tell what was wrong with it. I detected the disease and told him the animal had tuberculosis. The animal was afterwards killed and the lungs examined, and it was shown that I was right. A thoroughly practical farmer is accustomed to be among cattle all the time, with a few lessons, can be made quite capable of administering the test. Not only that, but the farmers would be capable of attending to the animals in a manner which a veterinary surgeon, in many cases, cannot equal. I have nothing to say against veterinary surgeons; they are necessary, and we have many that are a credit to their profession; but we have many of such a character that I would rather put an animal of mine under the charge of a thoroughly experienced farmer who had been brought up among animals and had paid attention to their diseases, than that of many veterinarians. I have seen the tuberculin test applied by a veterinarian, and also by a farmer's son, and the veterinarian admitted that the farmer's son, both in making the preliminary test of the temperature of the animal and in ejecting tuberculin, was as competent as any veterinarian could be. When we have so many large and valuable herds, it has become almost necessary that a young farmer should have a fair amount of veterinary education; and it is not necessary that he should spend three or four years at the profession in order to make the tuberculin test efficiently. A great deal has been said about cows, but I have not heard anything said about the male animals. Yet I know of one locality in which at one time there was no tuberculosis, and into which a male animal was brought, and that locality in a few years was overrun with tuberculosis. I should like to ask my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Roddick), and also my hon. friend from Macdonald their opinion on this question. They tell us that a calf from a cow that is affected can be raised to be a sound and healthy animal. I believe, from what I have read and seen, that such is the case. But I would ask these hon. gentleman if there is no danger of using a tuberculosis male, even if the disease is in its incipient stages? This is a question of great importance indeed to our farmers and one in which our farmers generally take a deep interest. I contend that the farmers should keep their buildings in a proper condition—that is the first thing to be done. I think it is beyond controversy also that herds that are kept in the house all the time, are more liable to the disease than others. There is little tuberculosis in the country where the herds are let out in the fields in summer and are properly cared for in winter.

Mr. W. C. EDWARDS (Russell). I am glad that this subject has been introduced by my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Roddick). It is a subject of very great importance indeed to Canada. While I admit that it is a subject that should be discussed by the medical men in the House, at the same time, being a practical farmer, like my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan), I would like to say a few words upon it. I have said that this is an important question to Canada. It is important not only because of its relation to the health of and well-being of the people, but it is of very great importance, in a commercial sense. It is so for the reason that in the breeding of animals, northern countries like Canada must always supply the foundation for the herds of more southern countries. Canada enjoys a very enviable position in this respect. Except Great Britain, perhaps, there is no country in the world that is more capable of raising good animals of every kind than Canada. It is not often that I disagree with my hon. friend from Huron, but in this instance, I am sorry to say, I must disagree with him. I do not at all approve of the tuberculin—and this is the only branch of the subject I desire, for a few moments, to discuss—being placed in the hands of our farmers generally or in the hands of any other class of people than the professional class—doctors and veterinary surgeons. And I will give my reasons. I will admit at once that, as my hon. friend (Mr. McMillan) has said, it is quite possible for a young man to go to such a college as the Ontario Agricultural College, and there acquire a perfectly good education for the applying of the tuberculin test. But, if you could confine it to these men who do go to the agricultural colleges and acquire the qualification, it might be reasonably safe. But can you limit it to this class? And if not, if you place it in the hands of the farmers of Canada generally, what is the result? We have, unfortunately, dishonest as well as honest farmers.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. EDWARDS. Well, we have not a large percentage of them, perhaps not as large a percentage as among the professional classes. Still, we have a few of them; and, this being so, I wish to show how disastrous results might follow the placing of tuberculin in the hands of the farmers generally. As my hon. friend (Mr. McMillan) has very properly said, it is certainly a slur upon a herd when it is known that tuberculosis exists in that herd. And, if tuberculosis exists, the farmer will try to conceal it, if he is dishonest. And if it be true, as has been stated—quite correctly, I believe—by my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) that if the tuberculin is applied for a few times in too rapid succession, it ceases to react. What difficulty is there, then, in the way of the dishonest farmer so treating an animal that it may be sold and pass the test successfully, yet be actually tuberculous? If I had not heard of cases of this kind, I should not be so much impressed with the possibility of such cases as I am now giving. But I have heard of animals being disposed of having passed the test perfectly well, and in a short time all slaughtered because of their being full of tuberculosis. Although at first they do not respond to the test, only a short time afterwards external appearances prove conclusively that the animals were full of tuberculosis. There is great danger in this respect, and I think it is highly desirable that the Dominion Government should take the most stringent steps, and so far as I am aware they are acting in this matter with all possible vigour. But if any further steps can be taken, it is highly desirable in the interest of Canada that they should be taken. I simply desire to express the opinion that it should be against the law for any individual whatever to apply the tuberculin test except properly qualified doctors and veterinary surgeons.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.) I desire to say a word upon a phase of the question that has not yet been touched. It sometimes happens that there is less tuberculosis in one province than in another. In Prince Edward Island, for instance, we are almost entirely free from it. By the examinations that have been recently made, only a small percentage of the cases examined have been found to be affected. Under these circumstances, should there not be some law that will enable one province to protect itself against another? I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the fact that in Prince Edward Island, during the past year, the local legislature has placed upon the statute-book a law providing that no cattle shall be imported into that province from the rest of the Dominion unless they have first been submitted to the tuberculin test. Now, is that desirable Act constitutional? I have some doubt. I think it is a matter of trade and commerce, which comes within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament. If so, then there are some phases of this question over which the federal legislature has absolute control. To enable one province to guard its cattle against the tuberculosis that may prevail in other provinces the Federal Parliament might pass a general Act applicable to the whole Dominion—but only to be brought into effect in any province by a resolution of a local legislature or by a provincial Order in Council. Such a statute would be somewhat on the principle of the Scott Act and would meet such a condition of things as is required to be safeguarded in Prince Edward Island. In regard to the broad question of the constitutionality of a Dominion measure, dealing with tuberculosis, it has been contended by the hon. member for East Grey and by the leader of the Opposition that we have no power in this Parliament to legislate in this direction. I have been led to a different conclusion. I think this Parliament has the power and can assume and draw jurisdiction to itself. For instance, the Scott Act prohibited the sale of liquor throughout Canada. The question afterward came before the courts for adjudication as to what power the Parliament of Canada had to deal with that question. As it was a matter affecting health, it was contended that it belonged exclusively to the jurisdiction of the local legislatures. But the highest authority in the realm decided that the prohibition of the sale of liquor came within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament. It was a national matter affecting the whole Dominion. By the Act itself this Parliament declared that it was a national matter, and in consequence of its being so, and being so declared, the court held that it properly came under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament. The constitution declares that this Parliament has power over matters affecting the welfare of the Dominion and generally can pass laws for the order and good government of Canada. Now, if any question affects the whole Dominion of Canada in a most vital degree, this comes within that category. I think, therefore, that the Dominion Parliament would have the same right to deal with this general question of tuberculosis, both as respects cattle and as respects humanity, as it has to deal with the sale of liquor under the Scott Act. Generally speaking, also, it is the right of the Dominion Parliament to declare what subjects are of such a national character as that this Parliament can legislate upon them. For instance, the Dominion Government may declare that a local railway is a road of national importance, and so may assume jurisdiction over it. In like manner the Dominion Parliament in many cases not defined by the British North America Act has the right to assume and exercise jurisdiction over and to pass laws concerning any matter of a national character. Therefore, there is no need in this case of asking for an amendment to the constitution, as we have already ample powers to deal with this important subject. My chief object, however, in speaking was to draw the attention of the Government to the circumstances that exist in Prince Edward Island, and to the necessity of providing some means by which one province can safeguard itself as against other provinces, as well as against the outside world.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I feel that the action of the hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal (Mr. Roddick), in bringing this matter before the House of Commons, is more than justified by the importance of the question. I will also take the opportunity of complimenting the hon. gentleman, not only on the fact that he has brought this question before the House, but on the clear and concise manner in which he has laid the principal points before us. I need not say that any words upon a medical subject that come from the lips of that hon. gentleman must be received with attention and respect. His position in the profession, and the way in which he has always dealt with matters of professional interest, are such that his opinion must command respect. I am able to endorse everything that he has said with regard to the necessity of dealing with this disease of tuberculosis. I am not a professional man myself, but it has been my duty, since taking charge of the Department of Agriculture, to study somewhat matters concerning public health and quarantine; and perhaps the fact that I am the son of a physician and was brought up in the atmosphere of medical discussion, may have had something to do in exciting my interest in these matters. I have given considerable time to the study of this matter of tuberculosis since I have been in charge of the department. My hon. friend from Montreal has read to us the resolutions of the Montreal Medical and Chirurgical Society upon this question. Those resolutions ask us as the Parliament of the Dominion to take up this question and deal with it on national lines. I am not going to enter into a discussion of the constitutional question alluded to by the hon. leader of the Opposition as to the rights that this Parliament may have in dealing with this matter. There is evidently some little difference of opinion, although I must say, that my own opinion has always coincided with that of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and the position which he stated has been the generally accepted one in Canada for long years that questions affecting public health, the management of restrictions and especially municipal regulations, in regard to public health, are essentially within the sphere of the provincial legislatures. This being the case it is questionable how far this Parliament might go, but there are some matters of purely municipal regulation, alluded to in these resolutions, which it would be unwise and perhaps unconstitutional to try to meddle with. There are perhaps other points that we, in this Parliament, might deal with, and it is quite possible that, in the North-west Territories, those parts of the country which are practically under the administration of the Federal Parliament, or of a council delegated with powers from this Parliament, we might deal with this matter. I am only giving that as my opinion, but in the North-west Territories, that sparsely-settled portion of our country in which the climate seems to be specially hostile to the introduction of tuberculosis, and where the germs of the disease seem to have difficulty in spreading, or even in existing, is perhaps the place where it is the least necessary to deal with tuberculosis in Canada. Still, no doubt, wherever people are there will be tuberculosis. I take so much interest in this question, and believe it of such importance to the people of this country that, a little while ago, I took the responsibility of recommending to Council the appointment of a delegate from Canada to the congress which has just taken place in Berlin to discuss this question. Dr. Farrel, of Halifax, one of the best known physicians in Canada, a gentleman who occupied a high position in the medical associations of Canada, and a gentleman whose name is synonymous with questions of public health, in the province in which he lives, was appointed to go there, and I expect that in a short time we will have an interesting report from him of the proceedings of the congress, by a perusal of which we will be able to find out a great deal about the disease and the modern methods of its treatment. In the course of the last few years an immense stride has been made in our knowledge of this disease, and of the methods of treating it. As the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) stated a little while ago, the intimate connection between the disease in the animal, especially in horned cattle and the disease in the human being has been abundantly proved and is now being thoroughly discussed and ventilated. I am not going into the question of the disease as affecting the human race; and further, I would prefer to leave that in the hands of the medical profession, except to say that having lately appointed Dr. Montzambert, Superintendent General of Public Health for the Dominion, his duties being to deal with the quarantine examination of people coming into the country for the purpose of preventing the introduction of disease, that gentleman is also devoting considerable attention to the study of tuberculosis, and perhaps, in the course of time, public opinion will reach the point where an effective examination for tuberculosis of people entering the country may be made. The subject is in too hazy a condition to make any definite statement in regard to it, or to say that that time is within measurable distance, but that question has been attracting the attention of physicians in different parts of the world and also of our own quarantine officers. As regards cattle, we have in this Parliament dealt with the contagious diseases of animals, and I believe we rightly did so when Parliament undertook that duty. The result is that to-day contagious diseases of animals and tuberculosis come properly within the sphere of the Department of Agriculture for the Dominion, and ever since I have been in charge of that department it has been my duty to try and see in what way this disease could be minimized amongst our animals. The hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal (Mr. Roddick), and others who have spoken, have alluded to what has been done, but perhaps it may not be out of place for me to say a little about what has been done. There had been nothing done in regard to this disease definitely before I came into office myself. But about two years ago, I asked Parliament to give a grant for the purpose of dealing with tuberculosis. In the explanation which I gave, when that grant was voted, I said that what I believed was necessary first to spread information in regard to this disease amongst the owners of cattle, to try and encourage the testing of animals with the tuberculin test, wherever possible, so that our Animal Contagious Disease Act might be applied to animals, where animals were found to be affected with this disease. That programme has been carried out. Last year again a sum of money was placed at my disposal for this purpose. That has been just about expended, in the course of the current year, and I am proposing to ask Parliament to give me another sum of money to continue the same propaganda and the same campaign. When this matter first came up to be discussed in Parliament, and before that, amongst the farmers of the country, there was quite a difference of opinion as to how far it would be possible to go in dealing with this disease. Some urged that we should make testing compulsory and make slaughter immediately compulsory. Other countries had tried this and had failed. A number of states in the American Union had tried to make testing compulsory; they had voted large sums of money for the purpose of carrying out this compulsory test and for paying compensation to farmers whose cattle had been slaughtered for the public safety. The State of Massachusetts was obliged to abandon this course; Vermont was obliged to largely abandon it and to change its programme. In England, and in the old countries generally, the question was thoroughly discussed, but public opinion would never allow the authorities of those countries to undertake compulsory testing or slaughter. Mr. Bang, in Denmark, and M. Nocard, in France, who are amongst the first scientists, went into the study of this question most thoroughly. They discovered what they believe to be a system which will entirely obviate the necessity of slaughtering the animals. This system is generally spoken of as the Bang system. It is the one which has been somewhat described by the hon. member for Macdonald, and I need not go into it except to say that the diseased animals are kept isolated and the products of these animals are sterilized so as to be innocuous and harmless. The animals are allowed to reproduce and to produce their milk if they are cows. This system has been successfully carried out by Mr. Bang in Denmark, and to-day, there is a large number of animals in Denmark, Germany and France which are producing milk for human food and whose flesh is used for human food which are known to be tuberculous, but the work is carried on under such restrictions and safeguards that the scientists of these countries say that it is done with perfect safety as regards the public health. Under these circumstances, and in view of the public opinion in this country, so evidently expressed by the people generally, and the farmers in their great convention of two years ago, I felt that it would be quite impossible for us to undertake anything in the nature of compulsory testing or compulsory slaughter. Therefore, I did not go so far. But I offered, on behalf of the Department of Agriculture, that any one who would make an application on a properly drawn up form of the department, would have his animals tested free of charge. This was done for the purpose of encouraging the people to test.

Mr. SPROULE. I have never yet been able to discover whether it was possible to get the animals tested in different localities. I understood they could be tested free of charge, if they were here.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Oh, no; they will be tested in any place in the country, where the owner asks that the Government shall test his animals, submitting himself to certain conditions and safeguards provided by the department. When that is done, the veterinary appointed by the department is sent to make the test.

Mr. SPROULE. I was not aware of that.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That has been published in all the agricultural papers in the country; it has been published in the press generally, and it has been announced over and over again at agricultural meetings, and fully ventilated before the farmers and stock-owners.

Mr. WALLACE. Did you put it in the Report of the Department of Agriculture?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There is the full report there, with a statement of the tests and everything else.

Mr. WALLACE. Did you put in the statement which you have just mentioned?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The description of the work that is being carried on is in the report of the department, as well as the bulletins and proclamations that were issued in regard to it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is it in the report, that it was done without charge?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Without charge to any owner of animals who sends the application in the proper form.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is that embodied in the report?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly. The conditions imposed are: First, that every animal on the farm should be tested. I did not consider it wise that a man should be allowed to pick out a few animals, and have them tested, and have them kept along with other animals which had not been tested, and might be diseased.

Mr. SPROULE. Does that mean every animal on the farm?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, only horned cattle; I accept the hon. gentleman's correction. The other condition is, that no compensation should be asked for, if the animals are slaughtered. They are not ordered to be slaughtered by the department. They are slaughtered entirely at the discretion of the owner; but, if they are found to be diseased, they must be isolated and quarantined, so that they may not spread the disease to other animals.

A large number of tests have been made all through the country. I have in my hand a statement by provinces of the tests made, but, as I have read it to the House already, I will only say that, in the course of the last two years, nearly 16,000 tests have been made by the appointees of the department, and, of these 16,000 animals, 1,017 have been found diseased, or just about 6½ per cent of those which have been tested. I consider this a most favourable showing as to the health of the herds of Canada, and I so consider it for two reasons. In the first place, it is a much lower percentage than has been commonly talked of by persons in discussing this matter. Wild statements were made, that all the way from 20 per cent up to 50 per cent of the horned cattle of Canada were diseased. In other countries estimates have been made of the number of diseased animals, and, though I have not in my memory what these were, they have ranged all the way from 10 per cent to as high as 30 and 35 per cent. Canada has been found, in so far as we have tested the animals, only to have 6½ per cent of her cattle diseased.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister said that out of 16,000 tested, about 1,000 were diseased. That would be one out of sixteen, and would be more than 6½ per cent.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) would take a pencil and figure it, he would find it is not. This is a most satisfactory showing for another reason, because, as a general rule, the herds which have been tested in this way have been herds which were suspected. The ordinary farmer who does not suspect anything about his cattle, does not ask to have them tested as a rule, but in this case a large number of them have been dairy herds in the neighbourhood of large cities, and belonging to people who are forced to have them tested by municipal by-laws. I may say that out of this 16,000 cases, very much the largest proportion of animals which have been found diseased, have been found in the byres of city milkmen who have their cattle in the close neighbourhood of cities, and supply these cities with milk. The conditions of such barns seem to be more favourable to the spread of the disease, and I may say that, judging from the investigations which have been held by our veterinary surgeons throughout the country, if an animal in a certain stage of the disease be introduced into a perfectly healthy barn-full of dairy cows—under the ordinary conditions of winter-keeping of stock in the neighbourhood of cities—it is almost sure that a large proportion of the rest of that herd will become diseased in a short time. I think there is no doubt whatever of the absolute accuracy of the statement which I have just made and I make it with emphasis, because I think it is right and necessary that the people of this country should thoroughly understand this condition of affairs and try to prevent it.

I am not going to continue now at any great length, but one or two statements have been made on the floor of this House which I would like to allude to. In the first place, I am under an obligation to my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) for the very clear way in which he put this whole question, as connected with cattle, before the House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Rutherford) is himself a veterinarian of high standing. He is a gentleman whom I know, from many and many a conversation with him, has very carefully studied and probed this whole question, and I do not think that any more valuable contribution could have been made to the debate this afternoon than that which he presented to the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The question is one of the utmost importance to our stock-holders in Canada. As my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards) said: Canada is specially well adapted to the growing of good, healthy live stock. We have the reputation to-day for the production of such healthy stock, and, with the exception of the mother country, I believe there is no place in the world where live stock of a higher or healthier class can be obtained than in Canada. I am glad to know that the stock-owners of Canada are to-day sending out of the country large numbers of animals, getting good prices for them, and acquiring a great reputation for the production of the best live stock possible. This being the case, it is of the utmost importance that the health of our herds shall be maintained, and it is of the utmost importance that the people who are managing our live stock should thoroughly understand this question.

In conjunction with the testing of animals in the country, my department has been carrying on a propaganda of information. Wherever we have been able to reach the farmers at public meetings, I have tried to secure the attendance of veterinary surgeons or others who are well acquainted with this disease, to give public addresses at institute meetings and gatherings of farmers throughout the country. I have had a number of bulletins printed and distributed largely, explaining this disease, the best methods to deal with it, and the best methods to prevent its spread. I believe that, in the course of the last year, there has been a great deal of information supplied to the stock-owners of Canada, which shall be of the utmost value to them in combatting this disease, and, consequently, of the utmost value to the people of the country at large. In these two ways, the testing of animals at the public expense, and the spread of information in regard to the disease, I have been working; and, until public opinion in regard to this matter is advanced to a more determinate point, I am satisfied that we cannot do any more than this in the way of the prevention of disease in the country.

I want to say a word or two in regard to the disease itself. My hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) explained that the calves born of diseased cows are not necessarily diseased. As a matter of fact, it has been found, on careful investigation of a very large number of cases, that it is almost unheard-of that a calf should be born affected with tuberculosis. If the calf is taken away from its mother before it had an opportunity to suckle the mother, and before the mother has had an opportunity of licking it, and possibly passing on the disease through the saliva with which her mouth is saturated, the calf will be pretty surely free from the disease. The danger is that in the first milk which the young calf draws from its mother, and in licking by the mother to cleanse the calf, which is the well-known practice of cows, the disease is communicated. But Mr. Bang, by his system in Denmark, has been remarkably successful in raising calves from diseased mothers, which calves have afterwards been perfectly healthy cattle. In addition to this, there is no doubt that thoroughly ventilated and well-aired barns are necessary for the keeping of our cattle. I need not dwell on this. It is a thing which every student of stock-keeping knows perfectly well. But, unfortunately, the practice of the people of our country is not as good as their knowledge. Frequently animals are kept in places which are no doubt saturated with the germs of this disease, and in which any healthy cow is in danger of being attacked by it. My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) has spoken of whitewashing. There is no doubt that the disinfection of stables is an absolute necessity, and any well-regulated stock farm must have its stables thoroughly disinfected by whitewashing or in some other way at least once or twice every year. If this is done, I have no hesitation in saying that the spread of this disease will be enormously decreased.

In addition to the work I have spoken of, we are carrying on some careful experiments in the way of investigations of milk which comes from diseased animals. It will be within the memory of a great many members of the House that about a year and a half ago a number of tuberculous cows were found on the Experimental Farm. In clearing the farm of these diseased animals, I directed that some of them should be kept, and that specimens of their milk should be taken every day and carefully inspected in a bacteriological laboratory to see how many germs it contained. This work has reached a certain stage, but not by any means a conclusive stage, and therefore I do not wish to make any statement founded upon it. But the experiment is being continued, and I will only say one word in regard to it. An hon. gentleman said a little while ago that there were a large number of cows affected in the udder. It is well known that animals affected in the udder are much more likely to communicate disease through their milk than animals otherwise affected by the disease. I and my officers have been searching in Canada for the last year to find cows whose udders are affected, and up to the present moment we have not succeeded in getting an animal to put into our experimental work whose udder is definitely affected with tuberculosis. I say this because I do not wish it to go abroad that it is a common thing in this country for the udders of cows to be affected with tuberculosis. I believe, on the contrary, it is a very uncommon thing indeed. There is a general opinion amongst medical men and veterinary surgeons that it is only when the udder is diseased that the milk is dangerous. I am not prepared to endorse that opinion; I do not know enough about it to say; but if that is the case, there is no doubt that the milk of cattle in this country is almost entirely safe. Still, there is a danger, and those best acquainted with the disease say that as long as an animal is diseased, the only safe way is either not to use its milk or to thoroughly sterilize it before it is used. I would recommend, as a matter of caution and safety, that the milk of any animal which has been tested and found to be tuberculous, should be carefully sterilized before it is used for any purpose whatever, whether as food for infants, for human beings or for other animals; and especially I would recommend that no milk from tuberculous cows should be fed to pigs or calves that has not been thoroughly sterilized. I regret to say that in the experience of veterinary surgeons and farmers, there is a considerable spread of tuberculosis amongst swine in the country, in consequence of the fact that these are fed principally upon milk which comes probably from tuberculous cattle. We have not made tests of swine, and I do not suppose that the real amount of the disease is very great. At the same time, the only safe way, where it is known that a cow is affected with the disease, is to have the milk thoroughly sterilized before it is fed to the swine or any other animals, or to human beings.

I want to refer to one or two things which were mentioned by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). I must say that I am rather surprised that the hon. gentleman, a member of the House of Commons who takes a special interest in agricultural matters, has evidently not followed what has been going on in regard to tuberculosis and our quarantine arrangements. The hon. gentleman said that one of the most important things we could do would be to see that no animals were imported into the country without being tested for tuberculosis. The hon. gentleman is not aware that for two years past, since I made the arrangement with the United States, every horned animal that comes into Canada from abroad, whether for breeding purposes or for dairy purpose, is tested for tuberculosis before it is allowed to enter the country. I am glad to find that the department has anticipated the hon. gentleman's recommendation by about two years.

Mr. SPROULE. I made the recommendation about ten or twelve years ago.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman, then, ought to have appreciated the fact that it was done, and ought to have congratulated us on having followed his advice. Further, the hon. gentleman said that the removal of the quarantine between us and the United States had created a danger with reference to tuberculosis. Before that was done, there was no necessity for animals coming from the United States or elsewhere to be tested for tuberculosis, although the animals that came in had to remain ninety days in quarantine.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not refer to tuberculosis alone, but to any other disease to which animals are subject.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is tuberculosis that we are talking about. But I may say that all animals coming from the United States have not only to be tested for tuberculosis, but have to be accompanied by a certificate that they are free from disease. If they are not accompanied by this certificate, they are held at the frontier to be tested for tuberculosis before they are allowed to enter the country. So that the hon. gentleman will see that we are taking this precaution very effectually. The hon. gentleman made another remark which I regretted very much to hear. Referring to the Doukbohors, he said that these people were rotten with tuberculosis, and were being imported in such large numbers that they were a menace to the health of the people of this country.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman permit me? The quarantine regulations imposing that restriction, I believe, only apply to thoroughbred cattle which are imported for improving the stock.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman again shows his ignorance, for it applies to all cattle imported for breeding or dairy purposes, as well as to cattle imported for the improvement of stock.

