of the Arrow program and the writer said what everyone in Canada then said:

> We are in no position to judge the exact merits or life of the Arrow; on that subject, there is a welter of conflicting opinions. But this Canadian-developed airplane is not the important thing—it might as well have been a Canadian-developed locomotive or automobile. The important thing, the only important thing, is the future of the engineering, technical and research establishment that brought the Arrow into being.

That, of course, was dissipated by this government. It was dissipated to the United States, whence we now must draw our weapons. In any event, at that time all hon. members of parliament and many people in the country were stunned at the government's decision to do away with this program. No one knew exactly what information the government was acting upon, whether it had some particular information which led it to believe that missiles and missiles alone were to be used in any possible assault upon Canada. Thus, the country stunned, waited to see what this government would produce in the way of defence.

I think one of the most important things was that those weapons, the Avro Arrow, were produced in Canada by Canadian workmen who received wages and paid taxes to this country. Since that time it has been necessary for us to rely upon weapons which are produced in other countries, which do not produce the same taxes but which must be paid for out of Canadian taxes.

The Arrow was made to order for the geographical facts and the climatic conditions of northern Canada. It was the only one prepared with those specifications. When the government decided it would be no more, it launched itself upon a program in which our defence reduced itself to two Bomarc installations. These of course were part of a chain of Bomarc installations. I think there is probably no one in Canada who is at this moment a resident of an area closer than I am to a Bomarc installation which is already armed with nuclear warheads. In Niagara Falls, New York, which is a few miles from my home across the river from my constituency, a weapon is ready. There are, in addition, Nike Zeus installations which are armed with nuclear warheads.

The Bomarc was wanted by this minister's predecessor and by government spokesmen, to be a sort of Maginot line. First it was wanted as a protection of Canada and second as a protection for the nuclear deterrent in the United States. Such pretence has already been exploded. It defends nothing. Its range is so limited, and its speed is—

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Its range is longer than that of the Arrow.

Miss LaMarsh: That, of course, is not correct. The flying range of the Arrow was some 2,500 miles.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): You had better read it again.

An hon. Member: Smarten up.

Miss LaMarsh: I have to refer to the Vancouver Sun of June 14, 1961, which reads as follows:

An hon. Member: That is not very accurate.

An hon. Member: Don't believe all you read.

Miss LaMarsh: This article in the Vancouver Sun contains the following:

> The Arrow was expensive. It was also a lot of airplane. It flew 1,400 miles an hour. It had an operational ceiling of 75,000 feet. It could break the sound barrier while climbing. Its range was officially stated to be considerably more than 2,500 miles.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Three hundred.

Miss LaMarsh: From this I take my information. In any event, what we have now is the Bomarc with a 200 mile range, and the Bomarc—

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Four hundred.

Mr. Drysdale: Yes, 400.

Miss LaMarsh: I am sorry. I must accept it has a 400 mile range. I take this again from the Globe and Mail of May 4, 1961. This editorial is entitled "Ban the A-Bomarc". The editorial continues:

> The Bomarc has been the object of expert controversy, and even the claims made for it are poor enough to raise serious doubts. It has a 400-mile radius of action, which makes nonsense of the story that the two Bomarc bases at North Bay and Mount Laurier are essential to Canadian defence. Those bases belong to a chain of 10 launching sites designed for the protection of U.S. cities. Even supposing the Bomarc did intercept an enemy bomber (and its published score so far—

And this was in May of this year:

> —is nine failures out of 22 trial interceptions) the resultant explosion would be so close to Canada's major population centres as to endanger—by radiation fall-out if nothing worse—the greater part of our population. In fact, the Bomarc is incapable of intercepting the only major weapon of intercontinental attack today, the ballistic missile.

And yet, that was the purpose for which the government introduced the Bomarc as Canada's defence. It appeared that this would be the weapon of defence which the government was to provide for Canada. The Russians have warned that the day of the manned bomber was not over. According to an article in the Montreal Star of July 28, 1961 the Russians have produced a bomber called the Bounder which is said to be capable of speeds as high as 1,600 miles an hour or more than twice the speed of sound. The Bounder was revealed at the Moscow air show. The government and its advisers then for the first time appeared to be aware that there was in fact a manned bomber threat and that what they had counted upon as providing defence for Canada would be insufficient. They then had to make the about face to which I referred earlier.

I was amused to note a number of editorial comments about whether the government had been improperly advised in the first instance. I wish to draw to the attention of the committee a comment made by Livingston Merchant, United States ambassador, at the time the latest aircraft was introduced in Canada. I think this comment is most apt. I refer to an article in the Ottawa Journal of July 25, 1961 under the signature of Gordon Dewar. The ambassador, speaking for those who felt the manned fighter was out of date:

> —recalled "Hobbes' observation that hell is truth seen too late".

I suggest that this is the position in which the government finds itself today. After months of delay the government entered into negotiations with the United States and has now accepted for use by our air force the Voodoo aircraft. This has been compared with the Arrow, obviously. It appears to fall short of it in performance. It is, of course, a design that is ten years old. It is an aircraft that is no longer being produced in the United States. We will be accepting this aircraft from some Californian bases. It is unlikely that it will last even as long as the aircraft which it is now replacing. Its fastest recorded speed is 1,200 miles an hour, although as I pointed out the Bounder is alleged to have a speed of 1,600 miles an hour. Its ceiling is, I think, 52,000; its range, 2,800 miles. I wonder if the government will try to justify the Voodoo on the basis that it is inexpensive, since it cannot in any way be a weapon which will defend Canada. We have the word of the Prime Minister and of the former minister of national defence to the effect that the manned bomber is no longer a threat, although the present minister has today changed his mind on this subject.

Are these to be the only weapons upon which we rely? Will we rely upon them together with the Bomarc? We have now received or are to receive in Canada four weapons including the Bomarc—there are two installations shortly to be armed with something—the Starfighter which is to be delivered to our NATO troops, the Honest John and the Voodoo.

Numerous statements have been made by the present Minister of National Defence and by the Prime Minister with respect to at least one of these weapons to the effect that they will not fulfil their capabilities without nuclear warheads.

Throughout this country there has been raging for many months, and indeed since the death of the Arrow, a controversy about whether or not Canada will become a nuclear power. We have waited now some ten or 11 months in this session of parliament to ascertain what is the government's intention. It depends upon whose statements you read and at what time they were made, whether you listen to the Minister of National Defence, whether you listen to the Prime Minister—and on what occasion—or whether you listen to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On one hand we see pressure for disarmament. On the other hand we see pressure to enter the nuclear club. As yet, there is no decision. I ask, Mr. Chairman, how any intelligent decision can be made as to how this country can be armed and defended unless the government will make up its mind and will make clear its policy concerning what it intends to use to defend us. Is the Bomarc, an expensive installation, to be used with non-nuclear warheads? Is the Honest John to be used with non-nuclear warheads? Is the Voodoo to be equipped with the Genie or is the Voodoo to be equipped with non-nuclear warheads? This, of course, is at the crux of the question of the defence policy or lack of defence policy of this government. The whole country has been awaiting the defence debate in order to ascertain what the policy of the government will be.

The policy of my party has been clear for some time, with respect to the acceptance of nuclear weapons here. It has been repeated again and again. We do not accept at this time nuclear weapons on our soil. We have nothing to gain from accepting such weapons. Although it is not impossible that there may be in the future, there is not at the moment any weapon which will defend against missiles. There is the Nike Zeus which has a limited range and certain defects because it cannot ascertain whether it is heading for a missile or some of the debris that falls away from the missile.

There is at this time no weapon which Canada can acquire which will necessarily constitute a defence against missiles. It appears that we are now turning back to acquiring a type of fighter which is supposed to be a defence against manned bombers and yet, in fact, even from the latest information available in the press it appears that the weapon we are to adopt, if not already obsolete, will shortly become obsolete. Are we to be left without defence while this government casts about from one side to another and again waits until it is driven into a corner before making up its mind?

This country requires a policy of defence. We have for this purpose a minister of defence and an associate minister. I charge, Mr. Chairman, that unless they have a clear answer to the question of whether or not we will use nuclear weapons this country will not be convinced that we have in fact any policy of defence for Canada. I would hope that before the debate concludes the minister will find it possible to decide that he will not accept nuclear weapons, that that being the case he will then review the decision as to what weapons Canada intends to use and will perhaps discard some of them. After all, this government has destroyed the Arrow despite the money put into it. The government has already shown itself capable of making a complete about face in the space of a few years. This perhaps is the most important thing the government could ever do, to make a right about face in the minister's apparently deliberate approach to the use of nuclear weapons.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, after the other hon. members who wish to participate in this debate have made their contribution I intend to cover the various points that have been made. However, I do not think I should let any time pass at all in clearing up the complete inaccuracies and misapprehensions which we have just been subjected to, particularly in connection with the Arrow, the F-101 and the Bomarc. To begin with, the opinion so-called which the hon. lady has given to the committee is based chiefly on editorials in Liberal papers—

Miss LaMarsh: The Globe and Mail.

Mr. Harkness: —and are completely inaccurate editorials; in most cases written also chiefly for political purposes. I saw one of those editorials in the Toronto Star not very long ago, in which they stated inaccurately that the F-101, which we have just secured had about half the performance that the Avro Arrow would have had. There are various statements along this line, which are completely false.

In connection with the Avro Arrow, I should like to say first of all that there is no question at all that the decision to go ahead with building the Avro Arrow was the greatest single mistake ever made by any government in Canada in connection with defence equipment matters or in connection with defence production.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister permit a question at this point? It is entirely up to him. Having said that, will the minister agree that it was the single greatest mistake ever perpetrated by a Canadian government to carry on the project for two years after the government changed in 1957?

Mr. Harkness: No, I would not. I will deal with that particular point.

Mr. Hellyer: That is when the change in technology came about.

Mr. Harkness: I know the hon. gentleman knows that he is on a very sticky wicket in connection with the Arrow, and when anybody attempts to make any statement on it he always interrupts. However, the actual situation with respect to the Arrow is this. The previous government took the decision to produce the Arrow without having any idea what the cost was going to be and without having any idea whether any other nation would buy any of those Avro aircraft. In spite of that fact they went ahead; they spent a large amount of money, running into hundreds of millions, in starting production of this aircraft, and when we came into power we found that this program was there. A lot of money had been spent on it, and we made the greatest possible efforts to try and interest other countries in buying this airplane.

Mr. Hellyer: You did not, you wrote a few letters. You never put it in production so it would have a chance.

Mr. Harkness: Hon. gentlemen across the way are so sensitive on this Arrow point that they will not even allow anyone to try to explain the situation. As I say we tried, and tried very hard. I must say the company tried hard also to sell this aircraft to other countries. We were unsuccessful; they were unsuccessful, and eventually we got from them very definite estimates of what the cost was going to be for this airplane. What was the cost going to be, Mr. Chairman? Here it is. This is to be found in the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the defence expenditures committee for 1958 and 1959 at pages 89 and 90. The total cost, as given to the committee at that time, was going to be $2,289 million for 169 aircraft, plus 37 pre-production models, some of which may have been serviceable and could have been used. But the actual number of aircraft that were to come off the line were 169 at $2,289 million. This meant that those aircraft were going to cost per copy the sum of $12.5 million each. This was just completely out of line; it was completely out of reason. If we had proceeded with that program it would have meant that we would have had to devote most of the defence budget, as it was at that time and as it has been since, to pay for those aircraft for some two or three years. In other words, it was just completely out of reason from a financial point of view for Canada to go ahead with the Arrow program. As a result, we took the only course we could take and cancelled that contract.

As I say, it was the worst single mistake any government ever made as far as defence equipment matters are concerned and as far as placing a defence order is concerned.

The hon. lady made a lot of comparisons, on the basis of those newspaper editorials, between the F-101B, which we have just secured, and the Arrow. The actual fact is that the performance of those two aircraft is very comparable indeed. Furthermore, rather than being an indeed. Furthermore, rather than being an old, obsolete aircraft, which is the impression hon. members opposite are trying to convey and have been trying to convey for some time past for purely political reasons, this aircraft is the best two-seater, two-engine interceptor aircraft in operation on this continent at the present time.

Miss LaMarsh: Is it still being produced? Will the minister answer the question? Is it not true that this aircraft is now out of production in the United States?

Mr. Harkness: It is true that they have come to the end of the production line and they have produced all of those aircraft that they are going to produce at the present time. This does not make it an obsolete aircraft. As I say, it is the best two-seater, two-engine interceptor aircraft which the United States or any other of the western nations has in operation for intercontinental defence—

Miss LaMarsh: An American hand-me-down.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. lady says "An American hand-me-down." If she wants to call the best aircraft of its kind in existence and flying an American hand-me-down that is perfectly all right with me. But she has demonstrated in the speech she made that she does not know what the situation is in regard to this aircraft. She does not know what the situation is in regard to the Arrow and she does not know what the situation is in regard to the Bomarc and the other things she has been mentioning.

As I understood her, I think she made the statement that we were getting the Bomarc in order to have a defence against intercontinental ballistic missiles. Nobody ever said that at any time. That is a statement which is completely inaccurate. This statement has been mentioned by one or two other people here today. It has been said here that the Bomarc will not shoot down intercontinental ballistic missiles, and to try to bring that statement into a debate on defence is merely an attempt to confuse the issue. There is no relationship between the Bomarc and intercontinental ballistic missiles.

The two Bomarc squadrons which we are putting and will put into operation in Canada are, as has been stated, part of a chain of ten which protect all of the eastern part of this continent from bomber attack. They were designed against bomber attack. This is their purpose. All of the people who are expert on this have looked into the thing carefully and are convinced that this chain is a very effective defence against manned bombers; and the manned bomber is still the chief threat as far as attack on this continent is concerned.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not intend to reply in detail or at length to this intervention which the minister has just made. However, there are two or three points which must be repudiated immediately. First of all, the former administration did have estimates of the cost of the aircraft before it was put into preproduction. Like most other developmental projects, the cost increased as production went along. This is quite natural. The minister will find this when he comes to pay the bills for some of the things he has been talking about in the last few days. They will exceed by several times the estimates that he has given this house.

Now, the thing that I object to most is the fact that the government has tried to mislead both the house and the country on any information it has ever put out in respect of the Avro Arrow.

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister has taken advantage of the fact that the hon. member for Niagara Falls was misled by a misprint in a newspaper editorial. But let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that after the government had poured hundreds of millions of dollars into this project for two years through 1957 until the end of 1958 and finally decided peremptorily to cancel it without putting anything in its place, resulting in 25,000 or 30,000 men being thrown out on the street, the information on the range of the Avro Arrow which was made public for political purposes by the government was 100 per cent wrong. It was subsequently corrected by the Minister of National Defence himself before the special select committee on defence expenditures, where he revised the range estimates 50 per cent from what they had been previously.

Neither the house nor the country can have any reliance on the figures given by the government in circumstances like these. Not only that, but every man who has ever had anything to do with the development of aircraft knows that pre-production models can have their range increased very substantially as the later marks come along. The Voodoo itself in its earlier models only had half the range it now has in the model which will be used by the Royal Canadian Air Force. The minister knows that and his officials know it, but he is trying to mislead the house and the country by distorting the picture.

Tonight he did the same thing. He got up in the committee and deliberately said that if 200 models of the Avro Arrow had been produced the cost would have been $12 point something million per copy. He knows as well as I do that this is on the basis of the original Canadian designed fire control system. He also knows that that fire control system had been cancelled and the Hughes fire control system substituted for it months before cancellation. He also knows that the substitution of the Hughes fire control system made a difference in the ultimate cost of hundreds of millions of dollars, or millions of dollars per copy. Yet tonight he has the audacity to get up in the committee and once again try to mislead the house and the country in respect of the record with regard to the Avro Arrow. I think this should be deplored, Mr. Chairman, and I hope the minister will not try to do it again.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to say just a word or two. There has been no attempt on my part to mislead the committee and there never has been that I am aware of. I did not go into all of the various complications of the Arrow. I simply said that we found that the Arrow would have cost this amount of money as it had been planned and projected and was being produced under the plans of the previous government. We did get the company to change the fire control system and so forth and they eventually came up with a price of $7,800,000 a copy. It was still an enormous price—

Mr. Hellyer: It is only a difference of $5 million a copy from what you said ten minutes ago.

Mr. Jones: You said your Arrow had been cancelled, and your Arrow was to cost $12 million a copy.

Mr. Harkness: —and the cost would still have been astronomical and completely unrealistic. The hon. member is very sensitive on this matter of the Arrow because he knows that the previous government made a terrible error in ever starting it.

Mr. Hellyer: Nothing comparable to you.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): Mr. Chairman, I believe that the remarks of the hon. member for Niagara Falls have been very well answered by the minister but there was one suggestion in her speech with which I should like to deal very briefly. She said that the industrial and technical capacity of the Malton area had been very much reduced by the cancellation of the Arrow. I do not think that the facts or statistics will bear this out. One only has to drive along highway 400 or 401 or through the Malton area to see the great number of new factories involving highly technical operations that have been built there since the Arrow was cancelled. I think statistics will prove that the industrial and technical capacity of that area have increased greatly from the time the Arrow was being built.

I should like to deal very briefly with two matters concerning national defence. We are living under a very imminent threat of war. If war does come we can be sure that it will not result from any provocative act of any Canadian government nor will it be because of lack of effort on the part of any responsible Canadian to prevent war. Some might argue with a certain amount of logic that if the Russian tests of atomic bombs in the atmosphere continue we are already under attack because of the unmeasured and unknown damage that may be done to future generations by atomic fall-out. If war comes it will not be by accident but by a deliberate act and Canada, if for no other reason than her geographical position, will be involved. Therefore if we have any true faith in democratic principles and if we are a Christian country as we claim to be, we must take all steps necessary to survive. We will do this, not through piecemeal surrender of principles but by our determination to hold on to those things that in our way of life have real value.

For these reasons we cannot overemphasize the need and importance of every Canadian supporting to the fullest the civil defence program, the survival programs of the militia and the emergency measures organization. If these efforts are not worth our physical and material support, then perhaps we should surrender in craven fear to alien philosophies. This is not the course for me and I do not think it is the course for most Canadians.

I should like to turn to another matter of less immediate urgency but of great importance. All Canadians today are worrying about the education and training of our youth for the rigorous times in which they will live their adult lives. We are preoccupied with the lack of schools, teachers and training facilities. We question whether or not we can provide them in the meantime to preserve our way of life. Certain experiences I had this summer have made me think there is in the Department of National Defence a competent and largely unused teaching capacity. This summer I saw three groups of cadets, air cadets, officer training cadets at Camp Borden and militia cadets at Barrie. No one who saw these young men would deny that they are better prepared and adjusted for adult life as a result of their training; nor could anyone honestly say that they had been made militaristic by this training.

As a country lawyer I come into contact in my practice with many young people who have not made a successful adjustment to adult life. As I watched these fine young cadets I could not help but regret that cadet training was not available to far more young Canadians. I hope that the minister and his department will make every effort to extend this excellent youth training to many more thousands of our young people.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I have no intention to speak at any length in this debate, but I want to express a few ideas with regard to some comments we have heard during this discussion.

Everyone, including the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) as well as the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has voiced his ideas on the war threat.

For my part, I believe that in some cases, everyone of those hon. gentleman has exaggerated the danger of war better to justify some steps they are about to take in the field of employment or with regard to increasing our armed forces.

I do not expect a war, but this is my very humble opinion. I do not expect war, in the ordinary sense of the term.

Those who are closely following the speeches and actions of the Soviet leader know that he is mainly interested in two kinds of warfare—first of all economic and then psychological warfare; he is out to fight ideas, and more particularly the ideas of those who do not share his way of life and his way of thinking.

The free world should, none the less, prepare its defence. But it should not go beyond preparedness with regard to defence, because it could then be accused of wanting to be an eventual aggressor. We must indeed build up our defence, keeping in mind the old Latin proverb:

Si vis pacem, para bellum.

I think we should not play into the hand of the Soviets who would have the free world and all nations in the world stand idly by and live in peaceful coexistence with the communist world.

Without trying to teach anyone a lesson, I think we Canadians and the free world in general must not forget that a primary duty of any human being is to avoid doing unto others what we do not want to be done unto us.

If all would obey this rule, there would be no war and NATO would no longer be necessary, any more than NORAD or the United Nations.

We would be united in brotherly understanding, which in itself would ensure peace.

But such is not the case, unfortunately. We all suffer from our downfall and every nation has its ambitions of material as well as spiritual conquest. This is why the free world must not stand idle in the face of the threats levelled against it at this time.

I am inclined to share the views of some hon. members who would want us to withdraw from NORAD. Not so long ago, those same hon. members changed their views a little, since a certain convention; they would even have wanted us to withdraw from NATO. This is an association of free countries which has prevented Soviet leaders from making territorial gains in central Europe, in eastern Europe and in Europe generally, since its foundation in 1949.

I do not recall exactly the number of bilateral agreements the communist world has entered into with several countries since the end of the war; and yet Russia had long given us the assurance of its peaceful intentions.

The free world must wake up at all costs, not only by preparing its defence, but by not remaining idle in the battle undertaken for the conquest of minds by the Soviet world—here I mean its leaders, because there are many millions of Russians who are bowed down under the yoke—and we must not stand idle, I say, in the face of this dreadful threat hovering over our heads.

While we answer through speeches and press releases the leaders of the Soviet state or of a few other satellite countries, the Russian world—I mean its leaders—take action and we retreat. They do things like this for instance: they establish the international friendship university in Moscow which opened last fall. That university will receive the most brilliant students from the continents of Asia and Africa and from Latin American countries. Their travelling expenses will be paid by the Soviet union. Those people will spend four, five or six years at the international friendship university where they will not only receive an academic or technical training but will also be educated in the line of thought of the Soviet leaders and the communist philosophy.

While we are talking, they are building vocational schools, like they did two years ago in Addis Ababa, they are also building hospitals, as they have done as well in Africa, still in Addis Ababa, to give only another example. Africans admitted into these institutions are charged ridiculously low fees or nothing at all, and their minds are infiltrated with the way of thinking of those teachers of atheism and of materialism.

In order also to distract the free world's attention from the actions of the Soviet leaders, the forum of the United Nations is used as well as all the international organizations, where attacks are directed against the free world, with the result that we are constantly on the defensive. For instance, when the Russian world or more specifically Mr. Khrushchev, speaks about the colonialism of capitalistic countries, why not get up with statistics and names of countries and why not give details to show the entire world that the greatest colonial empire today is the Soviet empire, where millions of human beings are subjected to the tyranny of those bosses who are constantly abusing the words "people" and "democracy". It might also be wise to try to get this information through into the Soviet countries and their satellites.

When we see all this, we are inclined to ask ourselves a question. We wonder if today, in 1961, men with warped minds are not attacking the conduct of honest people only to make them waste their time and make them assume the onus of proving that they are not guilty.

This reminds me of something I have read saying that the sons of darkness are much more crafty than the sons of light. My hon. colleague from Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh), a few minutes ago, asked the Minister of National Defence to tell the country and the house what policy the Canadian government has adopted concerning nuclear weapons.

During a C.B.C. interview, the Minister of National Defence stated—and I want him to correct me if I am misquoting him—that nuclear weapons were necessary. That is not quite what he has told us nor what was stated by the Prime Minister and, in particular, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, since the business of the house was resumed.

The radio commentator questioning the minister said: "When do you think we shall have nuclear weapons on Canadian soil?" The Minister of National Defence for Canada answered that he had nothing else to add.

I feel that the man who, with his colleagues, is responsible for determining our stand on that most important issue, which has a tremendously deep influence on world peace, should at least be in a position to advise the house as to the steps the Canadian government intends to take in connection with nuclear weapons.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear. And before the end of the session too.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Above all before the next general election.

Mr. Chairman, I should like for a moment to come back on certain ideas expressed on NATO by some of my colleagues who sit at my extreme right. I have not heard in this house many comments unfavourable to NATO, particularly since a certain convention. We heard quite a bit though, before the great convention held at the end of July.

Ideas have changed since then, but it seemed, at the time at least, that there was a tendency to promote the idea that Canada should withdraw from NATO. Now, everyone knows that this international organization has been set up thanks to the intelligence and creative imagination of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), who was then secretary of state for external affairs of the former prime minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, and thanks also to the very close co-operation of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) who, at that time, was following Canada's foreign policy closely.

I feel it is belittling our country's role in the field of peace to promote the idea that we should now withdraw from an organization whose development we have facilitated, and which has proven, since 1949, that it was not only necessary but essential to peace in Europe and throughout the world in general.

We also have an obligation of solidarity towards our allies, whether they be in Europe or in America. We cannot ignore our southern neighbours, nor can we ignore our friends in Africa, in Asia or in Europe.

We have responsibilities towards them and in carrying out those responsibilities we look after ourselves at the same time.

The idea that we should remain neutral makes me smile. I do not believe in neutrality any more than I believe that any man can belong to no church at all. In 1961, I believe in people who commit themselves, who fight for an ideal and for their ideas; I believe in those who fight for peace and for the welfare of humanity. We are just as responsible for our friends in Asia and Africa as for our fellow citizens. In fact, what good would it be to live in a country whose economy is flourishing, if at any one time events occurring on another continent could jeopardize our security?

In my opinion, we have a serious moral obligation towards all our compatriots, and today our compatriots are not only the people of Canada but every citizen of the world. I hope the government understands that and that they will act accordingly.

Let us take at least one example concerning the Russians and when I speak of the Russians, I mean their leaders especially. We do not share the same faith nor the same ideals but one of the great differences between the Soviet leaders and those of the free world is that the former live according to their beliefs and, in saying that, I fully realize that I, for one, am far from being true to my ideals. I am of the opinion that before calling for a change in the world, before saying that everybody wants peace, we should first seek peace ourselves and act in such a way that we are living testimonies of peace.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to delay the committee, but if the Minister of National Defence speaks again a little later, I would ask him to give us some information about the very vague statement he made in a televised interview, and like hon. members who spoke before me, I wish that my fellow Canadians and all the people of the free world advise those who want war, whether it be ideological or economic war, those who wish to enlarge their possessions, briefly, those who do not want the welfare of their neighbour, to think twice before going into action. I wish that we, Canadians, should set the example and give proof by our action that we really want peace.

(Text):

Mr. MacLellan: I should like to preface my remarks, Mr. Chairman, by offering my congratulations to the Minister of National Defence who, as he himself has said, is presenting his estimates to the house for the first time today. I should like to congratulate him upon the record he has shown in the very short time during which he has been Minister of National Defence. He has done a great deal to try to clear up a good many of the misapprehensions that exist in the country about problems respecting the defence of the nation and of the free world generally. In my view it is extremely important that this has been done. Perhaps in some way this debate will further help to clear the air in this regard.

I myself have found that there is more confusion in the minds of many Canadians concerning the matter of national defence than about any other single item of national import. One of the most obvious confusions I find is one that I have seen exemplified here during this debate, namely the confusion of the three fronts upon which the communist world advances upon us. As I see it, the communists challenge us on three separate sectors. First of all, as has been mentioned by many who have spoken, there is the ideological war in which they try to shape men's minds to accept the proposition that the communist form of government and the communist system of world order, in which all the nations would be brought under one dictatorship would provide the best future for the world. Second, there is the economic front. Many of those who have spoken here today have said that they think the most important fronts the communists have opened have been the ideological and economic ones. I feel that just as important as, or perhaps more important than either one of those attacks, and just as important as or more important than the hammer and sickle, the symbol of the communist ideology, is the red star, the symbol of the Russian army.

If we look at the record of accomplishments of the Russians in advancing in the world since 1945 we see they have accomplished much more by force of arms than by economic war or ideology. In 1945, when the rest of Russia's allies had disbanded their armies in the hope that freedom was safe for many centuries after the Nazis were defeated, the Russian army kept at full war strength. Despite their undertakings at Yalta in February, 1945, to allow the people in the countries over which their armies had run to have free elections, they forced upon a hundred million people in eastern Europe the slavery of communism.

I think it is very important to note that this was not done with ideology; it was done with the Russian army. Their stand there has been maintained not with ideology but under the red star of the Russian war machine. Communism is dangerous because it attacks men's minds. It is just as dangerous, or perhaps more directly dangerous, as the vehicle upon which Russian imperialism marches, supported always, everywhere in the world, by force of arms.

After 1945 the Russians kept 200 divisions under arms and with these divisions they gobbled up Poland, Hungary, Roumania, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Latvia, Estonia, Albania and Finland. Since that time, as I have said, their most important successes have been with armies. They occupied North Korea while at the same time the southern part of Korea was occupied by the armies of our allies. An agreement was reached that Korea would be vacated as soon as the country seemed able to look after itself. The Russians took advantage of their time there to build up a communist army in North Korea, and when South Korea was vacated by the forces of freedom they engineered an attack upon that country. In the Berlin blockade of 1948 they sought to force their way upon the people of that city with armies, not with ideology. Their present threat to free Berlin is a simple threat of force.

While we must always be ready to defend democracy and to push forward our ideals and spiritual beliefs in the world, on the ideological and economic fronts, I think it is a great mistake, and one under which many people labour, that we can with ideological and economical warfare alone meet the Russian threat.

Until NATO was formed in 1949 we had no chance in Europe. I am sure that if NATO had not been formed at that time and developed since then into the very powerful force it is today, all Europe would be under the Russian heel.

I talked very recently to a senior diplomat from a European country which has had some experience with the communist army. He told me that from his 30 years in diplomacy and from his observations of wars and rivalries between countries he was convinced that if we had not the armed strength we now have the Russians would have no hesitation in attacking us. He said the Russians would knock this nation and any other free nation flat to accomplish their aims if they were not afraid to do so.

I think it is from that point of view that we must face any question of national defence of Canada and the part we play with our allies to marshal the NATO nations and the other unconquered nations of the world against this Soviet threat. When NATO was taken over by General Eisenhower as Supreme Allied European Commander in 1950 it was very weak indeed. All that was left of allied forces in Europe were some 12 divisions, mostly administrative and occupation forces, some 400 aircraft, 400 ships and a few airfields. Yet, as I have said, the Russian army was at full strength. Since then, by acting together in NATO and by realizing that only by standing together can we stand at all, we have built up an army in Europe that is considered quite capable of stopping any advance by the Russian army with conventional arms in Europe.

It is true that it is not of the strength of the Russian conventional force, but when it is considered that many more times the force or power will be needed to attack than to defend, it is felt by most people informed in military affairs that the NATO force in Europe would be successful in stopping a Russian advance.

However, the NATO shield has to be further built up. It will cost us money to do so, but I am one of those who feel that we must spend to develop our conventional forces as well as to assist where we can in the nuclear deterrent, if our nation is not to be seared by atomic war. No one can tell me that in weakness there is hope of avoiding war. That was the mistake of 1914 and of 1939.

I feel that the chief hope for safety in our country, and in the other nations of the free world with whom we are allied, is the great nuclear deterrent force we have at the present time. I feel it is incumbent upon us as members of NATO and in partnership with the United States of America to maintain that striking force where we can and to do everything possible to see we are not at the mercy of Russian military nuclear might by default.

Many people ask me why Canada does not develop its own deterrent force and why it must rely upon nations like the United States. Or perhaps they have read books like Mr. Minifie's "Peacemaker or Powder Monkey" and have been led to subscribe to the thought that we would be better off to go it alone as a neutralist in the world. We might thereby pick up leadership and prestige which otherwise we would not have. It seems to me if, as Mr. Minifie and other people suggest, we spend our money to assist other nations to fight only the ideological and economic war, we would leave ourselves open very soon to the devasting attack of the Russian military force. It is recognized by all hon. members in this house that we Canadians cannot afford to contribute to or to maintain any sort of deterrent force. I suppose if we could and if we had the capacity to do that as has the United States of America, it would be our moral obligation to try to equip and maintain a deterrent force of our own since only behind such a force is there protection for the free world.

We cannot afford to do that. We have been told today by the Minister of National Defence that it would have cost over $2 billion to put the Avro Arrow aircraft into squadron production, and when we hear of the prices paid by the United States to develop missiles and so on, it is obvious that we cannot afford to be in the big race; we cannot maintain direct deterrent forces. We can, however, do something to help protect that deterrent so it is available for retaliation in case it is needed. We can do something to make sure the deterrent force is there to discourage an enemy from daring to launch the weapons of atomic war upon the free world.

With our radar system in this country we are now assisting in the warning of a missile or bomber attack. We can with interceptors and with the Bomarc missile help stop an attack on this nation or this continent. The argument has been put forward that the Bomarc and interceptors are not the final answer to an attack by Russia, and therefore we should make no attempt at all to meet the threat from that quarter. It has been said that the manned bomber is disappearing, and indeed I believe it is, and therefore we are wasting money if we cannot stop both missiles and bombers with weapons of the nature of the Bomarc or present day interceptors. It seems to me that the Hawker Hurricane and the Spitfire were not the final answer either to the defence of England in 1940, but they helped. The Bomarc anti-bomber missile and the interceptor will help defend us and the day may come when we will require all the defensive fire power we can find. It also seems to me that if we did not try to defend against the manned bomber we would be inviting an enemy to attack us with a very much cheaper and more readily available weapon than the intercontinental ballistic missile.

I should like to read an excerpt from a speech made by Dr. J. E. Keyston, vice-chairman, defence research board, which I think very neatly sets forth Canada's position with regard to the Bomarc and interceptor defence against the manned bomber. Dr. Keyston said:

> Let me now turn from broad defence policy considerations to a specific point of controversy that springs up when any reference is made to our defences against bomber aircraft.
> It seems that everyone knows we are rushing rapidly into the missile age, and that in the next decade Russia is more likely to be producing intercontinental ballistic missiles than long range bombers. So why put any more money into defences against bombers? I am not going to involve myself in all the facets of this question and their answer, but I would make the following observation. If we are to deter Russia from attacking, NATO must provide a deterrent that is balanced. I can think of no better way of encouraging Russia to use missiles as the threat and bombers for the actual surprise attack, than by our deciding she will not use bombers and our allowing NATO's bomber defences to decay.
> So long as the military game remains that of frightening Russia as much as she frightens us, the NATO alliance has to keep as up to date as Russia does in capacity for attack and capacity for defence in relation to all modern weapons. This is why, unhopeful as solution may appear, scientific research toward finding a defence against missiles must go on, and why research toward improvement of more conventional defence—and attack—must not be dropped. The Russians are not only very good scientists and engineers but they are outstanding chess players. Many a man, playing against the expert at chess, has kept his eye on his opponent's pieces, only to suffer the humiliation of a checkmate by a miserable pawn that has been pushed through the defence.

It is also in the nature of a deterrent that it must not only be balanced but continuous. At any moment of time, one has to deter attack by the bombers, missiles, or other weapons available to the enemy at that time.

I submit that if the weapon sought by both the free and communist world is an anti-missile missile the Bomarc "B" is at least a long step in that direction from the manned interceptor. If the defence of tomorrow is the anti-missile missile it seems reasonable that Canada should attempt to find out as much as she can about missile warfare and about defence against an enemy attack by missiles. Perhaps the great cost of an anti-missile missile may mean it will never be developed. However some day there might well be a defence against nuclear attack by missile and it is more likely to be by anti-missile missile than by any other means. With the Bomarc our forces are being trained in the use of the weapons of today against manned bombers; some more advanced version of the Bomarc may be tomorrow a weapon against missiles that might attack from over the Arctic circle. Moreover if we are to maintain defensive installations in this country to protect our soil, purely defensive weapons that have no purpose but that of defence, I think they should carry all the punch they possibly can. The Bomarc is purely a defensive weapon. It has no offensive purpose whatever. It has a range of from 400 to 500 miles. There is no way it can be used to attack any other nation on our borders except, of course, technically the United States one might say. It cannot be used to launch an attack against the Soviet union. It is solely designed as a defensive weapon to knock down a bomber that might swoop down some night from high over the Arctic circle to attack our cities or the defence bases which house our deterrent force. If that time ever comes the weapons we send up to protect us should pack all the punch, nuclear or otherwise, that is available to us.

If we are equipping the Canadian forces with interceptors that are designed to meet, attack and destroy enemy bombers that are destined to turn our cities into ashes or to burn our countryside with nuclear blast, the aircraft should be armed with the most force that modern science can devise.

The argument is raised that if nuclear weapons are on our soil even for defensive purposes we must lose some of our sovereignty in having them here, in that they must be under the joint command of our nation and the United States. If the night ever comes when we wish to send a Bomarc missile or a Voodoo interceptor high into the sky to defend us, it would be a poor answer to the citizens of Canada to say that we were not properly armed because we feared some loss of sovereignty in so doing.

It is important to realize that for a generation we may be in the present stalemate. As long as there is no defence against nuclear attack it may well be that there will be no major war. Never in the history of humankind has a weapon been used in war, such as that available today, to which there is no defence, when both sides had this weapon. That is the present situation in world affairs. There is no complete defence to a nuclear attack except the threat of instant massive retaliation.

In the years ahead we have to be prepared to meet the challenge that Russia presents in terms of ideology and economic pressure. We must make the greatest sacrifices we can afford to make to counter this. We must do as much as we can to aid the underdeveloped nations in raising their standards of living and assuring them of their share of the world's blessings. We must harness our resources and square our shoulders to the burden of this quarter century. We must face the fact that we are confronted with a direct challenge from an enemy who knows no law and who will pull no punches in an effort to destroy us in his attempt to achieve world domination. While this situation confronts us we must be prepared as a first call upon our resources to defend our nation with modern arms, as modern arms threaten us. We should do more in terms of marshalling the will of the nation to that end. We have so many people who are willing to do what they can to assist nations that are not yet as highly developed as they should be and who are nevertheless highly confused with respect to defence. We must make every effort to make clear to them that the enemy is without, that some day we may need every resource at our command to defend our soil. It must be made clear that while we have no intention of attacking anybody, while we will make every effort to negotiate world problems and find peaceful solutions yet at the same time we are prepared to arm ourselves in kind against the force arrayed against us.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacLellan: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: I ask my question because I did not hear the news today. Would the hon. member tell us when the news broke that the red army had gobbled up Yugoslavia?

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, Yugoslavia was conquered by force of arms and is kept in a suppressed state not necessarily by Russian arms but by communist arms.

An hon. Member: He means Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence have outlined in clear and unequivocal terms the position of the government with respect to defence policy and therefore I do not need to elaborate very much on my own views. However, I feel that the matter is of such importance that the people of this country are entitled to have placed on the record the views of the individual members of the committee.

One thing has become clear in the debate. I refer to the fact that the renewed threat of Soviet aggression has brought about on the question of defence policy a greater degree of unanimity than we have seen heretofore in this chamber. There was on the part of hon. members of the opposition a noticeable absence of statements such as were made by them not long ago to the effect that we should weaken our defence efforts in one way or another.

We have heard some statements of that kind coming, of course, from the C.C.F.-New party group. This is typical. I noticed this afternoon that the hon. member for Peterborough told us that we had nothing to learn from history. I do not know how many times we have to go over that, or how he expects us to learn in any other way than by looking back and seeing what has happened in the past. We do not need to look very far back through the pages of history to realize that if we are to survive in the world today we are going to have to be able to defend ourselves properly.

It has been said in the past that those who ignore the mistakes of history are condemned to repeat them. As I say, we do not need to look very far back through the pages of history to see what happens when we are not prepared to defend ourselves.

It has been said that sometimes we blunder into war because we have not had the proper international machinery for negotiations and, second, that we have not had a proper system of collective security. Well, since 1958 we have had both of those to a very great extent and I think the policy we have pursued since that time has been a very successful one. It was going along very successfully until we had spokesmen in various countries thinking it was going along so well that we could afford to weaken it. I am not at all convinced that it was not statements of this kind which have put us back in the position where we are now facing Soviet aggression once more.

It has been pointed out by many speakers in this debate that at the end of the second world war—one could go back further and learn the same lesson over again but we need to go back only that far to discover what happened—the western nations immediately disarmed, as we had done on previous occasions. We soon found out that the Soviet union had taken over the Baltic countries, parts of Finland, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Germany. Then, they went on to bring pressure to bear on Turkey and Iran when they did not want to take their troops out of there. Then, subversion was put on Hungary, Burgaria, Rumania, Poland and Czechoslovakia.

All of this happened when we were not in a position to defend ourselves; we did have international machinery for negotiation at that time. The United Nations had been formed but it became quite clear at that time that the United Nations alone was not able to give us security in the world. This situation obviously has not changed because we need to look back only to the time of Korea to see how useless the United Nations was at that time, or would have been, except for the fact that Russia had walked out and was not there to apply the veto which it did on every other occasion. In that particular instance the United Nations was able to take action, as I say, simply because of the fact that Russia had walked out of the meeting. Therefore, it becomes quite clear that if we are to survive we must have a collective system of security.

As I say, since the formation of NATO we have had that and it has been very successful. Therefore, when we come to discuss Canadian defence policy, in my opinion we can only discuss it in so far as we are a part of that system of collective security. It would be absolutely senseless to try to isolate it and I think far too much of this debate has been taken up in getting down to a very local level and a discussion of particular weapons which I do not think members of parliament are able to assess adequately. Surely, this is a matter for technical experts and for the government to decide, based on the advice given by those people who are in a position to make decisions of this kind.

We had a very good example in the speech made by the hon. member for Niagara Falls who read from newspaper editorials, and we learned how many ridiculous statements were made which were shown to be absolutely and completely unfounded. Statements of this kind which mislead the people of the country are very dangerous because if we are to succeed in our defence policy that policy must be freely understood and supported by all the people of this country.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister has the facts and he misled the people.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Nonsense. Of course, the defence policy of the west is to maintain peace. This has been pretty generally agreed upon in the house, but I think what we might add to that is that we want to maintain peace on honourable terms. I add this because some of the speeches which have been made in the house would lead us to believe that we should accept peace on any terms. Those countries in Europe which have been swallowed up by the Soviet union have found that you do not need to have a hydrogen bomb dropped on you to lose human freedom and dignity. Therefore, I add these words because if there is any difference of opinion amongst members perhaps it may be in that regard.

I noticed a statement which appeared today in a paper called the Outlook, which was dealing with some of the statements made by members of the New Democratic party, and ones that we heard in this house today. I am going to read this rather short article. It is headed, "How to Surrender" and reads:

> "The Commonwealth", the official weekly organ of the C.C.F., published at Regina, Saskatchewan, devoted the main editorial of its issue of July 5 to a plea for "a peace department" of government to replace the department of defence. This proposal was made by the left-wing organization "The Voice of Women" at its first annual meeting held at Toronto in June. "The Commonwealth" recommends that the replacement of the defence department by a department of peace be made a major plank in the program of the New Democratic party.

Perhaps this has been accepted and is a major plank in the program. I take it the member for Peterborough would be speaking for the New Democratic party. The article continues:

> If the attitude of the "Voice of Women" were to be adopted by the federal government through a so-called "department of peace" replacing the defence department the result in practice would be to surrender to the communists, whose main concern is world conquest by irresistible military power. That the free world should be disarmed by internal agitation on the lines of "The Voice of Women" policies is a cardinal part of communist policy. When an organ of the C.C.F. comes out for a "peace department" it is in effect advocating surrender to the reds. If such a policy is adopted by the New Democratic party, it will earn and deserve the reputation of being an effective Soviet agency.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the hon. member permit a question? Apparently he is prepared to accept Gladstone Murray as an authority on the New Democratic party. If so, will he also accept the New Democratic party's description of Gladstone Murray as being equally authentic?

Mr. Ricard: There is no relation whatsoever.

[Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have reason to have a little more confidence in Gladstone Murray than in anything I have heard coming from that corner.

As I was saying, when we consider where these statements come from they may not appear to be too harmful because this is a rather small group and does not represent the view of a large number of people of this country.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I do not think Gladstone Murray does either.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): However, as I say, it is important that the majority of Canadians understand the defence policy of the country, and what we are trying to do so that it will be fully supported and we shall not have statements of this kind made and the public misled as to exactly where we are going in our defence policy.

We have seen what has happened. I pointed out that in 1945, at the end of the second world war, we saw what happened when the Soviet union made the great advance it did because we had no collective security. Now NATO has provided that. As I say, we were going along very nicely. In fact we got going along too well and everybody started saying, "Now we can afford to weaken things a little bit, we have done so well." If the Soviet threat that is facing us now has done anything, surely at least it has awakened us again to the danger, and perhaps in the long run it may be a benefit to us, because I feel sure it will bring those nations closer together than they have been in the last two or three years.

I believe we are going to have to expand the deterrent weapons that we have, and have had during the past number of years. The policy has been, of course, to deter the Soviet union from attacking any of the North Atlantic treaty countries, or indeed any other country in the world, by having those forces necessary to be able to restrain them. I have some misgivings about the talk going on now with respect to building up conventional forces because it seems to me that if the Soviet union thought for one moment that we would be willing to fight what is now being referred to as a conventional war they probably would have no hesitation in starting one. I do not think there is any doubt that we would not be able to compete with them on those terms and would not be able to keep an army in the field in Europe that would fight with conventional weapons in order to deter them from aggression.

It has been the nuclear deterrent, mainly the strategic air command of the United States, that has in my opinion prevented the Soviet union from starting anything over the past few years. I believe we would be making a mistake in giving the Soviet union any indication whatever that we are prepared to see them go into any country in the free world today and take it by force of arms if they can.

There has been a good deal of controversy over what are conventional weapons, because it is obvious that the Soviet forces would have tactical nuclear weapons as they are called. Surely we would not want to put our men in the field to oppose them with so-called conventional weapons. On the other hand, if we equipped our forces with tactical weapons we obviously would not be able to fight a limited or conventional war. It is interesting to look at what the historians have to say about the last war when we talk about fighting a limited or conventional war. I came across a rather interesting statement today in a book by Stephen King-Hall entitled, "Our Times, 1900-1960". He discusses the aims of Hitler in 1939 and I should like to read one short sentence from page 190:

> His immediate purpose in 1939 was to seize the western half of Poland in a short, limited war.

That war did not turn out to be very limited and I do not imagine that if a war should start now it would turn out to be very limited either. In any event, I do not see why we should give any consideration whatever to turning away from a policy which has been sound and successful over the past ten years. One would think the fact that it has been sound and successful in the past ten years would make us want to strengthen the concept under which we have been working. When John Foster Dulles was on the scene he made it quite clear that we were not going to accept aggression, that if the Soviet union attacked any free country in the world they were going to be subjected to a nuclear attack.

I am convinced that policy has worked and will continue to work provided we remain united, keep up to date and secure the proper weapons that are required. For that reason, before we start any campaign to build up conventional forces I think we should take a very careful look at the idea of suggesting to the enemy that we are willing to accept a conventional or any other kind of war. Surely that is only going to lead to trouble. It cannot have any other result. It is quite clear that a nuclear war means destruction for the entire world. It does not make any difference whether we want to call it a conventional war or a limited war. If the major powers become involved in the fighting then sooner or later tactical weapons are bound to be introduced and then strategic weapons, if there is any differentiation between those two types of weapons.

For that reason I believe that if we are going to defend ourselves at all it is going to be by means of the nuclear deterrent and I believe that the nuclear deterrent must be spread among the NATO countries in so far as it is possible and that we cannot continue to rely mainly on the strategic air command of the United States. I am not saying that is all we have. There is a very large dispersal of armaments throughout the world now, but I think Canada is going to have to give consideration to whether the United States should have missile bases in this country. After all, we are on the side of the United States. There can be no mistake about that. I for one certainly reject any idea of placing Canada in any position of neutrality or trying to place the United States and the Soviet union in the same category. We can only be on the side of the United States. There is no other place for us to be.

If we are going to defend this country, then we must do so with every possible means at our disposal. It has already been pointed out that so far as nuclear weapons for Canada are concerned there may be some argument whether we should have strategic weapons of a missile nature in this country to act as a deterrent against Russia, but if the policy of deterrence is what we are going to follow then surely it is neither right nor reasonable for us to expect the United States to carry the brunt of such a policy and for us to sit back and say that it is all right for the United States to undertake everything and we will sit back and hope that they are going to be able to look after things. There may be an argument about whether or not we want to have weapons of this kind but, as has been said previously with regard to the Bomarc missile and weapons of that nature, weapons which cannot shoot beyond the borders of Canada, weapons which can do only one thing, shoot down an attacking airplane flying over our country, if we are going to antagonize by having nuclear warheads on these weapons I can only say that we are in such serious danger that it is not going to make any difference. If we are going to antagonize somebody by defending ourselves, I do not see what purpose there is in discussing the matter any further. Surely we are entitled to do that much. It will not harm anybody else for us to have that weapon on Canadian soil and I do not think we should have any hesitation whatever in making that decision.

Miss LaMarsh: You have had nearly four years to do that.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): These warheads cannot be used until the weapons are installed. When they are installed that will be the time when we have to make that decision. During the course of the remarks of the hon. member who is interrupting I did not hear any suggestions. I heard some rather idiotic criticism without many facts to support it. I did not hear her refer to many of the statements that were made by her party previously. The hon. lady got up and attacked the government's defence policy.

Miss LaMarsh: Or lack of it.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I did not hear her refer to the remarks that were being made by the Liberal party some time ago about weakening our defence efforts, such as withdrawing from NORAD, having another look at NATO and perhaps considering whether we would be better off red than dead.

Miss LaMarsh: That is a deliberate misstatement.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): It is statements of this kind that have put us in the position that we find ourselves today. However, they may not have been a bad thing because perhaps they will make us realize that there is only one way to survive in this world and that is to prepare to defend ourselves. I suggest that we should look at these matters in a realistic way rather than from the political point of view of saying those things which we think are going to appeal to our constituents at any given time. Some of the positions that have been taken by the Liberal party as they have jumped from one side of the field to the other have been rather remarkable. I can recall the Leader of the Opposition speaking in 1959 and talking about conventional wars. Then he dealt with tactical nuclear weapons. As found at page 7756 of Hansard, it will be seen that he was in favour of them. He thought they were a great thing, that our army should have them and that we should not expect our men to fight without them. However, by August 5, 1960 he had changed his mind and decided that we should not have them. I do not know whether that is political expediency but I want to say that I believe every hon. member has an obligation to put his views on the record because we may not have a second chance. If we make a mistake in what we are doing in trying to defend the free world today, we might not get another chance. In previous wars we have been able to blunder at the start and then, after the war was started, we have been able to build up our forces and eventually succeed. If there is another war, we are certainly not going to have that opportunity. When we consider this question of defence, therefore, we want to make sure we do not make any mistakes.

Well, I am satisfied with the policy as outlined by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence. I think the vast majority of Canadians are. However, I believe that it is the responsibility of all the members of the house to make sure that policy is spread across the country and that the people of this country understand it because misunderstanding and dissension can do a great deal of harm. There certainly is no room for political bickering. We have got to arrive at a common policy and with that policy we have got to stick. It is quite obvious if we are going to be a part of collective security, then we have at least got to have unanimity in our own country. For that reason, there is no sense in political bickering, especially when we are agreed on the broad general policies to be followed as was evident from the external affairs debate.

However, when we come to debate defence policy, then we find there are differences of opinion, mostly of a mind and nature as I pointed out, such as those concerning the individual weapons that are going to be used. Well, to put on a front of that kind does not help us very much when a united front, a determined front is one that is very important. The psychology of deterring the enemy is perhaps just as important as the weapons we have. We have many groups in the country that oppose a policy of deterrence. They are not large groups, but they can do nothing but aid and comfort the enemy and cause him to believe that perhaps we are not united enough to follow up the policy we have set. If the policy we have set is going to succeed, any potential aggressor has to be convinced we are going to carry out that policy; that we are not going to settle for something less or we are not going to back down at the last minute.

Many people have said that wars have started in the past because one side did not know what the other's intentions were. It has even been argued that if the United Kingdom had made its position clear earlier in 1939 we might not have had the second world war. We have to make sure there is no mistake about what our intentions are at the present time.

I have heard a number of members get up in this house and make that statement, but then by the time they finished speaking I was not quite sure what their intentions were. I do not know why we cannot get our intentions set out in plain terms so that not only we understand them but the other side understands them as well.

I suggest our policy has got to be, as it has been successfully for the past ten years, that of a nuclear deterrent. We are not going to accept aggression on the part of the Soviet union. They have got to understand that we are not going to accept that aggression. They have to understand if there is going to be a war at all, it is going to mean destruction for them as well as ourselves and, therefore, war is absolutely unthinkable. In my view, that is the only policy that can succeed because it has been shown that negotiation alone cannot succeed. I doubt very much whether or not the United Nations would even be in existence today if it were not for NATO. The so-called uncommitted countries would not be in a position then to make the kind of statements they are making now. I am sure that Mr. Nehru would not have dared go to Moscow and say anything to Mr. Khrushchev if it were not for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization because he simply would not have been in the position to do so.

We want to continue to negotiate. We are not going to be able to negotiate from a policy of weakness. If we have a chance for survival at all in this world today it is by maintaining a nuclear deterrent of the utmost possible strength on the part of every country in NATO and to make sure the other side knows what that policy is.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, our genial colleague from Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) just gave us a rather confused overall picture of the international situation at this time. I have a feeling that his speech will not have much effect on Mr. Khrushchev's or Mr. Kennedy's attitude. At all events, I should like to leave for a few minutes the subject of Nehru, Khrushchev, Kasavubu and Mobutu, and deal with a problem which is of closer concern to me, i.e. the serious problem faced by the employees serving the present government in military quarters throughout the province of Quebec and elsewhere, and more particularly in my riding of St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, where we have an R.C.A.F. base, as well as the royal military college at St. John.

Mr. Chairman, I want to draw the attention of the house to the treatment received by employees of the Department of National Defence who do not come under the civil service commission. I trust the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) will personally look into those cases which are really deplorable.

In 1961, for instance, we find that employees of the Royal Military College or of the R.C.A.F. station get an hourly wage of 87 or, perhaps, 89 cents. I need not add that those wages are entirely inadequate, more particularly when it is well known that in the mines, for instance, a labourer gets a minimum wage of $1.90 an hour. In comparison, the wages paid to those employees in the Department of National Defence are too low and I think it is really revolting to see that in 1961 wages of 87 or 89 cents an hour are still being paid.

Moreover, I should like to point out to hon. members that before 1957, i.e. before the Conservative party came to power—I do not know whether this is a coincidence but that is the fact—national defence employees received regular yearly increases. But since 1957 for some and 1958 for others, there have been no increase whatsoever. I do want to point out this entirely abnormal situation to the minister.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know what is going on elsewhere but I have put on the order paper this week questions about the wages paid particularly in North Bay, Ont., St. Hubert, Quebec, Comox, B.C., and at the military colleges of Royal Roads and Kingston. When the minister has given me the information, I will be able to make comparisons, but in any case, one bad situation is no excuse for another.

At the R.C.A.F. base as well as at the military college in my constituency, waitresses, assistant cooks, kitchen labourers, truck drivers and others, are paid absolutely inadequate wages that do not allow them to provide a decent living or even bare necessities for their families.

In the past, that is before 1957, those employees who were not under the civil service had the opportunity to work overtime; they then earned much higher salaries.

In fact, a truck driver told me that in 1955, for instance, he made $1,500 more than he does in 1961.

Furthermore, before 1957, employees who worked on Saturdays and Sundays were getting more, since they were paid time and a half and double time, whereas today they are paid regular salaries as low as 70 cents, 90 cents or a dollar an hour.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest this situation cannot go on any longer especially if we consider that the unemployed get $36 a week from the unemployment insurance fund, while full-time workers in national defence only get $40 a week. We should reconsider those salaries and give those employees who are devoted servants of the Department of National Defence salaries which should really compare with those of other workers in other fields.

Mr. Chairman, I would also point out that lower salaries are being paid in some areas. For instance, salaries are lower in St. John than in St. Hubert or Quebec City. I wonder why kitchen hands should get less if they work in another area. Yet, the same rate is paid to civil servants, regardless of the area where they work, as well as to servicemen, regardless of the camp where they are posted.

Therefore, I stress that point, and I would like the minister to tell us in his remarks what he intends to do to improve the lot of those honest workers who are forced to work hard without reasonable pay.

Tonight, I wanted to point out that anomaly to the house. I know it is very important during the examination of the estimates of the Department of National Defence to talk about missiles, threats of nuclear warfare and all those troubling things we read about in the newspapers every day, but it is also important, I think, to talk about the fate of those devoted servants of the Department of National Defence. They are often treated as slaves. I am also thinking of the rather sizeable estimates of the Department of National Defence, and of the extravagant expenditures on military hardware and nuclear testing, but I am convinced the government should consider first the situation of the Canadian citizens who suffer really inferior treatment and I should like the minister to intervene in order to remedy that anomalous situation.

(Text):

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether it would be permissible to call it 10.30 or whether the committee would like me to proceed.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that we call it 10.30?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask the house leader what business will be laid before the house tomorrow and Thursday.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will start off with the estimates of the privy council, followed by the estimates of the Department of National Defence. That business carrying over until Thursday would be followed by the Department of Defence Production.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 13, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

STARRED QUESTIONS

SALE OF C.N.R. LOTS, MONTREAL

Question No. 454—Mr. Valade:

1. Has the C.N.R. sold the lots situated at the southeast corner of Sherbrooke and Viau streets in Montreal?

2. If so: (a) on what date? (b) to whom? (c) what is, in square feet, the area of the land sold? (d) for what price, per square foot? (e) who authorized such sale? (f) have other adjoining parcels of land been sold thereafter to the same or other persons? (g) what was the sale price in each case? (h) to whom were such subsequent sales made? (i) were such parcels of land sold through public tenders? If not, on what other basis? (j) have all these transactions been authorized by the C.N.R. board of directors?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (for the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of the Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) August 10, 1953. (b) Bernard Dupuis et al. (c) Two parcels totalling 150,000 square ft. (d) 45.4 and 33.3 cents; total $60,000 for both parcels as shown in the records of the registry office division for Montreal. (e) The sale was processed and recommended by the company's real estate department through its general manager in the usual manner and approved by the board of directors. (f) Yes. (g) and (h) Sale price $10,750 to Bernard Dupuis. Sale price $11,700 to Bernard Dupuis. Sale price $17,550 to Bernard Dupuis. Sale price $10,375 to Lucerne Motel Cie Ltee. Sale price $7,625 to Lucerne Motel Cie Ltee. Sale price $240,779.28 to Christie Brown & Co., Ltd. All deeds are registered. (i) No. Negotiated price based on commercial value. (j) See answer to (e).

C.B.C. CENTRES, MONTREAL-TORONTO-VANCOUVER

Question No. 455—Mr. Taylor:

1. Is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation planning construction of a radio-television centre in the city of Montreal and in the city of Toronto?

2. If so, how much land is being purchased for the centres in Montreal and Toronto; and will such property be located in the downtown area or in the suburbs?

3. What is the market value of the property to be purchased in Montreal and Toronto?

4. What are the main requirements for locating a radio-television centre for C.B.C. operations?

5. Is the corporation planning to build a centre in Vancouver on its property on Georgia street or elsewhere in Vancouver?

6. What is the recommended acreage required for C.B.C. operations in Vancouver?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): This is a six part question, and I will answer accordingly. I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. Yes.

2. 33 acres of land have been purchased in suburban metropolitan Toronto. The area required for a Montreal consolidation site will be generally of the same order but precise areas cannot be determined until specific sites have been examined in detail.

3. The Toronto site was purchased for the sum of $635,000 serviced. No decision has been made as to Montreal.

4. Among other factors are:

(a) Acceptability from a technical standpoint.

(b) Sufficient area to permit the most economical construction of the known requirements together with provision for future developments.

(c) Accessibility by public and private transportation during the full operating day together with adequate parking facilities.

(d) Protection from present and future development which would be undesirable from a technical and administrative standpoint.

5. Consideration has been given to this in connection with the long range plans for development of the corporation.

6. When a decision is made the acreage will depend on the factors set out in No. 2 above.

FOREST FIREFIGHTING ASSISTANCE, NATIONAL DEFENCE

Question No. 456—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has the Minister of National Defence in the past two years made any public statement on his department's intentions with regard to providing military personnel with training at forest firefighting, and of the availability of such a forest fire force for emergency situations in the country?

2. If so, when and where?

3. How many men have been trained to take part in forest firefighting in the past two years?

4. What liaison and training facilities were developed with provincial forest firefighting services?

5. In the summer of 1961, how was such a military force deployed to meet the forest fire crisis in British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, and Newfoundland?

Starred Questions

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence):

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. 28,319 regular army soldiers received individual training in forest fire suppression during the past two years either during recruit training or during annual refresher training.

4. Approximately 485 officers and men participated in forest firefighting training conducted in conjunction with or by provincial forestry officials. This training took the form of liaison visits, reconnaissance or planning activities and attendance by army personnel at courses, lectures or demonstrations conducted by provincial officials.

5. British Columbia, no assistance was requested; Manitoba, 595 officers and men; Ontario, 14 officers and men; Newfoundland, 1,100 officers and men.

VOODOO PLANE—SERVICE COSTS

Question No. 457—Mr. Fisher:

1. What costs above the basic purchase price are involved in placing one of the Voodoo planes in service with the Royal Canadian Air Force?

2. If the specific costs cannot be released for security reasons, is it a fact that considerable modifications have to be carried out in Canada?

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answers to parts 1 and 2 are as follows. No Canadian modifications to the aircraft are foreseen. As of the date of delivery to the R.C.A.F., all outstanding modifications to each CF-101B aircraft engine and frame will have been incorporated.

C.N.R. PUBLICITY RELEASE

Question No. 458—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did the Canadian National Railways send out the following dispatch to any newspapers on July 19:

"JASPER PARK LODGE, Alta., July 19—Like, man, when the beats are next windin' up a jam session at your pad, why not give out with fodder that is really cool? Like an iceberg.

This way out number was dreamed up by the cookie at that big pad the CNR calls Jasper Park lodge. This Bill Schmidts is no square lad, dad. Like, he emotes with the mayonnaise.

So like, one day the lads who are with it in a far out way asked this Pastrami Picasso to put together a real cool number.

Now this cat was with it. He could dig. Like man, he took a piece of bread and sliced an onion on it. And then he sliced an orange on it. And then a slice of bread on top.

Like there you are. Dig? The guys who are in says its better than Bardot.

So be like the west, man. Get with it. Like, its crazy!"?

2. If so, what was the purpose of this dispatch, and to whom was it sent?

3. What does it mean?

[Mr. Fisher.]

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Acting Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes, this was one version released by a local representative of the public relations department.

2. A piece of lighhearted and nonsensical whimsy that attracts reader interest and is good publicity through contrast.

3. To "dig" the interpretation requires a humorous sense of the ridiculous, as delightfully illustrated by Mr. Richard Jackson in the Ottawa Journal of September 8.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Question No. 459—Mr. Robichaud:

What was the amount to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund as of May 31, June 30, July 31, and August 31, 1961, as compared with similar dates for 1960?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is a brief statistical table which the house might consent to have printed in Hansard at this point without being read.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: the table above referred to follows.]

	1960	1961
May 31	$299,293,511.04	$110,051,922.26
June 30	296,187,477.10	110,270,314.33
July 31	306,363,607.24	120,771,909.13
August 31	313,327,675.04	130,846,070.49 (Interim figure)

PROVINCIAL SALES TAX PAYMENTS BY CROWN COMPANIES

Question No. 460—Mr. Benidickson:

1. Which, if any, of the federal crown companies agree to the payment of sales taxes imposed by provincial governments on purchases made by such crown companies?

2. Does the Ontario hydro power commission and the liquor control board of Ontario submit to payment of the 11 per cent sales tax of the federal government with respect to purchases made by them?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Could this question be made an order for return, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

PERMITS FOR OATS IMPORT FROM U.S.

Question No. 461—Mr. Benidickson:

On what dates, and for what quantities, and at what prices if stipulated, were permits issued since May 1, 1961, by the Canadian wheat board for the import of oats from the United States of America?

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): The answer is as follows. Permits issued by the wheat board for the import of oats from the United States are valid for a period of one month. There is no assurance that a permit issued to an importing firm will be filled in whole or in part. Since the release of details with respect to permits issued may imply a greater volume of imports than actually takes place, it is not considered in the public interest to reveal details which may not reflect actual import volumes and which might be detrimental to the board in its marketing operations in the commodity concerned. The import permits cover quantities only and do not stipulate prices.

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL—PLANS

Question No. 462—Mr. Lessard:

1. Have the plans of the approaches to the Champlain bridge in Montreal been altered?
2. If so, could the minister tell the house at whose request such plans were altered, and give the nature of the changes and the approximate date when these changes will be made public?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Acting Minister of Transport): The answers are as follows:

1. The plans for the northern approaches to the Champlain bridge are in the process of being altered.

2. Such modifications are being made at the instance of the joint national harbours board-city of Montreal committee, and it is not in the public interest to divulge details of the changes until expropriation proceedings have been completed.

REPRESENTATIONS FROM INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

Question No. 463—Mr. Matheson:

1. Has the government received any representation from the international monetary fund relative to the government's policy with regard to devaluation of the Canadian dollar?
2. If so, what is the nature of such representation?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the information I have is that no such representation was received.

ADDITIONAL WHEAT PURCHASES BY CHINA

Question No. 464—Mr. Benidickson:

1. Has China agreed to purchase additional quantities of wheat since the last report by the Minister of Agriculture to the house?
2. If so, what are the particulars, and was it indicated to the wheat board that some of such purchases would be diverted and shipped to East Germany to cover sales under a trade agreement between China and East Germany?

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): The answers are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. The Canadian wheat board concluded a further sale of wheat to China under the long term agreement negotiated last April. The new sale involved approximately six million bushels of wheat for clearance from St. Lawrence ports during August and September. No indication has been received to date by the Canadian wheat board that the wheat involved in this contract would be diverted to East Germany.

SECTION 96A(2), INDIAN ACT—PROCLAMATION

Question No. 465—Mr. Howard:

1. Since November 1, 1960, has any Indian band in British Columbia submitted a resolution to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration asking that section 96A(2) of the Indian Act be proclaimed to be in force?
2. If so, what is the name of each such band, the date of each such resolution, and the present status thereof?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there are some 37 bands in British Columbia that have submitted resolutions which are in various stages of processing at the moment which makes it difficult to give an oral answer. I could give full details on this matter if this question could be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

FIREFIGHTING ASSISTANCE BY ARMED SERVICES, N.S.

Question No. 466—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Did the Department of National Defence and the armed forces provide assistance to the government of Nova Scotia in fighting forest fires in 1960?
2. If so, was any financial charge made for such assistance, and on what basis, and in what amount?

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes.

2. The Department of National Defence is seeking reimbursement for out of pocket expenses amounting to $60,102.33 relating to the assistance rendered by 410 officers and men of the armed services for fighting forest fires in the Sherbourne area of Nova Scotia during the period of September 3 to September 21, 1960.

TELEVISION SERVICE, MADAWASKA AND VICTORIA COUNTIES, N.B.

Question No. 467—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Has the board of broadcast governors heard representations from station CJBR-TV Rimouski applying for permission to erect a satellite or a rebroadcasting station to provide television service to the population of northwestern New Brunswick, and particularly to the counties of Madawaska and Victoria?
2. If so: (a) on what date or dates did such a hearing take place? (b) what was the nature of the decision reached by the board of broadcast governors? (c) was the decision made public, and on what date?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue):

1. Yes.

2 (a). The board heard two applications from CJBR-TV, the first at its public hearing on September 26, 1960, and the second at its public hearing on February 24, 1961.

2 (b). The board recommended that the application heard on September 26, 1960, be deferred and the second application which provided for increased power for the proposed rebroadcasting station, which was heard on February 24, 1961, be approved since, in the opinion of the board, the proposed station will provide a satisfactory French language service to the French speaking population of Madawaska county.

2 (c). The first recommendation was made public in the board's public announcement dated October 5, 1960, and the second in the board's public announcement dated March 3, 1961.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PROVINCIAL SALES TAX PAYMENTS BY CROWN COMPANIES

Question No. 460—Mr. Benidickson:

1. Which, if any, of the federal crown companies agree to the payment of sales taxes imposed by provincial governments on purchases made by such crown companies?
2. Does the Ontario hydro power commission and the liquor control board of Ontario submit to payment of the 11 per cent sales tax of the federal government with respect to purchases made by them?

SECTION 96A (2), INDIAN ACT—PROCLAMATION

Question No. 465—Mr. Howard:

1. Since November 1, 1960, has any Indian band in British Columbia submitted a resolution to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration asking that section 96A(2) of the Indian Act be proclaimed to be in force?
2. If so, what is the name of each such band, the date of each such resolution, and the present status thereof?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SAINT JOHN RIVER BOARD REPORT

Motion No. 158—Mr. Robichaud:

For a copy of the report of the Saint John river board on the effects of storage on power generation in New Brunswick.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this motion with the hon. member and assured him of the information he is seeking. I believe he is agreeable to dropping the motion.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Order discharged and motion dropped.

TELEVISION SERVICE, MADAWASKA AND VICTORIA COUNTIES, N.B.

Motion No. 159—Mr. Robichaud:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the board of broadcast governors or the Department of Transport or the Minister of National Revenue and all other persons concerning the granting of a licence for a television satellite or a rebroadcasting station to provide television service to the French-speaking population of Madawaska and Victoria counties in New Brunswick.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this matter with the hon. member and we have agreed on a beginning date of January 1, 1960 rather than the indefinite period to which the motion applies now. I would ask, therefore, that it be made an order for return, as it covers the various governmental and departmental agencies.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion shall be converted to an order for return, with the date indicated by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—REPORTED CONFLICT IN KATANGA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question, notice of which I gave to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who is unavoidably detained, and which arises out of a report on the radio this morning of fighting in the Congo between UN forces, in which Canada is represented, and the Katanga provincial forces. Perhaps the Prime Minister would care to take this question as notice.

My question is whether the government has any comment to make on these reports, and particularly under what authority from the United Nations are United Nations forces empowered to use armed force in a situation of this kind.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As the hon. gentleman has suggested, it would be better to take this question as notice, and I shall so do.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the Leader of the Opposition mentioned that he had given notice of a question dealing with the situation in the Congo. The Secretary of State for External Affairs received that notice this morning.

Mr. McIlraith: He is right behind the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is a famous historical analogy, "Give me night or give me Blucher".

Mr. Pearson: May I thank the Prime Minister for implementing his statement of the other day, namely that he never gets in the way of ministers.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that my interview with the foreign minister of Iceland did not last long enough.

It has been evident for several days now that a very tense situation was building up in Katanga, with the prospect that the United Nations might have to take firm measures to forestall the outbreak of large scale violence. While we do not yet have official reports on the latest developments, it would appear that the UN command now has moved to bring and keep the situation under control.

As hon. members are aware, there has been acute political tension in the Congo over the question of reintegrating the province of Katanga into the republic. One aspect of the resistance by some Katanga political leaders against a reconciliation with the central government appears to have been the revival of intertribal conflict in Katanga where, as the house will recall, there were heavy casualties in tribal clashes before the UN forces became established in that area.

One of the principal obligations imposed upon the United Nations command by the security council resolution of last February 21 was "to prevent the occurrence of civil war" in the Congo, and this was to include the prevention of armed clashes. The resolution specified that the measures which the United Nations might take in pursuit of this prime objective of preventing civil conflict should include the use of force "if necessary, in the last resort".

It is evidently the assessment of the United Nations authorities concerned that the situation in Katanga has now deteriorated to the point where strong measures offer the best likelihood of averting much more serious violence. Undoubtedly this decision is closely related to the recent reports that many thousands of Baluba tribesmen have sought United Nation protection in the face of reviving intertribal fighting. It is our earnest hope that by the present measures the United Nations will succeed in heading off more widespread trouble.

As far as we are aware, no Canadian personnel in the Congo have been involved in the current clashes in Katanga. There is one Canadian liaison officer with the UN units in Elizabethville. We expect to be having reports, of course, and when they are available I shall be very glad to inform the house.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RECRUITMENT OF CANADIANS FOR U.K. GROCERY CHAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the story in this morning's Globe and Mail headed "500 Young Zip-Zip Canadians Wanted by Loblaw for U.K. Jobs", and in view of the fact that Mr. George C. Metcalf, president of Loblaw Groceterias Company Limited is a member of the national productivity council, does this advertisement reflect proposals of the national productivity council toward the lessening of unemployment in Canada?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I read in the newspaper this morning the article indicating that Loblaw Groceterias Company Limited were advertising for 500 Canadians for jobs in their stores in Great Britain.

I immediately got in touch with Mr. George C. Metcalf of the Loblaw company, who informed me that the only reason for this recruitment of Canadians is that this company is in the process of opening up 40 new stores in Great Britain in the immediate future. This company finds that there is a great lack of experience in the supermarket business in Great Britain. Consequently they are unable to recruit the type of help to which they are accustomed in the efficient operation of their stores. Their experience is that Canadians have been exposed to the supermarkets in Canada for a great many years and are easily integrated into that type of business.

I am also informed that Mr. Weston, who prides himself on being a Canadian and who knows Canadian characteristics, is anxious to have Canadians man these stores, in order to carry on an efficient business in Great Britain.

In view of this consideration, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who asked the question is putting a wrong interpretation on the whole situation.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister not aware that attempts were made by that company in the United Kingdom to obtain United Kingdom help, but that because of the small amount of unemployment there the effort was unsuccessful?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East usually gets his information from the wrong sources. I have given the house the true picture of the situation.

TRADE

VISIT OF RED CHINESE MISSION TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I should like to direct a question to the acting minister. Is it true, as reported, that a delegation from the government of communist China is coming to Canada to meet with the department, and if so, when is the meeting taking place and what are the subjects to be discussed?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall have to take the question as notice.

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce, while he is abroad, expects to be in London. If so, will he impress on the United Kingdom government while there the necessity of bringing to an early conclusion the arrangements arising out of the uranium contract?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I expect, while the minister is abroad, that he will be dealing with all matters of urgent importance affecting Canada's trade.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

JAPAN—ANNOUNCEMENT OF VISIT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Prime Minister whether he has any further information concerning his proposed trip to Japan.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, an announcement was made yesterday in Tokyo to the effect that, following two invitations given to me to visit Japan, one by Prime Minister Kishi and the other by Prime Minister Ikeda, to which reference was made in the communique issued on the occasion of the visit of Mr. Ikeda, I had accepted.

These plans were made some time ago. The acceptance has been given. I point out to the house that this of course is subject to intervening events. My visit will cover the last five days of October. We have tremendous trade relations with Japan and in the matter of world events concerning freedom Japan occupies a prominent place.

The last visit by a Canadian prime minister was by Mr. St. Laurent in 1954, and it brought benefits to Canada. I have found, and I think this view is generally shared by the leaders of the various countries, that these visits have a pronounced beneficial effect and are necessary. I know that if there is nothing during the intervening period which prevents my visiting there for that number of days, my visit will not only repay the visits made to this country but will strengthen our relationship with Japan and also lead, as Prime Minister Ikeda has said, to an extension of our trade relations.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING TO AMEND CONSTITUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice if, now that the constitutional conference has concluded, he proposes to report to the house on the conclusions reached, particularly in the light of the published contradictory reports as to the results of the conference?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any published contradictory reports with regard to the conference.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They were given in the Globe and Mail of this morning.

Mr. Fulton: The conference of attorneys general reached a very encouraging degree of agreement on the outstanding problems between us. As was stated in the official communique issued at the end of the meeting, most of the discussion concerned the question of a formula for the delegation of power as between the dominion parliament and provincial legislatures. This was the main point upon which agreement had not been reached in earlier discussions. Most of our discussions in the last two days were devoted to trying to arrive at agreement in principle on this matter. In this we were largely successful.

The position now is that the draftsmen assisting us have been instructed to prepare a final draft of all the proposals which have been discussed and upon which agreement has been reached. When that is done it will be placed in final form before the attorneys general for submission to and consideration by their governments. It is the hope that the governments will find it possible to accept this as a basis for proposals to lay before their respective legislatures.

If that should be the case, then the work of the attorneys general conference is concluded. If, however, differences of substance emerge in the course of consideration by governments it may be necessary to reconvene the attorneys general conference in a further effort to reconcile points of difference.

I would also advise the house that at the time the final draft is placed in the hands of the attorneys general for them in turn to place before their governments, the text of our recommendation will be made public.

POWER

PEACE RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ACTION TO BLOCK DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I apologize for not giving him notice, but this was caused by my attention being directed to other matters related to my heavy responsibilities.

My question arises because a group of us watched the minister's participation in "Close-Up" last evening. Is the government giving consideration to blocking the development of the Peace river by the government of British Columbia by the use of the Navigable Waters Protection Act or any other federal statute?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer is that this government is giving consideration to all measures which would bring about a logical, orderly and sensible development of the power potential of British Columbia, which of course means that the Columbia river development should be started first.

TELEVISION

RIMOUSKI—APPLICATION FOR SATELLITE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Can the minister advise the house whether the government has accepted the recommendation of the board of broadcast governors approving the application of station CJBR-TV, Rimouski, for the erection of a satellite station to serve Madawaska and Victoria counties?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, a large number of recommendations have been processed and dealt with by the board at its recent hearings.

I am not certain of the identity of these various matters. I shall have to check and answer at a later date.

TORONTO—REPORTED TRANSFER TO U.S. OF INTEREST IN PRIVATE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue a question arising out of the answer he gave yesterday to an earlier question of mine about the private television station in Toronto. Has the minister drawn—and if not, will he draw—to the attention of the broadcast governors the fact that the transfer of a substantial ownership in this station to the American Broadcasting Company would be contrary to the sentiments expressed in this house at the time the Broadcasting Act was passed, and would certainly not be in the national interest?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I am sure the members of the board of broadcast governors read Hansard, and they will notice the remarks made by the hon. member, which I suspect may express the sentiments of this house; but it is not the responsibility of the minister to convey any instructions as such to the board.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN MARCONI COMPANY—LETTER RESPECTING NON-FRATERNIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources based on a question I posed to him on June 26, as reported on page 7035 of Hansard relating to certain correspondence between himself and the Canadian Marconi Company. At that time the minister indicated that the correspondence was current, which prevented him from tabling it. Could the minister bring the house up to date as to the state of the correspondence, and advise whether he is in a position to table it?

Hon W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I shall investigate that matter and bring in a report for the hon. member.

PUBLICATIONS

ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—ACTION TO IMPLEMENT RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I wish to pose a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister as yet in a position to advise the house what action if any is to be taken by the government to implement the recommendations of the royal commission on the publications?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I have said on previous occasions, when the government is in a position to do so, it will advise and inform the house.

