were all right, I looked out for the second fioness. She was standing up within fifteen paces, looking at what was going on around her. I took my gun and levelled it at her. She squasted down. When I fired she staggered, roaring, and disappeared in a field of maize on the edge of the road. On approaching, I found by her moaning that she was still alive, and did not venture at night into the thick plantation which sheltered her. As soon as it was day I went to the spot where she had fallen, and all I found were blood-marks showing her track in the direction of the wood. After sending the dead liness to the neighboring garrison, who celes brated its arrival by a banquit, I returned to my post of the previous night. A little after sunset, the lion roared for the first time, but instead of quitting his lair, he remained there all night roaring as if he were mad. Convinced that the woonded lioness was there, I sent on the morning of the 24th two Arats to explore the cover. They returned without daring to approach it.