Mr. SPROULE. It may be that my ignorance is dense; but I can tell the hon. gentleman that if that is the regulation, there are hundreds of cattle crossing the lines without any such test and without any certificate. They are going out of our country in hundreds without the certificate ever being seen.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman is talking now about cattle going from here to the United States.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. Minister to say both ways.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. When the animals are going into the United States for butchering purposes alone, the United States authorities allow them in without a certificate. As a matter of fact, no animals come into this country from the United States for butchering purposes, but all animals that come in for breeding purposes—not only thoroughbreds, but any animal—are not allowed in except when accompanied by a certificate of test. That regulation has been published two years all through the country, and is thoroughly well known to the farmers and stock-raisers of this country and the United States.

I am now coming back to the question of the Doukhobors, to which I was about to address myself when interrupted by the hon. gentleman. He said that they were rotten with tuberculosis, and were a menace to the health of our people. I do not know on what he has based his statement, and if he had not pretty good proof he ought not to have made any such statement on the floor of this House.

Mr. SPROULE. I based it on an article in one of our medical monthlies with regard to the prevalence of this disease in Russia, and the percentage of people who died from consumption in that country.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. What is the percentage?

Mr. SPROULE. About one in every five hundred.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman says he based that statement on the fact that he has read in a certain paper that the Doukhobors were largely infected with tuberculosis, and that in the country from which they came, the people die from that disease at the rate of one in every five hundred per year. If the hon. gentleman will figure out a little, he will find that one in five hundred means two-tenths of one per cent, and he will find that the average death rate the world over from the disease is about ten per cent of the mortality from all the diseases that occur. Therefore, instead of saying that the Doukhobors are rotten with tuberculosis, the percentage he gave shows that they are the cleanest and healthiest people on the face of the earth.

Mr. SPROULE. My statement is entirely misleading. There is a number of countries in which tuberculosis is very scarce, and if you take these countries and add their population to the population of those where the death rate is high from tuberculosis, you bring the rate to what the hon. gentleman has said it is. But that is no index whether the percentage is high or low in one country as compared with another.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, who is a practitioner, I believe, in good standing, what is the death rate from tuberculosis in this country? If he cannot tell us, there are other physicians who should know. No doubt the hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal, will be able to tell him.

Mr. RODDICK. Our statistics are so inaccurate that it is really impossible to get the figure, but it is very much lower than the ten per cent you mention.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Is it as low as two-tenths of one per cent?

Mr. RODDICK. No, two or three per cent, I think. May I say that in referring to that question, I was simply cautioning the hon. member with reference to Russia and Austria, which are the two countries in which the highest percentage is obtained in European countries, and I simply referred to the fact that recently from both these countries immigrants have been brought to Canada. But I am not aware that the Doukhobors are infected to the extent my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) says they are. I do not think they are, but that they are infected to a considerable extent is likely, from the fact that the disease is so prevalent in these two countries from which they come.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I was not taking any exception to what the hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal, said with regard to immigration from these countries.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But the hon. gentleman was making a statement directly opposite to what the hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal, said.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman is entirely misrepresenting me. I was simply referring to the statement of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that the Doukhobors were rotten with tuberculosis.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And the hon. Minister met that statement by saying that these people came from a country less affected by tuberculosis than any country he was aware of, and he called on the hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal, who tells him the very reverse is the case.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman has again misrepresented me by putting words into my mouth that I did not utter. He evidently did not follow the debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did, very closely.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman knows I said nothing of the kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I know the very reverse. "Hansard" will show which is right.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman must accept my statement. I said nothing of the kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, the hon. gentleman must accept mine.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. Minister should not misrepresent me; I did not say the Doukhobors were rotten with the disease.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, you did.

Mr. SPROULE. I said that as the disease was so prevalent in the country from which they came, I was justified in coming to the conclusion that a very large percentage of them would be affected by it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If the hon. gentleman takes back his statement that they were rotten with tuberculosis, I am very glad indeed. My ears told me the contrary, and so did the ears of a number of gentlemen who are near me, but I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman withdraws his statement.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not withdraw a word of what I said. What I said was correct, and I am standing by it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Very well. The hon. gentleman will not deny that he said that of these Doukhobors at home, one in five hundred died per annum of tuberculosis. I replied that that statement shows they are of the healthiest of peoples, as regards tuberculosis, in the world. I am not questioning the statement of the hon. member for St. Antoine, Mon-treau, or giving an expression of opinion on my own part.

Mr. FOSTER. This is obstruction. Let us go on with our work.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Does the hon. gentleman wish to interrupt?

Mr. FOSTER. I only made a remark, and I humbly beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Granted. The hon. gentleman is so fond of interrupting and interjecting remarks, that I rather expected an interruption.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend at this juncture is taking a tone that is very supercilious and very offensive to members on this side—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) understands very well what I mean.

Mr. FOSTER—and which does not sit well on him at all.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is a matter for my opinion and not the opinion of the hon. member for York.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a matter for the House to judge.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am perfectly prepared to abide by its decision. I shall not take lessons in politeness from the hon. member for York, or anybody else he chooses to indicate.

Mr. FOSTER. Necessity sometimes knows no law.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The point I wish to emphasize is that the Doukhobors are not a people who are rotten with tuberculosis, and their immigration into this country is in no sense a menace to the health of our people. I can quote the report of my own quarantine officer, Dr. Montizambert, who has had more opportunity of judging the Doukhobors than anybody else probably in Canada. He was present at Halifax, where some 2,000 of them were detained three weeks in quarantine in consequence of the discovery of a case of small-pox among them, and he was also present in Grosse Isle, where 2,700 of them were detained three weeks, in consequence of another case of small-pox being discovered on board, and he found that he had never come into contact with a cleaner or healthier lot of immigrants in the whole thirty-three years of his experience as chief quarantine officer of the Dominion than these Doukhobors in both lots. That being the case, I think we can fairly say that the statement that they are rotten or very largely infected with the disease, is not well founded.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. Minister is attributing to me a statement which I emphatically deny having made use of.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, you did.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) ought to know more about the rules of the House than to insist on saying that I did.

Mr. SPEAKER. The debate is assuming a very irregular character. I suppose the hon. member who has the floor will allow interruption for questions or explanations, as we go along; but cross-firing across the House, irrespective of that, should not go on.

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask your ruling as to whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) is not in duty bound to accept the statement I make, that I did not say what he attributes to me.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I certainly accept the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), that he did not say the Doukhobors were rotten with tuberculosis. I will say that he said they were very largely affected by that disease.

Mr. SPROULE. No, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER. It is better to allow the hon. gentleman to finish.

Mr. SPROULE. What I said was, that the death rate from consumption, in the country from which they come, was very high; and we must naturally come to the conclusion that a large percentage of these people would be.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Would be what?

Mr. SPROULE. It would naturally be expected that a large percentage of them would be affected.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Would be affected with what—tuberculosis?

Mr. SPROULE. If the death rate in any country from any particular disease is very high, and if that disease is of a lingering character before it causes death, then, taking a hundred, or a thousand, or ten thousand, of the people of that country, the percentage of cases of the disease among them is likely to be high.

Mr. McMULLEN. I heard distinctly the hon. gentleman—

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not allowable for the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) to contradict the statement made by the hon. member (Mr. Sproule). The statement must be accepted, and I have no doubt that it will be.

Mr. FISHER.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I accept the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Sproule's) statement. I think the statement of Dr. Montizambert on this question, and the facts which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) stated, as to the percentage of disease in the country, show that these people are not a menace to the health of the people of Canada.

There was one other matter upon which I wish to say a word, and that was the matter brought up by the hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell). The province of Prince Edward Island is freer, as far as our tests show, from the disease of tuberculosis amongst animals than any other province in the Dominion. We have had some 425 tests made in the province of Prince Edward Island, and only 16 cases of disease were found, showing an average of less than 4 per cent. The hon. gentleman says that the local legislature of Prince Edward Island has passed an Act by which the importation of cattle into the Island from any part of the world, the rest of Canada included, is forbidden, unless accompanied with a certificate of the tuberculin test. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) seems to think that this is unconstitutional. I am not prepared to give him an opinion on the constitutional question; but I would remind him, the legislature of Manitoba, some time ago, passed an Act forbidding the importation of horses from the North-west Territories, unless accompanied with a certificate of having been tested for glanders, or unless an examination and test for glanders were made at the frontier of the province, as the animal came in.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). May I ask, is that Act in force yet?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. It was disallowed.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It was in force for a little while. My own opinion is that, while perhaps it may be, that Prince Edward cannot forbid the entry of the animals, it can force the person importing them to subject them to a test in that province, and not allow them to be sent into other parts of the province until they have been so tested—this, a matter of municipal regulation. There is no question that, so far as subjecting cows which are supplying milk to cities and towns to an examination, or the inspection of meat sold in those cities is concerned, the provincial authorities and the local health board have absolute control—this, as a matter of municipal regulation which they choose to impose. And it seems to me—not pretending, of course, to speak as a constitutional authority—that the Island could perfectly well impose such a regulation as would require any animal landed within its borders, when once landed, to be so tested. This, of course, is a matter especially of municipal regulation. The province of Ontario, I might say, has for some time had on its statute-books a law which empowers the municipalities to compel a test of cows which supply milk to be sold within the municipality. This law has been, to a certain extent, enforced in the province of Ontario.

Quite recently, the city of Ottawa and a number of other towns and cities in Ontario have passed regulations by which all vendors of milk within their bounds were obliged to see to it that the cows which produced the milk had been tested for tuberculosis. This kind of work is rapidly and effectively spreading information among the people, information which is of the greatest value, and which will lead to the improvement of the laws in regard to this question, and, still more, to the improvement of the methods of keeping animals in this country. I congratulate Canada upon the fact that this disease is likely before long to come under practical control. I would only again, before sitting down, thank the hon. member for St. Antoine, Montreal (Mr. Roddick) for having brought this matter up, thus affording an opportunity for the ventilation of the subject on the floor of Parliament.

Mr. ERB. I rise to ask the question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher): Did I understand him to say that there was no country in the world where cattle were so free from tuberculosis as Great Britain?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I said I believed that in no country in the world were the cattle so free from tuberculosis as in Canada. But I have not all the statistics in regard to other countries, though I have them in regard to Canada; so, I only give that as an opinion, and not as a statement of fact.

Mr. ERB. I understood the hon. Minister to say that, next to Great Britain, Canada was freer from tuberculosis than any other country.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No; I said that, next to Great Britain, Canada had probably the finest stock in the world, and was sending out the best animals.

Mr. ERB. It is evident that I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. I could not reconcile the statement, as I understood it, with a statement that I find in the Report of the Minister of Agriculture for 1896, made, I believe, by the Dominion Veterinary Inspector:

To such an extent does it exist—

That is, tuberculosis.

—in Great Britain that it is stated on good authority that nearly 50 per cent of the herds are affected.

Mr. CLANCY. There seems to be a consensus of opinion in favour of guarding against the spread of tuberculosis in Canada. That has been so thoroughly discussed that it would be a waste of time now to continue the discussion upon that line. But there seems to be another side of the question, to which I took the liberty of calling the attention of the Minister of Agriculture a short time ago, and that is in reference to taking some decided steps to prevent it. I was told, on that occasion, that it was not the policy of the Government of Canada to undertake more than to quarantine diseased animals and to leave them to be slaughtered entirely at the will of the owner. It does seem to me that this is a faint-hearted and limping policy. I have no hesitation in saying that if the hon. Minister (Mr. Fisher) has been overawed by public opinion, he has been overawed in an entirely wrong direction. I would like to ask any sensible man, in this House or out of it, how we can stop the progress of disease of that kind, when we permit it to exist and nurse it in every locality in Canada. You permit men to keep animals in a quarantine which is one only in name and not in fact, and these animals are entrusted entirely to the owner, who believes that there is some value attached to them so long as they are kept alive, and every member of his family, every person who comes in contact with those animals, is in danger. Yet the hon. gentleman says that he has for the first time inaugurated a new policy, and he proposes now by his policy of inaction to leave alone a disease that threatens both the life and property of the people of this country. There is no greater need in Canada than the need of stamping out this disease, if for no other reason than to keep Canadian herds pure. But the hon. gentleman ignores that. He made a rather humiliating admission an evening or two ago in the House, when he said that he was not responsible for the old law. My answer to the hon. gentleman is that it is an old error, and the sooner we get rid of it the better. The only plan it seems to me for the people is not to pursue a faint-hearted policy, nor a parsimonious policy. Let us acknowledge the fact, the great deterrent to action is the cost, the additional taxation. And yet the hon. gentleman has before him the experience of European countries. A little more than a year ago the British House of Commons appointed a royal commission for the purpose of investigating this question of tuberculosis, and their recommendation was upon the line of compensation for slaughtered animals. It may be said that that policy will become abused in this country, that cattle will be slaughtered in great numbers, and that it will entail a great tax upon the people. That may be partly true, but it is no reason for the Government to stand by and make a mocking pretense of doing something to minimize the disease, when their very system itself is hatching the disease in every quarter of Canada. Just so long as the owners of cattle are permitted to keep them in a half dying condition until they drop off, so long will the disease be promoted rather than minimized. I had hoped something better from the hon. gentleman in dealing with a more vigorous hand, and using more effectively the money we have granted him. I am not complaining of the way he has used it, but I do complain that the hon. gentleman refuses to deal vigorously with this greatest evil that now threatens our country.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ROLLING STOCK.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to call the attention of the Government to a statement that is made by a "Star" correspondent from Moncton, N.B., which I will read :

It is reported in railway circles here that the Intercolonial is contemplating large additions to its rolling stock.

Mr. G. R. Joughins, the mechanical superintendent, has been for some weeks engaged in preparation of an estimate of the cost and the extent of the new equipment ; and so far it is stated his estimate is close to $3,000,000. For the purpose of the road Mr. Joughins estimates that 120 more new locomotives may be required. Since his occupancy of his present position Mr. Joughins has added 30 new locomotives to the Intercolonial's rolling stock. It is also stated that the road will add to its present equipment a large number of freight and passenger cars. This phenomenal increase in the expenditure of the mechanical department of the road will, your correspondent learns, be charged to capital account. Under the Conservative regime the acquisition of rolling stock was accounted for in the statement of current revenue and expenditure. But under Mr. Blair's management such charges are made against capital account.

I wanted to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) respecting that, as some people wished me to do so. They are naturally anxious about a rumour that such a large expenditure is to be incurred, and that the vicious principle is then to be resorted to of charging it to capital account. The Minister of Railways is not here ; I suppose, therefore, I shall have to wait until he comes, but meanwhile he will see it in "Hansard."

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. MARTIN. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) when I may expect the two returns ordered by the House some time ago ; one with regard to the dismissal of W. D. McMillan, light-keeper, Prince Edward Island, the other with regard to fines for the infraction of lobster fishery laws in Prince Edward Island.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The return in regard to fines has been brought down. I will see that the other one is brought down at once.

Mr. MARTIN. I would ask the Postmaster General when I may expect two returns ordered ; one with regard to the appointment of a postmaster at New London, P.E.I., and one with regard to the proposed change of mails for Grandview, P.E.I.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). No doubt I will be able to bring those down on Monday.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that a return which he brought down in answer to an order of the House with reference to postal notes, is defective in this important respect, that the order asked for the cost of postal notes exclusive of paper, and that piece of information is not given. I hope my hon. friend will have that brought down, and make the return complete.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I would remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), that the contract, which I think was laid on the Table included in some other returns, requires the contractor to supply notes, including paper, at so much per thousand. There is nothing to show the separate cost of labour and material. Tenders were called for, and the contract provided that the contractors were to supply paper, material and labour at so much per thousand.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. Postmaster General must recollect that the order of the House is one thing and a contract is another thing. The order of the House did not simply ask for the contract, but it asked for other information beside, and one of the items of information that was asked for was the cost of the postal notes outside of the paper. Of course, that is very easily obtained ; the hon. gentleman can easily get the information as his department no doubt has it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is quite impossible to furnish any such information. The House may have ordered it, but supposing that the contract, instead of being to supply postal notes, was to erect a building, and the contract required the contractor to provide labour and material at a certain contract price. Suppose it were a Government building. By what process could you separate the labour from the material, and say so much of the contract price is assignable to the cost of labour and so much for material ? I have no objection to the order going in any form that is desired, nor to comply with it if it is possible, but when I tell the hon. gentleman that there is nothing to show what portion is for labour and what portion is for material, I see no way by which I can give the information to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman can get the information in five minutes if he wishes to.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Militia and Defence—

For pay of troops, erection of barracks, transportation of troops and supplies and necessary expenditures in the Yukon $250,000

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) will explain what was the necessity for sending the militia to the Yukon at all. My information is that all that was needed for the preservation of peace and order could have been done by the Mounted Police, and I believe that Judge Dugas has already written to that effect, either to the hon. Minister of the Interior, or to the right hon. Prime Minister, or, it may have been, to the hon. Minister of Militia. The information I have is that the expenditure connected with sending the militia to the Yukon was perfectly useless.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Mr. Chairman, the question as to whether the militia should be sent to the Yukon, was discussed very fully last year in this House, and in so far as I remember, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), who has just spoken, took no exception whatever to the policy of sending the militia there. The fact is it was accepted in the country at large and in this House as a reasonable and proper thing to do, as a precautionary measure which this Government was bound to take in view of the condition of things which existed at that time. At that time the policy of sending the militia in there was admitted. That was in February or March, 1898. It was believed on all hands that a very large influx of miners from all parts of the world would take place into that country, and as a precautionary measure, in the interest of the maintenance of peace and order, it was considered to be proper and necessary to send this force to the Yukon. The matter was discussed in this House, and by the silence of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) it was considered that he approved of the course which the Government have taken, and it is rather late in the day now to undertake to attack the policy of sending the militia in there. It is well understood that in mining communities, such as that in the Yukon, there is always danger to peace and order; it is well understood further, that the presence of a force amongst that population, such as that which has gone into that country, will serve to preserve order, though these men have not been called upon to actively interfere. That is what has happened in this case. It is altogether unjustifiable for the hon. gentleman or any one else, to attempt to argue that, because that force has not been actually called out to use its firearms, it, therefore, is unnecessary. It is true there has been good order in that country, but there has been good order because the Government had taken the precaution of sending the Mounted Police there and sending the militia there to see that good order was preserved. The majesty of the law has been supported, but I will venture to say that the class of men who have gone into that country and who are there to-day are no better than the average of the class that has formed any mining camp in the world. To hear people talk sometimes you would imagine that they were a class of angels who had gone in to mine gold, but, from what I know, from what I have read and heard, they are precisely the same class of men who form every mining camp in the world, and if it had not been for the precaution which the Government has taken to maintain peace and order there serious difficulties would have occurred. I believe that one of the most important steps which has been taken, and the most justifiable is the sending of this force into that country. I thought the hon. gentleman would ask why it was that this large sum of money was asked in addition to the amount we asked for a year ago, which is practically increased by $250,000 above the amount which we estimated and which we asked for.

Mr. FOSTER. What did you ask for last year?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. We asked for $140,000 for the current year which ends to-day. I will explain briefly to the House how it happens that we are asking for this large sum in addition. First, we estimated that we would be able to use a considerable sum of money out of the ordinary vote for the permanent force. We found afterwards that the Auditor General objected to this, and not a single dollar of the money voted for the current year for the permanent force has been used, either as pay or otherwise, for the force in the Yukon. Next, our estimate of the cost of sending men from Glenora to Fort Selkirk was about $50,000. The fact is that the expense has been nearly $100,000 more, something like $130,000 odd to send men from Glenora to Fort Selkirk. I think I explained to the House last year that an arrangement had been made with the Hudson Bay Company for taking charge of the expedition to Glenora and carrying it through to Lake Teslin. The arrangement made with the Hudson Bay Company was that they should proceed, and that the Government should pay them 20 per cent upon the gross amount of their expenditure, and be credited back with the sale of any of the plant used in transporting these supplies and troops. I have the accounts and shall be very glad to lay them on the Table of the House, or to bring them up before the Public Accounts Committee, or to read from them such extracts as I may be asked for.

Mr. FOSTER. Give in detail the total amount for transportation.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The total for transportation, as nearly as we can get at it now, is about $240,000.

Mr. FOSTER. For how many men?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Two hundred men, and of course that includes their supplies for two full years. The transportation for the men themselves is not much; it is nearly all for supplies.

Mr. FOSTER. What I want is the distinction between the cost of the transportation of the men and the supplies.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I could not at this moment say as to the cost of the transportation of the troops, but it is a small matter compared with the total expenditure. The supplies which we supposed had to be carried in from Vancouver via Glenora to Fort Selkirk was eighty tons. It turned out that the weight by measurement, as shown in the Canada Pacific Navigation Company's account was 177 tons. That is more than double the quantity that we had estimated, and that is the explanation why, instead of $50,000 we have had considerably over $100,000 to pay.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the Minister mean to say that he took in 177 tons of supplies and not eighty tons?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Did you buy 177 tons of supplies?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. We had eighty tons by weight, but we were charged by measurement.

Mr. FOSTER. Did you have a contract?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That is always done in the transportation by steamboats. I think my hon. friend from Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Earle), will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. EARLE. I can correct the Minister in that respect. It is not always done, but when your contracts were being discussed last year I brought the matter up and stated that your contract with the Boston and Alaskan Commercial Company, which called for weight or measurement at the ship's option, would amount to between two and three times the amount as on dead weight which was offered to you by other companies. In this instance, as steamers do, if they are allowed to do it, they took the measurement instead of the weight, which shows that by measurement averages over double the quantity of freight, you would have to pay for if you contracted by weight. All shippers to-day, in shipping to Dawson via the White Pass and Yukon Railway, and all these routes, invariably ship by weight, as they do to all mining districts.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Earle) will agree with me, that in all shipments by steamboats, or in nearly all, the payment for freight is made by measurement, and the Canada Pacific Navigation Company, of which I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Earle) himself is a director, charges us for 177 tons measurement, which equalled about eighty or eighty-five tons by weight. I do not think their charge is excessive, I think the charge a fair one, and the rates we paid were the same rates that we paid to his company.

Mr. WALLACE. How much a ton?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Forty dollars.

Mr. WALLACE. Measurement?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes, weight or measurement, ship's option. That is the usual way.

Mr. EARLE. That is the usual custom, but there is no merchant who is shipping freight to these districts at these high rates would think of shipping by ship's option. It is never done, and all the traders at Glenora and other points contracted for their freight last year by weight. All the steamers, I know many of them at least, and I know some of the traders up there who got their freight, and they got it at very low figures by weight. It is customary, where freight runs at from $4 to $5 a ton, as from California to Victoria, to allow freight to go in the ordinary way, but when freight advances to the rate of $60 or $80 a ton, no merchant would think of allowing his goods to be charged at ship's option. That was the question we discussed here last year. I claimed that your contract was leading you astray; leading you to believe that you were getting your goods at $200 a ton, when the fact of the matter is you have to pay $500 or $600. All the goods taken in by merchants are shipped by weight, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. WOOD. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Earle) must know that the practice of all shippers is to take a certain class of goods by weight and a certain class by measurement, forty cubic feet to the ton. That is the invariable practice in shipping from England to this country, or in fact from shipping anywhere. It is always at ship's option.

Mr. EARLE. I can inform my hon. friend (Mr. Wood) that I am just as well aware as he is of what the custom in shipping is. If you ship ordinary goods from England, at low rates of freight, the ships insist on taking them in that way. But when you get up to $80 or $100 or $200 a ton, no one would be foolish enough to ship their goods by measurement; particularly bulky goods. It is simply out of the question. But the point is this. The question came up last year in regard to the advantages that were secured by letting the contract to these people at a low figure for freight, I told the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) what would happen then, and so we find when the bills come to be paid that instead of paying for eighty tons, we are paying for 177 tons.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Earle), I suppose, will hardly say that the Canada Pacific Navigation Company, of which he is a director, would attempt to play a trick of that kind on the Government or that they have played a trick of that kind on the Government. As a matter of fact, the company which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Earle) represents—and I think he was very much annoyed because they did not get all the freight to carry last year—did charge us upon 177 tons at the rate stipulated, when we supposed we had only eighty tons. That is a fact. I do not believe that company did anything unfair. I believe they are honourable men, notwithstanding the imputation which their director endeavours to cast upon them in this House. We paid that bill and we paid precisely the rates which every one had to pay, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Earle) knows perfectly well that the rate which the Canada Pacific Navigation Company charges to Glenora is precisely the rate, a better rate, than his company was getting from other people. Yet, he attempts to cast the insinuation here that we were paying three times a higher rate than we ought to. With regard to the other company, I wish to say that the rate which we made, at the time we made it was the same rate as the North-west Mounted Police were paying, and the North American Transportation Company and the Alaska Commercial Company refused to carry one single pound of our freight at the rate which we succeeded in getting it carried for.