FINANCE

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—REPORTED RECOMMENDATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. On July 22, 1961 the Ottawa Citizen carried a story called "Canada Urged to Peg Dollar" the first sentence of which reads:

> Canada was advised by the international monetary fund today to return her dollar to a pegged exchange rate but informants said Canada gave no firm indication she would accept the advice—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member has laid sufficient foundation for his question.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, my question is this. Is there any truth in the story carried in the Ottawa Citizen of July 22, 1961?

Mr. Speaker: It has not been the practice to ask the simple question, can the minister advise whether or not the newspaper report is true.

Mr. Fulton: Especially one of last July.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, as pointed out by the Minister of Justice, the matter is not one of urgency and, furthermore, was the subject of a question which was dealt with this morning.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may ask a question, but not a supplementary.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, you are quite correct in checking me on the use of that phraseology in my question. My question is this. In view of the apparent conflict between the answer given by the parliamentary secretary to questions today and an earlier announcement of July 22 on the same subject, would the parliamentary secretary look into the matter and bring forward a statement on the situation?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will examine Hansard of September 7 at page 8057 he will find an answer of the Minister of Finance which deals with the matter in full detail.

INDUSTRY

SHIPBUILDING—ASSISTANCE IN CONSTRUCTION OF SMALL VESSELS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask whether, in the light of the statement by the Minister of Transport some time ago that the assistance for ship construction would include assistance for small fishing vessels, any other fishing vessels are included in this assistance except 75 foot steel trawlers. If so, what they are?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member studies the regulations that have been printed he will find that the definition of ships which qualify for assistance is those that are used in some commercial enterprise, which would include fishing. In addition there is a subsidy for certain classes of fishing vessels, which is administered by the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question for clarification. Would the minister indicate whether there is in fact any new or additional assistance for any kind of fishing vessel except steel trawlers 75 feet and over?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The types of fishing vessels which come within the regulations published by the Department of Transport. The fact that they are fishing vessels will not exclude them from the general terms.

BROADCASTING

TATAMAGOUCHE, N.S.—APPLICATION FOR NEW STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if he could say whether the board of broadcast governors has received and, if so, whether it has considered an application to establish a new radio station at Tatamagouche, Nova Scotia by the Colchester Broadcasting Company. If so, what disposition has been made on such application?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I am not in a position to give a full answer, Mr. Speaker. My impression is that that application was considered within the last few days, but I shall have to check to be positive of it.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO FALL-OUT RESULTING FROM RECENT TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. My question is based on his recent statement concerning fall-out levels resulting from recent nuclear test explosions. Can the minister say whether the calculations he gave to the house yesterday included the fall-out levels from the last two Soviet union explosions, one of which at least was of greater magnitude than any of its predecessors?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge they did not.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Acting Minister of Finance whether he is in a position to inform the house of the personnel of the Canadian delegation of officials that will be meeting with other commonwealth government officials in London in the next week or so to discuss problems arising out of the United Kingdom application to join the European common market.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Acting Minister of Finance): I will take that as notice.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

PRIVY COUNCIL

312. Payment, notwithstanding anything in the Financial Administration Act or the Senate and House of Commons Act respecting the independence of parliament, to each member of the Queen's privy council for Canada who is a minister for whom no salary or allowance in addition to the allowances under section 33 and section 44 of the Senate and House of Commons Act is provided (the acceptance of which shall not render such member ineligible or disqualify him as a member of the House of Commons) of a salary of $7,500 per annum and pro rata for any period less than a year, $7,500.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, the one item with which I will deal at this moment will be the emergency measures and the organization in general, in order to place before the committee some indication of the measures that have been taken for survival. I take it that this will provide the committee with an opportunity to hear the views of various members regarding this matter. I trust that after discussion general support will be given to the measures and plans which have been evolved and are in effect.

The committee started with a consideration of external affairs and proceeded to a general discussion of the problem of defence. As indicated by me the other day, I hoped for an early opportunity to place before the committee something of the views of the government in the application of the principles of survival as developed by co-operation among federal, provincial, and municipal authorities.

On September 7, the Minister of National Defence and I made statements to the house regarding decisions that had been made on certain emergency preparations in the defence field. At that time I indicated that I would make a more comprehensive statement on emergency measures. I am not going to repeat any of the matters or deal with the questions that were dealt with earlier, except to say that the progress made by the Department of National Defence in respect of the order in council for emergency planning passed in 1959 which has resulted in the formulation of plans that can be brought rapidly into action at a time of crisis is in the opinion of the government confirmation of the wisdom of the decision that was made to assign to the Department of National Defence certain major responsibilities in the emergency planning field.

The statement made by the Minister of National Defence on September 7 dealt more particularly with the national survival role of that department. I wish at this time to say something further with respect to other aspects of emergency planning as they affect the public in general.

Two matters are very much in the minds of the Canadian people at the moment. One is that at a time of stress and difficulty, with the ever-increasing threats made by Mr. Khrushchev and the increasing number of explosions of larger and larger instruments of destruction, the people are asking what are the possibilities of evacuation or dispersal of residents of larger urban centres, and in particular those that are probable target areas. The other question is the matter of individual shelter, what can be done to provide helpful and meaningful action to reduce the number of persons who would die in any area should such an event take place, and in particular in large cities.

Some say that action in this regard will be ineffective. That is not the point of view of those who know and have given study to this matter not only in our country but in the United Kingdom, the United States and other countries. Indeed, without going into detail at the moment, may I say this. According to the recent announcement of the President of the United States on this important matter, a number of those things which we in Canada had adopted earlier have been accepted now in that country as important steps toward survival. A certain degree of voluntary evacuation is certain to take place and we believe that all cities should have in hand plans to assist in controlling those movements. A corollary, of course, is the planning of suitable reception preparations for those who would need them following their evacuation from their homes.

The other consideration, as I mentioned, is the provision of shelter. A distinction must be made between shelter against the blast and fire effects of nuclear weapons and shelter designed to protect against radioactive fall-out. The former type of shelter has much significance to residents of larger cities which might be the object of direct attack. For the majority of the Canadian people, however, protection against fall-out is much more significant and necessary, since it is the peril which is most likely to affect them. Even in the larger cities, if they are spared direct attack so that blast effects do not arise, fall-out shelters are of importance.

The government has given attention to many of the problems that arise with respect to fall-out. Target cities in arranging their survival plans must give and are giving attention to the positive steps they can take in the direction of both evacuation and shelter, and these plans will vary according to the different circumstances in existence from city to city.

The problem of appropriate types of shelter for Canadians in the varying circumstances is a complex one. Some live in private homes; others live in apartments, and there are considerable numbers in institutions of various kinds. It is felt that in addition to the information concerning shelters which offer a degree of protection and shelters suitable for occupancy for up to 14 days, consideration should be given to adaptations which would provide the same degree of protection at less cost. We should also suggest improvised types of protection suitable for shorter use, and makeshift arrangements where the protection offered is admittedly lower than might be considered reasonable but which will nevertheless give a degree of protection for short periods at least.

In this field of shelters, tenders have been called for construction at the Canadian civil defence college at Arnprior of a variety of prototype shelters. Some of these are designed for single families. Others will take groups of families or other persons totalling as many as 30 occupants. Some will be blast resistant and some are designed to protect against fall-out only. These prototypes will serve for instruction and display, and will make possible investigation of living conditions in them, and, of course, they will be available for use in an emergency.

In addition to shelters in homes and other places of residence, it has been recognized that many larger buildings offer a good deal of potential fall-out protection. With modest preparations possibly involving relatively small costs, fall-out protection can be secured in such buildings for countless thousands of people. With a view to ascertaining which buildings have such possibilities and what their capacity may be, the government in the spring of 1961 authorized suitable surveys. The Department of Public Works proceeded with the work and has completed surveys of all federal buildings with a view to determining the amount of fall-out protection in them.

Members may be interested to learn that new techniques have been developed which enable the Department of Public Works to make these surveys quickly. I refer to the use of special cameras to determine the nature and character of the construction of buildings and the use of electronic computers to speed the securing of early results. This latter procedure came about through co-operation given by the Ontario department of highways, to whom the thanks of the government are extended. This is the type of survey now to be initiated in the United States. I understand that the Canadian methods have been reviewed favourably there and may be adapted for use in the survey recently announced in that country.

Some 4,820 buildings in Canada have been checked, and the Department of Public Works is now engaged in determining those that have adequate fall-out protection, those that can be improved to provide such protection, and others that cannot be thus improved due to the excessive costs involved. These surveys and their results will be available to the planners concerned shortly, and it will then be possible to determine how much of such accommodation could be made available to the public.

A new technical manual entitled "An Engineer Looks at Fall-out Shelter" has just been printed. It is designed for use by engineers and architects who will be responsible for carrying out surveys of existing fall-out protection in buildings and the possible incorporation of protective measures against fall-out in new buildings. These manuals are now being distributed and should be invaluable to provinces and municipalities in undertaking their fall-out shelter surveys generally throughout the country.

In planning for the survival of our people, accurate public information is of vital importance, and during the past two years the government has authorized the publication of a series of pamphlets under the general name "Blueprint for Survival". These have included such booklets as "Your Basement Fall-out Shelter", "Fall-out on the Farm" and, more recently, "Eleven Steps to Survival". These pamphlets have been very much in demand, and as a result of the present international situation there has been a very large increase in requests in the last few weeks. More than a million copies of the publication "Eleven Steps To Survival" were printed up to July of this year, but it has become necessary to arrange for another large printing which is now in hand. This is indicative of the attitude and the feeling of Canadians as a whole. It is felt that publications which relate to the protection of the people under the possible perils of nuclear war deserve top priority in view of the widespread demand for full and up to the minute information.

Furthermore, there are other media of public information that will be used both nationally and locally, including the press, television and radio. The C.B.C. has been charged with the responsibility of developing an emergency radio broadcasting plan whereby adequate information can be made available to the public in the event of nuclear war even if normal broadcasting facilities are disrupted. C.B.C. studios are directly connected with army warning centres, and are capable of transmitting vital information to the public should the need arise.

In so far as a national exercise is concerned, the announcement was made recently that there will be another national exercise to test emergency plans. The last one was held in May, 1961, and served to inform the public of the plans that have been developed nationally, provincially and municipally. The forthcoming exercise, which I think will take place in early November, will enable the various warning arrangements to be used. It will bring home to individual Canadians and to the various levels of government their responsibilities and will enable an exploration of what can be done to meet the potential dangers. In short, the aim of such an exercise is to check the readiness of this country to meet the actual challenge of war if perchance that challenge should confront us.

The planning and preparations made by provinces and municipalities are important and cannot be overemphasized. I might refer to the financial assistance program of the federal government, which recognizes that planning of this sort is most significant as it gets nearer and nearer the people affected. That is why local planning is of such great importance. While the federal government can develop broad measures for Canada as a whole, and the provinces likewise within their respective boundaries, planning in detail can only be done at the local level. Hence the case for support and assistance in the costs that will be involved.

For some years the federal government has provided such financial support in respect of personnel and administration costs, supplies and equipment, training and all the other items that arise in the course of local planning. Included are communications equipment, construction costs for local emergency government headquarters, payment of fees for first aid training, purchase of protective clothing for volunteers and other emergency personnel, rescue equipment, vehicles, cost of local training exercises and publication of local survival plans including material on evacuation and shelter such as has been done by some of the larger cities. These costs are supported on approval to the extent of 75 per cent and when I say that these costs are supported I mean that they are supported from federal sources.

The federal government has provided $4,350,000 for this financial assistance program during the current fiscal year. To date projects totalling $3.5 million have been approved, of which the federal share exceeds $2.5 million, and a further volume of projects of an approximate value of $1.5 million is now being reviewed. It would appear that eventually more than $5 million in provincial and municipal projects will have been submitted this year, of which the federal government will pay some $3,700,000. This program of financial assistance has been generally admitted by the provinces to have been extremely helpful in provincial and local emergency planning.

In order that municipalities should have a degree of guidance in developing their local emergency plans, several significant steps have been taken by the federal government including the distribution of a publication "A Survival Planning Guide for Municipalities" and the provision of courses for mayors, reeves and councillors, as well as courses for municipal officials. This feature has been widely accepted by municipal officials.

I might point out that at the conference for mayors, reeves and wardens held in May at the Canadian civil defence college, some 69 attended. There were 64 present in October, 1960 at the Canadian civil defence college conference in respect to the provinces of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. At the conference in Edmonton from November 4 to 7, 1960 for the three prairie provinces, British Columbia, Northwest Territories and the Yukon, 56 attended. A further course took place in Ontario from November 6 to 10, 1960 at the Canadian civil defence college, and 81 attended. There were further courses in March and June this year for the maritime area and also for the western area. In all, these courses were attended by some 414 mayors, reeves and wardens.

The foregoing measures are largely concerned with survival. There is a related and important aspect of emergency planning, and that is the continuity of government. This is being provided for in all NATO countries to assure that there shall be such continuity in the event that war comes. This continuity of government is being provided for, so far as it is possible to do so, for all levels of government. If people are to survive they will need leadership, not only national but provincial as well as municipal. The government has authorized the construction of emergency headquarters in each of the provinces to provide facilities for governmental operations in wartime.

Since permanent emergency headquarters will not be completed for some months, it has been found desirable to make available immediately interim emergency headquarters. These will have the necessary communications to ensure that operations can be carried on. Arrangements are in effect with regard to the provision of central facilities for the federal government. Similar facilities are now being provided in the provinces designed for use by a nucleus of federal public servants in each province and by various elements of the provincial government and its officials, and by the Canadian army. These regional headquarters are protected against radioactive fallout but are not provided with protection against blast effect. The headquarters are not in the so-called target areas.

This is an aspect to which reference is made from time to time. It is one of those things that are absolutely necessary. It was found to be necessary in the days of the last war when the probabilities of complete disruption of government by the destruction of capital cities was far less direct and fearsome than it is today.

With regard to other aspects of emergency measures, I should like to refer to the fields of transportation, meteorology and defence production, as well as health and hospitalization. In the field of transportation we have provided for the establishment of an emergency organization for the control of all types of transport, inland, coastal, water, civil aviation, and road. The Department of Transport is working in close relationship with all agencies involved. Qualified individuals have been and are being selected to serve on emergency transport organizations. Plans have been made for the control and administration in wartime of the whole civil and national telecommunications system to ensure the best possible use of communications that survive attack, and the identification of alternate routes where existing systems have been disrupted or destroyed.

Provision is being made for the continuation of meterological services across Canada, for they are vital from many points of view, not the least of which is the assessment of fall-out patterns.

The Department of Defence Production has planned the organization of a war supplies agency which will be responsible in wartime for the control, production and distribution of all supplies and the establishment of rationing and price controls if required. Individuals are being selected to serve on the war supplies agency in wartime, and studies are being made of the need for the stockpiling in peacetime of certain supplies to be located so as to be readily available for use by the population. The department has already achieved a certain capability to operate such an agency, both nationally and regionally, and has a well developed plan for a system of damage analysis in order to be able to calculate immediately what supplies remain after attack and from this to determine their best use.

Now I come to the question of health. The Department of National Health and Welfare is responsible for arranging and stockpiling essential medical items. This has now reached a cost of $9 million, with supplies placed at strategic points throughout the country. In many cases they have been redistributed and so located as to be available to provincial health services. Eventually this program will cost $18 million. Arrangements have been made to have available 200 emergency hospitals with total accommodation for 40,000 patients. These emergency hospitals can be set up on short notice, thereby adding greatly to the national capacity for taking care of the victims of a nuclear war. All nursing schools in Canada and six of the 12 medical schools have introduced into their curricula a study of emergency nursing and health procedure. Through the co-operation of the St. John's Ambulance and Red Cross, tens of thousands of men and women have been trained in first aid and home nursing procedures. It has been estimated that some 50 per cent of all hospitals in Canada now have disaster plans.

These are examples of the work of particular departments and agencies. Others are doing comparable work. A case in point is the planning by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which will help support the efforts of the various attorneys general in maintaining law and order.

With a view to providing the necessary authority for control of all these areas of emergency action, special orders and regulations will have to be available for use in wartime. The federal departments concerned have already submitted proposals for the orders, and these are now being assessed with a view to assuring their adequacy and also to prevent duplication.

There are additional measures in a number of fields that are being studied, such as the following:

1. The authorization for the emergency measures organization, through the C.B.C. and otherwise to arrange appropriate notices to draw public attention to shelter and other survival measures such as those set forth in the pamphlet "Eleven Steps to Survival".

2. Determination of the costs that will be involved in bringing selected federal buildings up to at least minimum standards of protection against fall-out and in providing essential facilities and supplies for survival of occupants under fall-out conditions.

3. Consideration of measures giving priority to target areas, which in the main include our larger cities, for increasing fall-out protection for those dwelling in private houses or apartment houses by making it possible for people to make use of government, privately owned, commercial and industrial buildings.

4. Arrangements for an early conference of federal and provincial ministers in the civil emergency planning field to review planning programs, training programs, financial aid measures and related matters.

5. Development by EMO of a pattern of decentralized units of emergency government on a zonal basis, each of these zones being smaller than regions, in order to provide the necessary backup to emergency arrangements for regional government and to ensure that survival programs are understood by the people concerned.

6. Consideration of measures to ensure the training of the great numbers of civilians required in rescue and radiation monitoring to be undertaken by federal, provincial and local authorities, this planning being additional to the army's current program in these fields.

I should stress that most of the items of planning to which I have made reference have been under way for some time but the present international situation has tended to emphasize their importance. Looking back to what has taken place since 1959, may I say this. The basic arrangement then made, assigning the main civil defence responsibilities to four departments of government, has worked out very well. As I said a moment ago, the arrangement announced within the last few weeks by President Kennedy with respect to civil emergency planning parallels in many respects the arrangement which we have brought into effect. The assignments now given to the secretary of defence in the United States in respect of survival planning are very much similar to those carried out here by the Department of National Defence in the fields of warning, radiological monitoring, emergency communications and damage assessment.

There is a significant difference in the responsibility for the development of the shelter program, which is placed in the privy council office through the emergency measures organization. The current stress given to shelter in the United States, particularly with respect to the use of surveys to determine the protective capacity of existing buildings, is similar to the work we have been doing throughout the year 1961.

The creation of the office of emergency planning in the United States, which will be charged in the main with the co-ordination of all civilian wartime planning and with the responsibility of developing useful measures for the continuity of government, has brought into existence an agency comparable to the emergency measures organization which we have here.

I think these points are worthy of emphasis, for they indicate that Canadian planning, while it was focused on Canada and the specific needs of the Canadian people, is not unrelated to planning in the United States and, I might add as well, among our NATO allies generally.

This, Mr. Chairman, is not the kind of report one would relish bringing before the house. It is, however, necessary. We realize that in our country and in the free world there hangs over us from day to day the cloud of successive test explosions by the U.S.S.R., threatening in their import and I only hope not prospective of their use in the days ahead. I know there are some who say, "Why do anything about it?" These are measures designed as insurance to the highest degree possible for the survival of Canadians. I pray that they will never be used.

When I read some of the headlines I think it must be emphasized and re-emphasized that scaring people is not the course that democracies follow. Democracies, however, are sometimes slow to realize the danger, namely that the challenges of communism which know no restraint but power, are being increased daily. The devotion of this government is to peace. The continued advocacy of disarmament has had that one purpose in mind. However, when you arrive at a point where everything you endeavour to do in order to bring about disarmament is met by the stone wall of formidable indifference coupled with continuing threats, the people in the free world must realize that every action a government can take for survival must be taken.

Peace is our aim. Peace is our dedication. Peace is the purpose for which the hours of government are taken. But at the same time we would be remiss if we did not do everything we can to preserve and maintain our country against the dread contingency that has been made more frightening by the repeated statements, each often more threatening than the last, that have characterized Mr. Khrushchev and his international revelations and plans during the last few months.

I do not say that what has been done is perfect. No plan that can be made will ever achieve the measure of perfection that all of us have in mind. Last evening I was reading Lord Hankey's book, which is in two volumes, on the days of war. He was the clerk of the British cabinet. After all, clerks of the cabinet are closer to international and national events than even the cabinet ministers themselves, for they have all the departments within their knowledge. He points out the number of trials that turned out to be errors. All the same, advances were made each time.

We are in a field that has never been seriously considered as a necessary one in the past. We are in a field of danger that has developed nationally and internationally. It has developed in increasing measure since 1948. I think we owe the thanks of the house and the country to those who are devoting themselves to this administration, to the voluntary workers, to those who are in charge of the organization, to Mr. Curry and those associated with him. After all, in so far as voluntary workers are concerned, they are giving their services, often thanklessly in the public mind, in their individual contributions to the survival of us all. Such service is of the highest order of good citizenship.

I have taken longer than I intended, but I ought to place before the committee in some detail the action that is being taken and some conception of the additional steps that we have in hand.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee has been indeed interested in the statement by the Prime Minister this morning. It was a comprehensive statement in many ways. It covered a great deal of territory. It also reflected an awakening of the government's interest in the subject of civil survival. It was delivered in a very serious tone. One cannot help but wonder whether that tone is reflected in the action being contemplated by the government.

It is interesting to note that another exercise will be held in November to test the adequacy of measures taken so far. We hope there will be a considerable improvement shown from the last exercise. We are sure this will be so. However, we still suspect that it will show up a considerable number of very fundamental gaps, and we feel these have to be discussed in greater detail. In considering this subject one must look at a fundamental question, is passive defence worth while? This depends on the kind of world in which we and our children will have to live.

It is a fact, as the Prime Minister indicated, that the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics have great stockpiles of nuclear and thermonuclear weapons. It is also a fact that they are continuing the production and development of these weapons. Much time and effort has been spent attempting to negotiate a disarmament agreement, so far without success. This is a matter of profound regret to all of us. At the same time we must face the facts as they exist. If we must live under an umbrella of thermonuclear terror for a prolonged period, it may be advisable to take such effective steps as are open to us. As Rogers Cannell said:

> A non-military defence program is very much more than a passive aspect of preparation for all-out war. An extensive, well planned, thoroughly co-ordinated civil defence program is one of the best, most positive steps we can take to avoid war or blackmail threats of war.

The Russians know that we have as yet no real protection for our population. Knowing this, they are in a much stronger position to attempt atomic blackmail. The threat of an attack which would kill a large proportion of our population cannot be taken lightly.

Also, the Soviet know that we have no defence now. A dozen Bomarc squadrons and a dozen squadrons of Voodoos would not begin to provide us with any protection. As a matter of fact the fall-out from these so-called defensive weapons alone, if they are equipped with nuclear warheads, would be sufficient to wreak tremendous havoc amongst our civilian population. No, Mr. Chairman, we have no protection from these devices; we are as exposed as babes in the wood.

The true value of any defence program lies in its contribution to national objectives. If total war should come, and like the Prime Minister we pray that it will not, the survival of the people—and they are the nation—would be a primary objective. It is virtually certain that at the present time and in the foreseeable future the most effective measures for national survival in the event of war are those which contribute most to the survival of the people. These same measures act as a considerable deterrent to those who would contemplate the launching of a total war.

The Russians themselves appreciate this position. They have already taken steps far in advance of ours, and most of the adult population has received extensive instruction in civil defence measures emphasizing radiological protection.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. gentleman to give his authority for that statement.

Mr. Hellyer: My authority for that statement is the Stanford Institute research program. The Russians, aware of the facts, train their population in such activities as decontamination, shelter improvisation and atomic, biological and chemical warfare protection. Our government, too, is in possession of the facts, but so far does not seem to take the subject as seriously as one might expect, if the information available to the civilian population is true.

I have often said that it is important, in considering a large problem, to first admit that it exists and then to gauge its magnitude. Once this has been done it is possible to take action on the required scale. If the job is worth doing it is worth doing well. It is useless for some people to have shelters, for example, and others not. In this case chaos would result, if war were launched. As someone said the other day, "What sort of a problem would there be if the sirens sounded; if one person in a neighbourhood had a shelter and if women and children from other homes in the neighbourhood began to congregate there for protection?" On what basis would the selection be made? What tests it would impose on human behaviour.

It is a question of all or nothing. If the job is to be an all-out job, it can only be done if the government provides the leadership, and in particular if it provides the financial assistance necessary to do the job. The magnitude is too great for individual initiative. Strong leadership is required, and strong leadership has not yet been forthcoming. The Prime Minister himself said this morning, "If people are to survive, they need leadership". We agree with that. We are glad to see this new interest.

As the Prime Minister indicated, at least by inference, it would not even be sufficient to have a shelter in every home. The requirement would depend on the time of day at which the attack took place. If it occurred during the day, for example, many children would be at school. It would be necessary to have effective fall-out shelters in schools and other public buildings. The Prime Minister has indicated that surveys are going to be undertaken to determine the adaptability of public buildings for fall-out shelters. The thing that would concern many people in a casual reading of the right hon. gentleman's statement would be the number of surveys which are now to be undertaken. One would wonder why some of them had not been undertaken sooner if the threat is as grave as was reflected in the Prime Minister's tone this morning.

The Prime Minister referred to evacuation. Certainly to have evacuation, warning would be required. Undoubtedly there might be some cases when evacuation would be necessary in the cold war. In times of extreme crisis or if we were under the threat of atomic blackmail, if adequate facilities were available for partial evacuation of our great cities it would add something to the credibility of the deterrent. But this is no substitute for urban residential shelters.

Then, too, the warning systems must be realistic, and as yet they are not. The sirens themselves are practically useless and often do not work. The signals are sometimes not understood. Sometimes they cannot be heard in all areas, and certainly not inside buildings with the windows closed. They cannot be heard when the weather is inclement, when there are storms, and they certainly could not be heard, in most cases, by sleepers at night. If the system is going to be of any use at all and if it is to effectively fulfil its function it has to be properly arranged. There is no question but that an effective warning system would require an individual type of warning, some device within every home and building which could be instantaneously activated either by telephone or by radio in the event of attack. The period of warning has become so short that no other means of communication would be adequate. Some automatic device would have to be developed which would be capable of coping with the situation.

In addition to the shelters and an adequate warning system, many other measures are required. The Prime Minister outlined a number of them in his statement this morning. These include facilities for the storage of food and materials, the provision of medical supplies and other necessities of life, facilities for re-entry and for rehabilitation. All these things must be attended to. It is obvious that to do the job properly even on a minimum scale is a major and expensive project. Any guess as to the probable cost without benefit of a thorough study would be highly speculative. It is obvious, however, that an expenditure of $3 billion or $4 billion would be required in as many years if shelter protection and warning systems were to be installed on a universal basis for our population.

It is the responsibility of the government to say whether or not the job is worth doing. The government is presumably in possession of all the facts; indeed, it sometimes gives the impression that it is endowed with prescience. If the job is essential we should be told and advised of the consequences. If the government does not think the task is worth undertaking it should say so and give the reasons, explaining at the same time why it is spending money on partial and inadequate measures.

What has the government done so far? In fact, very little, and in reverse order. It is true that it has set up an emergency measures organization. It is also true, as the Prime Minister reminded us this morning, that it has divided the responsibility among four and perhaps more departments. There are those who think this authority is too divided, that it is unworkable, because it lacks a straight line command.

I join the Prime Minister in his tribute to the individuals who are members of the emergency measures organization and others engaged in this work. They are doing the very best they can under extremely difficult circumstances. They are dedicated, competent individuals, and we wish them every success in what they are undertaking. But the real problem is the lack of leadership on the part of the government. This case has been put many times, once by the Globe and Mail in an editorial on Thursday, May 18, 1961. The article is entitled "Survival Without Defence" and reads in part as follows:

> The core of the difficulty in evolving a comprehensive civil defence policy is the lack of a clear defence policy, which in turn would have to stem from a well-defined foreign policy.

In the opinion of some of us at least we still do not have a clearly defined defence and foreign policy. The government has, of course, built a shelter for itself. This is fine. The Prime Minister mentioned the necessity for the continuity of government. We hope he is not preoccupied with the continuity of the present government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member need not worry about that; we are sure.

Mr. Hellyer: I think the Prime Minister spends a great deal of time worrying about it. The government has purchased very little equipment. The government is now talking about prototype shelters. I must say I was surprised to hear that reference in the Prime Minister's statement. I would have thought the prototypes would have been undertaken many months ago. Particularly I would have thought the prototypes would have been completed before pamphlets were prepared and distributed to the public indicating methods of construction.

In addition to those things mentioned by the Prime Minister this morning, most of which in substance are in the planning and survey stages, the government has mentioned the training of 100,000 additional troops for civil survival. This, on the face of it, sounds like a very fine idea. We certainly need more trained people to assist in the event of a national calamity. According to the figures given to the committee yesterday by the Minister of National Defence, the cost of the training of these individuals will be approximately $5 million per month for pay and allowances alone. On the basis of the total figure he gave us it is obvious there is no provision whatsoever for equipment. We are going to have a broomstick army. I can just see them now, the 100,000 men out with their brooms sweeping up the radioactive debris. Of course I forgot one thing. They will all be dead; they will, that is, unless an adequate shelter and warning system has been established in the meantime. The whole program has been backwards. It is useless to have a training scheme without the essential requirements of shelters, warning systems and a stockpile of supplies, etc.

It would be difficult to establish priorities, but certainly a proper priority would be to build the shelters, to install adequate warning systems and to undertake the training simultaneously.

So far we have been shadow boxing; so far the whole talk about civil survival has had an air of unreality. The people of Canada have a right to be told, and on behalf of the official opposition we demand that they be told, whether the government really takes this problem seriously or whether it does not; whether the government feels that we must have an adequate shelter and warning system or whether it does not. If the answer is positive, then there should be a positive program for effecting it. If the answer is negative, then there should be positive reasons given why they are not required. This is the responsibility of the government. This is what the people expect of their government.

This morning the Prime Minister said that the democracies are sometimes slow to realize the danger. I think that statement can be underlined. The question the Canadian people ask is whether this government has been slow to understand the danger. I hope that before the debate is ended someone will again intervene on behalf of the government and tell the committee in clear and unequivocal terms whether the government is going to make the program work, whether it is worth working, or whether we are just going to continue, as we have in the past, to dabble with it.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, I am sure all hon. members were impressed with the seriousness of the situation as described by the Prime Minister this morning. I am sure also we were impressed with his frankness in indicating that this plan could not achieve perfection because we do not know exactly what kind of attack it will be, what the extent of it will be, or even the kind of weapons which will be used. Indeed, that is an understatement. We cannot achieve perfection, but surely we can give the Canadian people some sense of urgency, some sense of purpose and some sense of direction, something which has been entirely lacking over the past ten years.

This morning the premier of Ontario was quoted as saying, "For the first time we have order out of chaos because for once the army has been brought into this whole matter." This statement is made ten years after we have been threatened with thermonuclear war. The premier of Ontario called the efforts chaos. Evidently the only way a democratic nation can get out of chaos is by calling in the army. I think this is something which we as parliamentarians should be rather sober about. Indeed, I think the measures which were put forward this morning could have a good effect, but only if it is completely proven to the people of Canada that this government is serious about what is going on.

I thought the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence made a very good point yesterday when he said that we cannot put our heads in the sand. We cannot assume that because thermonuclear war will be so terrible, so horrible, therefore no human being would bring it about. We cannot be so completely devoid of recognition of human madness as to believe that war could not come. He is quite right. All of us in this house have been disgusted, have been angry and supremely disappointed over what the Soviet union has done in the past two weeks. Perhaps if some of us have not belabored Mr. Khrushchev as thoroughly as others—and this includes all parties—it may be because some of us have felt that there is no great advantage in belaboring Mr. Khrushchev.

There is a second way in which we can put our heads in the sand, and that is by failing to recognize the extent of the next war and the kind of attack which will be made. It is the feeling of many, I am sure, that our defence policies and our emergency measures policies are based on some kind of limited nuclear war. We have been told by people who should know that the U.S.S.R. has hundreds of bombers, and our emergency measures organizations are based on the assumption that only a few, maybe ten to 20, will get through.

This is an assumption for which I can find no strategic basis. We know the U.S.S.R. has missiles well on the way to development. We know they are capable of being fired now, yet our defence policies and our emergency measures organization policies are based on the belief that only one or two or three or four missiles will be fired in the first few hours. This seems unbelievable. We know that the Russians have a number of submarines. Some of them may be equipped with nuclear weaponry; yet we assume that only a very few will reach our shores, and only a few shots will be fired. I think this is the reason the people of Canada are so completely immune to the pleadings of the emergency measures organization people throughout the entire country. This feeling is found everywhere. People just cannot get very interested.

The Prime Minister mentioned the pamphlet which was sent out showing how to build a fall-out and blast shelter for $500. In Peterborough last March we tried to find out how many shelters were in the city. We could not find one shelter that had been erected. There had not been a building permit taken out for one shelter. This shows the extent to which the people of Canada are completely oblivious to the danger. They are basing their belief on the hope that there will be no war, or that it will be so complete that there is simply nothing that can be done about it, largely because of the attitude of the government which is based on the assumption that the kind of war which will take place is a limited nuclear war. Yesterday I sat in this chamber and was shocked by the remarks of the Associate Minister of National Defence when he said, as reported at page 8241 of Hansard:

> If the worst should come, and if we have to fight again, I do not hesitate to say that we shall once again win the battles of tomorrow just as we won the battles of yesteryear, and this for many reasons. The main reason is that we have right on our side and that right in the days of tomorrow will triumph as it has always triumphed in former years.

We shall win the war of tomorrow. Is this the kind of war it will be? I wish the minister had stated that he meant a limited war. I can only assume he does not see the possibility of an all-out nuclear war in the future. Surely hon. members are convinced that no one will win the wars of the future, and any attempt to talk about winning thermonuclear wars is a deception.

This is what worries me most, the fact that the Associate Minister of National Defence, who has the information in regard to the kind of defence we are building, should be talking about a limited war. If he is sure that Russia has only a few missiles capable of reaching United States and Canadian shores, if he is sure that she has only a few submarines, then he should tell the people of Canada and not talk about winning wars of this kind. He should tell the people that they have nothing to worry about other than a limited war, for which the defence which we have and the emergency measures organization we are preparing will be sufficient. But that is not being done. We have no information whatsoever that this government believes it will be that kind of nuclear war.

I turn now particularly to the emergency measures organization. I do not intend to go into the background, the history of confusion, lack of purpose, lack of material resources and divided authority which makes Mr. Frost's comment about chaos very descriptive. If there is any government which should be concerned about taking the lead in this matter of national survival, it should be the federal government. As I have said, I was much impressed this morning, and I hope we are at the beginning of a new era. I hope we have turned the corner, and that the national government is going to do something about national survival.

I speak as a representative of a community which is not crying or whining for help. It has done as much as it is humanly possible to do to deal with the matter of an emergency measures organization. I have been to other communities where it is nothing more than an office held by some person who has pretty well given up trying to get co-operation. We have a mayor who has taken the lead as the head of the organization. I was shocked when I saw in the newspapers the remark of the mayor of Ottawa, who asked "Shall we get out or shall we get under"? If she does not know it is certainly a terrible situation, because I understand that the federal government expects the mayors of the various municipalities to take the lead in this matter and to be aware of what is going on and what is being planned.

In the community that I represent the authorities have organized in every direction, including the police and fire departments and the Red Cross disaster service. It has been determined what the restaurants and cafeterias can do. It has been determined what Canada Packers, Quaker Oats and other industries can do. They have even brought the ham radio operators into the picture. Every effort has been made to determine exactly what the community can do in terms of a national disaster. What the authorities are looking for is some direction from the top.

Last January an exercise was held in many parts of Canada, when the siren systems were tested. In my community 100 people were listening for them, and a very small percentage even heard them. The survival operation came and went with very few people even knowing that it had taken place. Some of us feel that the sirens are inadequate. Some even say that they are useless, that the pitch is too high and that they are completely unsuitable having in mind the conditions we have in this country. I would hope that serious reconsideration would be given in the very near future to the type of sirens being used. As soon as the exercise was over a letter was written indicating that the people of the area could not even be warned if a national disaster took place. Yet today nothing has been done; we still have the same five sirens.

The Minister of National Defence gave us to understand that a new test is going to be made with the idea of trying to fill the gaps that were indicated in the previous test, but so far nothing has been done. The Prime Minister talks about the gaps shown in exercise Tocsin. Let us get rid of the gaps that existed even before that. I would say that the whole idea of individual shelters in the basements of homes has to be reviewed in terms of the kind of all-out nuclear war which a great many experts are predicting. The very fact that protection for the Canadian people is based wholly on whether a person has $500 to build a shelter is in my opinion a national shame. Having in mind the hundreds of thousands of unemployed last winter, and the fact that a great percentage of our farmers are not even making $2,000 a year, how can it be expected that these people are going to be able to pay $500 in a year to build a shelter? There is the additional fact that if you build a shelter you are then assessed more on the building containing the shelter than previously. In other words, you will pay for the shelter for the rest of your life.

Mr. Speakman: Would it be worth while having it to be alive?

Mr. Pitman: If I could be sure of being alive, but that is the whole point that needs reassessment in terms of the type of war being predicted. We need to reassess the whole basis of our thinking. We would not sell Salk vaccine at $10 a shot, and neither should we be selling national survival on the basis of $500 for shelters in the basements of our homes.

In the pamphlet "Eleven Steps To Survival" there is set forth step by step a method by which we can survive. I am very concerned about information I have received to the effect that this publication is not entirely reliable. I have a letter here written by a gentleman in my area who is a Ph.D. in nuclear physics, who has worked on nuclear reactors for some nine or ten years and has even invented and patented instruments to detect radiation. He has studied this pamphlet and has reached some very interesting conclusions as to the validity of the bases on which it has been written. He has this to say in the letter, and I am pleased to place this on the record:

My main concern is with the advice EMO is giving on fall-out shelters. Take first your booklet "Eleven Steps To Survival". On page 10 under "Know the Facts About Radioactive Fall-out" it is implied that the fall-out comes from activation of "earth, stones, buildings" etc.; but the decay rate stated on page 12 is that for fission products from the fission of U-235. But regardless of this inconsistency, if the radioactivity were from the earth, the lifetime of that radioactivity would depend on the locale, and one could not make any such general statement as is made on page 12. On page 14 the pamphlet states that the shelter given in "Blueprint For Survival No. 1" will stop 99 per cent of the radiation. This is not true. Eight inches of solid concrete will only stop about 90 per cent of the radiation; the difference between 99 per cent and 90 per cent may sound trifling but it means that the occupant of the shelter receives ten times as much radiation in the 90 per cent case as in the 99 per cent case.

Do you wish to call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, in view of what will take place at 2.30 this afternoon, with the president of Iceland in the chamber, could we now rise and report progress so that Mr. Speaker will be in the chair at that time?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, having had these general statements from the opposition, I would suggest that we return to the defence estimates this afternoon. I made my statement this morning because of the undertaking I had given to the Leader of the Opposition and in accordance with the arrangement that was made.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not know whether the Prime Minister has consulted with those in our party about that, but I understand that what he suggests would not be too convenient for us. If it is not too inconvenient for him, we would prefer to continue with the estimates of the privy council today and then return to the defence estimates tomorrow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the president of Iceland will be in the gallery we have to break in any event, out of courtesy to him, and I suggest that the committee should then continue with the defence estimates. I wanted to get my statement before the house so the widest possible discussion could take place.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, the members of this group support the official opposition in their request to continue the discussion of the civil defence item this afternoon and if possible finish it before we adjourn at six o'clock. I think we could do that very easily and we would then have all the discussion in Hansard in the one place. Would the Prime Minister reconsider his suggestion?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I always want to consider such matters, but the president of Iceland is here, which necessitates absences from the house. I would not be able to be here for the discussion. I wanted to carry out my agreement with the opposition that I would make my statement this morning. I have done so, and I would appreciate it if the house would permit me to be free this afternoon.

Progress reported.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PRESIDENT OF ICELAND

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I should like to refer to the presence in the gallery of the president of Iceland, Mr. Asgeir Asgeirsson, who is not unused to parliamentary institutions. He was, for a period of years, a member of the parliament of Iceland and occupied successive portfolios, finally that of prime minister. Throughout the years, he has made a great contribution to freedom and to the maintenance of good relations amongst the nations. This country and Iceland have had close relations going back for a thousand years. Indeed, it is not for me to become controversial, but it is recorded that the discoverer of Canada, Lief Erikson, was of Icelandic origin and came here 400 or 500 years before the recorded discovery. Throughout the intervening years there have been close ties between our nations.

Today, there are around 24,000 people of Icelandic origin in Canada, and they have two representatives in the House of Commons, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stefanson), and in the other place Senator Thorvaldson. This is an indication of the persuasive influence that the possession of a parliamentary form of government for ten centuries has had on the thinking and the lives of those either born in or descended from that country.

During the days of war, Canadian troops were stationed in Iceland in the years 1940 and 1941. Later on, there was a Royal Canadian naval base at Iceland which made it possible to bring about, at an earlier date, victory in the battle of the Atlantic. Since the war Iceland has been one of those countries which has given itself to freedom. It is a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and its position, so strategically placed, has made it an important bastion in the north Atlantic community.

I am sure I speak for all hon. members in the house in extending to him a warm welcome, to his wife and, if I may join therewith the foreign minister, Mr. Gudmundsson and Mrs. Gudmundsson, as well as other members of their party. I hope that their stay in Canada will be an enjoyable one and that in the years ahead, as in the past, we shall walk together in freedom.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest appreciation and pleasure that I associate the Liberal party with the welcome the Prime Minister has just extended to the president of Iceland, his wife and to the members of his party. I do so, Mr. Speaker, with all the greater pleasure because I have, myself, had the privilege of visiting Iceland twice and have been the beneficiary of the legendary hospitality of the friendly people of that island.

The president is the representative of a people who, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has said, have deep and close links with our own country. It is a country which has sent many of its men and women to Canada who, with their descendants, have enriched every aspect of Canadian life, including the arts, the sciences, law and the public service. As we have just been reminded by the Prime Minister, there are two members of our own house who are of Icelandic descent. At a time when there are in the world those who are trying to gain respect by brute force and braggadocio, it is a refreshing privilege to welcome to this house and to our country the distinguished leader of a people who, a thousand years and more ago, had learned how to govern themselves peacefully through free parliamentary institutions and who, ever since then, have earned the respect of all peoples not by their power but by their civilized decency and their passionate devotion to liberty under law.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group I associate our members with the best wishes that have been expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Pearson) to the president of Iceland and his colleagues who are present in the house today.

Iceland has been referred to as the grandmother of parliaments, having been in existence exactly 1,031 years this year, I believe. But through the reading of history and the developments that have taken place, I think it would be more correct to say that Iceland was the great aunty of parliaments. Incidentally, just a little while ago I was informed that the Icelanders formed the first republic in the British commonwealth of nations. In the northwest territories that was later incorporated in the province of Manitoba I am informed that an Icelandic republic was formed but it was later incorporated in the confederation of Canada without any difficulties whatever.

I believe our opinion of people is often related to our personal relations in addition to our reading and our attempt to understand other people. I am happy to say this, if you will pardon a personal reference, Mr. Speaker. Our family landed in Manitoba in the early days of this century, hoping to get started on a cattle farm. My father, who was rather green as far as Canadian ways were concerned, built a shack at a point where Cathedral avenue in Winnipeg bisects the railway that runs to Winnipeg Beach. It was a single board shack made out of shiplap. During the winter the temperature fell to 57 degrees below zero. Had it not been for the kindliness of an Icelandic dairyman—I think his name was Thorgeson—who lived somewhere close to us, we would all have been frozen to death that winter. We therefore have that memory for which to give them credit. Perhaps some hon. members on the government side wish we had frozen to death. We think of the great kindness of these people the first time we had ever been associated with people of Icelandic stock, having regard to the things they did for us. They were extremely practical compared to our impractical approach to Canadian life at that time. I understand that President Asgeirsson has had a long and distinguished career in the service of his country as a public official, a member of the Icelandic parliament, minister of finance and prime minister. I am informed that he is now serving his third term as president, having been elected in each case without opposition. Without doubt we have with us today a very distinguished representative of a very democratic state.

To me it is also interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that he was always interested in education. He has been a leader in education in Iceland. I cannot resist mentioning the fact that the new national president of the New Democratic party is also a leader in education. I hope this direction in history that has been followed by the president of Iceland will be followed with similar success in the days to come in Canada.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

232. Departmental administration, $3,455,378.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, the matter I should like to discuss for a few moments this afternoon should really be discussed under one of the later items. However, owing to the fact that I shall be unavoidably absent after three o'clock this afternoon I crave permission of the committee to allow me to speak on this one matter.

I wish to bring to the attention of the committee a situation with regard to hospitalization at the Petawawa military camp. It is my hope and also that of the dependents of the army personnel at the camp that some remedial action will be taken to cure the situation existing at camp Petawawa at the present time. The population of camp Petawawa, according to the figures given to me just recently, is approximately 10,000 made up of army personnel of 3,700 and dependents—wives and children—of 6,300. Those figures are approximate.

In 1959, the Pembroke Cottage hospital decided to make an addition to its facilities, this addition to be financed by subscriptions from the personnel of my constituency, as has been done in the past. However, owing to the fact that in the Petawawa military camp and outside in the village of Petawawa there were 6,300 civilian personnel, it was decided that some relief should be sought from the Department of National Defence. On March 21, 1959, a letter was written to the deputy minister of national defence by the chairman of the board of governors of Pembroke Cottage hospital. I will read just four paragraphs of this letter which are as follows:

> An examination of hospital usage has shown that dependents of D.N.D. at Petawawa military camp have taken up 15 per cent of our capacity during the year 1958. Moreover, the expansion program indicated for Petawawa would suggest that 35-45 per cent of our present bed capacity would be needed to service the dependents of D.N.D. personnel by 1961 or 1962.
> This expansion, together with a general population increase in the area and our present situation, poses a problem. It is obvious that we should increase our facilities and such increase should provide for the expansion of need at Petawawa.
> Until now, the Cottage hospital has in the main been financed by local industry, business and townspeople. There have been, of course, government grants. However, all grants seldom exceed 35 per cent in total.
> For our future needs we will require financial help beyond the scope of the town's ability to pay. As D.N.D. is a large employer and has shown acceptance of providing facilities such as modern schools, it is our belief that hospital facilities are in the same category and merit your financial support.

On March 31, 1959, the deputy minister replied to that letter. I should like to read paragraphs 2 and 3. The letter is addressed to the chairman of the board of governors of the Cottage hospital. Paragraphs 2 and 3 read as follows:

> The Department of National Defence is not authorized to contribute towards the cost of the extension of hospital facilities such as yours. Any contributions that are made by the federal government are made under the Hospital Grants Act administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Since we cannot assist in this matter there appears to be no purpose to be served by meeting with your official board.
> I note in your letter that you have assumed an extension program at Camp Petawawa which would result in a very substantial increase in the number of dependents there. There is no planned extension of the number of military personnel to be located at Camp Petawawa and I think it is a correct assumption that there would be no wide variation in the number of dependents there under these circumstances. While the number of married quarters are being increased by the present construction program, this should not result in any significant difference in the total number of families of military personnel in the area.

I do not think that is a statement of fact at all. On April 3, 1959 the camp commander wrote a letter to the chairman of the hospital board. I should like to read what he said:

> Whether the above figures represent an actual increase of 815 families is hard to state at this time. As you are probably aware, there are over 500 army families living in civilian accommodation in Pembroke-Petawawa area, and there are a further 150 who have no accommodation in the area. Another major unit has been added to the camp and will be located here by this fall. The first 415 houses will take care of the majority of those families now living in the area. There is a rotation between here and Germany this fall by two major units. It is estimated that the married strength of the unit returning is greater than that of the unit leaving the area. Therefore it is expected there will still be soldiers' families living in civilian accommodation.
> With all new quarters occupied by late 1960 the actual increase in the area might only be approximately 400 families. However the army does not cater for 100 per cent of its married strength and I think it would be safe to assume there would always be at least 200 families living in civilian accommodation. There could therefore be a net increase of 600 families in the area. The size of our families is remaining fairly constant at 2.7 children per family so that the increase of 600 families would mean approximately 2,200 additional wives and children.

Just as an aside I should like to say that in the Petawawa military camp today there are 92 school teachers and the school strength is well over 2,600. I now wish to refer to a letter dated May 5, 1959, written to the president of the board of governors of the Cottage hospital by the deputy minister of national defence. I should like to direct the attention of the committee to one word in the first paragraph. This paragraph begins:

> The department does not normally—

It is the word "normally" to which I refer. The paragraph continues:

> —assume responsibility for the hospitalization of dependents of servicemen. When dependents are sent with the men to isolated posts or overseas, the department arranges to get them to a place where they can get hospitalization when necessary or admits them to a camp sick bay or hospital if one is available.
> Authority is provided under the Municipal Grants Act, administered by the Minister of Finance, to pay grants in respect of federal property in a municipality where municipal services are provided in respect of that property. The department provides schools on many of its camp sites because there is no practical alternative because of location and other considerations. Where school services are provided in camps, deductions are made from the municipal grants on account of this. Service children who are not living in married quarters in the camps attend the local schools in the district in which they reside in the same way as any other resident in the area.

That is not the case in Camp Petawawa because the busses take these children to Petawawa point and take them home again after school, and that is well outside the confines of the military camp. The letter continues:

> While it may appear that schools are being dealt with differently than hospitals, similar principles are, in fact, applied to both. Differences arise out of the local methods of financing the construction of hospitals in that very often a considerable part of the capital is raised by local subscription of individuals and businesses. The department is not in a position to contribute in this manner.

It is my contention that because of the lack of facilities for hospitalization for the dependants of personnel at the Petawawa military camp, these personnel now consider themselves second-class citizens. That is something which should not be allowed anywhere and that is exactly the situation at Petawawa now.

The question of non-participation by the Department of National Defence has been raised in this matter of hospitalization and I should like to refer to the estimates of 1961 of the Department of National Defence, item 234, which reads as follows:

> Grants to assist in the construction of the soldiers' memorial hospital at Middleton, Nova Scotia, in a total amount of $135,588 subject to such terms and conditions as are approved by treasury board; amount required for 1960-61, $65,000.

Then in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962, under item 542 we find the following:

[Mr. Forgie.]

> Final instalment on grant to assist in the construction of the soldiers' memorial hospital at Middleton, Nova Scotia, $33,897.

It is not my intention to pursue this matter at great length. I am assuming that the Minister of National Defence has not heard of this situation and I just wish to call it to his attention to see whether something can be done.

I should now like to read from Hansard of 1959, volume V, page 5509. The Minister of National Defence was asked about item 230, which read as follows:

> Grants to the town of Oromocto, subject to the approval of treasury board, for municipal services including the maintenance and operation of schools and to promote the development of the town, $1,656,000.

General Pearkes replied to the question on that day as follows:

> Oromocto is the dependents' town at Gagetown. It is where all the dependents of personnel and the married service personnel live. It is set up under a special agreement that was reached a few years ago. They have a town council. They are encouraged to organize their own services and grants are made by the government in order to maintain this small town for the purpose of looking after the dependents of our service people.

There was a memorandum sent out under date of June 15, 1961 a copy of which I received from the proper source and portions of which I should like to read. The first reads:

> The cost of the hospital—

That is the hospital at Middleton. I continue:

> —was $1,045,000, towards which national defence paid $135,600. Grants from other governmental sources were as follows: Health grant (federal) $199,000; health grant (provincial) $292,000; municipal, $385,000. The assistance was paid as quarterly stages of construction were completed—

Another portion relating to the Pembroke Cottage hospital reads:

> The total estimated cost of this operation is estimated at $743,737 of which $100,693.33 will be paid from federal health grants. The province is contributing $117,880, and so you can see the two senior levels of government are paying a smaller percentage of the total estimated cost in this case than in the case of Middleton.

In conversation with the department they took the position that we were obtaining grants from the Department of National Health and Welfare and from the province. I point out that many other places are in a similar position but they do not have a military camp such as we have in Renfrew North. People from the camp must be attended when ill. They are occupying beds in the hospital for which people in the community paid. It would be a sorry pass to have to say to the people that they cannot be accepted in the hospital. A couple of months ago we had 285 people waiting for hospital beds. The present extension provides only 38 beds.

I wish to place on record a letter I received under date of August 17, 1960 from the former minister of national defence which reads:

> You will remember on a number of occasions you have spoken to me concerning the Pembroke Cottage hospital and the possibility of this department arranging financial assistance for the hospital. I have carried out a very thorough survey to see whether any assistance in this regard can be given this year but unfortunately, due to financial stringencies, we are unable to be of assistance at present. However, I am taking up the matter with treasury board—

I imagine that that is the stumbling block. I continue:

> —in order to ascertain, if possible, whether some arrangement might not be made at a future time, perhaps next year.

I do not wish to take up any further time of the committee on this matter. However, I wished to make sufficient reference to the matter to interest the present Minister of National Defence. I urge him to see whether something can be done to ameliorate conditions in that section of the country.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take the opportunity provided on this vote to place before the committee certain criticisms that the party to which I belong feels should be made with respect to NATO. We recognize that the formation of NATO 12 years ago might well have been a wise move only because it might have been tempting to the Soviets at that time to fill the military vacuum that existed in western Europe. We were informed that NATO's original aim was to maintain the peace. Our fundamental criticism now stems from the fact that NATO appears to be becoming a vested interest of more importance in itself than NATO's original aim. In our opinion if NATO had consciously sought peace throughout the years it is most unlikely that we would have the so-called Berlin crisis today. From correspondence I have received within the last two or three days I am able to say that many intelligent Canadians are of the same opinion.

In our opinion until 1955 there was a real possibility that German reunification could have been bought for the price of German neutrality on a basis similar to Austria's. However, already in 1955, those who view history only in military terms, those who believe that foreign policy is merely a question of armed strength and who depend on that alone, were already on the ascendency in NATO. Rather than doing everything possible to bring about a peaceful settlement to the problems created at the conclusion of world war II, other steps were taken. In the opinion of the party for which I speak NATO aggravated those problems by deciding on the rearmament of Germany. If anything could have been better designed to prevent the reunification of Germany and to aggravate the problem of Berlin, I do not know what it could have been.

Hon. members will remember the policy of the C.C.F. at that time was to oppose the re-arming of Germany. We took that position in this house.

I wish now to deal with certain statements made in other places by Senator Wayne Morse of the United States. We appreciate the fact that everyone taking part in this debate is expressing his sincere conviction. We recognize that every hon. member seeks to advance proposals that in his or her opinion will preserve world peace. It is my responsibility and duty to bring to the attention of the committee the point of view of the party I represent.

Senator Wayne Morse who is a very courageous and independent thinking member of the United States senate recently raised a question of the appointment of General Heusinger. He brought this to the attention of United States senate, as a result of representations made to him by the American Jewish congress which were supported by their brother organizations in Canada.

The American Jewish congress issued under date of November 22, 1960 a memorandum which points out that:

> The statement on extermination of Slavs and Jews quoted above in Gilbert's "Nuremberg Diary", was made in an affidavit to the Nuremberg tribunal. Heusinger initialed and forwarded for action two military orders that were decisive in the Nuremberg judgements—the so-called commissar order and the so-called command order under which thousands of civilians and partisans were shot by Nazi occupying troops in various countries.

It was reported to Hitler that under the direct order of General Heusinger, there was carried out an order that called for the massacre of men, women and children. This was dealt with in correspondence between General Heusinger and Hitler. Also in his reference to the carrying out of his order General Heusinger mentioned that this order provided the opportunity to exterminate the Jews and the Slavic race.

Senator Wayne Morse brought this matter to the attention of congress. There was not much reference to it in the United States or the Canadian press. As a result of these representations which occupy a page or two of the Congressional Record of April 19, 1961, the matter was dealt with by a United States assistant secretary of state. He sent a lengthy letter to Senator Morse trying to explain the circumstances and justify the appointment of General Heusinger. In reply to that, Senator Morse wrote as follows:

June 1, 1961.

Hon. Brooks Hays,
Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations, Department of State,
Washington, D.C.

Dear Mr. Secretary: Thank you very much for your letter of May 25, in regard to the appointment of General Heusinger.

Frankly, I find it very unconvincing. The United States should have been no party to such a shocking appointment.

Sincerely yours,

Wayne Morse.

In his explanation Mr. Brooks Hays points out that this appointment had received the endorsation of all governments within NATO. Before this debate concludes I should like the minister to inform the committee whether he was consulted with respect to the appointment of General Heusinger, and whether he agreed to his appointment. I bring this matter to the attention of the committee because it is of serious concern, and even a matter that was discussed on platforms in the elections in Norway which were reported yesterday, and had some effect in the election of two or three socialists who now hold the balance of power in the Norwegian parliament.

Mr. Pallett: All the other members supported it.

Mr. Herridge: Yes. I meant the ones who were elected. They ran on an anti-NATO ticket and were elected with overwhelming majorities.

Let me say also that other members joined in conditional criticism of this appointment. I mention this sincerely because it is a matter of serious concern to many people. I think this type of appointment is a most unfortunate thing and causes a lot of distress as to the ultimate direction in which NATO will go.

Can you expect a man of this type who has ordered the massacre of civilian populations, according to his instructions from Hitler, to be fighting for democracy? Can you believe this man is interested in the saving of Christian democracy? I cannot believe it, and I know there are many other Canadians who agree with what I say in this respect.

I wish to quote very briefly from a recent edition of the Nation. This is an extract from "NATO joins the Wehrmacht ... Heinz Pol."

This increasing militarization of the German mind is one of the three great dangers arising from present trends in the federal republic. The gradual linking of the Bonn Republic with the "glorious military past" is taking place almost unnoticed.

I ask members of the government to remember that in orders issued by the German army at this time repeated reference is made to the glorious military traditions of the past. I continue:

[Mr. Herridge.]

Several important persons in Germany, and isolated newspapers and periodicals such as the Frankfurter Rundschau or Der Spiegel, point to the growing danger and have enough guts to criticize Strauss' nuclear policy. The others either don't grasp what is going on, or else play along. Consider the Free Democratic party, which describes itself as liberal. In the forthcoming elections, it will presumably gain votes, which will give it a key position in a future coalition government. In a pre-election speech on May 1, 1961, Erich Mende, its chairman, announced amid tremendous applause that Germany's military tradition would finally have to be restored. Among the heroes to be honored, he named half a dozen prominent Hitler generals.

We fear that these people are becoming the predominant influence in NATO and we fear also the increasing strength of the German armed forces. I had an interesting thing brought to my attention last night by a lady who came from the United Nations to see me. She is an observer there. She gave me the following information, and I quote:

The information which is not printed today is more disturbing than the misinformation and propaganda which appear. The fact that General John S. McCloy, chief of the U.S. disarmament administration, is a brother-in-law of West Germany's arms-minded Chancellor Adenauer—as is also Lewis O. Douglas, high also in government planning—in itself means little or nothing. But the fact that any proof of the relationship is missing from Adenauer's biography in both American and British Who's Who, that no American newspaper or broadcaster, to my knowledge, has ever mentioned it, and that Dean Acheson, describing a meeting between McCloy and Adenauer in a recent Harper's article, made no mention whatever of their relationship, is much more significant.

We in this group are concerned over the fact that these generals are having an increasing influence in NATO. When Germany was re-armed we were told it was to integrate its forces, to bring Germany under the control of the NATO forces and under the influence of the democratic nations. I could go on reading extract after extract to show that these people, these German generals, are obtaining increasing influence and are having more and more to say. Members of this group object very strongly indeed to Canadian soldiers being asked in reality to march behind General Heusinger a man who gave effect to the terror orders issued by Hitler, who in his orders pointed out that here was an opportunity to destroy the Jews and the Slav races.

Mr. Speakman: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. Speakman: Will he tell us whether the party for which he speaks believes in opening the door to a new enemy by keeping alive those old hatreds and by trying to drive a wedge into the defence of our allies in NATO?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly not, a great deal of the information I get comes from democratic German friends of mine and from German publications.

All we are suggesting is that instead of this type of appointment, surely there are people who can be asked to command NATO troops whose record is clean from the political point of view, and whom Canadian troops would not be ashamed to march behind. I tell the minister that I have had this question also mentioned to me by Canadian soldiers, now retired.

Mr. Harkness: Is the hon. member aware that General Heusinger does not command anything?

Mr. Herridge: Yes, not directly, but he is chief of the general staff's committee of NATO. Is he not chairman of the general staff's committee? He is a leading official in NATO. He does not march at the head of Canadian troops on the roads. He is one of the senior planners in NATO and the minister cannot deny that in fact and in spirit he is the leader of Canadian troops who are in NATO at the present time.

Mr. Harkness: I do deny it.

Mr. Herridge: General Heusinger is chairman of the NATO military representatives committee in permanent session in Washington.

Mr. Harkness: That is right.

Mr. Herridge: Which means in effect and in spirit Canadian troops march behind him because he is one of those who plan the actions that they take.

Mr. Harkness: It does not mean that at all.

Mr. Herridge: It is obvious that the minister and others are on the defensive. They wish to intimate that he is not really in the leadership. If they were proud of his appointment they would not attempt to point out the fact that he is not in direct control of Canadian troops.

However, I have another quotation here which I wish to read before proceeding further. I never forget what Lord Wavell said when he was in Ottawa on November 14, 1949 as reported in the Ottawa Journal of November 15, 1949. This is what he had to say at that time:

> Field Marshal Earl Wavell, commander in the African desert and the first allied victor of world war I told a press conference he considered the Germans a greater problem to the world than the Russians.
> He believed the Russians did not seek world domination, but he did not think the nature of the Germans, aggressors in two world wars had changed. "Now the democracies are strong and if we stand up to Russia, I don't think we will have any more trouble.
>
> I don't think we shall have a war and I am sure the Russians don't want war if they can avoid it. I know the Russians for I have spent about two years there at various times and I would say the Russians are looking for security and trying to build a defence against Germany.
>
> They have been invaded twice during a generation and they have had casualties beyond any other combatant. The devastation caused by the Germans invading Russia had to be seen to be believed.
> I think their fear of the Germans is at the bottom of the Russian attitude."

And I believe that at the present time.

> "I would say they are not aggressive like the Germans for two reasons. They do not have the German urge for what Hitler called living space because they have plenty of land and they do not have the aggressive German belief that Germans can run a country better than anyone else. I do not think that Stalin and the other Russian realists believe that they can do that. They would like to spread communism into Europe, but I doubt if physical aggression and domination is in their minds."

Then he goes on:

> "The Germans are the most dangerous people in Europe. If I were a Russian I would be nervous about a resurgence of Germany."

That is what a very distinguished field marshal had to say when he was in Ottawa in 1949. I believe there is a great deal in what he says, that we have aggravated the situation as a result of the rearmament of Germany and as a result of the appointment of generals such as I have mentioned, and that is becoming a question for discussion in more and more countries.

I know that much has been made of Soviet intransigence but it also seems to me that far too little was done in the west to make an honest and sincere attempt to arrive at a general settlement with the U.S.S.R. in the new spirit that prevailed immediately after the death of Stalin. I think a great opportunity was afforded at that time if we had not had this irritant of the rearming of Germany. NATO, it seems to us, has simply ignored the Rapacki plan for disengagement and disarmament in central Europe—they cast it aside although it was proposed by prominent United States officials and proposed by various persons in the parliament of Great Britain—even though this plan was markedly similar to the plan proposed some years ago by the then Right Hon. Anthony Eden.

We consider that there is nothing sacred about NATO. Secure the return of Soviet forces within the frontiers of the U.S.S.R. and we believe the need for NATO will disappear provided, of course, that a mutual security pact for central Europe is worked out under the aegis of the United Nations at the same time. I might say that we were very pleased to hear the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition say that we should work for Berlin to be brought under the jurisdiction and control of the United Nations. That might seem a bit idealistic at this time but I think it is something we should all work for and in my opinion it is a proposal that can bear fruit if we understand the reasons for Soviet fears under the present circumstances.

Some will cry out: "What about the Atlantic alliance? What about western unity?" We reply that military alliances essentially are for war and not for peace, and in our case we have formed this military alliance to protect ourselves. Although the New Democratic party is willing to accept the temporary necessity of NATO to prevent a military vacuum in western Europe, we look forward to the day when a United Nations world security force can make all regional alliances obsolete, a day when our defence will be found in a United Nations police force. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that we do not intend merely to indulge in wishful thinking; we intend to strive with all the means at our disposal for the attainment of this ideal.

We certainly support all measures tending toward greater economic and political unity of western Europe. That has been demonstrated by our attitude in the house. Undoubtedly if true political unity is achieved then military unity will follow. We would accept this, for we believe in the cart following the horse. But what we do object to is NATO as it has come to be in practice, in effect a military organization dictating the foreign policies of its member states. We simply follow along. Major decisions are made and we have very little effect upon them.

In our opinion, if NATO had remained true to its original concept it might well have served, through clause II of its charter, as the vehicle for a greater European economic integration. That opportunity has been lost. I know the efforts that were made by the present Leader of the Opposition to give more effect to article II when he was a member of the committee known as the three wise men. As I have tried to show, Mr. Chairman, NATO is now purely a military organization limited in its scope and seemingly barren of the capability of bringing a fresh approach to the problems of the day. Its whole approach is becoming increasingly military all the time.

The New Democratic party, though it has reservations, has accepted that Canada should remain in NATO for the present, provided NATO does not become the vehicle for the further spread of nuclear weapons. This is the condition upon which the New Democratic party would agree to remain in NATO.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a question? I am trying to ascertain precisely the position of the hon. member's party. Assuming that no other NATO members acquire nuclear weapons, do I understand that the position of the hon. gentleman's party is that it supports NATO even though it may be at this time, as my hon. friend says, essentially engaged in military pursuits? Does the New Democratic party agree to support NATO in its present imperfect form provided none of its members acquires nuclear weapons other than those that have them now?

Mr. Herridge: I am quite ready to answer the question. The policy of the New Democratic party is exactly that. The convention approved a policy that support should be continued to NATO on the condition that nuclear weapons were not extended to any other country than those that have them at the present time. That is the position of the party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That being the case, would the hon. member explain how he can possibly make the criticism that he is now making about NATO?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this is conditional support given to NATO as a result of the convention decision of the New Democratic party. At the same time I am trying to bring to the attention of the house certain other features with respect to the administration of NATO that are causing serious and increasing concern, and that is why I mentioned the appointment of General Heusinger. The New Democratic party has accepted that Canada should remain in NATO for the present provided NATO does not become the vehicle for the further spread of nuclear weapons. The majority in the New Democratic party hope that on coming into power the New Democratic party government will be able to effect the basic changes in NATO's policies, strategy organization and attitudes that have in our opinion become essential. In our view the aim of western diplomacy should not be to perpetuate NATO but rather to strive to bring about those conditions that will make NATO obsolete. To achieve success in this endeavour is in our opinion to take a long step forward to achieving peace.

When the second world war started, Mr. Chairman, the western aim was to prevent Germany attaining hegemony over eastern and central Europe, but at the end of the war the western aim had become to destroy Germany's power for generations, if not forever. I am speaking of her military power and not the power of her people to rise again and develop a great culture. The result was that the west allowed the Soviets to attain that consolidation in eastern and central Europe which we had sought to deny to Germany.

In 1949 the aim of NATO was to maintain the peace. Now all we hear in NATO is the necessity of maintaining western unity. There is a difference in perspective and outlook there. History is repeating itself and it will continue to do so as long as we allow military thinking to dominate NATO and the minds of western statesmen.

What use was the winning of the last war when we so obviously lost the peace? What use will there be in maintaining western unity when we will all be united only in the grave if we go on as we are now?

Let us get back to the original aim of NATO—peace. Let us strive to bring the NATO powers to work for a settlement in Europe. Remaining in the position reached by our victorious armies 16 years ago is not a settlement. It is not even an armistice, for we are now engaged in an arms race with a former ally who, incidentally, lost some six million men in battle and uncounted millions owing to the savagery of the German armies that they were fighting.

Because of these considerations, Mr. Chairman, we object most strongly to the present so-called military build-up. In terms of the terrible power of the thousands of H-bombs that would be unleashed in the event of war breaking out, the sending of 2,000 additional troops by Canada to Europe is absurd. It is also provocative, for it shows not determination, not a desire to strive for the original aim of NATO which was peace, but rather a desire to strive by force of arms to maintain the status quo in Berlin. If the west was truly protecting the freedom of West Berliners, then our reaction could be understood. However, all our troop reinforcements really indicate, and apparently are intended to indicate, is the bareness of new concepts in the minds of the leaders of the west.

What makes our military gesture all the more farcical, all the more silly, from our point of view, is that we are not sending a single additional military unit to Europe but are simply making good the attrition or wastage of front line troops caused by the well known inclination of peacetime military forces, like other bureaucracies, to indulge in luxuries when no one is looking. We know that they have extra batmen, extra cooks, extra gardeners and extra people doing chores. What we are actually doing is replacing the loss of combat troops who are now performing other services. When our military forces went to Europe initially, they went as a full establishment at least, we were told that. If they are not at full war establishment now the reasons can be found in the administrative headquarters commanded by a full colonel in Antwerp and in the officers clubs, leave centres and recreational facilities in which peacetime armies abound.

If the Minister of National Defence really thought the front line units should be brought up to strength, he had only to round up and send forward all the rear echelon types who have grown up around our army brigade group and our air division over the last ten years. Anyone with any experience in military affairs knows that this happens.

Mr. Chambers: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. Chambers: Is he suggesting that our troops who spend three years overseas, should have no leave?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly not; I have some other material with which I intended to deal, but the chairman tells me that my time has about expired. I have tried to give the point of view of the members of this group. I trust our views will receive serious consideration. We are not making these criticisms lightly. We are not making them to be awkward or different. We are making them because we believe that the circumstances I have mentioned here, and the circumstances surrounding NATO and its administration, as well as the government's point of view, are deserving of criticism at this time in view of the situation the world faces.

Mr. Jung: I intend to speak very briefly on this item. Before I do so, I should like to ask the last speaker the following question: I listened to his remarks and I understood him to say that the government's stand in sending a further 2,000 troops to reinforce our brigade in Germany was a provocative gesture. Then, he followed that up by saying these troops would really not add to the fighting efficiency of our forces, they would only serve as extra batmen and so forth. If that is so, is that as provocative a gesture as the Russian resumption of nuclear testing? I should like to have the hon. member's opinion.

Mr. Herridge: I very willingly answer the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. I said a provocative gesture, and possibly I should have more correctly said, could be taken as a provocative gesture without providing the military build up that the government talks about I think it has been reported as a military build up and could be misunderstood; that is my point of view.

Mr. Jung: I am quite sure an intelligent person such as the hon. member for Kootenay West could understand that it is not a provocative gesture.

I should like to speak very briefly in order to pass along a suggestion to the Minister of National Defence, and it is this: some way should be devised whereby some members of the general public could attend lectures on survival operations. I make this suggestion because so many of the people of my constituency have communicated with me making this request. These people are deeply concerned about this aspect of the subject and do not know where to turn in order to get the necessary information. I suggest to the minister that if we are going to train 100,000 militia in survival operation, we should also be able to make available to the members of the general public, shall I say, night lectures on this subject. They might be given once a week in the local armoury. While these lectures may not give complete consideration to the subject, nevertheless they could give some indication of what the people could expect and what they, themselves could do. I believe that such a lecture was held recently in Ottawa and the turnout was so great many could not get in. If this is an indication of the general attitude of the public, then I think we have a responsibility to ensure that all those who wish to receive instructions in this vital subject are given an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Harkness: I understand that the Leader of the Opposition wishes to make a speech on this item but it is not possible for him to be here this afternoon. The hon. member for Trinity requested that we allow this item to stand on the understanding that the Leader of the Opposition would be given an opportunity to speak. I think it must be understood too, that I must have an opportunity to reply if I think that is necessary. We would then go on with the other items. I should like to get the agreement of the committee to that course of action, however.

Before actually going on with the other items, I should like to comment on the various points that have been made by members in this debate and to answer the questions which have been asked.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister does that, and if no one else has any specific point to raise about departmental administration, I have a point I should like to raise very briefly. Perhaps it might suit the minister's convenience if I did so before he speaks so that he can deal with this matter as well.

[Mr. Herridge.]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I wonder if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would allow me to put the proposed agreement to the committee at this stage?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the chairman could allow me to continue for a moment. The point I was going to raise is important and has nothing directly to do with defence in the ordinary sense. It has to do with the administration of the Department of National Defence and of the armed services. I do not think they ought to be mixed up. I would not want to mix it up with any question directly related to defence. If it were understood that every other hon. member of the committee who wished to raise points on this item had concluded, then that would be fine with me. I think it would be distracting to have this question mixed with the defence debate.

I can say right off that it has to do with the use of the armed forces in firefighting. Everyone will see that is not directly related to defence, but this is the proper item under which to raise it.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): What I propose to do is to obtain the consent of the committee to the proposal put forward by the minister which is, in effect, that the administrative item will stand following the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Then in effect there will be two further speeches on this item, one by the Leader of the Opposition and one in reply by the Minister of National Defence. Is it the pleasure of the committee to accept that proposal, subject to the remarks which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made?

Mr. Pickersgill: It may be the case that there might be other hon. members who would wish to say something about the subject which I am going to open. What I should like the minister to do is this. This morning I asked a starred question which was answered by the parliamentary secretary. When he replies I should like the minister to explain precisely what the basis is on which aid is given by the Department of National Defence in the fighting of forest fires and what the basis is on which financial charges for that purpose are made. Before entering on that subject, however, I feel I should recall the fact that on June 24, I asked the Prime Minister a question about forest fires in Newfoundland and the Prime Minister directed the question to the Minister of National Defence who made this reply, as found at page 6988 of Hansard for that day:

Mr. Speaker, I received information just before coming into the house that Newfoundland has asked for help from the Royal Canadian Navy and the R.C.A.F. They have asked for both personnel and vehicles to fight forest fires in the vicinity of the northern portion of the St. John's area. Eastern command Halifax has instructed the Newfoundland area commander, Brigadier Morres, to make arrangements to honour the request to every degree feasible by the resources of the R.C.N. and R.C.A.F. that are there and able to be used.

Then I made this comment:

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to thank the minister for his reply and say that I am sure his attitude will be greatly appreciated.

I should like to say that more than once during the summer I happened to be in the area in which both the naval helicopter and the air force helicopter were operating and to see the work of the personnel. Nothing could have been finer than the efforts they made under extremely difficult circumstances indeed. There is no doubt whatever that without the help provided by the R.C.N. and the R.C.A.F. it would have been impossible even to keep the fires in check to the degree they were kept in check. As is well known, on that terrible Thursday when, because of a sudden change in the weather, it began to look as though the whole of the eastern side of Newfoundland was going to be burned up in three or four new fires that had got started a day or two previously and the government of Newfoundland felt that they must appeal for help on a much larger scale and the premier made an appeal to the Prime Minister the response was immediate. The work done by the army personnel, of which I saw something while I was there—I visited the camp at Gander bay and saw a good deal of what was being done—was excellent and was greatly appreciated, I am sure, by everyone in Newfoundland. It so happened that the day after the troops were sent in, fortunately there was help not merely from the national defence department but from Providence; and I am bound to say that the providential rain contributed even more to the checking of the fires than did the armed forces, although their help was certainly greatly appreciated.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member might be interested to know that we in the cabinet attributed that providential rain to the prayers of the delegation that we sent over, particularly those of the cabinet member for Newfoundland and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I say that their prayers must have been answered before they got there because the rain started before they arrived. As a matter of fact, I will not soon forget that day. I had arrived in Clarenville, making a vain attempt to get to St. John's in the middle of that Friday afternoon when the troops first arrived. I could not get any farther because Clarenville was filled completely with smoke and the road east was closed. I spent about three hours in Clarenville when nearly everybody was leaving the place not knowing exactly where to go or where the fire was.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Just like the House of Commons.

Mr. Pickersgill: I might tell the committee that the fire in question the night previous had been ten miles from Clarenville. It is extremely hard to imagine that a fire, in an area which is not heavily wooded, could move eight miles, as that fire did, in the course of a single day. However, that is what happened.

I think the facts of this situation are not nearly as well understood as they perhaps should be. For two successive summers there has been virtually no rain in Newfoundland and during last winter the ground froze before the snow came. The result was that when the snow melted there was a quick runoff and the ground was drier than anyone who had seen Newfoundland only before 1960 could have believed was possible in that province. I am not amazed that there were as many fires as there were. I am really amazed that there were not even more of them. I think it says a good deal for the care that was taken by the whole population that there were not more fires and that most of them were kept in as good control as they were kept. However, there is no question whatever that, without the rain that came on that particular week end, while the troops might have saved a few settlements they would not have been able to do anything more to stop the fires in the forest any more than were those people who had previously been fighting them. However, the two things—the arrival of the troops and the rain—happened fortunately to coincide, although there have since been outbreaks. It is really very sad but each time the rain comes and even in spite of heavy rain, the ground is dry again within half an hour because there is just no moisture in the soil, and the rain evaporates so rapidly.

However, to come back to the point about which I am really concerned, may I say this and I think there will be a good deal of surprise about this situation. I know that most people I have talked to were surprised to discover that although the federal government acted with the greatest possible promptitude when requested to do so on both occasions and everybody has the greatest possible gratitude for that fact I think there is a good deal of surprise not only in Newfoundland but on the mainland when people realize that this assistance is not a national service given in a national emergency but is something that has to be paid for. It is true that not the whole of it has to be paid for, as was pointed out by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George in answer to a question this morning, but there is a considerable charge. I feel that the committee would wish to know what this charge is, what the basis of it is and what is behind it.

I think every sensible person recognizes the fact that the armed forces cannot be at the beck and call of every local authority or even every provincial government every time a house burns down and that there must be some reasonable safeguard against that sort of thing. However, we know that there have been other kinds of disaster in this country, even this year, in which the greatest possible generosity was shown by the federal authorities at the cost of the national treasury. The loss in this particular case—I refer to the case of the fires this year—in the province of Newfoundland is in some respects a loss that is going to go on as far ahead as the human mind can conceive because what has happened in part of that area—and happily only in part of it—is this. The situation is not just that the trees have burned. It is not just that the forest has burned. The situation is that the soil, or what there was of it, has also all burned. What is going to happen to a good deal of the cape Freels peninsula, is that when the winds come the ash will be blown away and there will be nothing left but bare rock. Then we will have to think in terms of geological time before anything will ever grow there again, except perhaps a little moss and maybe some blueberries. This is a really tragic loss of our forest resources.

Happily, in many other areas the fire raced through so fast that only the foliage on the trees was burned. The wood can be salvaged and the land is still there. But it is a tremendous blow to the province. I am not seeking in any way to be controversial or critical; I am merely seeking to get all the facts. I hope that when all the circumstances are taken into account, whatever the practice may have been in the past, the government will come to the conclusion that this was a matter of such national importance that it would not be appropriate in this particular case, in this particular circumstance, to follow the practices of the past. I hope the government will consider that whatever the armed forces may have done in Newfoundland should be regarded as a national contribution to that province in the face of a great disaster that is going to cost the province a great deal in its budget this year, taking into account the other measures it has taken to fight the fires. Unhappily—and this is the worst part of it—it has taken away the livelihood of a large number of our citizens.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question before he resumes his seat? I do not mean for a moment to minimize the magnitude of the fire and the tragic consequences to the province. Perhaps the hon. member would enlighten me and the other members of the committee by telling the committee why—I am sure the hon. member knows this, because he is very close to the government of Newfoundland—the government of Newfoundland waited at least three months before asking for federal aid which was obviously ready to be given?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know whether federal aid was ready to be given. The hon. gentleman may know more about this matter than I do. I do know that aid—as I indicated from reading Hansard—was asked for and provided as early as June 24. I think the fires only started about June 15. That aid was given continuously from that time on. Therefore the hon. gentleman's observation about three months seems to be rather a miscalculation.

I know there has been an effort made in certain quarters to suggest that more aid should have been asked for earlier. I was there all summer. Of course, I am only a member of the opposition. There is a member of the government from Newfoundland. I believe the minister came to Newfoundland just after the troops came there.

It would appear to me that if this aid was ready, and if in the opinion of the hon. member for St. John's East it should have been sent earlier, perhaps that same opinion should have been shared by the hon. member for St. John's West, who is a member of the government. Perhaps the aid should have been offered, instead of the hon. gentleman staying here until a request was made.

I do know that the government of Quebec did not wait to be asked; they offered help and they sent help. The government of Ontario did not wait to be asked; they offered help and they sent help. I have not sought to be provocative and controversial, and I do not think I will allow the hon. gentleman to draw me into any kind of controversy about this matter. But I think the question of sending for the army was perhaps bound up with this question of what it was going to cost, and what burden it would be upon an already heavily burdened provincial treasury, burdened with the unexpected costs—and they are going to be very considerable costs to the treasury—of the firefighting that had already been done.

I do know that the aid was requested after the Gander fire started—which was only two days earlier—after the Glenwood fire started, which was only two days before, and after the Dunns river fire really got out of control, which was only one day before.

It was only then that there really did seem to be a great crisis, and immediately there seemed to be a crisis the additional aid was sought. Up until that time, as the hon. gentleman knows if he was in Newfoundland —or, indeed, he ought to know—there were only two fires that were causing much concern. One was the fire in Bonavista north—and even if we had had the whole Canadian army in Bonavista north, that fire could not have been stopped in the forest after it really got going late in July.

Notwithstanding all the disadvantages of weather, it is a remarkable thing that not one life was lost. It is also a remarkable thing that only a very small number of houses were destroyed in the settlements, which until the rain came were the only places where the fire could be fought, where there were roads and facilities and where it was possible to fight it.

I travelled back and forth in this fire devastated area three or four times during the summer at various stages, and at every stage people, with good reason, felt it could be brought under control if the weather became favourable. But the weather continued to be increasingly unfavourable. The wind would blow first from one direction and then from another in a way that has never happened, I think, in anybody's experience in the summer in Newfoundland.

That fire could not have been stopped under those conditions. It might have been stopped at the very beginning but it certainly could not have been stopped at any time in late July or early August.

Mr. McGrath: Joe "goofed", and you know it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman was not heard in Newfoundland to say or do very much about this matter. I do say that it would have been a tragedy if we had not had the help—and I do not wish to disparage that help in any way—and it would be unfortunate if the overburdened taxpayers of Newfoundland, with all the difficulties they have to face, have this added burden laid upon their shoulders.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 232 carry?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I feel I should perhaps comment briefly on some of the statements made and on some of the questions asked during this debate. The hon. member for Trinity seemed to devote the major portion of his remarks to his own appreciation of the defence policy being followed in the United States and the strategy being followed by the United States. It was quite apparent from his remarks that he was labouring under a great many illusions and I wondered if he was also labouring under the illusion that he was speaking in the American congress rather than in the Canadian parliament.

Mr. Hellyer: Very funny.

Mr. Harkness: He gave his appreciation or his understanding of what was the defence policy and strategy of the United States. Unfortunately for him this does not agree with any of the written statements, or the general tenor at least of the written statements of the members of the defence department of the United States, the chiefs of staff and the leading generals of that country. Also it certainly does not agree with any of the information which they have given to me in various talks I have had with them. In other words, the picture painted in that regard by the hon. member for Trinity is, I think, a highly imaginative one, conjured up by himself and does not bear a very close relationship to the facts. The reason I mention this at all is that on the basis—

Mr. Hellyer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the minister has just alleged that my statement did not bear any relationship to the facts or any written statements from any of the senior officers of the United States, and so on. The picture as I painted it was based on authoritative statements from the commander in chief of the United States armed forces. The minister should have read these statements so he would know what is going on.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is not a question of privilege; it is actually a matter—

Mr. Hellyer: It is keeping you from distorting things again.

Mr. Harkness: —of consulting a large number of statements. If I had the time, I could demonstrate in detail that what the hon. member sought to convey as the general policy and strategy of United States is not very closely in accordance with the facts of the situation.

Mr. Hellyer: Then that is what you should do, instead of making broad statements.

Mr. Harkness: I mention this because on the basis of his improper and incorrect appreciation the hon. member then adduced a number of arguments. It is a well known fact that if your premises are wrong your arguments are bound to be wrong. That is the unfortunate position in which the hon. member left himself.

Let me deal with some of the remarks in which the hon. member engaged. As reported at page 8230 of Hansard of September 12, the hon. gentleman said:

> It is interesting to note that in the long list of priority items presented by President Kennedy to congress on March 28 last there did not appear one of the major items on which the Canadian government is relying. Not one American penny for the Voodoo, the F-104, the Bomarc or the Honest John. The Canadian defence department has become a pawnshop for second hand American hardware.

I deeply deplore that the hon. member has in this debate and on other occasions attempted to convince the Canadian people that the equipment possessed by the Canadian forces is inferior, obsolete and outdated. I submit that the hon. gentlemen has been doing a very serious disservice to the Canadian forces, to the Canadian nation, to NATO and to the western position generally in attempting for political purposes to present an absolutely false picture in that regard. The equipment of the Canadian forces is excellent. The Canadian forces themselves are splendid. Every NATO commander we have ever had at various levels who has had experience with the NATO troops in Europe, both the air division and the brigade group, has stated that there were no better troops than those of Canada and that the equipment was tops. This attempt for political purposes to discredit the equipment and efficiency of the Canadian forces is a highly deplorable thing.

In connection with the specific allegation made that none of these weapons we have secured is on the priority list of items presented by President Kennedy, let me say that the fact is that this was a supplementary list which was presented by the president.

Mr. Hellyer: Supplementary and priority.

Mr. Harkness: It did not call up funds for articles which were already funded. The Bomarc and the Honest John were completely funded. The same is true of the Voodoo. As I said yesterday the production run ended in December 1960 although tooling is still available for it. It did not call up additional funds for the F-104 as this was also funded. What the hon. member did not point out and what is more important is this. The list of priority items was accompanied by a list of items which were to be deleted from the defence program. I should like to stress the fact that not one item relating to the air defence of North America was recommended for deletion by the president. The hon. member is therefore completely incorrect in making statements to the effect that this department had become a pawnshop for secondhand American hardware. The hon. gentleman should be thoroughly ashamed of his attempt to create the impression that all these weapons are obsolete and worthless.

Mr. Ricard: Do not ask for too much.

Mr. Harkness: In that connection the hon. gentleman also took to himself the credit of being the father of what he said was a great change in the United States defence picture. Apparently the president and other people in authority took under consideration the hon. member's policy speech of last year and put his recommendations into effect so far as the United States is concerned. As I said, apparently the hon. member suffers from many illusions. This is not the least of those illusions.

To begin with, Mr. McNamara, American secretary of defence, made it clear when he appeared before the congressional committee that there had been no great reversal in the United States program as the hon. member would have us believe occurred. Let me read what Mr. McNamara said on the subject:

> There may be many possible situations in which it would not be advisable or feasible to use nuclear weapons. What is being proposed at this time is not a reversal of our existing national policy but an increase in our non-nuclear capabilities to provide a greater degree of versatility to our limited war forces.

Mr. Hellyer: Exactly.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, exactly. It was not a reversal.

Mr. Hellyer: A change of emphasis.

Mr. Harkness: Let us now examine the extra amount of money which was asked for by President Kennedy. The sum was $2,703 million. Of that sum, $1,856 million or 68.6 per cent was for strengthening the nuclear deterrent and $717 million or 26.5 per cent was for strengthening the conventional forces. I mention this merely to indicate that the hon. member appears to have completely misunderstood what the defence policy of the United States is and what they have been doing there. That, of course, I think is symptomatic of the various statements and allegations the hon. member made throughout his speech.

The hon. gentleman and other members of his party have been going about the country talking about the Liberal defence policy. The hon. member for Trinity made reference to it yesterday. I submit there is no such animal.

At the Liberal rally last January the Liberal party got itself into a terrible mess with respect to defence. It adopted one thing, threw it out and then adopted something else. The entire thing ended in confusion. Since that time no one has really known what the position of the Liberal party is with respect to defence or where the Liberals stand in the regard. The Leader of the Opposition realizing the mess the Liberals were in with respect to defence as a result of the January rally, has been crossing the country making speeches in which he has withdrawn and changed the position taken at the January meeting. Every time the hon. gentleman makes a speech the position changes. I have followed this rather closely because, after all, I am the minister of this department and I am curious to know what the policy of the opposition is. The only thing I have ever been able to ascertain about Liberal policy in this respect is that it changes each week.

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps the minister cannot understand the policy.

Mr. Harkness: It is impossible to know from week to week what the policy is. Of course, I was not at the January meeting.

Mr. Pickersgill: Really?

Mr. Harkness: A very good summary of what transpired at that meeting was carried in the January 13 issue of the Halifax "Herald" in an article written by a newspaperman who was present to observe the situation at that meeting with respect to defence. The article reads:

> Within the three days, the assembled delegates, or committees of them, proposed the country be taken out of the North American Air Defence Command (NORAD), then put it back in again and finally favored it being left half in and half out. And it was practically the same with the problem of what to do about nuclear weapons. When the delegates started heading back for home yesterday and were able to find time to collect their thoughts, many undoubtedly were still wondering just where their party stood on many aspects of these issues.

I have no doubt they are still wondering. Everyone else is wondering too because, as I say, the policy changes practically from week to week.

One military commentator who was quoted yesterday by an hon. gentleman opposite had the following to say in connection with the position of the Liberal party with respect to defence. This is to be found in the February 1961 issue of the Canadian Commentator in an article by John Gellner:

> This month's Liberal party rally has provided a dismaying example of what must happen if a military problem is resolved entirely on the basis of political considerations. The problem in question was that of Canadian participation in the North American Air Defence Command (NORAD). The resolution, as it was reported, suffers somewhat from confused terminology—it approves "identification" of suspected aerial intruders by Canadian fighter aircraft, but not "interception", although the former action is not possible without the latter. Still, it is quite clear what the stand is which the Liberals are taking in this matter: They want to leave all arrangements as they are except that Canadian forces in NORAD would not actually shoot. In other words, we would warn the Americans that the enemy was coming, we would tell him who he is, we would fix and track him, but then we would virtuously withdraw and let the Americans do the killing. This is a solution worthy of Pontius Pilate, not of a Lester B. Pearson and his associates.

I think this is a very good summing up of the position taken on defence at the Liberal meeting and is one of the great reasons why everybody has been in doubt on it since. Gellner goes on in this way:

> The policy which the Liberal party has adopted in this matter does not even make sense.

That is the situation. Until the Liberal party itself produces something that makes sense I really do not think we should spend too much time discussing its deficiencies.

The hon. member for Peterborough of course made a speech in favour of peace. Well, we are all in favour of peace and nobody will quarrel with him over his desire to attain peace; but I must say to him, in the language of a gentleman who is well remembered in this house, the Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, "in a kindly way", that I do not think he had very much to say really about defence. Therefore I have not very much that I can say about his contribution to it.

There is only one point really that I should touch on. He said we should have a mobile force capable of taking action in any part of the world under the United Nations. Well, of course, we have it. We have had it right along. We have been in the position for several years that whenever the United Nations made a request to us for a force we filled that request. The only way in which we can be in a position to meet any requests along this line that the United Nations may make is to have an army in being. We have got to have people trained in all arms, particularly people in the engineers, RCEME, signallers, and so forth. If you have a balanced army of that kind, in which you have all arms, when you are called upon to make a contribution to a force in NATO you are in a position to make it and make it immediately. This is the only way in which it can be done.

Up to date, every time the United Nations has called upon us to supply a force it has been a different type of force, and the only way we have met those demands, as I say, is by having a force of all arms, and having it well trained. Then when a demand is made on you you can meet it. We are in that position and have been in that position for some time past. This is a proposition which is stated very frequently as if it were something that did not exist and something that we should produce, namely a force for the U.N. Well, as long as we have a standing army, as we have, then we can produce the force that the U.N. may require from us, within the limits of that army, of curse, at very short notice whenever we are asked, and up to date that is exactly what we have done.

The hon. member for Peterborough did not say much about NATO membership. The hon. member for Kootenay West went into it to some length. I would just like to say there is no doubt at all that the New Democratic party—is that the name of it?—is in a very equivocal position so far as NATO is concerned. The C.C.F. party, of course, condemned NATO. They said that we should get out of NATO and it should be done away with. They condemned NORAD. They said that we should reduce our armed forces very materially; that we should devote the money instead to foreign aid. In other words theirs was a pacifist and neutralist position, although they always denied that this was so, but in effect this is what it was. It called on Canada to get out of NATO, to get out of NORAD, but it was a definite position; it was one that you could understand, and if you accepted certain premises it was one for which I think you could argue. The hon. member for Kootenay West was a strong proponent of that position and he indicated in his speech today that he still believes in it, but he is in the unfortunate position of supporting a party that does not believe in it and therefore I sympathize with him.

The New Democratic party came about as a result of the union of the C.C.F. and the labour union people. The labour union congress, of course, takes a totally different view from the C.C.F. They believe in NATO. They say we should belong to NATO. As a matter of fact, I have here the two latest issues of the official labour magazine, the Journal of Canadian Labour Congress. Mr. Jodoin has an article in one and Mr. MacDonald has an article in the other. They both say that NATO must be supported; that we must remain in NATO; they condemn neutralism and so forth. I will not bother reading these various articles. Anybody can get these magazines; in fact I shall be glad to lend them to the hon. member for Kootenay West, if he has not read them, so that he may learn just what the attitude of the labour party is toward NATO.

Mr. Herridge: I have copies.

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member has them I wish he would pay attention to them because the position taken by the labour party is pretty realistic; whereas the position taken by the C.C.F. and gentlemen like the hon. member for Kootenay West has been anything but realistic.

[Mr. Harkness.]

However, we have these two divergent views. There was a great argument at the founding convention of the New Democratic party, and as a result of that they came up with what I expect was looked upon as being a compromise, something along that line. It was essentially this as reported in the newspapers at least, that if NATO as a whole or individual NATO members are to control nuclear warheads, then Canada should make it clear that she cannot remain in the alliance, and should get out and so forth. Well, the people who produced that resolution either were completely ignorant of what the situation in NATO is or they were trying to hoodwink the people who were at that conference as well as the Canadian people. Because it is a well-known fact that NATO accepted a nuclear strategy back in 1954.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A tactical weapon.

Mr. Harkness: No. They accepted a nuclear strategy in 1954. They have made affirmations about it, which are matters of public record, on numerous occasions since. Various countries in NATO have entered into bilateral agreement with the United States and as far as having nuclear weapons on their soil is concerned, they have them available under the command of the NATO commander for use and so forth. In other words, NATO has been a nuclear power in effect for years and NATO adopted a nuclear strategy. Therefore, this proposition that if NATO as a whole adopts nuclear weapons, or any of the countries individually, that Canada should not belong to it, is contrary to the situation which exists. This has been the case right along and this resolution which was adopted by the New Democratic party is merely eyewash. It is merely a means by which the people there were deceived and the country generally; or otherwise the people who drafted this did not know anything about NATO and did not understand NATO. This matter is very clear. I hold in my hand the North Atlantic Treaty Organization handbook of 1959. It has in it various resolutions that have been passed in different years. Here is one, for example. It is the text of the declaration and communique of the December, 1957, ministerial meeting of heads of government. It states this, in connection with countering the Soviet threat, both nuclear and conventional:

> To this end, NATO has decided to establish stocks of nuclear warheads, which will be readily available for the defence of the alliance in case of need.
> In view of the present Soviet policies in the field of new weapons, the council has also decided that intermediate range ballistic missiles will have to be put at the disposal of the supreme allied commander Europe.
> The deployment of these stocks of missiles and arrangements for their use will accordingly be decided in conformity with NATO defence plans and in agreement with the states directly concerned. The NATO military authorities have been requested to submit to the council at an early date their recommendations on the introduction of these weapons in the common defence. The council in permanent session will consider the various questions involved.

As I say, NATO has had a definite nuclear strategy for all these years and therefore this is in complete contradiction of the resolution passed only two months ago, I believe, by the New Democratic party. According to the resolution passed by the New Democratic party, we should have been out of NATO several years ago. The thing is nonsense. It is just nonsense of the worst kind.

I have been surprised that this has not been pointed out long before now by some of the newspapermen who attended the convention, because it is a self-apparent fact that the resolution just does not make sense.

In addition to the official handbook of NATO which makes the position quite clear, it has also been made known in the newspapers on numerous occasions—I have some quotations I could give but I do not think I will take the time—that a number of NATO countries have made bilateral agreements to have nuclear weapons on their soil, which they now have, and to exercise joint control of such weapons with the United States. There are several countries of NATO in which that is the situation. Therefore when members of the New Democratic party and other people say that Canada should not be the first to join the nuclear club meaning the three countries who are actually producing nuclear weapons, the United States, Great Britain and France, they are not stating the situation correctly at all. Several countries have already, as these people refer to it, joined the nuclear club. Nuclear weapons have been placed on their soil and are there. I think certain matters along this line should be made clear because there seems to have been a great deal of confusion in the minds of many people as to what the actual situation is.

There was another point mentioned by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam in the external affairs debate which I think I should clear up because great confusion has been caused. He said that there were so many tons of t.n.t., ten tons or something like that, in the nuclear stockpiles of the United States and Russia for every man, woman and child in the world, and surely we did not need any more because this was enough to blow up the whole world. The whole point is that you might have enough nuclear power in a stockpile in a particular spot in Russia to blow up the whole world a hundred or a thousand times over but if they do not have the means of delivering that nuclear power it does not do them any good. In fact, it can only serve as a potential danger to them.

In other words, the important thing in connection with nuclear weapons really is not the total number that you have some place in a stockpile but the means of delivery that you have for those nuclear weapons. As I pointed out in the speech I made and as I have pointed out on numerous occasions during the past several months, the Russians have not, as a lot of people are always attempting to show, an unlimited number of rockets and intercontinental ballistic missiles. In fact, they have a very limited number of intercontinental ballistic missiles capable of delivering nuclear weapons to this continent. Actually their chief means of delivery at the present time would still be by bomber and would have to be by bomber.

I mention this point particularly because I see letters and articles in the newspapers all the time. I recall one particularly in which it was said that a thousand of these nuclear weapons will be landed in Canada by intercontinental ballistic missiles. This is a complete impossibility. I am afraid that many of the people who are talking this way are doing so with the deliberate idea of trying to scare people and frighten them into adopting a pacifist or neutralist attitude. In other words, this is really a means of carrying to the Canadian people the terror tactics of Khrushchev. Khrushchev is talking about creating a 100-ton megaton bomb and dropping it on us. This is a terror tactic and we must recognize that it is a terror tactic. When he does this a lot of people in this country say, "Well, you know how much damage was done by the bomb dropped on Hiroshima which was only one fifth of 1 per cent as large and if one such bomb were dropped on Ontario the whole of the province would be wiped out".

A certain gentleman who writes letters to the newspapers has complained about the fact that he predicted such a bomb would be produced and that some of the papers had scoffed at him, and that I had scoffed at him. The important point in this connection is that the destructiveness of such a bomb does not increase directly in relation to its size. In fact, it is on the basis of the square of the cube root of the distance or something along that line. In any event, to put the matter in terms that people can understand I had our experts on these matters produce a little table for me. Let us take a 20 kiloton weapon. It has a certain power of destruction. The area of complete destruction is 1.1 square miles and the radius of complete damage is 2.2 square miles.

My arithmetic is not very good but let us take a weapon a million times larger. To make it simpler, let us take a five megaton weapon and a 100 megaton weapon. With the five megaton weapon you have a radius of complete destruction of 3.9 miles while in the case of the 100 megaton weapon it is 10.5 miles. It is not 20 times as great; as a matter of fact, it is not quite three times as great. This point has to be kept in mind. The area of complete damage in the one case is 47 square miles and in the other case it is 346 square miles. The area of damage of all kinds, light damage and so on, is in the one case 610 square miles and in the other case 3,900 square miles. The area of dangerous fall-out in the case of the five megaton bomb is 2,500 square miles and in the case of the 100 megaton weapon it is 8,000 square miles.

I mention this because of the fact that the Khrushchev terror tactics of threatening to drop these 100 megaton weapons on people are being helped, I think, by a lot of people in this country who automatically take it for granted that if a one megaton bomb does so much damage a 100 megaton bomb will do 100 times as much. This is not the case and, as anybody who is familiar with explosives knows, the force of the explosion dissipates quite rapidly, with distance. I think we should know what the actual facts are. The people of Canada are entitled to know what the actual facts are in connection with these matters and those people who are trying to persuade them to accept something which is incorrect should themselves be exposed to the truth if they are not already aware of it.

The hon. member for Fort William spoke about the need for an armoury at Fort William. We are well aware of the need for armouries throughout Canada. There is a long list of places which need armouries and we would like to build them. However, armouries do no come very high on the priority list. There is only a certain amount of money available for defence and it is not possible for us to build all the armouries we would like to build. We have an armoury construction program under which we built a certain number of armouries, but nothing like the number that are being requested. In so far as Fort William is concerned, however, one of the companies of the Lake Superior regiment has recently been moved from Port Arthur to Fort William and hired accommodation has been acquired for them. This is not entirely satisfactory, but I think it will meet the need to some extent at any rate.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired. Has the minister completed his answers?

Mr. Harkness: No, I have a few more questions to answer.

[Mr. Harkness.]

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give the minister leave to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Leeds stated that the members of the House of Commons and people generally were in ignorance of whether or not United States airplanes carrying atomic weapons were flying over Canadian air space. This is a matter that has been dealt within the house on a number of occasions. On June 3, 1958, at page 781 of Hansard, the Prime Minister made a fairly lengthy statement on the subject. Several other statements have been made since, referring to this statement, and indicating the situation is the same now as it was then and as it was before this government took office.

I should like to read a part of the statement made by the Prime Minister. It is quite lengthy and refers to questions asked and statements made previously in regard to it. The Prime Minister said:

> In the passages to which I have referred the house was informed that United States bomber aircraft carry nuclear weapons over Canada only with prior permission from Canada; that each flight is dealt with separately by specific application, and there is no blanket authority; that the weapons are inactivated in order to avoid the possibility of accident; and that the procedures being followed are unchanged from those which had been instituted by the previous government.

This is still the situation. When the hon. member for Leeds said the members of the house do not know what the situation is—well, he is a new member and perhaps has not heard of this statement but there is no reason for anybody here not knowing what the situation is. It has been outlined on several occasions.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke gave an interesting speech on civil defence and proposed the building of underground garages which could be used as shelters. This is something which does not come under this department. He has put the matter on record and I will be glad to refer it to the Minister of Public Works and others who may be concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister is surely one of those under whom civil defence comes. It comes under three ministers, including certainly the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Harkness: Civil defence is not the proper term with relation to what comes under this department. We are concerned essentially with survival operations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do shelters come under the Prime Minister?

Mr. Harkness: The entire emergency measures organization comes under the Prime Minister and the privy council office. All the emergency measures, civil defence measures, survival measures and so on, are co-ordinated through that office.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo asked about ideological and psychological warfare and what was being done in this regard. I recognize, as he does, that perhaps there is some need for something more definite being done along that line. We have not any ideological or psychological branch in the Department of National Defence. This is, I think, something which, if it were done at all, would have to be done by some other department or by the government as a whole.

He asked about hydrofoil vessels; they have of course, been under study for a number of years. It just so happens that there was a release by the Department of Defence Production on this very subject on September 8, in which it is stated:

> There is a long history of Canadian hydrofoil craft design effort dating back to Alexander Graham Bell's design which exceeded a speed of 60 knots at Baddeck, Nova Scotia, in 1919. In recent years, Canada has been active in the hydrofoil area through studies conducted by the defence research board at Halifax, Nova Scotia.
> Current technological advances in such areas as lightweight high strength alloy metals and gas turbine power plants, now make feasible the construction of much larger hydrofoil craft than could have been contemplated in the past. These advances form the basis of the present study.

In other words, we have been carrying on the study of hydrofoil craft for a considerable time and their use as anti-submarine craft. We are going ahead with this study in connection with which this announcement was put out because we are working in close co-operation with industry.

Then, the hon. member made some comparison between the costs of defence in Sweden and the cost of defence in Canada, at which time there was a reference to the rates of pay of the armed forces. Somebody asked him a question with which he had a little difficulty in connection with the cost of living as it related to the pay differential between the two forces. Any comparisons along this line, I believe, are extremely deceptive. They depend on so many factors which may vary greatly from country to country. The hon. member mentioned particularly the submarines which Sweden had. Well, they are getting some small submarines which take only a few people to man. However, these submarines are useful only in coastal waters and in narrow seas. They would be no good for our purposes because we have to hunt submarines out on the wide Atlantic. Once again, this comparison is not valid.

I think the hon. member said that the Royal Canadian Navy destroyer escorts were not good enough to deal with the latest type of submarine; that they were not going to be any good in a limited war. This is not correct. The anti-submarine vessels we have are just as good as any that exist. They are recognized, as a matter of fact, as being the finest of their kind in the service of any navy in the world. Shortly they will be fitted with helicopters which will extend their range of operation and enable them to deal with the greater speed of some of the modern nuclear submarines. In this way these vessels will continue to be extremely effective.

I have a few more notes here, but time is passing so I do not think I will mention too many other points. The hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville made some statements, and the associate minister will deal with those. The hon. member for Renfrew North spoke about the hospital at Petawawa. The situation is that this is one of the areas in which the department was asked to put up extra money to help pay the cost of the local hospital. We did this in one area he mentioned, namely, Middleton, Nova Scotia because of the percentage of military dependent personnel that came into that area. It was in excess of 10 per cent of the population, and thus constituted an undue load on the municipality. A number of places have asked for that same sort of thing. Any place where the percentage of military dependents does not bring the total population up more than 10 per cent beyond what the general level was, we have not paid a grant because we do not think it is justified. As far as these people not paying their way is concerned, just the same as any other citizen, there is nothing in that suggestion. Of course they pay their way. They pay rent and through their rents they pay taxes, or otherwise they buy houses and pay taxes. They contribute to the upkeep of local hospitals just the same as does any other person who comes into the area, whether he comes in there to be a barber or butcher or whatever it may happen to be. To try to segregate the military personnel and say that they do not pay the general cost, of course, is to do something that just does not stand up. They help to pay for all of the hospital services and everything else just as does any other resident in the municipality.

As to the hon. member for Kootenay West, I have already dealt with his position on NATO. I may say that I deplore his attempt to stir up and play on anti-German feelings. I do not think this sort of thing does any good whatever. In fact, I think it does a great deal of harm. On this basis, I could go about the country in various areas making speeches and stirring up hatred against almost every national group we have in the country. In fact I could go to certain Highland communities and stir them up. My own family is Scotch.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Be careful.

Mr. Harkness: I could stir up one clan against another clan just in one small part of the country. Therefore, as I say, I deplore this matter of attempting to stir up, to play on and to try to get advantage in some way out of anti-German feelings, and things of that sort.

Mr. Herridge: Nothing of the sort.

Mr. Harkness: As the hon. member says, it is mischievous.

Mr. Herridge: Mischievous to talk against Heusinger?

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member asked me how Heusinger was chosen?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: He was chosen by a committee consisting of the chief military officers of each of the NATO countries. In other words the 15 chief military officers of NATO constituted a committee and various nominations were made to that committee. General Heusinger received the majority support and as a result was appointed. As it happens, the chairman of the committee at that particular time was Earl Mountbatten. The chairmanship rotates from country to country. That is the whole story of General Heusinger's appointment.

Mr. Herridge: I do not support it and many other people do not support it even in Germany.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. gentleman may say he does not support it and that other people do not support it. However, I am simply explaining to him how it was made. That was the question he asked. He asked me how this appointment happened to be made and that was the way in which it was done.

The hon. member for Kootenay West stated that he and his party were against sending any more troops to Europe, that this was just a waste of men, that no new units were being sent, and that the people being sent over were only replacing troops from the combat units that had been taken out for administrative duties to be cooks, batmen and goodness knows what, according to the story. This is completely incorrect. This is not the case at all. First of all may I say that two new units are being sent. An Honest John battery is going to be sent. I think it takes 235 men. A light helicopter reconnaissance unit is going to be sent. It takes some 75 men. The other 800 men are required really because, contrary to what the hon. member for Trinity has said, the equipment of the brigade in Europe has been steadily built up and increased during recent years. The brigade was sent over there with one squadron of armour. It now has a full regiment of armour. One squadron of armour represents approximately 200 men. A full regiment at full strength represents approximately 800 men. That is a difference of 600 men right there. The brigade has been supplied with a great many other pieces of equipment since it went overseas, such as recoilless rifles and so on. It has been supplied with many more vehicles so that the whole brigade is mobile. They can all be put in the vehicles and moved at one time. That is why these extra men are required, not as cooks or batmen or to replace cooks or batmen. In other words the hon. member was speaking of what he knew not when he made that statement.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre wanted to have arrangements made for members of the public to attend lectures on civil defence. He mentioned the example in Ottawa here. This is something which has been looked upon as one of the municipal responsibilities in civil defence. With the increased interest now apparent in civil defence I would hope that other cities will do the same as Ottawa is doing and put on these lectures for the general population in order to inform them of what the situation is, what can be done and to advise them in regard to it.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate spoke of the Newfoundland fires. We were all—and I think this includes everybody throughout Canada—extremely concerned over the fires in Newfoundland. We realize the tragedy that they cause and the terrific loss in resources that was caused by them. The Canadian government was extremely glad to render all the assistance asked for. The hon. member wanted to know the basis upon which we give assistance for forest fires. There is a laid down procedure of which the premier of Newfoundland and the ministers of the government concerned down there I think were fully aware. They were all written letters only about five or six months ago reminding them again of the procedure and pointing out that, if they required assistance, all that was required was that they sign a declaration to that effect, give it to the local military commander, the area commander as it happens in Newfoundland, and he was and is authorized at all times to meet that request up to the limit of the forces he has at his disposal. If he has not enough forces to meet that request, then he is authorized immediately to telegraph or telephone Ottawa to report the matter so that authorization can be given to some other military commander in another military command such as that in Quebec, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, to send men over. That is the procedure.

As far as the costs are concerned, may I say this. The costs which, on the normal basis, a province is expected to pay are not the pay and allowances. We charge nothing for that. But if there are any militiamen who are called out, then the province is expected to pay the extra pay and allowances for those militiamen. Then there are the transportation costs or in other words what it costs to bring the troops from the point at which they are located to where the fire is. Then there is the cost of equipment which is used up and lost, such as fire hose; or if there is a vehicle that is caught and burned in the fire and so on—any equipment which is used up or lost. Also it includes extra costs which may be incurred for lodgings, meals and things of that kind, whenever it is applicable. Generally it is not applicable. These are really a small portion generally of the total cost of the operation. As far as the government is concerned, there has been, as far I am aware, no discussion as yet with Newfoundland with regard to costs. There is a laid down procedure. Under the regulations the army commander, before he moves at all, is supposed to get a written demand from the premier or the designated ministers. In this case we did not wait for that. The premier of Newfoundland telephoned the Prime Minister here. The Prime Minister got in touch with me immediately. I gave the orders for the air force to commit the airplanes and for the army to get the troops ready. Then I telephoned the premier and asked him about equipment. He had not said a word about equipment. I said, "What equipment do you need?" and so forth.

This was the way it was done in this case. There was no mention of costs in this particular case. The army commander there subsequently went to the premier, explained the situation and asked him if he would sign the usual authorization. The army commander is required to do this under the regulations. I am sorry to say that the premier refused to sign it.

In any event, there has been no discussion of costs in this regard and I think this will perhaps be looked at from the general point of view of the size of the disaster, and so forth. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this is a matter I should go into further at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would permit me to ask just one more question. As the minister knows, a helicopter was lost. Happily, the crew and passengers of the helicopter escaped. I notice that if any equipment is lost, the user will be expected to pay for it. I doubt whether the minister would really expect the government of Newfoundland to pay for this helicopter.

Mr. Harkness: Under normal circumstances this would be one of the things for which the province would be expected to pay. There is just one other point in connection with this matter. I regret that some question was raised that the Solicitor General, the minister from Newfoundland, had not been doing anything in connection with this disaster. I can assure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the committee generally that the Solicitor General was extremely active in regard to this matter.

He spoke to me on several occasions about sending assistance to Newfoundland. He asked what assistance they had, what had they asked for, and so on. I explained to him what the general procedure was, which I have already outlined to the committee, and assured him that we were willing to give further help just as soon as it was asked for. But we could not force our way into Newfoundland with this help. If we had done so we would no doubt have got into quite serious trouble with the provincial authorities.

Therefore I would not wish any implication or idea left that the Solicitor General was not taking an extremely active interest in this matter and was not expressing very great concern throughout the course of these fires in Newfoundland.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to participate in the debate at this stage, but in view of the minister's apparent confusion I feel I must do so. I realize that the minister has been travelling across the country making speeches, some of them causing considerable confusion in the country. I now realize the reason, which is very simple; it is that he is confused himself.

At the same time I will take advantage of the opportunity to reply to a few of the questions raised yesterday in speeches by the associate minister and the parliamentary secretary. I had thought of replying to some of these statements and allegations last evening, but unfortunately the associate minister was not here. I understand he was enjoying himself elsewhere on official duties.

First of all in respect of the suggestion of the minister this afternoon that the information I used was not official, let me again repeat that the information I used was from the highest source available. It was taken directly from a statement given personally to congress by the commander in chief of the United States armed forces. Surely there can be no better authority on what is United States policy and on what are United States priorities than the commander in chief himself. I think the minister would agree with that.

An hon. Member: It was a supplementary statement.

Mr. Hellyer: Of course, the message to congress was a supplementary statement. It was to put into effect a supplementary program of high priorities required to bring United States strength up to the required levels. Emphasis was put on those particular projects which would best accomplish that purpose.

The minister is quite right when he says that of the total moneys allocated as a result of this message, the largest amount was for strategic weapons, for the carriers of atomic weapons. As the minister well knows, the United States carries the burden of strategic deterrence. At least 90 per cent of the total strategic capacity of the western alliance is the responsibility of the United States.

As I stated rather clearly, I thought, in my statement, they felt it was necessary to do something to augment that deterrent force and so the president recommended certain things to congress. The most expensive were associated with deterrents. But the president made it very clear that he was aware of the necessity, at the same time, to have a change in emphasis, to implement an increase in the conventional capacity of the United States and of the western alliance.

In respect of the four items of equipment to which I referred, they are all second-hand; not one of them was of sufficient priority to demand any more expenditure at this time. As a matter of fact, most of them are out of production. I will deal with each one briefly later on.

The minister said yesterday we should have the best equipment available. But the equipment we are getting is not, in all cases, the best available. Some of it is much less than that. I did not say that all second-hand hardware is useless.

Mr. Sevigny: What do you suggest?

Mr. Hellyer: I did not say that. I would hay, however, that second hand hardware is, in most cases, inferior to first class hardware. I think that should be obvious to my hon. friend across the chamber, if he would listen very carefully. The parliamentary secretary stated yesterday that the objectives of Canadian defence are two in number, to preserve the peace and to protect Canadian citizens. He further stated that the method of achieving these objectives is NATO. The parliamentary secretary is confusing the objectives with policy. There is no disagreement with respect to objectives; the disagreement is in respect of the means of achieving them.

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Chairman, there is going to be disagreement if the hon. member misquotes the objectives I mentioned.

Mr. Hellyer: I apologize to the parliamentary secretary. I think he is perhaps quite right. I believe those are the two objectives stated by the minister. I realized that in passing. If I misquoted the parliamentary secretary, I am sorry; but the same comment would apply.

Mr. Chambers: The objectives were the prevention of war and the preservation of freedom.

Mr. Hellyer: That is right. The comment still applies. There is no disagreement in respect of these objectives but the method of achieving them is open to considerable debate.

The associate minister made a number of complaints about my remarks in his speech. I should like to attempt to elaborate upon several of them for his benefit. First in respect to the increase in the armed forces, the associate minister questioned my figure of $10,000 per man. I was very careful to use the words contained in the blue book, "military personnel costs, operations and maintenance". Surely the associate minister would not say that additional forces would not mean an additional requirement for expenditures under the heading of operations and maintenance. They require heat and light. If they operate vehicles, they will wear out tires and consume gasoline. If they travel, they will have travelling expenses. Of course they will have most, if not all, of the same expenditures as the present members of the armed forces. I think his figure of the possible cost per man is much too low.

The minister then objected to my statement that the brigade did not have the fire power and mobility it should have. He said that it is mobile and equipped with the most up to date equipment that can be procured. Whom does he think he is kidding? He should take another look at the equipment and then look at some of the equipment which is now available in the world.

In the same vein the parliamentary secretary to the minister said that the brigade was moved bright and early one morning during manoeuvres before he arose for breakfast. However, he was careful not to tell us what it moved on. Did the brigade use rubber tired vehicles to move it on surfaced highways? Did it use world war II personnel carriers? The parliamentary secretary did not say.

Mr. Chambers: I was not up.

Mr. Hellyer: If the parliamentary secretary would take the trouble to inquire, I think it would be of interest to the committee to know whether these are the vehicles used by the brigade or whether they have some new equipment about which we have not been advised. The hon. gentleman should know that in the event of war the enemy might be so thoughtless as to blow up some of the roads and there might be the requirement for a carrier to go across a lake or stream. How does he think they would cross, by submarine?

The associate minister then went on to say that the enemy is impressed by the strength of our forces and the determination which is being shown by NATO to defend our way of life. I do not know what communications the associate minister has with the enemy, but even if the enemy are impressed as the associate minister said, they do not seem to be intimidated; at least, they were not deterred from recommencing nuclear testing nor from threatening to cut the access corridors to Berlin.

I must admit that listening as I did yesterday to the minister, the associate minister and the parliamentary secretary, I was reminded of Wynken, Blynken and Nod, three men asleep in the land of unreality. They are going to have to come out of their trance and face the hard world of reality.

I have here a clipping from Life magazine, issue of August 25, 1961. It is entitled "The Long Road Back for the Army". I should like to read it for the benefit of the committee:

> The conventional-war threat implicit in the Berlin situation poses some obvious questions about the U.S. army. The answers are disturbing.
>
> Across the sand hills and pine woods of South Carolina the spendidly trained 101st and 82nd airborne divisions fought a rugged week-long battle that was billed as "the most important land warfare exercise in 20 years". It was a convincing show of strength, but the sad fact is these two divisions constitute two thirds of the combat-ready U.S.-based army. Most of their equipment is of world war II or Korean vintage, and much of it is wearing out. Not only the airborne divisions but the five first-line U.S. divisions in Europe are still using old tanks, and the quality of tanks has been the weak link in the U.S. arsenal. Only one battalion in the entire army is equipped with the new M-60 tank to match Russian T-54's which have been in operation since 1952. The Russian army, after two post-war equipment changes, has handed out to satellites and even neutralist Arabs newer equipment than the best-armed G.I. now carries.
> This sorry situation came about largely because of the army's orphaned status during the eight-year era of the massive retaliation doctrine. After Korea the army was cut back to less than 25 per cent of the total defence budget and barely managed to avoid obliteration by getting into the missile and rocket business. The army's Redstone has become a mainstay in the space race, but this kind of development tended to obscure the army's conventional role. "After a while there wasn't any more fat to be chopped so they cut logistical bone and muscle and called it fat," says one colonel. "Now the army is 60 per cent of what it looks like on paper." The ground forces have another legitimate complaint: the air force has always placed too low a priority on the job of supplying planes and pilots that would turn the army into a swift and mobile world wide striking force.
> Demoralized and unsure of its mission, slapped down repeatedly by congress and the defence department, the army's top leadership has grown fusty and defensive. By the time Kennedy stepped in and authorized 133,000 new men to beef up limited-warfare capability, the army's overlapping technical services and weakened logistical systems were so messed up that army brass wanted to assign most of the new manpower to noncombat functions. The administration, disillusioned with the brass, is still trying to find the handle for a more effective troop build-up as well as for basic reforms. Defence department civilians and the younger officer corps share the administration's sense of frustration. "What we need," one of them says, "is a guy who is smart, mad at the way things are, and a real S.O.B."

One might say that the message contained in that article would apply with equal force to the Canadian armed forces. The associate minister went on to discuss the Russian bomber force. He stated that not only is the enemy still flying bombers but they are still producing them. How does he know? Is that the latest dispatch from Washington? Or is the hon. gentleman relying on published reports of the Soviet May day air show? Does he realize that a similar air show a few years ago contributed to the spending of hundreds of millions of dollars for air defence against manned bombers while the Soviet union concentrated on the development of ballistic missiles? Does the minister think that this might be another Soviet trick? If so, can he be fooled so easily? If not, and the bombers are supersonic as reported, then the minister had better obtain a faster plane than the Voodoo.

I was surprised at the Minister of National Defence today implying that anyone who said that the bomber threat was diminishing, was not still the main force and would not continue to be so for a number of years, was in effect off his rocker. Is the minister telling the committee that the government lied to the house and the people of Canada in 1959 when it cancelled the Avro Arrow? Is that what he intended in his statement?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could interrupt to clear one point. I did not at any time say that the bomber threat was not diminishing. Naturally, as intercontinental ballistic missiles are produced in greater quantities they will become progressively more important and the bomber less important, but that period has not yet been reached. That is the main point I made. That should be clear and apparent. The point has not yet been reached where the intercontinental ballistic missile is the main threat. The main threat is still the manned bomber.

Mr. Hellyer: I thank the minister for this interesting interjection. The minister said he made it quite clear that he did not say the bomber threat is not diminishing. If the bomber threat is diminishing why does the government now do something which it said two years ago was unnecessary? This is the question which comes to mind. The bomber threat is diminishing—

Mr. Harkness: The government did not say it was unnecessary. That is why the Bomarcs were ordered, for one thing. If we thought there was no bomber threat we certainly would not have ordered the Bomarcs.

Mr. Hellyer: The confusion about which I spoke earlier, Mr. Chairman, was never more apparent.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): In your mind.

Mr. Hellyer: May I take a moment or two in which to speak about the Bomarc. This is one of the pieces of hardware which I described as being second-hand; it is worse than that, it is junk. The Bomarc missile is a ten year old concept. As the minister well knows it was designed to shoot down enemy aircraft, manned bombers. The minister himself made very clear again yesterday that it is not effective against missiles and no one ever said that it was. With that we agree. But what the minister has failed to realize, however, is that times have changed since this concept was initiated ten years ago. At that time bombers were the only threat to the North American continent, not just the main threat if the minister is correct in the information he gave us today.

There is one other development on which the minister has not commented with respect to the Bomarc. The United States has developed stand-off bombs which are carried by manned bombers. Published reports and evidence indicate that the U.S.S.R. is doing the same thing. If the U.S.S.R. has approximately the same success with stand-off bombs as the United States it, too, will carry a ballistic missile which can be launched from the wings of its bombers which will have a range of approximately a thousand miles and which will carry a nuclear warhead.

The picture at the present time and for the future is this. To send a Bomarc, even if it will fly, with its four hundred mile range, against a ballistic missile that has a nuclear warhead and a thousand mile range is like trying to fight a sword with a toothpick. Long before the bomber force gets within range of the Bomarc station it will launch one of its ballistic missiles from under its wings, knock out the Bomarc station in toto and fly merrily on its way. Surely, the minister is at least that much up to date that he can see the futility of putting money in fixed bases, whether they be Bomarcs or SAGE or gap-fillers, if they are going to be destroyed at the outset by any one of three or four kinds of missiles, including missiles launched from bombers, which is the only potential threat against which they were designed.

The Bomarc will never reach the carriers. What good is it then? How can the minister justify spending Canadian money on a useless piece of second-hand junk.

With respect to the United States appropriations that we were discussing a few minutes ago, the minister did not say in respect of the funding for the Bomarc that it had been cut several times; that the limited program which is now being carried forward was probably a compromise designed largely to accommodate the Boeing Aircraft Company, the Canadian government, and what would have been the cancellation charges if the whole thing had not been proceeded with. Surely, he does not expect us to believe that it has a continuing military function. That would be stretching credibility too far.

The associate minister informed the committee that the federal government did not invite General Kuter to make his Toronto speech. Be that as it may; the minister did not contend that the government was not consulted. I would certainly believe that, in view of what has happened in the last year or two, that the government would have known of the proposed visit. The associate minister went on to say—

Mr. Harkness: I would not want to leave any misapprehension at all. When General Kuter, or anybody else in that position comes to Canada to make a speech he submits the speech to me to see whether or not I approve it. Anything I do not approve I strike out and this was done in this case. I read the speech. I thought it was an excellent speech and I approved it. But we had nothing to do with General Kuter coming to Canada to give the speech.

Mr. Hellyer: I appreciate the minister's explanation very much. This is exactly as I would have expected it to be.

The associate minister went on to refer to the Bobcat all-purpose personnel carrier and he said that it had been put into production. We would like some further explanation in reference to this. Is he referring to the limited production of a few prototype models which was announced in this house a year ago, or is he referring to something new, namely the production of a sufficient quantity to be of some military use. This is a question that has to be answered. We have to know how many are on order, and when they will be delivered to our forces overseas, because they are not much good until they get there.

The minister implied that I was saying there was confusion and indecision in the minds of those entrusted with the national defence of Canada, the serving officers. The minister does not have to lecture me in respect of the competence and dedication of the officers and men of the Canadian armed forces. They do not always agree, but they are always sincere in their opinions. The indecision and confusion lie with the ministers and the cabinet and I place the responsibility where it belongs, namely on the government leaders.

Both the associate minister and the parliamentary secretary proposed a strange hypothesis. It was as follows. To say that Canada has no defence policy is tantamount to saying that NATO has no defence policy. Well, this is a strange doctrine indeed. Is the minister saying, as he once said on a television program, that the Canadian defence budget and defence policy are determined by NATO? Do we take our instructions from NATO? I doubt it very much. Collaboration, yes, but surely NATO does not dictate Canada's defence policy or Canada's defence budget. This is a new doctrine that should be announced by the government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was repudiated in this house by the Prime Minister a year ago.

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps there has been a change since. If so, we should have been told about it.

Mr. Sevigny: I rise on a point of order. I never said that NATO fixed the Canadian budget and I made that abundantly clear when members of the opposition raised the point approximately two years ago. But I have said this and I repeat it, that agreements which are reached at the NATO conference table only after careful consideration are at the basis of the defence policy not only of this country but of all the member countries of NATO.

Mr. Hellyer: I must admit the surprise that I felt yesterday to have this new doctrine expressed by the minister. I hope that Canada's contribution is still determined in collaboration with our allies but on the best consideration of the Canadian government which is responsible to the Canadian people. Confusion reigns supreme on the government benches. And now with respect to the other pieces of equipment that were referred to earlier. I have dealt with the Bomarc and I do not intend to elaborate further now as there may be something to be said later in the debate.

With respect to the Voodoo aircraft, I have never said it was not a good aircraft. Perhaps the minister is technically correct, in his very carefully chosen phraseology of yesterday he said that it is the best interceptor now available for North American air defence service. That may be true. It is still not as good as the Arrow was and it is now out of production. I should have said this yesterday. Unquestionably if the Avro Arrow had gone into production it would have been welcomed now by the United States forces and the minister would have been able to find customers for it because it would have been the best in its field.

With respect to the F-104, the United States has not funded any money for it for a considerable period of time. The F-104 was in service with the North American air command. As the minister knows, it was withdrawn from the North American air command because it was not satisfactory and it was turned over to a subsidiary role with the United States national guard. That is what the United States air force thought of it. They may still have one wing in tactical air command on the continental United States. But they do not think enough of it to put any more money into it or to obtain it for the strike reconnaissance role for the United States air force. Those in use with the national guard in the United States are still experiencing the unfortunate accident rate which was evident previously with the earlier models of this aircraft.

With respect to the Honest John, it too is now second best, second-hand hardware. The United States forces are now putting their reliance on the Little John, a much smaller, lighter and portable weapon which can be carried by air transport and has a capacity probably not too different from that of the Honest John. When we have been so late in obtaining these things, why are we not getting the best instead of the second best? These questions have been raised and surely the minister cannot say in the light of what I have indicated that I was unfair in calling these weapons second-hand hardware. They are second-hand hardware.

I hope that the minister will reconsider some of the things he said this afternoon. I hope that he will reconsider the effectiveness of some of the roles that his forces are called upon to play. I also hope that he will stop stalling with respect to getting the necessary equipment for our fighting forces overseas because the time has long since passed when he should have got out of that frame of mind and have taken some real action to make sure they do have the equipment they need.

(Translation):

Mr. Sevigny: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I should like to give some specific explanations, in French, about the remarks made before this committee, yesterday, by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis).

The hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville referred to the situation in St. Jean, as well as in neighbouring areas, with respect to salaries which are paid by the Department of National Defence to employees on a part-time or hourly basis.

Among other things, the hon. member stated that, before 1957, the department's employees used to get annual increases.

That policy of paying hourly paid government employees salaries in keeping with the prevailing rates of the area for a similar work, has remained unchanged for years. The Department of National Defence makes sure that salaries paid to all hourly paid employees are reviewed at least once a year, and that increases are approved whenever they are warranted.

The hon. member added that since 1957 in some cases, and since 1958 in others, no salary increase had been granted. I am sorry to contradict him, but all the hourly-paid employees in the St. Jean area, except three, had a salary increase in 1958. In addition, other increases were approved in 1959 for almost all classes while other increases were approved in 1960 for certain classes of employees. Results of the preliminary study made by the department for the year 1961 on the rates paid in those areas are not yet available, unfortunately.

The hon. member mentioned that waitresses, assistant cooks, kitchen hands, truck drivers and others receive inadequate salaries that are too low to enable them to provide a decent living or even bare necessities for their families. The Department of Labour is responsible for the policies to be followed in the fixing of salary rates; in order to set these rates, we study the existing conditions in private enterprise.

The hon. member also mentioned that in the past, that is before 1957, employees who were not under the civil service could work overtime and earn higher salaries. There was no change made in that policy of paying higher wages for overtime, but it has never been a practice, in the Department of National Defence, to provide on purpose overtime work as a means to increase the employees' salaries. On the contrary, they are asked to work overtime only when there are serious reasons for it. We do this in order to avoid additional expenses.

These last few years, the department and the R.C.A.F. have been particularly conscious of the fact that it is necessary to cut expenses whenever it is possible, while maintaining a high degree of efficiency.

The hon. member stated that, prior to 1957, the employees working on Saturdays or Sundays received higher pay, since they were paid at time and a half rates and sometimes at double time rates while today they are paid at straight time.

Mr. Chairman, I will answer by saying that hourly paid employees are entitled to a certain extra rate for the number of hours worked in addition to their normal week. Moreover, they are paid for the work done on days of rest, above and beyond their regular number of working hours.

However, it must be understood that because of the nature of the duties they have to perform, some employees work only on Saturday, Sunday or at night. Those are therefore considered as regular hours of work, not overtime.

I would be very happy to send the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), a copy of the explanation given to me by the department and which should convince him that the Department of National Defence commits no injustice deliberately or otherwise towards its employees in the St. Jean district or elsewhere.

(Text):

I should like to comment briefly now, Mr. Chairman—

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Would the minister permit a question now or does he want me to wait for him to conclude his remarks?

Mr. Sevigny: If the hon. member does not mind, I should like to conclude my remarks. I shall gladly answer his questions then.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment briefly on certain remarks which were made to the committee this afternoon by the hon. member for Kootenay West. He referred to the fact it was rather inadvisable to permit German generals who have, at some time or other, served against our country, to occupy positions of prominence in the NATO forces. The hon. member referred particularly, and in rather strong language, to the fact that General Heusinger today occupies a place of prominence in the NATO forces. I fully agree with the hon. member concerning the employment of well-known Nazis in positions of high importance. I am convinced that no friends of the Nazi party or well-known Nazis, and certainly no well-known war criminals, are employed in any capacity in NATO.

In so far as General Heusinger is concerned, I feel that it is necessary to mention that this distinguished officer was never at any time a member of the Nazi party or of the Nazi forces. A distinction must be made between the forces of the regular German army and the members of the Nazi party. General Heusinger was, in fact, a career officer in the Germany army. After the uprising of July 20, 1944, at which time there was an attempt on Hitler's life by a group of officers who believed the time had come to put an end to this madman's antics, General Heusinger was arrested and escaped from gaol just before he was sentenced to death by the Nazi party.

General Heusinger is a man who served his country with distinction. I believe we must realize that, in spite of the excesses of the Nazi party in Germany during the last war, there were nevertheless some patriotic Germans who felt that by serving in the army of their country they were serving their country just like so many Canadians, Americans and British soldiers felt they were serving their country by being in uniform. General Heusinger was never a Nazi. He was a man who was under sentence of death because he tried at one time to stop the evil effects of the Nazi doctrine upon the world. I felt that these remarks were necessary at this time.

Mr. Herridge: Will the minister permit a question? Has he read the memorandum presented by the American Jewish congress in which there are extracts of orders issued by General Heusinger to the German army and statements made by him in the memorandum that the extermination of the civil population would provide an opportunity to exterminate the Jews and Slavs in the countries concerned. This is in the Congressional Record and I can give the page.

Mr. Sevigny: I must say in reply that I have not yet read this memorandum. However, I felt it was necessary for me to mention what I knew about General Heusinger, who enjoys the confidence of those around him in NATO and who is today performing a valuable service in the NATO association.

I should like now to refer briefly to certain of the comments which were made by the hon. member for Trinity. Once again the hon. member for Trinity surprised this committee and certainly surprised me when he claimed that nothing in the army was good. He said particularly that the army brigade is not mobile. He claims that the weapons with which we are equipped are second-hand hardware, in fact he called them junk. He claims that nothing is good. Nothing that has been done seems to meet his wishes. After listening to him, we have to come to the conclusion that he considers all that is being done here and in the United States is useless.

Mr. Hellyer: I did not say that.

Mr. Sevigny: The army is poorly equipped, he says, and poorly manned. Nothing seems to be worth while. He read a lengthy article which was supposed to be from Life magazine, written by I don't know who, in which it was stated that there was nothing in the United States forces that was modern or adequate to meet the threat that faces us today. The hon. member, as I said, stated that the army brigade was not mobile and he seemed to be concerned about this lack of mobility. He said that nothing moved, and that all was wrong. He also seems to think that the weapons we have put at the disposal of our forces are useless. He finds absolutely nothing good in what has been done or what is being done.

There was one thing that struck me, though. After claiming that nothing worked properly, that nothing moved and nothing seemed to fire right, he did not come out with one suggestion about the type of aircraft or the type of weapon or the type of ship which could be used and should be used by our forces in order to protect us. He once again let off a great big blast concerning the Bomarc program. He told us that the Bomarcs were useless against intercontinental ballistic missiles. We agree with this. However, there is one thing the hon. member should learn at some time, and that is that the Bomarc is not a missile meant to destroy intercontinental ballistic missiles. It is a weapon which is meant to be used against the enemy bombers which may attack our shores. It may well be that they will do so, since the manned bomber is still a very distinct possibility.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the hon. member for Trinity that the Bomarc is not meant, has never been meant and will never be meant, as a weapon against the intercontinental ballistic missiles. It is a weapon which is meant for defence against the possibility of attack by manned bombers. It is considered by the highest authorities in the United States, in Canada and elsewhere throughout NATO countries as an efficient weapon against bombers.

Then, the hon. member claimed that the figures we mentioned in relation to the cost of additional forces are too low. These figures have been supplied to us by the officials of the Department of National Defence who arrived at them only after the longest, closest and most careful scrutiny. In order to make sure that they would not be wrong their figures were further revised and studied with great care by the officials of treasury board. It was only after this careful study had been made by these two bodies of men that these figures were submitted to us. I may say frankly that we are still under the impression that the opinions of the experienced staff of the defence department and the experienced members of treasury board are good enough for us. That is why we say the figures we have quoted are correct.

Once again the hon. member tells us that we should have amphibious carriers for our brigade and that we should have these weapons at the earliest possible moment. We agree with him. This is exactly what we are trying to do in procuring these Bobcat vehicles which are being produced and which we hope will be produced at a faster rate from now on. We are pushing the Bobcat program. In fact, we have announced that we would eventually buy 500 of these vehicles. We hope that these vehicles will be ready in the near future.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister permit a question? Will he indicate when that announcement was made?

Mr. Sevigny: This was indicated last year. We said that as soon as the experimental tests were finished and once the vehicles were considered operational and satisfactory, we hoped to buy some 500 of these vehicles.

Mr. Hellyer: It was stated to be a requirement, but was any order ever given or was any money put in the estimates for it?

Mr. Sevigny: If the hon. member would keep his seat and listen carefully—

Mr. Hellyer: All I get is words.

Mr. Sevigny: —he would realize that I have said that last year or some time ago—I forget the exact date—we said that as soon as the experimental tests were finished and had been found satisfactory, we hoped to be able to place an initial order for 500 of these vehicles.

Mr. Hellyer: You will probably be a senator by then.

[Mr. Sevigny.]

Mr. Sevigny: As I have just said, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has continued with the well known Liberal policy of scrapping all that we have, in order to replace this policy with a policy of their own which has never been defined. It seems to me that it is slightly ridiculous to suggest that we get rid of all the proven weapons, which have been satisfactory in the past, which are still satisfactory and which I am sure give this country the defence it needs.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) a question. The minister told us earlier today that, since 1957 wage increases have been regularly awarded to the employees of the Royal Military College and of the R.C.A.F. station at St. Jean. But, first of all, the minister pointed out that I had said that employees there were earning inadequate wages; I did say so, of course, and I repeat it.

The minister received information from the Department of National Defence, but I made some considerable inquiries among the employees, because I had heard of several justified complaints. So let the minister take notes or refute my figures. It would be rather difficult for him to do so because I have here the stubs of the cheques paid to those people in the various sections. When I pointed out that fact yesterday, I had no intention of playing politics. I simply wanted to draw the government's attention to the discriminatory wages paid to members of the R.C.A.F. at the Royal Military College at St. Jean.

The minister referred to zoning, and he said that the department had considered zoning in the area. Well, is it not rather strange that at the St. Jean military college a waitress employed by the Department of National Defence should earn 87 cents, in St. Jean, while half a mile from there, at the R.C.A.F. base, a waitress earns 89 cents, that is two cents more? Yet, the zone is the same and the employer is the same department in both cases.

The minister seems to find this normal and did not say whether my complaints were justified. Personally, I think it is absolutely abnormal that in 1961 rates as low as 87 cents and 89 cents an hour should be paid to employees of the Department of National Defence.

I have stubs here. If the minister wants proofs, he would see, for instance, that a person called a kitchen helper was paid $74.19 for 96 hours of work, or $37 a week. Therefore, the worker who earns $37 a week in St. Jean gets a dollar a week more in his national defence job than an unemployed person who draws benefits. In my opinion, this is an anomaly and I clearly said so to the minister.

The minister said the procedure has remained unchanged since 1957, and he added that those workers have been granted increases regularly. Well, I note, as the minister will after inquiry, that those who received increases were precisely those who needed them less. The classifications which were in greater need of increases, such as waitresses, kitchen helpers and bus drivers, got no increase since 1957-58.

I have here other pay cheque stubs and I note that in 1957, a driver earned $300.50 in 15 days; today, he cannot earn more than $120.

Then, I say that the minister should not only take the floor to reply to the member for St. Jean and tell him that his claims are unfounded but that he should go to the heart of the matter and check the facts instead of being content with one side of the story.

I understand that departmental officials have given him a detailed list of the salaries paid at the station. I submit that that list in no way contradicts what I said here yesterday and what I am now repeating today. In 1961, a bus driver earns $1,000 to $1,500 less than in 1957. If the minister investigates, he will come to the same conclusions as I did.

He states that work done on Saturdays and Sundays is paid more now than before. According to my information, such work does not entitle the employee to higher pay; perhaps some local officer is mistaken in his interpretation of the law. I am told that work done on Saturday and Sunday is not paid at time and a half rates nor double time rates as was the case in 1957.

Mr. Chairman, I do insist on that point. I should like the Associate Minister of National Defence, for whom I have every respect, to take into favourable consideration the facts I brought to his attention. I see no reason, for example, why there should be a difference between the salary paid to a truck driver working at the St. Jean base and the one paid a truck driver working for the C.N.R., which is an organization owned by the federal government. The difference varies between 30 cents and 40 cents per hour.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the Associate Minister of National Defence for giving us his figures but I would like him to consider mine and to make a personal inquiry in order to ascertain the situation now prevailing at the Royal Military College at St. Jean and at the R.C.A.F. station in St. Jean.

People working very hard, 45 hours a week, get 83, 85, 87, 89 and 92 cents an hour. In fact, unemployed people get $36 a week while people who work hard get $37. I think that is an abnormal situation and I hope that the Associate Minister of National Defence will give me an immediate answer, if he has anything to say, and will look into what I have just stated.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Chairman, I intend to be very brief.

A moment ago, I mentioned some facts which I had obtained, as was said by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), from national defence officials, to explain government policy as regards salaries paid to part-time prevailing rate employees.

I wish to assure the hon. member that the Department of National Defence has no intention, any more than I have, to deal unfairly with part-time employees in the St. Jean area or elsewhere.

Mr. Chairman, I shall be most happy to ask the officials of the Department of National Defence to look into the information the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville will send me, and I hope that together we will succeed in seeing to it that everyone is justly treated in that area, just as in other areas.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the Associate Minister of National Defence for his statement. I hope that together we will be able to look into that situation and arrive at a conclusion which will be satisfactory to the employees of the Department of National Defence.

(Text):

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I rise on what I hope is a question of privilege, and it is this. We have been given a great many figures in this house today and on a good many occasions they have been strongly controverted. We who are not experts have to rely upon figures given to us, and that includes not only members of parliament but the public at large.

It seems to me, therefore, that it would be fair if we asked hon. members who have given figures today and who for any reason in their own minds, or because of what has been said in the committee, have changed those figures, to have the correction noted in Hansard so that when the record appears tomorrow it will be the best record we can have. This is important when we are dealing with very large and significant figures, because I do feel that the record will then be of great value to all concerned.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps on that—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Are you calling it six o'clock?

Mr. Harkness: I thought we might pass the next two or three items.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think that is possible now. I wish to make several observations. I want to deal particularly with the minister's statement that the Liberal party had not put forward a policy. It is not my intention to deal with what is the Liberal party policy because that has been adequately and clearly stated by the hon. member for Trinity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is clear, however, is that the government has not succinctly stated its policy. After all, the government was elected not only to formulate policy in all spheres of national and international activities, in so far as the latter apply to Canada, but also to see that these policies were given effect.

The government has not given us a clear statement with regard to the acquisition of nuclear weapons. I wish to say something about that at greater length than I can in the time at my disposal. I wish to indicate to the minister that I do propose, as others in this party have done, to call upon him to give now, before this house adjourns, a clear statement of the government's intention in this regard.

We do not wish to be confronted, with regard to this vital matter at this critical time in human history, with the device this government has employed on so many occasions. We were told, for instance, in the dying days prior to adjournment, that the government's policy with regard to amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act would be made known in due course.

The government stated in January in the speech from the throne that it was going to bring down amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Then, the moment parliament adjourned we were confronted with a device which removes from the government any immediate, apparent responsibility. I refer to the appointment of a royal commission to go into something in connection with which the government said in January it was prepared to enunciate a policy.

Now we may be here another month. I have no doubt, from every indication now apparent, that before we come back here in November or December the Minister of National Defence will announce a policy regarding the acquisition of nuclear weapons, and without parliament being given the opportunity of confronting the issue immediately and debating the question on its merits.

I believe that at a time when we are all seeking to appreciate the responsibilities of the government in this difficult period, it should take parliament into its confidence. The government should indicate what is in its mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of National Defence could rise in his place right now and say that Canada proposes to accept nuclear weapons without condition, or under certain conditions—in the custody of the United States, for instance, and under their control, but under arrangements that recognize the responsibility of the government of Canada in respect of matters pertaining to the welfare of this nation.

The minister can say that we propose to accept in Canada the agreement the United Kingdom has with regard to the acquisition of nuclear weapons in that country. He can tell us whether or not it is true that there is now ready an agreement formulated by the United States, with the full knowledge of the government of Canada, with respect to this matter.

I am not saying that is the case, but these are the indications we are receiving at every turn. We are entitled to know, before parliament adjourns, with respect to this very vital matter of whether or not the government has a policy; and if it has, the government should state it in a forthright and unambiguous way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Harkness: In reply to that, Mr. Chairman, I would say that I do not propose to accept the directions of the hon. member for Essex East as to what I should or should not say in this debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know you will not, but the people of Canada expect you to state where you stand in this matter of acquiring nuclear weapons.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, would the house leader indicate the business for tomorrow and the balance of the week?

Mr. Churchill: We will follow the agreed program to complete the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Then we will carry on with the privy council and defence production estimates.

Mr. Hellyer: In that order?

Mr. Churchill: In that order, I judge, unless there is some necessity for change.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Ask the Minister of National Defence to answer questions, and we will finish quickly.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

SYDNEY, N.S.—USE OF LOW VOLATILE COAL FOR STEEL

Question No. 237—Mr. Argue:

1. Has the Sydney, Nova Scotia, steel plant recently invited from the United States of America quotations for low volatile coal for blending purposes in the production of steel?
2. If so, what are the quantities of coal involved?
3. Does the low volatile coal required exist in the maritimes?
4. If not, what is the difference in the costs of making steel using low volatile coal imported from the U.S.A. and using the most suitable coal available in the maritimes?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys):

1. This is a matter affecting the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation Limited and is not one of government responsibility. However, the press has reported the movement of one cargo of low volatile coal into Sydney for this purpose.

2. Since this is a matter of private business, the government has no official information.

3. No coal of low volatile rank is known to exist in the maritime provinces.

4. The government has no information on this matter.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, September 14, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

TRADE

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would care to comment on a statement made in Ghana yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, presumably on behalf of the government, to the effect that the United Kingdom now had to choose between the European common market and the commonwealth.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I saw that report. It is a news report and I am sure it does not represent what was said. I have made it very clear on a number of occasions that we in Canada have made representations to the United Kingdom and have pointed out the potential effects of its joining under the treaty of Rome unless provision is made at the time of joining the Six for an exception in respect of those things upon which Canada and the other parts of the commonwealth depend. No such alternative as that suggested by the question of the Leader of the Opposition has been advanced at any time by the government.

The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, following the discussions that took place when Mr. Sandys visited various parts of the commonwealth, stated in the House of Commons that an application to join the common market would be made—I am paraphrasing what he said in that connection—but that commonwealth relationships would not be thereby weakened economically or otherwise.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a supplementary question. Would it be possible for the Prime Minister to secure for the information of members of the house the text of what appears to have been a very important statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the interesting point there is that this was a meeting behind closed doors. I have found in the past, as the hon. gentleman must have found in his experience, that some of the interpretations, speculative and otherwise, that follow such meetings very often bear little relationship to what was actually said.

VISIT OF RED CHINESE MISSION TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa West asked me a question with regard to a report that a delegation from communist China might be coming to Canada to discuss trade matters. The information I have is that the Chinese state trading corporations have expressed the intention of sending a group of their representatives to Canada. I am informed that the group hopes to begin its market study in Ottawa toward the end of this month, and to have discussions with Canadian businessmen in various centres throughout the country.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INDIAN AFFAIRS—IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and ask the minister what progress is being made with respect to transforming the recommendations of the joint Senate and House of Commons committee on Indian affairs into legislative form, and whether we might expect an amending bill this session.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): When the recommendations contained in the report are finally considered by the government and action is contemplated, the house will be informed.

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO IMMIGRATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): If I may I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a question. Does the hon. lady expect to be in a position to introduce the revision of the Immigration Act at this session of parliament?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, while considerable progress has been made in the considerations involved, I have not one to present to parliament yet. I am hoping to have one at the earliest possible moment.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Acting Minister of Finance a question arising out of a question I asked him yesterday. Is the statement made, according to press reports yesterday, that the deputy minister of trade and commerce will lead the Canadian delegation to the forthcoming commonwealth conference, accurate?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Acting Minister of Finance): The statement was accurate. I was going to reply to this question in a moment, after others had been answered. I was asked by the Leader of the Opposition as to the delegation. It is to be led by Mr. Roberts, deputy minister of trade and commerce and there is a possibility, I am told, of one change, but the plan at the moment, and the intention, is to send Mr. Roberts, Mr. J. H. Warren of trade and commerce, Mr. Latimer of trade and commerce, Dr. Annis of the Department of Finance and Mr. Turner of the Department of Agriculture. Those three government departments will be represented. Then Mr. D. R. Taylor from Canada House, London, will join the delegation and participate in the discussions.

IMMIGRATION

FRANCIS TOBIAS—INQUIRY AS TO LETTER RESPECTING DEPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. A United Press release appearing in this morning's newspapers stated that an office receptionist wrote the Prime Minister asking him to recall the deportation order against a Polish defector and allow him to remain in Canada. My question is, did the Prime Minister receive such a letter and can the Prime Minister make any statement to the house as to whether anything is being planned to deal with this matter?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think the hon. gentleman would have to be more definite in his statement than just saying "an office receptionist". Such a letter would be rather difficult to locate from an examination of the files. If he would give me the name of the person, I will certainly have the matter looked into.

Mr. Crestohl: This letter was sent by Sophia Horan and concerns Mr. Francis Tobias, who was recently ordered deported by the immigration department.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEWFOUNDLAND—RETURN OF TROOPS FROM FIGHTING FOREST FIRES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Does the minister have any comment to make on reports that Canadian army personnel, who did such an excellent job in fighting forest fires in Newfoundland, are now in the process of returning to their units on the mainland?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The continuing rain and cool weather in Newfoundland have relieved the situation to an extent that the provincial authorities have agreed to the release of the armed forces. The air lift for the return of the troops to their home stations will commence today and will continue until September 24.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION ON ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the genial Acting Minister of Finance a question. Can he say whether arrangements have been made to meet representatives of the city of Windsor and the united automobile workers regarding representations to be made by those agencies in connection with the Bladen report? Can the minister tell the house, now that the report has been published for some four months, whether the government has reached any decision on any of the recommendations that were made, and when we may expect some action from the government one way or another on those recommendations, affecting one of Canada's important industries in which there is so much unemployment?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, action was taken on that report almost immediately in the budget, in taking the excise tax off automobiles, something which was urged on the preceding government for many years and on which no action had been taken. Many other matters are referred to in the report.

It is a most important report. Consultations and discussions have been taking place with unions and others in the industry, and in governmental committees as well. It is a very embracing step and requires a good deal of study. When decisions are made with respect to the report the house will be informed, if the house is then sitting.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the genial minister, Mr. Speaker, but is he not aware, with regard to the excise tax—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member seems to be embarking on a proposition rather than a question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then, Mr. Speaker, since you so forthrightly admonished me, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether the government will see the two bodies to which I have referred in connection with a matter that is so vital to the community from which I come, and to the industry.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, the members of the government are continually meeting delegations that wish to make representations on matters of public importance. I personally have had no request made to me for such a meeting. However, if such a request has been made I am sure that every effort will be made to reach mutual agreement on a satisfactory time for such a meeting.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: I am informed by the parliamentary secretary that no approach has been made to the department itself with respect to this matter.

BROADCASTING

TATAMAGOUCHE, N.S.—APPLICATION FOR NEW STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked a question concerning an application for a new station at Tatamagouche, Nova Scotia, by Colchester Broadcasting Company. That application was heard during the hearings of the board of broadcast governors during the week of August 22, and under date of September 5 the board made its public announcement that its recommendation on this application was for denial.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): If I may I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary a supplementary question and inquire whether the reason for the denial was that it was considered that the area was adequately served.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, in its public announcement the board did give its reason, and it was generally in that tenor.

TELEVISION

RIMOUSKI—APPLICATION FOR SATELLITE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is he now in a position to supply the information for which I asked yesterday with regard to the application of station CJBR-TV, Rimouski, for the erection of a satellite station to serve Madawaska and Victoria counties?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to answer that question today. I will try to get the information and deal with it tomorrow or Monday.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

232. Departmental administration, $3,455,378.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, at the adjournment last night, following my remarks the Minister of National Defence quite properly said that he did not intend to take any direction from me as to what he should or should not say in this debate. But I am sure that on reflection the Minister of National Defence will agree that at this critical time it is essential for the government to state its position with regard to the question of the acquisition of nuclear weapons. The government can state that it has no intention at the present time of acquiring these weapons, or it can take the position that it proposes to acquire them, but it must not leave the house in the position where it is denied an opportunity of debating this matter at the earliest possible moment when the government has made its decision.

I expressed the view yesterday, bearing in mind the well known device employed by this administration, that we might well find that the government will make a decision after adjournment and before we come back to this house. The country is now asking this government to declare its policy with regard to the acquisition of nuclear weapons. The government, before this debate concludes, if it wishes to discharge its responsibility, should face this question and tell us precisely where it stands.

We are entitled to know what is the government's policy about Canada accepting nuclear warheads. We know the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and we have very much suspected, from pronouncements of the Minister of National Defence, that he and his colleague are not in agreement on this subject. Indeed the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the former minister of national defence did not on this question seem to be in full accord. What conclusion are we to draw from the remarks of the Prime Minister in his speech the other day, when he paid to his colleague a tribute which he felt was deserved? He said idealism was something that was essential, but we had to recognize that opinions had to be changed from time to time, particularly in the discharge of responsibilities in this difficult and complicated period.

Are we to conclude from this that the government is about to make a decision with regard to the acquisition of nuclear weapons? Was this statement by the Prime Minister a forerunner of the government's intention? Was this a way of making easier the load of the Secretary of State for External Affairs? If that is the situation, then we certainly are warranted in asking the Minister of National Defence to say forthrightly where this government stands at this time with regard to the acquisition of nuclear weapons in Canada. We certainly cannot tell from the statement made by the minister on September 12, as reported at page 8223 of Hansard. The minister said, among other things, beginning in the second last paragraph:

> Defensive weapons with a nuclear capability may be required to maintain the credibility of the deterrent, and in the event that the worst happened would be required to provide an effective defence against Soviet aggression.

Then he said:

> The situation is much the same as that of a man living in a lonely cabin in the woods who fears he may be attacked by a bear. He does not wait until the bear actually attacks him to buy a rifle, but secures it beforehand and has it ready in the event of need.

One might well ask, with regard to that statement, does it mean—does the minister intend—that there shall be no ammunition for the rifle? What does the statement mean? Then he said:

> The Bomarc will form part of the defences we must maintain against the manned bomber as long as there are potentially hostile aircraft in existence that can be used against us.

These statements are the closest indication the minister has given of what the intentions of the government are, but they do not tell us what, in fact, the government really intends to do in this matter. This question is of vital importance. On February 20, 1959 the Prime Minister announced the government's policy. He announced that it was the government's intention to acquire nuclear warheads. I refer to volume 2 of Hansard for 1959, and the words of the Prime Minister as reported at page 1223 are as follows:

> The full potential of these defensive weapons is achieved only when they are armed with nuclear warheads. The government is, therefore, examining with the United States government questions connected with the acquisition of nuclear warheads for Bomarc and other defensive weapons for use by the Canadian forces in Canada, and the storage of warheads in Canada.

Then he went on to say that problems connected with the arming of the Canadian brigade in Europe with short range nuclear weapons for NATO defence tasks were also being studied. Then, in volume 1 of Hansard of last year, the Prime Minister said at page 73—

Mr. Harkness: On what date?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On January 18, 1960. He said:

> We pointed out in detail that careful thought is being given to the principles that in our opinion are applicable to the acquisition and control of nuclear weapons. I proceeded to deal with our views in that connection and summarized those views by saying that the full potential of the Bomarc could be achieved only when they are armed with nuclear warheads.

He commented on the retention by the United States of ownership and custody of nuclear weapons and then, because he properly wanted to guard against the diffusion of nuclear weapons, he said that whatever was done, once the weapons were acquired we could be sure that they would be used only on conditions agreed to by the Canadian government. But later the government changed its mind. The Prime Minister said later that we would accept nuclear weapons from the United States only if there was joint control. The Prime Minister said he wanted the kind of joint control which prevails in the United Kingdom. Then on November 24, 1960 the Prime Minister added a new reservation, which was that no decision with regard to the acquisition of nuclear weapons would be taken as long as any progress was being made in the matter of disarmament.

The Prime Minister made it clear in his foreign policy statement on Monday that there was, indeed, no progress being made in the matter of disarmament. I agree with the right hon. gentleman that it is regrettable that notwithstanding the efforts of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and others, no progress in disarmament is being made. The test talks have been halted. The Soviet union now wants to integrate those talks with general discussions on disarmament. The Prime Minister is right in saying no progress is being made in disarmament. But because no progress is being made in this direction are we to conclude, in the light of the statement made by the right hon. gentleman on November 24, 1960, that the government is now about to acquire nuclear weapons?

However, the Secretary of State for External Affairs does not share the Prime Minister's views as to whether or not progress is being made in this field. He said the other day in answer to what I had said that he was still optimistic about the possibility of progress in disarmament being made at the forthcoming session of the general assembly of the United Nations.

Who is right, the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs? If the Prime Minister is right, then the Minister of National Defence owes it to the country to tell us now what are the government's intentions in this matter, and not to clothe its intentions in words incapable of interpretation. Not to do so suggests that the government at this moment has not a clear and unambiguous policy.

As a matter of fact, the only definite statement we have had with regard to this matter is the statement of the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When he spoke in the foreign affairs debate he said, as reported at page 8162 of Hansard:

> The government's stand on this matter has been made quite clear. At the present time we say no, but if events should take place in the world that might require these weapons then the government would have to give reconsideration to that position.