Now, I have accounted for a considerable portion of this deficiency by the fact, first, that we have taken nothing from the vote for the permanent force; secondly, that the transportation of freight from Glenora to Selkirk cost over $100,000 more than our estimate; and, thirdly, that the transportation of freight via St. Michaels cost us about $50,000 more than our estimate. We estimated that we had 300 tons, and we paid on 500 tons, though 50 tons of that belongs to the Mounted Police. I have accounted for about $100,000 of the amount paid for transportation via Teslin, and some $70,000 or $80,000 which we estimated we would receive from the permanent force vote. The only additional item is the item for buildings, which we had not estimated for, and which amounts to about $30,000. These items taken together will account for the $250,000 which we are asking for. My hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) has asked me for a separate statement of the amount paid for the troops themselves and the amount paid for freight. The amount for the troops, by railway and steamboat, was about $10,000 from here to Glenora. Of course, the men walked from there to Teslin. There were 60 men who went down Lake Teslin on the steamer; the rest went on barges which they built for themselves; so that the charge from there down was very small—in the neighbourhood of $4,000 or $5,000. The total amount paid as travelling expenses for the troops was relatively very small. The great expense was in the transportation of freight to its destination.

Mr. FOSTER. How much is that?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. $127,700 for the freight via St. Michaels and up the Yukon, out of which $12,500 would have to be taken for the North-west Mounted Police.

Mr. WALLACE. Is that the contract price?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes. The amount paid to the Hudson Bay Company is $130,000 in addition. That was by an entirely different route.

Mr. FOSTER. That represented how much freight?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Five hundred tons, via St. Michaels—about 300 tons or perhaps a little more by weight—and 177 tons, which weighed between 80 and 90 tons, via Vancouver and Glenora.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 106) to incorporate the Canadian Birkbeck Investment and Savings Company.—(Mr. Bertram.)

Bill (No. 150) incorporating the Imperial Loan and Investment Company of Canada.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 130) respecting "The London and Canadian Loan and Agency Company, (Limited)."—(Mr. Bain.)

MONTREAL ISLAND BELT LINE RAILWAY.

House resolved itself in committee on Bill (No. 112) respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Lemieux.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to hear from the promoter of this Bill if any changes have been made, and as to whether the harbour commissioners are satisfied with the Bill as it is?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have been asked to move an amendment to this section. I think the amendment has been agreed to by all the parties interested. It is as follows:—

To amend the said Bill by adding after the words "city of Montreal" in line 31 of subsection (c) of section 2 the following:—"But the powers and franchises of the company cannot be exercised to build upon or over any property vested in the harbour commissioners in Montreal, so as to affect the property of the said harbour commissioners, except upon agreement with the commissioners and on terms satisfactory to them; or, in the case of their failing to agree, upon terms to be approved by the Governor in Council."

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want to obstruct the Bill or anything of that kind, but I do think this is a very important Bill and ought not to be dealt with with only one member of the Government present, and he, probably, one who has not given any special attention to this measure. There are two very important bodies interested in this Bill, one being the harbour commissioners of Montreal, in which we as a Parliament have a very strong interest, because they are a body of men who have made large improvements under aids loaned by the Government. It seems to me we ought to hear from the Government whether or not this matter is arranged or if there is not a conflict of opinion or one party overriding the other.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This matter was discussed in committee at very great length, and an amendment was adopted which the committee agreed to almost unanimously; but it was not altogether satisfactory to the harbour commissioners of Montreal. Now, the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) has given notice of an amendment. As I understand, that amendment will be entirely satisfactory to the harbour commissioners and to this House. It is now getting somewhat late in the session and this Bill has been up from time to time. As the committee will remember, it was referred back to the Committee on Railways and Canals the other night for the sole purpose of considering the objection of the commissioners. The members of the Harbour Commission were themselves before the committee with their solicitor, and, after very full discussion, it was passed as it is now before the House. The amendment now proposed by my hon. friend of which notice was given by the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville, I think ought to be satisfactory to the harbour commissioners and to the House. The promoters of the Bill have not accepted the amendment. The proposition that I would make is that we adopt the amendment in committee and allow the Bill to stand until Monday, when both parties will have had an opportunity of seeing whether the amendment is fully satisfactory. There is no other point of the Bill to be considered, as it is otherwise satisfactory to both parties, I believe. If hon. members will listen to the amendment, I think they will see that it reaches the objections raised by the representatives of the Harbour Board and will reasonably fulfil their wishes. If we pass the Bill and allow it to stand for third reading until Monday night, both sides will have an opportunity of seeing the full effect of it and making their wishes known.

Mr. FOSTER. As I said before, I do not wish to put any obstacles in the way of the Bill going through in the form in which the House wants it to go through. Of course, there may be some difference of opinion about it. I would like the hon. gentleman to make his proposition in a little different form if he could agree to it. I would suggest that this amendment should be moved and allowed to go on record, as it will, if it is moved. Then we shall vote the amendment and the Bill and we can let the whole thing stand in that way until Monday night. If we pass the Bill in committee now nothing would remain but the third reading. I think the discussion in committee should not be cut off.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think that should be satisfactory.

Mr. WOOD. It seems to me that the amendment may meet the objection raised by the harbour commissioners of Montreal. I agree with the Chairman of the Railway Committee (Mr. Sutherland) that it would be well to leave the whole thing over to Monday night, when, if there is any objections to the Bill or the amendment, the harbour commissioners can have an opportunity to represent their own case.

Mr. SPROULE. This Bill was considered by committee and as that committee was asked the question if the commissioners were satisfied with the Bill. Some parties on behalf of the commissioners said they were perfectly satisfied. The Bill was reported to the House. Afterwards, it was referred back to the committee for reconsideration with a view to amendment in the direction suggested by the hon. member for Maison-neuve (Mr. Préfontaine) representing the Harbour Board. After exhaustive and careful debate, a clause was drawn by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), which, in the judgment of the committee, met the requirements of the Harbour Commission, and it was agreed to by all parties, or at least, the committee by a large majority passed that amendment.

Mr. WOOD. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) knows that the harbour commissioners would not accept that amendment.

Mr. SPROULE. But in the judgment of the committee, there was sufficient in it to satisfy the harbour commissioners, because it was left subject to the approval of the Governor in Council to whom the harbour commissioners could make their representations.

Now, the amendment is moved exactly upon the lines on which the Bill was asked to be amended when it was in this House before. It is coming back to the same thing. If we take that course now, it will indicate that no matter how carefully we consider a Bill, and whatever report we make, it is of no use, and an amendment is proposed as soon as the Bill reaches this House after being referred back the second time. The Minister of Railways and Canals had presented us a carefully drawn clause, and the judgment of the committee was that that clause was right, and I think the Bill ought to be allowed to pass this House without that amendment.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend is a little in error in the view he has presented to the House. The harbour commissioners represented to the committee that they wanted to have the Belt Line Railway placed on the same footing with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway do not control their lines on the harbour of Montreal, they are entirely under the control of the harbour commissioners. No one can plant a post or do anything on the harbour without the consent of the commissioners. Now, the Belt Line wanted to be placed upon the same footing as these two railways so far as the harbour commissioners were concerned. The Bill, as amended, does not do that, it virtually removes the harbour commissioners, and leaves the question as to the terms upon which the Belt Line shall occupy the harbour to be negotiated between the Belt Line and the Railway Committee of the Privy Council at Ottawa. That is the point the harbour commissioners objected to. The harbour commissioners of Montreal are a body corporate for a specific purpose; they are supposed to control the entire harbour in the interests of the country.

Now, they claim that if in the past they have well performed the duty devolving upon them, and as the Government has made the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway responsible to them for the manner in which they use the harbour and lay their tracks, they ask now why we should transfer that power to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, in so far as the Belt Line is concerned. Now, they say, place the Belt Line, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway on an equal footing before the harbour commissioners. But they say that if they, as harbour commissioners, and the Belt Line Company cannot come to an understanding with regard to any matter that may arise in dispute, they are willing that the Privy Council of Canada should be the referee, and that they should have power to settle it. That is the amendment, and I think it is a very fair amendment. My opinion is that it would be wise for us to go slowly until such time as the matter is adjusted, for the simple reason that the harbour of Montreal does not belong to Montreal, it does not belong to the province of Quebec, it belongs to this entire Dominion. We are all interested in it, and we hope and believe that Montreal is going to become the Liverpool of Canada, the great port to which will focus the entire trade of our North-west, and accommodation must be provided there for its shipment. In that case we should go very carefully in this matter. Let us put this Bill into such a shape that we may not seriously tie up the hands of the harbour commissioners, but enable them to look as carefully and as well after the interest of that harbour as they have done in the past. I do not say for a moment that the relations between the Belt Line and harbour commissioners would not be safe in the hands of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. But why should that step be taken at this juncture in the history of the harbour of Montreal? It has never been done before, why do it now? Would we not cast a certain reflection upon the harbour commissioners? If in the past they have performed their duties without any friction, without any complaint, and in such a manner as to show that they are an efficient and capable board, why should we now say that it is better in future that negotiations with regard to the use of that harbour should be conducted between the parties seeking those advantages and the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, ignoring the harbour board altogether?

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman in what respect the member for East Grey was mistaken.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will tell him in what respect. In the first place my hon. friend said that we had passed the Bill and afterwards referred it back, and when it was referred back all parties had agreed to the Bill. My hon. friend said he heard somebody agreed on behalf of the harbour commissioners.

Mr. SPROULE. No, you are entirely mistaken.

Mr. McMULLEN. I understood him to say

Mr. SPROULE. I said that at the first meeting, when I asked the question if this was satisfactory to the harbour commissioners, somebody on behalf of the commissioners said they were perfectly satisfied, and that the city council was satisfied; therefore, the committee passed the Bill without any further discussion. When it reached this House it was objected to by the Mayor of Montreal, who is a member of this House, on behalf of the harbour commissioners, and it was referred back to the committee with instructions to amend it in such a direction. But after considering the amendment proposed by the harbour commissioners the committee did not see fit to pass it as they desired. Then, a new amendment was drawn by the Minister of Railways and Canals, which was accepted by the committee by a large majority. That was my statement, not that all parties were satisfied. What was the contention of the harbour commissioners? That this railway will require power to lay down tracks along the front of the river, and that the railway cannot have power to expropriate land, because the commissioners have control over it. It is contended, on the other hand, that as the Belt Line is passing over property and grounds of the Crown, and as the Crown is represented by the Governor in Council, this latter body ought to be the tribunal to apply to. The harbour commissioners are only trustees of the Crown property, and negotiations between the Belt Line and the commissioners should be subject to the consent of the Governor in Council. This was regarded as the safest amendment to put in the Bill, and it was put in. Now, we have the amendment:

Nothing in this Act or in any previous Act of the Parliament of Canada shall be taken to confer upon the company the right to enter upon, use or occupy for the purposes of its undertaking any lands or privileges vested in the harbour commissioners of the city of Montreal in trust, without the consent of the Governor in Council.

As the Governor in Council represents the Crown who holds the property, it was thought they were the proper parties to get consent from. The contention of the Minister of Railways and Canals was that this Bill ought not to take away rights, and to satisfy the company that if it did take away rights, which he did not believe, then they should not be allowed to take away those rights unless by consent of the Governor in Council to whom the commissioners may make representations.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. WOOD. Why should not the harbour commissioners have the right to appear before the Privy Council? The amendment the hon. gentleman read just now excludes the harbour commissioners altogether.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Not at all.

Mr. WOOD. It does, because they are not parties to it at all. There are only two parties, one is the Belt Line Railway and the other is the Crown. The Crown are the trustees for the people, and, therefore, they should be consulted and they should have the right to appear before the Railway Committee as well as the Belt Line Railway Company. They are excluded altogether—

Mr. SPROULE. Not at all.

Mr. WOOD—and simply made useless. They have no voice in the direction of the matter at all so far as this Belt Line is concerned, and, therefore, when the suggestion comes it should be accepted, and the amendment allowed to stand until next Monday night, when we will be able to ascertain the views of the parties interested. We are really looking after the interest of the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) may laugh, but the harbour of Montreal does not belong to Montreal alone.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It belongs to the Government.

Mr. WOOD. It belongs to the country and we are interested in seeing that nothing interferes with the usefulness of that harbour. The matter should be allowed to stand.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Chairman, nothing will be gained by discussing this question. I think the suggestion that it should be allowed to stand until Monday is the better one. Let us get on to other business.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is an old maxim which may be applied to this case: Vigilantibus non dormientibus veniunt jura, which means that rights will not come to those who sleep but to those who are vigilant. When, in 1895, this Bill came before the House and the Belt Line Railway Company got their charter, the harbour commissioners of Montreal were not represented, although the Bill had been advertised for months previously. The rights, which some hon. members seek to deprive them of this evening, they have by their charter from Parliament. When they came to this House to amend their charter, and appeared before the Railway Committee, were the harbour commissioners represented? We sat for one day, and the harbour commissioners were not represented. However, as my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) said a moment ago, the question was brought as to whether the harbour commissioners had any objection to the Bill as it stood. Then I heard Mr. Archer, the law partner of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine) answer that the harbour commissioners of Montreal had no objection to the Bill as presented.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He had no instructions.

Mr. LEMIEUX. He said that they had no objection to it as it stood. Later on, the Bill came before this House. Now I am speaking for myself, just as the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) may speak for himself. I met, in No. 16, three of the harbour commissioners, Mr. McKay, Mr. Bickerdike, and another, one of the French commissioners, whose name I have forgotten just now. We spoke together about this Bill, and I was told, most positively, by the gentlemen representing the harbour commissioners, that if we inserted in the Bill a clause by which the harbour commissioners and the directors of the Belt Line Railway Company could go before the Privy Council before expropriating any portion of the lands belonging to the harbour commissioners, they would be perfectly satisfied. Now, the hon. member for Hamilton would like to postpone the passage of the Bill so as to give another chance to the harbour commissioners to be heard. I may say to this committee that the commissioners are not standing in the way, but that the Montreal Street Railway Company is in the way. The Montreal Street Railway Company is represented on the board of the commissioners, and it is the street railway company that is blocking the way of the Bill. I hope the committee will not listen—will listen, yes, but will not stay proceedings, but that it will pass this Bill as it was amended by the Railway Committee at the instance of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that careful reading of the amendment, which has been proposed by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), will lead one to the conclusion that, if the harbour commissioners are ignored in the Bill as we have it before us, they can be ignored in the Bill as proposed to be amended. It is optional for the company to accept the terms which the harbour commissioners may offer them to give them the right to enter upon their lands or ignore the offer and come direct to the Privy Council. It is not at all likely that the Governor in Council would act on the representation of the company without consulting the harbour commissioners, and, in my judgment, in view of the history of this Bill since it has been before the House and the committee, we ought to be very careful as to making further amendments to it. As the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has pointed out, it was discussed again and again in the committee, and the amendment proposed suggested by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals was thought a reasonable one, and was accepted by the committee. After the remark made by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) that there are other influences at work to prevent the passage of this Bill and to practically destroy it, the committee should be very careful before making amendments that would have the effect of destroying this enterprise, which, it is conceded, will, if carried out, be of substantial benefit to the city of Montreal and the adjacent district.

Mr. COCHRANE. As a member of the committee, I am very much surprised that we should have this discussion here at all, after this Bill has been referred back. From my experience of that committee, I think I am safe in saying that there has not been a Bill before it, for many years, that has received more discussion than this Bill. I do not know that we are here necessarily to register the wishes of the harbour commissioners of Montreal harbour. I think we are here to bring our best judgment to bear on this Bill, and to arrive at the conclusion that seems best in the interest of the country. It was because of the fact that we are all interested in the harbour of Montreal that I consented to allow that matter to be referred to the Privy Council for settlement, thinking that was the best tribunal to finally settle the question. I did not understand the question as the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) understood it. I heard that story that he told. The question was as to the difference of opinion of the solicitors representing the harbour commissioners and the Belt Line Company. When the company obtained the powers of this present Bill the harbour commissioners did not appear. The company consider that they do not obtain any powers under the present Bill than they obtained under the previous one. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals proposed an amendment so that neither party should be interfered with in the rights they had before, and that if they were not satisfied when they came to deal with the question of expropriation, the Council should settle the question. After the Bill was thrashed out at two sessions of the committee, and when the committee was almost unanimous, when the Bill was finally passed, I think the decision of the committee was proper and that it should be sustained.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that the Railway Committee is not being treated fairly in this matter. Due notice was given in the Montreal papers of this legislation, and notwithstanding the fact that we spent about two days in the Railway Committee discussing the Bill, the commissioners did not see fit to put in an appearance at all. After being guilty of such laches as this and when the matter came in the regular course of procedure before the House at a late hour, the suggestion was made that the harbour commissioners would like to have some further discussion of the matter and wished to have the Bill referred back to the committee. It was referred back to the committee and we spent another day discussing it. We agreed upon an amendment almost unanimously. The commissioners were represented. Now it comes back to the Committee of the Whole House again and it is proposed, after the Railway Committee has spent three days giving this matter the fullest discussion, that they are to be treated in a rather cavalier and discourteous manner by having their recommendation quietly ignored.

As to the amendment which has just been mentioned, there is one feature of it which shows the preposterous contention of the Montreal Harbour Commissioners or of those acting on behalf of them. It says that these people shall not pass through the property of the harbour commissioners, and shall not do anything that in any way shall affect the property of the harbour commissioners; that is that if they make a rattle of cars near to any building of the harbour commissioners, an injunction shall lie. It is simply preposterous. We may as well dispense with the Railway Committee if the last decision of that committee is not acted upon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My hon. friend (Mr. Powell) is mistaken. If the amendment moved here had been moved in the committee, I believe it would have been satisfactory to all parties.

Mr. POWELL. That amendment was moved.

Mr. SPROULE. And rejected.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. POWELL. I certainly heard this amendment read two or three times before the committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We have had all the lawyers in the House disagreeing as to what the effect of this Bill will be, but in my opinion there was nothing in it, even as it originally came from the committee, to interfere with the rights of the harbour commissioners. To make that perfectly clear, the Minister of Railways moved the amendment which passed the committee. The harbour commissioners now are not satisfied with that amendment. I think hon. members will agree with me that in legislation of this kind, where the parties agree between themselves and where the House is satisfied that the legislation is in the public interest, we generally adopt it. I believe having heard the discussion in the committee, and having heard from the harbour commissioners privately, that they will be satisfied with this amendment as now proposed. We might as well dispose of this legislation to-night, and it has been suggested to adopt this amendment and leave the Bill in committee stage for another night. The only difference between this Bill and any ordinary Bill passed by this House is, that the ordinary Bill leaves it to the company to deal with the property owners under the Railway Act. It is provided in this Bill, and for very good reasons probably, that if the parties could not agree between themselves or under some process of law, the Governor General in Council is made an arbiter between the two. The committee having apparently unanimously adopted that principle, I do think we should adopt this amendment now, in which the promoters of the Bill are willing to still further meet the views of the harbour commissioners. The Bill can be left in the committee stage if it is thought necessary, and the harbour commissioners can have an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon the amendment, before the next sitting of the House. I really believe if we adopt this amendment it will be found satisfactory to the House, to the harbour commissioners, and to the railway company.

Mr. COCHRANE. Has the company agreed to this?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. I did not hear the discussion in the Railway Committee, but it seems to me the difficulty is as to whether under an ordinary Bill you could expropriate as against the harbour commissioners. If the harbour commissioners had the user of that property for a number of years and a lease, the company could proceed by expropriation under the ordinary law, and it would not be necessary to get the consent of the Crown. The Minister of Railways carefully guarded against that, and provided that if the Crown had rights in the property, the company would have to get the consent of the Crown. We have given to the harbour commissioners of Montreal the user and the responsibility of the management of our property; but we are going past the harbour commissioners altogether both in the Bill and in the amendment proposed. The amendment proposed by the Minister is, that if the two parties cannot agree between themselves then the Privy Council has the right to settle the dispute. What I would like to see provided is that the consent of the harbour commissioners, to whom we have given the management of the property, should be obtained also.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) was quite correct in assuming that I had given no special attention to this Bill; but my colleague the Minister of Railways did give a great deal of attention to it, and I should not like to see the Bill pass its final stage until he had an opportunity of considering this later development. This afternoon, in common with several of my colleagues, I received a telegram from Mr. MacKay, which I wish to communicate to the House:

At a meeting of the harbour commissioners held this afternoon the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

"That in view of the report made to this board by the delegation that appeared before the Committee of Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines in Ottawa to present the objections of the board to the Bill concerning the Belt Line Railway Company, so that all railway companies should be placed on the same footing, the board approve of the attitude taken by said delegation to protect the interests of the harbour of Montreal, and are of opinion that all efforts and representations should be made to Parliament to have inserted in said Bill a clause which would protect the harbour against any encroachment without the consent of this board, and that the clauses proposed before the said committee should be pressed before the House of Commons, and the board desire to have the consideration of the Bill deferred until Wednesday evening, 5th July, so that they may appear."

(Sgd.) ROBERT MacKAY, President.

Mr. POWELL. He was present at the committee.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I presume Mr. MacKay's telegram and the resolution of the board have reference to the amendment as it now stands in the Bill, and that Mr. MacKay was not aware that my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) had in view this suggestion that has been offered in the way of compromise. It may be that the amendment now proposed will meet the view of the Harbour Board. However, I think it my duty to the Harbour Board to convey this telegram to the House, and I myself would be willing that the matter should now make some progress, but remain in committee, so that we may have an opportunity, when the Minister of Railways is present, to look into it more fully. Whether that is done in committee or on the third reading is not a vital point; but I think it would be as well to let the Bill remain in committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It seems to me that this amendment is a very proper one. It only provides that property which is vested in the harbour commissioners of Montreal shall not be crossed or affected by this railway, except with their consent, and that if they do not consent, rather than block the whole railway, which, I understand, the people of Montreal want, then, the matter shall be referred to the Governor in Council for settlement. That is all there is in the amendment.

Mr. SPROULE. Practically the same resolution was read in the committee, and rejected by the committee. The whole contention of Mr. McKay and Mr. Préfontaine, representing the harbour commission, was that this Bill gave greater rights than the old charter. The contention of the Minister of Railways, on the other hand, was, that it did not give greater rights; and we moved that amendment for the purpose of saying that it did give greater rights, the company should not exercise those rights unless by the approval of the Governor in Council, to whom the harbour commissioners could make their representations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. After hearing the views which have been expressed, I think it would be better to adopt the suggestion. But I wish to say on my own behalf, and I believe on behalf of the great majority of the members of the Committee on Railways and Canals, that if my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) had been present, he would not have made the remarks he has made to-night. The original charter was granted in 1894, and it was amended in 1896 and in 1898; and if he had an opportunity of seeing the various clauses, he would see that some gentlemen had a right to feel that probably some clauses in the Act did give the company powers not usually granted in railway charters. One clause which raises a doubt is the one which gives this company power to occupy lands in the city of Montreal with the consent of the city; and the point on which the lawyers differed was whether that referred to this property held by the harbour commissioners. However, the commission can hardly expect the Railway Committee or this House to carry out what they suggest in this telegram, for this reason—that this company has been granted a charter for reasons quite different to anything that exists at the present time; because it was thought to be in the interest of the city of Montreal that the company should have greater rights, and that elevated roads should be built for the purpose of conveying freight to the boats in a different way from the lines owned by the harbour commission and leased to the present railway. If Parliament sees fit to grant a charter, it cannot agree to put it on the terms of the notice given by the hon. gentleman from Montreal (Mr. Préfontaine) or those suggested in this telegram. But as I said before, when these gentlemen have an opportunity of conferring, I believe they will adopt this amendment; and I beg to move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 162) to incorporate the Belleville Prince Edward Bridge Company.—(Mr. Hurley.)

Bill (No. 166) respecting the Temiscouata Railway Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Militia and Defence—

For pay of troops, erection of barracks, transportation of troops and supplies and necessary expenditures in the Yukon..... $250,000

Mr. FOSTER. When the House rose at six o'clock, we were talking of the freight carried into the Yukon. This is the way the matter comes to my mind, that for the current year the cost of the transport of troops amounts to about $15,000, and the freight on the supplies via St. Michael's cost $127,700, less $12,500 which would be paid by the North-west Mounted Police, being net cost to the Militia Department of $115,200. That was for 300 tons in all, of which 250 tons were for the Militia Department via St. Michael's, and about 80 tons weight which went in by Glenora, and which cost $130,000.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Rather more than that. That was the bill of the Hudson Bay Company. It was $40 a ton for 177 tons.

Mr. FOSTER. The whole cost of freight on the supplies both ways amounts to $250,000.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes, about that.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the first cost of those 330 tons?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I must explain that part of this was ammunition. The supplies of food cost about $40,000.

Mr. FOSTER. The cost of the supplies of food—were there 330 tons of food?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That includes ammunition and everything.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the cost of the 330 tons?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I cannot give the exact weight, but excluding the guns and ammunition, the supplies cost about $40,000.

Mr. FOSTER. And the ammunition?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The machine guns are worth $2,500 apiece, and the ammunition I could not tell the cost. I hardly expected to be asked this.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not so very material. The astounding thing is that for $40,000 worth of provisions, except the guns and ammunition, the total cost of which would not be very large, I suppose, you had to pay $252,000 for simple transport. It illustrates the cost of the journey, and I am inclined to think it illustrates something else. It seems almost unaccountable, and the larger part went in by water the whole way. It seems almost unaccountable that 330 tons in weight of stuff would have cost the enormous sum of $252,000 to get into the Yukon district. That is at the rate of $750 a ton. Did the hon. gentleman ask for tenders for the carrying of this by both routes?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the tenders were to Dawson on the one by the water?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Selkirk in both cases, with an option at Dawson.