The parliamentary secretary of course is not a member of the government, but he does hold an important post in the administration at the present time. He said that the present policy with regard to the acquisition of nuclear weapons is "No". This is the only forthright statement on this subject that we have had from this government in this debate. Is this the policy of the government? I ask the minister of defence now, is it a fact that the parliamentary secretary, unwittingly perhaps, has stated the real position of the government with regard to this matter? In any event, the ambiguity and the lack of clarity in the declarations of the minister deserve to be compared with what he is reported to have said in May of this year outside of this house. He is reported in the Toronto Star of May 20, 1961 as having said—

Mr. Harkness: I would be very careful with regard to anything they report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend can correct me. If he thinks the Toronto Star has misreported him, let him so state. I do not want the minister to be misquoted. What I want the minister to do is to tell us precisely what the policy of the government is in this matter. This is what the minister is reported to have said:

> And no decision will be taken until a satisfactory agreement on joint control of such warheads has been worked out between ourselves and the United States.
> If nuclear weapons are acquired by the Canadian forces, they will only be used as the Canadian government decides and in a manner approved by the Canadian government.

Mr. Harkness: That quotation from the Toronto Star is right for once.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says that the quotation is right. I thank him, because it advances the position one step further. Is it a fact that there is now awaiting Canadian signature an agreement with the United States which meets the conditions envisaged by the Minister of National Defence in this statement of May 20. Surely when we are discussing the estimates of the Department of National Defence, at what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, is the most critical time since world war II, no government can function without giving parliament its views as to the situation and taking parliament and the country into its confidence. Surely that is the position. If the government takes the position at this time that it cannot state its position in any other way than it has done, let the minister give us the reason for this. We are entitled to know precisely what is the government's view and policy.

I mentioned yesterday the way the government treated parliament with regard to amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Two days before parliament adjourned the government, through the Minister of Labour, said it was still considering amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, and within four or five days after parliament adjourned the government announced a royal commission to inquire into the whole question of unemployment insurance. We want to make sure at this critical time in human history that after the house adjourns this government does not make an announcement, when the house is not in session, on a matter of such vital concern to the people of Canada.

Our position is that we should not acquire nuclear weapons. The Leader of the Opposition has stated our reasons on other occasions. I went over some of them again the other day. Our reason is not that we do not want Canadians to be as efficiently endowed with the necessary instruments to provide for effective defence as others, but we recognize that the deterrent now exists in a primary way through the United States.

We want to discourage the diffusion of nuclear weapons. We share the government's view that we do not want war. We certainly do not want to see nuclear war. We do not agree with the Associate Minister of National Defence that we can now speak of war in terms of victory. If a nuclear war develops there will be no victor. Anyone who takes a contrary view is simply not conscious of the terrible, cataclysmic consequences which would result from the modern instruments of war. This is the situation, and so we want to discourage the diffusion of nuclear weapons. They now exist in the hands of a limited group. If we acquire nuclear weapons, how can we complain about other countries acquiring them?

We do not intend to become a nuclear power because we believe this is really beyond our resources. We believe that the fulfilment of our duty to our allies in NATO does not depend on the acquisition of nuclear weapons by Canada at this time. As I say, the deterrent now rests with the United States, and certainly if we were to acquire nuclear weapons in Canada—I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs has argued this to his colleagues—this would not help him in his negotiations and consultations with other countries at the United Nations. Therefore we are entitled to ask, what is the government's position in this vital matter?

I have asked the minister, as have other members on this side, for a clear and unequivocal statement of policy. Surely this house is entitled to that at this time. I will say that I agree fully with what the minister said yesterday on another subject. I refer to the criticism he levelled at the position taken by the hon. member for Kootenay West regarding his party's position on NATO. I agree with him that the reservation which binds the new party with regard to NATO is one which is contrary to the very constitutional set-up of NATO now. It ignores the fact that the nuclear possession of weapons, which forms part of that reservation, is an already existent fact. The only reason we have NATO is the failure of the Soviet union to implement article 43 of the charter of the United Nations, which would render unnecessary the existence of any alliance such as NATO itself.

I would recall to the hon. member for Kootenay West and others the words of their former leader, Mr. Coldwell, who on March 28, 1949, used these words with regard to NATO, as reported on page 2073 of Hansard:

> Contrary to the propaganda against the proposed North Atlantic treaty, the proposal is not an attempt on the part of so-called American imperialism to bring western European democracies into an alliance for the purpose of destroying the Soviet union. It originates in the anxiety of western European democracies to persuade North America to support them in a defensive union. They believed this would halt a threat of aggression and provide the necessary defensive strength so that if the Soviet union has aggressive plans against them she will be turned from that course and thus make possible the peaceful solution of existing difficulties and problems.

Those words of Mr. Coldwell reflect what has happened. I agree with the Minister of National Defence that if it had not been for NATO we might have found ourselves the victims of aggression. In any event, as Mr. Coldwell has said and as we know and as the hon. gentleman knows, our membership in NATO has to do with its defensive purposes. We complain, of course, and no one has done more in that regard than the Leader of the Opposition, about its failure to live up to the economic objectives of article II of the treaty. Of course. But at this time when individual countries vis-à-vis the Soviet union would be outnumbered, what is there for like-minded nations of the free world to do other than combine in a defensive alliance?

There may be difficulties. My hon. friend has difficulties about West Germany. That is understandable because of his participation in the first world war. But the fact is that a realistic examination of the situation suggests that there was nothing else for Canada to do in 1949 but to join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, so strongly supported by the leader of the C.C.F. at that time, and a year ago violently opposed in this house by the present leader of the C.C.F., now constituting itself into a new political group that now, under duress by its existing leader, gives support to NATO on terms that would render impractical the operation of that body. That is a fact that hon. gentlemen must not overlook.

I agree with the Minister of National Defence with regard to his complete answer yesterday, in which he pointed out that NATO is now a nuclear power. He forgot to mention the declaration made by General Gruenther in 1957, I believe, with regard to the intentions of NATO in that respect. On this point I am in full accord with the minister. We have given indication in this house that we appreciate the problems facing the administration at this time with regard to the current crisis in Berlin.

But having said that, I repeat to the Minister of National Defence my view that when we are discussing these estimates, estimates involving so much of the treasure of this nation; at a time when we are all concerned about the dangers that lurk ahead, dangers that have been characterized by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as indicating that we are on the brink of war, the refusal of the Minister of National Defence in the face of that situation to state clearly what is the government's position with regard to the acquisition of nuclear weapons is in my judgment, I say respectfully, a misreading by the minister and the government of their obligations to the house and to the people of Canada at this critical time.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, in his usual manner the hon. member for Essex East has made such statements as "the government must declare its position now on nuclear weapons"—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: —and so on, as though the government had not made numerous statements in connection with its position on nuclear weapons.

Mr. Hellyer: Too numerous. That is the trouble.

Mr. Harkness: All these statements are along the same line.

Mr. Hellyer: Each one different from the previous one.

Mr. Harkness: I think they make the position quite clear. The hon. member for Essex East read part of the statement made by the Prime Minister on February 20, and he referred to one or two other statements. Actually the position the government has taken with regard to nuclear weapons was outlined in statements by the Prime Minister on February 20, 1959, January 18, 1960, February 9, 1960, July 4, 1960, and July 14, 1960.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I read them all.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Essex East read parts of one or two of those statements, and I think the parts he read made the situation quite clear. I do not think there is any need for me to take up further time of the house in rereading them. They are there, they are quite definite, and I see no reason why the hon. member or any other hon. member needs to be in any doubt as to what has been the position of the government on nuclear weapons. What the hon. member is trying to do is bludgeon me into making a yes or no statement at this time as to the securing of nuclear weapons. I tell him right away that he is not going to bludgeon me into making any statement before the government is ready to make it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before it makes up its mind.

Mr. Harkness: As I say, the position we have taken has been outlined and I think it is quite clear. This business of "you must say whether you are going to get nuclear weapons and when you are going to get them", and so on is not going to get the hon. member for Essex East or anybody else in the opposition any further ahead. As I said, our position has been stated. It is there, it is clear and definite, and I am not prepared to make any further statement at this time along the lines on which the hon. member for Essex East has been insisting.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister permit a question? Will he say whether the policy is the same as it was in May, when he is reported as having said in Victoria, as found in the Victoria daily Colonist, a paper not too unfriendly to the minister—

Mr. Harkness: A very good paper.

Mr. Hellyer: A very fine paper, the minister says—with respect to the decision regarding nuclear weapons: "Mr. Harkness stated the time to make a decision is when the time comes". Is that still the position of the minister?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East, and I have read as carefully as I could the speeches made in this debate by members of the Liberal party, of the government party and of this party. It seems to me that what must logically follow from those things advocated by the hon. member for Essex East, and I am sure other members of that party are associated with him in this regard, is that he is advocating that Canada should become a full-fledged nuclear power in possession of all these hellish weapons that now exist. I think that is the government's attitude too, even though it has not yet had the courage to make such an announcement.

I should like to make a few comments about NATO and the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East in that regard, because he had such an intense interest in certain political developments about a month ago indicating that he perhaps wished that he belonged to a party that had such enthusiasm and such feeling. He says—so does the government, and I think we all agree—that NATO is a defensive military alliance and that its purpose primarily is that of defence. However, I think what we are doing is placing an awkward interpretation on the question of defence and trying to show that the organization is different from an offensive or aggressive military organization; because to my knowledge it was stated for the first time yesterday by the Minister of National Defence that NATO has had a nuclear strategy, as I believe he put it, since 1954, and therefore is a nuclear power to a certain extent.

I think we must say that the type of defence that NATO has is one based on offence, just as the type of defence that the Soviet union has is one based on offence. The United States also agrees, as I understand it, that the type of defence which is based on nuclear weapons is not primarily the type of defence which means that you try to shoot down and destroy all or as many of the invading forces' equipment as you can, but one which rests upon the threat of retaliation and the threat of wreaking nuclear damage upon the invading country to as great an extent as possible. This is a type of defence which is really offensive, and offensive in two senses of the word.

The hon. member for Essex East made reference to some speeches by Mr. Coldwell in 1949, during which he made some comments about NATO itself. In this regard, I think we must remember that 1949 is not 1961, and the attitudes and concepts that were originally conceived for NATO are entirely different from those which exist today. The Leader of the Opposition, a very close friend of the hon. member for Essex East and a former secretary of state for external affairs, had a hand in the development of NATO, the use of the forces, and is given the credit for the inclusion of article 2 in the NATO agreement; at least, that is my understanding. I understand also that had it not been for the insistence of the then secretary of state for external affairs, perhaps the agreement would not have contained any reference to economic co-operation, as it does at the moment.

This was one of the primary thoughts Mr. Coldwell had, and it was one of the primary thoughts the Leader of the Opposition had then, I am sure; that we need to develop economic co-operation amongst these nations, and this would be a good means of competition, as it were, with the Soviet union's economic offensive in which she is engaged and has been engaged for some time in various parts of the world. In 1949, at the time Mr. Coldwell made his comments, NATO was not a nuclear power and did not have nuclear weapons. It was conceived as an organization which would be economic, and in the military field would be dealing with conventional weapons. It was not until 1954, as the Minister of National Defence revealed for the first time yesterday, that NATO became a nuclear power or accepted, as the minister put it, nuclear strategy. I will use his words so that I may not be accused of transforming what he said into something else.

[Mr. Howard.]

These conditions did not exist in 1949. The concepts and ideas that Mr. Coldwell had when he endorsed the plan, and which the then secretary of state for external affairs expressed, are different from those which exist at the moment. In 1949 West Germany was not rearmed. This event took place at the insistence of the Leader of the Opposition when he was in office. Former nazi generals, as has been mentioned so adequately and no doubt will be repeated by the hon. member for Kootenay West, were not in control of and exercising influence over NATO affairs. These are factors which make the situation entirely different. When the hon. member for Essex East cites what Mr. Coldwell said in 1949 and says this is inconsistent with the attitude that exists today, he might as well go back to some of the comments of Julius Caesar and say they apply equally well today.

We support and have always supported the ideals and attitudes for which the present Secretary of State for External Affairs has worked, mainly the promotion of disarmament discussions leading to a disarmament agreement. All the other connected attitudes, ideals and concepts of the present Secretary of State for External Affairs receive our whole support. We are just as sorry as he is that the Soviet union saw fit to destroy what little faith may have existed in its present administration in any part of the world by the resumption of nuclear tests in the atmosphere. We regret also, along with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the fact that the United States has been placed in a position of again participating in nuclear bomb tests.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, it will be necessary to make some reference to external affairs because, in my opinion, the attitudes of the Department of National Defence in relation to other countries are interwoven with the attitudes of the Department of External Affairs. We feel that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is one of the most sincere, dedicated and humble persons within the present cabinet. We wish him well in his endeavours along the lines upon which he has been working ever since he took over that particular office. We would like to see the Soviet union discontinue this bomb testing. Quite frankly, however, I do not know how this end could be accomplished except by expressing pious hopes, because this is something that is within the ambit of the Soviet government. I do not know how outside influence can be brought to bear on the Soviet union to cease and desist.

Mr. Hellyer: Send them a telegram.

Mr. Howard: Well, I think that sort of communication would have more effect if it came from the Department of National Defence than if it came from me. However, that is about the extent of this government's effectiveness in the world today. A telegram would be about as effective as anything else.

We wish there would be a resumption of disarmament discussions. We wish the Secretary of State for External Affairs would find that the countries would come to an agreement on the ideas which he has been propounding for a number of years. Unfortunately, though, I think he is whistling in the dark, and for a variety of reasons. The first reason is the attitude of his own government, because it is inconsistent with his ideas. We have heard references to the so-called troika principle being advocated by the Soviet union. I think we realize, too, that we have a troika principle involved in the present cabinet. We have the triumvirate of the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, all engaged in the same general activity—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Howard: Well, the Minister of Trade and Commerce was unofficially rebuked today for something he may have said in Ghana. Perhaps there will be a revision of the text by the time it gets back to Canada and everything will be straightened out. However, we find that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is in a minority within this triumvirate. We find that the Minister of National Defence does not agree, and never has agreed, with the promotional work done by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The other day we heard the Prime Minister practically cut the feet from under the Secretary of State for External Affairs on this question of promoting disarmament.

We do not wish to see those ideas of the Secretary of State for External Affairs sacrificed for the ideas of retired colonels who still wish they were in the armed forces and able to direct people around the country in somewhat the same manner as they did before. I say that almost as soon as this government took the decision—and this matter was brought to a head in some decisions the Prime Minister had made—to scrap the Arrow and buy or obtain the Bomarc, at that time the government in its own mind made the decision that it was going to have nuclear weapons, tactical or otherwise, in the hands of Canadian troops on Canadian soil. However, it has not yet the courage to stand up and say that this is its attitude. It is waiting for a propitious moment. It is waiting for public opinion to be built up slowly by these slight comments of the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister, and the variations in their policy with respect to their acceptance of nuclear weapons.

However, I venture to say that we shall have them on Canadian soil. I venture to say that we shall have them attached to the Bomarc missile when and if we get it and when and if it is operated. I venture to say that we shall have it attached to the Honest John or the Dishonest John—whatever way you want to put it—type of missile, and that we shall have it on the Voodoo aircraft. As to this attitude that the Minister of National Defence is taking, as I say he has not the courage to say so in so many words. This is a disgraceful state of affairs and in my opinion it is not too helpful in promoting any sort of war for peace on the international level.

I believe Canada has had a certain degree of respect among the other nations of the world for a number of years. However, we are gradually losing that admiration and that degree of respect which previously existed because we are becoming more and more closely allied and, to a large degree, subservient to the United States military machine. This fact is becoming recognized throughout other countries of the world. It is not our participation in NATO from which this development has arisen. As soon as the NORAD treaty was signed—and I might say that it was endorsed by both the government and the Liberal forces in this House of Commons—this was another indication that our military welfare or our so-called defence welfare and our economic welfare rested in the hands of these people in the United States.

During the course of this debate it has been stated that this is a time of crisis, a crucial moment, when we should have cool heads, logical thoughts and a non-partisan attitude in order that we may show a united front to the enemy whoever he may happen to be. By those hon. members who spoke earlier the feeling was also expressed that differing ideas were welcome, because we wanted to develop a policy that would be effective in promoting peace. One hon. member—I shall not make reference to him personally—spoke about there being a bipartisan foreign policy in Canada, and said it was too bad there was not a tripartisan foreign policy in Canada. Then he engaged in what I thought was a most unwarranted and uncalled for condemnation of the hon. member for Peterborough with respect to the remarks that hon. member had made in this house on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, and on defence also.

That sort of thing does not add in any way to a unified feeling or unified desire to reach a solution of these problems in so far as Canada is concerned. If, as there have been in this house, accusations of treason, treachery and selling out to the Soviet union are going to be made by members on the government side against members who may have different points of view, I submit that this does nothing to develop any conscious, sensible, unified approach to these particular questions. It is true that the hon. member for Peterborough has ideas which are different from those of the government. The hon. member for Essex East has different ideas, or so he said a moment ago.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Very different ideas.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Trinity has different ideas. However, there is no desire to label these hon. gentlemen as treacherous souls or treasonable types because they expressed different points of view. I do not understand why members in this House of Commons will say on the one hand, "We want to develop a non-partisan attitude on defence policy matters", and then will turn around, for political reasons, and get involved in the accusations that were levelled against the hon. member for Peterborough and the hon. member for Kootenay West. As I say, I think it is regrettable that there does not exist in this house at the moment a degree of respect for differing views.

Before I conclude my remarks I should like to make a comment or two about the question of disarmament. As I have mentioned on a number of earlier occasions, it is an objective toward which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been working for a number of years but which, of course, has been fairly well scuttled for the time being. I submit again, as I have stated earlier, that all the negotiations and discussions that have been going on throughout the approximately 340 meetings that were held, to a certain extent could not hope to come to fruition. They were not in themselves pointless, as they laid the groundwork for certain areas of agreement to be developed; but as I have said on a number of occasions, there is not going to be any disarmament unilaterally by either the United States or the Soviet union. I also submit that there is not going to be any disarmament by those two powers by agreement. Hence all these speeches and wishes about a disarmament agreement being reached between the United States on the one hand and the Soviet union on the other hand were just pious hopes. They were about something that was not going to happen.

Neither the United States nor the Soviet union was going to enter into such an agreement for disarmament, regardless of the conditions about inspection and the like, because there is in the world today a third growing military power, which was recognized by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as a necessary part of the discussions. I refer to China. So long as China is a growing military power and if, as we are led to believe if we can accept the reports that emanate from various government sources, China will be a nuclear power perhaps within a period of five years or less, you are not going to see the Soviet disarm with China building up, and neither are you going to see the United States disarm. What I think will happen if these disarmament discussions are resumed—and I think it should have happened previously—is that China will become a part of them. Without China becoming a part of them they are not going to end up in any agreement one way or the other. All we shall be doing is meeting, talking and building up our nuclear forces. Without China in these discussions I think they are to a great degree, although not entirely, a waste of time.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the Minister of National Defence told us that he was not going to be bludgeoned into making any further statements with regard to government policy on the use of nuclear weapons. May I say that nobody wishes to bludgeon him. However, we still hope that he will be able to make a statement in order to clarify a most important matter which we think is not clear.

His attitude reminds me of a story which perhaps I may tell the committee. It is the story of a young subaltern who had just received his commission in the army and was taking his platoon out for a march for the first time. He was leading the platoon up a hill, and at the top of the hill there was a precipice. As his platoon got closer to the precipice the young officer became a little panicky because he could not remember the order to change direction. I know how he must have felt. As they got closer and closer to the brink—and we are told, in another context, that we are on the brink now, in a more serious way—he became less and less able to think of the proper order, until finally on the very edge of the brink his sergeant turned to him and said, "For heaven's sake, sir, say something, if only good-bye".

We do not want the minister to say good-bye, at least not in this sense, but we do hope he will give us a clearer statement on this vital issue—and I will deal with this later in my remarks—than we have received over the years from any member of the government, though we have received a fairly clear statement, I admit, from one of the parliamentary secretaries.

This discussion of defence is being held in a world situation, the critical nature of which has been emphasized to us by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and other leaders of western governments. It is impossible, of course, to think of a more serious subject at a more serious time than what we should do to defend the peace, which is the only secure defence of our country, in this situation. While, of course, we do differ very strongly with government attitudes and government policies in the implementation of government objectives which we share, we do not disagree—and this has been pointed out by other hon. members of this committee—with what those objectives should be; security, defence through peace, and preparations to that end.

The Associate Minister of National Defence had this to say in his contribution to this debate on September 12. I quote from page 8241 of Hansard. Reference was made to this statement by my hon. friend from Essex East this morning:

> If the worst should come, and if we have to fight again, I do not hesitate to say that we shall once again win the battles of tomorrow just as we won the battles of yesteryear, and this for many reasons.

Mr. Chairman, if the worst comes—and there is no reason why it should come—we will not win the battles of tomorrow in a nuclear war, because not only is it impossible to win a nuclear war but it is impossible, we are told by experts, even to wage one. So I think no one can get any comfort out of the fact that we will win the battles of tomorrow, if these battles are permitted to occur, by a breakdown in the sanity of man.

That does not mean, of course, that in the face of this situation we should just give up, sit back, wring our hands and say "Nothing can be done about it", and look around for an escape to some other planet. Perhaps that will be within the bounds of possibility in a few years. But it does mean that before we act and before we decide on policies we should be aware of not only the problems of defence but of the shifting and changing nature of those problems and what we in Canada can do to help solve them, not merely as a nation laying down policies for national defence—up to a point that is still required—but far more important, what we can do as a participant in collective defence, which is the only way we can develop enough strength to constitute a deterrent to aggression.

I have no quarrel of any kind with the minister in his emphasis on the necessity of collective action or indeed on the necessity at times of subordinating the requirements of independence, in the pursuit of national defence policies, to those of interdependence.

This defence debate is the first we have had since this parliament met last November. In the first part of the session there was practically no discussion of defence problems. There was no defence committee discussion; there was not even a committee to discuss defence expenditures. In the face of the absence of earlier consideration of this vital matter, I think we had the right to expect from the minister and the government a report which would have gone into some of the essential problems of national defence, and a statement from the minister at this time which would have dealt with this matter in a fundamental way. We should have the kind of statement the United States congress gets periodically from the leaders of the government, the kind of statement the United Kingdom parliament gets from its minister of national defence. I refer hon. members of the committee to the kind of debate they had in that house some months ago, a debate on defence which was made possible because of the statement first made by the minister with regard to government policy on defence. And because of the white paper published which laid down the principles which govern British policy in defence.

Instead of that kind of white paper we got this blue book which was issued a few months ago, which in a very inadequate way told this house of the problems with which we are faced in this country in defence strategy, defence planning and defence policy at this particular time. It is similar to the minister's statement the other day which was inadequate and uninformative on these basic questions of defence policy.

So far as I can gather, the minister's position is that the plans and policies we have been pursuing for the last four years are still valid; they still stand up. In spite of what may have happened in the world, we continue along those lines. If you like, we continue in this particular rut, that everything is fine and unchanged and no new policy is required, except perhaps to substitute some United States equipment for Canadian equipment, especially in the air. Apparently we must not keep changing our minds. The minister makes great play over the fact, as he puts it, that we on this side of the chamber, and I in particular, have changed our minds over recent years with regard to defence matters.

Believe me, Mr. Chairman, that is true, because the situation has changed greatly in the last four years and a person would be foolish not to alter his own views in the light of these changing situations. But the minister says that no change, as far as he is concerned, should be made. That seems to be the policy of the government, except perhaps with regard to a change in the attitude of the Secretary of State for External Affairs which is now being forecast by the Prime Minister.

With regard to the desirability of changing policies to meet changing situations let me quote one sentence from a statement made by the director of the institute of strategic studies in London, which is an organization that has done a great deal of important and fundamental research in the matter of defence problems and what can be done to meet them within Great Britain and the coalition. The director of this institute—and I heartily agree with what he says—said a few months ago:

> I think you would agree that, in a field of policy as rapidly changing and as crucial as our own, it is both natural for one's views to be undergoing a constant process of refinement while at the same time it is cowardly not to make it clear when they have significantly changed. I have a great respect for those who think differently from myself. The only people I distrust are those who say "I made up my mind many years ago and have never seen occasion to alter it since."

In particular, in this development of conditions which we think necessitate a change of policy we are concerned with the attitude and the policy of the government with respect to Canada joining what has been called the nuclear club. My hon. friend from Essex East expressed this concern this morning and I propose to deal with it also, though what he said makes it unnecessary for me to say as much as I otherwise would have done. Yesterday the minister, as I read his remarks in Hansard, depreciated the significance of this matter because, he said, it had been decided in NATO many years ago, in 1954; and that from 1954 on, all members of NATO were members of a nuclear club.

I hope to go into this matter in greater detail later, because that was a most important statement made by the minister during this debate. We should like him to substantiate what he said and give us grounds for his assertion that the members of the NATO organization have made an agreement which makes them members of a nuclear club. We should like to know the nature of this agreement. We ask the minister again, as we have asked him before, whether in his opinion Canada is now in this nuclear club. If he was right in what he said yesterday, the problem is solved; we are now a nuclear power. If not, we ask him this; whether Canada is now about to join the nuclear club.

I hope the minister will not consider us as bludgeoning him when we persist in seeking a clear-cut statement on this vitally important matter. I am not satisfied yet, despite what the minister has said. Are we in Canada committed to the acceptance and use of nuclear weapons not under collective control, as would be the case, I would hope, in NATO—at any rate it should be the case—but under the control of our own government, with a veto exercised by one other government? I insist, notwithstanding what the minister has said this morning, that there has been shilly-shallying, procrastination, delay and indecision in the government's policy. Moreover, there has been confusion in government statements on this vitally important question.

The Prime Minister asked a question in Halifax a few weeks ago, a question directed to his audience and, presumably, to the country. It was a very significant question. I quote from his statement:

> Would you, in 1961, faced by the overwhelming power of Soviet might in East Germany close to West Berlin place those who guard the portals of freedom in the position of men armed with bows and arrows?

He added:

> It is as simple as that.

Mr. Chairman, it is nonsense to say it is as simple as that, or to try in this way to oversimplify one of the most difficult, dangerous and complicated questions which face us today by putting it in those terms. This particular approach to the problem was answered by the Minister of National Defence himself when he said—and I quote his statement—

> The strength of the union—

This is quite true, of course; he was talking of NATO.

> The strength of the union is the sum of the strengths of the individual members, and the total strength of the west thus marshalled is formidable indeed.

Then he went on to say:

> Individual members do not have to maintain a balance of all the forces which go to make up modern military power.

Therefore to suggest that each individual member of NATO must be able to equip itself with all the weapons of modern war and that, failing this, they are being asked to face the enemy with bows and arrows simply does not make sense. Indeed, this particular argument was exploded only this morning by the Toronto Globe and Mail, a paper which the minister will respect. Referring to an analogy which is becoming, if it has not already become, the minister's favourite, that of the man in the lonely cabin armed with a gun while a bear prowls around outside—the minister does not tell us what the man is going to use for ammunition in his gun—the newspaper said:

The picture this conjures up, intentionally or otherwise, is that of Canada facing single combat with Russia and considering whether to become a fully fledged nuclear power to deter the prospective enemy. This is not the problem at all. Canada has no hope of becoming a nuclear power. To build long range rockets and the like as a deterrent is altogether beyond her resources. Nor is the question really the direct defence of Canada against bombing raids or invasion. The basic issue is whether Canada needs certain nuclear weapons to carry out her obligations to her allies.

That is the responsible approach to this problem, not the one indicated by the terms used by the Prime Minister in Halifax. This particular editorial concludes by pleading for the kind of responsible approach to this question which I have mentioned; that the attention of the public should be drawn to these responsible aspects of the issue rather than romancing about bears and cabins.

It seems to me, notwithstanding what the minister said, that this decision in essence, though unannounced, must have been made by the government some time ago, yet it has not been told to us and a smokescreen of uncertainty and indecision is being put around it. And if that decision has not been made in connection with nuclear weapons, the government is surely guilty of complete irresponsibility in spending millions of dollars on weapons which can only be effective to their maximum extent—and presumably we want our weapons to be effective to their maximum extent—if they have nuclear warheads.

The former chairman of the chiefs of staff committee, now free of the restraints of official responsibility, is able to talk freely on this subject, and he is talking very freely according to the press this morning. He has contributed a pamphlet on Canadian defence policy in the nuclear age for the enlightenment of the Canadian people. I am sure the minister has studied this document, and I am sure General Foulkes is a man whose opinion will be respected by the minister as it will be respected by this house. He says, and I quote from page 15 of this pamphlet:

Canada has accepted a forward task for the brigade group in the shield forces in Europe which requires heavy support for its infantry. The government has agreed to provide for this support the Honest John 762 mm. close support rocket which requires an atomic warhead.

This is perhaps the foremost military authority in this country speaking, and he says here is a weapon which requires an atomic warhead. Will the minister still tell us that the government has not decided whether it is to be given such an atomic weapon warhead? Remember, we have bought this weapon and are spending a lot of money on it. Then the pamphlet goes on to say:

Eight of the day fighter squadrons—

Not all of them.

Eight of the day fighter squadrons are being converted to reconnaissance strike squadrons, and the government has decided to equip these squadrons with the F-104 strike aircraft which is to be armed with a small atomic bomb.

This is General Foulkes making the categorical statement that the aircraft which is to be used by eight of our squadrons in Europe is to be armed—not "may be armed"—with a small atomic bomb.

Mr. Harkness: What page is that to be found on?

Mr. Pearson: At the bottom of page 15, the last paragraph. General Foulkes goes on:

To carry out these roles which the government has accepted—

That is the strike attack role in NATO which we quarreled with in the beginning.

To carry out these roles which the government has accepted, these atomic weapons are necessary.

Then he goes on, at the top of page 16:

The Bomarc missile requires an atomic warhead and two of these air defence missiles will be located in Canada. If any new fighters are procured to replace the CF-100, these fighters will require an air to air atomic missile.

What does all this talk mean? Does it mean that the government has made up its mind in the light of the emergency threat today, in respect of atomic bombs or not? The kind of double talk we have heard goes back a long way. The minister and the hon. member for Essex East quoted from the Prime Minister's statement of February 20, 1959. I will not repeat the whole quotation which is the origin of this problem in its Canadian aspects. The Prime Minister said then:

The full potential of these defensive weapons is achieved only when they are armed with nuclear warheads.

Either we wish to use a weapon which will not achieve its full potential, and that is a strange basis for military policy, or we decided in February, 1959 to acquire the nuclear warhead without which the full potential would not be possible. As was pointed out, the Prime Minister has confirmed that statement on different occasions. I am not going into all the statements. The minister knows them and we have put some of them on the record. If they mean anything at all, surely they mean that. In essence this decision must have been made, unless we are to equip our forces with weapons which are not to achieve their potential capabilities.

While this decision must have been made in principle, we cannot get any clarification from the government now as to whether it has been implemented in the light of that basic decision made at that time. The minister said the other day that it would take two years to two and a half years—I think he used the expression "lead time"—to get our troops trained to use this kind of equipment, that we ought to be beginning to get the equipment now because it will take two years to two and a half years—

Mr. Harkness: Excuse me. If the Leader of the Opposition is referring to my speech, I did not say that. I said that in order to acquire these modern systems and train troops to use them it would take a lead time of two or three years or more. Most of that time is taken up in actually getting the equipment after it is ordered.

Mr. Pearson: I accept the minister's statement, but the statement made by the Prime Minister, which I have just quoted, was made more than two and a half years ago. If that was the decision of the government at that time there has been time to proceed along the lines which the minister has indicated.

Then on March 10, 1959 the Prime Minister made the same kind of statement. On July 3, 1959 General Pearkes, the minister's predecessor—perhaps I may interpolate and say I join very warmly now in the tribute of affection and respect which the minister paid to his predecessor—said, as reported at page 5415 of Hansard:

> I presume that eventually the Canadian forces will be equipped with atomic weapons.

It seemed to be a matter of some urgency at that time, but this urgency seems to have disappeared at least in part in 1960, because in a speech to the Canadian club in Ottawa on November 24, 1960, the Prime Minister had this to say about this matter of atomic weapons:

> We have taken the stand that no decision will be required while progress toward disarmament continues.

That was not the kind of decision the Prime Minister made in February, 1959, yet in November, 1960 he said:

> To do otherwise would be inconsistent. When and if such weapons are required then we shall have to take the responsibility.

Then a little later:

> In other words, this problem is not one requiring immediate decision.

If it takes our forces two years or two and a half years to be trained in the use of those weapon systems, if they need that lead time—and I am sure that is true—if that is so, in the light of the international situation which faces us today and which was pretty serious in November, 1960, to say that this problem is not one requiring immediate decision seems to me to be very unrealistic, especially in the light of previous statements made on the subject.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs threw some light on what seems to have been this changed attitude when he said in the House of Commons on May 2 that the decision to acquire nuclear warheads depended on progress made in the next few months toward disarmament. We have had those next few months. Goodness knows during that time there has been no progress made toward disarmament, and we all deplore it. But if the Secretary of State for External Affairs was right, then a decision should have been made by now on what to do in the light of this absence of progress. The minister himself said the same thing, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of May 20, and I hope I am quoting him right. He was referring to the disarmament talks and said:

> If the talks fail we will have to make decisions on nuclear armaments.

Will the minister even now, in spite of what he said a few moments ago, tell us what is that decision?

It is not possible for me, and I do not think it is possible for other members of this committee, to divorce these matters of arms and equipment from the purposes for which they are to be used, from the objectives of defence itself. In this connection I think first of continental defence. For the purposes of continental defence we are linked up now through NORAD. Incidentally I would like to correct what the previous speaker said, namely that the Liberal party approved NORAD in this house. That is not the case.

We now have for continental defence ten squadrons of CF-100's, linked with United States planes and equipment for continental defence. The NORAD agreement was entered into by the present government and we criticized it at the time as being inadequate and ineffective, and as not providing, as they should have provided, for NORAD being part of NATO. There have been these ten squadrons of CF-100's which, as we told the government a year ago, were obsolete in performance to do the job which they were originally asked to do and obsolete also, as the hon. member for Trinity pointed out so effectively the other day, in regard to the purposes of continental defence in 1961, not as it was in 1957 and 1958.

We have suggested a reduction in the number of continental defence squadrons and the alteration of some of their duties, alteration perhaps if after due examination that turns out to be feasible, of their association with United States defence forces through NORAD, perhaps a return to the kind of defence association which we had before NORAD. That position was ridiculed by members of the government, but within the last few months they have reduced the number of defence squadrons from nine to five, and have announced their intention of re-equipping the five, not with the Canadian Arrow, which has been sunk without trace—there is not even a trace adequate for exhibition in the air museum—but with an American interceptor.

It is clear now from what the minister has said, and I do not quarrel with this doctrine, that the major purpose, in fact the only purpose, of continental defence which makes sense in the face of the kind of attack to which we would be subjected is to protect the deterrent, the strategic air command of the United States, which is our deterrent. The purpose is not now the defence of Canadian cities, the defence of the Canadian people and the defence of Canadian soil, because there is no such effective defence of that kind against the kind of attack we would be bound to have. To give the impression that interceptor squadrons can give the people of Canada that kind of protection is cruelly misleading. What defence there is now has to be the defence of the strategic deterrent which it is hoped will be permitted to get into the air and fly off toward the enemy before that capability is destroyed by the destruction of the bases. That is now the basis of continental defence, presumably both by planes and by missiles.

But even that basis is shifting and changing, as the hon. member for Trinity pointed out so clearly the other day, because the deterrent itself is changing. It has changed very greatly indeed since we talked about defence over a year ago in this house. So far as the deterrent now is concerned, it is admitted by those who are planning strategy in the NATO capitals that we cannot rely on fixed bases which would be knocked out of action in a few minutes. The deterrent has to be mobile. It has to be mobile in the water through Polaris submarines and it has to be mobile on land. So in the face of a mobile deterrent the kind of protection which it was hoped these squadrons and Bomarc missiles might have given a year or two ago really does not make very much sense.

It may be necessary for the United States to keep them. The United States is a great power with great resources, and has responsibilities over the whole world. Having regard to the position of the United States it has to plug up every loophole even by maintaining equipment and planes which even in their own eyes may be obsolescent. But a country like Canada, which has resources that are limited and which in the nature of things can only play an important but subsidiary role in general strategy, has to be very careful indeed how it allocates its resources for the collective defence. While it may be necessary for the United States to maintain these squadrons and missiles for the time being, surely we are not making any effective contribution to the protection of the mobile deterrent through a few squadrons of interceptors, armed with nuclear weapons, and two squadrons of Bomarc missiles also equipped with nuclear warheads. If we rely on that kind of strategy and planning for our contribution to continental and collective defence, our participation and our policy will become as fixed and ineffective as fixed bases for strategic air forces are now ineffective in the light of new methods of attack.

I think it is in that context that we have to look at the role of the interceptor in continental defence, and if necessary to re-examine and revise that role and the arms that we may require in the air, on the land and on the water to meet this new situation. We recall very vividly that two years ago we were told that the bomber threat had diminished to the point where we scrapped the Canadian Arrow. In the speech made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on February 20, 1959, from which I have already quoted, he sought to explain why that decision was taken, a decision with which we quarrelled at the time and which we criticize even more now in the light of what has happened.

He justified that decision, as found on page 1221 of Hansard, on the ground that "the bomber threat against which the CF-105 was intended to provide defence has diminished". If we scrapped the CF-105, a great Canadian achievement, because the threat had diminished, why is it that in 1961 we are equipping our air force with United States Voodoos to meet a threat which in 1959 was supposed to have diminished to the point where a Canadian interceptor of this type was not needed? The then minister of national defence, General Pearkes, said in the same debate on February 23, 1959, as found on page 1280 of Hansard:

> ... the threat of the manned bomber against this country is diminishing.

He went on to say:

> It would therefore not seem to make sense for us to go ahead and develop an interceptor which would be ready by the end of 1961 and which could be in squadron operation by 1962, to meet a threat which would hardly exist at that time.

A threat which would hardly exist in 1962, according to the then minister of national defence. Yet as we approach 1962 we are equipping five squadrons of our air force with United States interceptors, presumably to be armed with nuclear air to air missiles.

What has happened, Mr. Chairman, that has caused this change of viewpoint on the part of the government in defence planning and the means of meeting the threat? The Minister of National Defence in a speech in Montreal last February, I believe—he will correct me if I misquote him—rather ridiculed the idea that there was no longer a bomber threat to this continent. His predecessor said a couple of years ago that threat would be over in 1962. So let the government tell us why in the summer of 1960 the Minister of National Defence changed his views on this matter. Let the government tell us now in the light of the information they have why they consider bombers to be such a threat at this time as to require the continuation by Canada of the defence policy of meeting that threat through interceptors and through NORAD. After all, NORAD is merely an agency of co-operation, not something that stands on its own feet, and the alternative to it is not non-co-operation, because we must co-operate with the United States in continental defence. The alternative is a return to the methods of co-operation that existed before NORAD, and which were effective at that time. Perhaps the minister will deal with this particular problem at some stage during the debate.

Our role then, as we see it, is not one of non-co-operation in continental defence. It is not one of defaulting on our obligations or betraying our friends and allies. It is one which we hope will be more effective for Canada, more appropriate for Canada, than that which we took on a few years ago and to which we now seem to be bound with no room for manoeuvre or change.

We agree that Canada can play a very important role and is playing a very important role in early warning, a suitable and appropriate role, but even that particular role will soon be diminished in importance. I should qualify that by saying that Canadian participation will be diminished in importance, when it becomes a matter of warning against missiles rather than warning against bombers, because in the case of a ballistic missile early warning system we are up in the realm of billions of dollars of expenditure, and it is not likely that we will be able to play a very significant part in that particular effort.

In the realm of anti-missile missiles, which gets us into even more astronomical figures, Canada's role is less important than early warning may be. Yet it is obvious that the Royal Canadian Air Force still has to have continental planes. We have to have planes for reconnaissance, for sky patrols and to intercept and shoot down at least the isolated intruder, as we have argued for some time and as the government now agrees. However, we do not, in the carrying out of this role effectively, have to arm ourselves, as we see it on this side, in a way which brings us into the nuclear club. We do not have to have two squadrons of Bomarcs for this purpose, the missiles for which are supplied by the United States and which, in effect, would be under the control of the United States.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence make a great play about joint control and the fact that we would not accept weapons unless they were under joint control. Even if this Bomarc missile is effective—and we do not think it is effective; we think it is obsolete, and that the United States will soon be dropping it—if it is brought under joint control, what "joint control" really would mean in this context is that the authority for action would have to come from the United States. Canada would be under a veto over the use of its own weapons, because these would be weapons in the hands of Canadian forces.

Defence of this kind, Mr. Chairman, is not going to save us, and Canadian participation in defence of this kind is not going to be the best way in which we can discharge our obligations. As I have said, no effective defence of our territory is now possible. We are talking about survival rather than protection. Protection of the deterrent is becoming more difficult because the deterrent is mobile. While defence is as essential as it was a few years ago, perhaps the best defence we have now, and this has been said by others, is the certainty of swift and sure retaliation if any aggressor disturbs the peace. But this particular defence by deterrence is the responsibility of the United States which has a strategic force for that purpose; and now, to a lesser extent, the United Kingdom.

We can have a better role, surely, Mr. Chairman, than the kind of participation in the kind of defence about which we have been talking and about which the government has been talking for two or three years. During the course of this debate we hope to put that role forward. We have already done so in some detail, in the debate a year ago. The role to which I refer does not mean that we are defaulting on our obligations, betraying our friends or minimizing our responsibility.

In case my own words in criticism of the role the government has now taken may appear to be prejudiced, may I quote some outside authorities in support of the position we have taken. The Vancouver Province on November 9, I think it was, said this:

> A small country like ours can't afford nuclear weapons and should divert its defence spending into areas where we can be of real assistance to the United States and our other western allies.
> Whatever Ottawa may think of this viewpoint, it is not furthering any kind of policy by talking out of both sides of its mouth. If we have much more of the present inconsistency, Canada's influence in world councils will evaporate completely.

Then the Globe and Mail of May 4, 1961 had this to say, and these are impressive paragraphs to us on this side:

We may be an economic satellite of the United States in many foreign eyes, but we are not yet a military dependency and our voice still counts for something in international councils. As a junior member of the nuclear club, obliged to get permission from Washington before acting in our own defence, we would lose bargaining power in helping to achieve compromise between the two major nuclear powers, and in our dealings with the underdeveloped countries which still regard Canada as a trustworthy friend.

This editorial concludes as follows:

Our resources are better spent in strengthening conventional forces against the dangers of limited war, and in bracing ourselves and our non-nuclear friends for the new (and undeclared) political, economic and propaganda war with the Soviet union.

Let me quote also, Mr. Chairman, a Canadian whose words I am sure will be listened to with respect by members of the government. I refer to the premier of the province of Manitoba, who spoke a few weeks ago to the Couchiching conference. I have not been able to get a text of his speech because I think he spoke from notes. He is reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of August 27, as follows:

Premier Duff Roblin made an incisive appeal here tonight for a distinctive Canadian role in world affairs. He suggested that some proportion of Canadian military expenditures might be more effectively applied to technical assistance of a more practical nature for Afro-Asian nations.

He questioned—

This is the Conservative premier of Manitoba.

—the value of the North American air defence command. If it abandoned NORAD, then Canada should also refuse nuclear weapons. "Not in any holier than thou spirit," said Premier Roblin, "but because these weapons are not essential."

He said: "Canada should seek leadership among smaller powers and within the ring of the United States nuclear deterrent, seek to reinforce the United Nations office of secretary general and rescue it from Soviet meddling. We should continue to make available to the UN a substantial and fully mobile soldiery. We should mobilize independent thinking and give expression to ideas among smaller nations. We should encourage such UN instruments of peace as the food bank.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, at the time of the luncheon recess I was putting forward in a very general way certain principles which I thought should govern Canada's contribution to collective defence. We on this side of the house will discuss these principles in their more detailed application as this debate goes on. However, I wish to make it quite clear, as I tried to do earlier in my discussion, that in the circumstances I put forward I was not advocating a policy of neutralism or a policy of default on our obligations or international commitments to our allies, or indeed a policy of refusing to play our part in resistance to aggression when we have no other alternative than resistance, irrespective of the consequences, something which, of course, would be tragic beyond words.

When I say that no one can win a nuclear war, that no one can win a nuclear war in the old conventional sense, that is true. However, it should not be misunderstood—and I am sure it is not misunderstood by those who might wish to break the peace—that our understanding of this position in the western countries means that we would not attempt to defend ourselves because there was no possibility of victory in the old conventional sense. Free men will always defend themselves when attacked, I hope, irrespective of the consequences. However, we should be aware of the consequences, which are so far beyond those of previous wars that they must be taken into consideration when we discuss defence.

In Great Britain in 1940 it did not look as though there was much chance of a victorious result of the war. However, it came. Yet in a sense that fact proves the other side of the coin or the other phase of the question. The resulting victory which was achieved in 1944 and 1945, and the inability of the west to follow victory with the kind of peace which would endure has brought us, through no fault of our own, to the situation in which we find ourselves today of trying to defend ourselves against a nuclear war which, if it occurred, would mean planetary destruction.

Nor do I wish it to be understood by anyone—and this was made clear in the quotation I read from a speech by the premier of Manitoba in so far as his views were concerned—that when we take the position that nuclear arms are not required by Canada under Canadian control or indeed under joint control for the defence of peace and the discharge of our obligations, we take that position because of some feeling of smug moral superiority. Of course that is not the case because, as a country, we are committed to nuclear defence. Indeed, we supply the material that makes possible nuclear defence and nuclear deterrence, through the sale of our uranium. It is therefore not because of any superior moral considerations of that kind that we take our stand.

Neither I nor the other members of the Liberal party who sit on this side of the chamber advocate the weakening of the strategic deterrent, let alone its unilateral abandonment. Indeed, I feel that the strategic deterrent in the hands of those who now possess it should be maintained strong and unimpaired. In the words of the phrase we now use, it should be credible so that in the minds of those who are tempted to break the peace there should exist no doubt that it can be used effectively.

I believe that western strategy—and that includes Canada—should be based on the credibility and on the invulnerability of the retaliatory forces not only on our side but perhaps even on the other side, strange as that may seem—the invulnerability of both sides through mobility—so that each side would be reasonably certain that the other side could destroy it. In that way the temptation would be removed to bring about victory through some kind of sneak attack with immunity from retaliation. That kind of mutual invulnerability, which may seem to be a strange idea to put forward on our side but which has been put forward by some fairly highly respected defence experts, would certainly discourage a surprise attack based on fear.

But while we take that view with regard to the strategic deterrent, we on this side are opposed to dispersal of the nuclear deterrent. We are opposed to purely national control of that deterrent, especially with regard to the North Atlantic alliance, just as we have great doubts—in fact our feelings are stronger than doubts—as to the advisability of national custody of the nuclear deterrent beyond the limits of those three countries which already possess that weapon.

That brings me to a subject which was dealt with by the minister and which has been discussed by other members in this chamber. I now leave the question of continental strategy and come to the question of what should be our NATO strategy in the present situation and what should be the attitude members should take to collective strategy and to the use of nuclear weapons in the implementation of that strategy.

So far as our own contribution to NATO is concerned, which contribution is to be strengthened, we are told, by the dispatch of additional troops overseas, we have a brigade group and we have an air division. I wish to refer the committee to Hansard of July 3, 1959 at page 5414. This was some time ago, and we were then told by the Minister of National Defence that this question of nuclear weapons for our forces overseas in NATO was being considered. General Pearkes said then:

> —the Canadian brigade in Europe with short range nuclear weapons for NATO defence tasks are also being studied. These studies are continuing and are fast reaching a stage when there can be an exchange of notes of this matter.

He was referring, of course, to an exchange of notes with the United States. That was more than two years ago. I should like to know, and I am sure the committee would like to know, what exactly is the position now in that regard so far as our contribution to NATO forces is concerned. In the same debate, as reported at page 5415 of Hansard for July 3, 1959 the minister of national defence added:

> I presume that eventually the Canadian forces will be equipped with atomic weapons under the same terms as the other NATO contingents under SACEUR—

What are these terms, and since that time has there in fact been a decision which covers the acquisition of nuclear weapons by Canadian forces in NATO? From what I have said it will be clear, I hope, that I do not object to the NATO alliance possessing in some form nuclear weapons for defence purposes; indeed, they have them now, but under national control. At present all these nuclear weapons which are available to certain NATO forces are, as far as I know—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong—in the custody of the United States or the United Kingdom.

I do not think that situation has been altered by what is referred to now as a sort of double key arrangement, or a joint control of such weapons. I believe it has been assumed by NATO, and NATO defence planning has been based on this assumption, that these nuclear weapons in the possession of certain NATO members will be used immediately against any aggressive move; that those forces in NATO which have these weapons have been trained for that purpose, and that there is equipment to discharge that purpose, though it is not in the hands of NATO; it is in the hands of the United States. Indeed, the minister said yesterday decisions were taken in this matter which made NATO, as he put it—I am not sure of the exact expression—a nuclear force back in 1954. That is quite true. The outspoken Field Marshal Montgomery—a man outspoken in this and other matters—said in 1954:

> I want to make it absolutely clear—

He was the NATO commander at that time:

—that we at SHAPE are basing all our operational planning on using atomic and thermonuclear weapons in our defence. With us it is no longer: "They may possibly be used". It is very definitely: "They will be used if we are attacked."

That is clear enough. General Gruenther said the same thing, in different words, the same year when he confirmed that nuclear weapons would be used and agreed—and he is an expert in these matters—that once such weapons were used by NATO, that use would spread to all-out nuclear war, in what has been called the awful escalation of destruction. The minister and his predecessor have both said—I certainly remember General Pearkes saying this—that they saw no way by which you could limit the use of nuclear weapons; that if you started with a nuclear bullet—I am not quoting General Pearkes but I think this was his view—you would likely end with a nuclear bomb.

That is why we have been so anxious and so worried about nuclear weapons in the hands of NATO forces and not under NATO control, especially in circumstances like the present when NATO forces under United States immediate command are moving along or have been moving along the corridor leading to Berlin armed with weapons. In 1957 General Norstad—though he seems to have altered his views since—took the same view, that it was impossible to draw a line between the tactical use of atomic weapons against an attacker's forces—and I once hoped that line could be drawn—and their strategic use against the attacker's homeland.

Mr. Chairman, the minister said that NATO has now a nuclear strategy and in that sense is a nuclear force. We know that nuclear weapons are in the hands of certain NATO powers. Yet I do not know of any decision that has been made—and perhaps the minister will enlighten me on this point—notwithstanding the decision to which he referred, which I think was in December, 1958, and which dealt with the matter in broad principle, I do not know of any political decision that has been made by the NATO council or any other NATO body authorizing and laying down the conditions under which NATO nuclear weapons will be used, or laying down any rules governing the control of the use of such weapons in the hands of NATO members in Europe.

Surely the time has come to do something about that. In view of what General Gruenther, General Norstad and others have said about the inevitability of this escalation of destruction, to use the nuclear weapon even in its tactical form as a first strike weapon for NATO forces against an attack surely might bring about the greatest danger of all, the danger of an atomic chain reaction, the kind of chain reaction which I have just mentioned, which begins with a bullet and ends with continent-destroying bombs.

This would result—and we have talked about this before in this house—in NATO becoming an agency, which it was never meant to become, for the conversion of what might after all be only an accidental or a limited incursion or attack, into a nuclear holocaust. That could be done either by immediate retaliation from strategic air forces which would not worry about the troops on the ground but would worry, in the language of General Gruenther, about the enemy's homeland; or it could be brought about by premature and unnecessary use of nuclear weapons in the hands of NATO front line forces or forces in reserve. Surely that is the most frightening aspect of this NATO strategic situation, and this NATO tactical situation also.

Henry Kissinger, who has written a great deal on this subject and I think is recognized as an authority, in an article called "The Necessity for Choice" had this to say:

If NATO can be defended only by all-out war, it will face a hopeless dilemma; to yield to pressure will set up a pattern of Soviet blackmail—

We know what that means. He went on to say:

—while to resist will involve catastrophic devastation.

That is the awful dilemma that those who are responsible for the political and military planning of NATO's strategy face at the present time. It seems to me that the answer, and perhaps the only way out of this dilemma, is not to do away with a NATO deterrent, even a NATO nuclear deterrent, as opposed to a United States or United Kingdom deterrent, but to bring that deterrent under some form of collective control and to build up enough conventional strength in NATO front line forces so that the nuclear deterrent will not have to be used until it is clear beyond doubt that a massive nuclear assault has been launched.

That does not mean leaving our front line forces defenceless. It does mean—and this seems to be a doctrine which is gaining more and more support—isolating the nuclear deterrent under NATO control from the conventional strength of its forces so there would not be this awful temptation to start a nuclear war when conventional defence might be sufficient to meet an attack. I have no doubt this is being looked into, and perhaps the minister will have a chance to tell us what progress is being made in NATO thinking in this regard.

I think these nuclear weapons, which NATO must have as a defence organization, must be under some form of NATO and not national control. But I make a distinction in my mind, a distinction the full importance of which I did not realize some time ago, between custody and control. If these weapons are brought under control, and if the policy determining the use of these weapons is to be isolated from conventional weapons in some form and brought under NATO control, then it does not seem to me to matter nearly as much whether they are in United States custody or not.

The alternative—and perhaps this alternative would appeal to many people who are fundamentalists on this question—would be to have NATO not only in control but in custody of these weapons. This would mean that the United States, the United Kingdom and France would relinquish their nuclear weapons now in the possession of NATO forces to collective custody and control. I have no illusion about the difficulty of doing this, but if this were done and if weapons of this kind were in the hands of our forces as part of NATO it would not, in my view, be extending the area of membership in the nuclear club, because three members of that club would be giving up their own national control to a collective organization.

I think this would be a move in the right direction, and it would be limiting rather than expanding the extent of the nuclear club. If that is not possible, however, the only alternative which makes sense to me would be to bring about NATO control and have the nuclear weapons isolated from the conventional front line weapons and placed in reserve in the custody of those countries—I hope it would be only one—which now have that custody. In that case we might be able to resolve this awful dilemma of how to meet an attack, if there should be one, without converting the situation into nuclear war.

I am not now thinking about an all-out nuclear assault on this continent or on Europe. In that case it would not make any difference whether our weapons were under collective control or joint control or single control. Everyone would use everything he had; one would just hope for the best and pray for survival. But that is not the only kind of problem we have to face. The problem is also to deal with a limited assault which NATO perhaps could not meet without using nuclear weapons if the organization does not have sufficient conventional strength. Surely this makes it of fundamental importance to build up NATO's conventional strength so as to decrease the present reliance on nuclear retaliation. At present I think there is too much reliance on the trip wire function of the organization and on massive retaliation. The inadequate conventional strength means that the first strike in defence might be from nuclear weapons, weapons which, if we had sufficient conventional strength, would not have to be used.

This, I think and hope, is the basis upon which NATO is now developing its strategy. This position, as I understand it, requires a change in existing strategy and a change in the defence policies of its members with regard to the control and custody of atomic weapons possessed by NATO. There is certainly growing concern among NATO members about membership in an alliance where a decision to use nuclear weapons could be made without their participation and at very short notice. I read confirmation of this in the press this morning in a dispatch out of Norway. Collective control in the interests of strengthening the alliance, however difficult this may be, seems to me to be essential.

Someone is going to say, how can you have collective control in a council of 15 members? How can you have, to use the common phrase, 15 fingers on the trigger? That would be technically impossible, I think, except under the conditions I have just mentioned, which would provide for adequate conventional defence against an attack by conventional weapons in the case of anything but an all-out assault, with nuclear defence in reserve. If you could have that, if you had sufficient collective conventional defence to hold an attack, then it would be possible to call the members of the organization together and put the problem to the NATO council in the light of the conditions as they developed. I would hope this is the way in which it could be done rather than by setting up some directorate or committee.

Mr. Jones: I wonder where the deterrent would be in that situation. What would stop the Russians sending over their missiles and bombers?

Mr. Pearson: I have been trying to deal with that situation. If we had sufficient conventional strength, and an attack was made by conventional forces, an attack which was not meant to be an all-out attack, we would have time to determine whether the NATO council would authorize nuclear weapons to be used. If there were to be a massive all-out nuclear assault by missiles across the continent and across the ocean, it would not make any difference what kind of mechanism we had set up.

Mr. Jones: The question is, what would deter the Russians from launching an attack of that kind if you could not retaliate?

Mr. Pearson: There would be a more effective deterrent than we have now. We would have a threefold deterrent. They would know that we had adequate conventional forces available for front line defence. They would know that we had intermediate nuclear missiles in reserve, and they would also know that we had strategic nuclear deterrent strength across the ocean. This kind of control, which apparently does not appeal to the hon. member for Saskatoon, could avoid the frightening possibility of a national field commander acting on national orders using nuclear weapons in the front line when this might not be necessary, and might be fatal.

In this connection, and differing from what he said in 1957, at the annual conference of the NATO parliamentarians last November General Norstad had this to say:

I believe that our forces must have a substantial conventional capability. They must be able to operate, where the military situation permits, without using arms and weapons equipped with nuclear warheads. This will require shield forces of the general magnitude being provided under our present program, a program which I regret to say is not yet completed.

That is an understatement. General Norstad then went on to say:

This conventional strength requires an organization or a system under which the basic combat elements would react normally with conventional weapons—

I ask the hon. member for Saskatoon to listen to this.

—but it also requires that associated with these basic combat elements there are atomic weapon units which can be used if necessary.

And, I say, used under NATO control. General Norstad went on:

However, the threshold at which nuclear weapons are introduced into the battle should be a high one.

That is military jargon which means, do not use nuclear weapons until you are absolutely certain it is the only protection you have against destruction. Then he concluded—and this is the very core of my argument—by saying about nuclear weapons:

The use of these weapons should be the result of a specific, deliberate decision, made at a level consistent with the policies and plans of NATO.

That is a military way of saying it should be made by a NATO agency.

Then this final sentence:

In any case, this level must be higher than that of the commander of the basic combat elements to which I have made reference.

I have made reference to the lines along which NATO strategy should develop, and I hope it is developing along these lines. There may be some strengthening rather than weakening of the deterrent both politically and militarily along those lines. That can only be done, of course, by strengthening political unity inside NATO itself by far greater political integration among the NATO countries, by greater defence integration among the NATO countries, and by using the NATO council as a council for strategy politically and militarily. If that is done; if the NATO council is given the kind of authority it should have and has not had, then with military advice and a re-examination of the military organizational set-up in NATO, we can make this organization a far stronger organization for military defence than it has been in the past. Perhaps part of what I call this diffusing strategy could be a disarmed zone right across Europe, which would avoid the difficulty of tactical nuclear weapons in the hands of opposing forces too close together.

This is a view that is not, of course, peculiar to me. A great deal of thinking has been going on along these lines. A group of the Conservative party in Great Britain called the Bow group, a rather radical young Conservative group, in a pamphlet called "Stability and Survival" issued not so long ago, at page 28 had this to say. This represents the views of some members of the Conservative party in the British House of Commons in regard to this very problem. The paragraph reads:

The British army is equipped with Honest Johns and Corporals, the warheads being under American control. The fundamental requirement for the relationship between tactical nuclear weapons and our armed forces is that the armed forces should always have a choice between using them and not using them and still be in a position to hold the line. In other words, they must be available, but not the only means of checking aggression. Thus, to quote Kissinger, "Forces in being are more important than at any previous time in our history!" It is important to understand that units once in battle cannot switch from one mode of warfare to another. To integrate nuclear weapons into every unit would make it virtually impossible to keep a war on a conventional basis. Far from being diffused throughout the army, tactical nuclear weapons must be kept in separate units, so that the temptation for a hard pressed junior officer to use them is avoided.

I say not only should they be kept in separate units in reserve, they should be kept under NATO as opposed to national control. If that can be done I think Canada could co-operate to the full in that kind of NATO strategy. But if we are being asked in NATO to accept nuclear weapons for our air division and for our infantry brigade under other than that kind of control, under national control, or under joint control which gives the United States an overpowering authority to use or not to use them, then I do not think we should accept them in Europe. I hope that choice will not have to be made, because I hope that NATO will develop along the lines which I have ventured to outline.

If it does it will mean far greater political unity as well as defence unity, and far from weakening the deterrent it will strengthen it.

This is the kind of continental defence and NATO strategy that I venture to put forward and which I hope we will be examining in detail as we go through the estimates. I should like to return to what I said at the beginning. There is only one sure defence, and that is peace. At the present time there is only one sure military way of maintaining peace—and I do not like to say this—and that is to preserve the balance of the terror by the maintenance of a strong and powerful nuclear deterrent force. I accept that in military strategy, but I see no reason—I see a great many arguments against it—for the extension of nuclear weapons from the countries which now have them to other countries thereby weakening their position in international affairs and in the United Nations and making it quite impossible, as I see it, for any Canadian secretary of state for external affairs to go down to the United States and argue against other countries accepting nuclear weapons.

It seems to me these are the advantages of adopting the kind of course I have put forward and the disadvantages of the alternative course by which we become a member of the nuclear club with nuclear weapons under national or joint control. If we are faced with that choice we should take the choice I have indicated, thereby strengthening our position in international affairs, and making our voice stronger in the only field which will save us, namely the maintenance and strengthening of international peace.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, a little while ago the Leader of the Opposition was talking about high levels and low levels, and I must say that the speech he has given since lunch was certainly on a much higher level than the one he gave before lunch. Before lunch what he was doing in effect was attempting to rationalize the irrational. It was a further attempt on his part to try and get out of the mess which the Liberal party got into at their January meeting as far as defence matters are concerned.

I indicated yesterday the comment of some well-qualified newspapermen with regard to the so-called position the Liberals took on defence at the January meeting. The Leader of the Opposition has been making a series of speeches across the country since then trying to explain this, and he complains that people do not understand what their position was. Well, certainly they do not understand it because it was not a position which is understandable. It was a matter of confusion. As I indicated yesterday, one of the reporters who was there said they decided to take Canada out of NORAD, then they put Canada back into NORAD, then they finally ended up with it half in and half out, that is as far as interceptors are concerned, and it was much the same thing as far as nuclear weapons are concerned and so on all down the line. It resulted, as I say, in a mess and confusion.

I noted yesterday also what a very serious writer on defence subjects had to say in a serious magazine called the Canadian Commentator. John Gellner had this to say about the position the Liberal party is taking on interceptors in particular:

> The policy which the Liberal party has adopted in this matter does not even make sense.

It does not make sense, and neither does a lot more of the so-called policy of the Liberal party on defence.

Mr. Pearson: What did he say about your policy?

Mr. Harkness: He said that at least our policy makes sense. He does not agree with all of it, but he said that at least there is some logic in it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Where does he say that? He does not say it.

Mr. Harkness: Paul, don't get too excited.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the Minister of National Defence is a member of the government and he ought to know that it is contrary to our rules to refer to any member except as the hon. member for such and such constituency. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite do not like it, but it is about time ministers were taught that rudeness is no substitute for effective action in this house. There is no one who on occasion destroys his argument in that regard more effectively than does my genial friend the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. gentleman was in error. He does it to a greater extent than anybody else. I apologize for not mentioning the hon. member for Essex East. I realize I was in error.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): According to the rules.

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry. I was tempted to do that by the numerous remarks the hon. member for Essex East makes along the same line, and mostly from his seat. However, what I was saying, which the hon. member hoped I would forget but he has not succeeded in throwing me off the track, was that Mr. Gellner in dealing with this matter stated:

> They—

The Liberals.

—want to leave all arrangements as they are except that Canadian forces in NORAD would not actually shoot. In other words, we would warn the Americans that the enemy was coming, we would tell him who he is, we would fix and track him, but then we would virtuously withdraw and let the Americans do the killing. This is a solution worthy of Pontius Pilate, not of a Lester B. Pearson and his associates.

Mr. Pearson: That is not our solution at all.

Mr. Harkness: I think truer words were never written.

Mr. Pearson: It is not true.

Mr. Harkness: It is a Pontius Pilate type of policy if there ever was one. It is an attempt to stand on both sides of the fence. It is an attempt to go in two opposite directions at the same time, and all the attempts of the Leader of the Opposition in various speeches across the country to try to rationalize this completely irrational position are just not going to succeed because it is impossible for them to succeed.

First of all the Leader of the Opposition today accused those in this party and myself in particular of refusing ever to change our minds. He was talking about the fact that he had changed his mind, and he said that we refused to change our minds, that we would not budge, that we were stubborn and so on. Yet about five or ten minutes later in his speech he was complaining bitterly because we did change our minds, as he said, in connection with interceptors. He cannot have it both ways. As a matter of fact, these two statements in his speech made only about five or ten minutes apart, are typical of the lack of logic in the speeches of the Leader of the Opposition on defence. He accuses us on the one hand of being absolutely unchanging and refusing to change and look at new conditions, and five minutes later he complains bitterly because, as he says, we did change.

What can the people of Canada make of such an attitude and statements of that kind? It is all right for the members of his party who sit behind him to applaud loudly when he makes a statement of that kind but when the general public or anybody who thinks seriously about these matters sits down and analyses what he has said it immediately becomes apparent that there is no validity in most of his remarks.

An hon. Member: Let the public decide.

Mr. Harkness: The public will certainly decide, and there is no question in my mind as to how they will decide.

Mr. Deschatelets: Sooner or later?

Mr. Harkness: The Leader of the Opposition also went on to complain in his earlier remarks that this was the first debate we have had on defence this session, and that there had been none in the earlier part of the session. No one knows better than he does that the reason for that was his own absence and that of the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not so.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, that statement is untrue.

Mr. Harkness: The defence estimates were announced for consideration by the leader of the house. They were to come up on a certain day. The Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Trinity—

Mr. Pearson: That is not true.

Mr. Harkness: —complained and requested that they be not brought up because they said they could not be here.

Mr. Pearson: So we waited for six months.

Mr. Harkness: As a result consideration of these estimates was delayed. He now complains that there was no debate on defence in the earlier part of the session, but the reason was the unwillingness of the Liberal party to go ahead with a debate at that time.

Mr. Pearson: That is ridiculous nonsense.

Mr. Harkness: The Leader of the Opposition went on to say that I should have made a statement on fundamental issues and questions, and that I had not done so. I submit that if he will read the speech I made he will see that it is a statement on the fundamental defence situation as far as this country is concerned, the position the government has taken in regard thereto, and what we have been doing and are doing. His chief complaint would seem to be that we have not said we are going to get nuclear weapons next week. That is really what it all boils down to.

From the statements of the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Essex East you would think that the acquisition or non-acquisition of nuclear weapons constituted the whole field of defence policy. They are one type of weapon, and they would be used in certain circumstances and not used in others. I think they have to be regarded as a certain type of weapon and not looked upon as the end-all and be-all of defence policy, which they are not.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to an editorial in this morning's Globe and Mail, a copy of which I have here, and quoted some portions of it with approval. I should like to point out that it would appear impossible that the writer of the editorial had read the speech I made yesterday or any of my previous speeches on defence. Otherwise he could not possibly have written this editorial, because he states here, after quoting something I had said:

> The picture this conjures up, intentionally or otherwise, is that of Canada facing single combat with Russia, and considering whether to become a full-fledged nuclear power to deter the prospective enemy. This is not the problem at all. Canada has no hope of becoming a nuclear power; to build long range rockets and the like as a deterrent is altogether beyond her resources.

That is exactly what I have been saying for months. The editorial goes on to say:

> The main defence of the western world against nuclear war is its deterrent force and the most important components are the missiles and heavy bombers of the United States strategic air command—

In speech after speech I have made those very statements, and for the writer of this editorial in the Globe and Mail to write as though these views are contrary to what I have been saying is, of course, simply an indication of the fact that the writer seems to have no knowledge whatsoever of what I have been saying for months past and what I said yesterday.

I have been insisting right along that Canada's defence depends on belonging to the NATO alliance, maintaining the NORAD agreement and our efforts toward peace in the United Nations. I have emphasized this time after time. I have emphasized the fact that the forces we maintain in Canada are not forces designed to meet every eventuality. We have no long range strategic bombers, we have no nuclear weapons, we have no missiles. We have no major naval vessels except one aircraft carrier. But within the NATO alliance as a whole we have all these components, and Canada's security is arrived at as a result of her membership in this alliance and the fact that we can depend on our allies to provide these various forces if they are required.

The editorial is completely ridiculous. The writer of the editorial and the Leader of the Opposition appear to dislike the fact that I used a somewhat homely analogy about a bear and a man with a rifle. Probably they do not like analogies of any kind, particularly rather homely ones.

The Leader of the Opposition went on to talk about NATO having a nuclear strategy. Later he said that he agrees that there is a nuclear strategy and believes that it must be maintained. I am glad to have him make that definite statement, because from some of the statements he has made through the country in past months you would think that he was against that idea. Having come to this position he, I hope, will remain with it.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Pearson: I have said that every time I have spoken.

Mr. Harkness: I hope he will not shift his position every month or so as he has done during the past several months. He asked me a question which I was not really able to catch, as to the basis on which I stated that there were several countries in NATO that have nuclear weapons on their soil and have entered into agreements with the United States in connection with those weapons, as I stated yesterday. I do not know exactly what he meant. I think he is aware of the fact that this is the case.

Mr. Pearson: I asked you what countries, what members.

Mr. Harkness: The only thing I would say about that would be to quote from a statement former President Eisenhower made on January 17, 1961 in a letter to congress which has been published. This letter contains a reference to an agreement with the government of Italy for co-operation in the use of atomic energy. I quote:

> To facilitate the necessary co-operation on our part legislation amending the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 was enacted by the congress in 1958. Pursuant to that legislation agreements for co-operation were concluded with four of our NATO partners in May and June 1959. A similar agreement was also recently concluded with our NATO allies, the Republic of Italy. All of these agreements are designed to implement in important respects the agreed NATO program. This agreement with the government of Italy will enable the United States to co-operate effectively in mutual defence planning with Italy and in the training of Italian NATO forces in order that, if an attack on NATO should occur, Italian forces could, under the direction of the supreme allied commander for Europe, effectively use nuclear weapons in their defence.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a question on this point, since I brought it up? Is he now telling us that these NATO members have bilateral agreements with the United States for the acquisition of nuclear weapons by their forces under national or joint control? If so, what members of NATO have made these agreements he has mentioned?

Mr. Harkness: I think what I have read is self-explanatory.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is another thing altogether; that is for the peaceful use of atomic energy.

Mr. Harkness: Some people refuse to understand if it does not further their own purposes. This statement made by President Eisenhower contains this sentence to which I have already referred:

> —if an attack on NATO should occur, Italian forces could, under the direction of the supreme allied commander for Europe, effectively use nuclear weapons in their defence.

I think that is clear enough. As to the other countries, I have not seen any public statements in regard to which countries they are; therefore I have to consider that as security information.

Mr. Pearson: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition says "Oh, oh". He knows quite well that anything along this line is a matter of security until it is released by the people concerned. I have read the letter signed by President Eisenhower and sent to the congress of the United States, which is a matter of public record. I think it makes the situation quite clear. There is nothing to be gained by me spelling out the other four countries to which he referred. Once more, of course, as I pointed out yesterday, all this, which has been public information for some time, makes a complete sham of the position taken in connection with NATO by the New Democratic party at its convention.

Then the Leader of the Opposition went on to mention the weapons systems we have already secured, the Bomarc, the Honest John and the 104. He quoted at the time from a statement by General Foulkes in a pamphlet entitled "Canadian Defence Policy in a Nuclear Age", one of those behind the headlines booklets. He quoted what General Foulkes said as though it were government policy. The Leader of the Opposition knows that General Foulkes does not state government policy. He never did state government policy as chairman of the chiefs of staff. This was the prerogative of the members of the government under whom he served, both the government to which the hon. member belonged and the present government. From the way in which the Leader of the Opposition put this quotation on the record it would appear as though General Foulkes was stating government policy. I will not say he did so purposely, but it was designed to cause misapprehension on the part of the people listening to him or reading Hansard.

Mr. Pearson: On that point, I should like to say I made it quite clear, as the record will show, that General Foulkes had no official responsibility when he made that statement.

Mr. Harkness: This is fine, but I say that the way in which the quotation was put would lead most people reading Hansard to believe that General Foulkes was stating government policy. This is not the case. General Foulkes was a distinguished soldier. He is listened to with great respect on military subjects. I believe everyone in Canada accords him that respect. One of the odd things about this, and this is typical of what you find in the Liberal party, is that only the other day the hon. member for Leeds was quoting from this same pamphlet in an attempt to show that General Foulkes was opposed to nuclear weapons. This is typical of the Liberal party, trying to go in two directions at once. The Leader of the Opposition quotes him as being strongly in favour of nuclear weapons, which he is. The hon. member for Leeds was quoting from this booklet, as a reference to page 8250 of Hansard will show, in an attempt to show that General Foulkes a great military leader in Canada, was against nuclear weapons.

This again is typical of what you get in the Liberal party. You find people going in opposite directions, so you have complete confusion in the party. I am afraid I often feel sorry for the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Don't feel sorry for him, feel sorry for yourself.

Mr. Harkness: —as a result of the things the people in his own party do to him.

Mr. Pearson: You should feel sorry for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, too.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You need the help of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs; they should be here to help you.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to draw attention to the long, sustained remarks which have been coming for some time from the hon. member for Essex East, who is deliberately breaking the rules by remaining in his seat when he makes these interruptions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I apologize.

Mr. Harkness: The Leader of the Opposition made a reference to the statement the Prime Minister made in regard to the acquisition of the three weapons systems to which I have referred, the Bomarc, the Honest John and the 104. He went into the question of lead times and then gave us his own interpretation of what I had said yesterday and on previous occasions in that regard. I should like to make it quite clear once more that you cannot decide today to arm your forces with nuclear weapons carriers and, having made that decision, expect to have the forces armed with these weapons within two or three years. It takes a considerable length of time after an order is placed to produce any one of these weapons systems, and it takes a considerable length of time to train people in their operation.

As I said in my speech when I opened this debate, and as I have said on numerous occasions, it has seemed the part of wisdom to acquire certain weapons systems which are capable of carrying nuclear warheads. Then in the event a decision should be taken that nuclear warheads are required, we would be in a position to make use of them. It was in connection with this use of the analogy of the bear and the rifle that the Leader of the Opposition chose to object.

Mr. Pearson: I did not object to it.

Mr. Harkness: This is the situation. If you are going to take due precautions in the extremely troubled situation which has been existing for the last two years or more and you believe that there is any possibility that you might have to have nuclear weapons for your own defence, for defence of your own territory, then it was essential to secure the carriers, the systems which could use nuclear warheads and to put in orders for them some considerable time ahead. The Leader of the Opposition objected to the fact that we had placed orders for the Bomarc, the Honest John and the F-104, I submit that it was only the part of wisdom and prudence to have done so, whether or not they are ever actually armed with nuclear warheads.

In this connection I would just recall to the minds of hon. members that yesterday the hon. member for Trinity was comparing the Honest John unfavourably with the Little John, thus indicating how absolutely little he knows about this matter. The Honest John is a very much more effective weapon than is the Little John. The Little John is not yet even an approved weapon. It has a range of less than half of that of the Honest John and its punch is approximately one sixth less than that of the Honest John. Nevertheless the hon. member for Trinity rises in his place as though he knew all about it and says that the Honest John is an obsolete weapon and that the Americans are now producing the Little John, a very much better weapon. Once more he indicated his complete ignorance of these matters of a technical nature.

Mr. Hellyer: You are hiding behind your security curtain.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Trinity is an expert on curtains.

Mr. Harkness: At this point the Leader of the Opposition made his great confession about changing his mind. I have no complaint about his changing his mind. The only thing about which I complain is that he does it so frequently that you never know where you are at with him. It is quite reasonable for a man to change his mind every two years, we will say, or every year or even oftener if conditions warrant it. But to do it every month or every week seems to be a little bit beyond reason and leaves us in a complete state of mystery as to what his position really is on these subjects.

Following that, he went on to interceptors and in effect stated that they are no more of any use. He said that their only purpose was to protect S.A.C. bases and that they were no protection whatever for Canadian cities. I submit that if there were no defence at all in Canada or in the United States against manned bombers, the world would not be in its present situation. The Russians would probably have been in control of everything a considerable length of time ago. It is the fact that there is a defence against the manned bomber particularly, which makes it unlikely that manned bombers will come over here to drop bombs. This defence therefore constitutes a great protection for Canadian cities and for the entire population.

In addition to that, of course, in the event that a war started, while it is true they would not knock down all the bombers that come over, nevertheless they would knock down a considerable number of them; and every time you knock down a bomber carrying one or two atomic bombs, you have saved the lives of a large number of people and avoided a great deal of property damage. While these things, of course, are relative, to say that they are of no protection whatever to Canadian cities is to make a statement which is just not correct.

Next, the Leader of the Opposition proceeded to discuss the Arrow. I dealt with the Arrow the other day when the matter was raised by an other hon. member on his side, and I am not going to say much about it now. However, I will make one or two comments. This was when the Leader of the Opposition complained and asked why we changed our minds. He said, "Why did the government change its views on the bomber threat?" Again he asked, "Why did they say, when the Arrow was done away with, that there was not going to be a bomber threat any more?" Of course, that was never said to begin with. What was said at the time was that other means of defence against the bomber would be investigated. I have here the statement of the Prime Minister in connection with this matter made on Friday, February 20, 1959. He ended the statement with these words:

> The government has taken no decision to acquire other aircraft to replace the CF-100, which is still an effective weapon in the defence of North America against the present bomber threat. The Minister of National Defence and the chiefs of staff are now engaged in further studies in the various alternatives for the improvement of our defences.

The then minister of national defence on May 17 last year in discussing the estimates had this to say:

Regarding the need for an interceptor, as seen at that time—

This is at the time of the cancellation of the Arrow.

—the chiefs of staff were instructed to investigate the possibility of obtaining another aircraft at a cheaper price to replace the CF-105.

We did not say that the bomber threat was gone. We did not at that time say that the CF-100 would not be replaced. In fact, we said just the opposite.

Mr. Hellyer: Selected scripture readings again.

Mr. Harkness: To continue what the minister of national defence said on May 17, 1960:

That was stated in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister when he gave his statement, that the chiefs of staff were being instructed to investigate and see whether there was any other aircraft of proven design that was available.

As a matter of fact we have secured the F-101. As I stated here yesterday, contrary to the opinions of the hon. member for Trinity it is an exceptionally good aircraft and fills the needs.