Mr. FOSTER. And the hon. gentleman called for tenders?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And you had three or four tenders?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. We asked four or five people to tender, and I think we only had three tenders.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the tender price for this work?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Via the Yukon was $250 to Dawson, and $300 to Selkirk per ton.

Mr. FOSTER. Was it specified in the tender that it was $250 or $300 per ton weight?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, what was the tender into Selkirk via the other way?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think I have explained that we made an arrangement with the Hudson Bay Company to pay them a percentage of profit. They were to do the work with the assistance of our men, and we paid 20 per cent upon the gross cost to them. They were to show us all their accounts, and to deduct any plant which they had purchased, after selling it for what it brought. They were to deduct what it brought.

Mr. FOSTER. You were to give them a profit of 20 per cent on their cost?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. You have gone over all those accounts. The gross cost was $137,000.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have the items: Disbursements, $117,913.90, less sales, $7,450.94—making a net of $110,462.86. Commission of 20 per cent was $21,302.93, bringing the amount up to $131,765.69, and the company still has on hand some horses and mules not sold. Probably not very much will come from that.

Mr. FOSTER. Any sales that were made were sales of what you had bought and you were simply getting your money back.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. What you really paid was $117,000.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. $117,000 less $7,000. That made $110,000, and then there was the 20 per cent profit, or $21,000. That was for eighty tons.

Mr. FOSTER. In round figures, $1,400 a ton.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That included the men assisting our men through. You could hardly separate the freight and the men. The men, for instance, had to use horses and mules to get there, and that is all included.

Mr. FOSTER. How many men?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Two hundred.

Mr. FOSTER. They did their share of the work?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the Hudson Bay Company had the advantage of the work of 200 men going through.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. We had twelve men attached to the force, who did a certain amount of work, of course. I presume they all assisted in getting through. The men had their own baggage in addition to the freight which was being carried.

Mr. FOSTER. Did the Hudson Bay Company furnish the horses for all these men?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes, they furnished everything.

Mr. FOSTER. The men rode rather than walked?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Some of them.

Mr. FOSTER. How many horses were there to the men?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am told that the men did not use the horses. They marched, and the horses were used for carrying the supplies.

Mr. FOSTER. The men looked after their baggage. The baggage, of course, was cared for, as far as the carriage was concerned, by the Hudson Bay Company?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. In addition to the eighty tons.

Mr. FOSTER. So, but for the assistance of these men, the Hudson's Bay Company would have required a much larger force to take in these supplies?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. To some extent, I suppose, that is true. But it would be difficult to say exactly how much they had assisted the Hudson's Bay Company.

Mr. FOSTER. This $1,400 per ton was from what place to what place?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. From Glenora to Teslin, or practically to Selkirk. From Teslin it was by water carriage.

Mr. FOSTER. And the Hudson's Bay Company's responsibility ceased at Teslin?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. About what time did these men start in?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Early in June they started from Glenora. They left Vancouver in the middle of May. The first 60 men got to Teslin before the 1st July, and to Selkirk the first week in July. The remainder reached Selkirk early in September.

Mr. FOSTER. How much did the freight cost to Glenora?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The goods were purchased, delivered at Vancouver. Then there was the freight from Vancouver by the Canadian Pacific Navigation Company at $40 a ton measurement as I have stated, roughly $7,000. This delivered the goods at Glenora. From Glenora to Telegraph Creek they were taken by boat by the Hudson's Bay Company. At Telegraph Creek the work of transporting them across the land began.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the Hudson's Bay Company took them over at Glenora?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. EARLE. Did the Hudson's Bay Company transport these goods with their own horses or contract with other packers?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. So far as we know, with their own horses.

Mr. EARLE. As a matter of fact, they had a contract with pack trains at a very large figure. A train was packing all summer at forty cents a pound for the Government under arrangement made with the Hudson's Bay Company. While I am on my feet, I desire to point out one matter to the hon. Minister. He stated that the goods were both delivered at Vancouver. But if he will refer to the account of H. N. Bate & Company, he will find a charge for freight. He will find the account at L-77 and 78. There are also a number of extraordinary charges. The hon. gentleman stated last year that the prices were better than those offered on the coast. But he will find, if he will compare the bills, that not only are the prices on the coast cheaper, but there are no such charges as those which run through the bill of H. N. Bate & Company. For instance, here is a charge for 1,200 tin boxes for biscuit, $300; time strengthening packages, &c., repacking, 793 hours, $118.75; material used in strapping, clutch nails, &c., $174; freight on car, $243; freight on car, $225; freight, $256; freight on car, $302; freight on car, $226; freight on car, $315. All this has been paid by the department, and it is certainly a clear contradiction of the statement made by the hon. Minister last year when these accounts were before us.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
What did he say?

Mr. EARLE. In reply to a question by myself, the hon. gentleman said:

With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Earle), I may say that in addition to correspondence with parties in British Columbia, we got a list of prices early in March which were being paid by the North-west Mounted Police in British Columbia for goods, and we found that the prices at which we were offered the same goods here, delivered on the coast, were better than the prices which had actually been paid up to that time by the North-west Mounted Police.

Now, on reference to the Auditor General's Report, we find the exact contrary to be the case; the goods are not cheaper, and these large amounts are charged for freight. I should like if the Minister would explain how that comes about?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. So far as the prices are concerned—

Mr. EARLE. I would not quibble about prices; there is not enough difference for that.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. So far as the prices are concerned, it will be necessary, as the hon. gentleman knows better than I do, to know almost the exact date, the exact week, in which the prices were quoted, in order to know whether the purchases took place at practically the same moment, because there are fluctuations in the prices. But I must say that I am surprised, and this is the first time my attention has been called to it, that that charge for freight should have been made, because most of the goods were to be delivered at the coast. I am informed by my officers that so far as the goods which were to go up via Glenora and Teslin were concerned, the first lot that we bought we paid freight on them, and the others were to be delivered on the coast. I am bound to say that that was not my understanding.

Mr. EARLE. The prices are higher than the prices of similar goods supplied on the coast to the Mounted Police at various dates all through the early part of the season.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I can tell the hon. gentleman one circumstance which I remember distinctly. There was some rivalry between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway about getting this business, and the Canadian Pacific Railway succeeded in getting the business from Mr. Bate. It was a matter with which we had no concern at all. We told them at once it was not a matter that concerned us, that these people were to put the freight on the coast wherever they liked, because they paid for it. I am very much surprised to see this item.

Mr. EARLE. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is not present, but he has the freight bills, paid and certified, and a memorandum of the cheques. So, as a matter of fact, the department paid the freight in addition to the prices which they claimed were prices delivered on the coast. So that Messrs. Bate & Son, in addition to getting pretty round prices for their goods, get a lump sum of over $2,000 for freight, and $800 to $900 for packing.

Mr. FOSTER. In colloquial language, this is a pretty how-do-you-do. The Minister stated last year that these gentlemen were to pay the freight. They got the order for the goods on that understanding. The railway companies came bothering the department about freight rates, and the Minister referred them to Mr. Bate, saying: That is none of our business at all; you make your terms with Mr. Bate. Mr. Bate has to pay the freight. The Minister tell us tonight that that was the understanding upon which they got this order. He told us a moment ago that is what he told the railway companies who came to ask him for it. And yet we find the extraordinary thing that Bate & Co. have been paid freight on every car of goods they took there, seemingly. Here is the freight bill: 9 cars of goods, $2,051.64. I do not know what is the custom of business men, but it seems to me that if I went to a store and ordered a lot of goods to be sent over to Victoria or anywhere else, I would not have to pay for the time that was taken up in packing these goods, that I would not have to pay for all the cases and the like of that. Here we find they have charged for the goods, and besides, as my hon. friend said, they have charged for their time in strengthening the packages, in repacking, so much an hour, and then they have gone to work and charged time for marking the goods. Then, they have charged for the material used in strapping and packing goods, even the clutch nails they put in they have charged for. Then, the freight on the goods, wharfage, and so on. This is certainly an extraordinary account.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It was necessary to pack these goods in a very special way, very different from ordinary packing.

Mr. FOSTER. And Bate & Son got a very special order. Recollect that Bate's bill amounts to $34,744. That is not an order that comes to a man like Mr. Bate, or a man like my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood), every hour of the day.

Mr. WOOD. The packages are always charged for.

Mr. FOSTER. When I go into my hon. friend's place of business and give him an order for $34,000 worth of goods, does he charge me his time for marking those goods? No, I should think not. Here they charge for all the little boxes in which the goods are put up.

Mr. WOOD. Small boxes are charged for.

Mr. FOSTER. Cigar-boxes and the like of that?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. They are not charged here.

Mr. WOOD. These packages have to be carried on men's shoulders, and they are packed with 50 to 75 pounds each. These small packages really in the aggregate cost more than large ones, therefore, they are charged for. They have got to be supplied with iron hooks and all this kind of thing.

Mr. EARLE. I would invite the Minister or any one else who knows anything about the way Government business is conducted, to step down to the office of the Controller of Mounted Police. He has just now a bill of goods to be delivered, part in Victoria and part in Vancouver, and they call for them to be put up in a certain way. They call for 2 tons of oatmeal to be put in 10-pound tins, and they state distinctly in all these cases that the price is to include the package. In this case the outside price is charged in every instance for package. I do not know the price of oats in this country, but they are charged here $48 for 2,000 pounds.

Mr. WOOD. You do not mean to say that the packages in which these 10-pound lots would be packed would be given free?

Mr. EARLE. I mean to say that they invariably call for goods to be put up in certain ways, and you have to tender for them put up in these sized packages, and you cannot charge for the packages. The bills are here.

Mr. WOOD. I am shipping goods to the Klondike, and I charge for packages.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. member is shipping a keg of nails, does he charge for the keg?

Mr. WOOD. Certainly not.

Mr. EARLE. Fancy $48 a ton for oats. I never saw any such prices paid for them in our country. Everybody knows that oats go in bags—you do not take oats and throw them around loose—and the bag goes with them. Here they make a charge of $48 a ton, and on top of that some $10 or $12 besides for package. It runs all through the bills that I have gone through. I have not gone through every item, because there are many little things that are charged for that may not be worth one-half of what is charged.

Mr. FOSTER. There is an extraordinary charge here. Mr. Bate charges for 120 working days, of 10 hours per day, for packing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. For one man per day?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. You never can get me to believe, that to pack all that was included in that Bill, would take one man 120 days, working 10 hours a day, or 120 men working one day. It is simply preposterous. The fact of the matter is that Mr. Bate has had the run of the yard. There was every reason why he should have it. There was no reason why he should not have it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What is the reason?

Mr. FOSTER. The reason is that there were no tenders called for. The hon. Minister knows as well as anybody that he simply gave to this man, gave to the other man, and gave to the third man in his line of specialties. Mr. Bate received $34,000 of an order from this Government without practically a shadow of anything like a tender. That was all threshed out last year and there is no need of going over it again, because the hon. Minister had to defend himself for making these purchases without tender. There was hurry; there was this and that and the other, all of which, in our opinion, were but excuses for giving Mr. Bate this great order. Mr. Bate got this $34,000 order, and in addition he has charged for packages, strengthening, marking goods, strapping and clutch nails. He has charged 1,205 hours at 15 cents an hour for packing. It seems to me perfectly absurd. Then $2,000 odd dollars have been paid to him for freight when the bargain was that he was to deliver his goods freight free at Vancouver. There must be some reason why the hon. Minister and the staff of his department were so utterly regardless of the money of the country and of business methods as to allow this. There is not a man that ought to be allowed to stay in the department five minutes who had charge of this, if he knew what the contract was. I knew what his Minister had said here and allowed all these charges which were expressly against the arrangement made, as was made clear by the hon. Minister in this House. I think this committee ought to know the reason, because the hon. Minister is as much surprised as any one, but surprise does not bring the money back to the country which has been taken from it wrongfully. The idea of a man charging for 120 days' work in packing an order that was given him! It must have gone out wide and broad that the Government was fair plunder for certain men and they took advantage of it.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The business of making this contract and having these goods put up properly was in the hands of the then Quartermaster General.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not care whose hands it was in.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) does, but I am only telling him. He is a reputable officer of the Imperial Army, a man whose reputation for straightforwardness and ability was generally believed to be excellent. Last year I read a statement from Col. Lake to the House, as follows:—

The points to be noted with regard to the allotment of tenders for stores for the Yukon force to the successful tenderers appear to me to be as follows:—

The first order given for the preparation of the force contemplated that the force should start in ten days' time from the giving of the order. As every detail had to be worked out, from the settling of the uniform to be worn, the amount and nature of the daily ration each day, down to the actual detail of the men to compose the force, it is evident that we were very much pressed for time, and that practically it was all but impossible to advertise in the press for tenders for these supplies to be submitted in the usual way. As a matter of fact, several firms were invited and did submit tenders. For instance, Messrs. H. N. Bate & Sons, the Hudson's Bay Company, Mr. J. Strachan, of Montreal, the Ogilvie Milling Company, Harris Brothers, Hamilton, Mr. J. Jamieson, of Ottawa, the Bovril Co. (Limited), and one or two others.

Mr. CLARKE. Were they all for groceries?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No, not all. That of the Bovril Company was not, of course. Messrs. Bate & Sons, Mr. Strachan, and Hudson's Bay Company tendered for groceries. The Ogilvie Milling Company tendered for flour; Harris Bros., of Hamilton, for biscuit, and I do not know what Mr. Jamieson of Ottawa tendered for.

Mr. FOSTER. Biscuit.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE—

Secondly, in allowing these contracts, considerable attention had to be paid to the uncertainty of the conditions of the route and the means of transport. For instance, it was for some time uncertain whether the stores would be conveyed by sleighs, by toboggans, by pack transport, or by men. Further, we were constantly receiving additional information about the route. It was, therefore, most desirable, it may be said essential, that we should have our contractors close at hand in order that we might direct them as to the method of packing, and answer the numerous questions of detail which arose in the course of the fulfilment of the contracts. I may say that from the time that the contract was allotted to Messrs. H. N. Bate & Sons to the time the goods were delivered to the railway company for transport, we were in almost daily communication with their representative, as to the manner in which the stores were to be packed and preserved for keeping, &c. In the case of the Hudson's Bay Company, to whom a considerable portion of the contract was allotted, we had personal instructions given to them by the officer commanding the force, and we were, in addition, fortified by our knowledge of the vast experience of this company in packing.

At the same time, that it may be seen that the prices paid by us to our contractors were not excessive, a list of the more important articles, and the price for each, is attached, together with a list of the prices current in the wholesale market at the present time. It may also be remarked that it was a matter of common knowledge from newspapers that a force of men would be sent to the Yukon district, and that they would, of course, require supplies; and it may be stated that the Hudson's Bay Company submitted their tender solely on information derived from the press. It was, therefore, open to any other contractors to have adopted the same course.

It is true that the expedition did not start until May, although ordered early in March; but it must be borne in mind that throughout the whole of the period it was impossible to say how soon the force might be required to move, and it was, therefore, necessary to be prepared with our arrangements without loss of time.

It will be remembered that there were two main supplies of stores: first, the supplies actually taken with the detachment itself for its use; secondly, the reserve supplies for delivery by sea, and via the mouth of the Yukon River. Having arranged for the delivery of the first consignment by certain contractors, and having explained to them all the conditions attending the transaction, there was evident advantage in giving the further contracts to the same people, and avoiding a repetition of process of giving instructions. Further, these contractors were in a position to secure us, as they did secure us, against the extra expense which would otherwise have been incurred consequent upon the great rise in the wholesale prices of all provisions, which was brought about early in April by the war between the United States and Spain.

Mr. EARLE. I am not finding fault with the prices charged, if the goods were delivered as it was stated they would be delivered.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Are the prices charged admitted to be reasonable?

Mr. MCDUGALL. No, they are not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not ask the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall); he knows nothing about it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I have as good a right to answer as any member in this House.

Mr. EARLE. The prices, as far as I have had time to look over them—I have not gone into them minutely—are slightly higher than you have paid on the coast for similar goods for the Mounted Police. But on top of that is this large amount charged for extras and freight. Now, what does the Minister propose to do about this? Is he going to permit it? When he tried to refute my argument last year, as to our ability to supply goods on the coast at equally low prices with the eastern people, he said he was doing better here, and that he could lay the goods down cheaper in British Columbia than he could buy them there. But now we find when the bills come in that the Minister did not state the facts. He has to pay, and has paid these heavy charges on top of the actual cost of the goods. It is extremely unfair to subject our people on the coast to such competition as that. It is simply giving the contractor here a bonus over and above the prices which he should supply them at under reasonable competition. Now, I am not speaking for myself, for I have no interest in the matter, because I could not do any business with the Government, being a member of Parliament, but our people on the coast feel that if the Government have any business or trade to give, they should at least have a fair share of it. We have men in the business there who are quite able to pack such goods without having a man standing over them. As I told the Minister last year, the idea of appointing a man like Col. Lake to superintend the packing of these goods, a man who knows nothing whatever of the manner in which goods should be packed for handling in this country, to appoint him to that position was nonsensical, when you could get men on the coast who have thirty or thirty-five years' experience in that business. Last year the Minister told us as one of the reasons why the goods should be purchased in Ottawa, that somebody should supervise the packing of them for their destination. That is, as I have said, simply nonsense. The House certainly deserves some further explanation as to what is to be done about this amount paid for freight to Messrs. Bate & Sons.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Col. Lake had great experience in matters of this kind in India in the Imperial service, and it was part of his duty as Quartermaster General to see to this matter. Besides, we have Capt. Benoit in the department, who was there during the whole of the North-west trouble, and no doubt he had a great deal of experience in forwarding supplies. So far as the item for freight is concerned, I can only say that I am surprised to see that item there. I have not the explanation at the present time, but I shall get it, and I will give the fullest explanation on the Yukon item in the main estimate.

Mr. EARLE. As far as I am concerned, I shall certainly demand that the item stand until we get the information. This matter is too serious to pass over in that way. It certainly is not an ordinary item. I look upon it as a very serious matter.

Mr. FOSTER. Most extraordinary.

Mr. EARLE. Yes, I consider it most extraordinary, and because of that the item should stand.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. This vote is really required.

Mr. COCHRANE. It should not be required at all.

Mr. EARLE. This bill has been paid.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes, it was paid out of the vote which was taken for the year 1897-98, but you might as well stop the whole of the militia Estimates as this one, so far as that goes. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Earle) will not press his objection, I think I can get him a satisfactory explanation.

Mr. EARLE. I think my objection is a very reasonable one.

Mr. COCHRANE. It is a strange thing to find the Minister of Militia trying to get behind one of his officers for a defence. We have too much of that kind of thing done by the Ministers. Why do you not come out and assume the responsibility?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do.

Mr. COCHRANE. You were taking refuge behind one of your officers.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I said Col. Lake was in charge of this.

Mr. COCHRANE. Is not this an astounding thing? Did I understand the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Earle) to say that the Minister of Militia paid in Ottawa about the same prices, or a little higher, as he would have to pay in Victoria for similar goods?

Mr. EARLE. Yes. I have not looked exhaustively through the accounts, but I should say the prices run a little higher.

Mr. COCHRANE. That is an astounding thing, and I do not see how any Minister can attempt to justify it. Here we find them buying milk on the coast at about half what they paid for it in Nova Scotia, although it originally came from Nova Scotia.

Mr. CLARKE. That was reindeer milk.

Mr. COCHRANE. Yes, but the Reindeer milk is the same price all over. At all events, it should be cheaper in Nova Scotia than British Columbia, but it appears that the Government have some friends here, that they think they are entitled to more consideration than their friends on the Pacific coast.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). That explains the milk in the cocoanut.

Mr. COCHRANE. It is too serious a thing for the Minister of Marine to joke about. He was serious enough when he was in Opposition on this side of the House. He has the fact staring him in the face that he paid $8 per case for Reindeer milk in Nova Scotia, where it was condensed, and only $5.60 in British Columbia after it was taken across the continent.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I deny that point blank.

Mr. COCHRANE. I did not look into the matter myself, but the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) said you paid double. Anyhow you cannot deny the fact in the Auditor General's Report that you paid more for goods in Ottawa than you could get the same goods for in British Columbia.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. member (Mr. Earle) does not complain of the prices.

Mr. COCHRANE. He does. He says you paid a little higher for them in Ottawa than you would have had to pay for the same goods in Victoria, and in addition to that, you pay $2,000 for freight across the continent, and you pay a large sum to men for packing the goods. It is the most astounding piece of business that I ever heard of. You pay slightly more in Ottawa for the goods than they could be got for on the coast; then, you pay for packing and all other expenses, and after that you pay $2,000 or $3,000 for freight. In British Columbia, where you could get the goods at less money, and I dare say already packed, besides you would have the advantage of the freight. I do not object to the Ministers giving the advantage to their friends when other things are equal; but, as a representative of the taxpayers of Canada, I object to you giving it to your friends at such enormous cost. I say give the whole community a chance, and then, other things being equal, give the work to your friends. But, in the first place, you have deceived the electors by getting the position you occupy under false pretenses. You told us, when you were on this side of the House, that we were robbing the country with our extravagance, and that we should not do anything of this kind without tender. And now the Minister, with that bland smile of his, tells us that it was an official in whom he had every confidence who did this job. I think it is a humiliating position for a Minister to occupy to get up in this House and tell us that he has allowed his officials to run riot with the people's money, instead of having the manliness to get up and tell us that he gave this business to his friends and put a job on the country.

Mr. CLANCY. I think the Minister of Marine and Fisheries asked a very proper question, when he asked the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Earle) if he had any complaint to make of the prices, and whether there was more paid for the goods here than on the coast. The rather startling answer came, that a little higher price was paid in Ottawa than would be paid for the same goods on the coast. But there was something in addition to that: there was the freight from here to British Columbia to be added. There was more—the packing of the goods. There was still another item—the packages. The hon. member for Victoria made it pretty clear that the trade is so well settled that when goods are ordered, they are ordered in certain sized packages, the prices including the packages in every case. There is surely some mistake about this. I cannot bring myself to believe that this transaction is so bad as it appears, but it is so bad that there is no necessity so urgent as to induce the committee to consent to the item going through until there is an explanation.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If we were taking a vote for the payment of this bill, there would be something in the criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite; but this bill, be it wise or unwise, has been paid. There will be ample opportunity at a later stage for the House to review it, and I would suggest to hon. gentlemen that we might let the item pass on the understanding that it will be the subject of full discussion under the vote for the Yukon. I think that is a fair way to deal with it.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to refer to another transaction. We want to see what kind of bargains are made by the Minister of Militia. I have nothing to say about Col. Lake. He may have selected the goods, while the payments went through other officers, and the strictures have reference to them and the Minister who has them in charge, and who consented to the payments. Does the committee think it is a business-like arrangement to go to a company and ask it to take a certain amount of freight 150 miles, and to supply 200 men going at the same time—able-bodied men, soldiers every one of them, who do their share of the work right along—so that the company will make an actual profit, above every cent of cost to them, of $21,000, with the men's services given free?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman is not quite correct. The company have shown items of the account, and they have not charged anything for the men. They supplied horses, mules and men of their own.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say they charged for the men. I say that the Hudson Bay Company undertook to take these supplies from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, and they supplied what horses and what pack mules were necessary to carry it. They had whatever services were given, be they great or small, by the 200 men who went over. Whatever those services were worth, they got them.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I may be wrong, but it seems to me that the hon. gentleman is making an argument which will not hold, in the light of the facts. I understand that these men did a certain amount of work; but the Hudson Bay Company only got paid their actual outlay, and the work which the men did prevented a certain outlay on the part of the company, and saved a corresponding amount to the department.

Mr. FOSTER. Quite so. The Hudson Bay Company paid actual costs and charges, and these men did whatever work they could.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The Hudson Bay Company were not paid for that.

Mr. FOSTER. They were not paid, so far as actual costs and charges were concerned, but they were paid their bonus of 20 per cent, amounting to $21,293; and I say they earned their bonus much more easily for having the 200 able-bodied men whom they simply took over.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Suppose the men had not been there. Assuming the hon. gentleman's argument to be sound, and that it cost the Hudson Bay Company double, the country would have had to pay $41,000 commission, instead of $21,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not pressing that part of the argument very strongly; but I am saying that it was an advantage to the Hudson Bay Company to have 200 men, all able-bodied, drilled and disciplined, to help to do that work. While it kept the actual costs and charges down, it at the same time enabled them to earn their bonus much more easily and with much less trouble than if they had had to go to the expense of getting men. Now, they took the freight over 150 miles, and they did it in what time? About the 1st of June they took the stuff in charge, and by the 1st of July they had got the first batch of 60 over. Then they took over the second batch—140 men. That would take them about the same time, or it might take them a little longer. Anyway the first batch went over in thirty days or about that, and the second batch took twice as long, or sixty days. There were ninety days of work, and for that ninety days of work the Hudson Bay Company was paid every cent of the cost and charges, and then given a bonus of $21,293. That does not look to me like good business management. It is a tremendous profit to give over and above every cent of the cost and charges. $20,000 for two or two and a half months' work. I do not think that it shows good management either that my hon. friend paid on about $50,000 worth of goods, $257,000 for transport alone from Vancouver, a part of it around by Wrangel and a part of it through from Glenora or Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake and so down by water carriage. It is a tremendous amount to pay. My hon. friend was let in. When he had competition, when he had freight carriers, and when he had the making of a contract with these men, he was not careful to make it a condition of this large order that he was to pay $250 per ton and $300 per ton, per ton weight and not ton measurement. He left that option open, so that they exercised their option, and instead of his paying for ton by weight, he paid for the tonnage at the rate of $250 and $300 per ton, according as it was Dawson or Selkirk, under measurement, which was between two and three times as much as it would have been by weight. He had offers to take this freight Dawson per weight ton and not measurement ton for $275. The offer was made to Mr. Peters by a reputable and worthy firm on the coast, who would have been glad to have got the contract, because it was a large order. But instead of that the hon. gentleman pays that much per ton measurement, which is twice as many tons as per weight measurement. All these things put together show an amount of extravagant mismanagement for which the country has to pay most roundly. The hon. Minister says this item might be allowed to go through because the bill has been paid. I suppose nearly all the bills have been paid. How much of that $250,000 which he is asking does he still owe?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. About $50,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Probably not as much as that when you come to shave it down close. Where did the hon. gentleman find the money to pay the $200,000?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Governor General's warrant.

Mr. FOSTER. How did he first propose to pay it?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. In our Estimates for the current year, we estimated $75,000 to pay the goods which went up via the Yukon, and about $50,000 to pay for those that went across via Teslin, and we expected to have had under the ordinary vote for the permanent force, a considerable amount of money which we have not used, and which remains still unused. But the Auditor General objected to our using it. He called our attention to the fact that if we wanted money, we must get it in some other way.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend had a vote for the payment of the permanent force. These 200 men belonged to the permanent force. It was not the most violent stretch that has been made in Cabinet appropriations to say that if you have a vote for the permanent force, you might use a portion of the money to pay a portion of the permanent force in the Yukon, and you tried to divert that vote. Parliament did not suppose you were going to do that when you asked for that vote for the permanent militia, and the Auditor General said: No, these appropriations mean what they say and you will not be allowed to do it. There is a certain method by which you can get money; you can get a Governor General's warrant. That is a fact well worth being kept in mind. The Auditor General found out from the Minister, who was frank enough to tell him, that he wanted to use a certain amount of money for that purpose. Being forewarned, he said: No, you cannot take it from that vote. Did other Minister's divert votes without the Auditor General knowing anything about it? There is positive truth that in the Auditor General's opinion, these votes mean what they say, and you ought not to divert them even to matters intimately connected, such as, for instance, the payment of a part of the permanent force, not employed in that capacity, but for another purpose.

What does the hon. Minister propose to do with reference to the freight charges? Does he propose to say to Mr. Bate: These must be refunded. We want an answer to that, and then we will talk about this item going through, with the privilege, of course, of discussing some points of it when we come to another vote. The Minister knows the terms of the contract. He told the House in good faith what it was. I think he cannot do less than demand that the money should be refunded.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I will to-morrow morning inquire into the whole matter and see exactly what the situation is. As the hon. gentleman is good enough to say, I certainly made my statement here in good faith last year, and I have my own recollection of what took place. But I cannot make any further promise than that I shall see the letter of the contract entered into with Mr. Bate carried out.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. Did you have a written contract?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am not sure that we have—correspondence, I suppose.

Mr. EARLE. Can we not take the statement of the hon. Minister, given on the floor, at a time when these things were fresh, as a correct statement of the contract?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will make a statement to the House at the very earliest moment on Monday or Tuesday, of everything connected with the matter. I cannot promise any more than that to-night.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Where did the hon. gentleman receive the flour in Messrs. Bate's bill, was it in the city of Ottawa?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No, delivered in Vancouver.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Was there none of the $2,051 of freight charged paid on that flour?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman now. I have promised a full statement on Monday.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The flour is the heaviest article in the whole bill, and if we find $2,051 charged on the rest of the goods, it will be found to be a very great charge.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I will get the hon. gentleman all the prices. Let it stand until Monday.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think it would be hardly fair to ask the Minister of Militia to make any statement which would imply a reflection upon Messrs Bate & Sons without giving him an opportunity of seeing them. They are a respectable firm in this city, and no one would want to assume that there was any intentional overcharge on their part. I do not think he should be called upon to make an engagement to demand a refund on the ground of overcharge without asking for an explanation. There is an apparent discrepancy, it is true, between the Minister's statement and the account, and the Minister said that he would see the contractors and get an explanation. The firm is one of high standing, and I am bound to assume, until they have had an opportunity to explain the matter, that they have an explanation which will be forthcoming in due course.

Mr. FOSTER. There is evidently a misunderstanding here. The Minister understood and now understands that freight was to be paid by Messrs. Bate and Sons. I have not a word to say against the firm of Bate and Sons. Of course everybody knows them to be a respectable firm. If they made this charge, it was contrary to what the Minister thinks was the agreement. I do not think it is unreasonable for the Minister to say: I will see Messrs. Bate & Sons, and we will talk the matter over. If the agreement is such as I thought it to be, I will ask the firm to refund that freight.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have said that already.

Mr. FOSTER. That being so, I do not think we can do other than adopt the suggestion of the Minister of Finance. But I do think this packing business, and so on should not be allowed. I wish the hon. Minister would get an explanation of that at the same time.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I will get that at the same time. Messrs. Bate & Sons are a firm that cannot afford to have accusations of this kind brought before them without an explanation. I am sure they will want to take the earliest opportunity of placing an explanation of these items in my hands.

Mr. EARLE. I am content to let the item go through and discuss the subject when some other item comes up. Of course, I cannot afford, as you can understand, as a representative of a Pacific coast town to allow these matters to pass without criticism. It is only a matter of fairness to our traders. It did seem extraordinary to me that Messrs. Bate & Sons should wilfully do a thing of that sort. They could not afford to do it. But the figures are there, and an explanation is naturally called for. Can the Minister give us a statement of the amount of freight that went by the Yukon?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not think the hon. gentleman was in when I stated there was 500 tons by measurement and 300 by weight.

Mr. EARLE. Was it to be delivered at Dawson? I presume it has all been delivered—250 tons at Fort Selkirk and 250 tons at Dawson, of which 50 tons are for the North-west Mounted Police. Did the Boston and Alaska Transportation Company deliver that freight?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It was delivered in their vessels. But they got into difficulties going up the river and Commissioner Ogilvie really had to make arrangements to have the vessels taken charge of and the goods delivered. He paid the bills, and we paid him. So far as the Boston and Alaska Company are concerned, we have made no settlement with it, absolutely; we have not paid them a dollar nor do we intend to do so until the goods are all delivered according to contract. That is, so far as they can be delivered according to contract; for the time limit was 31st August. When that time limit expired, we gave them notice that we were not held. We propose to give them what they are fairly entitled to, after deducting every charge that can fairly be made against the company.

Mr. FOSTER. Where did you take hold of that freight?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Below Dawson.

Mr. EARLE. Can you tell how much these goods have cost you delivered at these points?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. They cost $300 at Selkirk; $250 at Dawson.

Mr. EARLE. Measurement tons?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. McDougall. When the Minister brings the information, I would like to ask him to be kind enough to bring information with regard to the price charged for oats?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I tell the hon. gentleman that, now that my attention has been called to this matter, I will get information with regard to every item in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. FOSTER. The main part of the information is yet to come. We would like a short statement from the Minister as to what these troops have been doing and where they have been stationed during the current year. I do not want to go into the whole matter of policy under this vote. We will take that under the main vote. I just want to know what they have been doing during the present year.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. At first they were all stationed at Selkirk. That was in the last of September. Barracks were constructed there. Shortly after that and before the close of navigation Commissioner Ogilvie made a requisition for fifty men to go to Dawson and assist the Mounted Police. The detachment now at Dawson consists of two officers and seventy non-commissioned officers and men. The duty of the force there, as that of all military forces, is rather one of reserve power in case of necessity. These men, it seems, have been actively engaged in certain duties. The men at Fort Selkirk have been a reserve force ready to act in case they were required in any part of the Yukon district.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman tell me what has been the total cost of these men, taking transport, supplies and everything, for the current year?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. It is very difficult, as my hon.

friend will see, to give an estimate, because in this very heavy expenditure for carrying freight is included the cost of provisions for about two years; so it is not fair to charge it all to the present year. But the actual expenditure for the present year has been $350,000. We expended $100,000 in the previous year.

Mr. FOSTER. Which really belongs to this year.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There were two months, of course, of the pay, allowances, clothing and all that and we have on hand food for a large part of next year. Probably, fully two years' food and clothing were provided at the time the force left here in April, 1898.

Mr. FOSTER. Can you tell us exactly what is the cost per day of the force?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The pay is $95,000 per year, and the rest is about $60,000.

Mr. FOSTER. That report my hon. friend read, is that the only report in his department?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No, there are other reports, but none yet published.

Mr. FOSTER. Do not you have regular reports coming from your commanding officer detailing everything that these men are doing?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes, and they will appear in the next annual report of the militia. There are some very interesting reports, among them a valuable report as to the progress of the force over the route from Glenora to Teslin. I have here a map of the district made by a graduate of the Royal Military College.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like the Minister to bring down to the House as soon as possible what will give the House a fair idea of the work of those soldiers during the year. It would be interesting to know how they got in there, but that will come out in the general report. I want to get at the usefulness of the force, and what they are doing from day to-day.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have a detailed report for several months. I would be glad to furnish that.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like the Minister to revise the figures so as to have them accurate, with reference to the total cost of getting in there. Of course, he has got the approximate cost.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I will endeavour to produce what the hon. gentleman requires.

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

Mr. FOSTER. We should have that a little while before the main vote comes on. With that information before us it would facilitate the vote.

Post Office—

Amount required for this service, including special allowance to railway mail clerk, A. C. James, now on special duty in the Yukon district, making his salary equal to $2,000 a year since October 1st, 1898 $103,900 90

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I move to reduce that item to $28,900. The vote estimated for the Mounted Police includes this item, and it is not necessary to take it in two departments. The cost will be apportioned as a matter of book-keeping between the two departments. The Mounted Police will be paid out of the vote, and then the officers will apportion the cost between the two departments. We deduct $75,000, which is in the estimate of the Mounted Police.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not my hon. friend think that that $75,000 should be voted here, and should be dropped from the Mounted Police, when we come on to concurrence? There is no other way of doing it. The appropriation is made here, and if the appropriation is made here for Mounted Police, it is impossible for you to transfer it in your books. It cannot appear in the accounts. It is an appropriation for Mounted Police, and what you want is an appropriation for mail service. If $75,000 is your calculation of what the Post Office Department will require to pay for this mail service there, that $75,000 should be voted for mail service and never should have been put under Mounted Police in the first place. In doing it that way you will have a parliamentary appropriation, and you have a basis for your accounts. Is there any reason why it should not be done in that way?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is no reason, except that it is not necessary to vote it twice, and at present the scheme my hon. friend suggests is an impracticable one. Nobody can tell precisely until the end of the fiscal year, until all the accounts are brought in, how much of the cost of the police service is properly chargeable to one department and how much to the other department. When we come to the item of the Mounted Police, if it is necessary to earmark it by making the very proper provision and safeguard that we should attach to these votes that a portion is to go to the mail service, it is quite easy to get over the difficulty that my hon. friend has mentioned by indicating in connection with that vote: "including the cost of mail service, and to be apportioned," or some such words as these. There is a larger vote for Mounted Police, and it includes the two services. J quite recognize the force of the hon. gentleman's observation that there should be something in connection with every vote of money indicating the service to which it belongs, but that point can be easily provided for when we come to the other item, the item of the Mounted Police, which includes this service and the other service. I will have no objection to having some words inserted which will get over my hon. friend's objection, an objection which perhaps has force in it.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to that; I think it is reasonable. Of course, that item is passed, but I imagine after the statement that has been made by the hon. Postmaster General, that on concurrence it will be possible to indicate in this vote that it is to include the cost of postal service to be apportioned and charged ultimately to the Post Office Department. I quite acknowledge that it is rather difficult to apportion the cost until you get all the accounts in. I suppose you really have them pretty well in now.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, I asked Col. White. If I could have got the information, I would have given it.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be that it will require some time for adjustment. I think, either now or before the item for the Mounted Police is concurred in, that we should have a general statement from one of the Ministers as to the principle upon which they propose to make this apportionment. If the hon. Postmaster General will be prepared upon concurrence on the item that these words should be put in to indicate to the House, then the House knows something of what it is doing, and the Auditor General has an indication of what Parliament meant.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have asked Col. White, but he could not give me anything sufficiently definite; but if it is possible to be anything sufficiently definite before we reach that stage of the Estimates, I will see that my hon. friend has that information.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to know the principle upon which the distribution shall be made in the Yukon. Will the hon. gentleman give us an explanation of that $28,000 vote?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We have organized a post office at Dawson City, where there are a postmaster and about ten clerks. The postmaster is paid at the rate of $3,200 a year. He did not enter upon his duties until about three months after the beginning of the fiscal year, so that this includes about three-quarters of the year's salary as postmaster of Dawson City.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the postmaster?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Hartman.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is he?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He at one time lived in York County. When he was appointed to the position, he was, I think, residing in Guelph. He is the son of a former member of Parliament, Joseph Hartman, who before confederation represented the riding that I have now the honour to represent.

Mr. FOSTER. He was not in the service previously?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He was never in this service, but he had been a postmaster. In his early life he was afflicted with pulmonary troubles, and he went to Colorado, where he became a postmaster in a mining district. He grew out of his weakness, returned to his native land and engaged in business. In seeking for a man of capacity and experience, I selected Mr. Hartman, and I am told that he is giving general satisfaction.

Mr. FOSTER. When was this post office instituted?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Under him?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think he was appointed in September.

Mr. FOSTER. What charge had the hon. gentleman himself of postal matters in Dawson up to the time that Mr. Hartman went there?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Of course, I am the responsible head of the department. We placed the matter in the hands of the police, and I gave Major Walsh whatever authority I could give him. His position was that of a sort of Governor. I treated him as a sort of inspector in that remote district, when he went up there in the fall of 1897, giving him general authority.

Mr. FOSTER. He could not issue postage stamps?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, but I wanted some person with authority there in charge of the Mounted Police, and I authorized him, in writing, to take charge of the mail service in Dawson City. There are ten clerks, who in salary or living allowance cost about $135 a month.

Mr. FOSTER. They are not paid equally?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is about what it costs. I think they are pretty nearly equally paid.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman give them salary and allowance?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We have to pay about $75 a month board. The board is more than the salary. Each one gets about $60 salary and board, which comes to $135 a month for each man. Mr. Hartman's salary for ten months is $2,934. The ten clerks have been on duty about the whole time. Their account amounts to $16,400. There are also sundry expenses that will amount to $750. Then, we have an officer stationed at Bennett, who receives the mails for distribution and forces them on their way north and easterly to Dawson and Atlin.

Mr. FOSTER. A sort of travelling postmaster.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, he is stationary at Bennett. I took a Mr. James an experienced mail clerk, a very energetic and capable man from Winnipeg, and sent him to Skagway. Of course, it is hardly necessary to remind hon. gentlemen that the post office at Skagway is on territory at present in the possession of the United States. At first, we had to receive our mails at Dyea, which was the exchange office established by the United States. Subsequently Skagway was established as the exchange office instead. It is not for me to say, but it was said, that the United States postmaster there was not as keen in forwarding the mails when they arrived, and sending them to the interior of the Canadian Yukon as we could have desired. I appointed Mr. James to go to Skagway, and the American Government appointed an officer in their behalf to go to Skagway. These two officers are at Skagway now. They have been there since last year, and when the mails come in, some for Alaska and some for the Canadian Yukon, these two officers receive them from the postmaster at Skagway and send them on, Mr. James forwarding those for the Canadian Yukon.

In that way Mr. James gets possession of them, and pushes them on to their destination. They used to be packed across the White Pass, but now, I think, they go to the summit by rail, and if the line is not completed down to Bennett, of course they have to be packed there. At Bennett our officer delivers them to the couriers for Dawson and also for Atlin. He attends to the local business, and has also supervision of the forwarding. Mr. James is a mail clerk in the civil service, and it is necessary to have this special provision in the vote, or otherwise he could only be paid the statutory salary, which is $960. He was a first-class mail clerk with a good run in Manitoba, and made altogether about $1,500 a year.

Mr. FOSTER. What do you give him now?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Upon the recommendation of the controller I selected him as a man of special fitness, having a good constitution, about 35 years old. He is a level-headed man, and I told him I would have his office worth to him $2,000 above his expenses. Of course, he does not give up his railway mail clerkship, as he has the option of coming back if he wishes. He is at Skagway.

Mr. EARLE. You stated he was a very robust man, which led me to think he would have to travel up and down the Yukon.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He is constantly going over the mountain and he showed a great deal of endurance and courage last winter. He was with a party of five, three of whom lost their lives, and he and another only escaped. He is constantly going to Bennett to keep the service moving.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the postmaster at Bennett?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Kane.

Mr. EARLE. From North York?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He was at Rat Portage, originally from North York.

Mr. EARLE. With regard to the despatch of mails from Victoria to Vancouver, do they go by the steamers that leave our coast, or do they go to Seattle as they did some time ago?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have a contract with Captain Irvine, I think it is, or the Canadian Pacific Navigation Company, to carry the mails between Vancouver and Victoria. We have a contract also with Captain Irvine, or the same company, for the carriage of the mails, between Vancouver and Skagway once a week, I think. We pay them so much a pound for letters and so much for newspapers, and so on.

Mr. EARLE. You do not pay by measurement?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We pay so much a pound, as is done by the United States, and most European countries, although, hitherto, it has not been done by Canada.

Mr. McDOUGALL. How long has that contract been in force?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It began on the 1st of June or some time this spring.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is there any delivery of mail except in Dawson City in that district?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I instructed the postmaster at Dawson to establish post offices at centres where there were communities.

Mr. EARLE. On the other creeks?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He has instructions to do that so as to save the people the necessity of coming into Dawson. I have no doubt when I get his report it will show he has striven to develop the service in that way.

Mr. EARLE. He cannot do that without money; have you provided any for him? It is a matter of great importance that the miners in these districts should have a mail service, and it should be given to them promptly.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I agree with you.

Mr. EARLE. There are some 7,000 or 8,000 people in Atlin now. Has any post office been established there?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, we started sending mails once a week from Bennett to Dawson, shortly after the new year, and we made a contract with Captain Irvine for a mail service between Bennett and Atlin, semi-weekly, during navigation.

Mr. FOSTER. What about the balance of the items?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The total salary of the postmaster at Bennett is $1,750, and there is $875 in this vote for the balance of this year.

Mr. FOSTER. Does he get any allowance besides?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No. We suppose the salary to be $1,000, and the $750 is given to him to pay his board, which we think is more satisfactory than supplying him with rations. There is $2,040, which is the proportion of the salary for Mr. James, and living expenses at $60 a month for nine months. There is an item of $1,000 for his travelling expenses, for which he will have to put in his account, and he also has to pay the packers for the transport of mail over to Bennett.

Mr. EARLE. That is exactly my idea about your officer at Dawson. He ought to be provided with a fund.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will make my hon. friend's mind easy on that point. The cost of the services from the beginning of navigation up to the 30th of June between Bennett and Dawson and between Bennett and Atlin is estimated to be somewhere in the vicinity of $2,937.50. We have a contract with Capt. Irving. I put the services up at so much per round trip and so much for the season, and the contract was awarded to Capt. Irving. The rate per round trip between Bennett and Dawson is $300, and between Bennett and Atlin $50.

Mr. EARLE. Are these weekly?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The Dawson service is weekly; I think the Atlin service is semi-weekly. Then there is an intermediate point between Bennett and Dawson, where it was thought there might be some settlement. It is a little off the route, and the contract contains a provision that we may, at our option, require the contractor to provide a special service at that point for $50 per trip; but we have not had occasion to exercise that option. That is by water. There is another item, which makes up the total to $28,963.50. With reference to my hon. friend's inquiry whether there is any fund yet provided to enable the postmaster at Dawson to establish these extra services, I think that can be accomplished in this way. We do not know anything about that at the present time. The services will be more or less expensive, I am afraid. Still, they have to be established, and we have the general post office vote, which is not limited to any particular service, and which will be quite sufficient to carry us through till Parliament meets. If there is any surplus in it, we shall not have to ask Parliament for any special vote for the Yukon. In the meantime, it will place the department in funds for the Yukon service; and all that would be necessary would be to include in the supplementary Estimates next session any shortage to meet the year's services, in consequence of having unexpected expenditure in connection with the services in the Dawson district.

Mr. EARLE. I drew the hon. gentleman's attention to the matter so that it would not be overlooked, more than for anything else.

Yukon Provisional District—

Amount required to cover expenditure by the Department of the Interior. (The sums paid from this amount are to be charged to the several services for which the expenditure was made.) $150,000

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. This appropriation is for the purpose of covering the cost of a Governor General's warrant that was issued on the 6th of February, 1899. The facts which led to the issue of the warrant are somewhat as follows. The House will understand, from discussions which have already taken place, that during the last session of Parliament we were practically without any information which would enable us to form a detailed estimate of the requirements of the Yukon district. Major Walsh only arrived in Dawson on, I think, the 20th of June, and the House adjourned about that time. I had an estimate of $50,000 for the requirements of the Department of the Interior. The Post Office Department had, I think, no special appropriation; the Public Works Department had no appropriation except $15,000 for work upon the rivers; and no appropriation was made for buildings of any kind except in the general vote for the Mounted Police. Our officials were absolutely unable to form anything like an accurate idea of the expenditure that would take place. In the case of every department the expenditure was very much underestimated. The Militia Department underestimated their expenditure by $250,000, for which a special warrant was subsequently issued. The Mounted Police expenditure was very much underestimated, although that department was in a better position than any other to make an accurate estimate. In the Department of the Interior we found ourselves in very much the same position. We had practically no definite information until a short time before Major Walsh returned, and then we had already despatched Mr. Ogilvie to the district. He left, I think, on the 4th of August, taking with him a letter of credit for $10,000. When he reached Dawson, he found that the $10,000 was only a drop in the bucket compared with what was required; and Major Walsh was compelled to disburse considerable sums of money which he got from the revenues.

Mr. FOSTER. Where did the officers keep those revenues?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Up to the time the Bank of Commerce established an office in Dawson City, the officers had to keep the money in their own custody.

Mr. FOSTER. Was it kept by the Mounted Police?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No. The Gold Commissioner, I believe, kept the money himself until a robbery took place, and after that I believe it was placed in charge of the Mounted Police. I am not speaking with any great degree of positiveness with regard to that. The larger portion of the money was collected at other points outside Dawson City by the officers of the Mounted Police in connection with the customs officers, and the money was under the custody of the Mounted Police. I think, at Dawson City it was kept by the collector of customs himself and the Gold Commissioner. Mr. Ogilvie went up with a letter of credit for $10,000, but he found that was quite inadequate for even immediate requirements, and he took the responsibility of securing a credit from the Bank of Commerce there, which he checked upon for immediate expenditure, and advised the department as quickly as he could.

Mr. FOSTER. He created his own credit.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The bank advanced the money, believing the Government would endorse Mr. Ogilvie's action. If the Government had refused to endorse it, the bank would, of course, have had recourse only against Mr. Ogilvie.

Mr. FOSTER. You did give him a letter of credit here?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, for $10,000, but that was not sufficient. He told the bank that he was out of money and the necessities were urgent, and the bank advanced the money, trusting that the Government would ratify what Mr. Ogilvie did. Mr. Ogilvie got up there about the middle of September. There was a space of time during which there was no mail communication, which accounted for delay in getting advice from him, but we got the advice in the latter part of January, and on the 6th February we took a Governor General's warrant for $150,000, and we did it upon the following estimate: The commissioner advised us that he had issued cheques to the amount of $39,094.67. It was thought then that Parliament would be sitting in May, and that if there was not sufficient money to carry on the service, we could then come to Parliament and ask for an emergency vote. Our estimate was based on the requirements of the service until the 31st May. We estimated for fuel and light $31,510.50; for post office requirements, $10,000; for general administration of the Department of the Interior, which embraced all the salaries and whatever other expenses there were in connection with the officers of the department, $70,000.

Mr. FOSTER. You do not include the customs officials.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No, no drafts were made upon our department for them. This estimate was made upon the best information we could obtain at that time, in the belief that that amount would be required on or before the 1st May. I will now give the expenditure up to the 1st March at the head office and at Dawson, so that the committee will see what the operations of the year have been. The expenditure at Dawson, from the time Mr. Ogilvie got up there, prior to the 1st October, was $21,101.28.

In October	$14,974 04
November	17,019 35
December	19,102 31
January	10,388 33
February	13,703 66
March	16,266 54

At the head office, up to the end of March, the expenditure was $29,818.41. The hon. gentleman will see that that makes a total of $142,373.92. We have since been refunded $5,850 by the North-west Mounted Police, and $1,504.50, travelling expenses of officials, will be accounted for on their return—altogether $7,354.50. So that the expenses of the Department of the Interior at Dawson City since Mr. Ogilvie arrived there, and at the head office since the 1st July of this fiscal year, has been $135,019.42. We have the $150,000 for which we took the Governor General's warrant, and the $50,000 appropriation, which we took last year, which will furnish sufficient to meet the requirements of the Minister of the Interior. The expenditure did not turn out to be as large during the latter portion of the year as anticipated, when the Governor General's warrant was made out, so that we have sufficient to meet the requirements of the year.