Mr. Hellyer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to quote the opinion which I expressed, which is contrary to the one he just quoted.

Mr. Harkness: I have the floor.

Mr. Hellyer: He is continually falsifying the record by misrepresenting the facts.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member cannot resist interrupting, Mr. Chairman. He is extremely sensitive. I suppose there is no one so sensitive as is the man who knows he is wrong. The hon. member for Trinity demonstrates that fact.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us keep our tempers down.

Mr. Harkness: My temper is all right. It is the tempers on the hon. member's side that he needs to worry about. I refer to the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Hellyer: Don't be smart.

Mr. Harkness: I think the hon. member for Essex East had better speak to his colleague. He is excited. As was stated by the then minister of national defence, the cancellation of the Arrow to a very great extent was due to the fact that it was just too costly a weapon for the Canadian economy and Canadian defence budget to be able to stand. The cost of it would have been something in the neighbourhood of $2,250 million or about $12,500,000 a plane.

Mr. Hellyer: You are lying again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Trinity has just said, "You are lying again". I would request that you ask him to withdraw that remark as any other gentleman would.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the minister used that figure no less than a day ago—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Hellyer: Will you allow me to make a statement, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Grafftey: Withdraw.

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order may I say that I asked for a withdrawal. If the hon. member is not sufficient of a gentleman to observe the rules of the house, then just let him sit quietly.

Mr. Caron: He can prove you were lying.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I can give the hon. member for Trinity some authority for acquiescing in the request of the minister and I would appreciate it if he would withdraw the remark.

Mr. Hellyer: I would like you to hear me out, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order—

An hon. Member: He has the right of reply.

Mr. Hellyer: If I can prove the minister is lying, will you accept—

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member should withdraw. He has no right to make a speech. He must withdraw.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member withdraws that particular word I hope it will not be interpreted in the sense of the acceptance on this side of the chamber of facts which we know not to be accurate as stated by the minister.

An hon. Member: That is different.

The Deputy Chairman: I think perhaps the Leader of the Opposition was speaking from the point of view of the group situation in bringing in that particular factor. In the matter before the committee, the allegation made by the hon. member for Trinity was direct and personal and was impugning the integrity and honour of the minister of the crown who had the floor.

For that reason, without any preliminary explanation I would ask the hon. member for Trinity to kindly withdraw the remark.

Mr. Hellyer: The evidence of the defence expenditures special committee—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Hellyer: —pages 146 and 147—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, would you please ask the hon. member to resume his seat? I have the floor.

Mr. Hellyer: —the committee was advised by the—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have the floor, as it turns out, and I do not think there is any need to exercise the temper of the committee, which has been on a fairly gentle level throughout this very serious and important debate on national defence.

I say again that there is no need for any preliminary explanation on the part of the hon. member for Trinity. I know him well enough personally, to know that he knows he should withdraw the remark so we may continue the debate that is before the committee.

Mr. Hellyer: I withdraw the phrase I used, in accordance with parliamentary practice, while reserving the right to vindicate the statement I made later in the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, after this unseemly interruption I should like to resume what I was saying, which was that the cost of the Arrow, at $2,250 million—

Mr. Hellyer: You never learn. You are stupid—

Mr. Harkness: —which would have been $12,500,000 per copy as the program was presented at that time and as was the estimate of the company, was just completely beyond the capability of the budget. When we told the company that and said we could not continue the program, they then made an alternative proposal of putting in, instead of a Canadian-manufactured weapons system, a United States-manufactured weapons system and said that under those conditions the cost of the airplane would be $7,800,000 per copy instead of $12,500,000 per copy.

Mr. Hellyer: That was the figure of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Harkness: However, this was still completely out of reason and, as the minister of national defence said on May 17, 1960:

[The Deputy Chairman.]

> All I can say in conclusion is that the cost of $12½ million for an aircraft, or even, if the alternative system of fire control had been introduced, of $7,800,000, was just a price tag which was too high to be included in the defence budget of those days.

That was the situation in regard to that.

Mr. Pearson: And get back half of it in taxes.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to point out in this connection that we were not alone in cancelling one of these extremely high priced airplanes. The United States cancelled their 108 really for exactly the same reasons that we cancelled the 105, because they considered the cost of the airplane was too great for the return involved, and also because they considered their other airplanes, the F-101, the F-102 and the F-106 were adequate for the purpose of meeting the bomber threat as they saw it at that time.

Of these airplanes, of course the F-101 is one of those we are going to get, and it is the only two-seater airplane of the lot. Both the 102 and the 106 are single-seater airplanes and are not adapted for the job that is to be done here in Canada. The next thing—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the minister continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harkness: The Leader of the Opposition went on to say that he thought the Bomarc was obsolete, that it is no good. Then of course the hon. member for Trinity made similar statements. If that is the case, here is a very peculiar thing which I would ask the committee to consider. There was a story written by Paul Dubois in the Ottawa Citizen of October 29, 1960. The dateline was "Thurso". It was about the speech of the Leader of the Opposition at a rally in support of Gaston Clermont, Liberal candidate in the by-election occurring at that time in Labelle riding.

Some hon. Members: And elected.

Mr. Harkness: I would read the committee the direct quote. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition will say he was misquoted, but the direct quote of what he said was this:

> A nuclear deterrent may be necessary for the U.S., but not for us and other countries. If Russia ever attacked North America and specifically Canada, Montpellier would be a prime target for the Russians, Montpellier and communities for hundreds of miles around would be reduced to ruins.

If Montpellier was going to be a prime target because it had the Bomarc base there, why does the Leader of the Opposition now say that the Bomarc is completely useless? If it is completely useless the Russians would not be wasting any bombs on it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: We find the Leader of the Opposition, for election purposes, going to this area and saying this terrible Conservative government had built a Bomarc station there and that was going to bring Russian bombers and these people would be wiped out if the balloon ever went up.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The balloon went up this last minute.

Mr. Harkness: The Leader of the Opposition says the Bomarc is no good and nobody takes it seriously except this government. He says the Russians do not pay any attention to it. That is another example of the logic of the Leader of the Opposition in connection with these matters. Now—

Mr. Chevrier: Take a long breath.

Mr. Harkness: He went on to say that the Liberals had put up a much better policy last year and he indicated much better roles that Canada might be following as far as defence is concerned.

What was this great policy they put up last year? As described by my predecessor, it was a policy of scrap, scrap, scrap. They wanted to scrap practically everything and what they did not want to scrap in this so-called policy consisted chiefly of advocating things which we had already done or were proposing to do. I have a list here and I could go over them in detail, but I hardly think it is worth while. I will just indicate that they urged the abandonment of the SAGE Bomarc system and recommended the purchase from the United States of a number of supersonic interceptor aircraft. They knew we were negotiating at that time for supersonic aircraft, so they recommended this and thought they would get on the bandwagon, I suppose.

There is one other thing I should like to mention. They advocated, really, that the navy should become a sort of glorified merchant marine.

Mr. Hellyer: Assault vessels for the troops.

Mr. Harkness: Fortunately that policy is not supported by anybody except themselves. That so-called policy is so full of holes that it is much worse than one of those famous cheeses.

An hon. Member: It smells worse, too.

Mr. Harkness: The Leader of the Opposition read some quotations from newspapers supporting the position that they take. I have a whole file here attacking the position they have taken, but I certainly have not time to read them. This sort of reading does not prove very much, of course.

After lunch—I think the Leader of the Opposition must have had a good lunch—he seemed to get onto a somewhat better tack. He got away from this attempt to justify the mistakes that he and his party had made in the past in regard to defence and he got on to a discussion of NATO, what its objective should be, how nuclear weapons might be controlled in it, and so on. The hon. gentleman said he did not object to NATO having nuclear weapons. As I indicated, I was very glad to have that definite statement from him and I hope he will stay with it. I think we all realize that the control of nuclear weapons is an extremely difficult problem, as the hon. gentleman himself admitted. It is, of course, one which has been exercising the attention of governments of the NATO countries for a very considerable time. To date, no generally acceptable solution has been reached. It is a problem which I certainly trust can be solved, just as the Leader of the Opposition does and as, I think, we all do, but it has not been solved to date.

There is another question which was raised by the Leader of the Oppositoin and with which I should like to deal briefly. He referred to 15 fingers on the trigger. Of course, it would be hardly a credible type of deterrent if we had to obtain the agreement of 15 countries before nuclear weapons might be used, in certain circumstances particularly. In this connection a great deal of thought has been given to whether what are known in the navy in particular as rules of engagement might not be worked out—whether all the 15 countries of NATO might not agree to those rules of engagement, as they are called, which would lay down the situation in which each country would agree that nuclear weapons might be used. There is, I think, hope of arriving at some type of what might be called full NATO control over the use of nuclear weapons by this means.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke of the necessity, in his view, of building up the conventional front line strength of NATO. I fully agree that not only the conventional front line strength of NATO but the conventional strength of the organization generally should be built up. I do not think anybody would quarrel with the hon. gentleman in this regard. Ever since the organization was established, one of the greatest difficulties as far as NATO is concerned has been the failure of certain members of that organization to build up their conventional forces at a sufficiently rapid pace to the strength to which they themselves had agreed to bring them at some time in the future. Of course, the greater the degree to which each of the individual countries in NATO builds its conventional strength the stronger the force will be. I think the Leader of the Opposition and myself share common ground in that regard. As a matter of fact, the increase in the Canadian force which was announced here last week is an indication of Canada's willingness to build up her own NATO strength and increase her contribution to NATO.

I should like to say a word about one idea which the Leader of the Opposition put out—the idea that the Russians might launch a limited conventional war, and that we must have some means of dealing with it. I do not think that eventuality is very likely, though I do not say it is impossible; nothing is impossible. But I think it is very unlikely that the Russians would start a limited war in Europe which they would expect to keep as a conventional war. If they were to do so I think the chance of such a conflict developing into a nuclear war would be very great. For this reason I hope the Russians would not contemplate such action for a minute because it would be an extremely dangerous type of move.

As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, perhaps the greatest danger we face in the world today is that of a war started by accident. This is something which could happen, and it is a possibility which needs to be guarded against very carefully as far as the west is concerned—and we trust the Russians will take equal precautions. However, as I say, the chance that they would start a fair sized conventional war in the expectation that it could be kept at that is, I think, very unlikely. The basic situation is that they have nuclear weapons in their force in eastern Europe, and if they started to move, Mr. Khrushchev himself has said they are going to use everything. That is why it is necessary to have sufficient strength to deter them from ever making such a move. I agree it is the most important thing in the world at the present time to try to ensure that peace continues. On that note I think I will end.

Mr. Hellyer: I apologize for taking up the time of the committee at this stage but it is most difficult to conduct a responsible examination of the estimates of the Department of National Defence when the committee cannot rely on information given it by the Minister of National Defence. The example we have had this afternoon is just one of many. Either the minister's memory is incomparably bad or he gives us wrong information.

For example, in respect to the cost of the Avro Arrow, in May of this year, speaking on Vancouver island during the by-election, the minister is reported to have said, according to a newspaper which he indicated this morning was a good paper, that the planes would have cost $15 million each. The report in the Victoria daily Colonist reads in part:

> Referring to the Liberal leader's remarks about the scrapping of the Avro Arrow jet interceptors the defence minister stated that the planes would have cost $15 million each and that the huge cost would have meant scrapping much of the army and navy strength.

This afternoon the minister must have decided in his imagination that it would be more credible if he reduced the figure to $12 million each. And then, when he was challenged, as he was yesterday when he pulled the same trick, he reduced the figure to $7.81 million each. Even that figure is too high, because that is the figure which was given to the special select committee on estimates a year ago as the cost of 108 operational aircraft plus 12 pre-production models. If hon. members do the arithmetic they will find that the cost per operational aircraft was $6.8 million each.

An hon. Member: Still too much.

Mr. Hellyer: That is all in the evidence. The minister is aware of it, and for him to stand up and tell this committee that the cost would have been $12 million each is an insult to hon. members, particularly as the evidence given by the former deputy minister of national defence, now Air Chief Marshal Miller, was that the planes would cost $6.8 million each. How can we have any faith in anything the minister tells us if he uses a device of this kind to try to confuse and bewilder both the committee and the Canadian people?

This is a type of arithmetic which might be applied to a new situation. The minister has just worked out an arrangement under which the Canadian Department of National Defence is to receive 66 Voodoo aircraft in exchange for certain things. I have the agreement here. I shall not read it in detail, but in exchange for the 66 Voodoo aircraft the department agrees to take over from the United States the cost of maintaining Pinetree radar stations previously maintained by the United States air force. In addition, it is to contribute $50 million toward a program of military aid—toward the acquisition of F-104 aircraft to be built at Canadair in Montreal.

In addition, it will pay one third of the cost of spares and ground handling equipment for the Voodoo in the amount of $10.9 million.

Now, there is no cut-off date as to when Canada's responsibility ends in respect of maintaining the Pinetree line. The annual cost of maintaining the Pinetree line has been variously estimated. The then minister of national defence, the Hon. George Pearkes, V.C., advised the house on March 2, 1959, as reported on page 1518 of Hansard as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, before the house rose for the dinner recess, the Leader of the Opposition had asked for information with regard to the cost of the Pinetree system. As I explained, the Pinetree system is shared by the United States and by Canada, some of the stations being operated by Canadians and some being operated by the Americans. The cost to Canada of operating each year is approximately $28 million; that is the cost of operating those Pinetree stations which were either built by Canada and manned by R.C.A.F. personnel or were built by the United States and manned by R.C.A.F. personnel. The cost to the United States is approximately $43 million for operating their stations. That figure of $43 million includes some $5 million which the United States are spending on purchasing equipment for those stations in Canada.
> Hence if Canada were to take over the operation of the line in its entirety it would mean the addition of $43 million to our defence budget at the present time.

A United States congressional subcommittee was advised by the director general of the United States air force budget that the saving to the United States air force by Canada taking over the cost of the Pinetree line was $50 million a year. If this is so, Mr. Chairman, let us assume that we have to maintain this Pinetree line for ten years. The cost, even by using the lower figure recorded by the Minister of National Defence, would be $430 million. Add to this $50 million which is Canada's share of the purchase of F-104's, and $10.9 million which is our share of the spares for the Voodoo, and the total cost is $490.9 million for 66 aircraft or approximately $7.5 million per copy. If we had to maintain those stations for 15 years the cost would be a total of $705.9 million, or more than $10 million a copy, far more than it would have cost to carry on with the Avro Arrow program.

The Minister of National Defence told the people in Victoria that the commencement of the Avro Arrow program was the greatest mistake ever made by the Canadian government. Well, the deal he has just made with the United States government, which could result in the cost of $10 million each for aircraft which at the most are not worth more than $2 million each, is in my opinion one of the biggest boobs ever pulled by a minister of national defence.

In closing may I say I think the minister should apologize to the committee for using figures upon which it cannot rely.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, if these allegations came from some serious source I would take them seriously. However, I consider the source from which they come and I will merely say that the figures the hon. gentleman is producing are probably comparable with the figures he was trying to produce yesterday as to what the cost would be for the 15,000 more troops we are going to raise, which he insisted was double what I had said they would be, although this was a figure arrived at by careful estimates of the departmental officials and officials of treasury board. But he produces any figures that his imagination suggests to him and I suggest that the committee should not take him to seriously—I certainly do not take him too seriously—in regard to these matters.

As far as the actual cost of taking over these Pinetree lines, and so on, is concerned, if the cost went on for long enough, of course, it might be very considerable. But the main point is that we are taking over those radar stations in Canada, manning them by Canadian personnel and operating them with Canadian personnel rather than having them operated by United States personnel.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are always complaining about having United States personnel here stating that it is an infringement of our sovereignty. Therefore rather than complaining about it they should be happy to see Canadian personnel replacing United States personnel in manning those radar stations. The point is, if you take a long enough period you can arrive at any figures you like.

Members of the committee will recall an item which appeared in the paper the other day. There was a clergyman in Boston who sent a bill to the chancellor of the exchequer for $18 worth of damage done to the fence of his church back in 1770 something. He presented a bill for upwards of $750,000. If you take a long enough period you can come up with a terrific figure. In effect this is what the hon. member is doing.

Mr. Pearson: Could I ask the minister a question arising out of the article by Mr. John Gellner which he quoted a few minutes ago. The article criticized the Liberal party. Does the minister agree with this statement in the article:

> The country certainly needs a Minister of National Defence who can overcome public apathy and suspicion, and restore confidence in Canadian military policy.

Mr. Harkness: Where did the hon. member find that? The reason I ask the question is that as I recall this particular statement by Mr. Gellner, he went on to say, "It looks as if Canada has secured one."

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Chairman. I will send the article over. It went on to say:

> Let us hope Harkness is the man.

But I am sure his hopes are not realized now.

Mr. Harkness: He suggests strongly that I am the man, as I recall it.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, this debate, which is of such great significance to all Canadians, has now reached its third day, and we just heard from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) a masterful statement on all aspects of the national defence policy Canada should follow, a statement which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) was unable to refute. We therefore have the proof that in this field as in all others, the Canadians who are looking for guidance and leadership must turn to the Liberal party and not to the government which persists in taking a confused and ambiguous position in this and every other matter.

Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak very briefly on this question which seems to me a capital one at this time and which is a subject of interest and concern for the Canadian people. The present situation may be summed up in the following question. What is the policy of this government with regard to the use of nuclear arms in Canada?

Mr. Chairman, I think that the discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Defence, which takes place this year in the midst of an international crisis, would have been a very appropriate moment for the government to state a definite policy and tell us clearly whether or not it had come to a decision with regard to the number one problem, the use of nuclear arms in Canada.

It is inconceivable that the government after three days of debate should leave us in an ambiguous position. The situation is becoming more and more confused. Only yesterday, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) when concluding his speech called upon the government and the Minister of National Defence clearly to state their policy in respect of nuclear arms in Canada. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Essex East said this, and I quote from page 8330 of Hansard:

(Text):

> We are entitled to know, before parliament adjourns, with respect to this very vital matter of whether or not the government has a policy; and if it has, the government should state it in a forthright and unambiguous way.

(Translation):

Here is the answer given by the Minister of National Defence, as recorded in Hansard on page 8330.

[Mr. Pearson.]

(Text):

> Mr. Harkness: In reply to that, Mr. Chairman, I would say that I do not propose to accept the directions of the hon. member for Essex East as to what I should or should not say in this debate.

I contend that this is an extraordinary statement on the part of the minister and I hope that this observation of the minister will receive wide publicity because he has overlooked a very important fact. When the hon. member for Essex East asked the government to tell us what their policy is he was not speaking on behalf of the Liberal party only but also on behalf of the Canadian people who would like to know what the decision of the government is on this important question.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, such indecision on the part of the government is not only disappointing but also detrimental to the interests of Canada, and as long as no clear and specific decision is arrived at on this most important matter, Canada will be incapable of playing the leading part that it should play.

I listened last Tuesday to the statement made by the minister. That statement can only lead to speculation. Here is what he said as recorded on page 8223 of Hansard:

> It requires that they be equipped with weapons comparable to if not better than those of a potential adversary. It is the policy of the government that our forces should not be required to face a potential enemy with inferior weapons.

Mr. Chairman, most newspapers understood that the government had decided to acquire atomic weapons and to become a member of the nuclear club. But that statement is ambiguous and causes dissatisfaction everywhere among the public.

I also listened to the remarks of the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny); he too avoided any definite statement on this capital matter. Indeed, he considered war in terms of the 1914 world war or the second world war because, according to page 8241 of Hansard, he stated:

> If the worst should come, if we have to fight again, I do not hesitate to say that we shall once again win the battles of tomorrow just as we won the battles of yesteryear, and this for many reasons.

Well, the minister has forgotten, I think, that victory has no meaning at all in a nuclear war. However, he was a little more careful yesterday than he was when he addressed a rally in Mont Laurier during the last by-election campaign in the constituency of Labelle. I should tell him that I was not far from the place where he was speaking and that I heard him enumerate the advantages of the La Macaza launching base. The minister will recall, I hope, that one of the reasons for his party's humiliating defeat in the riding of Labelle was precisely the stand taken by his government on this question of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Chairman, after three days of debate, it is obvious that the government's national defence policy is several years old, as the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) has shown, and that the government has not had the courage to adopt a definite position concerning the use of nuclear weapons in Canada. As long as this situation prevails, we cannot hope to play the part we could play, and we would be ill-advised to criticize today the other countries which belong to the nuclear club since our objections to nuclear tests would be weakened because of the position taken by the government.

That is a cause of great disappointment for all Canadians but they have one reason for keeping up their hopes, and that is the fact that there is one political party which has remained true to the policy it has always advocated with respect to nuclear weapons. Here I should like to quote from the newspaper Le Devoir of Tuesday, April 11, 1961. Here is what Paul Sauriol had to say in an editorial:

> The Liberal party rally, last January, clearly declared itself against acquisition or use of nuclear weapons in Canada, under any form of control; Mr. Pearson said that such weapons were not required for the time being.

What position we took at the rally was our position before and it still is our position. That is something that one cannot say of this administration.

I do not want to be too critical of the C.C.F. members who have been wearing since last summer a new jacket which fits them about as well as a strait-jacket. As I say, I do not want to be too hard on them, because it is really pitiful to see them trying to take positions now to the left, now to the right, according to the instructions they get.

I simply say that the only encouraging sign for Canadians is the fact that at least there is in the Canadian political life one party with a clean cut position, with a clear stand, a constant stand, and I am proud to be a member of that party, the Liberal party.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, regardless of the sombre nature of this debate, I for one am very pleased to note two cheering news items in the afternoon paper. The first in the Citizen, is headed, "U.S. Ready for Serious U.N. Talks With Russia". It is a Reuters dispatch from London and reads as follows:

> Soviet foreign minister Andrei Gromyko is ready to enter into an exchange of opinions with U.S. state secretary Dean Rusk on Germany and other problems, the Soviet news agency Tass announced today.

The other one is in today's Ottawa Journal. It is a report on a meeting held by Willy Brandt, and it reads in part as follows:

> Speaking in the heart of the socialist Ruhr before a quiet, attentive audience of at least 20,000 with several thousand more milling outside, Mr. Brandt rejected proposals for atomic weapons for Germany and pledged faithful adherence to the pact of London that forbids Germany to produce atomic weapons.

I thought I would mention those two news items because they are heartening, I think, to anyone who is interested in watching developments on the international scene.

We have had a rather lengthy and interesting discussion, Mr. Chairman, with respect to military hardware. It seems to me to be pretty well a stalemate, and at times the debate was difficult to follow. Of course, I would not suggest for a moment that I am capable of speaking with any knowledge or judgment on such a question. As a member of the working class I am more acquainted with the saw, the axe, the pick and shovel. I could pass some opinion as to the quality of those tools, but not those that have been mentioned previously in the debate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, at the request of a number of people I again raise a matter that I raised yesterday, a matter that is of serious concern to a great number of Canadians. Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, I made certain statements with respect to General Heusinger and expressed strong opposition to his appointment as chairman of the military representatives committee of NATO. This means that he is one of those who plan the strategy and tactics of NATO and who, indirectly, would direct the activities and actions of Canadian troops. I want to say that my statements were not made lightly. They were not made just to create resentment or anything of that sort. I feel very keenly on this matter and I speak with conviction. I feel as keenly as a number of other persons do, a number of other groups in Canada and in the United States.

The Associate Minister of National Defence replied briefly to my arguments and at one point said that General Heusinger was a man who had served his country with distinction. He then went on to defend the appointment of this general to this very important position. I am quite sure that the Associate Minister of National Defence spoke according to the information he had available. I am confident also that, judging from his remarks, he has not been completely informed on this matter. In order to put the record straight, and on behalf of a number of Canadian citizens, I want to place the facts on the record. This appointment offends a good many Canadians in various groups, including religious, ethnic and other groups.

In order that there will be no misunderstanding, and for the sake of accuracy, I am going to read at some length. I trust the committee will bear with me so that the facts will be on the record. I have read a number of books and documents that have been brought to my office by people interested in this problem, including one lady of German descent. I have the Congressional Record.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member would be king enough to indicate to the committee how long this quotation is. We have had a rather bad precedent, when a very long quotation was put on Hansard the other day, and I would not want to see this become a practice. If the hon. member would indicate to the committee how long it is, that would be helpful.

Mr. Herridge: I would judge, Mr. Chairman, it is about half as long as the interesting statement put on the record by the Progressive Conservative member the other day.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should get the consent of the committee, then, if it is that long. Will the committee give unanimous consent to the putting on the record of this information?

Mr. Pallett: Why does the hon. member not give the library reference, and then those who are interested can read it?

Mr. Herridge: I shall give the sources.

The Deputy Chairman: I have not had the consent of the committee as yet. Does the committee give its consent?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because I was the person who unwittingly made arrangements for seeing that the situation which confronted us the other day was procedurally put on paper, may I ask is the hon. member proposing now that he just table the reference? This would be contrary to our procedure.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member indicated to me he was going to quote it. I asked him if he would be kind enough to advise the committee, in whose hands I am on this matter, how long it was. He said it was about half the length of the very long statement put on the record the other day by the hon. member for St. Boniface which I felt, on reading Hansard, created a rather bad precedent. I feel I should ask leave from the committee to permit this substantial quotation to be put on the record. Does the committee give its unanimous consent?

Mr. Harkness: I take it, then, that the statement is going to take 25 or 30 minutes to read. Under those circumstances, I do not think we could agree to have the statement read into the record.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member could paraphrase what it says, and get it on the record in that fashion. I do not want to be unfair, but I do not want to see this practice develop in committee and I think hon. members would agree because the committee could get into a very complex and difficult situation if we were too free in our interpretation of this particular rule.

Mr. Herridge: I shall try to take extracts from this reference. I would rather not paraphrase it because I want it to be exact. This is a most interesting document, and I should like the information to be recorded here. I will read extracts and I will try to be as brief as possible. I certainly do not intend to be anything like 30 minutes.

Now, I am quoting from the United States Congressional Record for April 19 of this year. These various groups had made representations to Senator Wayne Morse—

Mr. Pallett: What page?

Mr. Herridge: The pages I start at is 5893. There are several pages, in fact, but I am only going to take extracts. An appeal was made to Senator Wayne Morse by the American Jewish congress and other groups to bring these matters to the attention of the United States senate, which he did. In doing so, he said:

> Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the record, as part of my remarks, the fact sheet on the record of General Adolf Heusinger.
> There being no objection, the fact sheet was ordered to be printed in the record, as follows:
>
> Fact Sheet on General Adolf Heusinger
> (Issued in conjunction with the appeal to Mr. Dean Rusk, Secretary of State, by the Warsaw ghetto commemoration meeting, April 16, 1961, at Manhattan Centre, New York City. The appeal urged the annulment of the appointment of General Adolf Heusinger, chairman of the military representatives committee in permanent session of NATO)
>
> In his autobiography, "Befehl in Widersteit," published in West Germany in 1950, Heusinger wrote that he sympathized with the 1923 Hitler putsch in Munich, but did not participate because he was sure the attempt would fail.
> In 1940, Heusinger became chief of operations on Hitler's general staff. Was responsible for the military planning of all Nazi invasions from then on.

In 1942 was made responsible for all actions against partisans. In August 1942 this order, initiated by Heusinger, was sent to the army group centre on eastern front:

"The Fuehrer demands immediate retaliatory action for (partisan) attack on the railroad station in Slavnoye, with the use of the strongest measures of terror. Report what measures you take."

Heusinger's order resulted in the following: In Slavnoye the Nazis threw several dozen live children into a deep well. None survived. In another village, Gayanka, Heusinger's troops exterminated the entire population of 115.

Heusinger, as chief of operations of the OKW (Oberkommando der Wehrmacht)—the high command of the Nazi forces, commanded the special extermination squads (Einsatzgruppen). These squads were given the task of exterminating all Jews and other groups. William L. Shirer describes some of the mass atrocities committed by Heusinger's Einsatzgruppen (see pages 961 to 963 of "The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich.")

In "SS—Alibi of a Nation" Reitlinger says that Heusinger planned the levy en masse of the civilian population on the eastern front (page 386).

Heusinger was one of Hitler's most trusted generals. When a bomb planted by army officers exploded at Rastenburg. East Prussia, during a meeting of Hitler and his top generals, the following facts should be remembered:

After the bombing, Hitler said on the radio, "But you should know of a crime unparalleled in German history. The bomb seriously wounded a number of my true and loyal collaborators." (For Heusinger's role in the aftermath to the July 20, 1944, bombing see Shirer, pp. 1044 et seq.; Reitlinger, "SS," pp. 386 et seq.).

The loyal Hitler general who was giving a detailed report on the Russian front at the precise time of the bombing was Gen. Adolf Heusinger.

That, though wounded, the general who led the vengeful hunt against other Nazi generals who had failed in their plan to kill Hitler so that they could negotiate a separate peace with the West was Gen. Adolf Heusinger.

That the top-ranking military figure who participated prominently in the mass executions that followed—wherein the victims were slowly strangled by piano wires as they hung from meat hooks, was Adolf Heusinger.

That among the handful who survived the bombing and was called by Hitler himself—

This is after the bombing.

—as "my true and loyal collaborator" was Adolf Heusinger.

That the first recipient of Hitler's July 20, 1944, medal commemorating the bombing at Rastenburg was Gen. Adolph Heusinger.

Mr. Pallett: Will the hon. member indicate the page he is on at the moment.

Mr. Herridge: I am on page 5893. I am jumping from paragraph to paragraph in order to be as brief as possible.

On May 27, 1959, the West German news magazine Spiegel wrote: "The question remains open as to how General Heusinger managed to survive, although Stieff names him to the police and the people's court as an accomplice."

General Heusinger was named on the first list of war criminals issued by the United Nations, but escaped trial by being held as a prisoner of war by the U.S. army.

Heusinger has been a consistent supporter of Nazism and Nazi ideology.

Heusinger said: "It had always been my personal opinion that the treatment of the civilian population and the methods of anti-partisan warfare (extermination) presented the highest political and military leaders with a welcomed opportunity for carrying out their plans namely, the systematic extermination of Slavism and Jewry."

Then further on:

General Heusinger tried to save the life of SS Gen. Oswald Pohl, the man who ordered the liquidation of the Warsaw ghetto. Heusinger and Gen. Hans Speidel, today commander of the NATO Ground Forces, made a secret approach to a top-ranking diplomat in Bonn on January 30, 1951, threatening that if General Pohl and other SS criminals were executed, West Germany would refuse to raise an army. (U.S. diplomat Charles Thayer in his book, "The Unquiet Germans", London.).

Testifying at the Nuremberg trials Heusinger spoke highly of his superior, Gen. Alfred Jodl, who was convicted of the most heinous war crimes and was hanged by the neck by judgment of the Nuremberg tribunal for these crimes October 16, 1946. To Heusinger Jodl was a thoroughly decent man.

Heusinger is still proud of the Nazi army and Hitler's ideals. In addressing a meeting of subordinate officers in 1958, he said, according to the Sueddeutsche Zeitung: "We should remember our past and we should not neglect the decisive factors of leadership which brings success. Let us stick to the principles we used to have." The principles "we used to have", we may point out, brought death and destruction to millions in many countries and almost succeeded in the murder of the entire European Jewish population.

On November 11, 1960, in a letter printed in the New York Times, Yale Law Prof. Jerome H. Skolnick termed the Heusinger appointment "disturbing" and said, "I seriously question that we must have such people representing the defence of American freedom and democracy on the world scene... Furthermore, if we ever wish to reach any kind of agreement with Russia to settle the German question, we will have raised tension to a virtually unbearable height to this move... I hope the U.S. government will veto the nomination of this former Nazi.

I have just one more short paragraph to read, Mr. Chairman:

On January 31, 1961, Brig. Gen. Hugh Hester, U.S. Army (retired), in a statement calling the appointment of Heusinger part of our ill-advised policy in the rearming of West Germany, stated: "It seems to me that it would be wise for the U.S. government to withdraw its support of Heusinger, or any other former Nazi. Unless we are willing to do this I fear that the U.S. government will be identified with the policies generally attributed to that system."

Then Senator Morse later repeated his statement that he thought this was a most unfortunate appointment. I mention this Mr. Chairman, in order to place the facts on the record. I could go on and quote from books containing extracts from captured nazi documents which the world Jewish organization has documented very well indeed. I want to make this point. I think of the first world war. I can truthfully say that on a good number of occasions the reason why I did not run away was that I believed our cause was just. I believed that a sense of being morally right is very important in facing the situation we have today. In my opinion this type of appointment creates unnecessary suspicion so far as the Soviet and other countries behind the iron curtain are concerned. Place yourself in their position, Mr. Chairman, knowing that the chairman of the top planning body of NATO was a general who was merciless in the destruction of their civilian population.

I therefore say that in the first instance it is unsound from our point of view to create this unnecessary irritation and to arouse suspicion on the part of behind the iron curtain countries as to our motives and as to our principles in which we profess we believe. I think it causes unnecessary distress to many people as for instance to the unhappy relatives who suffered from this sort of thing. I think it causes suspicion even among Canadians who are given cause to wonder, when we talk about our being a Christian democracy and use language of that type, how we can justify Canadian troops in reality, if not in effect, actually marching under the leadership of a general with a record such as this. It may create in young people a feeling of cynicism and a lack of belief in the things for which we profess to stand. I know that it creates a great deal of resentment among former veterans of the first and second world wars. Just imagine the feelings of relatives of veterans who sacrificed their lives in the first and second world wars in the defence of principles in which we in Canada believe. With all my heart I believe that an appointment of this type does our cause harm. I feel deeply on this question. I do not think we can justify this appointment. There are a good many other people in our country who feel keenly and sincerely with respect to a question of this type.

The hon. member for Essex East for whom I have great respect made some reference to my remarks yesterday and said that he could understand them as possibly they were somewhat motivated by my experience in the first world war. That is not the situation at all. No one can accuse me of being in any sense a person who has any antagonism towards any race. Anyone who has known of my life throughout the years and my activities in the district in which I live knows that is not true, and that on behalf of even German citizens during the war, I sought to make sure they obtained justice during those difficult times. I do not express these views because of antipathy to any race. I recognize the position of the ordinary soldier who served his country in time of war whether he was on our side or the enemy side. I refer to the ordinary soldier recruited to serve in what he considered to be his country's defence. However, Mr. Chairman, we must remember that people like General Heusinger were the leaders. These were the people who decided policy. They were the ones who gave expression to nazi ideology, nazi ethics in battle, and who transgressed all the known ethics of modern warfare, in so far as one can term war as having any ethics at all.

A good deal of my information comes from friends of mine of German ancestry. A German lady visited my office just a few nights ago. She came from New York to visit me. I have also had Germans working for me in my constituency on many occasions and I know the contribution they make to society. They are the type of Germans who opposed nazism and left Germany because of it in the first place. They oppose nazism and I respect those people.

I am speaking of those who supported this nazi ideology which we, at great cost, defeated in world war II. I and others oppose this appointment because we believe, in the light of all the circumstances of what the western world suffered in world war II and because of our professed principles, that such an appointment is strictly immoral and, as I said before, weakens our cause.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I urge the government to consider the feelings of the people who feel keenly about this; to obtain the facts and to do what they can to see that this general is replaced by someone with a clean military record, someone who cannot stir up the feelings of many in our country and other countries by creating unnecessary suspicion as to our methods.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter into any argument with the hon. member for Kootenay West as to the antecedents of General Heusinger. I merely wish to say that the hon. member has given the opinions of one or two men and perhaps somebody else in connection with this matter. My information is that it was precisely because Dr. Adenauer was convinced of the anti-nazi antecedents of General Heusinger that he appointed him as his chief military adviser in, I believe, 1950. I do not think the hon. member doubts the anti-nazi character of Dr. Adenauer or his general attitude.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I have just this to say regarding what the hon. member for Kootenay West has said. I have no means of knowing the validity of the evidence he has produced, but it seems to me that to leave this matter open, with the possibility that this kind of thing will be disseminated in Russia, with no valid answer to it except that apparently Dr. Adenauer was satisfied, would be a very dangerous thing.

I hope we will pursue this matter further. It seems to me that if there were not an adequate answer to the evidence produced by the hon. member the Russians would be able to disseminate this opinion which we have received from a reputable source. The hon. member is known to us and his own war record is known. He knows of responsible people feeling as he does in connection with this matter and I hope the matter will not be allowed to drop here.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Shall vote 232 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, there is just one brief matter to which I would refer, for the record. As reported at page 8176 of Hansard, the other day the hon. member for Kootenay West made this observation, which is reported at the top of the page:

> We were listening to him carefully—

That is the Prime Minister:

> —and at one point we understood him to indicate that it was the government's position that if there were any change in the status of West Berlin, or a war, that we were honour bound in this country to support war. Am I correct in that interpretation?

The Prime Minister said in reply:

> What I said was this. If perchance, and all of us hope to the contrary, war came, we would become a participant because of our relationship, our undertakings and our pledges in NATO.

I simply wish to say for the record that, while it is true that under article VI of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization we would be involved, we have constitutional processes in this country which, subject of course to the exigencies of nuclear war, we must observe. That is, before there is any declaration of war by the executive arm of the government or by circumstances such as I have envisaged, such as a nuclear war, parliament must authorize a declaration of war. There is no automatic involvement. This is our constitutional position. I am sure it was inadvertently left out by the Prime Minister.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Shall vote 232 carry?

Mr. Hellyer: Before the vote carries, Mr. Chairman, I have one or two routine questions to ask the minister, if he would like to have his officials come in now. One question concerns the number of people now at national defence headquarters.

Mr. Harkness: As far as the number of people actually there is concerned, I think the details are given at page 316 of the estimates book, which I note the hon. member has before him.

At page 317 it shows that for the year 1961-62 the number is 661, and for 1960-61 it was 670. In other words, last fiscal year it was 670 and this year it is 661.

Mr. Hellyer: Those are the figures given in the blue book, and I presume in the details. I wonder whether the minister can say if there has been any change since these figures were published?

Mr. Harkness: I am informed, Mr. Chairman, that there has been no change in that figure since the estimates book was published.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister indicate the number of service personnel presently stationed at national defence headquarters and give the comparable figure for a year ago?

Mr. Harkness: I will just give the total figures for the navy, army, air force and tri-service personnel. At December 31, 1960 the total was 3,045; at March 31, 1961, it was 3,029, and at June 30, 1961, it was 3,097. From March 31, 1960, it is given for March, October, December and then March and June. It has varied from 3,039 up to 3,097.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister say whether any additional service personnel will be required at national defence headquarters as a result of the proposed build-up both in the regular and auxiliary services?

Mr. Harkness: I do not think there will be any increase. As a matter of fact, some of the military personnel at army headquarters have been used and will be used to man the alternate army headquarters which has been set up and which is now manned. Therefore, the number here will actually be reduced rather than built up, I think.

Mr. Hellyer: I note there has been practically no change in the strength of the personnel either civilian or military at national defence headquarters. I should like the minister to comment on this statement:

> In my opinion the first step which should be taken as far as reorganizing Canada's defence set up is concerned is the complete reorganization of national defence headquarters in order to secure efficiency and economy at that level. I have spoken on this subject before; perhaps it may be said that I have harped on it during the past——two or three years.

> I have made speeches on the subject when the defence estimates were up going back to a period of two or three years after the war. In speeches I have made from that time on I have referred to the top heavy organization of defence headquarters and the large proportion of service personnel in administrative and desk jobs as compared to those in fighting units.

A little later on the hon. gentleman said:

> In any event it has been my contention for several years past that defence headquarters is top heavy and as a result wasteful and inefficient. I now have two very powerful witnesses to reinforce that claim. General Simonds has said in this article that the headquarters is top heavy. The minister, of course, said that was only his opinion. I think that opinion is a very weighty one and it is reinforced by General Macklin and every other retired officer with any experience with whom I have ever spoken with regard to the matter.

Would the minister agree to comment on that statement, and indicate if in his opinion it is still a fair reflection of his views?

Mr. Harkness: Would the hon. member give us the source of that extract?

Mr. Hellyer: Well, with very small paraphrasing, the minister himself is the author.

Mr. Harkness: I recognized some of the phrases although I did not recognize the passage entirely and I wondered what the hon. gentleman was reading. Was he perhaps paraphrasing something which appeared in Hansard?

Mr. Hellyer: The pasage appeared in Hansard on July 19, 1956 and the only change I made was to change seven or eight years to two or three years. The hon. gentleman will find the reference on page 6175 of Volume 6.

Mr. Harkness: First of all, since that date the number of civilian employees employed in the headquarters of the department has been cut down from 791 to the present strength of 661. In spite of the fact that the workload has been increasing there has been a considerable reduction in the number of personnel at headquarters. As far as the various staffs are concerned, as I have indicated, some of the headquarters personnel are now being employed in manning the alternate army headquarters which have been set up. Some of the personnel who will be used to man the target headquarters outside cities will also come from this source.

In addition, I should like to tell the hon. member that I instituted some time ago a very thorough manpower study with the object in mind of cutting out any unnecessary personnel who might be shown to be on the strength of the national defence headquarters.

Mr. Hellyer: Has that study yet been completed?

Mr. Harkness: No, it has not been completed yet.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say how many persons are on his personal staff at the present time and also how many are on the staff of the associate minister?

Mr. Harkness: The number of persons on the combined staff of the associate minister and myself is 34. I may say that the number of persons on my own staff is, I think, smaller than the number employed on the staff of any minister of national defence in the last years at least.

Mr. Hellyer: It seems that the associate minister is compensating for that difference.

Mr. Harkness: I think the total number of people on the staff of the minister and the asociate minister is less than the number serving in the period of Mr. Claxton and Mr. Campney, though I will have that checked. This is despite the fact that the workload has considerably increased; we have many more military commitments than we had then.

Mr. Hellyer: It is also due, perhaps, to some of the additional confusion.

I wonder if the minister has any plans for a new national defence headquarters and whether a site has yet been chosen.

Mr. Harkness: As the hon. member is aware, this matter has been under consideration for a long time—at least for ten or 12 years and perhaps even longer than that. Several sites have been considered, but to date no agreement has been reached between the Department of National Defence, the National Capital Commission and the Department of Public Works, in particular, as to the exact site on which the national headquarters will be built. I sincerely hope we shall be able to get an agreement on the site and begin construction in the fairly near future.

Mr. Hellyer: Is this decision subject to the troika principle?

Mr. Harkness: I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by that. However, I think he is aware that all three departments are concerned in this matter.

Mr. Hellyer: I realize it is not usual to prepare any working drawings or anything of that kind before a site has been chosen, but can the minister say whether there have been any preliminary studies of the requirements with regard to space, the type of building which will be needed, the provision of the protection against fall-out and so on.

Mr. Harkness: The study on manpower requirements at the national headquarters is related to this very question. If we find we can cut down the number of personnel at the headquarters it would, of course, mean we could construct a smaller building than would otherwise be the case. There have, of course, been a considerable number of studies regarding the space which would be required in order to bring under one roof, or into one set of connected buildings, all the installations, numbering at the present time something of the order of 53, I believe, which are now scattered about Ottawa.

Inspection services—

233. Operation and maintenance, $7,224,436.

Mr. Carter: I understand that the inspection services include the inspection of the quality of purchases of material and equipment and that they also cover the quality of performance. Will the minister say who carries out the inspection of the fixed assets and stores which are kept over a period of years? Will he also tell us whether the inspection services have anything to do with the inspection of the efficiency of administration or the efficiency of training?

Mr. Harkness: The inspection services have nothing to do with those two latter matters. Once goods have been purchased and delivered to the respective services each service is responsible for the inspection of those stores in its own quartermaster's stores and so forth. Essentially the inspection services inspect articles which are being delivered to the Department of National Defence to ensure they are up to specification.

Mr. Carter: Who is responsible after that? Does the responsibility for continuous inspection rest with the commanders?

Mr. Harkness: Once the stores are delivered —we will take boots as an example—they are delivered to the ordnance depot and the ordnance depot is responsible for seeing that they are kept there under proper condition and in good shape. Then, when they are delivered to a unit, say an infantry battalion, that battalion is responsible for their proper storage and to see that they are kept in proper condition there.

Mr. Carter: I was thinking of stores that might deteriorate over a period of years. Who would carry out any tests on goods that might deteriorate? Is that done by the ordnance department, or is there some machinery within the command for that?

Mr. Harkness: It depends on what type of stores they are. If they are medical stores, the medical service would declare them unserviceable when they considered that they had reached that stage, we will say. With respect to dental stores, the dental people would do it. With respect to general stores, the ordnance people would do it. If a unit has some stores that it thinks are unserviceable it declares them unserviceable and the ordnance people inspect them, and if they agree they are unserviceable they take them to the ordnance stores for disposal.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister elaborate a bit with respect to the extra work load referred to in the blue book? Under this item the total expenditures for construction and equipment, as he knows, are reduced this year over last year. Therefore, it would seem that the number of inspectors necessary should decline as well. The blue book mentions the SAGE installation and radar gap-fillers as one reason for the continuing work load. Can the minister say whether he is getting assistance from the United States air force in respect of the inspection of the SAGE installation, for example? They are experienced in these matters and might be giving him some assistance. Can he explain to us why so many personnel are needed when the expenditure is reduced?

Mr. Harkness: We are doing all the inspection on behalf of the United States air force for these installations in Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: Would it not be reasonable to engage the services, by loan or otherwise, of some people who are familiar with the same types of installation in the United States?

Mr. Harkness: I am informed that our people are thoroughly familiar with this, and this provides means employing Canadians on this work in Canada rather than bringing in people from the United States to do it.

Mr. Hellyer: That is fine. I presume they must have gone to the United States and probably gained at first hand the experience that was to be gained there. Can the minister say whether there are any inspection personnel at A. V. Roe? If so, what are they engaged in doing?

Mr. Harkness: None of the people of the inspection service is at A. V. Roe. However, the air force has personnel there who are carrying on inspection work as the work proceeds.

Item agreed to.

234. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $211,000.

Mr. Carter: Is the policy with respect to armouries likely to be revised as a result of the increase in personnel for the army? What is the present position with respect to the possibility of an armoury for Newfoundland?

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member is asking this question on item 234 which comes under the inspection services. If he would bring up the question when the army estimates are under consideration I would then have the answer book here to see what the situation is in regard to an armoury in Newfoundland. Of course, the statement that I made the day before yesterday in connection with armouries generally would be applicable here. We have an armoury construction program. I would like to see it increased, but the construction of armouries has not been considered as much a priority item as some of the other things we had to spend the amount of money we got on, and therefore we had not been able to construct as many of them as we would like to have done.

Mr. Carter: May I conclude that there is still hope?

Mr. Harkness: As far as a specific answer to the question about an armoury in Newfoundland is concerned, if the hon. member would bring it up when we get to the army estimates I would be glad to give him the definite information.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Navy—
235. Operation and maintenance, $208,135,049.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to ask the minister a question in respect of the navy. If he will consult page 1 of his blue book, the preamble, under the heading "Royal Canadian Navy" he will see listed there four roles for the Canadian Navy in support of Canadian defence policy. This numbering is mine. The roles are: (1) maintenance of sea communications; (2) the defence of Canada against attack from the sea; (3) to contribute to the collective defence of the NATO area from attack from the sea; (4) to contribute naval forces to the United Nations as may be required. Can the minister indicate which of these four roles is the most important role of the Royal Canadian Navy?

Mr. Harkness: These roles are so interconnected that I do not think I can pick out one and say it is the most important. As I think is quite clear, they are not set out 1, 2, 3, 4, as the hon. member has just put them; they are put in as a sentence. As I say they are pretty closely interconnected. Therefore, I do not think you can pick out one and say it is the most important role.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister care to tell the committee what in his opinion is the principal threat against which the Canadian navy is to operate?

Mr. Harkness: Of course, the principal threat is the submarine threat and, as is indicated here—it has been indicated on numerous other occasions—our navy is basically an anti-submarine navy consisting principally of destroyer escorts and frigates. The destroyer escorts particularly are specialized anti-submarine ships. The carrier and the tracker aircraft and the interceptor aircraft that it carries really for protection from the air, and the helicopters which are now being added to the destroyer escorts—the whole thing is designed to be a well co-ordinated anti-submarine force. It also, of course, has a capability for general sea warfare.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Hellyer: As the minister knows, the Russians are reported now to be producing atomic powered submarines, and concentrating on the production of atomic powered submarines from which nuclear missiles would be launched. Presumably, in an attack against the North American continent the Rusians would use their present supply, or the supply existing at that time, of nuclear powered missile launching submarines. If the minister is concerned about protecting the deterrent as well as providing such protection as he can to the Canadian civilian population, what provision is he making through the Canadian navy to cope with the threat from the atomic powered nuclear submarine?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as I have just indicated, the navy is essentially an anti-submarine navy. It is designed to be able to hunt out and destroy enemy submarines. Part of the strategy at the present time is to do that as far away from the coasts of North America as possible. The fact that nuclear submarines may be in possession of the Russians as they are in the possession of the United States and that these nuclear submarines are faster is precisely the reason why we are equipping the destroyer escorts with helicopters. We are doing so in order that they will have the capability of tracking, and discovering and finding these submarines and destroying them at a considerable distance from the destroyer escort from which the helicopter operates and also at a considerable distance from our coasts.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister contending that Canadian destroyer escorts with helicopters would be capable of seeking out and destroying nuclear-powered submarines at some distance from our shores in either the Atlantic or Pacific oceans?

Mr. Harkness: The answer is certainly yes. That is the basic purpose of the destroyer escort, particularly equipped, as I say, with a helicopter.

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps the minister will let me make this comment. Here again I think that we are left in a most unfortunate position. The minister has stated, and he has been very careful with his language, that that is the purpose. We all know that is the purpose of the destroyer escort. We know that is the purpose of an anti-submarine force, but the minister did not say that we have that capability and he knows that we have not. What is more, the minister knows that we are not getting that capability.

Let me say for the minister's benefit that I have seen an atomic submarine in action and it can swim circles around our destroyer escorts or anything like them. The minister knows this, and these submarines cannot be detected and destroyed with the type of naval vessel that we have. What is the minister contemplating that will cope with this threat? Is he contemplating the construction of anti-nuclear submarine submarines or anything of that nature with the speed, range and capacity to be able to deal with that type of threat?

Mr. Harkness: All I am saying is that our competent naval officers inform me that the sort of statement the hon. member has just made is completely erroneous, that our anti-submarine vessels, particularly when they are completely equipped with helicopters using sonobuoys and so on, have the capability of destroying submarines at any time. Certainly you are not going to destroy every submarine. It was not done during the last war and it was not done during the first war. However, a very considerable number of submarines were destroyed in both of those wars and the submarine threat was eventually beaten.

There is also no question that the faster the submarine the more difficult it is to detect and thus to destroy, but nevertheless we have a very considerable capacity to destroy submarines at any time. Therefore I deplore the hon. member stating as though it were a definite fact that we have no such capacity. He has no means of knowing that. What he is really doing is making such statements in direct contradiction of the opinions of all those people who have devoted their lives to naval service, not only the senior naval officers in our service but in the British, United States and other navies.

Mr. Pitman: I should like to follow up the comments of the hon. member for Trinity because I think it is the duty of hon. members in spite of the opinions of the experts to find out as much as we can about the defence of the people whom we represent. I think we are getting right down to the bottom of this whole thing right now as to just exactly what the value of our defence is.

The minister said yesterday afternoon that the enemy can have enough power to blow up the whole world but as long as they cannot deliver this power we seem to be fairly safe. I think that is a very good point but there seems to be quite a difference of opinion as to just what the capability of the enemy is. Perhaps we can assume that the enemy is only going to start a limited nuclear war and will only use a few submarines, a few I.C.B.M.'s and so on, but I think this is a fantastic concept and that the war will be an all-out one from the very beginning. Surely common sense would lead to this conclusion. Certainly a submarine war would be the most potent method having in mind their mobility and so on. I would hope that we would realize the danger of the situation. I do not think we are deploring the opinions of the experts or in any way trying to bring strategic concepts into question. If the strategic concepts of the government hold water then we have no criticism; but I wonder.

We understand, for example, that the Russians have 500 submarines. I was very happy to hear the minister say that the major role of our navy is anti-submarine activity, but do we have in mind dealing with submarines that are out to sink shipping or is it a case of dealing with submarines the purpose of which is to strike at our cities, each submarine having far more power than all the bombs dropped in the last war?

In the blue book it is stated that we are responsible for the collective defence of the NATO area. That is a very large area involving the Atlantic, the Pacific, the North sea, the Mediterranean and so on. Can the minister tell us what particular areas Canada is responsible for and can he possibly tell us how many submarines might be likely to move into this area on the basis of the studies that are being made by the experts?

The minister said that the Russian power to deliver is limited. Everything is limited. Nothing is unlimited, but to what extent is their power to deliver limited? How many of the submarines moving into the areas for which our navy is responsible would actually be nuclear submarines? We cannot tell, of course, which are and which are not. What is the speed of the aircraft carrier, the destroyer escorts and frigates which are being equipped for anti-submarine activity? What are the detection capabilities? I think the Canadian people should know to what extent they are paying for defence, or to what extent they are simply paying for activities which will show that the government is doing something in the naval field but which activities are not really very important.

I should like to remind hon. members that we are not trying in any way to add to the terrorizing effect of the U.S.S.R., as the minister seemed to suggest. Before the last war Churchill was accused of trying to terrorize the British people when over a period of four or five years he was merely trying to put before them the realities of the situation in Europe which he felt had to be met. I think the Canadian people should know what the reality is on the basis of the knowledge that is available to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister answer any of my questions?

Mr. Harkness: I think that I had better explain first of all that the defence of the north Atlantic comes under SACLANT, the supreme allied commander Atlantic, who occupies the same sort of position as General Norstad does in SACEUR so far as NATO defence of the European land area is concerned. In the event of war he would have under his command not only the Canadian Atlantic fleet but also the United States and British Atlantic fleets, all of the other NATO naval forces in the north Atlantic. To begin with, he would dispose of all those naval forces in such a way as to form an anti-submarine screen. The purpose of the screen would be to try to destroy Russian submarines trying to get through the comparatively narrow waters leading from the Arctic ocean and between Iceland and Norway and also to prevent them from getting out of the Baltic. The purpose would be to contain as many as possible in those areas and also, of course, to destroy any that were already loose in or that got through into the Atlantic. In other words, the first function of the north Atlantic naval forces would be to destroy as many enemy submarines as possible and to keep them as far away as possible from the shores of the NATO countries. Subsequently, it may well be that Canadian naval forces would be employed in the convoying of merchant vessels in order to attempt to defend them from possible attack by submarines. I do not know whether or not this answers the question of the hon. gentleman, but broadly speaking that is the concept.

Mr. Pitman: The situation is even more serious than I suspected, Mr. Chairman. You are assuming that the Russians, if they start a war, will have all their submarines in the Baltic and the Arctic and would not have them deployed throughout the world. It appears that there is no particular duty for the Canadian navy except to act as convoy for ships. This is not facing up to the reality of the situation in which Canada would be placed if war came. The minister said himself this afternoon that the Russians would not likely engage in a limited war, and there was no sense talking about giving the forces non-nuclear weapons because there would be an all-out nuclear war.

What we are doing in connection with naval defence there has no relationship whatever to what the minister said this afternoon about the kind of war which every military expert I have read suggests is going to take place. It will be a war which will take place in 30 minutes and the destruction will be so fantastic that I doubt very much whether there will be any convoying of troops from one place to another afterwards.

[Mr. Pitman.]

Mr. Harkness: I think the hon. gentleman completely misapprehended the remarks I made. I said the first purpose of the North Atlantic naval forces would be to destroy Russian submarines and to contain them in their home ports in so far as possible. I said that one of the purposes would be to hunt out and destroy Russian submarines that may be loose in the Atlantic. Now, this is so far as the Atlantic is concerned. Then I said that subsequently maybe Canadian naval forces might be used in convoy work. This would only come later if a protracted struggle developed. This may not happen at all. In any event the primary purpose, and I should like to emphasize this, is to hunt out and destroy enemy submarines.

This applies also, of course, to the Pacific coast. On that coast this is a matter for co-operation between the United States Pacific naval forces and the Canadian naval forces. In the Atlantic area, the war plans are made by the supreme allied commander, Atlantic. He has specified the forces he would like from Canada and there are defence plans drawn up as to how those forces would be employed. I am not, of course, at liberty to state what those plans are.

Mr. Hellyer: I agree with the hon. member for Peterborough that we are carrying on here with this air of unreality which has seemed to weave in and out of the minister's remarks during the last two days. The minister deplores any statement which is made from this side of the house which is not in agreement with the statements he makes. However, this afternoon we had an example in clear terms of the fact this committee cannot rely on the information given to it by the minister. He said, in effect, you must not challenge the word of senior naval officers. I have here some opinions from a senior naval officer which are not in accordance with what the minister said. Now obviously, there is a difference of opinion.

This is what he says:

> The only concession to reality is the mention of the anti-missile defence exercise on page 6—

That is in the blue book.

> —when U.S. submarines, presumably playing the role of missile-firing "enemy" submarines, provided "realistic and elusive targets". I'll bet they were elusive. Our naval forces today are not designed to deal with these sorts of things at all unless the "enemy" submarine purposely presents himself for sacrifice as a part of the war "game" just to make the "friendly forces" feel better. And this is often done for political purposes.

Mr. Speakman: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman to identify the article from which he is reading.

Mr. Hellyer: I will identify it as soon as I am finished.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think this is good enough. When an hon. member is asked to identify what he is reading from, I think under the rules he is required to do that and not say he will do so after he has finished.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not know, Mr. Chairman. I have been in the house when the other procedure was followed and, when a document was read it had to be tabled at the end, or the source had to be given. Whichever way you rule, Mr. Chairman, I shall comply; it makes no difference to me.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I suggest, not having had the opportunity of surveying the specific rulings on the matter, that it would be logical, if the hon. member were asked a question concerning the source of the material, that the committee be given the information at that time. I do not think this is a real point of dispute, is it?

Mr. Hellyer: Not with me, it is not. The author is Captain David Groos, and he goes on to say—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: Do not turn up your nose at one of the brightest young naval officers this country has produced in quite a while.

An hon. Member: He cannot be very bright or he would not have been in the Liberal party.

Mr. Hellyer: I continue the quotation:

> The entire scheme of things is to my mind quite unrealistic and don't think the men in the Canadian navy don't think so too. They are, however, bound hand and foot to this concept agreed to by the government some years ago...when it was still valid...and somehow never changed since to meet the conditions of today.
>
> As long as our navy is obliged to play this "head in the sand" game and obliged to provide forces to deal with this out of date concept, I suppose there is little wrong with the way they propose to spend our defence dollars this year... it will provide work for our shipyards and it will fill the pay envelopes of our sailors and shipbuilders. But don't let us be fooled into thinking it will provide us with any maritime defence. It won't.

Later on, he says:

> Is it a valid concept in the present age? Of course not. We must come up with a "new look" in operational forces to deal with the new but very real threat from missile launching nuclear submarines. These are the real threat to this country and we must get the government to admit it. In these new forces Canadian nuclear-driven submarines designed to seek out and destroy other submarines, especially these missile-launching submarines, will undoubtedly play a major role. They are well known to be far and away the best, in fact they are the only effective type of anti-submarine vessel there is and they can be built in Canada in Canadian shipyards by Canadian workers.

This is not an isolated opinion.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member has identified the author, but he did not give us the title of the document or the date of its production.

Mr. Hellyer: It is some notes on defence estimates by Captain David Groos, and I will give them to the minister or table them if that is desired.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I wonder if the hon. member could tell us whether or not this was the speech made while Captain Groos was a candidate in the Esquimalt-Saanich by-election?

Mr. Hellyer: The answer to that question is no. This is a responsible statement by an interested Canadian citizen trying to make a contribution to national affairs, and a very real contribution. This article points out in clear terms that in respect of naval policy, as in respect of most of its policies, this government has no conception whatever of what is going on in the world of military technology today. The minister told us earlier in the debate that two or three years lead time is required in the development of nuclear vehicles. During a recent trip to the United States in discussion with naval officers there, they indicated that, in their opinion, the only possible way that nuclear submarines could be dealt with would be by an atomic device. I should like to know if the minister concurs with this opinion or whether he does not. If he does, has he any plans to obtain atomic devices for the navy? If not, does he contemplate giving the matter any study because, as the minister can well appreciate, by the time he adds two or three years lead time to the end of his survey, any potential all-out war might be over.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to deal with several of the comments that were made. I will deal with the last one first. There has been a good deal of study given to this matter. In fact, the means of killing submarines is one of the most intensive and continuing studies carried on by the navy. There is no question that the use of a reasonably small yield nuclear weapon would be more effective in destroying a submarine than would a conventional bomb or torpedo. I think there is no question about that fact because you get a much bigger explosion. However, there are plenty of conventional bombs and torpedoes which are also effective in destroying submarines. As to the matter that he mentioned first, namely some notes by Captain Groos, with regard to opinions as to strategy I would merely say this. I prefer to take the advice of the senior serving officers in the Canadian navy, the British navy and the United States navy rather than the opinions of a retired naval officer who has just recently been standing as a Liberal candidate in a by-election and whose opinions on this matter might therefore be looked upon as being somewhat biased, having regard to the fact that they were supplied to the hon. member for use in this debate.

Mr. Hellyer: All I can say is that the minister's policy in respect of preferring the advice of serving officers over that of recently retired officers must have changed in the last three years or so. He used to take quite a different attitude. I can assure him that there is no bias whatever in the argument presented by Captain Groos. This was put forward in all sincerity in order to help bring to the attention of the nation the head-in-sand attitude of the minister in the hope that at some time in the not too distant future he will pull it out.

Mr. Pitman: I think we are living in some kind of fairyland here. It just does not seem to me that the kind of war that is going to be carried on, if one takes place has come to the realization of this government. It would seem we are being told that it is going to be a much different kind of war than any in the past. Everywhere I look, in the magazines and in the latest books, it seems to be indicated that it is going to be a nuclear war and an all out war.

Mr. Grafftey: Show us your crystal ball.

Mr. Pitman: The minister says, and probably quite rightly, that our naval forces are involved in SACLANT and so on. We are dealing with the estimates of our naval forces. We have not yet found out where those naval forces might be deployed, to what extent they can handle this area, or to what extent they can actually defend Canadian shores. In other words, we cannot find out and give the information to the Canadian people. I am sorry but I do not think I can go back to my constituency and say that the naval experts say thus and thus but that our Minister of National Defence simply says this is what he believes or this is what the naval experts believe. I want to hear on the floor of this House of Commons the extent to which this defence is actually possible. I asked the question as to the area our navy can be expected to look after in such a nuclear war and I have been told that they will be deployed in a certain area. The minister did not say that for security reasons this could not be stated. He has not said that the number of our submarines could not be stated.

[Mr. Harkness.]

I should like to know to what extent these ships have detection capable of picking up these submarines. It seems to me there are a great many questions which I should like the Canadian people to have answered. If there is no defence we have got to start working somewhere else. Perhaps this will affect our emergency measures organization too. I think it is an extremely disconcerting aspect of the whole picture.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think the hon. member took in what I said a short time ago. The defence on the north Atlantic is a combined fleet of the NATO countries which have NATO forces bordering on the north Atlantic. All the naval forces of all of these NATO countries in the event of war come under the command of the supreme allied commander, Atlantic. It is then up to him to deploy those forces in the places where the Russian submarines are found to be. You cannot say that the Canadian navy is going to be used from point A to point B and point C and point D. It may be used any place on the north Atlantic where needed to hunt down and destroy enemy submarines. The same thing applies as far as the Pacific fleet is concerned. As I said, in the event of war it is a combined command between the United States and Canada. Also the naval forces of the United States and Canada in the Pacific would be used as one co-ordinated weapon to destroy enemy submarines and to protect the sea lanes leading in there.

I think that statement is clear enough and I think the hon. member's constituents will be able to understand it quite readily. In the case of ships you do not say that they will work in this particular area and this particular area only. Under modern conditions, the whole concept of naval defence is to have a co-ordinated command which will employ all of the naval resources available in the whole North Atlantic in the place where they are most needed at that particular time. The same thing applies as far as the Pacific forces are concerned. We had the same thing, of course, during the second world war. Canadian naval vessels were employed in all sorts of places throughout the Atlantic ocean, in the Mediterranean and so on.

Mr. Pitman: I wish to remind the minister that it took five years to destroy the submarine menace in the second world war. The German submarines nearly brought Britain to her knees at that time. If an attack took place tomorrow, how long would it take before Canadian ships could occupy the areas they are expected to defend as part of this whole over-all strategy in SACLANT?

Mr. Harkness: The best answer to that question I think is this. Except for the limited number that happen to be in dock refitting at any particular time, our ships are in a state of immediate readiness. At practically all times some of them are at sea. They are therefore available immediately to counter enemy submarines. This is one of the reasons why we are increasing the complement up to full strength, from an average of 86 per cent to 100 per cent. We are doing this so that they will be capable of going out and maintaining patrols for long periods. With 85 per cent manning they are able to go out and manage full operational duties for a few days but you have not enough men to keep them on three hour shifts. They therefore have to work overtime, as you might say, and they eventually become tired. That is the reason why we are increasing the complement up to full strength. We are doing that in order to enable them to operate over long periods of time at full efficiency.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister has said that most of the Canadian navy is assigned to SACLANT.

Mr. Harkness: I did not say that, Mr. Chairman. I said the Atlantic forces are assigned to SACLANT in the event of war and come under his command.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister says the Atlantic forces are assigned to SACLANT in the event of war. He gives the impression that, because they are part of the whole, we do not need to concern ourselves whether they do not have a particular capacity. However, two or three questions immediately come to mind. First of all, may I say this. Surely the Canadian ships have an area of responsibility. Surely there is a function they have to perform. It is an allied command. In addition to that, one of the roles which was put in the blue book—and perhaps it should not have been in the blue book—is the second one, namely the defence of Canada against attack from the sea. The question that arises is this. Are we incapable of protecting Canada against attack from the sea? Must we rely on the ships of other nationals who are also assigned to the supreme allied command, Atlantic, to protect Canadian shores from attack? Is it necessary that the submarines our navy has to cope with should be of the oldest possible vintage, nearest the surface and close in, where they can be easily spotted? I think the minister should give us some more assurance about this, because from what he has said so far I must agree with my hon. friend that there is a terrific air of unreality about this whole thing. We have no feeling of comfort whatsoever that our ships could find, let alone destroy, even the present, let alone future submarines.

Surely if the minister is going to be consistent at all—and perhaps he is not going to be, which would not be too surprising—he should concern himself with the reality of attack from the sea just as he told the committee he is concerned with the reality of attack by air.

May we please have a further explanation from the minister as to just how we are going to cope with an attack from the sea, and how Canada can play an effective role under the supreme commander of the Atlantic, when our ships are not capable of performing some of those functions they would be called upon to carry out if they were assigned a specific task?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the unreality which the hon. gentleman speaks about exists in his own mind rather than in the mind of the Department of National Defence or in the mind of the navy. He is engaging here again in what seems to be the general activity of trying to run down the defence forces of this country by saying they are obsolete, their equipment is no good and they cannot do their job.

He has been doing this regularly. This is his stock-in-trade. Once more I can only say that I deplore an attack of this kind, particularly when it has been pointed out to the hon. member on numerous occasions that the allegations he is making are completely incorrect.

As far as our Atlantic fleet is concerned, as I have already stated, in the event of war it comes under the command of SACLANT and is used in accordance with his orders anywhere in the Atlantic where it can best be used and for which he is responsible.

At the present time, of course, one of the sub-commands in SACLANT is the commander, Canadian Atlantic sub-area. Our admiral at Halifax is the commander of that sub-area. He is responsible for the command and the defence of that area. In the event of enemy forces being in there, forces might be sent by Great Britain, the United States or other NATO people. He would take command of them and would carry on the operations.

In peacetime there is a considerable area off our coasts which the Canadian navy keeps under surveillance. It does this by means of its tracker aircraft and its various ships, and also with the maritime command of the R.C.A.F., which is constantly flying various routes over those waters in order to detect any submarine or other activity of that kind.

This is the way the operation is carried on in peacetime. As I say, in wartime you have a unified command and all the naval forces of the NATO alliance in the North Atlantic would be used to the best advantage as one striking force.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the minister has said I am trying to run down the Canadian forces. That, of course, is not true. First of all, to distinguish between the forces and the equipment, I think the Canadian forces are of the finest in the world, but I think they are handicapped by having some of the most obsolete equipment.

The hon. member for Peterborough and myself are trying, like Winston Churchill did in the late 1930's, to shake a complacent government out of its complacency. We are trying to get it to admit the facts of the world about it, and that is a most difficult task apparently.

I wonder whether the minister would indicate to the committee when the first keel of the destroyer escorts was laid, and would he also indicate how many are still under construction.

Mr. Harkness: First of all I wish to state in the most definite terms that our destroyer escorts are considered, not only by our own naval authorities but by those of other countries, as the most modern and up-to-date destroyer escorts possessed by any navy. The number under construction at the present time is six. They are of the latest class. The first of the modern destroyer escorts, the St. Laurent, was commissioned in October, 1955.

Mr. Churchill: When the hon. member for Trinity was associate minister of national defence.

An hon. Member: No, not then.

Mr. Hellyer: Not then. I wonder whether the minister would indicate to the committee why, in view of the tremendous technological changes which have since taken place, and more particularly the fact that since then the first atomic submarines and the first atomic missiles carried by submarines have been put into operational use, he continues to build destroyer escorts which were then incomparable and which may still be the best destroyer escorts in their class, but which today are no match for the potential enemy. That is the point we are trying to get across to the minister. We would like the minister to tell us what plans he has to meet the threat of the future?

Mr. Harkness: The destroyer escorts which have been built have been subsequently improved. Improvements have been added to them constantly and their anti-submarine capability has been constantly improved, particularly through the development of the variable depth sonar, which is an invention of the Canadian defence research people.

We are now commencing to modify the existing destroyer escorts so they can carry a helicopter each, in order to greatly extend their range of operations, and thus their ability to both detect and destroy enemy submarines.

The hon. member seems to have the naive idea that if conditions change a bit, immediately you must scrap everything you have. This is the general line he was following last year—scrap this, scrap that, scrap the other and get a complete new line of equipment. You just cannot do that, particularly as far as naval vessels are concerned. The construction of a naval vessel is a long business. The design particularly, of a new naval vessel is a long business. As I have said, our destroyer escorts are as good as any that exist in any navy in the world. I do not know how the hon. member can expect us to do better than that.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the minister has just underlined the problem. He has said that the designing of a naval vessel is a long business and that the construction of a naval vessel is a long business.

Is the minister telling the committee, in conclusion, so we will understand his position very clearly, that he has no plans for more modern ships than those presently under construction, and that he has no plans for the introduction of atomic weapons into the Royal Canadian Navy? Is that the present position of the minister and of the department?

Mr. Harkness: We have all kinds of plans. There are no plans which have been definitely decided upon, approved and funded which I can announce at this time. The navy has a very considerable number of plans for ships of different kinds and a naval construction program upon which they would like to embark. There are quite a number of variations of their projected naval construction program, but I am not in a position to announce any of these at this time because they have not been definitely approved and there has been no arrangement made as yet with regard to their financing.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 235 carry?

Mr. Hellyer: Before the vote carries, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister can say what the cost will be in respect of the tanker supply vessel for the current year, and when this tanker will be commissioned and ready for service?

Mr. Harkness: The total cash requirement for this tanker supply ship this year is $5 million.

Mr. Pitman: Before this vote carries I should like the minister to clarify this subject further. We have some 40 anti-submarine vessels. Can we really convince the Canadian people that if the U.S.S.R. should decide to attack Canada these vessels which are the sole defence of the Canadian area would have any hope whatsoever of destroying nuclear submarines armed with nuclear weapons? Can the minister give the Canadian people any indication or hope whatsoever that this naval contingent for which, as the hon. member for Trinity has said, we have nothing but the greatest respect, is equal to such a task? I think we should stand before the Canadian people and tell them just what the stakes are—not to give them a sense of insecurity but to show them where we stand in terms of modern warfare. Can the minister give us any indication that the Canadian navy as it is today could act capably and efficiently in dealing with nuclear submarines in such numbers as would likely be in Canadian waters or in the areas for which we shall be responsible? Would our forces be able to make any impact upon them whatsoever in the first few hours of attack in the kind of war which would take place in 1961?

Mr. Harkness: I have tried on several occasions already to make the situation clear to the hon. member but he seems to have the notion fixed in his mind that Canada is going to fight Russia by herself. This is not the situation. He asks whether the Canadian navy can protect Canada against Russian submarines. Well, the Canadian navy is not going to protect Canada by itself. As I have told the hon. member on three or four occasions already, the protection of Canada and of the other NATO countries will be the responsibility of the navies of all the North Atlantic treaty countries which have navies in the north Atlantic. It is a combined affair. In the same way, the R.C.A.F. is not expected to defend all of Canada by itself against the Russian attack; it is part of the continental defence of this whole continent. It is a co-ordinated defence shared by our own R.C.A.F. planes, Bomarcs, the radar lines and the forces of the United States. In the same way the sea approaches would be defended by the navies of all the North Atlantic countries. I think we have to look upon the resources of the alliance as a whole and not have it fixed in our minds, as seems to be the case with the hon. member for Peterborough, that the 43 Canadian navy vessels are going to be the sole defence of the Canadian sea approaches against a Russian submarine attack or threat.

Mr. Macdonnell: Perhaps the committee would permit a layman to make a comment on this question. As I listened to the discussion it seemed to me that what we have here is the minister trying to deal with a real situation—with the facts as they are—while the hon. member for Peterborough—I say this with deference—appears to be talking as if this was merely a war game or, to change the figure, a game of chess. It seems to me there is an unreality about what he is saying and that the minister is striving again and again to reintroduce reality into the discussion as against the war game approach where you can get all the facts and calculate what this unit is going to do or what that unit is going to do.

Mr. Hellyer: With the greatest respect to the hon. gentleman, may I say that if there is an air of unreality here it is not present on this side of the chamber. This is not a game of chess. This may become a game of life or death, yet we are talking about coping with 20 year old submarines. The submarine we got up from the United States so that our chasers would have something real to chase is a vessel that they had kept in mothballs. It is not reality to chase a submarine which has been kept in mothballs and which no one in his right mind would send out to sea in the event of war. That is not reality. It is putting the clock back at the very time when we should be projecting our imagination into the future. It is the hon. gentleman himself who is turning the clock back. I know he has many fine reminiscences of days gone by and he is entitled to them, but the time has come when men in responsible positions have to cease looking to the past. They have to look ahead and use imagination concerning the situation they will have to face in the future. That is what the minister has not done up to the present time, and I urge the hon. member for Greenwood to join with those of us who suggest that the minister should bring himself up to date and stop playing chess with mothball submarines and second world war equipment. He should project himself into the future so as to be aware of the real situation, not of make-believe situations.

May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Harkness: Just before you call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say briefly that the hon. member has misunderstood the hon. member for Greenwood just as he misunderstands nearly everything. The point is that most submarines at the present time are, as it happens, of conventional type. Moreover, the Canadian navy gets practice with nuclear powered submarines in practically all of the exercises in which it is engaged. Therefore the general idea which the hon. member is trying to put over, namely that the navy is playing with 20 year old submarines and does not know about anything else has no validity in fact.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish to make a brief interjection. This afternoon the hon. member for Kootenay West raised certain questions with regard to General Heusinger and at that time I said I thought the matter deserved further inquiry. I have made further inquiry and I wish to withdraw my request. I wish to give a brief explanation.

Hon. members will recall that the Associate Minister of National Defence referred to General Heusinger's record and said that he had never been a member of the Nazi party. He also referred to the fact that he had been one of the people suspected on July 20, 1944; of an attempt on Hitler's life that he had been arrested and escaped from his jail before he was sentenced to death.

I wish also to say that since this afternoon I have made further inquiries through the Department of External Affairs, with the following results: General Heusinger is a professional soldier of long standing, having joined the German army in 1915. In 1950, while Germany was still an occupied country, he was selected by Chancellor Adenauer to reorganize the German defence forces. Since West Germany did not regain a full measure of independence until 1954, the appointment of General Heusinger to this important post in 1950 indicates clearly that he enjoyed the confidence of the United States, the United Kingdom and French governments, which at that time had the status of occupying powers. In these circumstances I think we may accept the endorsation of those countries, and for my part I am ready to withdraw my request this afternoon that the matter be further inquired into.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, a question was asked to which I said I would give an answer. It had to do with the combined number of personnel on the staff of the associate minister and of myself, and what the number was in the previous administration. In 1956, the number on the two staffs, the associate minister's staff and the minister's staff was 42. On March 1, 1961 the number was 32, ten fewer.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister bring us up to date in respect of the helicopter program for the navy which is referred to in this year's blue book. Will he indicate the number of helicopters in service at the present time and when he expects the remainder of the requirement to be available?

Mr. Harkness: The number of anti-submarine helicopters held by the navy was, front line helicopters, six; reserve helicopters, two. One of these just recently was lost in aiding in the Newfoundland fires. In addition to that they have some other helicopters, four Bells and three Vertols.

As to the time that the other anti-submarine helicopters are expected, they expect that it will be something in the neighbourhood of a year before we will be getting delivery, which will be before it will be possible to install the helicopter landing platforms on the destroyer escorts.

Mr. Hellyer: I presume those helicopters are not the same type as the reconnaissance helicopters which are the army's requirements.

Mr. Harkness: No; they are a much bigger helicopter than that.

Mr. Hellyer: Then, the minister has given up on the possibility of standardization, which was the reason given by his predecessor for the delay in placing orders.

Mr. Harkness: Well, we have attained standardization on the light helicopters now for all three services. However, this type of helicopter for anti-submarine work is a specialized one on which it is not possible to standardize with the other two services.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister indicate when the last deliveries of the CS2F Tracker were made?

Mr. Harkness: October, 1960.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minsiter indicate what the $4 million for aircraft in this year's estimates represents?

Mr. Harkness: The breakdown is as follows: for tracker aircraft, spares and modification, $800,000, anti-submarine helicopters, $3 million, light helicopters, $155,000, delivery charges and taxes, $55,000, which makes a total of $4,010,000.

Mr. Hellyer: What taxes?

Mr. Harkness: The ordinary sales taxes that are charged on all equipment of this type, as I think the hon. member knows or should know, and which are paid by the department on its purchases.

Mr. Hellyer: In the 1961 blue book it is indicated that the Banshee aircraft can be operated until the end of 1962 at which time the airframe reaches the end of its life. Will the minister indicate whether he has yet reached a decision with regard to a possible replacement?

Mr. Harkness: There has been no definite decision on that. We have been planning on a ship-to-air missile but the exact kind has not yet been decided upon.

Mr. Hellyer: In view of the difficulty posed by the long lead times outlined to the committee on several occasions by the minister can the minister indicate approximately when a decision will be taken with respect to this ship-to-air missile?

Mr. Harkness: No, I am not in a position to do that.

Mr. Hellyer: I have received a complaint from H.M.C.S. Cornwallis with regard to working conditions in the laundry room and the wardroom. Has the minister received any complaints recently as to working conditions there, particularly with respect to weekend overtime and the difficult and unsatisfactory working conditions generally?

Mr. Harkness: I have not had any complaints along that line that I can recall. The associate minister, with whom I have checked, does not recall having received any either, nor does the deputy minister or naval headquarters.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister or associate minister undertake to check into the situation to see if the complaints are justified?

Mr. Sevigny: I will attend to this matter.

Mr. Hellyer: I have one final question. Would the minister indicate the final disposition of the Shannon park property? I presume that Mr. Dwyer has a paper ready on that for you.

Mr. Harkness: The Shannon park property is one on which the bulk of the married quarters for naval personnel in the Halifax area is situated. There is no idea of disposing of it. There is a plan for the construction by an entrepreneur of more housing there and if the plan goes ahead he will rent the houses so constructed to married personnel of the navy. There is also a projected plan to put a shopping centre there.

Mr. Hellyer: It was the shopping centre I was referring to specifically. As the minister may recall, the shopping centre land was sold to a private entrepreneur without tenders having been called and I understand that the enterpreneur later went into receivership. A question was raised whether the crown had protected itself, whether the land again became the property of the crown or what was the ultimate disposition, whether or not the shopping centre has in the meantime been constructed and, if so, by whom?

Mr. Harkness: I understand this project was transferred from the original man to a second one. He has now completed part of the shopping centre and the remainder is under construction.

Mr. Hellyer: There is one further reassurance we would like from the minister. Is he satisfied with the progress of the shopping centre? Is it meeting the purpose for which the land was sold and filling the function which persuaded the crown to give up the land without calling for tenders in the first place?

Mr. Harkness: I am informed that the project has not gone ahead as rapidly as had been hoped would be the case, but it is now proceeding reasonably satisfactorily and it is expected that it will perform the function which was envisaged for it.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): If the project involving construction of houses by the entrepreneur materializes, what is going to be the length of the leases?

Mr. Harkness: As far as the individuals who will occupy these houses are concerned, they will occupy them on the same basis that such personnel occupy ordinary married quarters and thus will have no lease with the entrepreneur who constructs them. As far as the department is concerned, we have a lease or form of guarantee extending to 40 years occupancy.

Mr. Morris: May I ask the minister when the Department of National Defence first proposed the use of land at Shannon park for purposes of a shopping centre, and were public tenders called at that time?

Mr. Harkness: I do not have that information immediately available. I will send for it and give it to the hon. member later.

Mr. Morris: Is the minister under the impression that it was about 1955 and is it not a fact that there were no offers received at that time?

Mr. Harkness: We are not sure about the matter. I think we will have to check the information and give it to the hon. member later. I am informed that there were no offers.

Mr. Morris: Is it not so that the land when transferred recently to the new proprietorship was an entailed sale, that is, it was sold on the clear understanding that a shopping centre would be built there?

Mr. Harkness: That is correct.

Mr. Hellyer: Just to set the record straight, I am sure the parliamentary secretary is aware that the first time it was offered for sale there were conditions attached. In fact, it was a lease arrangement, while when it was sold the second time there were no strings attached except the building of a shopping centre and apparently there was no protection for the crown. Consequently there was trouble when the receivership took place.

Mr. Morris: The hon. member who has just spoken had so short a life in the defence portfolio that perhaps he did not have the opportunity to acquaint himself fully with the file.

Mr. Hellyer: You obviously have not.

Mr. Morris: When the Shannon park project was first advertised it was advertised with the object of securing someone to construct a shopping centre upon it.

Mr. Hellyer: On a lease arrangement.

Mr. Morris: If anyone had come forward it would have been sold under the same conditions.

Mr. Hellyer: Under a lease arrangement. Do not make a false statement.

Mr. Morris: On a question of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman, I have not made a false statement.

Mr. Hellyer: Just check the facts.

Item agreed to.

236. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment, $71,823,500.

Mr. Carter: I should like to ask the minister if he would explain the reduction in expenditures for armament, equipment and electronic equipment. There is also a reduction in ammunition.

Mr. Harkness: What was the first one?

Mr. Carter: Armament, electronics and ammunition.

Mr. Harkness: Well, so far as armament equipment is concerned, the programs have been continuing programs. They are broken down and the first is guns, mountings and weather-shields. There were $2,328,000 spent in 1960-61 and this year there will be $1,100,000. The thing is that it was a continuing program and this is the amount that is estimated will be required to complete the program this year. There was the Sidewinder missile and facilities in 1960-61, and there are none for this year. Torpedoes and equipment, anti-submarine mortars, mines, et cetera, and there is to be more spent for those this year than last, $1,138,500. Then, there is weapons control systems and facilities, $771,000 this year as against $1,678,000 last year. Again, this was a continuing program and less is required for it. Freight charges, customs, excise and so forth amounts to $90,500 this year as compared with $130,000 last year.

The next item was electronics. There are reductions in several places here but the biggest one is in radio communication equipment. Last year we spent $3,902,000 and this year it will be $1,935,000. There will be a somewhat smaller amount spent on Sonar equipment, about half as much, $845,000 as against $1,498,000, and for electronic equipment, power supply, navigational and internal communication equipment.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister would give us a recapitulation of the new equipment supplied to the brigade group in the last 12 or 24 months?

Mr. Harkness: We are on the navy at the present time, Mr. Chairman. This item does not come up until we get to the army.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Army—

237. Operation and maintenance, $359,572,000.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister would now give us the recapitulation of the new equipment supplied to the brigade group?

Mr. Harkness: There is quite a long list, but I will keep on reading as long as the committee can bear with it. The list occupies two and one half of these big pages. Does the hon. member want all the items read out?

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps the minister could just give us the principal ones at the start.

Mr. Harkness: These are all listed as major items which have been received in stock since the second world war. There is the FN rifle and the automatic FN rifle to replace the 303 Bren gun. There is a submachine gun, 9 millimetre; there is a 106 millimetre recoilless and anti-tank rifle and ammunition; there is the 3.2 inch Heller anti-tank rocket launcher and ammunition; there is the S.S. 10 anti-tank missile for training purposes; medium mortars, 81 millimetres, and ammunition; field artillery, 105 millimetre howitzers and ammunition; surface to surface launchers and training ammunition for them; training missiles for the Honest John. There is communication equipment, including the United Kingdom family of very high frequency sets for the brigade group in Europe. There is the five-mile V.H.F. radio sets; the C-42 wireless sets to replace the No. 19. There are the cargo trailers in the one quarter ton-three quarters ton range. Then, there is the "Rat, a Canadian developed vehicle, the Ferret scout cars, standard military pattern vehicles in the one quarter, three quarter and 2½-ton range. Partial requirements for a 5-ton cargo vehicle. There is the medium gun tank, Centurion, mark V; parachute stores and equipment; light aircraft—the L-19 for air op. flights; Bell helicopters and presently the Hiller helicopter which is now being secured, as well as two Sikorsky H-5 helicopters.

You have ammunition of various kinds. There are kits for up-gunning the Centurion tanks from 20 pounders to 105 millimetres to increase their hitting power, and associated ammunition; short range surveillance radar and counter mortar radar. Special equipment vehicle kits of all kinds; water tanks, light metal workshops, small arms repair and so on; vehicle navigational aids. Then, there is the armoured track vehicle the Bobcat which we have ordered; light reconnaissance helicopters; communications and engineering equipment of various kinds; the United Kingdom heavy ferry and heavy assault floating bridge. Then, there are various machine guns, general purpose machine guns and ammunition.

Those items are the ones that are now forecast for delivery, which have been ordered and so forth. I see these are marked "secret", so I will not go on with them. These are some of the major items of equipment which have been secured.

Mr. Hellyer: I thank the minister for the list. He went back quite far when he went back to world war II.

Mr. Harkness: I said since world war II.

Mr. Hellyer: Am I wrong in saying back to world war II? Is that different from since world war II?

Mr. Harkness: Yes; I think the implication was that it included some world war II equipment.

Mr. Hellyer: I am sure it does include some. Did I hear the minister correctly when he said that some of the 762 millimetre rocket launchers are already installed in Europe?

Mr. Harkness: No, none of them is installed in Europe as I indicated in the house when I made the announcement in connection with this matter. I think we anticipate it will be along towards the end of the year before they will be sent to Europe.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister anticipates that some will be installed this year. I thought I heard him refer to some practice rounds or something. I refer to the previous minister's remarks as found at page 7556 of 1960 Hansard where he states as follows:

> While there are no funds allocated in this year's estimates, it has also been announced that the Canadian army is to procure the Honest John launcher and associated surface-to-surface missile, the 762 mm. rocket. This weapon, too, has a nuclear capability.

Then before the defence estimates committee last year at page 330:

> We are acquiring the Honest John which is a ground to ground weapon and which, when we receive it, will be capable of firing a nuclear warhead. When we receive it next year—

That would be this year.

> —it will be capable of doing so. We are training some of our staff and some of our personnel in the uses of that weapon now. The problem in respect of storage and so forth should be solved before we receive this weapon.

My question is this. Does the minister still expect to receive them before the end of this year? If so, will the problem of storage and so forth with respect to nuclear weapons have been solved by that time?

Mr. Harkness: We have received the deliveries of these Honest John launchers. We have formed a battery to operate them—and it will be sent to Europe. We have it under training at the present time. We have secured some practice rockets for practice firing with the rocket launcher. I think that is the situation. As I said, towards the end of this year or early next year we shall have a battery in shape to send over to the brigade in Europe.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether the minister can say whether, as reported in the congressional subcommittee on defence expenditures, the 762 mm. rocket launcher is not accurate enough to use with high explosive shells?

Mr. Harkness: This is the first I have heard of anything along that line. I am informed that this statement is not correct and that the United States are developing a conventional warhead to use with this rocket launcher.

Mr. Pitman: One item in the blue book indicated that one of the duties of the Canadian army was the ground defence of the Canada-United States region. Assuming an all-out nuclear war, just exactly what is included in this term, "ground defence of the Canada-United States region"? What plans are foreseen for the Canadian army in this particular situation? It would seem to me that it is rather unbelievable that the U.S.S.R. expects to invade Canada from the Arctic in this kind of war that I am assuming. I should like an explanation of this particular item, if the minister does not mind.

Mr. Harkness: There is always the possibility of airborne landings in order to knock out particular installations, particularly some of the radar installations and things of that sort, in order really to prepare the way perhaps for a large bomber attack. There is also always the possibility of a considerable amount of sabotage and things along that line. You therefore must have troops in order to guard against these possibilities. Some of our troops are trained for airborne operations, as parachutists and as airborne troops.

Mr. Pitman: That statement is very interesting but I find it rather hard to believe that they would actually invade with paratroopers before they attacked the country with missiles. It just does not seem to hold water strategically. I find it to be part of this unreality which the hon. member for Trinity was talking about this afternoon. I just cannot see this as a rational phase of the program at all, in terms of the kind of war we seem to be hearing about.

Mr. Harkness: As I explained to the hon. member, the possibility of attempting to seize certain installations and thus to disrupt the general defences of the continent is something which is quite likely to be attempted. If there were no defence against it and if there were no troops that were able to counter it, it is something that would then probably happen.

Miss LaMarsh: The minister mentioned that the brigade group was being supplied with some of the automatic FN rifles. I recently heard a report that these rifles are being withdrawn by virtue of the fact that an error has been made by Canadian Arsenals and in order that they may have the breech blocks modified. I wonder whether the minister can make any statement with respect to the alleged cost of more than $1 million in withdrawing these rifles in order to have modifications made.

Mr. Harkness: The situation is that a modification is being made to the FN rifles owing to the fact that the ammunition made in some of the NATO countries and which we may have to use has a primer which does not work properly as it is pierced to too great an extent by the Canadian FN rifle. With the ammunition made in Canada there has been no difficulty whatever. However, with a very occasional round of ammunition from some of the other NATO countries there has been difficulty in that there has been a bit of a blow-back. Nobody has ever been seriously injured by this blow-back but there is the possibility that a man might lose an eye if this happened. Consequently we are modifying all these rifles in order to ensure that any country's ammunition of this calibre can be safely fired in it.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Miss LaMarsh: Can the minister assure the committee that the modifications now required are not the result of certain modifications made at Canadian Arsenals to the Belgian designed rifle, and were not made by any of the other NATO countries which accepted and took into use this rifle?

Mr. Harkness: As far as I recall the matter, although I have not been able to get the specific information here, the Canadian manufactured rifles were made with a slightly heavier barrel in order to give a longer life and a longer range. As I say, the Canadian ammunition has never caused any trouble whatever but some of the European ammunition very occasionally has resulted in a bit of blow-back, as I stated.

Miss LaMarsh: Can the minister inform the committee what the estimated cost per rifle is for the modification?

Mr. Harkness: I cannot break down what the cost is for this particular modification. Some other modifications are being made at the same time that the rifles are going in for this particular modification. They are really what you might call normal improvements and also include the replacement of damaged or worn out parts and a general clean-up of the weapon. The cost for the whole thing will run to approximately $16 per rifle.

Miss LaMarsh: I have one other question, Is it correct that the army has directed that the FN rifle be used with a weaker cartridge than that originally designed for it because of the fact that there is a gas leak around the breech block?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman. As I indicated before, we have restricted the use of certain lots of ammunition which did not prove to work completely in all cases, in order to ensure there would be no danger to any of the personnel using it through blow-back.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, I should like to continue the questioning on the FN rifle. Could the minister please tell the committee when the last competition for the Hamilton Galt trophy took place, and how the scores compared since the Lee-Enfield rifle has been out of use during the last few years?

Mr. Harkness: I have not that information here. I will have to send for it and give it to the hon. member later.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, on Thursday, September 7, the Prime Minister told us that the government, after consultation with allied governments in NATO, has come to the conclusion that certain measures should be taken to strengthen Canada's preparedness for defence both at home and overseas.

I refer to a booklet called "The Record Speaks". On the cover there is this passage:

> The government of Prime Minister John Diefenbaker has accomplished more for the ordinary man and woman of Canada than any government in our history.

There is a very appealing chapter entitled "National Defence and Defence Production" over the signature of Hon. George Pearkes, former minister of national defence. The first sentence reads as follows:

> Despite increased costs for new equipment in a new age, Canada is spending less dollars on defence. In 1960-1961 defence expenditures are down 10 per cent from 1956-1957, the last year under the Liberals.

I do not wish to introduce a partisan note in this debate—

Mr. Grafftey: But you are going to anyway.

Mr. Matheson: —but I am concerned about what appears to be a drop of approximately $145 million on over-all defence expenditures, if I read the estimates correctly, from the year 1956-57 to which Hon. George Pearkes referred. In particular I am interested in, not the equipment of the army but the personnel of the army.

There is one thing in which I think this committee is very interested. That is the Canadian services colleges. I am referring to an article written in the Royal Military College review of 1959 by the director of studies, Colonel W. R. Sawyer, who writes as follows:

> When the college was reopened after the war, strong emphasis was put on the principle that the level of instruction should be equal to that of the universities. The minister of national defence, the Hon. Brooke Claxton, stressed this in his address at the official opening ceremonies on September 20, 1948:

Colonel Sawyer goes on to say in his article:

> We have steadily held to the view that these qualities can be developed best by study of the three traditional branches of learning—the humanities, the social sciences, the physical sciences.

I think there is reference to the fact that the Royal Military College is the only military institution in the commonwealth which is degree-conferring. I have occasion from time to time to be in Kingston at a sister institution and I can speak most enthusiastically about what we see and hear of Royal Military College.

I think great heart has been given to people who care about our military affairs by the strong leadership in that school and the level of teaching that has prevailed. I know that the Hon. Ralph Campney has been extremely interested in the Royal Military College and I know that General Pearkes maintains a close interest. We rejoice in the appointment of Brigadier W. A. B. Anderson, with his superlative background, the most honoured graduate of his year in R.M.C., a graduate of Queen's University with service in the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery. He has graduate training from nearly every important staff college in the world and has given our institution great dignity and strength.

We know, too, that Colonel Sawyer, with his almost 100 highly qualified teachers, nearly 40 of doctorate level, has done a great deal to lift military training in this country to an extent to which we are certainly proud. I have studied with some care the calendar offered by Royal Military College and it is amazing to see the strength of departments that are not really directly military in their nature.

Personally, I concur very much in the emphasis stressed by Colonel Sawyer of elevating Royal Military College and the sister colleges to the type of institutions that will make our cadets great service officers in due course by staffing R.M.C. with the best, most highly qualified people possible.

It seems to me that more than ever before the army needs flexibility, a fresh approach and the type of personnel who will be capable of dealing skilfully and well with many new situations, problems and people. I know how interested the minister is in these service colleges. I wish to ask him whether perhaps there has been too great a decrease in salary levels of the college. I may be misreading the estimates, but in referring to page 331 and looking at the items from director of studies down to instructor, class 1, I have formed the impression that there is approximately $100,000 less being paid in 1961-62 than there was the previous year. I know it was with great difficulty that this faculty was gathered together in Royal Military College in the first instance.

One of the persons very interested in R.M.C.'s growth and strength was W. A. Mackintosh, then principal of Queen's University. I believe he was at one time a member of the Canadian services colleges advisory board. We know that in other educational institutions of that level, generally speaking our teaching salaries are appreciating rather considerably. I think there are very few universities in Canada where in 1961-62 the salary level will be less than that of 1960-61. I am not informed or in a position to be critical, but I ask the minister whether this kind of reduction is justified.

I also wish to ask whether in our great national need for more troops, we are now bringing along enough graduates out of these schools. It is obvious that we have gathered together an extremely able staff, gentlemen who could very easily be absorbed by other universities in Canada and the United States. As we look over the qualifications of these men we see that almost every lecturer has qualifications from several universities. I should think they would be highly mobile personnel and easily lost.

I wonder whether the minister would be kind enough to indicate what is developing at Royal Military College. I can say, from what we can see from where I live, close to Kingston, that we are extremely proud of this school. R.M.C., we think, has never stood so high, and I am one who has been in a position to form an exceptionally high opinion of R.M.C. graduates of the past.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the hon. member for his remarks about Brigadier Anderson and Colonel Sawyer. Brigadier Anderson was a good friend of mine whom I saw a good deal of during the war and since. Also, I am glad to note his interest in the Royal Military College. As far as the salaries of the professors are concerned, they have gone up, not down. I think that is clearly indicated in the details of services in the blue book at page 331. Hon. members will see that the director is getting $14,500 as against $12,000 last year. Fourteen professors are getting $168,000 as against $136,000—their salaries have gone up considerably. This has been necessary, as the hon. member pointed out, in order to retain the services of university professors of a high calibre since those men are in short supply at the present time and we at the military colleges are, of course, in competition with the universities and colleges throughout the continent. Hon. members will see that there are 23 lecturers provision for whom amounts to $136,000 this year compared with $129,000 last year. There are 14 instructors and they are receiving $73,000 this year compared with $67,000 last year. I think that is typical. The salaries have gone up and, as I say, this is necessary in order to retain the staff.

I am glad to say we have an excellent staff not only at the Royal Military College but also at the College Militaire Royale and at Royal Roads. We have on our staffs some extremely outstanding men in their particular lines. We are fortunate indeed that in many instances these men remain with us, although they have been offered higher salaries in other institutions, because they happen to like the type of work they are doing and, in particular, the type of young men with whom they are dealing, in addition to certain facilities for research which are given to them and which they might not have available in other places. As a result we have been able to retain our staff in spite of the fact that the salaries they receive are not as high as those they have been offered in other places.

Mr. Hellyer: In respect to the program to replace the 20 pounders on Centurion tanks with 105 millimetre guns, I wonder if the minister would tell us what the projected program is. According to the white book of 1960, improvements to the fire power of the Centurion tanks are estimated to cost $6 million for which $482,000 is being provided in 1961-62. Then in 1962, according to the blue book:

> The army major equipment program includes provision for improvements to the fire power of the Centurion tank. The estimated cost of this program is $6 million of which the estimated expenditure in 1961-62 is $587,000.

I should like the minister to tell the committee how many of the tanks overseas have been reconverted to date, and what the projected program is for the balance.

Mr. Harkness: I am not in a position to say how many tanks have been converted up to the present time. This work is being carried on at the discretion of the brigade commanders so that he will not have very many tanks out of action at any one time. However, the whole program will be completed at the end of this year.

Mr. Hellyer: That is an amazing statement. The minister says the whole program is to be completed by the end of this year. How can that be accomplished when we are being asked to fund only about one sixth of the total, including last year's estimate? It will require 12 years to complete the program on the basis of the amount funded here.

Mr. Harkness: The answer is that that includes the ammunition which will be secured in the future.

Mr. Hellyer: The $6 million figure includes the ammunition?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister tell the committee what proportion of the $6 million is required for the installation of the guns and what proportion is being spent on ammunition? I must say this seems unusual.

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry but we have not got that information here. We shall get it. It will come down shortly and I will give it to the hon. member.

Mr. Pitman: I am sure all of us will be glad to see that the Bobcat light tracked vehicle is being produced in Canada. Could the minister indicate how many have already been produced and how many foreign governments, if any, have bought them? Could he also tell us what the approximate cost per Bobcat will be, including development costs.

Mr. Harkness: There were four of these vehicles, hand made, one might say, as a means of developing the vehicle and experimenting with it. There are 20 being produced on a production line at the present time to discover whether there are any difficulties in turning these vehicles out in quantity and, if so, to correct those difficulties. As soon as those 20 have been produced a further 480 will be secured.

Mr. Pitman: Have any foreign governments signed contracts to accept the Bobcat? I understand there is a German carrier of the same type—if it is not of the same type perhaps the minister will tell us. But would the cost of producing that vehicle be comparable to the cost of producing ours?

Mr. Harkness: A considerable number of countries have shown some interest in this vehicle but we have received no definite orders as yet. I should like to point out that a number of other personnel carriers, such as the German carrier to which the hon. member referred, are not amphibious vehicles such as this one is. They have no swimming ability, and as a carrier which can cross all types of country and which is, in addition, amphibious, we think this is the best one being developed. As a result we have hopes we shall be able to sell this vehicle to other countries.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister tell us how many of the Bobcats are now with the brigades in Europe?

Mr. Harkness: That question indicates the naïveté or the childishness of the hon. member. He has just heard me say that four handmade models have been produced and that 20 more are in production.

Mr. Hellyer: It is not childish. I was just reading the blue book and I find in it this statement:

> A production run of 20 models of the Bobcat light armoured tractor carrier will be commenced in 1961-62.

What I want the minister to tell the committee is where the associate minister got the wild statement he made in this house when he told us that 500 Bobcats were on order.

Mr. Harkness: When I made the announcement in connection with the Bobcat some considerable time ago I said that we were definitely securing 500 of these vehicles. I explained that 20 of them were being produced as rapidly as they could be produced as a production line run and that as soon as they came through successfully the other 480 would immediately be secured.

Mr. Sevigny: On a question of privilege, may I say that if the hon. member would just read Hansard he would see that what I said last night was exactly what the Minister of National Defence has just said.

Mr. Pitman: I assume it is too early to know what the production cost of the Bobcat, including development costs, will be. Perhaps I can reserve that question for later on.

There is one question about which I am particularly concerned and it relates to the fact that the army controls the warning system. Last Friday I asked the minister a question with reference to the fact that this had been reported as being inadequate as long ago as last January but nothing had been done about it. Second, it had been stated that the system was aimed for outside audibility but the minister suggested that such a statement had not been made.

I want to say it had been made in front of officials who I am sure are very good witnesses who said that that was the situation.

Last Tuesday two officers arrived from Picton. They came to Peterborough to carry out tests, the tests which were predicted by the Minister of National Defence. I am very happy to see that his department has gone on with this matter with the speed with which it has shown. When those two officers arrived they informed the officials in Peterborough that they were testing for outside audibility.

This afternoon the minister complained that the people on this side of the house had not been reading his speeches. It appears to me that some of the people in his own department have not been reading his speeches because they have been testing for outside audibility. When they were told what the minister had said in the house last Friday they said they had heard nothing about this. They got in touch with Ottawa and were told that no new orders had been issued and therefore they are now testing the sirens once again for outside audibility.

I wish this matter could be cleared up because it is of extreme concern. I am sure the minister realizes this because he had been made contact with in the area that I represent.

Mr. Harkness: I said nothing about testing for inside audibility. What I did say was that the degree to which those sirens could be heard inside buildings depended on the type of construction of the building. For example, I used a bank vault down in the basement of a building where you would not hear the siren at all. I used this as an extreme example.

The only way in which you can test and get a test which will be valid in Peterborough and in various parts of Peterborough or anywhere else is on outside audibility. Because, if you start testing on this structure, that structure and the other structure, you are going to get a little different result in each one, depending on the type of construction and the particular room in the building in which you carry on the test and, of course, how much the particular building happens to be shielded by other buildings from the site of the siren. The only way in which you get any sort of test which is standard or uniform is on outside audibility.

Mr. Pearson: Can the minister tell the committee what are the Canadian army commitments at the present time to the United Nations or any other form of international service, and can he give us some details in regard to this service? I know figures were given some time ago but I was wondering what the figures are now.

Mr. Harkness: My officials will turn up the exact figures.

Mr. Pearson: While this is being done perhaps I might ask another question related to my previous one. To what extent are those Canadian contingents of United Nations forces or other international services maintained by Canadian air transport?

Mr. Harkness: Well, as far as the location of the force is concerned, first there is the United Nations emergency force in the Suez. It consists of a total establishment of Canadian army units of 69 officers and 789 other ranks, for a total of 858 all ranks. There is a reconnaissance squadron in that, Lord Strathcona's Horse; a signal squadron, a transport company, and an infantry workshop as the main units making up that particular force.

The R.C.A.F. has 14 officers and 74 other ranks with that force, so that the total of all ranks in the force is 941.

In the Congo the army has 41 officers and 230 other ranks; the air force has six officers and two other ranks, making a total of 279.

In India and Pakistan in that truce observer role the army has eight officers. In Indo-China the navy has two officers; the army has 28 officers and 24 other ranks; the R.C.A.F. has two officers, making a total of 56 all ranks.

In the United Nations truce teams in the Middle East there are 17 army officers. In other countries there are one naval officer and seven army officers; three army other ranks; three R.C.A.F. officers; three other ranks; making a total of 17.

I am sorry, I have forgotten what the second question was.

Mr. Pearson: To what extent are these Canadian forces maintained by Canadian transport?

Mr. Harkness: There are five scheduled North Star flights per month from Trenton, Ontario, via Langar, England and Pisa, Italy to El Arish and return.

As far as the Suez forces are concerned, the total number of flights in support of those forces in the year ended September 30, 1960 was 66, or a total of 788,000 odd miles flown.

I do not suppose the hon. member wants the number of passengers and so forth. As far as the Congo is concerned, there are 15 R.C.A.F. personnel on the strength of the United Nations force there. That was as of June 1. There are two scheduled North Star flights per week to the Congo from Langar via Pisa, Italy to Leopoldville and return, and there are two scheduled North Star flights per month from Trenton, Ontario, down to the Congo and return.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I may be permitted to pay my own humble tribute to the magnificent work that these men are doing on behalf of peace and for their country. I know we are all very grateful for the service they have rendered and are continuing to render under particularly difficult circumstances in the Congo at the present time.

I noticed from what the minister has said that the signals personnel in the Congo have been reduced somewhat, because in the blue book of May reference is made to the army signal unit comprising 280 all ranks. I think the figures the minister gave were a little less than that. May I ask the minister whether the transfer, if you would like to call it that, of those Canadian signallers to the Congo, when it took place, had any effect on the work of the Canadian army signals in Canada? Has the work of training the signallers been carried on in the normal way notwithstanding the transfer of so many of the signals unit to the Congo.

Mr. Harkness: Well, the training at the signals school has been expanded considerably because of the number of signallers employed in the Congo and in the Suez, in order to increase the supply of signallers.

I should like to thank the Leader of the Opposition for the tribute he has paid to the men whom we have serving in those places in the cause of peace and particularly those in the Congo, who, as he has stated, have had an extremely difficult time, particularly in certain spots. I know that the whole Canadian people are grateful to them for the job they have done there.

As to the difference in the numbers, originally there was a considerable contingent of Canadian officers and some other ranks on the United Nations headquarters staff in the Congo. That has gradually been cut down as other nations have made contributions to the United Nations headquarters staff and also there has been a redistribution of the signal personnel at various points in the Congo. The Leader of the Opposition will perhaps remember that fighting took place at Matadi, the seaport for Leopoldville, and that our signal detachment was under fire for some time. It was then withdrawn to Leopoldville and it has not been sent back because United Nations troops were not sent back to maintain the position there. As a result of some of these shifts of this kind, the number now is not as great as it was when the booklet was put out.

Mr. Pearson: Do we pay the full expenses of all our contingents in these United Nations forces? I assume that we do and, if we do, do we get credit for that expenditure against the assessments which are levied by the United Nations to cover the expenses of United Nations activities, a credit which we will perhaps never be able to realize in cash?

Mr. Harkness: Theoretically the way the matter is supposed to work so far as costs are concerned is that we pay the normal costs, pay and allowances, of our personnel who are there. The United Nations is supposed to pay the extra costs for accommodation and so forth. We bill them for these extra costs. In the case of the Suez force, it has been on a definite basis and these bills have been paid. As far as the Congo is concerned, the same system is supposed to work but there has never been any final determination of what the United Nations would pay and therefore the matter is still in abeyance.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister comment on this statement by the former minister as found on page 462 of the proceedings of the defence estimates committee? I quote:

> You asked what weapons if any are replacing any of the Browning machine guns used by the Canadian army. It is planned to replace the .30 calibre Browning in due course by a machine gun of the 7.62 millimetre NATO standardized calibre. Preliminary studies are being carried out on some new machine guns which might meet the requirements. Consideration is being given to the replacement of the .5 calibre Browning in due course by the new heavy machine gun. As yet, no decision on the type of gun to adopt has been made, but various guns are being considered.

Can the minister indicate if either of these decisions has yet been made?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman, there has been no final decision taken on that particular matter yet.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister advise the committee as to how many of the new C-42 wireless sets have been delivered to the brigade group in Europe?

Mr. Harkness: All units of the brigade in Europe are fully equipped now with this new wireless set as are the regular army units in Canada. I think some of them have also been delviered to militia units. If not, I think some will be delivered fairly soon for national survival purposes.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister indicate whether he has any plans to equip the Canadian army with light aircraft, more specifically of Otter, Beaver or Caribou class?

Mr. Harkness: No, there are no definite plans. Various proposals along this line have been made and studied. No decision has been made to equip the Canadian army with any aircraft of this type. There is quite a considerable question involved. The particular proposition was, of course, to equip the brigade in Europe, but for a formation of that size it is a matter of considerable doubt whether it is a practical proposition to give it its own little air force, you might say. There is quite a body of opinion that this is not a practical way to solve the problem of the need for air transportability and for air transport. As far as Canada is concerned, of course, air transport requirements can be met by the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Hellyer: I am sure the minister would admit that the contrary opinion is held in some quarters. Would he also indicate whether he plans to obtain any heavy helicopters for the brigade group to be used for moving personnel and equipment?

Mr. Harkness: I have had a considerable number of these plans and propositions put before me and have given them a good deal of study, both with respect to aircraft of the Otter or Beaver type and also heavy helicopters. I think there is a need for a certain number of heavy helicopters and I hope to be able to work out something definite in that regard in the very near future.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister advise the committee how many consultant architects and engineers were used in the last fiscal year and what was the total cost?

Mr. Harkness: While that is being looked up, I might reply to a question that was asked about the Hamilton Galt trophy competition. I have the information here for the last three years only. In 1958 the trophy was won by the second regiment, R.H.C., in 1959 it was won by the first Royal 22nd regiment and in 1960 it was won by the first P.P.C.L.I. regiment. The competition is between all regular infantry battalions and includes the scoring of all personnel of the battalion. A steady improvement in firing skill of the battalions as a whole has been experienced. The director of infantry is still searching for statistics on the actual results.

Mr. Pitman: I thank the minister very much for that information. Could he tell us whether the scores indicated an improvement as a result of the use of the new rifle compared with the Lee-Enfield or whether the improvement resulted from greater accuracy in firing rather than the use of the FN rifle?

Mr. Harkness: We have the percentage scores for these three years and they show an increase from 127 to 132 to 141. They do not show which rifles were being used which I think was the point the hon. member was getting at. I will have to send for that information. The last question was in connection with the number of architects and consultants. The amount of money which was budgeted for consultants fees in 1960-61 was $900,000 and in 1961-62 $500,000 or a decrease of $400,000. I have not got the actual number.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister giving the figures for those on the staff of national defence headquarters?

Mr. Harkness: These are consultants' fees.

Mr. Hellyer: Consultants to the department?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: In his list of equipment for the brigade group the minister mentioned the S.S. anti-tank missile for training. Would he indicate his intentions with regard to an operational anti-tank missile for the brigade group?

Mr. Harkness: Well, no final decision has been made as to what type of missile of this kind will finally be adopted as our regular equipment. We have been using the French wire-guided weapon, the S.S.-10 for practice purposes and for training. However, we have been evaluating other weapons of the same type and, as I say, no final decision has yet been made as to which one we will eventually adopt.

Mr. Hellyer: If the minister examines the box score he will see the basis for our suggestion that the brigade group is not as adequately equipped as it might be. We admit quite freely that some of these programs are coming along in more or less orderly fashion. We strongly suspect, however, that some of them have been held back for budgetary reasons. This is the reason we charge that the brigade group has been starved for equipment at the same time rather heavy expenditures have been made for other equipment which, in our opinion, is not nearly so essential.

I might give a sort of running box score: No Honest John rocket launchers in Europe, and no decision as to how they will be equipped when they get there; the FN rifle being re-constructed; Centurion tanks are being re-equipped and so far we do not know how many. The ammuniton has not all been ordered, as yet. The Bobcat is not yet ready to go into production, let alone be delivered to the brigade group. The C-42 wireless set is apparently fully installed and in use. There are no light aircraft and the minister is not yet convinced they are a requirement. I would suggest he visit some of the installations of other armies that are equipped with light aircraft to see their capabilities and then, on that basis, perhaps he would be impressed with the advisability of providing some light transport companies for the brigade group. There are no heavy helicopters yet available or on order, although the minister is giving this some consideration. Finally, there is no final decision with respect to an anti-tank missile.

This box score, Mr. Chairman, is the basis for the charge we have made, and we believe the facts substantiate the position we have taken. I wonder if the minister would give the committee a list of the equipment which has been issued to the militia for national survival operations?

Mr. Harkness: My officials will turn up that list, and while that is being done I should like to say that the Centurion tank, of course, is a heavy British post-war tank and an exceptionally good one. The up-gunning of it has been proceeding quite satisfactorily and, as I said will be finished by the end of the year. With 20-pounder guns, it is still a very effective tank.

In so far as some of the other criticisms are concerned and this so-called list the hon. member has read, I would ask him to compare that list with the partial list of just some of the major equipment to which I referred a while ago as being supplied not only to the brigade in Europe but also to the regular army troops in Canada and, in some cases, to the militia. It is very easy to pick out four or five items and say that these are not yet complete. The basic fact is, however, that we have, by and large, completely re-equipped the brigade in Europe and the other army units since the second world war with vehicles, weapons and what-not. This has been a very considerable undertaking. So far as the anti-tank wire missile is concerned, to which reference was made, there are probably a half a dozen of those which have been produced in various countries. It takes a considerable length of time to evaluate all these. We also hope there will be some standardization so far as the NATO countries are concerned in putting them into their armies. In the meantime, as I say, we are using the French type.

There is a list here of the major items of survival equipment which have been issued to both the Canadian regular army and to the militia units. There are rescue kits on an operational scale for the two types of units, regular and militia. There is radiac equipment for the re-entry forces and fall-out reporting posts. There is a limited quantity of gamma survey meters, and the models of low range survey meters are the CDV-710 contamination meter and the CDV-700 in quantities sufficient to permit training and limited operations; approximately 30 per cent of the requirement of tactical dosimeters and dosimeters chargers; over 50 per cent of the requirement of personal dosimeters and approximately 40 per cent of the requirements of readers for these dosimeters; full requirements for training kits and training devices; communications equipment, including the United Kingdom C-42 wireless set, which is a 15-mile very high frequency set.

The major items of equipment which are on order and of which we hope to get deliveries fairly rapidly and regularly are the additional requirements of radiac equipment of various kinds and these dosimeter chargers for them; remote reading gamma survey meters for fall-out reporting posts; nuclear burst position indicators; communication equipment including telephone cable and public address sets, miscellaneous radio sets; portable heaters; decontamination apparatus; mobile laundry equipment; mobile bath equipment; gasoline driven saws; centrifugal pumps; torch cutting equipment; water purification equipment; various generating and lighting sets; some winter footwear; food cooking equipment; various items of crowd control equipment.

Planned for procurement are additional radiac equipment above what is already ordered; decontamination vacuum cleaners, collapsible tanks for water storage and additional lighting equipment. As I indicated last week, we have taken a considerable number of measures to speed up the securing of a considerable quantity of equipment needed for national survival purposes. We are securing all of this just as rapidly as it can be produced for us.

Mr. Hellyer: I am very pleased to learn of this speed-up. I understand, indirectly, that to a large extent it results from the attention drawn to the need for it last year when the estimates were before the committee. At the same time, I know the minister would not wish to take credit for all the re-equipment which has been given the brigade group over the years, most of which was ordered away back and then subsequently delivered to the brigade group long before the minister had any responsibility for the provision of equipment.

I wonder if the minister would give the number of resignations from the militia for the years 1959, 1960 and 1961 respectively and perhaps the rate of enlistments for the same periods?

Mr. Harkness: Well, I would have to get the number of withdrawals from the militia. I think perhaps we could get the information best by giving the strengths at various times. The strengths going back to, we will say, March 31, 1958—this is the total strength, officers and other ranks—41,000. I will leave off the odd hundreds. December 31, 1958, 41,400.

March, 1959, 40,900; December, 1959, 40,-700; March, 1960, 40,000; October 31, 41,000; December 31, 42,600; March 31, 1961, 43,200; June 30, 1961, 44,000. It will therefore be seen that during that period there has been a gradual increase of upwards of 4,000 in the numbers. We will try to get the number of the people who enlisted and the number who withdrew for the past year. I think that was what was asked for.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to have the rate of enlistment or the turnover in that period if you have it handy.

Mr. Harkness: No. We have not it at hand but we will get it. It may take some time to get it.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether the minister would bring us up to date in relation to Maple Leaf services being supplied to the armed personnel overseas? Has he received any complaints recently, particularly with respect to the range of goods being carried and the fact that allegedly there is not a sufficient range of Canadian products?

Mr. Harkness: There are, of course, complaints. There are always complaints over the operations of anything along these lines. The complaints are chiefly of two kinds. One is on the part of troops who have newly gone over to Germany. There are complaints that there is not the same variety of goods as that to which they have been accustomed at home. I think this situation can readily be understood. It is just not possible to carry the great variety of goods, such as canned goods and so on, of all kinds which you find in a supermarket here in Canada.

The other type of complaint that I have received is with regard to the prices in the Maple Leaf services. This has been based chiefly on a belief—which is some cases is correct and in some cases is quite wrong—that the United States PX's are selling the same goods more cheaply. If you examine into this matter you find that some goods are certainly sold more cheaply in United States PX's. However, on the other hand certain goods are sold more cheaply in the Canadian Maple Leaf stores. Of course you never hear any complaint about that matter. It is taken for granted. But if there is found an item the price of which is cheaper in the United States PX's you get the complaint that it should be sold at that price in the Canadian Maple Leaf services. Of course, one of the reasons that there is a difference in prices is that the United States PX's are securing goods in very much greater quantities than we are and on a direct supply line, and thus their costs of acquisition and their transportation costs in the case of many items are less than ours. In the case of certain other items, as a matter of fact, as I say we can produce at a better price. This is the general situation with regard to complaints with respect to Maple Leaf services. However, I have never received very serious complaints in this regard.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to read a rather incredible letter addressed to the Hon. Lester B. Pearson, House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario or a copy of it. It reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

I am a retired Canadian army officer and veteran of world war II. I take the liberty of addressing this letter to you in order to place at your disposal certain facts gained from personal experience concerning Canadian complicity in the recent military action against Cuba organized by the government of the United States. It is my present conviction that the matter must be thoroughly exposed in order that proper measures be taken to prevent our further entanglement in the disastrous consequences of American policy toward Cuba.

Six months ago I was hired by the C.I.A. as an instructor and detailed to a camp where anti-Castro units were trained in landing operations. Through my close association with C.I.A. officials and participation in the camp activities, I was in a position to obtain some knowledge of the extent of Canadian involvement, as the following list of particulars will indicate:

1. From information secured through C.I.A. channels, it is clear to me that Messrs. Diefenbaker and Harkness had full knowledge of, and indeed encouraged, the recruitment of Canadian citizens on Canadian soil by the C.I.A. for service in units being prepared for the invasion of Cuba. The same evidence indicates that R.C.M.P. officials co-operated with the C.I.A. in this activity.

2. My estimate is that from 200 to 300 Canadians were recruited. In the main they were unemployed persons and ex-servicemen. Practically all of them joined up because of the high rate of pay.

3. In addition, several regular army officers took part in the training and actual landing operations in Cuba. Presumably their participation was approved by their superiors.

Mr. Speakman: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Will the hon. member who is reading this document kindly identify its source?

Mr. Herridge: I will give it later.

Mr. Speakman: I should like him to identify it now, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: The initials of the gentleman are "D. J. S." I wish to finish reading it.

Mr. Harkness: What is his name?

Mr. Herridge: It is just initialled.

Mr. Harkness: It is an anonymous letter.

Mr. Speakman: If it is an anonymous letter, it is out of order to read it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the hon. member adopting it?

Mr. Herridge: No. Some rather unusual statements are given here. He is willing to come forward. I will carry on and paraphrase it.

An hon. Member: Name him.

Mr. Herridge: He goes on to say this—

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, will you kindly rule on that point of order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I was wondering whether the hon. member who was reading the letter was giving me his own abbreviated version of the person who signed the letter or is the letter actually signed by initials as indicated?

Mr. Herridge: No. It is initialed but not signed. I can paraphrase the contents of it.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Just a minute, please.

Mr. Pearson: While you are ruling on this important point, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make it quite clear that I did not refer the copy of this letter to the hon. gentleman.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): The ruling I had in mind is to be found in Beauchesne's fourth edition, paragraph 158, subsection 3, page 134, which states:

(3) An unsigned letter should not be read in the house. On the 16th May 1928, a member stated during debate that a letter which he had been quoting was not signed. The Speaker said: "Such a letter should not be read into Hansard; all letters when read must be signed and they become part of the documents of the house".

I think the point is well taken by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, in view of the apparent length of the letter and also in view of the fact that it is for all practical purposes an anonymous letter. I would suggest that a free paraphrasing of it would be more in order.

Mr. Herridge: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and I shall paraphrase it. I raise the matter because he sent this letter to the Leader of the Opposition and to five members of parliament. He goes on to say this.

Mr. Pallett: Does the hon. member take these remarks as his own as well as paraphrasing the letter? Is he taking responsibility for them?

Mr. Herridge: I am not obliged to take responsibility for paraphrasing information.

Mr. Pallett: Oh, yes, you are obliged to take responsibility for an anonymous letter.

Mr. Herridge: I am not reading the letter. I want the minister to answer this.

Mr. Grafftey: Disregard the rules.

Mr. Herridge: He goes on to indicate that the invasion collapsed and he mentions money.

Mr. Pallett: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The point I raise is that the hon. member is purporting to read an anonymous letter and he says, "He says". I suggest that the hon. member either accept these remarks as his own, a procedure which is in accordance with the rules of the house, or accept responsibility for them.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I can overcome that quite easily according to the rules by saying I have been informed. That is quite correct.

An hon. Member: No, you cannot.

Mr. Grafftey: Oh, no.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): On the point of order that has been raised, I would appreciate it very much if the hon. member for Peel would direct the attention of the Chair specifically to the rule which covers this particular point. In my humble opinion, if this rule does exist, it has been honoured in the breach.

Mr. Churchill: Oh, no.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I say that from my experience, and in my opinion. I would appreciate some guidance as to the specific precedents in this matter. The point I have in mind has occurred frequently in debates and discussions in the house when in quite recent times hon. members on both sides of a particular argument have quoted from the same editorial. Clearly hon. members on both sides of the argument cannot be assuming responsibility for the same editorial which in part seems to support both sides of the argument.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Surely that would be out of order, Mr. Chairman, because it is specifically governed by citation 157, subcitation 5. That citation is perhaps not relevant to our particular discussion, but the reading of editorials in support of argument has been frequently ruled to be out of order.

Mr. Pallett: I would refer you, Mr. Chairman, to citation 159, subparagraph 3, which by an analogy covers this situation. The citation reads:

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the house, if it can be done without injury to the public interest. The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda. On the 18th May, 1865, the attorney general, on being asked by Mr. Ferrard if he would lay upon the table a written statement and a letter to which he had referred on a previous day, in answering a question relative to the Leeds bankruptcy court, replied that he had made a statement to the house upon his own responsibility, and that the documents he had referred to being private, he could not lay them upon the table.

Mr. Chevrier: There is another sentence which you did not read.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): The citation goes on to say:

> —the documents he had referred to being private, he could not lay them upon the table. Lord Robert Cecil contended that the papers, having been cited, should be produced; but the Speaker declared that this rule applied to public documents only.

I think, with the lack of some immediate direction and instruction from precedents, we should proceed on a common sense basis. I think perhaps we are all of a mind in this particular instance. Without attempting to establish a precedent and—

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member does not accept responsibility for the statements he makes. This is fundamental to the practice of the House of Commons. It is such a fundamental rule that it is basic to the whole proceedings.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, possibly through a lapse of memory or oversight I did transgress the rules of the house in this instance. But I will not transgress the rules of the house further. All hon. members know that I try to keep them as much as possible.

Mr. Grafftey: Do you, or do you not, take responsibility?

Mr. Herridge: Having had certain information which now seems very unusual, I would ask the minister two or three questions which will be quite in order.

First, does the minister know of any Canadians being recruited to serve in forces that were used in the invasion of Cuba?

Second, does the minister know of any Canadian army personnel being directly or indirectly involved in such an arrangement?

Third, in view of certain persons making these most unusual statements, and a certain person being willing to come forward to give information in detail, if requested, will the minister give any person who is willing to come forward and present evidence to the defence committee an opportunity to substantiate any statements they have made in correspondence, conversation or otherwise?

Mr. Harkness: I shall be very glad to have anybody come forward with anything that he can substantiate in regard to any matter along this line. As far as any Canadian army personnel having had any part directly or indirectly in the Cuban affair is concerned, I know definitely that none of them had. In other words, these various statements in this anonymous letter are just completely false. There is the statement that the Prime Minister and I had full knowledge of the matter. I know that I had absolutely no knowledge of the matter in any way, shape or form. As I say, I also know that the Canadian army had no part of any kind in training people or anything else along that line.

I suspect this is the same man, as a matter of fact, who made an appearance on a television show here in Ottawa some months ago and claimed that he had been in Cuba and that there were a lot of other Canadian soldiers in Cuba. He claimed they were using Canadian army rifles, and things of this sort. I answered a question or two in the house on it. He said they had been using .303 rifles which were stolen from a certain camp. I have forgotten the name of the camp now, but on investigation it happened to be a camp where there never had been any .303 rifles because it had come into operation after the FN rifle had been issued. This showed a palpable falsehood in these claims.

As a matter of fact, the man claimed that he served in certain Canadian army units, and so forth. We looked the matter up and found he had enlisted, under his brother's name as I recall it, and had been discharged because he was found to be mentally unstable.

He then threatened me, and the R.C.M.P. were actually looking after him for a while. He was going to do away with me because of the answers I had given. But subsequently somehow or other, I think Liberty magazine printed an article for him and showed pictures of him, presumably in Cuba. It turned out on investigation that these pictures had actually been taken by a Toronto photographer—his name was right on the back of the pictures—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Did he have a beard?

Mr. Harkness: —and they were taken in the botanical gardens at Toronto. I suspect that the fellow who wrote this letter is the same man.

Mr. Herridge: In order to clear up the matter—

An hon. Member: Tear the letter up.

Mr. Herridge: —would the minister say whether he invites this person to come forward and sustantiate his claims?

Mr. Harkness: I invite him to come forward and substantiate his claims, but if it is the same man as I suspect it is, he is just looking for more notoriety and I am not going to give it to him.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Shall vote 337 carry?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, would the minister tell the committee to what extent the standardization of arms and ground equipment has proceeded in NATO? I know that there has been a standardization of the FN rifle. I am not sure how far that has been carried out. Has there been some backsliding from that example of standardization? What else has been done to standardize arms and equipment in the NATO forces?

Mr. Harkness: This is one of the areas in which there has been disappointingly slow progress. The amount of standardization outside of the FN rifle has been disappointingly little. It arises to a large extent, I think, because each country, for purposes of maintaining employment in its own industries, and so on, always attempts to manufacture everything it possibly can in that particular country. I believe this is the main reason why it is so difficult to get standardization of these different pieces of equipment.

Mr. Chairman, a question was asked about the up-gunning of the Centurions. The hon. member for Trinity asked for the division of the $6 million which was put into this program. Six hundred thousand dollars of that amount is for the modifications to the guns, and $5,400,000 is for ammunition.

Mr. Hellyer: I thank the minister for that information. I wonder if the hon. gentleman has the information to enable him to answer this inquiry. I shall read it for the benefit of the minister. Without going into voluminous detail, suffice it to state that under order in council, PC 1959-1/1297 northern allowance at $87.50 per month was converted to isolation allowance and reduced to the sum of $70 per month with effect from October 1, 1959, this new allowance to be reduced by 20 per cent each year for a period of five years, to the end that at the conclusion of this period no special allowance would be paid to personnel posted to Dawson Creek, British Columbia. However, a discrepancy arises from the fact that even at the reduced rates isolation allowance is awarded only to personnel who were posted to Dawson Creek prior to the order in council coming into effect. Personnel posted subsequent to that date receive no consideration. Therefore, a number of personnel posted prior to the order in council being passed receive $52.50 per month even after the 20 per cent reduction which became effective on October 1, 1960, in addition to normal pay and allowances, while those posted subsequent to the order in council receive only normal pay and allowances. Yet all live under the same circumstances and conditions.

I wonder if the minister would indicate, if these facts are correct, whether or not he thinks this situation is equitable and whether he proposes alleviating the discrepancy in the treatment of personnel at Dawson Creek.

Mr. Harkness: I am told there was a complete study made of these isolation allowances and northern allowances. In some cases they were increased as a result of this study, while in others they were decreased. In the cases where they were decreased the decrease was to be effected over a five year period. I have here a list of the areas in which allowances were decreased and of those in which they were not. I presume that if increases were paid with respect to the northwest highway system it was because a considerable number of other places such as Dawson Creek certainly cannot be looked upon any longer as isolated posts.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister not feel that even if the allowance is reduced over a five year period the amount paid should apply to all personnel at a particular station rather than be applied to some and not to others?

Mr. Harkness: I must say frankly that I am not familiar with the situation, and therefore I am not in a position to answer that question.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister take it into consideration and let me know the results of his inquiries either privately or otherwise?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I shall be glad to have this looked into and if I cannot give an answer before the estimates are completed I shall write to the hon. member.

Mr. Carter: I should like to direct to the minister one or two questions about the public relations staff. Can the minister say how many such personnel the army has engaged in this work and how that number compares proportionately with the numbers employed in the other services? This is one item of expenditure in connection with which I sometimes wonder whether the taxpayer is getting good value for his dollar. I have not had much opportunity to observe the work of the P.R.O.'s. I did have one opportunity to do so in July and I cannot say I was much impressed by what I saw on that occasion. However, I should not like to draw any conclusion from a single observation.

I should like also to find out on what basis these P.R.O. people are allocated to units and formations and whether any thought has been given to unifying the work of this department in the three services.

Mr. Chambers: The public relations directorates of the services and defence research board have three main functions:

1. To facilitate a flow of unclassified information about the armed services and defence research board to the public.

2. To provide counsel to their respective services, to ensure that each service is, in fact, serving the public interest to the best of its abilities, in closest possible harmony with other national interests, and that its plans, policies, programs and activities are presented or performed in such a way as to reflect the high standards of the service concerned, and its dedication to public interest.

3. To advise upon and implement planned community relations programs, particularly at overseas establishments.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo will realize that wherever there is a service establishment, particularly overseas but here in Canada also, the relationship between the civilian population and the service population can sometimes cause difficulties. One of the ways in which this situation can be helped is through good public relations. I was asked to give some figures, and I can tell the committee that at national defence headquarters there are two civilian public relations officers. The navy has a total of 14 officers and ten civilians. The army has 28 officers and 34 other ranks, besides 30 civilians, for a grand total of 92. The R.C.A.F. has a total of 29 officers, 35 other ranks and nine civilians for a total of 73. The defence research board has two civilians engaged in this work.

Mr. Carter: Could we have any indication of the total cost? Is that figure available?

Mr. Chambers: It is not broken down—

Mr. Carter: Could we not have some indication of the cost? I understand the navy has 14 officers, the army 28 officers and the air force 27, plus other ranks. What would the top rank be in each of those establishments? What would the average rank be?

Mr. Chambers: The senior officer in each service is a lieutenant colonel or equivalent. The bulk of the working officer personnel are army captains, or equivalent.

Item agreed to.

238. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment, $60,556,000.

Miss LaMarsh: I should like to take this opportunity to raise a question which is of interest to my own constituency. There was an artillery armoury there called the General Brock armoury which was purchased by the department a few years ago. An anti-aircraft battery was stationed there. In June of this year the armoury was sold on tender having been declared surplus and the artillery battery was required to move into the Victoria Avenue armoury which has been the home of a company of the Lincoln regiment. Could the minister say why the General Brock armoury was declared surplus and sold? It was about three times the physical size of the armoury which remains and it was a more modern building although not so well designed as an armoury.

Consequently, we think it will now be necessary to rent space to train individuals of the militia in the Niagara area for civil defence.

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Chairman, we will have to send for this information for the hon. member.

Mr. Carter: The minister might now answer the question I asked earlier.

Mr. Harkness: Well, I am informed that the question of a Newfoundland armoury is awaiting the decision on the ownership of the Pepperrell air base, and that some accommodation in it might be used as an armoury.

Mr. Mitchell: I am going to ask my annual question of the minister concerning the proposed Sudbury armoury. The hon. lady from Niagara Falls gave me the idea when she was talking about the armouries. Has any progress been made with the construction of this building? I am advised that army construction experts have been in Sudbury recently looking over the situation and have made a report to the department. A new arrangement has been suggested concerning the construction of this building. I am advised that local money can be obtained for its erection on a lease back contract. It is suggested, of course, that the department oversee the construction of this building according to army regulations, and rent it for a period of 20 to 25 years, with the purchase of same to be arranged at that time, if they so wish.

Is there any money in this year's estimates earmarked for this purpose? Of course, you realize, that the property for this armoury has already been donated to the crown and has been lying idle there. The deed is still held by the Department of National Defence. I am asking this question to see whether the department has taken any serious thought of the construction of this building under other arrangements.

Mr. Harkness: This is one of the armoury projects with which it happens I am thoroughly familiar. I went into it in considerable detail as the hon. member knows, with the delegation from Sudbury and I am doing my best to get the things approved and get construction started as soon as possible. It is at the head of our priority list for armouries in Ontario. I have not yet managed to get it approved by treasury board, but I hope to be able to do that in the very near future.

Mr. Mitchell: Thank you.

Mr. Badanai: I should like to direct a question to the minister with regard to the armoury situation in Fort William. It has being brought to his attention on several occasions. I wonder whether the city of Fort William is on a basis similar to that mentioned by the hon. member for Sudbury. The Department of National Defence is well aware of the need for an armoury at Fort William. Will the minister give some assurance that consideration will be given to this matter in the near future?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I dealt with this question, I think it was the day before yesterday, as a result of the speech which the hon. member made on item No. 1. I really have nothing to add to that. I said at that time we have to make arrangements to rent a hall in Fort William to accommodate a company of the Lake Superior Scottish and this will go some small way at least to meet the need there. I regret to inform the hon. member that, unlike the situation in Sudbury, the actual building of an armoury at Fort William is not close to the top of the priority list and therefore I can give no indication as to when the construction might be started on an armoury in Fort William.

Mr. McFarlane: I am in a position almost similar to that of the two previous speakers, but my proposal to the minister is a little different. At the present time we have a militia unit in the city of Kimberley in British Columbia and we have endeavoured to carry on over a period of years, handling part of the program in one building, part in another building and part in schools, keeping the equipment wherever cover is available. I have worked on this for some time. The last letter I had from the minister stated that the information had been requested from departmental officials and would be available at an early date. I sincerely hope it will not be very long before I will be able to obtain that material.

A brief has been submitted to the department concerning the necessity for the armouries at Kimberley. The submission is as follows:

That Kimberley Armouries limited erect a building acceptable to the Department of National Defence standards for a militia armoury.

That this building be rented to the Department of National Defence for a period of 20 years, at rates sufficient to write off the cost of construction and such other charges as may be deemed necessary.

That at the end of the contract period, the building be sold to the crown for a nominal sum agreed in the contract.

That the building be erected on the 2.25 acres of crown land held in the name of the Department of National Defence in the city of Kimberley.

Financial backing for Kimberley Armouries limited has been obtained from the Royal Trust Company, Vancouver, B.C., through the bank of Montreal, Kimberley, B.C.

The land was given to the Department of National Defence by the city of Kimberley so that an armouries could be built. It constituted the last suitable site in the community when the gift was made. The city had itself received the land as a contribution from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada limited as park land, with a clause defining an armouries as an acceptable improvement.

There are several other items in this brief. They have enclosed the signatures of very responsible men in the community and also of members of the opposition party. In addition to that, they have given us a brief summary of the militia activities in Kimberley over the past few years. It is now known as the 17th field squadron R.C.E. at Kimberley, at Creston and at Cranbrook. During the years they have been in operation they have trained 33 officers and 525 men. In addition they have 65 cadets in the city of Cranbrook and 35 in the Creston area.

Also attached to this brief, Mr. Chairman, is the engineering project of the building as it will look when completed, in addition to the site plan which has been laid out on the property concerned; and also tentative estimates of the amount required for the construction of this building, with an approximate cost of $150,000.

In view of the fact that we feel this project is an essential in the area, I should like to give the committee a slight resumé of the geographical location of Kimberley. It is situated very close to my own town, within 20 miles to be exact, in the heart of the Rocky mountains. It is my understanding that in case of an emergency the militia would be called upon to undertake a great deal of the work necessary at such a time. I took up this matter with the department and they came back with the reply that in the case of an emergency help would be forthcoming from Calgary and Kamloops where units are already established.

One look at the map, Mr. Chairman, would bring to your attention the problem that would exist in moving equipment and personnel from either of the two points mentioned. The Rocky mountains and the lakes and rivers in the area forestall any quick movement of troops and equipment. I would appreciate it if this matter could be given consideration at an early date. The Kimberley group has gone to a lot of trouble in preparing plans and data, and in the event of the citizens signing a letter of intent that they are prepared to proceed as a private group should approval be obtained within a reasonable time construction of the Kimberley armouries could also be a winter works project. We are very anxious to proceed with construction and if a prompt reply could be given by the minister or the department within the next few days or weeks we could possibly arrange for some construction this winter.

Mr. Harkness: I happen to know this unit at Kimberley. It is a very excellent engineering unit and they are to be highly commended on the work they have done. I also have an additional interest in the unit. It was formerly an artillery unit and was part of the regiment that I commanded as a militia commander in the years immediately after the war. It was later converted to an engineering unit. I know what the need is for an armoury there. It has been on a priority basis for some considerable length of time. At the present time it is in the same situation in western command as Sudbury is in central command. It is at the top of the priority list so far as the construction of armouries in western command is concerned and I trust we can get some action on it fairly soon.

Mr. Weichel: On the subject of armouries, Mr. Chairman, about a year and a half ago a brief was presented by some gentlemen in Kitchener with regard to the need for a new armoury. We have five or six units in Kitchener and Waterloo which are scattered all over the place and I am quite sure that the rent paid on the buildings now occupied would pay for a new building in about ten years time. Accommodation could also be provided for the navy and civil defence personnel in such a building. I would appreciate it if the minister would look at that brief again.

Mr. Harkness: This is another case where we realize that an armoury is very badly needed. As a matter of fact, it is fourth on the priority list of central command. I can assure the hon. member that we have it very much in mind and it is really a matter of when we can get sufficient funds to construct it, as well as a number of other armouries.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us the ultimate decision with respect to the University avenue armouries in Toronto?

Mr. Harkness: The city of Toronto and the metropolitan district have both indicated that they wish to have this site for a new law courts building and that they wish to proceed with the agreement entered into some years ago under which we are to turn over that site to them. We have built one other armoury, the Dennison armoury, which I believe will be officially opened next month or perhaps even this month. It has been taken over and will be officially opened very soon. There is a need for two more armouries of the same size.

The metropolitan district was supposed to assist us in securing land sites to build the two additional armouries but unfortunately nothing has been produced yet. One site was put forward but the expropriation which the metropolitan district sought to put through was cancelled when the matter was taken to the courts and therefore we lost that site. We do not have definite sites for these other two armouries. I hope we will be able to get them very shortly so that construction can be started.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say when the department will have to give up the University avenue site and will the two other armouries be ready by that time or will there be a hiatus?

Mr. Harkness: The original agreement was that we would give it up by December 31 of this year, but in view of the fact that sites have not been provided and therefore it has been impossible to proceed with construction I have informed the city officials that we cannot give up the armouries at this time and will not be able to do so until we have been able to provide alternative accommodation.

Mr. Hellyer: Is it true that that very famous regiment, the 48th Highlanders, does not wish to carry on if it has to leave the University avenue armouries and is that situation being resolved?

[Mr. Weichel.]

Mr. Harkness: I do not think there is any question of that. Some people may have made statements along that line. I do not know. If so, they have not come to my attention. I have had no indication whatever that the 48th Highlanders will not continue and I would be very surprised, in fact, if they are not anxious to continue.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say whether any decision has been taken with regard to a new armouries for the city of Vancouver?

Mr. Harkness: The Vancouver armouries would have been started before now except for some difficulties there over the site and the objection on the part of some people to having it built on a piece of crown owned property where we originally intended to put it. I think that the matter of the site is being straightened out now. As far as western command is concerned, the Vancouver armouries is the second one on the list and comes immediately after Kimberley as a priority project.

Mr. Garland: Could the minister say who is responsible for the establishment of these priorities?

Mr. Harkness: After carefully considering the situation in the light of the needs of the militia and the accommodation at present being used, each command recommends a list of armouries in the area which they think should be constructed. This list is reviewed at army headquarters and then reviewed again by myself. The list is established on that basis.

Mr. Garland: With respect to North Bay, in view of the developments that are taking place from a military standpoint, can the minister say whether he sees any reason to believe that the priority rating for the project there might be raised? I know it is well down the list.

Mr. Harkness: North Bay is not nearly as much a priority project as some of the others that have been mentioned. The list is changed from time to time depending on changes in conditions. At the present time North Bay is in seventh priority position on the central command list which would mean that there is not much hope of getting it built in the immediate future.

Mr. Garland: Perhaps the minister missed my question. In view of the fact that it has that rating and in view of the developments in the military field that are taking place across the country, I wonder whether there is any reason to believe that North Bay's priority might be raised in the reasonably near future.

Mr. Harkness: As I said, the matter of armoury construction and the priority list are under review continuously and there are changes made from time to time depending on changed situations. I do not know enough about the situation with respect to this armoury compared with others to be able to give a definitive answer to the hon. member.

Mr. Morris: I wonder if the minister would inform me whether or not the department is holding land on Rainnie drive in Halifax for army building use?

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Chairman, the department does hold this land for possible future army development.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Air Force—

239. Operation and maintenance, $536,666,000.

Mr. Pascoe: I should like to ask some questions on item 239 which concerns R.C.A.F. operations. I was very interested in the announcement by the minister on September 11 in connection with the replacement by 1963 of the Harvard trainer with the CL-41 jet trainer as the basic R.C.A.F. training aircraft. There is a very fine R.C.A.F. station in my home city of Moose Jaw. The minister's announcement has aroused great interest there. I was present during graduation ceremonies for the last class of student pilots, and I saw how eagerly they looked forward to their jet training after flying Harvards, although they were also very proud of the Harvards. By 1963, student pilots will be training on these jet trainers.

Could the minister tell the committee what changes may have to be made at R.C.A.F. stations to accommodate the jet trainer, particularly in so far as personnel, maintenance and repair hangars and runways. Will the runways which have accommodated the Harvards have to be lengthened or strengthened to accommodate the CL-41? I am not sure of the exact length of the runways at the Moose Jaw R.C.A.F. station, but I know that jets do not normally land there. If it is necessary to lengthen the runways, and I imagine it will be, could some of this work be done this fall and perhaps during the winter to provide winter employment?

Mr. Harkness: There will be no changes required in the hangars. There will be a very small increase in maintenance personnel. There are only two of the stations in which there needs to be an increase in the length of the runways, one is at Penhold, Alberta and the other is at Moose Jaw. The runway at Moose Jaw is only 3,700 feet long and it will need to be extended to 6,000 feet. The work will not be undertaken this year because of the date of delivery of the new trainer, which will not be until 1963. It is not a priority matter to lengthen the runways at the present time or in the next few months.

Mr. McMillan: I listened to the minister yesterday when he said that our troops were splendid and their equipment was excellent. I agree with the minister 100 per cent in his reference to our troops, but I have grave doubts about his description of their equipment. After listening to the debate in the committee yesterday and today, I have grave doubts about the equipment provided for the three services. At this particular time, I want to refer to the equipment of the air service.

Now, the Voodoo airplane which is being purchased is a second hand plane. It is being purchased from the United States. The CF-104 is being made in Montreal. These two airplanes will not be effective operationally with the R.C.A.F. for some time. Certainly, there are none of these planes in Europe. I do not see how the minister can say that the equipment of the air wings in Europe is excellent, particularly when they are equipped with airplanes that cannot intercept some of the commercial jet aircraft. They certainly would not be fast enough to intercept enemy fighters or fast enemy bombers.

I have read several times in the press, and the truth is, that since the cancellation of the Avro Arrow program this government has had no definite defence policy at all. It is two and a half years since the Avro Arrow program was cancelled, at which time five airplanes were nearing completion. Only now are we starting to replace them, and with slower aircraft. It is true that the government proceeded with the construction of two Bomarc bases, one in northern Ontario and the other north of Montreal, but these will not be in operation for some months yet. After two and a half years, and when we have a crisis on our hands, we find we have no adequate air defence in Canada. We have outmoded fighter planes in Europe and we have two Bomarc bases that are non-operational.

I do not pretend to know anything about the Bomarc B, but I have read articles in the press, as I know other members have, emanating from the United States and dealing with tests that were made. These tests are certainly not very reassuring. At the time the decision was taken by this government to go ahead with the Bomarc B missile bases, I read one article concerning tests made in the United States. These tests would lead one to believe the Bomarc interceptor missile was of very dubious value. This article stated at that time that in 12 tests the missile got off the ground on only four occasions and only hit a slow moving target on one of the four occasions. There was a later article that appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on December 29, last and I have it here, concerning tests made of the Bomarc B missile at the Elgin air base in Florida. The article stated that the series of tests at that time were a success.

The article went on to say that eight of the tests were complete failures, and that 14 of the next 15 tests were successful. I suppose that means that in the next 15 tests the missile got off the ground 14 times, so that 14 successful tests out of 23 could not be described as great success. During these tests there was a near miss on a jet drone travelling at subsonic speed over the gulf of Mexico. The article only describes this one test, and I do not know whether or not more tests were made on a target. If the missile only made one near hit in the whole 23 tests, that is not very good.

I hope the minister can give us some information as to subsequent tests, and I hope the results were better than that. I have read some derogatory remarks from defence people in the United States concerning the Bomarc B. In view of this, I think the minister should allay some of our fears about the usefulness of the Bomarc B. As I said before, I hope he will give us some results of later tests, as these articles have appeared in the press. As I said earlier, I do not know anything about the Bomarc B. I think the minister owes it to the members of this committee and to the people of Canada generally to give some information as to the results of the latest tests made on the Bomarc B missile.

It is generally agreed that the Bomarc B missile is useless without an atomic warhead. The Prime Minister himself said this in effect two and a half years ago. He at least said that it could not reach its full potential use without an atomic warhead. I have the quotation here but I do not propose to give the quotation from page 1223 of Hansard. I heard the hon. member for Quebec East and the Leader of the Opposition quote from that speech today.

The Bomarc B will have atomic capability but the government will not announce whether or not an atomic warhead will be used. To me it looks as though United States personnel will be stationed at our two Bomarc bases and will have control of these Bomarc warheads and that we shall be able to use them only when they give us permission to do so.

After reading what the Prime Minister said over two and a half years ago about the Bomarc B and about its reaching its maximum potential only when it is equipped with an atomic warhead, I would conclude that the decision was made by the government at that time that when the Bomarc B missiles are completed they would be equipped with atomic warheads or that at least they would be available for use. As I said before, it is over two and a half years since the Prime Minister said that the government was examining various questions with the government of the United States in connection with the acquisition and storage of Bomarc B missiles. It has taken a long time to get an answer. One can only conclude that the examination is still in progress. Even though we assume that the Bomarc B is equipped with atomic warheads, that it can get off the ground and that it can hit the target more than once in 23 times, as was reported in earlier tests, the Bomarc B missile base is still itself a target. That fact has been brought out here today by the hon. member for Trinity and the Leader of the Opposition. It is a target for the intercontinental missile. It is also a target for an air to ground missile from a bomber. If these bases are put out of commission, these bombers can just roam at will as far as the Bomarc B missiles are concerned and certainly as far as our slower aircraft are concerned at the present time.

Yesterday the minister said that Russia had comparatively few intercontinental missiles. He said that the chief means of the delivery of atomic bombs by Russia was by bombers and that we need something to stop the bombers. This is a far cry from the words of the Prime Minister when he cancelled the Avro Arrow contract two and a half years ago. I also have here the words of the Prime Minister but I do not propose to quote them now. The reason given by the Prime Minister at that time was not that the Avro Arrow was not a good machine but rather that new projects were overtaking the aeroplane. Indeed, the main reason for cancelling that contract was that we would not need interceptor planes as they would be of no use against intercontinental missiles. The minister now tells us that we need interceptor planes almost more than we need anything else.

The minister says that the Liberals have no defence policy. After all, the Liberals were developing the fastest interceptor plane in the world. By now the R.C.A.F. would have been equipped with fast interceptor planes. The government scuttled the Arrow program, yet the minister says that our party has no defence policy. After killing the ace in our defence, they say that we have nothing left. I say that they have nothing left. They certainly have nothing left at this time with which to defend us here at home. As I said before, they have no interceptor planes that can take their part against enemy planes in Europe.

One or two of the Avro aircraft were flown with engines not adapted to them. I met a number of officers of the R.C.A.F. and I may say that they were greatly impressed by the speed of this aircraft, its manoeuvrability and its great climbing power. In any case, five of these planes at or nearing completion at the time were cut up by the blow torch and the opportunity was lost to test them further. There is no question about their being cut up by the blow torch. In an answer to a question by the hon. member for Trinity, as found at page 5683 of Hansard of July 8, 1959, the Minister of Defence Production stated as follows:

> The fact is that the ministry of national defence gave orders to my department, and my department to crown assets that all equipment should be taken out of these aircraft and that they should be reduced to scrap. Those were the orders received from national defence.

I have heard hon. members on the other side of the house disparage the Avro aircraft. If the performance of this aircraft was so poor, why did the government cut them up? Why did they not save them so that the R.C.A.F. might test them and prove to their own satisfaction whether or not they were good or whether they did not come up to the required specifications. I met many officers in the R.C.A.F. who had the impression that it would still be the fastest military plane in the world.

I heard some reference to the cost. I think the minister said this plane would cost $12.5 million. I read a speech of the Prime Minister in which he said that, with certain modifications, it would cost $7.8 million. Today the hon. member for Trinity mentioned a figure of $6.8 million. The hon. member for Trinity, in giving the offset cost against the Avro Arrow, did not mention the Bomarc B bases. These cost well over $100 million, and as far as we have been able to find out they are not much use. Certainly if this were put as an offset against the cost of the Avro Arrow, the government is spending just about as much money.

The government started out on this Bomarc B program and these cheaper and slower airplanes because they did not have the money. Why did they not have the money? The weird financing of this government, the promotion of higher interest rates by the conversion loan and other fiscal procedures have certainly saddled us with a great deal of debt. Already the extra interest aggregates over $800 million. I think this, and this alone, is the main factor why we have no defence policy; why we are accepting slower airplanes than the Avro. This is the main reason why our airmen in Europe and here in Canada would be sitting ducks for faster airplanes.

If our equipment is as excellent as the minister says it is, why is he now buying secondhand airplanes from the United States? I think the government has given greater priority to the payment of higher interest rates than they have to an adequate national defence. Unfortunately for us the government has been more solicitous of the money changers of our defence and the personnel manning that defence.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in connection with the rather extraordinary statements which have just been made. In the first place, the hon. member said the F-101B is a secondhand airplane. This is not so. This is the latest two-engined interceptor that the United States have in their system. The airplanes that were secured from them are not secondhand airplanes; they are airplanes that came off the assembly line just a few months ago. Of course they have been tested, and so forth, but this has to be done with every airplane. Therefore any allegation that these are secondhand airplanes is just not correct.

The hon. member is under a complete misapprehension about the Arrow. It would not have been in service had the program been completed. The Arrow would not have been in service until late in 1962. We will have the F-101B's in service more rapidly than we would have had the Arrows in service had the program been continued. I should like to correct that misapprehension.

Mr. Hellyer: You only say that now because you cannot be disproved.

Mr. Harkness: I am not going into this Arrow matter again. I spoke on it two days ago and I spoke on it at some length this afternoon. I simply repeat the fact that it would have been an extraordinarily expensive program which the defence budget just could not stand and which the Canadian taxpayer could not stand. It was a terrible mistake that the program was ever initiated, and I think we have to accept that this was the case. The result was that a good deal of money was wasted on it. The hon. member says the Bomarc B is no good and he talks about some of its—

Mr. McMillan: I did not say that.

Mr. Harkness: —early failures. This is what the hon. member said, as I wrote it down. The hon. member said there had only been one successful bid out of 23 tries, and so on.

Mr. McMillan: I read that from the press. I did not say that was true.

Mr. Harkness: If you did not believe it to be the case, you should not have put it on the record of the House of Commons. You should take the responsibility for what you say.

Mr. McMillan: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I did not say that was the case. I said I did not know anything about the Bomarc B; that I had read this in the press. I hoped this was not the case, and I asked the minister to give us the results of some further tests.

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, last year and the year before in the early testing and the development of the Bomarc B which was then going on, every time a failure of a Bomarc firing was announced the hon. gentleman opposite rose and hailed it with the greatest of glee. They made as much out of it as they could. They asked all kinds of questions and made all kinds of jibes at the then minister of national defence.

Of course, when there began a series of reports of successful firings of the Bomarc B they stopped that tactic. This is the first time for some time that anything has been said about the firing ability of the weapon, its accuracy, and so forth.

A few months ago I was down at Elgin field. I saw a firing of this weapon. It was a highly successful firing. I talked to the people in charge of the program. I spent over a day there. We have two R.C.A.F. officers attached to the field. They have been there a considerable length of time. I saw records of the firings of this weapon, which are very extensive now. The weapon is well proved and is highly successful.

Reference to early failures when the weapon was being developed are of course not applicable at the present time. The hon. member said the Arrow was the ace in the defence policy. He seems to think the Arrow was the chief piece of equipment and the cornerstone of our whole defence policy. This was never the case. Then he went on to say that now we have no Arrow, we have nothing.

That is also completely contradictory of the policy adopted by the Liberal party in January and the policy they have been stating since, that we do not need interceptors; we should have only a few airplanes for reconnaissance and identification purposes, but they should not shoot.

The hon. member is now stating a proposition completely contrary to that when he says the Arrow was the ace in the defence policy. It was, of course, nothing of the kind. It was one piece of hardware. It proved to be much too expensive a piece of hardware, and if we had gone ahead with it, it would have resulted in a completely unwarranted proportion of the defence dollar going into one particular piece of equipment.

The hon. member then went on to say the Bomarc bases cost over $100 million. As far as Canada is concerned, this is just fantasy. The actual estimated cost to Canada of these two Bomarc bases has been put on the record previously. The total cost of the two bases, the one at North Bay and the one at La Macaza, will be $13,993,560. Over half of that amount has been spent up to date. The annual cost to us of maintaining these two bases will be about $1 million.

Mr. Hellyer: Too much.

Mr. Harkness: It will be just over $1 million a year. As a result, the Bomarcs are actually the greatest defence bargain I think Canada has ever secured. We are getting a greater amount of protection and value from these two Bomarc bases, per dollar invested in them, than from any other kind of equipment that we have ever secured in recent years. That is the actual story in connection with this.

I have read in newspapers the statements which have been made by members of the Liberal party. They have said these Bomarc bases are terrificly expensive and are costing Canada $50 million or $100 million a year.

Mr. Hellyer: We did not say "in Canada"; we said "total cost".

Mr. Harkness: They said the bases were costing $100 million each, and so on and so forth. As I say these are the actual figures. They are, from the national defence point of view, a very great bargain indeed.

Mr. Hellyer: Before we leave the subject of the Bomarc I wonder if the minister will explain how the Bomarc operates against ballistic missiles launched from beneath the wings of aircraft. This is really the central argument.

Mr. Harkness: I have mentioned several times in this debate that the Bomarc is designed against the manned bomber. It does not deal with intercontinental ballistic missiles, and any mention of it in connection with those missiles is, unless it springs entirely from ignorance, designed only to confuse the issue. It has been stated time and time again that the Bomarc has no connection with intercontinental ballistic missiles—stated so often that I do not know why this question continues to be brought up. The hon. member referred to intercontinental ballistic missiles but he was, I think, referring to air surface missiles launched from aircraft.