Mr. FOSTER. Take one month and just give us a sample of the expenses.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have a statement which perhaps I had better read, as I thought the committee would like to know, in a general way, what the expenses are like and what the money was being paid out for. The $39,094.67, which is the first item in the amounts that make up our estimate, is made up in this way. It is made up of the first three items in the monthly expenditure which are given. The committee will remember that the first item in the expenditure was $21,101.28, the next $14,974.04, and the next $17,019.35. Those being added together, and the $10,000 which Mr. Ogilvie had in the shape of a letter of credit, being subtracted as well as the $4,000 which was refunded by the Mounted Police, makes the balance $39,094.67. I have the items of three months' expenditure, and I might as well give them :

Mr. FOSTER. A thousand dollars a month for rent ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes. When Mr. Ogilvie went up there, of course the question of the position of the post office had been a matter of common discussion. I need not say much about it, but the position of the post office was very bad. I told Mr. Ogilvie when he went there that in case immediate action was necessary he would have to take the responsibility of doing what was necessary to relieve the pressure. He found no possibility of dealing with the post office satisfactorily, except by renting this building, and he had to pay $1,000 a month for it.

The total of these items is $53,094.67. From this we take $10,000, the amount of Mr. Ogilvie's letter of credit, and $4,000 refunded by the Mounted Police, leaving a balance of $39,094.67, which is the first item of our estimate of $150,000. Our estimate for building, fuel, &c., was $31,210.50, made up as follows:—

Estimate—Building, rent, fuel, &c.

Fuel	$15,000 00

We have expended at the head office here on account of the Yukon government in various ways a considerable sum. Our largest expenditure is for salaries. Men from the east have been appointed whose salaries are paid to their families here through permanent orders left in the department. There are expenses of fittings and small matters of equipment, and so on, to be paid. I will give the committee these tables, showing expenditure in the Yukon territory:

Expenditure at Head Office, 1st July, 1898, to 30th Nov., 1898 (5 months.)

Less—Refunds by other departments and refund on advances for travelling expenses.....	7,354 50
	$135,019 42

I have a statement here which may be of interest, in which the various classes of expenditure are taken out of the itemized statements and classified. This total expenditure, which I have said is up to the 31st of March, $135,019.42, after taking out $7,354.50, which was refunds, is classified as follows:—

Salaries	$45,555 55
Travelling expenses, outfits, &c.....	21,052 93
Buildings, rent, &c. (Public Works Department)	28,710 73
Rent and salaries, &c., post office....	21,069 90

Printing and stationery.....	4,514 01
Packing, provisions, express, &c.. ..	4,880 20

That item for travelling expenses is very large, but there is no necessity, I should judge, for the item being so large in future. The passage of officials in and out has cost more than it will in future, I think. Of course, that includes the expenditure of Mr. Ogilvie's party going in, and of the Gold Commissioner and other officers.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I propose to the Minister of Finance that, having had this statement read, and it will go upon the "Hansard," as it is impossible to see what it is until we see it in print, we will let the item go with the idea that on concurrence we have the same privilege of discussion as in committee.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Very well.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Perhaps it would be only fair that I should give a short statement in detail of the next item so that it may go on "Hansard."

Mr. POWELL. I would like to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that we are rather antiquated in the matter of postal accommodation, while these big expenditures are made in the west. I think it would add greatly to the convenience of the members if we had boxes in our post office here, so that after six o'clock on Sunday evening, or at other times and on holidays, when the officials are not in, the members could obtain their mail. If we happen to be late coming to the office on Saturday night we cannot get our mail until Monday morning. I do not think it would add much to the expenditure of the Post Office Department, or add much to the contingencies of the House, if the matter comes immediately under the jurisdiction of the Speaker.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I fancy that an improvement of that kind would have to be directed by a committee of the House, but I shall have pleasure in bringing it to the attention of the Premier. I agree with my hon. friend that it seems to be a very reasonable suggestion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That seems to belong to the Internal Economy Committee.

Sum required to recoup the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the amount of customs revenue, $106,976.37, and of Dominion Lands, revenue, $93,427.48, used without legal authority by the officials charged with the administration of the Government of the Yukon provisional district in carrying on the different services under their control, viz.:

North-west Mounted Police.....	$144,077 19
Public Works	15,836 90
Customs	15,565 32
Government of the Yukon provisional district	24,924 44
	$200,403 85

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The total sum of $200,403.85 was spent out of revenue, of which $106,976.37 was customs revenue, and $93,427.48 out of Dominion lands revenue. Dominion lands revenue technically includes mining fees and things of that kind. They are made up by the items that I referred to here in the resolution. The committee will remember that the other evening, when we were passing the Mounted Police estimates, I mentioned that a great deal of that item of $144,077.19 was handed over to the Mounted Police at various places, or rather was collected by them and charged to the customs. But there was that much spent by the Mounted Police out of the revenue that came into their hands directly and indirectly. I do not wish to confuse the account, but I wish to say in connection with that item of $144,077.19, which was included in the total statement which I gave the other evening, respecting the expenditure of the Mounted Police in the Yukon district, that $35,675.39 of it was expended by Major Walsh at Dawson. The items thereof are as follows:—

W. R. Rourke, work on warehouse.	$ 3,000 00
Capt. Starnes, disbursements for July, 1896	6,845 80
W. R. Rourke—
Acc. building warehouse	6,000 00
Acc. work on barracks	10,000 00
D. G. Stewart, wood, N.W.M.P.....	1,000 00
C. G. Caldwell, packing, Dawson to Mc-Questin River	1,500 00
Capt. Starnes, disbursements for Aug., 1898	7,329 59
	$35,675 39

I want to make myself clear concerning this part of the $144,077.19, so as not to create any confusion. I have the special items of that expenditure made at Dawson City, and I give them to the committee. I have the special items for the expenditure which was made at Dawson City, and I thought it would be worth while to give that to the committee. It was a Mounted Police expenditure, but the expenditure was more or less of a special character, and, therefore, I have called special attention to it. The next item in the resolution is for public works, amounting to $15,836.90. It is made up as follows:

Arctic Saw-mill Co., lumber for Government buildings	$3,000 00
W. R. Rourke, acc. contract	1,500 00
A. J. Prudhomme, building addition to Gold Commissioner's house and office fixtures	4,882 00

Geise & Apple—
Stove-pipes and weights for same....	20 50
Work, Gold Commissioner's house..	48 50
W. R. Rourke—
Work on house for Government officials	2,500 00
Extras on Government building.....	725 00
Fitting-up house, &c.....	230 00
M. Watson, stove-pipes	31 50
Hart & Cotes, furniture	95 00
Louis Coste, acc. travelling expenses..	2,500 00
	$15,836 90

The next item is $15,565.32, which was paid out for the Customs Department, as shown by the resolution. The items of expenditure on account of the Customs Department are as follows:—

Dawson	$5,250 00
Tagiah	3,536 94
Chilcoot Pass	3,257 73
White Pass	3,225 35
Atlin	195 30
	Total
	$15,565 32

This amount was retained by the collector, Mr. Davis, to meet the contingencies at his post. The Customs Department have not furnished me with the details of that expenditure of $5,000, but I have no doubt that the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) will furnish the items.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Mr. Davis, the collector, retained the amount, largely to pay rent.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The assistant inspector, Mr. McMartin, retained the sum of $250 to meet his living expenses. At Tagish the expenditure was $3,563.94, made up as follows:—

(Mr. Davy was an officer at Victoria, salary, $650, and this differential brought the salary up to $100 per month.)

$76,436 73

These are officers of the Government. That gives the total of the details, as far as I am able to furnish them.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. Minister gave us that first item of the North-west Mounted Police, $35,000, as expended by Major Walsh, but no statement as to show how the remainder was expended.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I gave the explanation of the whole of it. That was included in the $144,077.19 of which I gave an explanation, but I called attention to this special amount expended by Major Walsh in Dawson City because it was expended for special things which I thought might be of interest.

Mr. FOSTER. We might just put that wording in, but I think it would be better to put it in the general police vote that we took the other night.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Perhaps we can go back to the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose it is understood that on concurrence we have the same liberty as in committee on these items.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you include the revenue for mines under Dominion lands?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It apparently has always been done.

Mr. FOSTER. You are getting a large proportion of your revenue now from mines and it is very important to keep our mining statistics, as far as possible, distinct.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That might be done next year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We might have the same general heading, but divide the mining and lands branch.

Mr. FOSTER. It is very important that should be done. As to this amount of $200,403, that is revenue which never came out of the Yukon.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They were appropriated by various officers into whose hands they came for creditors, as stated. They never went into the Receiver General.

Mr. FOSTER. What authority had these officers for that? Was there any Order in Council?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No. I think I am safe in saying that no member of the Government knew it was done until after it was done.

Mr. FOSTER. It was done entirely without any authority?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. We will discuss that afterwards. They have no safes in that country.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They have now. Everything is in perfect order now so far as the financial part of the public service is concerned. We sent up light steel boxes as safes, and the Minister of Finance sent up experienced officers to have everything in first-class order. I might explain to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), with reference to one part of the revenue which was in the hands of Major Wood at Tagish. He had about $75,000 that he did not know what in the world to do with. His men were scattered and he became alarmed, and so he took four men and started down to Victoria with the money. He had a dreadful time of it. He was followed by a party of men who tried to rob him, and one of his pack mules fell from a precipice with $30,000 or $40,000, and when he got to Skagway bandits watched him all night, and made a desperate attempt to get possession of the money, and actually chased him in a small steamboat over to Skagway. This money was carried in bags and tied up with old stockings and rags and all that sort of thing, as that was the only way they had of conveying it down. A considerable portion of this vote was spent by Major Wood at Tagish for the transport of Mounted Police supplies. It is just a question whether Major Wood would carry his money down again to Victoria under the circumstances of the first time, then get it changed into other money and carry it back and spend it there. I do not minimize the importance of the absolute necessity, under all reasonable circumstances, of the law being complied with. But I desire the House to understand the very extraordinary and exceptional circumstances under which this took place. I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will discuss it later at length. As to the manner in which it took place in Dawson City during most of the time there was absolutely no means of getting communication in or out.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose since the banks have been established at Dawson, the officers there deposit under the same rules as here.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). What is the authority for this grant to an hospital?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It was a case of urgency, and there are English authorities for saying that expenditure of this sort can be justified under certain circumstances, relying on the good sense of the House to recognize the urgency.

Mr. CLANCY. You mean the generosity of the House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, I think the English rule says the good sense of Parliament. There are two or three items in the main Estimates which I should be glad to have adopted under the same reserve with regard to further discussion. I refer especially to the item for Mounted Police, which it will be necessary to pass, as we are at the end of the financial year.

Mr. FOSTER. Any other item?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The immigration item.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot consent to that, but I have no objection to take the Mounted Police item under reserve, and I do it with particular reference to the plea that was made shortly after three o'clock this afternoon.

The committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12 (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DOMINION BUILDINGS AND MUNICIPALITIES.

Mr. BERGERON (by Mr. Mills) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to indemnify every city or town in Canada, where there are Dominion public buildings, as they intend to do for the city of Ottawa, as per resolution before Parliament ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend who gave notice of this question is over-inquisitive and over-zealous. I am happy to inform him that no town or city has claimed the same privileges as are claimed by the city of Ottawa.

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY—SUPERANNUATIONS.

Mr. CLARKE (by Mr. McDougall) asked :

1. Have any employees, guards or other officers of the Kingston Penitentiary been recommended for superannuation since the 1st January, 1899 ?

2. If so, what is the name, age and length of service of each such employee, guard or officer ?

3. By whom were such recommendations made to the Government ?

4. Who selected the officer to make the recommendations regarding superannuation ?

5. Will all the recommendations as to superannuations be carried into effect by the Government, and if so, at what date ?

6. If the Government do not intend to carry out all the recommendations made as to superannuations, in what cases are the exceptions to be made, and for what reasons ?

7. Were the persons recommended for superannuation medically examined, and if so, by whom ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. None have been recommended for superannuation, but several have been retired with a gratuity on the ground of physical incapacity. 2. Michael Brennan, age 56 years, length of service 33 years six months. T. Conley, age 63 years, service 11 years 3 months. J. Evans, age 63 years, service 17 years 3 months. W. MAINTENANCE OF ROADWAYS ON GRENVILLE CANAL.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Mills) asked :

Has the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals received a letter from Mr. G. S. Conway, of which the following is said to be a copy :—

“ Hon. A. G. Blair, “ Minister of Railways and Canals, “ Ottawa.

“ Sir,—I would most respectfully beg to call your attention to the fact that the farmers' roadway on the south bank of the Grenville Canal is in a dangerous and impassable condition for traffic, being too rough and too narrow for the hauling of hay or grain, and would, owing to the loose stones and boulders on the surface, break mowing or reaping machines if driven over it.

“ The engineer, in widening the canal under the present contract, took away in many places all the roadway and allowed the excavations to be dumped on the bank of the canal on the only remaining ordnance lands, therefore leaving no road of any kind, completely blocking the farmers off their lands for the best part of two years, excepting the winter months, when we could cross on the ice.

“ The section of roadway which I now speak of is west of lock No. 5, on the south bank of the canal, and the walling and the waste weir is completed as far as can be seen ; there was, therefore, no reason why this part of the road should not have been graded down to a uniformity with the coping of the wall and the new bridge across the waste weir, and the road-bed made to a width of at least 17 feet for safety of teams and property.

“ This has not been done, the engineer having allowed the contractors to get up and level off the top of the dump, without any regard to uniformity as to grade or width of roadway, the road-bed varying in height above coping from 1 to 4 feet, and width of roadway from 16 down to 12 feet, at the highest points, so that two teams could not pass without empty hay racks, as you will see by diagram in margin.

“ The contractors have to all appearance abandoned the work, and when the superintendent, Mr. Simpson, was asked to put the road in shape for traffic he refused to have anything to do with it until the Government gave instructions. It cannot be possible that the Government have also abandoned the work, and left the farmers to furnish their own road on ordnance land under the control of the Department of Railways and Canals. Or is it possible that the farmers are to again this season lose the use of their lands for the want of a proper road which, for the past fifty years, has been kept in repair by the Government for the sole benefit of those farmers whose lands are crossed by this canal ?

“ The improvement now being made on this canal has been done in a scandalous manner from the first to the last, and has been a public nuisance to the farmers whose lands have to be reached by the canal bank.

“ You are aware that we have from time to time called your attention to the loss of our roadway, and the great damages we have been subjected to in consequence.

"We have appealed by petition to the Government for justice. We have time and again called the attention of the engineers in charge of this work to the fact that our road was destroyed, and we have appealed to the superintendent, Mr. Simpson, for a road, all to no effect.

"I don't want you to understand that I am the only farmer who is deprived of a road, or who is finding fault; all the rest, with the exception of Mr. Robinson, have been compelled to sign off their claims for road and damages, before they or their teams were allowed employment in the public improvements being made on this canal. Yet these same farmers want me now to press the Government for a road, because they are afraid to speak for themselves.

"It was about time we received justice at the hands of the Government. It is a roadway we now want, so we can begin our hay harvest, the damages can come later on.

"All of which we would beg to submit for your immediate consideration, as the harvest is on us.

"I have the honour to remain,

"Yours truly,

"(Sgd.) G. S. CONWAY.

"Stonefield, June 27th, 1899."

If so, what action does the Government intend to take to render relief to the farmers said to be aggrieved?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The communication referred to has been received by me, and is now under consideration.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS AND OTTAWA POST OFFICE—ILLUMINATION OF CLOCK DIALS.

Mr. DUGAS (by Mr. McDougall) asked:

1. What is the new system adopted by the Government in connection with the illuminated clock dial on the tower of the Parliament Buildings and on that of the Ottawa city post office?
2. Who is the inventor of that system?
3. To whom was the order given for installing the new light?
4. What will be the saving of light on Parliament Buildings and on city post office, and also the cost of same?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). 1. Before the system of lighting was changed, the lights were placed inside the dials, and now they are placed on the outside of the dials. 2. Dr. Gareau. 3. Dr. Gareau. 4. The saving on Parliament Buildings, twelve 50 c.p. lights, and on the city post office, two 16 c. p. lights. The cost of the same is $80 and $4 respectively.

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS TO OFFICE.

Mr. PRIOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to an item that appears in the Victoria "Daily Colonist," of the 22nd June last:

The Vancouver "World" says that Mr. Maxwell, M.P., will be appointed postmaster at Vancouver before the close of the present session. We greatly deprecate the filling of offices by members of the House of Commons. It is a practice that is wholly objectionable, because it is susceptible of being abused to an almost unlimited degree.

I would take this opportunity of asking the right hon. gentleman whether there is any truth in this report, whether the hon. member has been appointed, or is going to be appointed, or whether this is another case of an hon. gentleman sitting in this House with a commission in his pocket, and voting in his seat?

The PRIME MINISTER. I am happy to relieve the anxious sentiments of my hon. friend by telling him that he need have no fear that the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) has a commission in his pocket. There has been no suggestion at all of appointing my hon. friend to any office whatever. The House, I am sure, would be sorry to lose his services, and I hope that he will long continue to adorn the House by his presence.

BIRTHDAY OF SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

The PRIME MINISTER. While I am on my feet, I may be permitted to offer my congratulations to the leader of the Opposition on his eightieth birthday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Seventy-eighth.

The PRIME MINISTER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I hope he will see many more years, and that he will long continue to occupy the position which he now so ably fills.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may perhaps be permitted briefly to express my hearty thanks to my right hon. friend the leader of the Government for the very kind manner in which he has referred to the fact that I reached my seventy-eighth birthday yesterday. I cannot afford at this time of life to allow even the smallest possible addition to my age beyond the actual figure.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

The House proceeded to consider resolutions adopted in Committee of Supply.

The Department of Railways and Canals, including $2,200 for L. K. Jones, $1,800 to be paid to the law clerk, and $700 each for J. H. J. Gleason and S. Loftus, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act..... $41,000

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I propose to amend that item by inserting, after the word "Law Clerk," in the second line, the following words:—"Gerald E. Ruel, to be appointed first-class clerk at a maximum salary of $1,800."

Mr. FOSTER. Let us have the explanations.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I understand that the Auditor General is somewhat concerned lest there should be ambiguity in these items, and in order to avoid any question at all, these words have been added. It will be noticed that in the original item as proposed, the provision was for the appointment of a law clerk at a salary of $1,800. It appears now that the Civil Service Act requires that a statement should be added that he is appointed as a first-class clerk at the maximum salary in order that there may be no doubt as to his right to receive this salary.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the appointee?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Ruel.

Mr. FOSTER. Is he a clerk?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He has just entered upon the duties of the office.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that a new appointment?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is Mr. Ruel, and where is he from?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Ruel belonged to the city of St. John, and is a barrister of standing.

Mr. FOSTER. He has not been previously in the service?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Ocean and river service $39,624

Mr. FOSTER. I avail of this opportunity to call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) to a matter of some importance from a point of view not strictly of business. I read a very well written article in the "Century" magazine for July, in which the writer gives a description of bird life on Bird Rock, in the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The plea is on behalf of science, in part, and the statement is made that the bird life is being destroyed by wanton taking of the eggs and destruction of the birds, and that between now and, say, fifty or sixty years ago, there has been a very great decrease in the number of birds. Of course, my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) knows that the bird life there is very unique of its kind, and it seems to be a sort of breeding place for sea-birds, as the rookeries in the North Pacific Ocean are for seals. What is suggested is a close season so as to give the birds security for laying their eggs and nesting between certain periods. It is a food supply in one sense, but it is of greater interest in order to preserve the bird life of that great area in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. If the Minister would look into it, he might find it advisable to adopt some regulations to prevent the reckless taking of eggs and killing of the birds.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I thank the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) for calling my attention to the matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not take any exception to the item, but I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) to a communication which I received from a very able and intelligent sea captain, Mr. George W. Bunkler. He is the captain of one of those large four-masted schooners plying between the United States and the port of Louisbourg, and when I was there last summer he drew my attention to the great importance of having a fog horn, or a steam trumpet, or, perhaps better, an explosive signal at or near the vicinity of Guion's Island, ten miles to the westward of the port of Louisbourg. He says that point is very subject to fogs, and that it is very dangerous for vessels approaching Louisbourg, in consequence of the rocky approach and the impossibility of ascertaining exact bearings. If my hon. friend will allow me, I will send him the communication, and ask him to give it such attention as he thinks the case merits.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I should be very much obliged to the hon. gentleman.

Towards the construction of Upper Traverse permanent lighthouse, to replace lightship $20,000

Mr. FOSTER. Has that cribwork yet left Quebec?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think so. I cannot say positively. Colonel Anderson went there to be present at the sinking of it, and my deputy also went down. I am in hopes to have a telegram almost every hour.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman know that it has left Quebec?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not positively. I assume that it has. It was to have left on Saturday.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, my hon. friend will not need all of this $20,000.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We shall not spend it all if we do not need it.

Mr. FOSTER. Generally it is not supposed to be necessary to take a vote if you do not expect to spend it. Can my hon. friend tell me how much has been spent on the cribwork?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I cannot. Colonel Anderson said he desired to be present to have personal supervision over the floating of this cribwork, as he considered it very important.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish my hon. friend would get that information.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will make a note of it.

Victoria public building—Vault, fittings, furniture, post office box fronts, &c., work done $3,839 29

Mr. PRIOR. I would like to call the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mullock) to this vote. The old post office building at Victoria, so the House was informed by the hon. gentleman, is now being rented out for stores. It seems to me and to my colleague and to our constituents that it would be far better to have that building used for a mint. In the first place, I do not think it is quite the proper thing for the Government to enter into competition with owners of other buildings in the city of Victoria by renting out the Government property for stores or similar purposes. This property does not pay any municipal taxes, and the Government have to that extent an unfair advantage over the owners of adjoining stores. It seems to be the general impression of the people there that this building would have been a splendid building for a mint. As has been pointed out in this House by other gentlemen from British Columbia, a mint would be of the greatest importance there. Miners coming down from the Yukon who go to Seattle and sell their gold, would be tempted to stop at Victoria if they could have their gold melted down, and get the full price for it. It would be the means of largely increasing the trade on our Pacific coast instead of allowing it to go to American territory. I am not going to say much about the matter, because it is evident, from what has already been said in the House, that the Government are very much opposed to the establishment of a mint. At the same time, our constituents feel that it would be a far better use to make of that building than the use to which it is at present put by the Postmaster General.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I do not think the Post Office Department has to do with buildings of that sort. The buildings are under the control of the Department of Public Works, and I presume that upon the post office being moved from the old building to the new one, that department has put the old building to such use as seemed advisable. I do not know that we could leave Government buildings idle simply because renting them might bring them into competition with other buildings. Though I do not know what the law is on the subject, it would appear to me that when Government property is used for private purposes, it ought to be no more exempt from municipal taxes than it would be if owned by private citizens. I am aware that property vested in the Crown in Toronto and used by private citizens, is subject to taxation just as other property. As to whether the building would be better utilized for the purposes of a mint, I would refer my hon. friend to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. PRIOR. I forgot at the moment that the Minister of Public Works had given me an answer in regard to the building, and he stated that the Government did not pay any municipal taxes on it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The Crown may not pay taxes, but is not the tenant liable when he rents Crown property?

Mr. PRIOR. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think it right that the country should be allowed to keep property shut up, simply because, if rented, it might come into competition with other properties. If any one occupies the property and has stock there, he will certainly pay taxes on the stock.

Mr. PRIOR. Yes, that is right.

Mr. McMULLEN. The only thing that could be exempt would be the building itself.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. gentleman is too good a business man not to see that the Government can rent cheaper than a private holder of property.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The tenant becomes liable for taxes.

Public Buildings, Ottawa—
Gas and electric light, including road and bridges—additional amount required for 1898-99..... $7,000

Mr. FOSTER. I think the Finance Minister was to bring down the contract and some information with reference to the lighting of the buildings. I have not seen it as yet.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My impression was that the understanding was that when the corresponding items in the main Estimates came up, that information should be furnished; and I gave instructions accordingly. I have some of the information, but not in complete form. I shall be glad to bring it at that time.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will see that it does not do to bring the information just when the item is before us. I would ask him to bring it as soon as possible, so that we may be able to see it before the item comes up.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will do that.

To purchase wharf at Mount Stewart,
P.E.I. $3,500

Mr. FOSTER. Before this passes, I think the hon. Minister was to bring down the report of his engineer upon which this property was bought and the letters or correspondence that passed in connection with it. He showed me privately the original letters and asked if I thought it was necessary that copies should be brought down, because he did not wish to lose the original letter.