Mr. Hellyer: That is what I said. The minister was not listening.

Mr. Harkness: I was listening carefully. Perhaps the hon. member made a slip of the tongue. However, this has been asked so frequently—the hon. member asked it the other day. He asked whether the Bomarc was any good against intercontinental ballistic missiles.

Mr. Hellyer: I said: stand off bombs from bombers.

Mr. Harkness: He said that the other day when he was speaking. Attempts to confuse the issue in this way will get nobody any place.

As far as the stand off bomber is concerned, how many stand off bombers there are or will be, and at what range they will be able to fire their missiles is something that we at present do not know. The Americans have such missiles. The weapon is still in the development stage but I think it has been developed to the point where the range runs up to 300 or 350 miles. They expect that in future it will have a range of a thousand miles. Whether or not the Russians have any of these weapons yet we do not know, but we must assume that if they have not got them they will probably get them shortly. But if they have anything like the range that they have at the present time the Bomarc is going to be effective against them long before the bombers can get off their missiles against the Bomarc bases. In any event, we are dealing here with what the possibilities are likely to be in the future. It is a matter of speculation, not a matter of fact.

Mr. Hellyer: Before we leave this point may I say that this is the type of information which the minister gives the committee—information which misleads both the committee and the Canadian public. The minister knows that the range of the Hound Dog missile is greater than the range he has just given. He also knows, or should know—we presume he has some of these facts at hand since he is minister of defence—that the range of the ballistic missile which will be carried by the B-52 bomber and the British V-bombers is considerably greater than that range. The figure used by the President of the United States in his message to congress was 1,000 miles. That is a far cry from 300 miles, and it does not help the discussion here for the minister to pick the figure of 300 miles in an endeavour to convince us that since 300 is less than 400 his Bomarc will be effective, still less that it will be effective in the future.

The Bomarc stations are not yet operational. The minister has not yet made up his mind as to whether they are to have atomic warheads or not. By the time he does the Russians will certainly have this type of ballistic missile with a range far greater than the range of the Bomarc. The minister cannot continue to mislead the public and the committee any longer in this regard. He has got to admit that as far as the future is concerned the Bomarc is useless because the carriers against which it is designed will never come within range of it.

Mr. Harkness: I have had about enough of this constant harping about my misleading the committee. I state in the most definite and categorical terms that I have given no information to this committee in which I do not firmly believe and for which I have not got a basis of expert opinion behind me. As to misleading the committee, may I say that the hon. member for Trinity gives figures which he pulls out of his imagination and out of the air. He says: these are the correct figures; all the figures produced by the defence departments of the whole western world are wrong. I have had enough nonsense of that kind. The hon. member is completely childish in making these repeated statements along that line and I think he should get wise to himself.

Mr. Hellyer: And I think we have had enough of these childish interruptions by the minister. I think he often gives to this committee information which is not accurate, and he must know it. He then takes the liberty of hiding behind security regulations—he cannot disclose the true figures to the house, he says, because it would not be in the national interest for us to be told the facts. He can then get up and use any figures he likes; we do not know what is going on, but he does. Figures printed in the Congressional Record are not accurate, but his are; figures printed in the message sent by the President of the United States to congress are not accurate, but his are; figures shown to other hon. members in private by representatives of the armed forces of the western world are not accurate but his are. He is the only source of wisdom, the only source of accurate figures. He suggests if we had to rely on the minister's figures we would be in a sad state indeed and I deplore the type of accusation he has just made.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in the committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what business we shall be doing tomorrow? Perhaps the leader of the house would also give us some indication of what the business will be for next week.

Business of the House

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we shall carry on with the estimates of the Department of National Defence and we shall, I hope, finish them. Then we shall carry on with the estimates of the Department of Defence Production which I also hope we can finish tomorrow if we are to maintain the earlier hope that we would complete the work of the session in very good time.

On Monday and Tuesday of next week it is the intention to proceed with legislative items. The precise order in which they will be taken I shall announce tomorrow, but members might be prepared for the following items.

Appearing on Votes and Proceedings tomorrow will be a resolution referring to a proposal to introduce a bill dealing with amateur sport. There is a resolution already on the order paper dealing with national housing, another concerning the centennial and another concerning school lands. Hon. members should be ready for debate on the four matters which I have mentioned.

Tomorrow it is the intention to bring forward for first reading the bill concerning what we have been calling the Pine Point railway. We had a discussion of the resolution earlier in the summer and passed it. If first reading is given to the bill tomorrow it would be available for second reading on Monday.

The bill on the order paper concerning the Civil Service Act is in the committee stage and might be called.

Those are the items that the house might be ready to give consideration to on Monday and Tuesday in the resolution stage and then in the bill stage. The order in which they will be taken up I will give tomorrow.

It being 33 minutes after 10 p.m., the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

232. Departmental administration, $3,455,378.

Inspection services—

233. Operation and maintenance, $7,224,436.
234. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $211,000.

Royal Canadian Navy—

235. Operation and maintenance, $208,135,049.
236. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment, $71,823,500.

Canadian Army—

237. Operation and maintenance, $359,572,000.
238. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment, $60,556,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11 a.m.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS TO INDIAN STUDENTS

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will be interested to learn that for the 1961-62 school year, 26 scholarships ranging in value from $250 to $1,750 are being awarded to Indian students of outstanding ability to encourage them to continue with their studies. The greatest number of scholarships previously given in any year since the government instituted this program in 1957 was 18, so the 26 awards for this year represent a substantial and encouraging increase.

Indians from Ontario and Quebec shared 14 scholarships; six were awarded in Saskatchewan and three each in the maritimes and British Columbia. The new awards include eight for university training; three for teacher training; four for nursing; six for various kinds of vocational training; four for studies in the arts; and, for the first time, one for forestry. It is particularly interesting to note the wide range of studies chosen by the recipients of university scholarships, which include dentistry, medicine, law, engineering and home economics.

I have a list of the scholarships here, Mr. Speaker, and if the house would give permission I should like to have it incorporated at this point with this announcement in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to incorporate the list in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The list referred to above is as follows:]

List of Scholarship Winners—1961-62

B.C. Region

Catherine Leo, Kyuquot band, university scholarship, University of B.C., arts $1,200.

Rennie Brown, Gitlakdamix band, teacher training scholarship, University of Alberta, $1,200.

William Etzerza, Tahltan band, vocational scholarship, commercial training $1,050.

Saskatchewan Region

Thomas Stevenson, Cowessess band, cultural scholarship in music, $850.

David Sparvier, Cowessess band, university scholarship, University of Ottawa, arts, $1,300.

Harvey Tootoosis, Poundmaker band, University of Saskatchewan, engineering, $1,375.

Ida Ruth Crowe, Piapot band, teacher training scholarship, $1,250.

Rosella McKay, Kahkewistahaw band, nursing scholarship, $525.

Bernice Stonechild, Muscowpetung band, nursing scholarship, $525.

Northern Ontario Region

Joseph Land, Islington band, cultural scholarship in art, Manitoba U., $1,500.

Rene Bannon, Fort William band, vocational scholarship, technical high school, $775.

Southern Ontario Region

Clare Clifton Brant, Mohawks of Bay of Quinte band, university scholarship, Queens University, medicine, $1,500.

Proposed Legislation

Maritime Region

Joan Johnson, Eskasoni band, university scholarship, Mount St. Bernard-Antigonish, home economics, $1,050.

Carl Sacobie, St. Mary's band, university scholarship, St. Thomas College, arts, $950.

Elizabeth Mathews, Eskasoni band, nursing scholarship, $250.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Perhaps I might be permitted to express my gratification, not merely as a member of parliament but as the person who occupied the position now occupied by the hon. lady at the time this system of scholarships for Indians was instituted. I am gratified that this system is so satisfactory in the view of my successor.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Not having had the background which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has had, I cannot take any credit myself for this. However, we in this group also welcome the announcement of the minister. It is extremely gratifying to us that there are increases and we hope there will be increases in the future in such scholarships to our native people. The advancement of our native people, in all forms, rests so much upon the education of the younger children.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSTRUCTION OF LINE TO GREAT SLAVE LAKE

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-126, respecting the construction of a line of railway in the province of Alberta and in the Northwest Territories by Canadian National Railway Company from a point at or near Grimshaw, in the province of Alberta, in a northerly direction to Great Slave lake, in the Northwest Territories.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Before the motion is put, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether the agreement upon which the resolution was based and, I presume, upon which the bill is based has been finalized between the government and the company?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, the agreement has been finalized.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister table it before we discuss second reading of the bill?

Mr. Balcer: I will study the request of my hon. friend and let him know later in the proper fashion.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Speaker.]

TRADE

ACCRA—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED STATEMENTS BY CANADIAN MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether statements made during the last two days at Accra in Ghana by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce behind closed doors, we are told, but given to the press in whole or in part, were approved in advance by the government.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to secure a copy of those statements as yet, though I have endeavoured to do so. Communication between Canada and Accra by telephone is a major difficulty. I tried to do so yesterday afternoon for a number of hours. However, I think I should say at this time that throughout the years this party has stood for a strong commonwealth, and this during the days when there were others in other parts of the house who did not hold that view.

An hon. Member: Including South Africa.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We still believe in the maintenance of a strong and effective commonwealth. That we have succeeded in many of the things we have endeavoured to do in that connection is apparent from the fact that we brought about a trade and economic conference. If anyone has any doubt about the stand we have taken in that regard he has but to read Taylor's book on the commonwealth, "The Years of Challenge".

Whatever the statements made may have been, any discussion thereon will be fruitless until those statements are available. The view of this government was expressed by me yesterday and on previous occasions. Our desire is not in any way to interfere with the right of any other member of the commonwealth to determine the course it will take, any more than other parts of the commonwealth can determine ours. However, we have the right among ourselves to point out the potential or possible effects of the action of any member of the commonwealth on the other members. Our desire is a strong and effective commonwealth, and to that end are our purposes directed and our representations made.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in view of what the Prime Minister has said, and before I ask a supplementary question, may I be permitted to say that not only do we on this side agree that there should be a strong commonwealth, but we believe that if it had not been for Liberal government policy in Canada in the past there might not have been any commonwealth at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider it proper if the United Kingdom government indulged in the same kind of public criticism of Canadian policy that Canadian ministers are now aiming publicly at United Kingdom government policy on a matter so politically controversial as the one we are talking about.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to answer that question. When the hon. gentleman protests as to the attitude taken by this government to the commonwealth I would just recall the fact that in 1956 his leader said the days of power, in so far as the United Kingdom and France were concerned, were over. That was their attitude to Britain.

Mr. Pearson: That is not what he said. On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister sees fit to quote in this house from one of his predecessors, he should quote accurately and not misrepresent what was said.

[Later:]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance said at Accra, as reported by the Southam news service:

> The United Kingdom cannot have a foot in each group and retain the freedom of action which is necessary to the leadership of the commonwealth.

Was he speaking for the government, or expressing the views of the government at that time?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have already made very clear the views of the government with respect to this matter. I am not going to discuss reported statements until I see the remarks that have actually been made. I have seen reports of statements allegedly made by both the hon. gentleman and the Leader of the Opposition that I am sure they did not make. I am giving the same consideration to some of the remarks allegedly made at this conference.

Mr. Pearson: In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has mentioned me, may I say that when I am faced with a quotation of that kind, which he says I did not make, I do not give it to the press in advance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I seem to recall one which had to do with—no; that was a statement on a television program.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister based upon an excerpt from a speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on this same occasion at Accra. The excerpt is as follows:

> And so we in Canada are convinced that we are considering not only an economic problem which has far reaching implications for all of us, but also a problem which involves the future of the commonwealth itself. We strongly urge the government of the U.K. to consider this matter in this broader concept when the negotiations with the E.C.M. countries commence in the near future, and ensure that the trading arrangements which exist between the U.K. and her commonwealth partners which have been mutually beneficial over so many years remain unchanged.

My question is this. Is it the view of the government that any effort by any member of the commonwealth to change its trading pattern places the commonwealth itself in jeopardy?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is another of those hypothetical questions based on a hypothetical quotation. I think it is perfectly clear that each member of the commonwealth may take the course it desires at all times, giving the fullest consideration, as Mr. Macmillan said would be the fact, to the effect it would have on other members of the commonwealth.

Indeed, I rely very strongly on the statement which the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom made in the House of Commons that an application was made for membership to the end that through negotiation the situation might be determined. He also stated —and I know this is the attitude of the United Kingdom government, and at all times it has been their attitude during the period in which the responsibility of government has rested upon my colleagues and myself—that in anything they do every consideration is given by them to assuring the achievement of that which is the common objective of both our governments, namely a strong and effective commonwealth, and that nothing should be done without the fullest consideration and regard always being paid to the welfare of all other members.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of what he has just said. In view of what he has said, will the right hon. gentleman instruct the ministers concerned to stop their public squealing before Canada is hurt?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not think the hon. gentleman is very much concerned about the latter part. I think that was an addition to the question. I have seen statements made by the hon. gentleman to which I might have ascribed the same words that he now ascribes to the statement which has been read.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I may direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Are we to understand from the answers he has given with respect to the statements which appear in quotation marks, alleged to have been made by the ministers in Accra, that there was no agreed position which the ministers were to take, determined in advance in Ottawa?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The agreed position was declared by me on behalf of this party and the government, in the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Evidently the ministers did not understand it.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I apologize for not sending him notice owing to the rush of affairs. My question is this. In view of the recent disturbing developments which have taken place in the Congo, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position to comment on the present situation in Katanga province?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I share the concern which I know is felt by all hon. members of this house at the turn of events in Katanga. I am disturbed by the most recent press reports as to the apparent deterioration in the situation there. As I told the house on Wednesday last, it had been our hope that the action taken by the United Nations forces in the Congo would forestall the outbreak of large scale violence and would bring the potentially dangerous situation there effectively under control.

In view of the absence as yet of direct reports from our own people in the Congo, or of an official report from the United Nations command on the most recent developments, I do not wish to go any further than this in offering detailed comment at this stage. As the house is aware the secretary general, Mr. Hammarskjold, is still in Leopoldville, and will be in a position to report personally on these developments when he returns to New York in the near future.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister—

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for St. Boniface has a supplementary question.

Mr. Regnier: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister explain the role of the United Nations in the Congo, and can the United Nations interfere in the political and local administration of a province in the Congo?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, it would not be opportune for me to explain the role of the United Nations in the Congo on orders of the day. I believe that the effort now being made by the United Nations in Katanga is designed to bring all parts of that unfortunate country into one unit and under the control of one central government.

AIRPORTS

FORT WILLIAM—STATEMENT ON IMPROVEMENT OF RUNWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): On Monday last the hon. member for Fort William asked a question concerning the runways at the lakehead. I have made inquiries and find that an operational requirement for improving the runways at the lakehead to accommodate larger aircraft has not been submitted to my department by T.C.A. Consequently there are no immediate plans to improve the runways at the lakehead. If an operational requirement for such improvement were presented and approved by treasury board, a suitable item would be placed in the estimates of my department to meet the requirement.

HUMAN RIGHTS

REPORTED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FRENCH CANADIAN CHARWOMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister been informed that the Ontario Building Cleaning Company Limited, which has contracts with the federal government, has practised discrimination against a French Canadian charwoman working on those contracts?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Caron: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If it is established that the Ontario Building Cleaning Company is practising discrimination, is it the intention of the department to cancel the contract on the basis of the bill of rights?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I fail to see how the hon. member could expect an answer to a question as hypothetical as the one he is posing.

Mr. Caron: Perhaps I could put it this way, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister establish an inquiry to see if it is true?

Mr. Grafftey: Divide and rule again.

Mr. Caron: If I am not to receive an answer, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State.

(Translation):

In a matter of such importance, could we be assured of the good offices of the Secretary of State?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): I am always willing to be of assistance.

(Text):

[Later:]

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I was at a loss to understand the purport of the question of the hon. member for Hull which appeared to be a speech and a political one at that; but if he has any facts to substantiate the alleged story in the press I would be happy if he would bring them to my attention. As he must have been aware long since, in my position I am the champion of all efforts to see that there is no discrimination of any kind as to language, race, religion or even politics, and that is more than the hon. member for Ottawa West can fully comprehend. In fact we have even hired some Liberals.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, may I tell the minister that since the present Secretary of State for External Affairs left the public works portfolio, no Liberal has been placed, because the present minister is one who always plays politics.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Caron: I will send the details to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope hon. members on both sides will not take further liberties with the question period.

WATER RESOURCES

TRENT WATERWAY—INQUIRY AS TO MAINTENANCE OF WATER LEVELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a letter from chief engineer A. J. Bonney, informing him that the water flow past the Peterborough Hydraulic Power Company was 300 cubic feet per second less than expected, in spite of the fact that the storage lakes in the Haliburton region were well up?

Would the minister explain why this has happened, and whether there has been a change in policy in this regard in spite of assurances that were given?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to send me notice of his question. On the first point mentioned by the hon. member, a letter has been received from a Mr. A. J. Bonney of the Quaker Oats Company at Peterborough, and the points he has raised are now under study. A reply should go out shortly.

On the second point, I informed the hon. member on April 18, in this house, that no major changes in the method of regulation are likely to be made this year. This has, in fact, been the case. There are bound to be minor fluctuations from year to year, resulting both from over-all water levels in the system and from the varying needs of different groups. The hon. member must be aware that there are widely varying views among different public groups in the area as to the best method of water regulation on the Trent system.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED IRREGULARITIES RESPECTING ELECTION OF SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Would the minister have any comment to make on an item which was published in this morning's Gazette and which reads as follows:

(Text):

A former Quebec liquor police inspector testified yesterday he worked for two months as a political organizer in the riding of Secretary of State Noel Dorion during the 1958 federal election campaign and was paid with fraudulent expense accounts.

Rene Mercier, 45, said he did "election work" in Bellechasse riding—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member appears to be reading a rather lengthy excerpt on a question which, although I did not hear it completely because of the switch from English to French, did not seem to relate to the public responsibility of the Secretary of State. If I am mistaken in that I shall be glad to be advised, of course.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, in the first place I was not reading a lengthy excerpt. I was reading one short paragraph from an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of September 15, 1961. I was asking the Secretary of State whether he had any comment to make on it. I think that is a perfectly normal and ordinary question, and I again ask the Secretary of State whether he has a comment.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member proceeds, did the question relate to a public servant or was it a question arising out of some election activity? If so it does not seem to me to be a matter of the administrative responsibility of the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the question relates to the minister himself. I should think the minister would be the first to want to make a comment on that item.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question, as the hon. gentleman must know, is not a proper one; but I think since a portion of the particular news report has been read the Secretary of State ought to have the opportunity of answering it.

(Translation):

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I heard about this last night through a journalist. I inquired of those concerned in order to know what was mentioned in the evidence referred to in the Gazette, and I must say that contrary to the allegations of the journalist my name was never mentioned during that preliminary investigation.

I must add, moreover, that I never had anything to do whatsoever with the administration of Quebec liquor control board authorities.

Finally, after inquiring of my chief organizer during the last election campaign, the latter told me repeatedly that he never retained the services of any police officer from the Quebec liquor control board to work for my election.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEW BRUNSWICK—CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING TAX COLLECTING ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister replied to a recent communication from the premier of New Brunswick concerning federal proposals dealing with tax collecting arrangements?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a reply has been given to the premier of New Brunswick.

[Later:]

Mr. Creaghan: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. A moment ago the Prime Minister answered in the affirmative my question concerning correspondence with the New Brunswick premier. Would the Prime Minister make a statement on it, or agree to table the correspondence?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the best course would be, with leave of the house, to table the correspondence, although the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate usually rises to ask that it be printed as an appendix. While I have not asked the permission of Mr. Robichaud, I am sure he would not object to the reply being tabled as well as his letter, because he gave publicity to his letter in detail at the time he forwarded it to me.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I might ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question which he has almost invited me to put. He may wish to have some consultations, but at the first convenient opportunity would he make available in good time all the correspondance there has been with the provincial governments since the last meeting of the conference, so that it will be available for study before we undertake consideration of the legislation now on the order paper?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I accede to that request with great pleasure, and will make available copies of all the correspondence that has passed. In the meantime I would ask that my letter to Premier Robichaud and his reply be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to have printed as an appendix to today's Hansard the correspondence mentioned, namely the letter from the premier of New Brunswick and the Prime Minister's reply?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of correspondence above referred to see appendix.]

SHIPPING

COMMUNICATIONS FROM U.K. RESPECTING CANADIAN SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises out of a news story appearing in the Times of London of September 12, 1961. Has the government received two memoranda from the British government relating to the government's shipbuilding subsidy? If so, what is the effect of such memoranda?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take this question as notice.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF RAYMOND DUPUIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is Mr. Raymond Dupuis, the chairman of the Union Nationale party convention to be held in Quebec on September 23, the same Raymond Dupuis who is a member of the board of directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? If so, would the minister say whether it is proper for a member of the board of directors of the C.B.C. to act as chairman of a political rally?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about the political activities, past, present or future, of Mr. Dupuis.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the minister inquire if Mr. Raymond Dupuis is the same person acting in both capacities?

Mr. Grafftey: Find out for yourself.

NIAGARA FALLS AND TORONTO—COVERAGE OF POLITICAL CONVENTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Can the minister inform the house whether the C.B.C. has been asked to give free live coverage to two political conventions to take place in Niagara Falls and Toronto in the month of October and, if so, what decision has been reached?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I will make inquiries with respect to that matter. If the hon. member will advise me as to the political conventions she has in mind, it might make the inquiry much easier.

Miss LaMarsh: I will be glad to send a memorandum to the minister.

IMMIGRATION

FRANCIS TOBIAS—INQUIRY AS TO LETTER RESPECTING DEPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cartier asked me yesterday whether I had received a letter from one Sophia Horan concerning one Francis Tobias. A search has been made of my records, and I am advised that no such letter was received.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO FITTINGS ON SHIP GIVEN TO WEST INDIES

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister aware that the gear and fittings on the Federal Maple, one of the ships given to the West Indies federation by Canada, is marked "made in U.S.A." or "made in England" and, despite the government's buy-Canadian program, the cutlery on the ship is Japanese and the china is from the United States?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not made an examination of this ship to the extent that the hon. member appears to have done. These particular details do not come under my department at all.

TRANSPORT

P.E.I. CAUSEWAY—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON FEASIBILITY STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask an unrelated question of the Minister of Public Works in the hope that he will give a plain answer and not make another political speech. My question is this. Has the long awaited and long delayed feasibility study on the causeway to Prince Edward Island been completed and, if so, will it be published?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, a former student of law, has been very quiet this session—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Walker: —and it seems odd that he cannot think of anything better to raise at the moment. He knows full well the tremendous problem involved in this investigation, a problem that has so far never been solved anywhere in the world.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Ottawa West is rising on a point of order.

Mr. McIlraith: We have had this spectacle of the Minister of Public Works contravening the rules in his answer to the question asked. The question appeared to be in order and the answer was completely out of order, in that it made gratuitous and personal references to the member asking the question and did not deal with the subject matter of the question. My point of order is that if the question period is to be kept effective and serve any purpose, the answers to questions must be brought within the rules just as the questions now are.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate that the hon. member and most hon. members, I think, wish to observe the established practices. In this instance I think both the questioner and the questionee expressed themselves in terms beyond the normal range of questions and answers.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I might put a supplementary question to the hon. gentleman, and ask him if he knows that the causeway is now referred to in Prince Edward Island as the "pauseway".

Mr. Walker: I know the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is referred to as the lost cause in Newfoundland.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Royal Canadian Air Force—

239. Operation and maintenance, $536,666,000.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, yesterday in a discussion of air force matters the hon. member for Trinity put on the record some fantastic figures of his own devising as to the cost of the acquisition of the F-101 airplane and the manning of the Pine Tree line that were involved in this particular deal. At the time I said if the allegation had come from a serious source I would have taken it seriously. However, I considered the source from which it came and merely said the figures the hon. gentleman was producing were comparable to figures he had produced before, which were quite evidently out. The Canadian Press carried a story in one of the morning newspapers making use of those figures and I think, therefore, I should refer back to what I said in connection with the cost to Canada of the acquisition of the F-101 and the manning of the radar stations on the Pine Tree line.

In order that there may be no question as to what the cost is, I refer to the figures I gave on June 13, which are the estimate of responsible officials of the department. They are the figures which will be used so far as the coming year's operations are concerned in the estimates which are put before this house for approval. I think they are the accurate figures and the figures that must be accepted.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

At that time, on June 13, I said in answer to a question by the hon. member for Laurier that the annual cost of civilian staff operation and maintenance—this is the cost for the radar stations of the Pine Tree line which Canada has agreed to take over—is estimated at $5 million for 1961-62; $9.6 million for 1962-63; $15.1 million for 1963-64 and $16.1 million when the stations are fully manned. The NORAD agreement is to run until 1968, when it will be reviewed. The total estimated cost during that period is $94.1 million.

Then there was a supplementary question as to the cost of armed services personnel. I said that the military personnel, of course, will be provided from within existing R.C.A.F. staffs. The total number which will be required to man these stations will be in the neighbourhood of 1,700 to 1,800—I am speaking from memory now but I know it is in that area—and some 800 to 900 civilian staff. There was a further supplementary question, and I said that the estimated cost of the 1,700 to 1,800 military personnel which will be involved in manning these stations when the take-over is complete is around $9 million a year.

I should like to point out that I stated the plan was to provide these out of existing members of the R.C.A.F. The estimate of the total cost of manning the Pine Tree line and the cost for the support for the F-101, which we have to pay for, is $170 million rather than the $490.9 million which the hon. member represented was going to be the cost. In this case, I think he had it for ten years. However, that is the actual figure, $170 million.

This estimate is made up of the cost of the civilian staff and maintenance, which I have mentioned, of $94.1 million; $14.1 million for the spares and support that we have to secure for the F-101; $61.8 million for the cost of military personnel. In addition, of course, under the deal we are giving $50 million of mutual aid and the United States is giving approximately $150 million in the form of F-104 airplanes to our NATO allies in Europe. This $200 million is to be spent in Canada for the production of F-104 airplanes. This is, of course, one of the very attractive features of this whole deal, and will provide $200 million worth of business which means a very large amount of employment to Canadian workers.

Those are the costs and the definite costs. In view of the completely irresponsible calculations which the hon. member for Trinity made and which, unfortunately, have been printed, I thought I should make this definite statement so there would be no question as to what the costs are in connection with this whole deal.

At the same time the hon. member for Trinity talked about the costs of the F-101 and the manning of the Pine Tree line, he referred also to evidence given by the present chairman of the chiefs of staff committee, the then deputy minister, before the defence expenditures committee as to the cost of the Arrow. He made an allegation that the statement of the present chiefs of staff committee was contrary to the figures which I had given relating to what would have been the cost of the Arrow. He subsequently accused me of lying and, of course, was completely out of order so he had to retract; nevertheless that appeared in the newspapers.

I should like to make it clear that the figures I have given in connection with this matter at various times were figures which I quoted from the proceedings of the special committee on defence expenditures. I had in my hand a copy of those minutes and read from them when I gave the figures. The whole story is here in these minutes of the special committee on defence expenditures; therefore there does not need to be any argument as to what the figures are or what was said.

I should like, however, in order to show that the present chairman of the chiefs of staff committee used the same figures which I used, refer to his evidence as found on page 136 of the regular proceedings for Friday, May 12, 1960. He stated at that time:

> So the figures to which the minister has referred in the amount of $7.8 million per copy is the average cost of the 100 aeroplanes.

This was on the presumption at that time, or the basis, that 100 airplanes would be secured. I should furthermore like to point out, however, that if the number had been reduced to the number of F-101's which we have actually secured, that is to 66, the cost per copy would be considerably higher and as a matter of fact would have come to something in the neighbourhood of $9 million for that smaller number of planes.

However, the main point is this, I think. All statements which I have made in connection with the cost of these planes were taken directly from the figures of the subcommittee and are substantiated by the officials in the department. These various allegations that I have been attempting to mislead the house and to give incorrect figures have no foundation in fact, as I think is quite apparent, I would hope that there would be no more wild statements of that kind.

The matter of continuing to flog the Arrow situation, of course, in view of the fact that it is now some considerable time since the contract was cancelled, I do not think gets us very far, where the discussion of the present estimates of the Department of National Defence is concerned. However, I think these two corrections were necessary so there will be no doubt whatever as to what the situation is in connection with either matter.

Mr. Pitman: Last night just before the supper hour the hon. member for Greenwood I thought made a very profound statement, and I think it certainly refers to this area of the R.C.A.F. perhaps even more than to any other area. He said that we on this side appeared to be dealing with unreality or war games, whereas the minister was dealing with reality. When the hon. member for Greenwood says anything we on this side of the chamber listen, and indeed we search ourselves to find out just exactly the reason for what he has said.

I am the first to admit that we are only a part of the whole, or that we are only a small link in this chain. However, it seems to me that we in this committee are concerned with deciding just how effective or how strong this link is, with the dreadful realization that a chain is only as strong as all its links. Why is it that the minister's statements have this air of unreality? I cannot help feeling that we have a defence policy in reverse. What we are doing is this. We decide that we are a small partner with limited resources and that we can do only a very little. We therefore adjust the threat to what we are prepared to meet, in terms of the small area with which we are dealing in our relations with our allies.

Yesterday one or two examples of that tendency arose under the army estimates, when we asked about the Canadian army looking after the shore lines of North America. No matter how often the Minister of National Defence says that the army is concerned with dealing with parachutists and stopping them from taking over our radar installations, I cannot believe that in an all-out nuclear war they would send planes anywhere near the radar installations without realizing that the whole strategic air command would be on them before the parachutists had taken over the D.E.W. line or any other area.

The same criticism applies with respect to the navy estimates. The hon. member for Trinity has suggested that the anti-submarine activities of the Canadian navy are completely and hopelessly out of date in relation to the kind of nuclear submarines that we know the Russians are making. What are we using for our knowledge? The hon. member for Trinity is using a great deal of material from the United States congress. To some extent I have been using material from the London institute of strategic studies, which has attempted to make some study of the threat. They tell us that the Russians have 500 submarines, 10 of which are atomic powered submarines.

Mr. Chambers: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. We have passed the estimates concerning the navy as well as those of the army. We are now dealing with the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. Pitman: I accept that point of order, Mr. Chairman, and will continue. I meant this only as an example of the same thing as that with which we are dealing now. The point is this. The reason for this feeling of unreality in the defence estimates is that what we are doing is adjusting the threat to what we think we can handle in our particular area in conjunction with our allies. I refer to this item for the R.C.A.F. We know that Russia is moving into the missile field. We know that we can do very little in this area, and indeed that the United States can do very little. So once again we adjust the threat to what we think we can deal with.

I tried to find out what the minister thinks the threat is. I think it is important to know this. Some extremely intelligent strategists have suggested that the Russians are manufacturing over 1,000 planes capable of making a one way flight. I think there are 100 to 200 which are long range planes capable of getting back again. However, it is suggested that over 1,000 planes can make a one way flight, and that is all that would be necessary.

The minister himself has suggested that the number of megaton bombs that could be dropped on the United States is unlimited, but he says he feels that the ability to drop them is limited. To what extent is it limited? This is what I want to know. He gave us some very interesting figures on the difference between a one megaton bomb and a five megaton bomb and he said that a five megaton bomb is not five times as effective as a one megaton bomb. There is no escalation in the price. A five megaton bomb is not five times more expensive or five times heavier. Therefore it is quite feasible that an aeroplane could carry 1 of these 100 megaton or super bombs, as has been suggested.

It seems to me that until we know what the absolute threat is, we cannot play our part. I realize that we are doing this in conjunction with our allies, but just how effective are we in this whole matter? If the Russians have 1,000 planes, one strategist suggests; that at least two thirds would get through. In the last war they were lucky to get 10 per cent through. But let us suppose that even with the much better bombers they have today and with the defence that is put up, 50 per cent get through. On this basis, in an all-out nuclear war, that would be enough to completely annihilate every single person on the North American continent.

I think the problem is that we must have some idea of what this danger is. I humbly appeal to the Minister of National Defence and to his department to tell the Canadian people just exactly what the threat is. What I am concerned about is the tremendous amount of propaganda that is coming out —I will not say it is from the Pentagon—to the effect that we can survive a nuclear war. Yet it has been suggested by the strategist whom I have quoted that there is no such possibility, no matter what kind of shelter we have or what emergency measures organization.

Perhaps I will be accused—and I hope that this will not be the case—of being childish and trying to scare people. I do not think this is the point at all. In a democracy I think if a danger exists we should have the truth. If it is suggested that the people cannot be told the truth because they would lose their compulsion or desire to fight, then I suggest that democracy has lost before the first missile has been launched.

I hope the minister will answer a few of these questions I have in this regard. To what extent is Russia armed with missiles that may be delivered by ICBM or by submarine? Perhaps along with that question I might ask this one, and here again I realize we are not trying to fight Russia by ourselves. Assuming the Russian determination, resources and technological skill which are quite evident from their research into space, how many years, will it be before they have enough missiles so they will be able to forsake bombers completely, and before the Bomarcs and other material we are using will be completely out of date? Can he give us any information in this area?

Mr. Harkness: First of all, the hon. member said he wanted the truth. I should like to emphasize the fact that every statement I make in regard to this matter is truthful as far as the facts at my disposal are concerned. I would not think of telling the hon. member or the Canadian public as a whole anything but the truth in regard to these matters.

The general situation is this. We know that the Russians possess a very considerable number of nuclear weapons. We know they have a large fleet of submarines. We believe they perhaps have some submarines that are capable of firing nuclear tipped missiles. As I say, we believe this is probably the situation; of course we do not know the order of battle of the entire Russian army, navy and air force. We naturally receive some intelligence reports in connection with this. I think the hon. member will realize, however, that it would not be in the interests of this country to state what the various intelligence estimates are from time to time as to Russian capabilities in certain of these things.

The statement I have made on several occasions previously and which I should like to repeat is that as far as air attack on this continent is concerned, we believe, and we think we have good reason for believing, that the number of intercontinental missiles which the Russians have and which would be available for delivery on this continent is quite limited. On the other hand, they have a very large fleet of both medium and long range bombers. Therefore in the event of a full scale nuclear war the appreciation is that the main weight of the attack would be delivered by these bombers.

The hon. member has said that, of course, in the last war a considerable number of bombers always got through. I said two days ago, I think, in this debate that naturally you cannot have a perfect defence against bombers or, as far as that goes, against almost anything else. But if your defence is sufficiently strong, that in itself constitutes a very strong deterrent to the use of these bombers, missiles or anything else. In other words, if we have sufficiently strong forces in the western world we thereby, in my view at least, greatly diminish the chances of attack. This is really the basis and the theory upon which the NATO alliance has been working, that if we maintain sufficiently strong forces, both nuclear and conventional, the chance of war is very much diminished because it would result in mutual destruction.

I do not think I can answer the hon. member's questions any better than that. I do not know if this is what he was trying to get at, but this is the situation as we see it.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, first I wish to thank the Leader of the Opposition for giving way a moment ago; I have to leave the committee in a moment. I wish to make it very clear that in saying the Canadian people wanted the truth I was not implying that the minister was not telling the truth. I was simply seeking more information.

I understand that Russia is still producing aircraft such as the Bear, the Tupelov type 20 turbo-jet, the Bison and the Myasishchev turbo-jet. Do we have any idea how many of these aircraft they have? I fully appreciate the desire for security, but is there any reason for our not telling the Russians how much we know they have? Does the minister think these aircraft are really important strategically?

Since rising to my feet in this debate I think I have apologized for asking questions of this sort. In the blue book it is mentioned that the CF-100 is limited in its role. Would the minister explain what is meant by that statement in the blue book? I think I am quoting it exactly.

Mr. Harkness: The speed of the CF-100 is of course slow in comparison with modern, high speed jet aircraft. Therefore the CF-100 would not be able to catch the later models of Russian aircraft which fly at supersonic speeds. The only way in which the CF-100 could shoot down an airplane of that kind would be by catching it on a collision course, as it is called, when they were coming in toward each other. That is what we mean when we say its capabilities are limited.

Mr. Pitman: Do the interceptor airplanes which have been purchased have the capability of intercepting the modern airplanes which the Russians have?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Pitman: I am interested in knowing exactly how many bombers, flying simultaneously toward strategic air command bases, a Bomarc base could be expected to successfully down.

Mr. Harkness: This is a matter about which I do not think there can be any definite answer. It would altogether depend upon how close together the airplanes were flying.

Mr. Hellyer: And whether the Bomarc had an atomic warhead.

Mr. Harkness: As the hon. member has interjected, and whether the Bomarc had a conventional or an atomic warhead, and many other factors.

Mr. Chevrier: And whether it was obsolete.

Mr. Pitman: My final question, Mr. Chairman, is this. What is the role at the moment of the mid-Canada and Pine Tree lines? Are they expected to pick up those airplanes missed by the D.E.W. line, are they for reporting later positions, or what is the major value of these rather expensive lines?

Mr. Harkness: The Pine Tree line is what you might call the line which directs the Bomarcs and the interceptors. It is the line which is used to engage hostile aircraft coming in over Canada. The D.E.W. line, on the other hand, is a straight warning line to give warning of the coming of these aircraft. The mid-Canada line performs the same function.

Mr. Pitman: I have one other question before I resume my seat. How much of a self contained infantry battalion with all its ancillary arms and services could the air force transport in a single airlift at this time? How capable is the air force of carrying on United Nations operations in this respect?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I could give the committee a great many figures in this respect as to the number of miles flown, the number of trips of different distances, and so on. When the new Yukon long range transports come into operation by the end of this year, they will be capable of transporting a battalion, together with its equipment, at one time. We will have that capability when these transports come into operation by the end of the year. I do not want to convey the impression that we have it at the moment, because the Yukons are not all in operation yet.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has made a plea for responsibility and accuracy in statements on this important matter, and I agree that this is of first importance. I find it difficult not to remind him of some statements which he himself has made and which contravene that principle, including his statement in Victoria as reported that the Arrow would have cost $15 million a plane.

I also wish to refer, because I think it should be corrected, to a statement which was made by the minister last evening and reported on page 8402 of Hansard with regard to Liberal policy on air defence and particularly continental air defence. The hon. gentleman said that the policy they have been stating since—"they" being the Liberal party, and "since" being last January—is that we do not need interceptors; we should have only a few airplanes for reconnaissance and identification purposes, but they should not shoot. The minister will have a hard time, I think, finding statements which I have made as the leader of this party since that time which would confirm that statement.

We have said that the number of interceptor squadrons, the number of continental air defence squadrons, should be reduced. I think I said it should be reduced to five or six squadrons. Well, the government itself have done this. They are, I understand, disbanding four of the nine squadrons, so the continental air defence force in this country will consist of five squadrons instead of nine. I do not know whether or not the minister considers that number to be sufficient for the purpose; I do not know whether he considers that to be only a "few" airplanes, but the number has been reduced.

Then we have said that we should not try to deceive anybody, especially our own people, by saying that those squadrons, especially squadrons of CF-100's—because that is what we were talking about at that time—could do anything to protect this country against the kind of jet bomber which now faces us if there should be war; because those particular planes, however effective they may have once been and however skilfully operated, could not intercept the latest jet bombers. The minister confirmed that this morning. So there would be no protection from planes of that kind. They are to be replaced now by a plane which is no longer in production in the United States but which, the minister says, will be effective for this purpose.

We have said, without trying to deceive our people as to what can be done that there should be five or six squadrons—and we shall now have five—of the latest type of planes for reconnaissance, identification, tracking and interception of isolated intruders, capable, if necessary, of dealing with them. This is the only effective role which can now be performed, as we see it, by the R.C.A.F. in this sphere. I am not talking about other important roles on which the R.C.A.F. should be employed.

Then the minister went on to attribute to us the statement that they should not fire. I have more than once in the last six months said that of course any planes being sent into the air for such a purpose would have to be armed, but that they should not be armed with nuclear weapons, because this would be too high a price to pay for bringing Canada into the nuclear club. That is our position on this matter. The minister has been talking about the threat which faces us, and so has the hon. member for Peterborough. The minister has reaffirmed this morning that the Arrow was too expensive a plane for the purpose we had in mind, and I agree with the hon. gentleman that it does not get us much further if we rethresh that old straw. But because I think it is of first importance in assessing this problem, together with what was done and what was not done to solve it, I put on record again the words of the then minister of national defence on February 23, 1959, as reported on page 1280 of Hansard, when he said:

> It would therefore not seem to make sense for us to go ahead and develop an interceptor which would be ready by the end of 1961 and which could be in squadron operation by the end of 1962, to meet a threat which would hardly exist at that time.

"That time" is 1962. We are purchasing these planes, or at any rate we are acquiring them from the United States—planes which are new to us but which are out of production in the United States now—to meet a threat which the minister of defence told us some years ago would hardly exist in 1962. That is the position.

As the hon. member for Peterborough has said, we on this side do not know all the facts of the situation. We do not have the information which is available to the minister. That is one of the handicaps under which we must labour, and we have had no defence committee this year which would enable us to ascertain such facts as were available. The minister said yesterday, and he has said many times, that this was our fault because we were given a chance to debate this subject. And so we were, about a year ago, or ten months or so ago. We were given it at a time when the Prime Minister could not be here, and on a short day. That was to be our debate on defence. The fact that we did not have a debate on defence that day is surely no answer to our criticism that since that time there should have been a committee set up to deal with these matters so that we might get all the facts which are available.

The hon. member for Peterborough asked about some of these things, including the nature of the threat which faces us from the air, the quantity and quality of the bombers and missiles which constitute that threat, and all the rest of it. The minister has said that for security reasons it would be improper for him to give us that information. Well, the hon. gentleman must be the judge of that. We do not quarrel with him on that point. Nobody wants to have information which would prejudice our security, though we do not need to apologize for asking questions. But I would remind the minister, and he must know this, that a great deal of this information is given in Washington including details, in so far as they have been ascertained, of the nature of the bomber threat which faces this continent. Any member of this committee can read chapter after chapter, blue book after blue book of evidence given, for instance, to the house committee on defence appropriations and get a great deal of detailed information which we do not have at our disposal in this chamber. If we did have that information perhaps we should be in a better position to discuss these questions.

I have some detailed questions which perhaps I could address to the minister at this time. They arise out of passages in the blue book which I have before me. I should like to ask what role will be performed in Europe by those four squadrons which are not being converted. The minister tells us that the CF-100 is not now capable of performing the role in continental defence which was given to it. Are the CF-100 squadrons, or they may be Sabre squadrons, capable of performing their role with NATO? Also, with respect to the F-104 aircraft for the new role of strike attack, is it a fact, as stated by experts, including General Foulkes—who of course is not responsible for government policy and is not speaking in any official capacity when he now talks or writes—that the F-104 aircraft cannot perform effectively the role of strike attack without carrying what have been referred to, among others by the NATO commander, as baby nuclear bombs?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition made some complaint about the statement I made to the effect that the Liberal party had withdrawn from the position taken at their national meeting. I am very glad they have, as a matter of fact. According to the newspapers they adopted a resolution at that meeting which, in effect, urged that we should stop wasting our defence resources on interceptor fighter squadrons and on Bomarc missiles, that although the United States with its vast resources and world responsibilities might find these forms of defence necessary there was no reason for Canada participating in that role in these circumstances.

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: The Liberal party went on record as being against having any fighter squadrons. As I stated, the Leader of the Opposition has since modified that position. I am glad he has modified it. I feel he has now adopted a much more realistic position.

The hon. member referred to a statement made two years ago or more by the former minister in connection with the diminishing bomber threat. Whatever might have been said by him at that time, the present situation is that we are confronted with a bomber threat. All western governments recognize that it exists and are taking measures to counter it. Despite what might have been said two years ago or more about anybody's appreciation of the situation at that time, it is at the present situation we must look.

I believe the Leader of the Opposition recognizes that the recent Moscow air show was a demonstration of the fact that the Russians have been continuing to build planes of modern design, contrary to what perhaps might have been thought two or three years ago, would be the situation. Actually the development of the so-called stand-off bomber, the air to surface missile carried by a bomber, has undoubtedly considerably prolonged the useful life of bombers. That is one reason that led to a considerable modification of the thinking of two or three years ago in regard to bombers.

The Leader of the Opposition wished to know about the role of the CF-100 in Europe, the four squadrons which are not being replaced by F-104's. SACEUR has requested that these squadrons remain there for at least two more years to meet an existing need. As far as the strike reconnaissance role of the F-104 is concerned, both SACEUR and the NATO council have asked Canada to assume this role with respect to the eight squadrons presently armed with Sabre aircraft which are now to be rearmed with the F-104. We have met that request.

The Leader of the Opposition asked if they would not be useless in that role unless armed with nuclear weapons. I believe that was the purport of the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: That is not the case. They could be armed otherwise and be effective to some extent, but there is no question but that they would be much more effective if equipped with nuclear warheads, just as in the case of the Bomarc and other weapons systems which are capable of carrying nuclear warheads. I think this is not an arguable matter. If you have a conventional warhead which has a force of one, and a nuclear warhead of the same size which has a force of one hundred, the nuclear warhead will be very much more effective. That is a plain fact. The situation with respect to F-104's is that they would be much more effective and destructive weapons if armed with nuclear warheads rather than conventional rockets.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, may I thank the minister for the information he has given. He has stated, and undoubtedly it is a fact, that while the former minister of defence spoke in 1959 and said the bomber threat would not likely exist to any extent in 1962, that situation has changed. A major factor which led the government to the decision it made in regard to air defence in 1959 turned out to be wrong in that the bomber threat, according to the minister, does exist, and it exists in an aggravated form perhaps because of what the minister has called the stand-off bomber by which a missile can be carried and let loose on a target, we have been informed, up to 1,000 miles away.

There is a difference of opinion on that. The minister says that range is too high. The information we have received indicates that if it is not now the range, it will be shortly. This, of course, establishes an entirely different set of conditions for continental defence against the bomber. The threat comes no longer from the bomber but from the missile which is capable of being discharged from a bomber at a distance of from 400 to 1,000 miles away from the target.

Presumably the government has had to modify its policy to meet that changed situation, and modification is a good thing when conditions change. I wish to assure the minister, however, that this party has not changed its policy with respect to continental defence, to which the minister made reference. We have not changed our minds. We should not be engaged in continental defence with the United States continental air defence command in a way which would necessitate Canada becoming a member of the nuclear club.

That, of course, applies both to interceptor squadrons and to the Bomarc missile. If it were felt on this side of the house that such weapons were absolutely essential for the protection of this country, this continent and the strategic air bases, that perhaps would not be too high a price to pay, although it would be very high. But this is not essential in our view, and therefore we should not be performing this role. While we would advocate a fighting role in the sense that the planes would be armed and in the sense that Canadians could not allow Americans to do the fighting and shooting for them, Canada's role should not be a fighting role, in the sense that the planes need not be armed with nuclear weapons; because we do not think that this would be necessary in view of the changing nature of the threat; if such a threat is going to make Bomarcs and other weapons of that kind ineffective very shortly if they are not ineffective now.

That is the situation, and we have not modified our stand in that regard. I have made it quite clear, however, that we think the squadrons the R.C.A.F. should have should be the most effective and efficient that can be secured in terms of equipment, and they certainly should be in a position to defend themselves.

With respect to another question I directed to him, the minister said that while the F-104 could perform a role without what are described as baby nuclear bombs, that role would not be of maximum effectiveness without such nuclear weapons, and we can leave it at that.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, in view of what the Leader of the Opposition has said about stand-off bombers, the size and range of the missiles which they might discharge and so on, and in view of what was said yesterday about them, I think I should quote an extract from page 12 of the testimony of the secretary of defence of the United States before the subcommittee of the committee on appropriations in April of 1961. This was his statement at that time:

> Also under development is a more advanced air to ground missile, the Skybolt. This is a solid fuel ballistic missile with a design range of about 1,000 miles. Whereas the B-52 can carry only two Hound Dog missiles, it would be able to carry four Skybolt missiles. The successful development of an effective Skybolt missile would offset the expected increase in Soviet air defence capabilities by increasing the effective attack radius of a B-52 and the penetration capability of its weapons, as well as increasing its ability to launch stand-off attacks on multiple targets. However, the Skybolt is a costly project and presents some unusually complex development problems. Even if the development is successful, it would take several years to bring it to operational status.

The hon. member for Trinity contended yesterday that this missile was in existence or would exist shortly, but the fact is that it does not exist. As the United States secretary of defence says, it presents a very difficult development problem, and even if the development is successful it will be several years before it will be in operation.

Mr. Hellyer: I thank the minister for that explanation. As he probably realizes, elsewhere in the same testimony it is indicated that the total SAGE-Bomarc system will not be in operation in its entirety for several years either, and the time lapse, if that is the proper term for it, is approximately the same in each case.

If I understood the minister correctly, he indicated that the bomber threat is more substantial than it was two or three years ago. He told us the night before last, I believe, that he did not say it was not diminishing, but this morning he gives the impression that the facts today are different from what they were then, and that as a result of the facts existing today the government should take some action to meet this threat even though earlier it was not considered to be required.

If the threat is greater today than was anticipated, why are the government only acquiring 66 planes, when earlier their appraisal was somewhat different even on the basis of their then belief that the bomber threat was not so great? As found on page 1281 of Hansard for February 23, 1959 the former minister had this to say:

We therefore concluded that the maximum number of aircraft that we would require to meet the threat would be approximately 100 . . .

If the threat is greater now, or is interpreted by the government as being greater now, why will 66 planes do more work now than 100 planes were estimated to be able to accomplish at that time?

Mr. Harkness: There is no magic in the figure 66 or in the figure 100 in connection with this particular matter. The important point is that with the "Sageing" of the whole NORAD system, which incidentally will be completed in 1963, the means of employing the Bomarc chain and the interceptors of both the United States and Canada is very greatly improved, and therefore the capability of the whole system is much higher than it was two years ago or three years ago. It has been constantly improved every year, in fact, and the ability of the system both to detect and then to direct on hostile intruders either Bomarc missiles or interceptor planes has been getting better and better all the time.

Therefore, as I say, there is no particular magic in 66 planes or 100 planes. You have an integrated system making use of the air defence command of Canada and the air defence command of the United States under the operational control of NORAD, and with constantly improving methods of employing those forces in order to destroy intruder aircraft.

Mr. Hellyer: With respect to the cost of operating the Pine Tree line, the minister told us this morning that the committee would have to accept the figures prepared by responsible officials of the Department of National Defence. Can the minister explain the discrepancy between the figures prepared by responsible officials of the Department of National Defence on a previous occasion and those given to the committee this morning?

Mr. Harkness: I do not know what previous occasion is referred to, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hellyer: I am referring to the time his predecessor gave figures to the committee on defence expenditures, which presumably were also prepared by responsible officials of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Harkness: I think where the confusion exists with regard to this matter perhaps lies in the fact that General Pearkes quoted a figure of $43 million which, to begin with, included $5 million for equipment to be purchased in Canada. This equipment was new radars. Therefore the actual cost of operation and maintenance was $38 million. However, the $38 million covered not only those radars but also the radars in Newfoundland, the gap fillers and so forth, the nine group one radars and all their associated gap fillers. They were not included in the 11 that we have taken over and the five which we have been manning already, and for which we have assumed financial responsibility.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say who is paying for the new heavy radars that are being built?

Mr. Harkness: This is part of a general cost sharing program of one third to Canada and two thirds to the United States. We are doing the construction as our contribution to the cost.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the discussion so far this morning, and have attempted to follow the minister's comments and statements. In order to have the matter clear perhaps I might give my understanding of his reasoning, and if I am in error in my interpretation of what he said he can correct me.

With respect to the use of the Bomarc, the Voodoo or CF-104 as I believe it is to be called, and perhaps even the Honest John surface to surface missile, I understood him to say that the greatest deterrent that exists to a war being started or visited upon us by enemy forces is if we have a sufficiently strong defence, and that the stronger our defence the greater is the deterrent to attack from other countries. If that is a correct understanding of what the minister said—

Mr. Harkness: It is the retaliatory forces.

Mr. Howard: This is what I want to get clear. It would seem to me that our defence and the deterrent is not the Bomarc, the rifle or the Honest John or any other kind of small, tactical weapon of that sort. The deterrent, as the minister has just stated, is the threat of retaliation, which is not something that Canada has. As I understand it, this threat of retaliation rests primarily at the moment in the United States strategic air command. The defence is really one of threatening to bomb the enemy country and do as much damage or more damage than the enemy expects he will be able to do to this country.

If that is a correct understanding, and I thought I had it correctly, then it seems to me that in view of what the minister told us on Wednesday, that NATO is and in fact has been since 1954 a nuclear element, operating on somewhat the same principle of retaliation as a defence more than anything else, Canada really is part of the nuclear club in NATO. It would seem to me that Canada is already part of the nuclear forces on the North American continent, whether or not we have such weapons in the hands of Canadian troops and on Canadian soil. It would seem to me that following this, whether we are in possession of the Bomarc with nuclear warheads or without them, or the Honest John or any other type of rocket with or without nuclear warheads, it really does not matter very much so far as being a deterrent to attack is concerned, because the deterrent rests not in our hands but in the hands of the United States strategic air command.

This is what makes incomprehensible to me the recent statement by the Leader of the Opposition that the acquiring of nuclear warheads by Canada is almost too high a price to pay, regardless of the circumstances, for some sort of defence. The defence rests in the possession by the United States of nuclear and thermonuclear bombs and in the threat of retaliation, the threat of destruction to other countries. It seems to me that following from that Canada is in precisely the same position on the North American continent as we are in Europe with the NATO forces; that is, that we are already a part of the nuclear club whether we like it or not, and whether or not we have nuclear warheads on Canadian soil attached to Bomarcs or anything else is relatively inconsequential.

The point in so far as the deterrent is concerned is that it is not our deterrent, it is not Canada that is threatening retaliation. The only deterrent that exists, as the minister has said, is in United States miltiary forces that are threatening this sort of retaliation. This is the only defence which exists and is the greatest deterrent to attack. I think we can assume that the same situation applies to the Soviet union. This is substantially their defence or offence policy, whichever way you want to classify it. Any other nation that comes, by its own right or through development, into possession of nuclear weapons will fall into almost the same category.

It would seem to me that the very moment we endorsed the NORAD treaty, which was supported by the Liberal party in this house, we in fact joined the North American nuclear club. Those are forces in the control of or under the domination of the nuclear deterrent in the United States. This makes me wonder even more whether the minister and the Liberal party when they were in office—because the development of the nuclear deterrent was in process then, and it was during their term of office that NATO followed nuclear strategy and the NORAD agreement was spawned and finally came to fruition—were telling a completely factual story of Canada's position in so far as North American defence is concerned. I think it would be much more in keeping with our sense of responsibility to the electorate if the government would make a clear, definite statement as to just precisely where Canada stands.

It is my interpretation, following from what the minister has said and in this I may be incorrect, that Canada is in fact a participant in a nuclear agency, NATO. If that is the case, and I take it that it is, it seems to me also that Canada is a participant in another nuclear agency, namely that of the United States, primarily through our participation in NORAD. If these are the facts then they should be stated clearly to the Canadian public. There should not be any of this nonsense, and I term it nonsense in retrospect, of people in high places in this government talking about no nuclear weapons in the hands of Canadian troops; no nuclear weapons on Canadian soil, then changing later to say that there might be, depending on what arrangements we can work out with the United States and depending on what congress does with certain laws that exist down there. In my opinion this is all just a lot of double talk on the part of the government. If my interpretation is not correct, then I should like the minister to straighten it out.

Stated again, not for repetition only but just so it is clear, it is my understanding following upon what the minister stated that Canada really has no defence in terms of being a deterrent to attack; that that sort of defence of deterrence and prevention of invasion or attack by another country rests on the retaliatory force of the United States, primarily their bomber squadrons in the strategic air command; that Canada, particularly as a participant in NORAD, is in almost the same boat as she is in NATO, and that is that we are participants in a nuclear agency because we have in fact joined forces with the United States and its military forces.

If my interpretation is incorrect, I should like to have the minister clear it up. If it is correct, then I think a clear, unequivocal statement should be made to the Canadian public so we are not led down the garden path by the Prime Minister or anybody else talking about "no nuclear weapons on Canadian soil as long as I am Prime Minister", and all this other business.

Mr. Harkness: First of all, the Prime Minister has never made any statement along that line. I do not think the hon. member should be making allegations of that kind without producing any proof of them whatever. I certainly have never seen or heard of any declaration along that line by the Prime Minister at any time.

I should like to make it clear that the deterrent consists of several elements. The deterrent is not merely the nuclear capability of the strategic air command of the United States, their intercontinental ballistic missiles, their Polaris submarines and the V-bomber force of Great Britain. These are the nuclear parts of the deterrent. They are the part of the deterrent which would respond to or retaliate or actually deliver nuclear weapons to Russian territory if the Russians attacked us. But the deterrent is made up of much more than that. It consists of all the defensive air measures which we take in order to ensure that as few as possible enemy bombers would be able to reach targets in the NATO countries. It consists also of all of the conventional forces. It consists of all the naval forces. In other words the entire military forces of the western world constitute the deterrent, not just the one part of them which would be used to drop bombs. It is an integrated whole. The greater the strength of the armed forces as a whole, the greater the deterrent power we have and the more unlikely it is that the Russians would start a war.

That is the basic situation as far as the deterrent is concerned. You cannot isolate one part only and say it is the deterrent. If you had the SAC air force and some intercontinental ballistic missiles only and had no conventional forces to protect them, and no interceptor aircraft, radar warning lines and so forth, they would not last very long and they would not constitute very much of a deterrent. Actually the deterrent is not only what you have in peacetime but what the enemy think you will have left after he actually attacks you. This is where the striking part of the deterrent becomes so important.

The hon. member said that we had placed our forces under the control of the United States by entering into the NORAD agreement. As I have made clear in this debate and on many other occasions, this is not the case. The NORAD agreement was a means of co-ordinating the air defence command of Canada and the air defence command of the United States in order to get the quickest possible reaction time to any threat. In the event of attack it provided for operational control of these defence forces by a co-ordinated headquarters in which the commander is a United States general and the second in command is a Canadian air marshal. When the commander, General Kuter, is away from the Colorado Springs headquarters, as he is quite frequently, Air Marshal Slemon is in full command of the NORAD operation.

No control of Canadian forces has been given to the United States by entering into this agreement. It is a mutual undertaking. As I say, command is exercised by officers of both countries. At the headquarters in Colorado Springs, as is realized by those who have been there, there are officers from both countries and they are doing all kinds of different jobs. It is a fully integrated headquarters, with no distinction being made whether it is a Canadian in a particular job or whether it is an American. There is a good deal of changing around in the jobs from time to time as people's tours of duty come to an end and other people replace them.

I think the Prime Minister and I myself have been quite clear and quite plain in stating what is the position of Canada in connection with NATO, the NORAD agreement and the defence situation generally. I therefore think there is no justification for any allegations of double talk on the part of the government with regard to these matters. These are serious matters. I have made every effort to try to keep the public informed as well as I could as to what the situation was, at least as I saw it.

Mr. Matheson: I wonder whether I could ask of the minister a very short question arising out of a story appearing in the London Times of September 9. Under date of September 8 from Ottawa the correspondent of the Times says this:

> But what is particularly in people's minds here now is whether Canada will be forced to accept nuclear warheads for her Bomarc missile weapons in Ontario and Quebec . . .

I wonder whether I might respectfully ask the minister if he could give us an answer and call it one o'clock, or perhaps he has an immediate answer?

Mr. Harkness: I presume this is an article by some correspondent, Mr. Chairman. I do not know what answer I can give to it. This is speculation. I can see no answer that I can give to speculation on the part of a correspondent of the London Times.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could ask the minister one question to which he may reply after one o'clock or perhaps immediately, as it is a very simple and direct one. Can the minister tell us whether there is in existence, awaiting signature by the government of Canada, a draft agreement for the joint control of nuclear weapons?

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry to disappoint the curiosity of the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 239 carry?

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Chairman. Would you be willing to call it one o'clock, or would you prefer another question at this time?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Shall vote 239 carry?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, would the minister indicate whether the department did try to obtain an off-the-shelf price for the Voodoo aircraft, and if so, how much was it? Was it a cash price?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we did not ask for any off-the-shelf price in regard to this airplane. The cost of the airplane to the United States government was in the neighbourhood of $1.6 million a copy, I believe. That was a fly away price, without any spares, supporting equipment and so forth.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister say with what missile the Voodoo will be equipped?

Mr. Harkness: The Falcon missile.

Mr. Hellyer: Will that be the only missile it will carry?

Mr. Harkness: No, the Voodoo can carry another type of missile, the MB-1, which is a nuclear weapon. The Falcon is a conventional warhead weapon.

Mr. Hellyer: Will it carry the Sidewinder as well as the Falcon?

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the hardware on the airplane be such that it will take the MB-1?

Mr. Harkness: That is what I said a minute ago. It can carry the MB-1 as well as the Falcon.

Mr. Hellyer: And that hardware will be on the airplanes which the R.C.A.F. is securing?

Mr. Harkness: We are securing Falcons for the airplanes.

Mr. Hellyer: I think the minister understood what I was asking for. That was, whether or not the attachments from which the other missile would be launched would be on the airplane as procured.

Mr. Harkness: Yes. Perhaps I might explain that these missiles are launched from the airplane on a sort of table which can be turned. On one side are the attachments for the Falcon and on the other side are the attachments for the MB-1.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might bring a matter to the attention of the minister very briefly, and perhaps down from the high level of international commitments to the level of the local taxpayer, and specifically the taxpayer in my district.

The problem arises from the defence installations now being constructed in our area; in particular, SAGE at the Trout lake site. Early last year there was an announcement, as a committee will recall, that 200 homes would be built in that area to accommodate personnel at this military installation.

Some discussions have taken place among the local municipality, the local school board and the minister's department. I have here a letter dated May 19 this year from the chief of air staff to Mr. A. J. Norman, business administrator for the township school area of Widdifield. One passage of this letter reads as follows:

> On the basis of 200 additional homes this could mean a requirement for Widdifield township to accommodate 340 elementary pupils—

The letter then goes on to deal with high school pupils, etc. The situation is that our municipality, like other municipalities, is very heavily burdened, particularly in the field of providing facilities for education. To point up the problem, last year when we were examining the estimates of the Department of Public Works the minister indicated, as reported at page 6853 of Hansard for June 21, that the total housing requirement would be 575 units. On the basis of the figures of the Department of National Defence this would indicate a requirement for accommodation for almost 1,000 students at the elementary school level. The department is using—I was going to say "hiding behind"—the contention that the responsibility rests upon the local authority. Here again I should like to quote these words from a further letter from the chief of the air staff to the business administrator in the area:

> However, as the proposed 200 additional housing units will not be constructed on federal property, the financing of providing and maintaining any additional school facilities for the occupants of those units is regarded by this headquarters as the responsibility of the municipality or township, in exactly the same manner as for other new civilian property ratepayers not necessarily employed by the R.C.A.F.

This is all very fine, and the department can retreat behind regulations of this type but, surely, the wise administration of any department calls for a high degree of common sense. Surely, in the light of the developments which are taking place in the area there is need for a further look at situations of this kind. As I said, we have been pursuing this subject with the department. My purpose in bringing the matter to the minister's attention today is to soften him up, because this problem will have to be met. The construction of 200 homes was announced last year. A second announcement later in the year spoke of 575 homes. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe current plans call for something in the order of 350 homes, 100 of which may be out for tender this month. There is another group off the station property itself and a further, third, block making up a total of some 350 homes which will probably be occupied by the end of 1962. Without pursuing the matter further here and delaying the committee, may I say that I hope the minister can tell us the exact requirements of the department as far as housing in this area is concerned and give us some assurance that representatives of his department will meet with our board to deal with this important problem.

Mr. Harkness: Two types of housing are being referred to here. The first concerns the houses on the station itself and, of course, we have provided a school and are looking after the education of the children occupying those houses. Then there are the houses being built in the town under a rental housing agreement just as there are low cost housing developments in various other cities across the country under the central mortgage and housing corporation. The houses which are being built in the town are being built so that they may be rented to the people who will be working at this station. They are in the same category as houses built for rental in other places. Taxes will be paid with respect to them, and these taxes contribute to the upkeep of the local schools and other facilities. As a result, the children of the people who live in the houses are entitled to go to the local schools.

Mr. Garland: So that there may be no misunderstanding about this, let me say that what the minister has told the committee is correct as far as it goes. But only a small portion of the homes to be built in the area is being built on national defence property. The great bulk of them will be built in the small local municipality, which has just completed an extensive program of providing new school accommodation and which may now be faced, according to the figures which are available, with the cost of providing school accommodation for a thousand additional students. I hope the minister will bear this in mind because the situation cannot be passed off as being the same as a situation arising from a housing development of any other kind. This burden has been dropped in our laps to accommodate the people who are to be absorbed by this defence installation. Some consideration will have to be given to assisting in the provision of the capital cost of providing these facilities and I hope the minister will bear that in mind when we pursue our representations in this regard.

Miss LaMarsh: There is one matter which I should like to raise with the minister. It was referred to me by a constituent, formerly a member of the R.C.A.F., who was stationed at the air station of St. Sylvestre, near Quebec city. I am not altogether familiar with the arrangements laid down for what are called non-public funds but I understand they are funds in the nature of canteen funds and the like. A number of projects are set up which give servicemen an opportunity to earn extra money and do interesting work in their leisure hours. I think that this is perhaps a good way of keeping the men interested and giving people associated with the service certain amenities which perhaps otherwise would not be available.

However, my informant advises me that in the air station at St. Sylvestre, which is one of the Pine Tree Stations, there is not only a gas station where n.c.o.'s are employed full time to pump gas but also a grocery store where a flight sergeant, who is paid flight sergeant's pay, operates full time. I am also told that there is a snack bar and gift shop which, until recently, has been operating full time staffed by service personnel, in addition to a post office which was formerly operated by a civilian but which has recently been taken over by air force personnel. Most of these men, I am told, are skilled tradesmen in receipt of trade pay in addition to their regular pay and allowances as members of the air force but they are not performing air force duties, nor are they working at trades for which they receive extra remuneration.

My informant advises me that one of the reasons for this situation is that the chief administrative officer is in charge of the non-public funds and is responsible for detailing men from various sections to take jobs in connection with the non-public funds amenities available. This strikes me as being an improper practice. I cannot myself take responsibility for all these facts because I have not been in the area myself. However, my informant was stationed there and he tells me this has been going on for a protracted period. I should like the minister to tell us whether this is a proper practice or not, and how this situation has come into being. If it is not a proper practice perhaps he would have an inquiry made.

Mr. Harkness: The regulations of the R.C.A.F. in this regard are very strict. No R.C.A.F. personnel are to be employed in non-public fund operations in duty hours. If they are being employed, they are being improperly employed. I do not know what the situation is at this particular station at St. Sylvestre. I have never heard any complaints of this nature with regard to the station before, but I shall have an investigation made and see if there is any validity in these allegations.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could tell us whether any of the CF-100 squadrons presently under air defence command will be retained in service or whether they will all be phased out as the Voodoo comes into service.

Mr. Harkness: It is intended to retain some of the CF-100's in the electronic warfare school and for some other purposes, but not as interceptors.

Mr. Hellyer: Not as complete squadrons?

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister indicated this morning that the squadrons overseas equipped with CF-100's would remain in service until the end of 1961 or 1962, I believe.

Mr. Harkness: 1963.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister say whether he has any plans to replace them at that time and, more particularly, with the F-101B?

Mr. Harkness: No definite plans have been worked out as to what action might be taken to replace the CF-100's at that time.

Mr. Hellyer: With respect to the F-104 could the minister say when the first squadrons will be posted overseas?

Mr. Harkness: In November of 1962.

Mr. Hellyer: Have arrangements yet been worked out with the government of France for their operation from French air bases in the event they are equipped with atomic arms?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I was waiting for the appropriate item to be called but since I have been given the floor I should like to say a few words in praise of the R.C.A.F. While attending the war memorial celebrations in France last July I had an opportunity to make a brief visit to the air base at Marville. I was very much impressed by the way this unit was being run. I am sure the people of Canada have every reason to be proud of the R.C.A.F. units which are representing Canada overseas.

We were conveyed back and forth by the R.C.A.F. jet transport. At this point I should also like to say a few words of appreciation of that unit. We were treated with the utmost courtesy and consideration and were provided a meal in transit which compares very favourably with meals provided on commercial aircraft. When we reached the end of our journey we were provided with a card on which we were asked to note our suggestions concerning improvement of the service and I was unable to think of any way in which it could be improved.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with my hon. friend in that tribute. We have an air force second to none. It is too bad that it has had to go so long since the proud days of 1955 and 1956 without new equipment. We also regret, as said before, that it is undertaking a new role of strike reconnaissance rather than having ground support fighter aircraft to back up the Canadian troops there.

Could the minister say what types of helicopter are being obtained by the air force and what they have available in Europe for support of the army when required?

Mr. Harkness: The R.C.A.F. is obtaining some Vertol helicopters. This is a medium to heavy helicopter which will be used, particularly in Canada, for search and rescue. They are obtaining also, of course, some light helicopters.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the Vertol the twin rotor helicopter that looks like an inverted banana?

Mr. Harkness: It is the Vertol-107. I cannot say anything with respect to the description of an inverted banana. I think most helicopters look somewhat like that.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister indicate the type of light helicopter the air force is obtaining? Is it the same one the army is receiving?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Garland: Could the minister tell the committee if the figures concerning the completion of homes used in the schedule to which I referred are in agreement with the latest figures he has available? I purposely delayed pursuing that to give the officials an opportunity to check it.

Mr. Harkness: I have not yet received those figures but I shall give them to the hon. member in a few moments.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister indicated earlier today that most of the air transport aircraft would be in service by the end of this calendar year. Can the minister say how many of those currently on order will be available by then, if any?

Mr. Harkness: The Yukons have all been delivered. They are undergoing flight testing and so on. I believe I said that they would be in full operation or full squadron use by the end of the year.

Mr. Hellyer: Has the minister any plans to augment the transport command beyond those presently funded?

Mr. Harkness: We have some projected plans but nothing has been definitely authorized so far. Of course, the retention of the North Stars in service which was announced this week means that the whole transport capability of the R.C.A.F. is now very much greater and will continue much greater than it has ever been before.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister explain to the committee how the Caribou aircraft which was purchased in haste and delivered under such pressure by the de Havilland aircraft company for use in the Congo wound up in the Gaza strip?

Mr. Harkness: All I can say is that in the final analysis it was decided they were not needed in the Congo and the United Nations wanted them in the Gaza strip.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say whether any Canadian minister wrote the Secretary General of the United Nations asking that the Caribou be used only by Canadian troops and received the reply that that was not a condition satisfactory to the United Nations?

Mr. Harkness: I cannot say that, no.

Mr. Hellyer: Now that the Prime Minister has entered the chamber perhaps I could address this question to him. Can the Prime Minister say whether any representations were made on behalf of Canada to the United Nations that, first, the Caribou aircraft be used only by Canadian troops in the Congo or, second, that Canadian troops be given a preference in their use over other troops, and was this condition rejected by the United Nations? Is that the reason the Caribou aircraft were not used in the Congo by the United Nations forces?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I cannot add anything to what has already been placed before the committee by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the Minister of National Defence explain then why he would require employees from an aircraft company to give up the week which had been set apart for their holidays and to rush back to the aircraft factory to deliver aircraft which sat on the ramps at Trenton for weeks or months before they were used for anything?

Mr. Harkness: All I can say is that the situation in the Congo, as all hon. gentlemen opposite are well aware, has been changing very rapidly from week to week and in some cases, in fact, from day to day.

Mr. Pearson: It is a fact then, is it, that the Canadian government made no representations to the United Nations with regard to the use of this particular aircraft?

Mr. Harkness: Well, Mr. Chairman, if any representations were made they were not made by me.

Mr. Hellyer: I think that is correct. Perhaps the minister would not care to disclose whom they were made by—

Mr. Harkness: I did not say they were made. I said that as far as I am concerned none was made.

Mr. Hellyer: I said I believed that. Would the minister indicate why, at a time when we are under such pressure and tension and it is the policy of the government to expand the auxiliary forces and to train 100,000 new men for civil survival purposes, it is also the policy of the Department of National Defence to disband existing auxiliary squadrons of the R.C.A.F. which, although they have had a different function in the past, might conceivably be converted to carry out some useful civil survival role?

Mr. Harkness: The R.C.A.F. auxiliary squadrons, the disbandment of which was decided upon over a year ago and which has been going on for some considerable time, were aircraft warning and control squadrons whose function had disappeared. There was no other function that could be assigned to them at the present time and therefore in the interests of efficiency and economy the only thing that we really could do was to disband them. We were very regretful about having to disband these squadrons but there was really no function that could be given to them which would have added to the defence strength of the country. That was why, very regretfully, the decision was arrived at to disband them.

Mr. Hellyer: On the basis of this theory of efficiency and economy, would the minister explain why one branch of the armed services is discharging people and disbanding units at the same time that other branches of the armed services are recruiting and training for other roles? Presumably there might be a possibility of retraining or readaptation.

Mr. Harkness: All I can say is that we would be very glad to welcome all of the members of the squadrons being disbanded into the survival operations and the militia who are carrying out that role. The point is that the survival role in Canada has been given to the army and the militia is carrying a large part of the load in that regard. It is for that reason that we are giving special militia survival training to 100,000 men in order to increase the number of men available with training in survival operations. It would not be a reasonable proposition to be trying to give some sort of role to an air force squadron here, there or some place else when these squadons operate in a completely different manner.

Mr. Hellyer: Apparently the minister has not achieved that state of integration yet in the Department of National Defence under which men can be transferred from role to role as required.

Mr. Harkness: As I said, these men can transfer quite readily into the militia units. We would be glad to have them.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister will recall that when the BMEWS was first put into operation an alleged false alarm was reported in the newspapers. Can the minister say whether there have been any recurrences of this type of occupational hazard and can he give the committee any assurance that there are adequate precautions so that a general alarm would not result?

Mr. Harkness: I think the short answer to that is that it was an alleged false alarm but it was not actually a false alarm.

Mr. Hellyer: That was the exact phrase I used. I assume from the minister's answer that he is confident that a false alarm cannot in fact occur.

Mr. Harkness: I am confident that it is extremely unlikely it will occur. Whether it is completely impossible for it to occur I am not competent to say. I feel quite certain, however, that no matter what the particular radars or recording screens might happen to show with regard to such an instance it would be well checked in other ways before any action was taken.

Mr. Hellyer: Has the minister received any representations from Canadian personnel serving at Goose Bay in respect of the allegation that they are required to use other than Canadian legal tender to make purchases at the United States air force base there?

Mr. Harkness: I have no information on that.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister agree to look into that situation? I have received representations to the effect that since the Canadian dollar was devalued payment not only at the PX but other local stores is required to be made in United States funds and the Canadian civilians feel that this is an infringement of their rights and probably of their pride and pocketbooks as well. Would the minister undertake to investigate and see if the situation can be corrected?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I will be glad to.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister knows, of course, that the situation in France with regard to the use of French bases for American air equipment with nuclear weapons is such that these bases are not now available to the United States air force. Has there been any indication of a change in that situation that he may know about and has he any reason to believe that the French government will adopt a different position with respect to the Canadian air force if that air force should be equipped with nuclear weapons?

Mr. Harkness: I am not aware of any change in that position except that I noted in the newspapers the other day that some French units were going to be trained by the Americans in the use of nuclear weapons. This might well portend a change but I do not know.

With regard to the number of rental units and housing units generally at North Bay, may I say to the hon. member for Nipissing that there are under consideration 100 permanent married quarters for the station. Two hundred rental units have been approved and a further 200 rental units are under consideration.

Mr. Carter: I should like to ask the minister to clarify the statement he just made in reply to the question about an alarm. The impression I got from listening to the minister's reply was that it was a genuine alarm and if that was not the case I think it should be made quite clear on Hansard.

Mr. Harkness: The actual situation was that the system was really under test at the time. It had not been taken into full operational use. They began to get reflections from the moon, I believe it was, and this information was of course passed down the line. The way it was portrayed in the newspapers, however, made it appear that it was interpreted as an actual attack and that it was just by a hair's breadth that retaliatory action was not ordered. All that part of the story was completely incorrect.

Item agreed to.

Defence research and development—
Defence research board—
241. Operation and maintenance, $24,993,564.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like, first of all, to reiterate what I have said on previous occasions that it is my opinion Canadians are very fortunate in obtaining from the defence research board probably more results for the dollars expended than any other people in the western world. The achievements of this board have been remarkable for the size of the group and the amount of money expended. I should like the minister to indicate whether or not the financial support they are receiving at the present time is greater than in the past or whether he plans to enlarge it and make sure that this extraordinarily fine group is given every possible support in its work.

Mr. Harkness: The amount of money being voted, as is shown in the estimates book, is approximately the same this year as last year. There is no question about what the hon. member has said in regard to the achievements of the defence research board. They have done a remarkably fine job and they are a remarkably good group of scientists. This is an activity of which we can be proud. The board has made great contributions to the defence of this country and of the whole western world and is continuing to do so.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with my colleague, the hon. member for Trinity and the minister in paying tribute to the defence research board. I have always had a very special interest in research, particularly in scientific research. Looking back over the years, it seems that the time has come when we should take a good, hard look at our policy in regard to defence research. I have done a little homework in this connection, and I should like to place a few figures on the record. In the year 1950-51, the expenditures on research and development were $23.4 million; in 1951-52, they were $35.4 million; in 1952-53, approximately $43 million; in 1953-54, approximately $41 million; in 1954, approximately $50 million; in 1955, $64 million; in 1956, $69 million; in 1957, $78 million; in 1958, $74 million. Then, in 1959, the figure dropped to $39 million.

All the figures I have mentioned so far have been taken from the public accounts and they are the actual expenditures on research and development. The two figures I want to mention now are estimates taken from the blue book for last year and for the item that is before us at this moment. In 1960, we voted $44.7 million and this year we have in the estimates a vote of just over $45 million. It seems to me that these figures show that since 1958 there has been a significant drop in the amount of money we are allocating to research and development. If we look back over the figures we see there is a steady increase from the $23.4 million in 1950 up to $78 million in 1957, then $74 million in 1958, while in 1959 the figure drops to $39 million and last year and this year is around $45 million. If we add the amounts for the last two years together, we only get a little more than the average of what we have been spending.

It seems to me we are reducing our expenditures on research and development at the very time when we should be increasing them. If there was need to increase them from 1950 to 1958, surely since 1958, with the world situation steadily deteriorating and with an ever-increasing emphasis on scientific development, we cannot hope to keep abreast of the times if we are going to drastically reduce the amount of money we allocate for this purpose. It is all right to praise the achievements of our defence research board, but we cannot expect them to make bricks without straw.

I should like to point out to the minister that the dollars we are giving them today are depreciated dollars. The dollars we are giving them this year have 20 per cent less purchasing power than the dollars we gave them in 1950. We are giving them fewer dollars and a smaller dollar with which to work. We cannot expect them to do credit to Canada or even to their own establishment if we are not going to provide them with the money to enable them to carry on this work.

The minister said in his statement, I think, that the activities of the defence research board would be co-ordinated with industry. I heartily agree with that policy. I think there should be even more co-ordination. I should like to see some authority set up to co-ordinate all research in Canada. We have so many departments now, and practically every department has some research being conducted. Whatever research we may do in defence will always have, for the most part I think, some application in industry. A country like Canada, so dependent upon export trade, certainly should be placing the greatest emphasis on research and development. We should be following the examples of little countries like Switzerland and Sweden who have developed products and techniques that have enabled them to compete with other countries to compensate for their small domestic market.

Let me cite one example, alloys. Alloys are of the utmost importance in defence, particularly with the new weapons and rockets that are coming into use every day. Alloys are of extreme importance in industry as well, in our construction industry and in practically every product of which we can think. I should like to see Canada specialize along certain lines. I understand we have been doing something with regard to equipment for northern climates and also with regard to electronics. It seems that we have been able to take a lead in the electronic research. I realize our resources perhaps are small. But surely here is an opportunity worth embracing. I urge the minister to take another look at this policy and to provide more funds for this extremely important work.

Mr. Harkness: The amount of money spent in research has gone up steadily year by year. The hon. member has taken the two votes together or rather he has taken the two votes for research and then added to them the vote for development. If he will look at the table at the back of the blue book which has a comparison of the expenditures for fiscal years, he will see that, as far as the expenditures of the defence research board are concerned, they have gone up from $23.7 million in 1952-53, to $30.8 million—almost $31 million—estimated for this year, $27 million the year previous and so on. Underneath that is given the development vote and it is quite variable. In some years it showed a figure of $45 million, $53 million, $47 million and so forth. Most of that amount actually was on account of this albatross around our necks.

I refer to the Arrow. It was development work on the Arrow which amounted to these considerable expenditures during those years but it is not part of the research activities. This is development activity.

As far as a program with industry is concerned may I say this. In the speech I made in introducing the estimates I stated that a program of industrial support was being put into effect in conjunction with the Department of Defence Production but under the control of the defence research board. It is designed to do this very thing, namely to assist industry to develop new products and things of that kind.

Mr. Carter: I thank the minister for the explanation he has given me. It is true that I lumped the two together as I wanted to look back over as many years as possible and I just did not have the time in which to separate out the two figures. However, before coming into the chamber I took the trouble to look at the public accounts for 1960. In that year we allocated $51 million for research and development but we actually spent only $39,183,481. The unspent money I want to point out was for development. We voted $21.5 million that year and actually spent $11.5 million. Hence there was $10.5 million left over. That pattern fairly well holds true for a good part of the period I covered in the figures. I do not know what the situation was last year. Perhaps the minister can tell us exactly what the expenditures were. In last year's blue book we estimated $44,696,364 for research and development. I wonder what the expenditure actually was?

Mr. Harkness: Again, Mr. Chairman, I would have to request the hon. gentleman to separate research from development. They are not the same thing. As I stated, the amount spent on research has been going up steadily year by year whereas the amount spent on development has varied greatly from year to year. If you look at the breakdown of the figures, you will find that the amount spent on development has varied. One year it was $42 million and the next year it was $5 million. You cannot possibly lump these two things together and say it is the amount spent on research. It is not the amount spent on research. The research items are items 241 and 242. The development item is a separate item altogether, namely, item 243. Again in this table at the back of the blue book that was issued it is shown that in 1960-61 there was appropriated in the vote for the defence research board the amount of $31,080,000 and that they expended $30,863,000.

Mr. Carter: May I have those figures given again?

Mr. Harkness: Have you not a copy of this document? This is the national defence blue book which was issued several months ago.

Mr. Carter: Oh, yes. I was wondering whether that information is taken from the public accounts figures. Is that taken from the public accounts figures?

Mr. Harkness: No. The public accounts for this fiscal year about which we are talking—I refer to 1960-61—are not out yet.

Mr. Carter: I know that. That is why I could not get them; but would the figures be the same?

Mr. Harkness: Yes; I think they would be approximately the same.

Mr. Carter: There is just one point I wish to make. The minister has stated that there has been a steady increase in research and development—

Mr. Harkness: No; not development.

Mr. Carter: All right; we will take it as being for research. He mentioned that in 1951 we were spending $23 million on research. In 1959-60 the total expenditure as given in the public accounts was $39,183,481.

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but once more he has research and development lumped together.

Mr. Carter: I know that. I would ask the minister to allow me to finish. That is the total expenditure. If the minister will be patient for a minute or two I will explain what I mean. I am saying that of that amount of $39 million, roughly $11.5 million was spent on development which leaves approximately $27.5 million for research. Hence from 1951 up to 1960, we have gone up only from $23 million to approximately $27 million. I still maintain that is not a sufficient rate of increase for this important work. I think we should be spending two or three times as much as that having regard to the changing circumstances, the deterioration of the world situation and the increased emphasis on mechanical and technical research and development.

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. gentleman will get this publication, if he has not already obtained it, and if he will consult it, he will see what the expenditures were each year from 1952-53 up to the present time. The actual expenditure for 1959-60 was $27,696,000 as far as research was concerned. The chief scientist on the board here just informs me that they have never yet been able to spend the whole amount of money appropriated because of the difficulty of getting the proper kind of people to carry on this experimental work. They are difficult to procure and there is always a shortage of them.

Mr. Hellyer: You have to pay them.

Mr. Carter: I appreciate the minister's position and I thank him for his explanation. However, I hope he will see my point. My point is that the $27 million that we spent last year—

Mr. Harkness: No; $30 million.

Mr. Carter: —or in 1959-60, will only have the same dollar value or same dollar equivalent as the $23 million we spent in 1951 because the dollar has gone down in value by 2 per cent a year since then. That is just about 20 per cent. If you take 20 per cent off the figure of $27 million you are back to about the same figure as 1951. I think what we have been doing is keeping pace with the depreciation of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. McFarlane: Just before this vote carries, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks. I may be using the words "research" in a broad fashion, but I feel it would be advisable at this time for some research and re-assessment to be carried out with regard to the location of our major airports in British Columbia.

At the present time our major military installations in British Columbia are pretty well grouped along the coast. I should like to enter a plea to the minister to have some research carried out on the selection of sites in the interior of British Columbia. In the event that the airports or installations are wiped out on the coast, the next installations are apparently in Alberta, located at Calgary and Edmonton. There are several ideal locations in the interior of the province which are suitable for development and research.

Mr. Chambers: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but this matter does not come under the defence research board. It is under the air force construction program, with which we have dealt at some length.

Mr. McFarlane: Then, Mr. Chairman, may I ask permission to revert to item 240 for about two minutes.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to allowing the hon. member to revert to the item which brings his contribution into relevance?

Mr. Churchill: Provided it does not reopen the whole item for general debate. It is a most unusual procedure.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee has to give unanimous consent. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could make his remarks on some other occasion, unless there is unanimous consent.

Item agreed to.

Mutual aid—

244. Contributions to infrastructure and military costs of the North Atlantic treaty organization and the transfer of defence equipment and supplies and the provision of services and facilities for defence purposes in accordance with section 3 of The Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, not exceeding a total of $40,798,000 including the present value of defence equipment or supplies or the cost of services made available by the Canadian forces estimated in the amount of $24,848,000 and provided by appropriations for those forces in the current and former years in respect of which, notwithstanding subsection (3) of section 3 of the said act, no amount shall be charged to this appropriation or paid into a special account; provided by this vote, $15,950,000.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I thought it would be interesting to look back over the years not only with respect to expenditures on research and development but also on mutual aid. I wish to place on the record some figures I have taken from the public accounts and use them as a basis for some questions I should like to put to the minister later.

It was not easy to obtain these figures because we did not call it mutual aid in the beginning. The first time there was any allocation for this purpose was in 1951. That was tied up with the allocation for pensions, and the figure was around $144.5 million. In 1952 we allocated $235 million for special aid. Then $289.7 million in 1953 for NATO, and in 1954 we got around to calling it mutual aid.

In 1954 we allocated $253.4 million; in 1955 the figure was $175 million; in 1956, $133.5 million; in 1957, $118.5 million; in 1958 there was a drop down to $13.4 million, and in 1959 the expenditure was $18.4 million. These figures, again, have been taken from the public accounts of those years.

Last year in the estimates we allocated $14.8 million and this year we have before us another item of $15.9 million. Looking back over these figures we see there was a steady decrease from $235 million in 1952 down to $118 million in 1957. But in 1958 there was a very sharp decrease, from $118 million down to $13 million, and it has been around that average for every year since, with the exception of 1959, when the figure was around $18 million.

So for the last four years, 1958 to 1961, inclusive the figures only add up to about $62 million, which is a little less than half of the amount we spent in 1957. If we add all these figures together they total around $1.4 billion.

While I realize that the bulk of it has been spent on stock, equipment, parts and so forth, it does promote two questions in my mind. First, what has been the result of this contribution on the part of Canada over the past ten years? Second, on what basis have these figures been arrived at? Have these contributions been evaluated on the actual cost of the equipment we contributed, on the replacement cost or the depreciated cost, because I presume some of it was used. I do not expect the minister to give me the figures for the whole period, but I wonder whether he could tell the committee how much of this money, if any, was contributed in cash.

When we look at the sharp drop from $118 million in 1957 to $15 million or $16 million this year, the other question which comes to our minds is, what is the future of this mutual aid? Is it something that is going to be wound up and will disappear in the near future, or are there continuing commitments which will require a vote for a considerable time in the future?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member mentioned the purpose of this vote, which was to build up the strength of our NATO partners in Europe. This is why there is a period when the expenditures under this item were quite heavy, since when they have gradually been cut down.

Once again looking at this comparison of expenditures by fiscal years in the blue book, as far as aircrew training is concerned, for example, the amount went from $104 million down to $71 million, $52 million, $51 million, $47 million, $26 million, $6 million, and then nothing. That is because during those years 1952 to 1958-59 we were carrying on the training of a considerable number of airmen from the various NATO countries of Europe. That phase is now over so those expenditures are no longer being made.

During the same period we were supplying a large amount of equipment to these people to build up their stocks. That phase of the program is over to a great extent. Where you see this big drop in 1958-59 of $70.7 million to $18.3 million in 1959-60, the $18.3 million figure represents all cash contributions, whereas from there over it was some cash but mostly equipment taken out of stocks, and so forth.

The hon. member wanted to know how these figures were arrived at. As far as new equipment given as mutual aid is concerned, the actual cost of it is the figure used. So far as used equipment is concerned, or equipment which has been in stock for a considerable time, it was the estimated present value which was used in most cases. In some cases the replacement cost was used. It would depend on the type of item it was and whether it was an item which would be replaced or not. As to the question whether this is coming to an end, the answer is, no. Actually, the $50 million which is being appropriated to supply F-104's to the NATO countries is a further contribution on our part toward mutual aid.

Miss LaMarsh: Could the minister tell the committee what material, if any, is being supplied to Portugal under this vote?

Mr. Harkness: There is none being sent to Portugal at the present time.

Item agreed to.

National defence general—

245. To authorize, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, and subject to allotment by the treasury board, total commitments of $2,674,046,619 for the purposes of the foregoing votes relating to national defence, regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,123,561,879 will come due for payment in future years), $1.

Mr. Hellyer: This item is probably one of the most important in the whole of the estimates of the Department of National Defence because it authorizes the government to make defence commitments in respect to procurement outlined in the book of estimates. It is the item which sets the course, the item which sets the direction for the future. It is the item which, to a very large degree, controls the flexibility of future expenditure. It governs to a large extent the course of Canadian defence policy for years to come. As a consequence, I cannot let this item pass without going back to some of the cardinal issues which face us. These are: how can Canada best contribute to collective defence, and how can Canada best contribute to the preservation of peace. These are the issues. These are the questions which have to be asked, and these are the questions which have to be answered. The answers, of course, are not easy. The answers are profoundly difficult and there is considerable difference of opinion with respect to them.

Are atomic weapons necessary as part of Canada's contribution? That is a question on which there is certainly no unanimity. The Globe and Mail in what I consider to be a most thoughtful editorial dated September 14, 1961 entitled "The Nuclear Dilemma" breaks this fundamental question into its two logical parts: (1) Is it or is it not our duty to our allies to equip ourselves with atomic weapons in order to provide the best possible defence in our sector against attacks on SACEUR and (2) Do our obligations to NATO require us to go the whole way and accept warheads.

With regard to the former we have attempted to demonstrate that the measures now contemplated by the government make no significant contribution to the protection of SAC and make no significant contribution to the deterrent. The deterrent would be as strong without these measures as it would be with them. It is our opinion therefore, as we have indicated during this debate, that it is not necessary to have two Bomarc squadrons nor is it necessary to arm our defence squadrons with nuclear warheads. This is a new situation. This, as we have said, was not true in the past but it is true now and it will be true in the future. In the past an effective defence against the bomber did, in fact, help to protect SAC, but in the missile age this situation no longer exists and the experience of the past has to be reassessed.

Our problem in Canada is complicated by the fact that we have limited resources. The way in which these resources could best be utilized depends to a large extent on the point of view of the man with whom you are talking. If you were talking to the commander in chief of NORAD you would find that he naturally takes the position that Canada's main burden of effort should be in respect to the air defence of the North American continent. If you were talking to the commander in chief of the Atlantic forces you would find he would think it advisable for Canada to increase her contribution to the naval forces in the Atlantic. Of course, if you talk to the commander in chief of the Atlantic and ask him who is responsible for air defence against missiles he would say "talk to the commander in chief, NORAD" and if you asked the commander in chief NORAD he would tell you that you had better talk to SACLANT. Similarly, if you talked to SACEUR no doubt you would be told that building up our strength as part of the NATO shield was the most important thing on the priority list. This situation is not unusual. Each service grudgingly admits a limited role for the others but emphasises that it has the essential role and must have the larger share of the total budget. Melding these widely diverse opinions, each put forward in good faith by sincere and competent officers is a difficult task. They cannot all be right.

The minister takes pride in the acquisition of the Bomarc and the Voodoo, alleging that they will make a significant contribution to defence. Well, an old pal of his whom he used to quote often in debates, disagrees with him. Major General W. H. S. Macklin, C.B.E. in an article entitled "What air power do we need?" has this to say:

> Why, for instance, should not some of these squadrons be equipped with our own CL-44 transport which the Americans rejected? The 32 CL-44s that the government proposed to trade for Voodoos would contribute far more to the common defence of the western alliance than the Voodoos ever will.
> We need other types of flexible air transport, too; planes that can operate without great concrete airfields, such as the famous Beaver, Otter, Caribou series, all made in Canada, and various types of load-lifting helicopter. It could never be argued that these sorts of aircraft will become obsolete as fast as they are issued. Good models last a long, long time.

There is, for instance, the reliable, if slow DC-3 still in use after over 20 years, and the North Star, which has been on the air force inventory, since 1947 or '48.

Lastly, we ought to have some aircraft that could intervene tactically in a land battle, without resort to the nuclear bombs that the Starfighter we are buying will need to be useful. We have had the R.C.A.F. for 37 years, but it is an astounding fact that never has our air force been able to act in battle with the Canadian army. The army got its air support in the second world war from the British and in Korea, from the United States.

What we require, in short, is an air force that can co-operate effectively with the other Canadian armed forces to carry out strategic decisions made in Ottawa.

Consider that for a dozen years we have trained and maintained a parachute force at staggering expense. But never, no, never, has the air force been able to lift it with its armament. Does this make sense?

We know neither the day nor the hour when some new crisis, like Korea, Suez, or Congo, or worse, may arise in Africa, Asia or elsewhere. It is Premier Khrushchev's stated intention to promote such crises.

The Air Force ought to have the strategic, long-range air lift that could get an armed force to the danger area with speed, and then keep it there, with or without great airfields in the theatre. And if the peace-preserving role of such a force should fail and war ensue, the air force should be able to fight, under the conditions imposed by the enemy and geography. We can rarely make war as we might like to.

In regard to the second question, as to whether our obligations to NATO require us to go the whole way and accept warheads, the minister and the Leader of the Opposition agreed that subject to certain conditions, the answer to that question might be yes. The Leader of the Opposition reiterated the position of the Liberal party. The first priority is to build up the conventional strength, to give it flexibility, to give it the capacity to withstand an onslaught, at least long enough for the decision to use nuclear arms to be made at the proper level, which is the political level, and in this case by the NATO alliance. Then, he said that as a second line only to be used when conventional forces failed or when found inadequate to meet a situation, should it arise, atomic warheads might be used by separate units, preferably units which are held in reserve for such a contingency. This is a point on which there is not too much disagreement between the Leader of the Opposition and the minister.

The minister's friend of yesterday does not even think that NATO should have nuclear arms. Mr. John Gellner in an article entitled: "Needed: A Revision of NATO Policy" states, in part, as follows:

> As long as the pretence is kept up that nuclear weapons can compensate for deficiencies in men and material, those member countries of NATO which have been inclined to shirk their military responsibilities, anyway, will not be persuaded that they must at long last start to pull their weight. As long as the dubious doctrine that nuclear weapons can be used in limited wars is adhered to, NATO will not be able to gather the conventional forces which it needs to deal with the kind of emergency with which it may be faced. Above all, unless a military policy is laid down which will put the weight equitably on, and make sense to, all the allies, NATO will remain largely ineffective, militarily. In that case, the alliance itself will be meaningless.

But the government seems to have made a decision contrary to Mr. Gellner's; at least by its actions the government seems to have made the decision, but by its words we are left in doubt. Has the government made a secret decision in respect to the use of atomic warheads? One might speculate on that. Or is the government in fact spending hundreds of millions of dollars on weapons it might not arm? Is it again this afternoon under this item seeking authority to commit this country to the advance expenditure of further hundreds of millions of dollars on weapons that reach their full potential only when armed with nuclear warheads while at the same time having no intention to use them? This is the question which has to be answered: Are we going to or are we not?

In the meantime the government's indecision is causing considerable embarrassment and concern both at home and apparently in NATO. John Gellner in an article entitled "New Hope in the Alliance" has this to say:

> There is another impression which a visiting Canadian gets at the headquarters of NATO, and it is not encouraging: The standing of Canada in the alliance seems to be less than it used to be. From having been instrumental in the founding of NATO, and a main driving force in it for many years, Canada has receded into the background, particularly politically—we have become "consumers of information" as a leading NATO representative politely put it.
> The reason for this is that the present Canadian government obviously sets less store by NATO than by the United Nations—and is in this respect at variance with virtually all other allies who consider NATO a much more useful instrument of international policy than the U.N. Hon. Howard Green's statements at the ministerial meeting last December, and to a lesser degree in Oslo last May, have certainly been interpreted in that way. Canadian indecision on whether or not to adopt nuclear weapons also does not enhance Canada's prestige. Their adoption would be considered a logical consequence of our acceptance of NATO strategy, and more specifically of the "strike" role (involving attack with nuclear weapons) for the Royal Canadian Air Force air division in Europe. Their rejection, even though belated, would probably be understood. But our fence-sitting, just as our apparently lessened interest in the Atlantic alliance, merely act as a dampener on the currently soaring spirit in NATO.

What is the Canadian position with respect to nuclear arms? We do not know. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked earlier this afternoon if there was in existence a draft agreement awaiting signature under which Canada would be able to obtain nuclear warheads under joint control. The minister said he would not say whether there is or is not a draft agreement awaiting signature. If there was not one would guess that the minister would say so, but we are left to conclude that the document is in existence awaiting signature.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member should not appear to be quoting me as having said anything in that vein. What I said to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was that I was not prepared to satisfy his curiosity on the subject.

Mr. Hellyer: It will be unfortunate if this item carries and this debate concludes without the committee and the country receiving a clear statement of the government's policy. It is not a satisfactory situation.

May I say that in my opinion our present method of dealing with the subject of defence is quite inadequate. Under the parliamentary system parliament is responsible for the voting of funds and it is this process in which we are engaged at the present time. And yet, we do not have adequate information. Parliament and the people are not given the facts. I am not alleging that this is completely new under the present government. It is probably traditional under our system but it is more important now. It is more urgent because the subject of defence is much more complicated. It has at last become a matter of survival, a matter of life and death, even on the North American continent. As I said, the information given to parliament and the public is inadequate.

At one time we used to receive a white paper which contained at least an outline of Canadian defence policy. The British issue a white paper which contains a thorough and exhaustive outline of the opinions of that government with respect to national defence. We used to have a similar paper here but now we have nothing. We now receive a blue book and I might say it is appropriately named because it would certainly make one blue to read its contents. It contains no information whatsoever in respect to defence policy. It merely, as it says, contains some information in respect to the roles and activities of the armed services and the defence research board.

Other important documents vital to the Canadian people are not made public. For example, the Graham report on civil defence was not disclosed either to the house or the Canadian people. We are led to wonder what it contained.

In addition, the government colours the information it gives to the committee and to the Canadian people. I suppose that is only natural. The government has a particular point of view, right or wrong, and it wishes to acquaint the public with it. The opposition, if it has a contrary point of view, also selects the available evidence to support its case. The difference is that the government has dozens and dozens of public relations men working full time faithfully and dutifully grinding out the truth as the boss sees it. That is quite natural too. As a matter of fact, I think that our expenditure in the Department of National Defence on public relations and public relations people is too great. I think it is too costly for the amount of benefit received by the Canadian people. I would recommend that treasury board have a look at it when the estimates for next year are being prepared.

At the same time the minister has deliberately tried to create the impression that the opposition is uninformed, and because the opposition is not at liberty to disclose its sources without losing them their contributions are not always given the consideration in the press and elsewhere that might be the case if the sources could be authenticated. Some better system must be found. I am aware of the traditional situation with respect to our parliamentary institutions but I think the time has come for a change. I think we waste too much time. We could accomplish a great deal more if we were to face the facts and make the necessary adjustment.

We must have some mechanics for making information available to the elected representatives of the people and I think that a good solution would be a small standing committee on defence. This committee would in no way attempt to usurp the functions of the Minister of National Defence but it would have briefings by serving officers. It would visit defence installations and see the hardware about which we are talking. It could meet in camera and be given classified information with respect to the Russian threat and our capacity to cope with it. It could study all aspects of defence, national survival and related subjects.

The result would be a small body of informed representatives of the people who would then be in a better position to help parliament and the public in a responsible examination of the public business. I have no doubt some criticism would be avoided, but I am sure the criticism that would be levelled would be better prepared and more authoritative. It would be much more difficult under those circumstances for either government or opposition to colour their points of view appreciably without fear of immediate refutation by informed persons. The press and the public would know that spokesmen were or should be well informed.

The committee might issue a declassified record containing the maximum possible information to assist the public in appreciating better the complexities of the subject of defence and its many ramifications. I think that it would contribute to an improvement of the standard of debate. It should reduce irrelevancies and, most important of all, it should permit parliament to fulfil its function which is to give careful, thorough and responsible examination of the proposed expenditures of the executive branch. It would assist the public in assessing the issues, gauging the different policies if different ones are proposed and reaching conclusions. It would increase public confidence in the parliamentary system. In view of the gravity of the subject, which I think is appreciated by all of us on both sides of the house notwithstanding that sometimes in the heat of battle we do and say things which would not be appropriate under cooler circumstances, I think that under the circumstances I have outlined such a committee would assist us to do our job, to do it responsibly and to do it properly, which is the objective we have in mind. I therefore urge the government to give sympathetic consideration to this suggestion, and I know that in doing so it will have the support of parliament and the Canadian people.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, during the course of the debate in the last several days I think I have dealt with practically all of the matters which have been revived in the remarks just made, and I do not think it would contribute anything to the debate for me to repeat the arguments I have made throughout that period. I agree with the hon. member that too much time is wasted and has been wasted in this committee, most of it, I am sorry to say, by endless repetition of the same arguments in connection with the same subjects.

As far as committees are concerned, during the period from 1952 to 1957 there was, I believe, one committee during that time which met during two sessions of parliament. From 1957 to date there have been two separate committees which have dealt with defence matters. The hon. member is now advocating a standing committee on defence. This is something that certainly can be given consideration. Whether we should have a standing committee on defence as suggested or whether we should continue the system which has been followed in the past of having special committees from time to time as conditions seem to warrant is really a matter for decision, and I have nothing definite that I can say on that at the moment.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 245 carry?

Mr. Hellyer: On division.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank members of the committee generally for the interest which has been shown in defence matters and various members for the contributions they have made to the debate on this important subject.

The Deputy Chairman: We will now proceed to the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Defence Production.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

67. Departmental administration, $9,574,385.

(Translation):

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, in my statement today I would like to discuss the principal responsibilities and accomplishments of the Department of Defence Production and in this connection to follow the procedure that I have followed in the past, that is, of dealing, where possible with the votes in the order that they appear in our departmental estimates.

In the course of my statement I would like to give you a brief outline of the work of the Department of Defence Production. I would also like to refer to those instances where there are differences between the amounts which we are asking to be voted this year and those amounts which were voted last year.

Under the provisions of the Defence Production Act, my department has exclusive authority to procure the goods and services that are required by the Department of National Defence. As the funds required in connection with this primary responsibility of my department are provided by the Department of National Defence, the defence production estimates do not provide too clear an illustration of the level and nature of departmental activities. I referred to this aspect during the discussion of the estimates of my department last year. However, I think it is worth while to touch upon the point again at the very outset of this statement.

The responsibility for procuring the equipment and material required for the Department of National Defence has been the primary task of my department since its establishment in 1951. This responsibility is still of primary importance but there are today other responsibilities which are of ever increasing significance.

The growing complexity of new weapon systems illustrates in most vivid terms how difficult it is for Canada to undertake the development and production of such systems on a purely independent basis. Against this background of changing conditions I shall continue, as I have in the past, to look to the resources of Canadian industry, whenever possible, to produce the weapons and material required for our armed forces and, as in the past, I shall continue to examine the demands of the services to see how they can contribute to the creation of new skills and facilities in Canadian industry. I wish to make it clear, however, that in addition to these activities new ways must be found—and are being found—to not only maintain but extend the capabilities of our defence industry. In this regard I would like to point out that my department has the responsibility for promoting the sale of Canadian defence items to the United States and our other NATO allies as well as the responsibility for co-ordinating Canada's activities in connection with the efforts of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to increase co-operation in research, development and production in order to attain maximum efficiency in standardization and production by member countries.

My department is also placing increased emphasis on activities in the field of industrial research and development. This step is necessary if we are to ensure that Canadian industry will succeed both in finding and exploiting opportunities in the field of production sharing as well as responding to the future requirements of our own services. I am firm in my intent that we should do our full part to make these efforts succeed.

(Text):

In the field covered by aircraft procurement the main production program is the CF-104 and the associated J-79 engine. Production schedules are being met for this 200 aircraft program and already five aircraft have been allocated to an advanced flight test program. The similarity between the Canadian version of the F-104 aircraft and that adopted by certain other NATO countries —Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and Italy—has resulted in close co-operation between the countries concerned. An officer of my department has been transferred to Germany as a representative to the European organization for direction and control of the F-104G program which is now a subsidiary body of NATO.

Defence production in Canada on behalf of the North Atlantic alliance is showing a marked increase with the order for 61 Caribou aircraft received by de Havilland from the United States army. Present negotiations contemplate an additional order for 53 aircraft. Other programs include the CC-106 and CL-44D, long range transports, Otter and Beaver aircraft. Contracts have also been placed for 3 UH-QE light observation helicopters for the R.C.A.F. and 21 for the Canadian army. These 24 light observation helicopters are being purchased from the Hiller Aircraft Corporation. Two Vertol model 107-11 heavy helicopters have been purchased from the Vertol division of Boeing of Canada Limited for the R.C.A.F. and the purchase of an additional four is being negotiated. Both these companies have placed business with Canadian contractors on a reciprocal basis in accordance with current production sharing policies and both are using the services of a significant number of Canadian subcontractors.

As a result of the phasing out of older types of aircraft, it is expected that there may be some reduction in the workload of repair and overhaul contractors. The new aircraft which are being introduced will offset to some extent the effects of this phase out but generally speaking the introduction will not have an effect this year.

Other factors such as decreased R.C.A.F. flying hours, reduced contractual expenditures, rising costs and reducing manhours are all tending to create a constantly diminishing workload in terms of manhours of employment for aircraft repair and overhaul contractors.

My colleague, the Minister of National Defence, announced to the house on September 11 that the CL-41A will be used as a basic jet trainer by the R.C.A.F.

My department, in co-operation with the Department of National Defence, is now working on detailed specifications for this aircraft, and we expect to request proposals from the various companies concerned within the next two or three weeks.

I also intend to enter into discussions with Canadair Limited with a view to assisting that company in the development of a systems trainer version of the CL-41A to be designated the CL-41R. This engineering study is primarily directed towards potential requirements by the NATO countries operating high performance jet aircraft with sophisticated navigation and radar systems.

The CL-41R would be used as an advanced systems trainer, in order to give the pilots complete systems training.

The procurement and production of electronic equipment will continue at a high level. In airborne electronics, the major programs are related to the supply of fire control, communication, navigation, and identification systems for the CF-104 and the F-104G aircraft. There are also continuing retrofit programs for doppler navigation, communication and anti-submarine detection. Electronic training aids are increasing in importance, and flight and tactics simulators are being built for the R.C.A.F. and for the German, Netherlands and Belgian governments. There are other promising possibilities in foreign sales of this tactical simulator.

Communication equipment will be procured for the army including the requirements for national survival warning networks. Field radar and radiation detection equipment will also be obtained for the army. Programs for the Royal Canadian Navy include shipborne radar, navigation, identification and counter-measures equipment, and a new Canadian designed sonar. This sonar equipment is also being manufactured in Canada for the account of the Royal Navy and Royal Australian Navy.

Installation of the R.C.A.F. air defence communication system will continue and a major program to lease communications for the North American air defence system is underway. Operation and maintenance of the existing defence warning systems will also continue and ground navigation stations for air defence installations will be procured. Up-dating of equipment at existing air defence sites is in process and new stations will be installed.

Last October, the functions of the ammunition and gun branches of my department were combined to form the new armament branch which is now responsible for the procurement and production of all types of ammunition, explosive stores and weapons systems including fire control equipment, underwater weapons, guns, mortars, launchers and both guided and ballistic missiles.

In production at present to meet Canadian military requirements are small arms, torpedoes, antisubmarine mortars and projectiles, automatic rifles and naval destroyer-escort guns. In addition, a range of fire control instruments and a tank navigation system are being produced in Canada to meet U.K. and foreign as well as Canadian military requirements.

The shipbuilding program is continuing with particular emphasis, as during the past year, on the construction of six destroyer escorts of the repeat-Restigouche class. All contracts for the construction of these ships were placed in Canadian shipyards. In addition, a very large number of components for these vessels are being purchased and manufactured in Canada.

Modernization programs are being initiated for the destroyer escorts of the St. Laurent class and also for the H.M.C.S. Crusader.

In addition to the destroyer escort program shipbuilding activities include the construction of the naval tanker supply vessel. A contract for this vessel was placed as a result of competitive tenders. This is the first time that a contract has been awarded for a large and complex Canadian naval vessel in this manner. A contract has also been placed as a result of competitive tenders for the construction of a hydrographic and oceanographic survey vessel for the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Ship repair work will, of course, expand with the increase in the size and complexity of the Canadian fleet. Contracts for repair work as well as those for construction and modernization provide considerable employment in our Canadian shipbuilding industry.

I would also like to refer briefly to the general purchasing program which covers those supplies and services which do not normally involve special production arrangements. These items are procured both through departmental headquarters and the 14 district purchasing offices of my department which are located across Canada from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, British Columbia. These requirements although usually individually small in dollar value represent a great variety of items and a large sum of money in total. It is anticipated that procurement of this type will be approximately the same as last year.

All the programs to which I have just referred have a bearing on the amount of vote 67. The defence production and development sharing responsibilities, which I shall discuss very shortly, also have a bearing on this amount.

As you will note, there is an increase of $911,549 under vote 67 as compared with the estimate for 1960-61. The largest individual item involved in this increase is the provision for salaries which has been increased by over $830,000. This, of course, reflects the adjustments in the salaries of the public service that were made last year.

Vote 68 covers the care, maintenance and custody of stand-by defence plants, buildings, machine tools and production tooling. The amount provided in this year's estimates, namely $888,700, represents an increase of $98,645 over the amount provided in the estimates for 1960-61. The provision is dependent upon decisions to be taken during the fiscal year as to whether continued production stand-by arrangements or disposal action will be required. Accordingly, these requirements cannot be forecast in precise terms at this time.

Vote 69 and supplementary vote 507 provide for capital assistance to Canadian industry and also for the provision of assistance in connection with tooling and preproduction costs involved in bids submitted by Canadian industry under the Canada-United States development and production sharing program. This is another case where there is an element of contingency involved and, as you will appreciate, it was not possible at the time of the preparation of these estimates to anticipate the number of cases where Canadian firms will ask for assistance nor the degree of success that will be obtained in such bids. I shall discuss the provisions of this vote at greater length when I review the provisions of vote 72.

Vote 70 provides for the payment of grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown-owned defence plants operated by private contractors. As I explained at the time of the consideration of last year's estimates these plants are ones that have been acquired by the crown under capital assistance programs of past years. The grants are computed on the normal assessment evaluation by the municipality concerned subject to adjustment with respect to services rendered. There is a very small increase in the amount that is being provided this year.

Vote 71 covers the provision of funds to establish qualified sources for component parts and materials. This vote was established in October 1958 in order to establish qualified component production sources essential to the production of military electronic equipment in Canada.

The object of this vote is to prepare Canadian companies to participate in the production of components for future Canadian military requirements, in order that it will be possible to increase the Canadian content of defence procurement in Canada. This, of course, has the added advantage of increasing the Canadian content in allied countries' requirements for similar items.

From October 1958, to August 31, 1961, more than $860,000 has been spent. Twenty eight contracts have been placed and 12 of these have been completed. In addition, 18 projects are under consideration. These cover a wide range of items, from basic ceramic and precision bearing facilities to transistors, fuel pumps and servo-synchro components.

The operation of this vote shows clearly that Canadian industry is capable of producing new military components to acceptable standards. Some form of government support is required in this area where advanced military technology is a necessity, and vote 71 includes the provision for $607,000 with an additional future year's commitment authority for $300,000.

Vote 72 and the portion of vote 69 dealing with tooling and preproduction costs concern the Canada-United States defence production sharing program, and I should like to discuss the progress of the program, and in particular, the development sharing aspects of that program at this time. I should also like to refer to the important efforts being made to expand the role of Canadian military equipment in the programs of our NATO allies.

During 1960 co-operation between Canada and the United States resulted in the broadening of the areas of opportunity for Canadian defence industry to compete for U.S. defence requirements as well as the streamlining of the procedures involved in such cases. Extensive efforts on both sides of the border were required in this regard. The result has been the elimination of most of the obstacles to Canadian industrial access to the U.S. defence market. For example, the Buy American Act and U.S. duty barriers have been eliminated for a broad range of defence supplies from Canadian industry. It is also important to note that the U.S. defence directives which were issued in late 1960 in connection with the return of offshore procurement to U.S. sources, do not apply to the procurement of Canadian supplies which are included in the defence production sharing program.

One form of financial assistance which is made available by my department to Canadian industry actively interested in sales to the United States is the sharing with Canadian companies of certain preproduction engineering and special tooling costs to enable Canadian companies to cope on more equal terms with competing firms which have been able to write off such costs against previous orders.

In 1959-60 $1,250,000 was voted for this purpose and the same amount was voted last year. As a result of firm commitments for this type of assistance totalling approximately $2.5 million about $20.1 million in production contracts had been received by Canadian companies by August 31, 1961. In addition, these companies have been placed in a position to compete for follow-on orders for similar supplies. Actual expenditures made against the votes for the past two fiscal years have totalled $1,230,554. In the current fiscal year $175,602 has been spent to the end of August.

Expenditures have been less than provided by the votes because of the difficulties involved in attempting to forecast expenditures in this area. The production sharing program is a comparatively new responsibility and there has not been an opportunity to accumulate sufficient data to establish trends in expenditure. Second, it is not possible to anticipate the number of cases in which Canadian firms will seek support from these funds. Third, the number of competitive contracts that will be won by Canadian firms cannot be forecast, and of course, expenditures are only made when a Canadian company has received a contract. Finally, the rate of our expenditure depends upon the period of time covered by the contract and the receipt of billings for progress payments. For these reasons provisional commitments against this vote fluctuate greatly throughout the year and actual expenditures do not fully indicate the amount of support offered during the year. In order to continue this assistance in the establishment of production capacity there has again been included the sum of $1,250,000 under vote 69, and an additional $500,000 has been requested under the supplementary vote 507.

The other major type of assistance made by my department is our contribution to development sharing to encourage Canadian defence industry to maintain technological developments at a level which will promote future defence exports. The sum of $5 millions was approved in both 1959-60 and 1960-61 for this purpose. Expenditures for these two fiscal years amounted to $4,752,775. In the current fiscal year expenditures to the end of August totalled $706,185.

The difficulties involved in forecasting expenditures under vote 69 also apply in the case of this vote. In addition there is a further element which has prevented the full use of the funds that have already been approved. Research and development is by its nature a long process. Most programs require only modest funds in the initial study stages and large expenditures do not occur until prototypes, testing facilities, and such items are required. Some of our programs will be moving into this stage this year.

We are assisting development in such selected fields of United States defence interest as, for example radar and communications, V/STOL aircraft and turbine engines, anti-submarine warfare devices, plasma physics and surface transportation such as hydrofoil vessels and light weight high mobility vehicles.

This support of Canadian industry takes several complementary approaches to defence development sharing with the United States. We have ratified procedural arrangements with the United States army and are now negotiating with the United States air force to the end that selected United States developments requirements will be undertaken in and financed by Canada. Furthermore, in support of uniquely Canadian projects whose successful development will be of interest to the United States services my department has placed contracts with competent Canadian companies. In addition, to equalize the position of Canadian industry in competition with United States industry for U.S. financed development requirements, we are arranging to share the cost of selected projects with the United States government and the Canadian companies concerned.

These activities to August 31 have resulted in the Canadian government's contribution of about $20.1 millions to development projects now awarded to Canadian companies or fully approved and pending only final contractual details. In addition to these firm commitments, there are a number of projects under active consideration including several unique Canadian concepts and formal U.S. requirements approved in principle for support. These amount to about $4.6 millions.

In addition to these projects, which total some $24.7 millions for Canadian expenditure on defence development projects in Canadian industry, a variety of development possibilities are under preliminary investigation. These figures, which do not include some $13.7 millions of U.S. funded research and development and technical engineering assistance contracts, or Canadian industry's own contributions, indicate that substantial U.S. oriented research and development is now taking place in Canadian defence industry.

Examples of major projects included in this Canadian development program are V/STOL aircraft, Avro, Canadair and de Havilland; turbine engines, Orenda and Pratt and Whitney; airborne electronic equipment, Marconi and Computing Devices; radar items, Long Sault Woodcraft and Fleet Manufacturing; communications equipment, Radio Engineering Products; and rocket vehicles, Bristol and Canadair.

In order to continue this work of sustaining technological capability in Canadian defence industry the sum of $5.5 millions with additional commitment authority for $11 millions has been included under vote 72. If this development sharing activity is as successful as the present trend indicates then I expect that supplementary estimates will be proposed before the end of this fiscal year.

As a result of our continued co-operative arrangements with the United States. I am now able to report an increasing flow in the number of United States defence development and production sharing contracts awarded to Canadian industry. These contracts totalled $112.7 millions in the calendar year 1960.

This total includes $61 millions in United States government prime contracts with Canadian companies and $51.7 millions in United States industry subcontracts to Canada. It should be noted that such subcontracting was negligible before 1959 and is largely the result of our production sharing program. The 1959 and 1960 two year total for United States defence production sharing in Canada is $209 millions.

The first eight months of 1961 have shown a similar favourable trend. Production sharing contracts in this period involve some $79.9 millions made up of prime contracts for about $43 millions and subcontracts for about $36.9 millions. This compares with the total of $65 millions of such United States defence business placed in Canada in the first eight months of 1960. Some major items involved in the prime contract area were in connection with de Havilland Caribou aircraft and spares for various de Havilland aircraft, $7.7 millions; Pratt and Whitney Aircraft engine spares, repair and overhaul, $11.7 millions; Sparton sonobuoys, $1.1 million; Canadian Arsenals' cartridges, $3.9 millions; Radio Engineering Products field telephones, $1.6 million; Orenda engine development, $913,000; and Marsland Engineering, plotting tables, $2.6 millions. A firm order for Marconi airborne doppler navigation radar in the amount of $370,000 has been received and negotiations are under way to increase this to $1.7 million. There are good prospects for additional large orders.

Some of the subcontracts consisted of counter-measure systems, $1.2 million, to Northern Electric; switchboards for FPS-26, $830,000, to Federal Pacific; radar equipment, $2.3 millions, to Canadian Westinghouse; NASARR subsystems to Westinghouse, $3.5 millions: training and installation AN/FST=2B (SAGE) Burroughs, $1 million; missile components, $2.7 millions, to Sperry; and Bomarc parts and components, $1.3 million, to several Canadian companies.

Significant impetus has been given to the Canada-United States defence production sharing program by the F101-F104-Pine Tree agreement between the two governments announced by the Prime Minister on June 12. This agreement clearly indicates the sincere intent of the United States and Canadian governments to make defence production sharing a vital program. It will make a singificant contribution to maintaining Canada's defence production base. Many of our most important defence contractors will receive contracts and subcontracts.

Only governments can negotiate transactions of the magnitude of the one that I have just mentioned. Generally, however, the government's role lies in the creation of a climate of opportunity for Canadian industry to compete for United States defence business. Therefore, real success of the program is dependent upon the efforts of Canadian industry. In this regard some companies have shown commendable initiative and effort but unfortunately some others have been reluctant to accept the challenge. In order to further stimulate Canadian industrial activity in the production sharing program I again wrote on May 29 to the senior officers of Canadian firms which have indicated an interest in the program, outlining progress for the past year, the continuing need for co-operation from industry, and the opportunities available. I once again urge all companies with capability and resources to make a determined effort to gain United States defence business for Canadian industry.

I should now like to turn to another area, quite separate from production sharing, in which my department has been endeavouring to expand the role of Canadian developed defence equipment—I refer to our efforts to co-operate with our NATO allies in the research, development and production of defence equipment requirements.

By direction of the NATO defence ministers, the NATO armaments committee and its various sub groups are providing a means by which research, development and production requirements can be co-ordinated to the mutual advantage of all countries participating. My department is working closely with the Department of National Defence and others in this long range plan of NATO co-operation which will, I trust, ensure that Canadian capabilities are recognized in the light of NATO requirements. It should be emphasized that the purpose of this co-operation is co-ordination and not sales promotion, and it is in this spirit that we are participating.

We have found, however, that our increased efforts in the NATO area have had supplementary benefits. Several countries have placed contracts for current Canadian equipment. These contracts involve substantial benefits for Canadian companies.

The interest shown by certain of our NATO allies in our aircraft, radar, anti-submarine warfare equipment, navigational aids and other equipments developed by Canada is heartening. Every effort is being made by my department in close co-operation with the Department of National Defence and Canadian industry to provide demonstrations, items for test purposes, and the administrative machinery to ensure that our industry is not in a disadvantageous position in relation to other potential suppliers in the European area.

We intend to provide financial support for preproduction and tooling costs and development costs, similar to that we now provide to companies entering the United States defence market. Support of a company under the production sharing program has a secondary benefit in that it also assists the same company in its efforts to sell to our overseas allies.

With respect to administrative machinery, I have offered to the defence ministers of our allies, the services of the Canadian Commercial Corporation to act on behalf of their governments and prime contractors in the procurement of defence equipment and supplies in Canada. Use of this crown corporation ensures that any purchases made by a foreign government will be negotiated and administered by the Department of Defence Production employing the same procedures and safeguards as are followed by the department in procuring supplies for the Canadian services. Such assurances are valuable to both foreign governments and Canadian suppliers since they eliminate many of the difficulties inherent in the establishment of new commercial relationships over large distances and outside of traditional military procurement channels.

The benefits which may accrue to Canadian industry in the years ahead as a result of co-operation with our NATO allies are indicated by the successful sales of Canadian developed products in connection with the F-104 aircraft adopted by Canada and other NATO countries. In 1960 letters of intent authorizing the manufacture of flight simulators up to about $3.5 millions were received. The total probable procurement involves about $22 millions. These flight simulators are produced by Canadian Aviation Electronics Co. for sale to Germany and the Netherlands. Our expectations are that further orders from other countries for these equipments will be received.

In addition, as a result of our arrangements with Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, we have received orders worth approximately $15.5 million for the wings, rear fuselage and empennage of F-104 aircraft. Further such procurement from Canadian sources may result in substantial future orders.

Other Canadian equipment has also found a place on these aircraft and I refer specifically to the electronics equipment sold to Lockheed for inclusion in the F-104's that have been sold by that corporation to overseas governments. For example position and homing indicator systems produced by Computing Devices of Canada and sold to Lockheed for Germany involve a value of $2.1 million. I have, of course, already reported these Lockheed orders as U.S. production sharing subcontracts.

In our efforts in the European area we are not neglecting our traditional relationship with the United Kingdom. Two major sales of Canadian developed items to the United Kingdom in 1960 were the sale of de Havilland Beaver aircraft and also variable depth sonars produced by EMI-Cossor Electronics.

For the first eight months of 1961, some $2.5 million in actual prime contracts were placed through the Canadian Commercial Corporation alone, covering such diverse fields as flight and tactics trainers (Canadian Aviation Electronics) and variable depth sonars (EMI-Cossor). In addition de Havilland has received this year prime contracts direct from Ghana for Otter, Beaver and Caribou aircraft totalling about $8.4 million; Orenda Engines has received about $4.8 millions direct from West Germany for spares, and Jarry Hydraulics has received about $1 million direct from West Germany for power flight controls. Furthermore, Canadair has received this year about $1.3 million in subcontracts from German and Dutch prime contractors for components for the F-104, and Computing Devices received contracts for P.H.I. systems valued at approximately $8.3 million destined for Germany, France and Italy. Further orders for such equipment are expected from NATO countries and their prime contractors. In most cases these sales were part of major continuing programs placed in Canada as a result of technological skill, competitive pricing and active selling by Canadian industry with the assistance of government departments concerned. For the first eight months of 1961 the total overseas defence business reported by Canadian companies, including the above-mentioned contracts, amounted to $28.8 millions.

In all these activities my department is fortunate in that it has developed over the years the machinery and the specialized knowledge of production and procurement officers essential in the field of military procurement. This background now enables us expeditiously to promote Canadian capabilities to meet the defence requirements of allied countries wherever they may arise. The efforts required are most substantial, entailing, among other things, considerable liaison abroad. I should like to say that the members of my department are pursuing these matters with energy and dedication.

Our progress in our efforts to expand the use of Canadian defence equipment both by our overseas allies, and also by the United States in our production sharing program has been encouraging. We shall continue these efforts in a most vigorous fashion.

Mr. Chairman, in light of the recent unfortunate change in the international situation, I wish to bring the house up to date on the planning for a war supplies agency that has been going forward in the emergency supply planning branch of the department since May of last year.

As I explained in presenting last year's estimates, and as the Prime Minister reiterated on September 13, the government has decided that should nuclear war break out a war supplies agency would be brought into existence immediately, by order in council under the War Measures Act, to assume responsibility for all aspects of control over the production, distribution and pricing of supplies for both civil and military purposes, with the exception of certain aspects of the agricultural and fishing industries.

An interim organizational structure for the war supplies agency, designed to meet the anticipated needs for the period immediately following nuclear attack, has been developed and approved. Within the over-all organization of the war supplies agency, there will be national, regional, zonal and local components, in conformity with the system of emergency government being developed by the emergency measures organization under the direction of the Prime Minister. The staffing of the national component of the war supplies agency has been completed by the selection on a stand-by basis of suitably qualified persons from various government departments and agencies in Ottawa. The staffing of the ten regional components, likewise on a stand-by basis, is near completion. I might add that the war supplies agency was fully represented at the national level during exercise TOCSIN 1961 and had a nucleus staff at each regional headquarters. In the further exercise to be held this fall the war supplies agency will participate fully at both national and regional levels.

In connection with the staffing of the regional components of the war supplies agency, hon. members might be interested to know that arrangements are being made with the various provincial governments to draw on their personnel resources as well as on the field staffs of various federal departments and agencies. Formal agreements to this end are currently being negotiated. The next step in the organization of what might be termed a "shadow" war supplies agency, will be the establishment of the appropriate components at the zonal and local levels. For this purpose we would expect to draw on the personnel resources of business and industry as well as on federal and provincial field staffs.

One of the major tasks of the war supplies agency, should it ever have to be brought into existence, would be to assess the country's surviving material resources. To provide the basis for making such an assessment, the emergency supply planning branch has initiated a research program designed to produce in readily useable form comprehensive inventory data on major stocks of essential commodities and related production facilities normally available in the country. This research program is necessarily long term in character, but substantial results have already been achieved with respect to the collection and processing of data on stocks of food and petroleum products. Methods have been developed in co-operation with the army and emergency measures organization for evaluating surviving resources after attack.

A third major aspect of our planning has been the preparation in draft form of various regulations and orders likely to be required by the war supplies agency in exercising effective control of supplies under conditions of nuclear war. Among other things, a plan for the emergency rationing of essential consumer goods is now before the government.

The staff of the emergency supply planning branch remains small. There are at present 12 officers at headquarters in Ottawa and five regional officers. Two additional officers for the headquarters staff and four more regional officers are currently being recruited.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to thank the minister for his very thorough and almost exhaustive report. He has gone over the activities of the department very carefully and he has given us considerable detail with respect to the projects on which it is presently engaged.

Last year we went over most of the items of this department very thoroughly and consequently it is not our intention to debate them at length on this occasion, particularly in view of the fact that a considerable portion of the money being asked for has already been spent.

There are, however, one or two questions which we shall ask on the details, and there is one I should like to ask at this time under the general subject of administration. The minister mentioned that although the amount of production sharing which had been obtained from the United States so far this year was greater than in the first eight months of last year it is, however, only about half last year's total. I wonder if the hon. gentleman could give the committee some assurance that during the remaining four months of the year the amount of business obtained will bring the total up well beyond last year's figure.

Mr. O'Hurley: I should like to report to the hon. member for Trinity that this year, to date, at the end of August we had contracts and subcontracts for $79,925,000. Last year on the same date the figure was $65,095,000. Our prospects for the months to come are very good and we are positive that the result this year in production sharing is going to be very much higher than last year.

Mr. Carter: Last year in this committee there was some talk about contracts we hoped to get from Germany, Belgium and other European countries. Were we successful?

Mr. O'Hurley: The discussion at the time was concerned with the simulator program and possible orders from Germany, Holland and Belgium. We obtained those contracts. We won the competition and we were awarded the contracts. The simulators are being built in Montreal at the present time for those countries, as well as to satisfy the Canadian order.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister indicate in round figures the total amount involved in those contracts?

Mr. O'Hurley: As it stands today the figure is around $3 million, but the total contract is going to be worth more than $20 million.

Mr. Howard: My intention is to ask the minister a series of questions rather than to make specific comments. I placed some queries on the order paper before the summer recess and in due course I received some answers which are contained in sessional paper 267B of September 7. I should like to make some inquiries of the minister concerning the information contained in that sessional paper and the answers given to particular questions.

My inquiry had to do with subventions, or subsidies. The question which I asked was whether, since January 1, 1950, any subventions had been paid to any incorporated companies other than crown corporations and, if so, what was the amount of the subvention, the total amount paid to each company, and so on. Some of the information which was given to me by the Department of Defence Production contains the names of companies such as the Canadian Marconi Company, Canadian Steel Foundries, Canadian Steel Improvement, Canadian Vickers—a number of companies which have received subventions from the Department of Defence Production in respect of certain types of work. The information lists the fields of endeavour in which each of these particular companies are engaged—electronics, shipbuilding and the like for the period, I take it, from April 1, 1959 to May 31, 1961.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

In so far as one part of the answer is concerned a total of about $1,250,000 is shown as having been paid to these companies by way of subvention or subsidy. I wonder if the minister could explain the reason for these particular subventions. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has before him a copy of this particular sessional paper. If he has, it will not be necessary for me to go into detail with regard to the particular companies. However, if the minister has not got the list I could go into greater detail. Before doing so, I wonder if the minister is familiar with this particular subject matter I have before me.

Mr. O'Hurley: I do not know whether this information would be sufficient but these subsidies or subventions are really payments in respect to pre-production and engineering assistance in connection with contracts for the United States. Would the hon. member for Skeena mind giving me a few examples? I have not got that paper before me today.

Mr. Howard: Certainly. For example, the first company mentioned on this list is Beaconing, Optical and Precision Materials, of Montreal, Quebec. They are engaged in the electronics business and they received a subvention during the period between April 1, 1960 and May 31, 1961, to a total amount of $23,000. The authority for payment is given as treasury board minute 573346 of December 12, 1960. The second entry deals with the same firm and the amount is $25,596 over the same period of time. I think that, perhaps, will be sufficient.

Mr. O'Hurley: I have a copy here of the answer given to the hon. member for Skeena at the time. These subventions were approved by treasury board, by the Department of National Defence and by the Department of Defence Production, this, of course, being a joint venture. The amounts are for tooling and pre-production so as to be competitive in obtaining United States contracts.

Mr. Howard: This was in order that we might be competitive with United States firms?

Mr. O'Hurley: In the United States market.

Mr. Howard: Does the same reason apply in respect to the subsidies paid to each of the companies listed? Was it a question of competition?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if I might ask a further question of the minister based on the same order. This is headed "Establishment of Qualified Production Sources of Components and Materials". I take it this relates to something different because in some instances the same companies are listed—the Canadian Marconi Company and Canadian Arsenals, for example. This also applies to subventions given for some other reason. The total for the four year period is shown as $811,715. There is a further reply headed "Sustainment of Canadian Industrial Technological Capability". This is for a three year period and the total amount is $4,919 million.

Can the minister explain what is meant by the heading "Establishment of Production Sources of Components and Materials", the further heading "Sustainment of Canadian Industrial Technological Capability" and offer an explanation concerning the various subventions?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, the first question concerns vote No. 71. With a view to ensuring the maximum participation of Canadian firms in defence procurement, this requirement was first set up to establish qualified sources of supply of component parts and materials sufficiently in advance of Department of National Defence contract demands to lessen the dependence of end product producers on United States and other sources of supply. These are products we used to buy outside Canada which are now procured for the department in Canada. The program is essentially one of developing industrial capability in the military components field. It is to assist Canadian manufacturers to produce in Canada components to meet the requirements of the Canadian armed forces.

The hon. gentleman's other question related to vote No. 72. This vote was raised in 1959-60 to further the stated policy of the Canadian government of sustaining a research and development capability in Canadian industry with which to undertake the sharing of defence development and production tasks with the United States.

Mr. Howard: What is the future expectation with respect to engaging in subvention of this type? Will the activity diminish, increase or remain stable?

Mr. O'Hurley: Over the next few years we expect an increase in this activity which is valuable in providing work for Canadian industry. For the assistance of the hon. member I should point out that this activity prepares Canadian industry by assisting it to acquire skills that were not previously available. The benefit applies to defence and civil industries. They are able to acquire skills which they lacked previously and can thus produce material we formerly had to purchase outside Canada.

Mr. Howard: I cannot resist commenting that I find it strange that these private enterprise companies should require assistance through the government from the Canadian taxpayer. I am not complaining about our helping them from time to time in the development of Canadian industry to ensure that as much of this work as possible is done in Canada but these are rugged individualists who in this case are asking the Canadian taxpayer to take the risk for them.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister indicate to the committee what were the Canadian purchases for defence equipment in the United States for 1960 in relation to both contracts and subcontracts and what they have been this year to date?

Mr. O'Hurley: The following are the Canadian government's defence purchases placed directly in the United States. In 1959, prime contracts $47 million; subcontracts $61.2 million. In 1960, prime contracts amounted to $83.3 million; subcontracts $113 million. For the first six months of 1961 the figures are as follows: prime contracts $18.7 million; subcontracts $36.4 million.

Mr. Hellyer: These figures do not include contracts for defence equipment placed by Canadian industry directly in the United States?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes, they do include those contracts which related to defence purchases.

Item agreed to.

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, now that the estimates of this department have been passed by the committee may I take this opportunity to extend my appreciation to hon. members of the committee. I think we have probably established a record for the passage of the estimates of this department. I wish to assure the committee of my continuing co-operation and understanding.

Mr. Hellyer: As long as the minister appreciates that this does not establish a precedent.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

FLAGS OF CANADA

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR A NATIONAL FLAG OF CANADA

On the order:

Resuming debate on the motion of Mr. Smith (Lincoln) for the second reading of Bill No. C-8, an act to authorize a Canadian flag.

Mr. John Pallet (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lincoln is unable to be here this afternoon. He has asked me to request the unanimous consent of the house to allow this order to drop. There are other bills on the order paper relating to a national flag which will likely be reached and so the hon. member has requested unanimous consent to have this order dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to the withdrawal of the order for the resumption of the debate on the second reading of Bill No. C-8?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it would be ungracious not to agree to give unanimous consent, but this is such an extraordinary and bizarre bill it seems rather a shame to take it off the order paper. However, I will not on that account object.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this is such an extraordinarily interesting and unusual bill that it would be a kindness to the hon. member to permit it to be withdrawn from the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the bill be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill withdrawn.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT REQUIRING DISCLOSURE OF CAMPAIGN FUND CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-50, to amend the Canada Elections Act (election expenses).

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on second reading of this bill I might say that while technically we are dealing with the second reading, in actual fact we are really resuming debate on a bill that has been before the house for many years before I had the privilege of attending this chamber. It is very interesting also, and I think the house should be reminded of this, that such a bill has always been introduced by a member of this party. Similar bills have been introduced for many years by members of the C.C.F. party but unfortunately we have never had an expression of opinion of the house on the measure. The history of the bill in the past is that it has always been talked out, first by Liberal government members and then by Conservative government members. I should like to express the hope that after all these years we may have reached the stage where we can at least give second reading to the bill and accept the principle.

However, Mr. Speaker, the efforts of this group over many years have not been entirely lost because there is a growing interest and concern about this matter. We see examples of this right across the country from coast to coast. We are aware, and it has been referred to before, of the great assistance in this regard that was rendered by two members of the clergy in the province of Quebec who, having become most concerned about corruption that arose out of contributions to political parties, proceeded to write a very thought-provoking article in this regard that has had great and beneficial results, particularly in the province of Quebec.

I should like to make it very clear that this problem is not confined to that province. It is very fine for those of us who come from other provinces to point a finger at Quebec and say that the problem is much worse there than in any other province but unfortunately that is not the case, as I intend to prove in my few brief remarks when I refer to certain articles that have been written.

It is our contention that a great deal of the corruption and a great deal of the fear and uneasiness that are growing across the country can certainly be curtailed, if not eliminated completely, by the adoption of a measure such as Bill No. C-50 which compels political parties to reveal the sources of their funds. I recall that some two years ago when a bill similar in many respects was being debated in the house a question was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome). I believe the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) was speaking at the time. As found on page 2744 of Hansard for April 16, 1959, the hon. member for Vancouver South asked the following question:

> When your party evolves into the party you expect it to be, will you still be introducing a bill concerning the disclosure of election expenses.

I do not think there is any better answer than the fact that today, after the event has come about which was referred to two years ago, we who are now within the confines of the New Democratic party are introducing a bill similar to the ones we introduced when we were in the C.C.F.

We have also heard various spokesmen from the other parties expound the theory that it might be better if members did not know from where their support came. I believe that the same hon. member for Vancouver South expressed this idea as found on page 5308 of Hansard of June 30, 1959. I think he missed the point. The important thing is not that the candidate or member should know the source of these funds. Rather, it is that the public should know the source of these funds and that the house assembled here should know their source. Hon. members should know if breweries, contractors, yes, trade unions, contribute their money to support any political party. The house should know so that these factors can be taken into consideration when members are considering legislation that comes before the house. When legislation which is of particular benefit to an organization that has contributed substantially to the party in power at any particular time, comes before the house I think it would be a very useful thing for the house to be fully aware of what has taken place in the past.

I should like to refer to two articles in recent issues of Maclean's magazine which deal with the subject matter of the bill now before us. The first one, written by Mr. Peter Newman, is found in the issue of May 6, 1961, some few months ago. It is entitled, "Who'll Pay the Record Shot for Our Next Election?". The subheading is, "The Smart Contributors Buy 'Insurance' with the Two Old Parties". The first paragraph reads as follows:

> No process in the working of Canadian democracy is surrounded by a climate of greater mystery than the collection of campaign funds by political parties. The innuendo of scandal is so strong that the details of party finances can seldom be traced beyond the whispered exaggerations of Ottawa gossip.

I think that is one mystery which, if it is going to remain, should be made an illegal offence. He goes on to express the danger, as he sees it, of the streamlining of what I would call this malpractice that has gone on for so many years in our country. He goes on to say:

> The Conservatives have set a precedent by appointing to the cabinet a man believed to be specifically charged with financial matters.

Certainly if that statement is true, and I do not know whether it is, it gives rise to further concern. Mr. Newman goes on to mention the methods used and says:

> The biggest donors, as in past elections, are expected to be the large corporations, indulging in what they call "necessary" giving. These are contributions made without any expectation of specific returns, beyond the preservation of free enterprise and the two party system. The donation is almost always split 60-40, with the party in power getting the bigger share.

The interesting thing about this suggestion is that it is verified in another article to which I should like to refer in a moment, an article written by no less a person than the former national organizer for the Liberal party. Mr. Newman goes on to deal with another group which he says is much more dangerous than the one he has already mentioned, and says:

> The most willing contributors to party treasuries are some of the contractors who deal in government work. They usually make the gift to the party in power fairly openly, but quietly also take out some insurance by making a smaller donation to the opposition.

Then he concludes his article by referring to what is probably the greatest known scandal of this kind that has ever hit a federal government.

The last paragraph of this article reads as follows:

> Meanwhile, the present system mysteriously continues to produce millions of dollars for the party war chests. Probably the most forthright clue came from R. O. Sweezey, the president of the Beauharnois Power Corporation, who in the late 1920's contributed about $700,000 to the Liberal party, after his company had secured hydro rights on the St. Lawrence. The contribution had been necessary, he said, because "gratefulness was always regarded as an important factor in dealing with democratic governments."

I think that outlines very clearly the situation. This problem has existed for many years in this country. In order to indicate that feeling of concern is growing, and growing at a very rapid rate, I should like to point out that not only was this article published in May of this year but we also find another one in a recent issue of Maclean's magazine. I should like to recommend this article to all hon. members. It was written by Mr. James Scott who, until recently, was the national organizer of the Liberal party. He says, "Political slush funds corrupt all parties".

There are some allegations or suppositions in this article of Mr. Scott's which I certainly cannot accept. For example, while he very frankly points out the contributions in the past and mentions specific cases, and after all as the national organizer of one of the two major parties in the country he should know what he is talking about in that respect, he goes on to say something to the effect that because the New Democratic party might have funds available to them in a somewhat unequal proportion to that of the other parties, the whole idea should be abolished.

I should like to submit that it is not in the giving of this money to political parties that the evil lies. I submit it is in the secretive giving. If any company wants to donate to the Liberal party or the Conservative party, it should be its privilege to do so. However, the public should be made aware of what it is doing. Then, the public could realize possibly why it is being done. As I say, it is very important when we have to deal with legislation in this house that we should be aware of any facts along this line. Mr. Scott endeavours to create the impression that it is just as evil for say a million members of the Canadian labour congress to contribute their 60 cents a year to the New Democratic party as it would be for one individual to contribute $600,000 a year to one of the other parties. I think any reasonable man would realize there is a great deal of difference here. Contribution of 60 cents a year from an individual would not place him in the same preferred position that a much larger contribution by an individual or by a company seeking favours from a government would be in as a result of that contribution.

Again, on page 67 of this issue of Maclean's for September 9, we find some very interesting point to which I should like to refer. As I say, both Mr. Newman and myself are in agreement as to what occurred in the past. I quote:

> However, the biggest corporate donors for the most part do not attempt to intervene directly in party policy. Generally speaking, they contribute to both the Conservative and the Liberal parties. The traditional split is usually 60 per cent to the party in power and 40 per cent to the party in opposition, but this is subject to many variations.

He points out how widespread this practice is. On page 67 I also find this:

> Nevertheless, nobody who holds office or hopes to hold office can ignore his benefactors. Any citizen of Canada can lay his views before the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition but, human nature being what it is (and these men are human), a man whose firm donates $25,000 or $50,000 to a political party every election is likely to get through to the party leader a lot faster than somebody the party never heard of.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that the evil here is not in the giving. The evil is in the fact that nobody knows about it except the two parties involved; that is where the danger lies. Then, on page 69 of this article, I find this, and this is something to which I referred a little while ago when I said that the favourite pastime of every province was to point the accusing finger at the province of Quebec.

> It is often assumed in the rest of Canada that this occurs only in the province of Quebec, but this is far from the truth.
> A year or two ago, during a provincial election campaign in another province I received a call from a small contractor of my acquaintance. He told me he had been telephoned by an official of the government party of the province who instructed him to have $2,000 ready in cash by the following week. It would be picked up by a party legman and would be the contractor's contribution to the party's campaign funds. This man's entire business had been built up on government contracts and he asked me what to do. I told him to give the man the money and me an affidavit stating how and why he had made the contribution. We could have broken the whole thing wide open; my informant told me other contractors had received similar instructions. But they were all frightened. They all paid up and kept quiet about it.

It is not my intention to take up too much of this private members' hour in speaking on this subject. I think I have pointed out some of the dangers involved. I think I have pointed out the fact that this practice is widespread and has gone on for many years. I feel it is time this matter was given serious consideration because if this practice continues unabated it will undermine our whole democratic system. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is designed to eliminate this danger, and I hope it receives approval in principle in this house today.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on this particular bill today I do not need to go into any detailed complaining or crying as the hon. member who just resumed his seat has done. I am not exactly sure where he stands with regard to former C.C.F. policy and that of the New Democratic party. I should like to draw to the attention of the house the fact that he is in no position to try to bluff as he has done today. It is nothing short of a bluff when any member gets up in this house and tries to make a case based on facts derived from some national magazine, of which he has no personal knowledge and for which he is more or less dependent on someone else.

I say it is a bluff for the simple reason that the success of the former C.C.F. party—if it is a former party because that is yet to be decided in view of the fact there does not seem to be the collusion between the two parties that they would like to have—is directly related to its success in the field of collections. If I may put it another way, the success of his political party at the polls is directly related to its success in the field of collections. You can see for yourself why they get up and complain.

The hon. member has referred to the fact that it is the secrecy of the giving that is evil and dangerous. I think if the Canadian people were given a choice they would rather have secret giving than the intimidation which has been imposed upon the workers and trade union men of this country by this New Democratic party in extracting 60 cents a year from these individuals. I say "forced upon the workers of this country" for the simple reason that it is nothing less than that. They have evolved a system whereby 60 cents per capita be taken from the members of an affiliated union of the Canadian labour congress. If any one individual does not choose to pay this 60 cents, he is given this democratic right to contract out. How can any man in this house stand up and imply that he belongs to anything that is democratic when they collect 60 cents a head from every individual who belongs to an affiliated union of the Canadian labour congress? How can they refer to this procedure as democratic?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the hon. member permit a question.

Mr. MacInnis: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Is the hon. member aware of the fact that the only way in which he might be affiliated is by the democratic vote of his local?

Mr. MacInnis: This hon. member has more experience than and just as much knowledge as the hon. member for Timmins who has just taken his seat as to what goes on in local unions. I can give him and the other members of his party quite a rundown of how this develops. I might say that if he himself professes to be democratic, he will stand up and deny the attitude adopted by the new party in that they are giving every man an opportunity to contract out on this 60 cents payment. If there is anything whatever democratic about their intentions in this new party, the attitude should be "contract in". It is just a matter of mass intimidation when they bring this matter before the union membership for a vote and certain trade unions are affiliated with the congress. The situation is that an individual is obliged to declare himself against something. This is not the nature of the union men. They do not necessarily want to declare themselves against anything. Usually it is for something that they want to declare themselves. However, you have now put a question to the men throughout the unions in Canada, asking them to declare themselves against something. They do not wish to do this. The result is that through mass intimidation you have a great number of union men in this country being forced to pay into what is called the New Democratic party and I place the emphasis on the word "Democratic". If there were any guts whatsoever in the Canadian congress, the principle would be not to contract out but rather to contract in. That would be something in the way of a democratic movement. But that is not the situation. What you have is intimidation. You say the secret way of doing things is evil and dangerous. I say that intimidation is far worse than that.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes; if it is a sensible question.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Is the hon. member aware of the fact that this decision to contract in or out was an individual choice made by each and every affiliated trade union across Canada, a choice made by themselves?

Mr. MacInnis: I note that the hon. member said that it was an individual choice of every union across Canada. May I remind the hon. member now that what I am speaking of in the way of the democratic movement on the part of the New Democratic party are the rights of the individual, not the decision of the union bosses. This is a situation that I am fully aware of as it has gone on in my own union at home for some time, where the C.C.F. party collected a per capita tax from the united mine workers when the constitution of the mine workers itself did not permit it.

The hon. member speaks of the rights of individuals and refers to the choice of individual unions. But here was a case in which men were paying into the C.C.F. party or giving financial support to it while their moral support was going somewhere else. I put this question to the hon. member for Timmins and if I were permitted to do so I would put it in the way of a question to him and would allow him to answer it. They have the new party and they are going through this system of check-off whereby individual members will pay through a check-off to a political fund. When the request is put to the various companies or businesses through which the check-off will be asked to be deducted, what will the position of the new party be if the individual who agrees to this check-off, agrees with the condition that the check-off be taken for a political fund, that it be taken off and directed to the Liberal party while another person's is directed to the Conservative party? Are they then going to stand up and ask for the privilege of a check-off for the three political parties?

As a member of the Conservative party I certainly do not want any part of a check-off from a union man who supports my party. If he supports me through my party he does it voluntarily. If he pays to my party, he does it voluntarily and secretly. This is going to be the last party that would stand up and consider doing or attempting to do what is being done by the New Democratic party, even without intimidation, namely to ask and to collect fees from people who will be forced to pay 60 cents towards a political fund while they will go out and support another party. Something that is evident right across this country. Although the C.C.F. for years have been collecting through the check-off from the workers of the country, they still have not been collecting the votes. We ourselves will depend on the secret way, on what the hon. member considers to be the dangerous and evil way. I say to him, however, that the dangerous and evil way is the intimidation which they are placing on the union men of this country by asking them not to contract in but to contract out.

As a union man himself, the hon. member is fully aware that this is the least democratic approach they could possibly put to any kind of fund or check-off from the men for any such purpose. As I said before, this is a situation that has gone on for years with the C.C.F. party in Cape Breton. A few of the locals stood up and cut it off. But for years they have been collecting that per capita tax from the members of the union down there while the union constitution itself denies this as a right.

The hon. member talks about the individual. Still and all, this was something that was jockied into position by the executive of the union at the time, whereby the men were not given a choice at all. This money was just taken from them and paid into the coffers of the C.C.F. party. I could go on and tell what happened to some of that money also.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): If the situation is as stated by the hon. member, namely that the C.C.F. somehow collected this money from the miners down there without their consent, how were some of the locals able to cut it off, as he also stated?

Mr. MacInnis: In a question earlier the hon. member referred to the individual choice of the union and I reminded him that he said "the individual", not the union. Now he wants an explanation as to how this was done. Again I say it was done by the union bosses. There was no referendum for the men with regard to the manner of this payment. Then one or two locals took objection to its being done and they stood up and asked that this money no longer be deducted. There was nothing then the union could do about it because there was no referendum held on it. Again I say this to the hon. member. If he wishes to inquire more about the working of these unions, I will give him a full and detailed explanation as to how it comes about. I do not think it is necessary for me to do that because I understand the hon. member is a union member and that he already knows the workings of it.

This thing has been going on for years. The C.C.F. party has collected this money, as I say, while the constitution of the united mine workers does not permit it. But here is a situation which went on, which has been stopped by the miners and which is again being imposed. Here is a condition being imposed upon the workers of this country by a per capita tax of 60 cents for every individual that belongs to a union affiliated with the Canadian labour congress. I say it is a shame. I would ask the hon. member, on union principles alone, to rise in his place and deny that contracting out is the proper way. I would ask him to rise in his place that is and support the idea that contracting in is democratic, as opposed to what they are trying to pull.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Before the hon. member sits down, may I ask him one more question?

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacInnis: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the hon. member try to inform the miners of Nova Scotia that, like the rest of the country, they should run their union bosses instead of permitting the union bosses to run them, as I can only assume they did from the remarks made by the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member repeat that question.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just informed the house that the miners in Nova Scotia are being run by the union bosses. Will he endeavour to tell them that the practice across the rest of the country is for the union members to run the union bosses, instead of the other way around, as is apparently the case in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, apparently I have to keep driving to get my point across. The hon. member has misinterpreted my remarks. The miners in Cape Breton decide what their union bosses should do. I have already pointed out that they took it upon themselves to stop the per capita tax that was being paid to the C.C.F. party. We stopped it where this was desired; and where it was not desired by the miners because of their affiliation to the C.C.F. party, it went on.

But the miners of my area and of my local in particular took it upon themselves to stop the C.C.F. per capita tax payment through the union check-off. The miners run the union, it does not run them.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest this afternoon to the speech of the hon. member who introduced this bill and also to the speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) who speaks with such authority and feeling on union matters.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): He speaks with such confusion.

Mr. McGee: It seems to me that in approaching this subject of campaign funds and campaign contributions the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) has fallen into a common error and has certainly departed from the direction and definition of his New Democratic party.

The tenor of the speech of the hon. member suggested that this matter of campaign giving was an evil thing; that the secrecy which clothed the contributions of individual members was hiding strange, dark shapes of men bent on twisting the purpose of parliament and corrupting the parties in this house.

When his colleague, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) was speaking to a similar bill in 1959 he used the word "subvert". He said:

> These persons who contribute to political parties attempt to subvert parliament and the political parties within parliament.

I looked up the specific meaning of the word "subvert". It means, to overturn; to effect the destruction or overthrow of a party. The approach of the hon. member for Skeena and other hon. members who have taken this position in this discussion is repudiated by the people who have provided what has been described as the intellectual backdrop of the new party. The book "Social Purpose for Canada", edited by Michael Oliver, discusses many interesting things in connection with the new party. I have yet to appreciate how the principles defined in this book, which was written and rushed into print before the convention, are accepted by the New Democratic party.

I suggest that the hon. member read this book. I refer him particularly to page six and an article written by George Grant entitled "An Ethic of Community". He touches on this question of campaign giving and campaign contributions. He goes on to describe the support the established parties have obtained in various ways, and then he says this:

> In saying all this, however, it is necessary to disclaim any "cops and robbers" or "conspiracy" view of history, which would imply that our society is at the mercy of a few wealthy and powerfbul men with Machiavellian intentions.

Perhaps the hon. member should have checked before he proceeded with this bill again.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member inform the house by whom those words were written? Did the hon. member say it was Grant?

Mr. McGee: George Grant is the name of the author.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Does the hon. member know the gentleman's occupation or where he is from?

Mr. McGee: This particular book has been published, advertised and discussed. It is supposed to be, and is described as the intellectual backdrop of the New Democratic party. Being intrigued, as many of us were in all political parties, with all aspects of the New Democratic party I glanced through this publication to determine whether this particular group had anything to say about campaign funds.

I would mention one thing that has been said, and which I think has to be said. It is easy to indulge in hand-wringing and to deplore all the various incidents which have occurred in connection with campaign giving. However I think it must, and should be, placed on the record that people over generations have considered campaign giving an important and integral part of their social responsibilities, just as contributing to a church collection and the various types of funds and community drives which occur in everyday life.

It would be indeed unfortunate, it seems to me, to lump in with this suggestion of unlawfulness and illegal practices, decent, honourable and idealistic persons in our society who, supporting the party of their choice over the years, have provided on a continuing basis the money they know is necessary to provide continuity and the essential ingredients that keep a party alive and functioning, as parties must do in our society to sustain the very essence of our democracy.

In connection with the articles written in Maclean's magazine, I am not suggesting for a moment that abuses have not taken place. The evidence is of course there. But I am suggesting that the men of obvious Liberal background and persuasion who contributed substantial sums of money to the purchase of a home for the current leader of the opposition, when the leader of the opposition of that day happened to be a Conservative, had no malicious or malevolent idea behind their contributions. Since the government has changed and that house is occupied by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), men who are Conservative supporters have donated to the refurbishing and continuing expense of that home. Is there any evil motive in this?

This book also contains another very interesting passage. I do not think I am at liberty to disclose the name of the gentleman in question, but he is well known to several hon. members of this house. He contributed substantially to one of the established parties, and in cases where an individual had the particular characteristics and attributes which he admired and respected, he supported that person regardless of political party. Another thing he supported is what is described on page 77 of this intellectual backdrop to the new party in an article entitled "The Mass Media" written by Neil Compton. He is discussing the small magazines in Canada today and he refers to the "scholarly and literary quarterlies we now have in plenty". However, he adds, "the poor old Canadian Forum once a mighty power in the land is perhaps the only publication in existence which could conceivably fulfil this role." He is talking about the role of social and political criticism. He goes on to say:

> Unfortunately the Forum has for some years been deprived of the private subsidy which once took care of its deficit.

Then he goes on to explain the problems they have in applying to the Canada Council as part of their efforts to sustain this particular magazine.

The private subsidy referred to which kept that organ of socialist opinion alive and coming out on a monthly basis was this same individual whom I mentioned a few moments ago. Is the hon. member going to group that particular individual in with implications and suggestions of what amounts to banditry involved in the contributions? As I say, abuses have unquestionably taken place but there are surely distinctions to be made. I could go on for a considerable time to discuss other persons, honestly motivated and with the highest ideals who should not be included in the company at which the hon. member was sneering.