Post Office—

Amount required to increase the salary of Mr A. Bolduc, post office inspector, from $2,000 to $2,200 a year from 1st July, 1897, to 30th June, 1899, Mr. Bolduc having completed 10 years' service as inspector $400

Mr. PRIOR. May I ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) whether he has decided in regard to the payment of an extra $200 a year to the postmaster of Victoria, and also the same to the assistant postmaster?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have submitted the question to the Department of Justice, and will be governed by their opinion.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask what question the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has submitted?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will remember that when we were in Supply the other evening, my attention was called to the revenue of the post office at Victoria, and I then expressed the opinion in regard to inspectors and postmasters, that they were entitled to increase automatically. With regard to the inspectors, I think there can be no doubt about that point; but, on looking at the Civil Service Act, I find under the heading "Postmasters—increases in salary" there are some words at the bottom of the schedule—"as the Postmaster General may determine." I had not those words in mind when speaking generally about the two classes of officials, but rather the case of inspectors. I spoke that evening as though the Minister of Justice had advised upon the subject. The facts were that the Auditor General had, in connection with the case of the postmaster of London, intimated that to be his opinion, and it was considered as the law; but when it comes up to be determined as the law, I find there is no legal opinion of the Department of Justice, and I preferred to have one. I do not know whether the Auditor General had an opinion from the Department of Justice, but I preferred to get one on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) has no doubt that he has the power to make the increase, even though it be not obligatory.

Mr. FIELDING

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know that I have the power to make the increases. I think what I can do is to submit it to Council, and they would have to submit it to Parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. That is right.

Mr. PRIOR. Could the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) say whether the letter carriers are in the same category—whether their increase is mandatory or permissive?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It appears to me that the increase is only permissive, unless otherwise ordered. With regard to the letter carriers, certain things must take place before they are entitled to an increase, among other things a recommendation. There is nothing to compel the Ministers to recommend an increase.

Mr. PRIOR. What I mean is this: Suppose the opinion is given by the Department of Justice that it is mandatory that the postmaster and the deputy postmaster shall have an increase, does the same apply to the letter carriers?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is different phraseology. There may be discretion given in one class of officials, and not in the other. There is no doubt that, as far as statutory increases of the civil service are concerned, it is a matter to a large extent of a discretionary character.

Yukon Provisional District—

North-west Mounted Police—Required to complete the service of the year. $385,000

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I would like to move to add the following to that vote:—

This vote covers certain expenditures for carriage of mails, rents, services, &c., on account of the Post Office Department, the amount of which, when ascertained, is to be charged to that department.

Mr. HAGGART. Is this an instruction to the Auditor General? How will the Auditor General manage with the vote?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. One department is performing services for two departments. Instead of the Post Office Department taking a vote, at present the service is being performed by the Mounted Police; and when the year's accounts are in, the two departments will adjust the accounts and divide the disbursements.

Mr. HAGGART. I think that you will find that the Auditor General will not pass the expenditure until he finds out which department it is for.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is being paid out now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is what is wanted: we want to have a proper division made, and no person seems better qualified to ascertain the accuracy of that than the Auditor General. So, when the matter is submitted to the Auditor General, it will be for the departments to show him that it is a proper division of the expenditure, that the service which was performed by one department should be charged to another.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It will work out right, I think.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think so.

Militia and Defence..... $274,290

Mr. PRIOR. I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) to the fact that in Victoria, B.C., we are sadly in need of a rifle range. The range we have been using for a great number of years at Clover Point the owner will not allow the militia to use any longer. A new range was talked of at Oak Bay, but having been examined by the district officer commanding and other experts, they came to the conclusion that it was not a good range, and I quite agree with them. But a new range has been found, as the hon. gentleman perhaps knows, close to the present barracks of the Imperial troops, a range that I think, from my own observation, and from what I have heard from experts and military men down there, would make a magnificent range. Everybody connected with the militia and also a large number of private citizens are anxious that the purchase of a range should be put through as quickly as possible. There was a vote of $6,000 last year, but I am afraid it has lapsed, owing to the fact that no range has been bought. If the hon. gentleman does not push the matter I am afraid it will be too late for any rifle practice to take place this year. Of course the regiment stationed out there will suffer materially owing to the want of a range. I would ask the hon. gentleman to give his best consideration and immediate attention to the matter.

[The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I may say in reply to the hon. gentleman that the matter is receiving the attention of the department. As he has correctly said, we had selected a range, but it was objected to and we had to look elsewhere. The site to which the hon. gentleman refers will probably answer the purpose, and negotiations are going on now with the Hudson Bay Company who, I think, are the owners, with a view to acquiring the land. I saw the representative of the Hudson Bay Company here the other day and spoke to him about it. He says they are not disposed to sell, but would be ready to give a lease for a long term of years. I shall press the matter on as rapidly as possible. Of course, until we can make some arrangement with the Hudson Bay Company, it will be impossible for us to prepare a range. So far as the vote is concerned, I shall see that the money is re-voted.

On order 16, receiving report of Committee of Supply of June 30th,

Mr. FOSTER. The evils of leaving over discussions for concurrence are apparent on these Yukon items. The understanding was that we were to take up another item of business to-day, and consequently I left my notes at home.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is no fault of mine, if you left them at home.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not finding any fault. I am pointing out the difficulty that has occurred, and I am going to make a suggestion to overcome it. There were three items, one in Militia and Defence, one in the Interior, and one in Miscellaneous, in regard to the Yukon. I would ask the Minister of Finance if, when we get into the main Estimates, he will take an item, no matter where it is, on which we may discuss these other items, and under that condition we will pass this vote now?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There will be no difficulty whatever in doing so on any item the hon. gentleman suggests.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like the three Ministers, the Minister of the Interior especially, to be ready with their information.

Mr. HAGGART. There is another item. I would like the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Railways and Canals to bring down all the papers on the item in the supplementaries to pay the Kingston and Montreal Forwarding Company a rebate of tolls on grain which passed through the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals in 1891 and 1892, and which was transhipped at Ogdensburg.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals and of the Minister of Customs to that item.

Post Office—

Amount required for this service, including special allowance to railway mail clerk A. C. James, now on special duty in the Yukon district, making his salary equal to $2,000 a year since 1st October, 1898 $103,900 90

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I would like to add the following words:—

Including allowance for living expenses of Mr. James.

Mr. James is a member of the civil service. That is his salary, and we pay his board, whatever it may be, and I think the Civil Service Act has an express provision against any allowance to a member of the civil service.

Mr. FOSTER. "Special allowance" would take that in.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. But that seems to be limited to the money. That special allowance is for the salary. We pay him $2,000 and his living allowance.

Item, as amended, concurred in.

LOAN COMPANIES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 164)—from the Senate—respecting Loan Companies. He said: This is a Bill of a general character, and somewhat lengthy, and I am sure that the House will agree that it can be much better dealt with by the Committee on Banking and Commerce than that we should take it up in all its details. I, therefore, propose that it shall be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) if this is the Bill in regard to which the Attorney General of Ontario has drawn the attention of the Government to some objections?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes; at the earlier stage of the matter there was some correspondence with the Government of Ontario, but I think that the hon. Minister of Justice has satisfied the Ontario Government that this Bill is not open to their objections. At all events, that matter can be considered before the committee.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 86) to further amend the Insurance Act.—(Mr. Fielding.)

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). This Bill is somewhat lengthy, and, in its character, somewhat technical, but it is largely a re-enactment of existing clauses. The chief clause of the Bill is that which relates to the rate of interest to be earned on the reserves of insurance companies. It was a question of considerable importance, enlisting the interest of insurance companies and financial people generally to a large extent. There was a large attendance, and a protracted debate before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and I think I am safe in saying that the Bill is reasonably satisfactory to all concerned. Having given the committee the assurance that the matter was very thoroughly considered by the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and that the debatable portions of the Bill were the subject of what I may call a reasonable compromise on the part of all concerned, hon. gentlemen will, perhaps, have no difficulty in allowing the Bill to pass through its present stage without much discussion. If there are any points on which information is needed, I shall be glad to furnish it.

Mr. MULOCK.

On section 6,

Mr. HAGGART. How does the superintendent value the assets?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I believe there never has been any case in which we have been called upon to make a special examination. We accept the statement of the company, unless there is something in that statement which leads to the supposition that it is incorrect. In all cases so far the valuations submitted by the companies have been found to be satisfactory; but if the superintendent is not satisfied, this section gives him power to make a valuation for himself.

Mr. HAGGART. The superintendent is responsible for the valuation in his report to the Minister?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, he is responsible. He would have to accept their valuation, or, if dissatisfied, he would have to make a valuation for himself.

Mr. HAGGART. The result of this legislation depends entirely on the value of the assets of the company.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is true, but with the knowledge that the superintendent has that power, the valuation is likely to be very carefully made.

On section 8,

Mr. FOSTER. What extension is made in the investing powers of insurance companies, compared with what have hitherto existed?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend is aware that the practice has been, in the absence of any general law, for each insurance company to make a special application and obtain special powers. The result has been a lack of uniformity. Our aim has been, as far as possible, to establish uniformity in this way, and this is substantially, with a slight variation, the same legislation that we granted last session to two or three companies. We have adopted that as a standard, and propose to extend it to all. There are one or two companies who have powers beyond these, and while we do not diminish their powers, the effect of the section is to broaden the powers of other companies. The principal stocks we have included are those of trust companies, navigation companies, rolling-stock companies, bridge construction companies, harbour trust companies or commissions, fire insurance companies, and the debentures or bonds of steam railway companies. We have been restricting insurance companies to a high class of securities, and they complain that they cannot earn the rate of interest we desire them to earn, and have been constantly asking for a broadening of the field. We have broadened the field, but we still think it is within safe lines.

Mr. HAGGART. What companies does this clause not apply to?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Canada Life, which has a very old charter, the Sun Life, the British America and the Western. All of these, by their charters, have powers somewhat broader, and we have not felt it necessary to diminish their charter powers.

Mr. FOSTER. What could you add to these?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We have managed to keep out a good many things, notwithstanding that this is a fairly broad list.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a tremendously broad list, it seems to me. There are securities included in this list which open up a very doubtful range.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What would my hon. friend suggest as being open to criticism?

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest navigation companies and railway companies. The section includes the debentures or bonds of any steam railway company whatever. We have companies in this Dominion whose debentures and bonds, I am afraid, would not be considered a very safe investment. Of course, the trouble began last year when additional powers were given to one or two companies that applied for them, and the argument was used very strongly that if we were going to open these lines of investment to one company we would have to do it for all; and the logical sequence is this clause. Then, you have rolling stock companies. What does my hon. friend mean by that? Is it a company for the manufacture of rolling stock for railways?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The rolling stock company has, I think, a well-understood meaning. It is intended to mean a company which manufactures rolling stock for railways, and I think it is generally known as that.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, there is a harbour trust company or commission.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That would mean the bonds of a harbour commission.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we have some harbour commissions in this country whose bonds would not be at the present time a profitable investment. Altogether, it seems to me that the range of securities is a tremendously broad one, and to that extent it diminishes the security of policy-holders. I would much rather see the range more restricted.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My own mind runs in the direction of a wholesome conservatism on that question, and I do not feel like opposing my hon. friend's views. The difficulty is that among these companies there are some concerns which are good and others which are not good, and if you shut them all out, you exclude the insurance companies from a legitimate class of investment. The insurance companies, I suppose, will exercise their discretion between the good and the bad. This is a balancing of the good and the evil. We thought that to exclude all that class of security from investment would be an extreme step, and we trust the companies to exercise their powers with moderation.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend says we will open a bad security, and trust to the discretion of the companies. He makes an argument for doing away with any restriction at all.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I quite see that.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government take the position that they are to a certain extent the trustees and guarantors to those who insure. A large proportion of our railway securities, I am sorry to say, in a young country like ours, with new regions constantly opening up, are utterly worthless as securities. But you place in the hands of an insurance company's management, who may be interested in some of these stocks, the power of buying them up. Why could not that power be guarded in some way to make it more safe; providing, for instance, that the railway company should be one which pays a dividend, or which has a surplus of income over running expenses, or something of that kind? Otherwise, you might just as well do away with the clause altogether, and leave the matter entirely in the discretion of the companies, which, I understand, is the English plan, to a very large extent. Take railway securities and harbour trust commissions—I do not like to particularize, but I could particularize two or three securities which are simply worthless. We should hope that the discretion of insurance companies would not allow them to invest in these. I should like to see the railway company clause somewhat restricted, if any practical way can be devised.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am so much impressed with the importance of having the securities first-class, our insurance investments being in the nature of a trust, that my hon. friend's suggestion has my entire sympathy, and I think we had better let this clause stand and consider it later on.

Mr. HAGGART. From the whole tenor of the Bill, I think that the Government are responsible that the securities are perfectly good, because the superintendent calculates the value of the securities and reports to the Minister. The duty of the superintendent is to see that the securities are all right. From the tenor of the Bill, the Government accept responsibility, through its superintendent, as to the value of the security.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is substantially correct. I think it is the duty of the Government to see, from time to time, that the invested securities have the value represented in the insurance company's statements. The superintendent should examine them closely, and if he finds that they have not the value put upon them, he must so report and the value must be put down to what it really is. I entirely accept the view of my hon. friend, and I think that view will be taken by the superintendent of insurance.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend would not offer the opinion that if an insurance company invests in railway stocks, for instance, and the investment were practically worthless, the Government would be responsible to the policy-holders for the amounts of their policies?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not mean responsible to any individual, but responsible, in the broad sense, to the public. Having undertaken a paternal charge of these companies, we are responsible, so far as the supervision can go, to see that their securities are of the value put upon them, and the moment we find a company publishing an official statement of assets which will not bear investigation, the superintendent makes a report, and the valuation is cut down.

Section allowed to stand.

Section 5, subsection 3,

Mr. FOSTER. Is that in the present law?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, it is in the charters of individual companies, but we have no general clause governing it.

Mr. FOSTER. This is taken from the charters of some companies?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. The deposits would have to be in some chartered banks?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not necessarily. The Governments of other countries may require certain deposits, and these will have to be made as required, but not necessarily with a bank.

On subsection 6,

Mr. HAGGART. As to the investments of these companies doing business in foreign countries, if made under the terms of the Act, they would not be subject to re-valuation by your superintendent?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They would come in the statement of the company's finances and we should have to value them. The superintendent would have to go over that part of the statement as over the rest. I grant that our opportunities for the valuation of these securities at a distance are not very great.

Mr. HAGGART. But where you permit them to make these investments, and they proceed under the provisions of the Act, they could not be re-valued.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes; if in the superintendent's opinion, any security was valued too high, he would put on it his own valuation.

Committee rose and reported progress.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved second reading of Bill (No. 146) further to amend the Act respecting the Geological Survey.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On subsection "c" of amendment to section 4 of the Act,

Mr. FOSTER. Let us have an explanation for the necessity of this subsection "c." It seems to me it might as well read that the Minister may appoint any person he pleases.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There is no change made by this Bill in the law except in subsection "a." The law as it now stands provides that a man may be appointed when:

(a) He is a science graduate of either a Canadian or a foreign university or of the Mining School of London or the "Ecole des Mines" of Paris or of some other recognized science school of standing equal to that of the said universities and schools, or a graduate of the Royal Military College.

And it goes on to say:

And in each case, only after having served a probation of not less than two years in the scientific work of the department.

So that even a graduate could not be appointed until he has served two years in the scientific department. The director told me that the intention of the clause—and it had always been so acted upon—was that if a candidate had the necessary qualifications, that is, if he was a graduate of one of these schools or colleges or was otherwise eligible for appointment, he was appointed, but in a probationary way, and these appointments were confirmed at the end of two years. When the point came up, he showed me the Act. I said: I do not know what the intention was, but if that was the intention, I think the Act does not carry it out; my impression is that you cannot appoint anybody until he has served two years. He asked me, quite naturally: How, then, is a man to get into the service unless he be appointed? My answer was: He can be appointed at $400 a year; but he told me that the men who were required could not be had at $400 a year, and that that was not the intention; though after discussing it with him it appeared clear that it was a mistake in drafting the Act. It was not evident what intention the parties who were acting under the Act had in regard to it, so I said I would bring in an amendment. The only change is one by which such a graduate can be appointed. Then in the latter part of the clause I am now dealing with, the hon. gentleman will see that the appointment will be made permanent at the expiration of one year instead of two years. One year, I think, is quite sufficient. I quite agree with the director who said that one year was long enough to tell whether an officer was qualified to discharge the duties of the position. At the end of one year he will be prepared to say whether the appointment should be made permanent.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt he would. I have no objection to the change in (a) and (b) clauses, so that it will not require a scienced graduate to serve a probation of five years before he is appointed; I think that is not necessary. Subsection (c) may have been in the old Act, but I am inclined to think that it vitiates the two preceding subsections.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It is very vague; I have never appointed any one under it at all.

Mr. FOSTER. That is all the more reason why that might be allowed to drop out.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have no objection to striking that out. Cases have come up two or three times where I have been asked to hold certain persons to be qualified under that clause, and I have always held they were. I have found it difficult to say when a man should claim to come under it; "similar work" I have always held to be scientific work; but of course it is rather a dangerous expression. However, I have not the least objection to its being struck out.

Bill reported.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 168)—from the Senate—further to amend the Criminal Code of 1892.—(Sir Louis Davies.)

THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 147) further to amend the Act respecting the Department of the Interior.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have an explanation of that. It seems to me that that makes a very large hole in a door which is already sufficiently open. What would the Minister consider the classes of service as coming under this section 1?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The only officers to whom it can apply in my department are the officers in the Surveyor General's branch. It is altogether for the purpose of that branch that the Act is being introduced.

Mr. FOSTER. It applies to any branch here, and we have already had some instances where a Minister argued that a certain profession was a technical profession in order to get a man in.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have no objection to making it apply to the Surveyor General's branch; it would not answer the purpose to make it applicable to the surveyors only. Take, for instance, one particular case that we have under consideration now; I am not sure whether the man is a surveyor, he is a computer, a man with special mathematical qualifications in the astronomer's branch. We might easily come across a case where that would mean a man who is fit for that purpose and who might not be a surveyor. This man is appointed simply on account of his qualification as a mathematician.

Mr. FOSTER. That might be a case.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That is the particular case that has given us most of the trouble.

Mr. FOSTER. That would occur very seldom, and hon. Ministers have not found it at all difficult to overcome matters of that kind by inserting three or four magic words—"notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act." I think it would be better if the hon. Minister would make it apply to the surveyors.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I am willing that it shall apply, but I think I cannot limit it to the surveyors.

Mr. FOSTER. Say "surveyors or astronomers."

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. "Mathematicians."

Mr. FOSTER. "Mathematicians" would only indicate a common branch of knowledge.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. What the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) refers to is, no doubt, the case of a man being forced upon the Minister into the service on account of his technical qualifications when he was not required for the service. When you limit it to the Surveyor General's branch, and when you say that he shall be appointed by the Minister on the certificate of the Deputy Minister and of the Surveyor General, if he is fit and possesses the qualifications, it would be practically impossible that there should be any abuse. I apprehended that this objection would be raised when I contemplated bringing the Bill in. I think the hon. gentleman will admit that if it is confined to the Surveyor General's branch, it would be out of the question for the terms of the Act to be complied with unless everything was in accordance with the spirit of the Act, that is to say, that a man was required and that he actually possessed the qualifications. I think it would be hardly conceivable that the Surveyor General would join in recommending a man who is not fit and who is not required.

Mr. FOSTER. The Surveyor General will come in under it.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, as head of the branch.

Mr. FOSTER. Make your amendment in that way.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR moved :

That the words, in the second line of section 1, "or any branch of it" be struck out, and that the words "the Surveyor General's branch of" be inserted after the word "in"; that, in the 11th line, the words "head of the branch where such assistants are required," be struck out and the words "Surveyor General" inserted in lieu thereof.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 2,

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR moved :

That the word "any" in the first line be struck out and that the words "the Surveyor General's" be inserted in lieu thereof, and that in the third and fourth lines the words "the head of the branch where he is employed" be struck out and that the words "or the Surveyor General" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 3,

Mr. FOSTER. Does that refer simply to those officers under sections 1 and 2, as amended?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes. It says it shall not be necessary for any person so employed or continued, &c. It refers to nobody except these.

Bill reported.

Mr. FOSTER.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 148) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and House resolved itself in committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Hon. gentlemen will see that the Bill has been reprinted and some amendments added.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman point out the effect of these amendments as compared with the existing law?

On section 1,

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Under the law as it stands, one-fifth of the purchase price of school lands was paid down, but this amendment provides that one-tenth shall be paid down. It gives easier terms of payment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So that you may get a higher price?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, the lands must be sold at public auction as heretofore. There is a provision also by which when a town lot is on school land, the town lot can be surveyed out of it, and sold by auction. That has been done as a matter of custom, but I thought we should have the authority of law for doing it.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it the experience of the Minister that the instalments and interest have been paid with regularity heretofore?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It depends altogether on whether the farmer has a good crop or not. If he has a good crop and some surplus money he pays, and if he has a bad crop he thinks the Government ought to wait. My impression is that the past sales are now pretty well paid up. Times have been very good in the Northwest, and I think the farmers have pretty well paid up their indebtedness on the school lands.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Could the Minister give us a statement of the amount of school lands which have been sold, the amount of money they have brought, and the quantity of these lands that remain unsold?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have not got the information on hand, but I will get it for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) to-morrow.

On sections 2 and 3,

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. These two sections are intended for the par-pose of bringing the law into harmony with the practice of the department. Before I took office, the department issued patents upon the expiration of three years from the time the settler got his entry, and not from the time he perfected his entry as the law provides. I was not aware of that practice until a year ago, and I thought that if it were a uniform practice, the law should be made to conform with it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is perfecting an entry ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It means, under the Act, taking up permanent residence upon the land.

On section 4,

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. This section is for the purpose of enabling the Government to deal with the half-breeds. Under the law as it stands, the granting of land in satisfaction of claims of half-breeds is circumscribed to those resident in the territories, outside the limits of Manitoba, previous to the 15th of July, 1870. This date was fixed because it was the date of the transfer from the Hudson Bay Company. The transfer did not affect in any way the half-breeds resident in the district of Athabasca and the adjoining territories. The effect of the amendment to the Act will be to enable us to give scrip to the half-breeds in the Athabasca district as it was given to the half-breeds of the province of Manitoba.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is nothing about the Athabasca district in this clause.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No, it is not specially limited to that district. It will also enable us to deal with a number of half-breeds in the North-west Territories who were not dealt with at the time of the transfer, as the Manitoba half-breeds were. After the rebellion in 1885, a commission was sent up there and gave those half-breeds their scrip, but they have always claimed, and I think with justice, that they should have been dealt with on the basis of a settlement in 1885, so that their children born up to the year 1885 should have scrip issued to them. That is the intention of the Government under this clause—to deal with those half-breeds on the same basis on which the Manitoba half-breeds were dealt with in 1870, dating the settlement 1885, and dating the Athabasca settlement 1889.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You strike out the limitation clause in the former Act and substitute this for it ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes. I simply sent the clause to the Department of Justice, saying this is the intention of the Government, and this is the clause just as the Department of Justice drew it.

Mr. FOSTER. What will this amount to with reference to the half-breed ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. We have about 1,000 half-breeds in the Athabasca district, and I think about 3,000 in the North-west Territories. But there has been no enumeration made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are about 3,000, I understand, outside of those already provided for ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes ; that is, in the older portions of the North-west Territories.

Mr. FOSTER. What will they get ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. $240 in scrip.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend knows, I suppose, where the scrip goes. He issues it to the half-breeds, and it is bought from them for a song by brokers, and such like. These men get full value, but the half-breeds get only half value or one-fourth value. Does my hon. friend intend to give the broker another harvest ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I cannot say as to that.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the system is entirely vicious in the way in which it is practically carried out. I do not suppose that it has been ameliorated. A few years ago I had occasion to look into it, and it turned out in this way. The Dominion, in its generosity, provided a certain amount of scrip for the half-breeds, worth so many dollars ; but the half-breeds, who were very improvident, away from banks, and the like of that, parted with it at a very small figure. These brokers got the advantage of the Government's generosity, but the half-breeds got almost nothing. It is inevitable that something like that will occur if the hon. gentleman gives them scrip. What he ought to do is to guard that in some way, by either giving them land or a cash payment. This scrip is not redeemed in cash, but goes in payment for land ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the same as cash to the white settler who wants to buy lands. If the object is to get these half-breeds to settle on lands, why does not the Minister give them the lands ; or, if the object is to get into the hands of the half-breeds an equivalent value, why not pay them in cash, under certain regulations which would ensure as far as possible the half-breed getting the value which the Government pay ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They have the option of taking land. As a matter of fact, however, I suppose these half-breeds all have land. The question which the hon. gentleman has referred to is no doubt an important question. I have to some extent improved on the old method by changing the form of the certificate. Formerly the certificate seemed to have been drawn up by the brokers themselves. I do not suppose the brokers performed that work for the Department of the Interior; but anybody who looks at the old form of certificate will come to the conclusion that no better form could have been devised for the purpose of facilitating speculation in scrip. It was made out to John Smith or bearer, and no endorsement was required. If a man went to the half-breeds and got the certificates from them and presented them to the department, he was entitled to the scrip. The form has been changed, so that an assignment is required, which will have to be filed and duly certified and passed upon by the department. I do not know whether the difficulty to which the hon. gentleman refers can be effectively dealt with or not. I have already given the matter some consideration. I discussed it to some extent with Father Lacombe, when he was here. He takes strong ground on it; but he recognizes, as everybody else does, that it takes two to make a bargain, and that when we are giving the half-breed something to satisfy a sort of political claim which he has against the Government, for the extinction of the aboriginal rights to the land, for that is what it is, we must give him what he will accept. There is no use of talking about compelling the half-breeds to accept land. They contend that the Government should treat them in the same way as it treated the other half-breeds, and give them scrip. But if there is any plan by which the scrip can be secured to them, that will be very desirable, and I intend to give the subject some further consideration before any action is actually taken in connection with the issuing of scrip. Scrip will not be issued for some little time yet. At present the commissioners are simply going out there for the purpose of enumerating the half-breeds and returning a list to the department showing who are entitled to the scrip. I cannot say that I have arrived at any plan by which, with the consent of the half-breeds, we will be able to make an arrangement to prevent their improperly disposing of the scrip.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman says there are about 3,000 of those half-breeds who have to be reckoned with; $240 each is, I understand, the amount of the scrip, or nearly three-quarters of a million dollars of money. That means, if you carry out your plan, that you may be giving some persons other than half-breeds more than nine-tenths of that amount. The issue of this scrip is not going to benefit the half-breeds, unless they are very much changed from those who received the scrip before, and the result would be that this country will have expended $720,000, and will have that much less to receive for the lands which it will sell to others, and will not have benefited the half-breeds to any considerable degree. Either by trustees in whom they have confidence, or by commutation for many payments, payments lasting over many years, this money might be expended. I should be very sorry to see this legislation pass and power given to distribute $720,000, unless under some scheme by which the money would really benefit the half-breeds themselves. If it were put into a fund, or invested and accounted for in some way, and extended for the education of their children, or in payment of lands when they require them, or in a dozen different ways which it might be worth while to consider, something might really be done which would benefit these people. A fund invested will ultimately give those people quite a large amount of money. But if it is paid out in the old form of scrip, to which I was opposed the whole time that system was carried on, it will be found that that scrip will be of very little benefit, as far as the half-breeds are concerned.

Mr. DAVIN. I think the suggestion of my hon. friend well worthy of consideration. Unless Father Lacombe has greatly changed his mind, he has a strong conviction that land should be given to the half-breeds. I know that when I conversed with him some years ago, and the late Archbishop Taché, both had the strongest possible objection to the giving of scrip.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MONTREAL ISLAND BELT LINE RAILWAY.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 112) respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. MONET. The other day I gave notice of an amendment to this clause which I understand is practically admitted on both sides. The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), who represents the company, tells me that he accepts our amendment. The amendment is as follows:—

To add after the word "Montreal" in the 31st line in subsection 1 the following words:—"But the powers and franchises of the company cannot be exercised by it over or upon any property vested in the harbour commissioners of Montreal, or so as to affect the same, except upon notarial agreement with the commissioners and upon terms satisfactory to them, or, in case of their failing to agree, approved by the Governor General in Council.

Mr. POWELL. This section provides for a division of the line into sections for the purpose of raising a revenue. Would it not be better to make an independent section of the amendment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think it would be better to substitute it for clause 8, which was an amendment carried by the committee much to the same effect. If you will just change that and substitute it for clause 8.

Mr. MONET. I have no objection. Of course, this will necessitate the withdrawal of the amendment proposed by the Minister of Railways and Canals in committee.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 148) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act.—(Mr. Sifton.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 4,

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Mr. Chairman, in reference to this clause there is a great deal in what has been said this afternoon in regard to the issue of scrip to the half-breeds. When the abolition of the territorial rights of the half-breeds through their Indian title was first provided for by this Parliament, a certain amount of land, 1,400,000 acres, was set apart in Manitoba and allotted to the half-breed children who were born before the 15th of July, 1870. When the first census was taken, it was found that each child was entitled to 240 acres of land, so that the territory that was first set apart by the commission that was appointed at the time, was subdivided into as many lots of 240 acres as there were children entitled to the same. Under the clause enacted in this Bill the children in the Territories are allotted scrip of $240 as the price of their land in the Territories, but as the price of land in the Territories is, I believe, $2.50 or $3 an acre, it will be seen that the children of the half-breeds in the North-west Territories will not get as large a grant with their scrip of $240 as the children in Manitoba received since 1870. On the other hand, I believe that this system of issuing scrip, representing so many dollars, is more apt to lead to speculation, because these half-breeds, not knowing what to do with their scrip, representing, it is true, certain value, will dispose of it to speculators, while if the system that was adopted in Manitoba in the first place was adopted in this instance, instead of receiving scrip which at the face value would be worth $240, they would receive 240 acres of land, the amount which has been allotted to the half-breeds in Manitoba. These lands could be selected in the same way as they were in our province. Instead of receiving this money, as I have said, they would receive land, which could be selected in the best part of the territory to which they belong, and this land, of course, would not be bought up by banking institutions and speculators in that kind of business. They would not want to buy land, while if scrip is granted, the half-breeds could dispose of it to any one who has money to pay the Government. This scrip will be bought by the agents of speculators; it will be brought to Winnipeg, or some of the centres in the east, and then it will be applied to land bought in Manitoba upon which there are still payments due, and it will be applied in the same way, while if their land were allotted to these half-breeds in lots of 240 each, that land would remain for these half-breeds and for the children who are not yet of age, so that they might settle upon it when they become of age. It is true that in our province most of the half-breeds who had land allotted to them disposed of it. But there are still in Manitoba half-breeds who have received their lands from the Government, who are still holding them. These lands were not taxable until the half-breeds were of age, and, therefore, they were kept intact, so that they might settle upon them when they became of age. If a tract of land in the North-west Territories, large enough to meet the requirements of the case, were set apart and allotted to the half-breeds, there would be less speculation, and the half-breeds would benefit by the adoption of this system. If this were not done, I think it would be better if the Government gave the half-breeds themselves a certain sum of money, instead of giving them scrip payable to bearer, by which the Government could obtain a quit-claim deed from them as to their title to these lands in the North-west Territories. The half-breeds would have a certain sum of money coming direct to them from the Government, and they would get the benefit of it, while in this case they will dispose of their scrip to the best advantage they can, but they will be in the hands of speculators, who will fix the price of it, and they will be, of necessity, obliged to accept whatever price is offered, and will, therefore, not get anything near $240, which is supposed to be the amount that this scrip is worth. If the Government would allow them a fixed sum of money, which they would pay directly to the half-breeds, there would be no speculation in the scrip, and the half-breeds would get a good deal more than they will under the present system. Of course, my remarks apply to what has been done in the past as well as to what will be done in the future. The hon. Minister is not making a new departure in this case, because he is just doing what has been done in the past, but when we find out that we have made mistakes in the past, it is the best of times to remedy these mistakes. Under the circumstances, I would ask the hon. Minister to look more carefully into this matter and devise some means whereby the half-breeds will get the greatest amount of benefit that it is possible for them to have.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Chairman, this is a question which requires some consideration, but which, in my judgment, does not admit of any more delay. All the trouble that we have had in Manitoba and the North-west Territories in regard to this question of the extinguishment of Indian title, so far as the half-breeds are concerned, has arisen from the objections which were made from time to time to the manner in which the half-breed title has been extinguished in Manitoba, and from the delay which rose in consequence of the adoption of this system. In 1869, when the Hudson Bay Territories became part of Canada, the half-breeds' title in the province of Manitoba was extinguished, as we know, not as the Indians' title was extinguished, but by a grant of land made to the half-breeds and to the children born before 15th July, 1869.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The 15th July, 1870.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think it was in 1869. There is no question that this manner of extinguishing the Indian title possessed by the half-breeds was of very little benefit to the half-breeds. It is on record that they squandered the scrip that was issued to them, and that the speculators derived much greater benefit and advantage from the bounty of Parliament than did the half-breeds themselves. It is also on record that when the question arose how the Indian title, in so far as the half-breeds was concerned, in the North-west Territories was to be extinguished, objections, and very serious objections, were made to the re-adoption of the plan which has been carried out in Manitoba. It was objected to by Bishop Taché, amongst others, and by most of the missionaries, that the bounty of Parliament had been abused, that the half-breeds, who in many respects are children, had become the prey of speculators who had obtained their scrip for a bagatelle, and that the result was not only no benefit to the half-breeds but an actual detriment to them. Several plans were proposed to deal with the question in a different manner. We have only to look at the papers brought down in 1885, at the time of the Riel rebellion, to see that Archbishop Taché had one plan, the Bishop of Rupert's Land had another plan, Commissioner Dennis had a plan of his own—and there were so many plans to choose from that nothing was done. Years and years elapsed, and the rebellion broke out before anything was done. When the rebellion broke out, commissioners were sent at once to deal with the question and settle it, to interview the half-breeds, to meet them wherever they were to be found and to issue them scrip in the same manner as had been done in the province of Manitoba. And, I am sorry to say, that this was no greater source of profit to the half-breeds than the plan had been to their brothers in Manitoba in 1869.

Now, in 1899, we have a certain number of half-breeds whose claims have not been recognized and whose claims must be recognized. There is a latent discontent amongst these half-breeds of the North-west Territories who have not been settled with, a belief that faith has not been kept with them. Everybody will admit that it is not a healthy condition that we should have this latent discontent going on from year to year as it has been going on. My hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) has undertaken to deal with the matter and settle it. He proposes to settle it according to the old plan with some modifications. Now, I understand my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), and my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), and also my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) point out the objections to dealing with the half-breeds in the same manner as formerly. But while these gentlemen point out that the mode in which we have dealt with the half-breeds' claims up to this time has not been satisfactory, so far as I have listened to them, not one of them is prepared to suggest any substitute for the plan that is proposed. My hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) tells us that he has given a good deal of attention to this question and has consulted with the best men whose advice could be had. He has consulted with Father Lacombe, who, upon a question of this kind is an authority. For my part, I have talked this matter over several times with my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, and while I would advise, that the settlement made in 1869 in Manitoba and in 1885 in the North-west Territories was far from being wholly satisfactory, still, I would impress upon him the necessity of dealing at once with this question, and if nothing better can be done to settle on the old plan rather than leave the question open. After all, it is better that the half-breeds should be paid even if they squander, as their brothers have done, the bounty of Parliament, rather than that this open sore should be kept running and this discontent kept for ever alive amongst this class of our population. They will at least be paid a certain number of acres of land. Land is not such a scarce article, it is not such a valuable commodity in the North-west Territories that we cannot afford to be generous with the half-breed, the first occupant of the soil. Even if they squander the land given them, better have it thus than have these people living under the belief and constantly making the assertion that the faith of the Crown has not been kept with them. Any man who has been in the North-west Territories and met this class of people knows that they pretend to be the first occupants of the soil, and to have a direct right in it, so that they should not be dispossessed without compensation. My hon. friend from Provencher knows that better than I do. If anything better can be suggested than what has been done heretofore, I would strongly urge my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior to consider it with a view to adopting it. But if nothing better is suggested, let us revert to the old form of settlement, imperfect as it is, but let this question be settled once for all with the half-breed, and let him feel that he has been given a compensation to which he is entitled, let him be satisfied with his allegiance, and let him believe in his heart that the Crown has dealt fairly and equitably with him. That is the purpose of the Bill, that is the intention of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior in dealing with this matter; and I am sure it must commend itself to the judgment of every hon. member of this House. I heartily wish that something could be done better than has been done, and I hope that the Minister will be able to find something better; but if he can do no more than has been done in the past, let him settle this question and settle it once for all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There does not seem to be any division of opinion in the committee as to the desirability of dealing with this question in some way. I confess, however, that I have not heard a statement of the ground on which this claim is made. As I understand it, the law recognized the claim of the half-breeds and sought to extinguish that claim as regards the half-breeds born before 1870. But do you not here recognize the claim of parties who were born since 1870? And, if that is the case, how do you reach any finality? How do we know that, 30 years hence, children now unborn will not make a similar claim? I have listened with some interest to see how it was proposed to reach a final solution of the matter, but I have not yet heard it suggested. Now, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says, and with a great deal of force, that the course pursued on previous occasions was not satisfactory, in carrying out the design of the Government to meet fully and fairly the claims of the half-breeds. We failed owing to the character of that class of the population and their being imposed upon by speculators who, for small amounts obtained very valuable considerations, thus preventing any great advantage accruing to the parties for whose benefit the concession was intended. My right hon. friend says that he is not able to adopt at the present time any suggestions for an improved condition of things. Assuming that it is our duty to meet these claims, we all agree that they should be dealt with in the manner most advantageous to the half-breeds themselves, and in that connection I draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the suggestion of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), who speaks with more direct knowledge of the subject than most of us. I ask the right hon. gentleman to consider as to whether it would not be better to substitute money payments for scrip, the issue of which has resulted in the past in more advantage to the speculator than to the people we wish to aid. This suggestion could probably be carried out at a less cost to the Government, but whether or not, if it were more beneficial to the half-breeds, it would be well for the Government to consider it. Was it part of the former proposal, that assuming they take the land in change for the scrip, they are only entitled to 160 acres?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The 160 acres does not at all affect the half-breed title. This is in favour of the actual squatters or settlers upon the land, and they are entitled to 160 acres. Anything above that they would have to pay the Government for. It has no reference at all to the half-breed question we are now discussing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was going to say that the value of the 160 acres of land to-day would be very much more valuable than when this settlement was made.

The PRIME MINISTER. The settlement adopted included, for instance, that half-breeds who were settled on river lots were to be dealt with as ordinary settlers. They would be entitled to the land they actually occupied to the extent of 160 acres. But apart from that, a grant of 240 acres was made to the children in extinguishment of the Indian title, or right to the soil.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It occurred to me that as my right hon. friend was rather inviting suggestions, that the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) was well worthy of consideration.

Mr. DAVIN. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was referring to the well-known fact, which I think the Minister (Mr. Sifton) is aware of, that Father Lacombe and the late Archbishop Taché were much opposed to giving scrip to the half-breeds. Did I understand from the Minister that Father Lacombe has changed his view in that regard?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I did not intend to say anything with regard to Father Lacombe's views. I discussed the matter with him, but I did not pretend to speak as to his views at all.

Mr. DAVIN. I discussed the matter with Father Lacombe and with the late Archbishop Taché, and I know they were opposed to giving scrip owing to what took place on the first issue, and which was to some extent repeated when scrip was subsequently issued by the late Government. What happened was this: The agents of private banks accompanied the commissioner, and they bought in the certificates of scrip for a song. The result, as stated by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), was that the only persons who gained by what is after all a large expenditure by the Government, were the note shavers and the financial sharks who followed the commission, just as we read of sharks following a ship. I am inclined to think that the suggestion of my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) would be better, namely, that money should be given instead of scrip. If this were done it would insure that the half-breeds would, at least, get the value of the interest they surrender. On the occasion of the first issue of scrip, it is well known that half-breeds holding scrip for 240 acres sold it in Winnipeg for $5, and some of them sold it for a few drinks over a bar. I do not know that anything like that took place on the last issue of scrip, but there cannot be the least doubt that the agents of people who are well known to the Minister of the Interior at Winnipeg, these agents got scrip at a large discount on its face value, and a short time afterwards we saw advertised "scrip for sale." Persons who wanted to buy land from the Government bought this scrip at a small discount, and then the Government had to acknowledge its face value when these people came to pay for their land. It is a most unsatisfactory arrangement. So far as any little influence I had before is concerned, I urged on the then Minister of the Interior, subsequent to the rebellion, that he should adopt some other method than the issue of scrip, the unfortunate character of which had been abundantly established. This suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. LaRivière) would, I think, be better than giving scrip. But it would be much better to give the land to the half-breed, or, if he did not want the land, to keep it for his children. Anything would be better than to give him a means of sacrificing an interest which he possesses for a mere trifle, which rapidly passes out of his hands, and by which the only persons who can benefit are the agents of speculators.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Would the Minister of the Interior kindly state what is the face value of this scrip, and what is its approximate present value?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The scrip to each half-breed, if it were issued, would be $240, credited on the purchase of Dominion lands. The value of the scrip is just like the value of a bond or any other ordinary security for money. It is only of value in paying the Government for Dominion lands, and the proportion which the amount of scrip in the hands of the public bears to the amount of Dominion lands that are unpaid for and that are likely in the near future to come into the market, fixes the amount which traders are prepared to pay for scrip. That is what gives it its value. I do not know what Dominion land scrip is worth at the present time. I think what is out is quoted at between 90 and 100. If a large quantity of scrip is issued, its value may go down to 60 or 65 cents on the dollar.

Mr. SIFTON.

Mr. FOSTER. For how much per acre do you sell Dominion lands now?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The ruling price, when we sell any lands in the ordinary way, is $3 an acre.

Mr. FOSTER. And you will take scrip at the face value instead of money?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. We take scrip, having a face value of $240, for the value of $240—not for 240 acres of land.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Do I understand that each half-breed has the option to take scrip for $240 or to take 240 acres of land?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That is the intention.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. But the holder of the scrip cannot get 240 acres of land if the price of the land is $3 an acre?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. We have not decided all the details of the arrangement, and I am prepared to consider the views of the committee, which are just the same as my own. I am quite anxious to do everything I can to secure to the half-breeds the due and proper benefit they ought to derive from the assistance the Government is giving them. It is our intention, at the present time, to give the half-breed the privilege of taking 240 acres of land if he chooses; if not, he will get $240 of scrip. While on my feet I wish to refer, first, to a remark made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, that is, that there would be no finality about the claims of the half-breeds for scrip. That idea arises, in my hon. friend's mind, I suppose, from the fact that we dealt with the half-breeds of Manitoba in 1870, with those of the North-west in 1885, and are now dealing with those of the Athabasca district; but after this settlement is made there can be no further claims on behalf of the half-breeds. The half-breeds of Manitoba and their children were settled with; but a considerable number of the Manitoba half-breeds moved to the North-west Territories, and they were not dealt with; and they claim that until the Government deal with them, they and their children have the same rights as had the half-breeds of Manitoba. I think their claim is perfectly just, and cannot on any logical ground be refused. If the half-breed had any claim at all, it was on account of his Indian blood and his occupation of that territory, and because the Government of the Dominion, in taking possession of the territory, was bound to recognize his position and extinguish his title, as was done in the case of the half-breeds in the province of Manitoba. I think, therefore, the late Government made a mistake, when dealing with the half-breeds in 1885, in not settling the whole question then. We have to deal with the Athabasca half-breeds in the same way.

Mr. FOSTER. What was done in 1885 ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. In 1885, the Half-breed Commission hunted up the half-breeds who had been born prior to 1870, and who lived in the North-west Territories, and gave them scrip, but did not recognize their children. So, I say that when the settlement is made on the basis we propose, the whole question will be wiped out, and cannot arise again. The hon. member for Provencher suggested a money payment. While I am quite ready to consider any suggestion made by any member of the House, especially one who has a knowledge of the whole question like my hon. friend from Provencher, I am bound to say that the knowledge I have of how affairs have gone in the North-west Territories does not at all indicate that a money payment would be better than a scrip payment, except possibly that it might be better for the Government. We might be able to satisfy them with a smaller amount of money, but I am satisfied that it would be no better for the half-breed; for he would as quickly and improvidently dispose of the money as he would of the scrip. The same thing happens practically with the Indians when their treaty payments are made. There is no way that any Government officer can devise that would prevent the Indians, when they get their treaty payments, from squandering their money. The traders go and camp around their reserve, and the Indians squander their money in a very short time. My experience and observation would not lead me to suppose that a money payment would be any better, so far as the half-breeds are concerned, though the suggestion is worthy of consideration, and it might be better from the standpoint of the Government.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Could not my hon. friend make it payable by instalments and then his objection would not stand ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I do not believe any settlement could be made that the half-breeds would accept which would compel them to take their payments by instalments. We are apt to consider these people in the same light as the Indians, and to think we can make with them any arrangements we choose. But that is an entire mistake. They are intelligent men and citizens and they do not consider that they are getting any charity or favour from the Government. They say that they were in that country before us, and perfectly able to take care of themselves, and that we came and took possession, and they want what they claim as their just rights. No reason can be assigned why the amount should be $240 in scrip any more than any other sum, except that that was the amount given to the others. They consider they have a right to the same treatment as the other half-breeds got. The main difficulty is not to devise a plan whereby so much money could be spent in a way that would give the greatest benefit to the half-breeds, but the difficulty is in dealing with a number of men who are not by any means children, who are not, if you like, a very provident race, who are not well able to take care of themselves in competition with white people, but who do not consider that they are by any means bound to take what the Government give them. No amicable satisfactory settlement can be made with them which does not recognize them as independent and able to take care of their own property. That is the real difficulty. Whatever may be our desire to spend this money in a way we think will do these people the most good, we are not in a position to do as we please. The difficulty is a political one which must be settled in a way satisfactory to the persons who have to be settled with.

Mr. FOSTER. What special pressure, if any, is being brought now by the half-breeds in the North-west for settlement ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The matter has been pressed upon me constantly ever since I took office. A colleague of the hon. gentleman some years ago, promised a settlement to the half-breeds upon the basis I am suggesting. The matter was brought before the right hon. First Minister and pressed strongly upon him, and it has been pressed upon me ever since I have been a member of the Government, particularly by members from the North-west, who have numbers of these half-breeds residing in their constituencies. It has also been pressed upon me by members of the Territorial Government. I have from time to time put off settlement on the plea that pressure of work prevented me from taking the matter up as quickly as I desired, and it is in consequence of this representation of mine that there has been no public demonstration.

Mr. FOSTER. Where are those half-breeds distributed, and what are they doing? Is any proportion of them farmers ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The larger portion of them, I may say substantially all of them, are in the electoral division of Saskatchewan, largely along the Saskatchewan River, in and around Prince Albert, west, north-west and north-east of Prince Albert. In addition there is a considerable number who are at the settlement of St. Albert, not a great way from Edmonton. They are largely an agricultural population. They are to some extent engaged in trading for the Hudson Bay Company, and the class of work which half-breeds do in that section of country. Their time is occupied between that and agricultural pursuits in a small way. A couple of townships of land have been set apart north of the Saskatchewan beyond Prince Albert, in regard to which no special action has been taken, except that the department has declined to allow other settlers to go in. Father Lacombe has been told that upon that territory he will be allowed to settle any half-breeds that he can induce to go there. His object is to induce them to go there and form a separate settlement, where they will not be subjected to the close competition of white people, his idea being that he will be able to develop them in a higher way by this means than by having them centered among other people. We have done nothing substantially in this regard except refuse to take homestead entries for that small piece of territory. It has been suggested that we should give—and I expect to submit to Parliament, before the session is over, a vote for a small sum of money to assist in the preparation of that settlement, but I need not discuss that now. I only mention it in connection with the suggestion of the hon. member for Provencher.

Mr. DAVIN. I quite recognize the justice of dealing with the half-breeds on the basis proposed by the hon. gentleman, and the basis on which the hon. gentleman proposed to deal with them was discussed some years ago by those who are acquainted with the subject and pretty well accepted. The only thing that strikes me is the method. I doubt very much, with our experience of the two cases we have before us—with our experience of the first and second issue of scrip, and of the waste that resulted to the half-breeds and gain on the part of persons who are mere sharks—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. What would you suggest?

Mr. DAVIN. Why not make the experiment of giving them land?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Does the hon. gentleman think that would satisfy them?

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman says that he proposes to set apart a certain amount of land on which Father Lacombe will settle them. People who know the half-breeds better than I or anybody in this House tell that if the half-breeds had been settled with on the basis of giving them land and letting them settle on the land, that would have been the true solution. There was the strong opinion of Archbishop Taché. In 1879, when I was up in Winnipeg, Archbishop Taché and Father Lacombe urged me in the strongest way to impress on the Government not to give scrip but to give land, so as to force the half-breeds to settle on the land. There is not the slightest doubt that a mistake was made at that time in giving the scrip. If at that time the Government said to the half-breeds: We will give both of you 240 acres of land in settlement of your claim and for the extinction of the Indian title, the result would have been that the half-breeds would be wealthier to-day than they are. The hon. gentleman knows this also—that that scrip that was given the first time melted out of their hands like snow, and a large amount of the scrip that was given on the second issue melted likewise; and this will not remain long in the hands of many. It is true, there are many of these persons having claims who are thrifty, industrious, excellent farmers, good citizens, and no doubt they will take care of whatever opportunities are placed in their hands. But my hon. friends know very well that a large number of them will part with their certificates, with the result that a number of persons, probably very few, will make a big haul out of the transaction, and probably one or two years after the settlement the half-breeds will be very little better off. It would be worth trying the experiment. If it were found, after a few years, that they were not satisfied with the land, some other course might be taken.

Now, look how much this proposition is to the advantage of the half-breeds. At present the value of land in the North-west Territory is greater than it was when the original settlement was made. At that time land was worth $1 an acre—at least, that was what was thought to be the value of it. A large quantity of it was alienated by the Mackenzie Government at that figure. Now, my hon. friend says the selling price of land is $3 an acre.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) knows that Dominion lands would not run $3 an acre or anything like it. When I speak of the value of land, it must be remembered that we only get a chance to sell Dominion lands where they are valuable on account of location. But if the hon. gentleman would take the trouble to look at the map and see the amount of land that was taken up by the railway land grants, which cover almost the entire fertile portion of the North-west, and that for homesteads, he will see that there is very little available. It is not suggested that the half-breeds would be able to take up lands worth $3 an acre.

Mr. DAVIN. That proves my contention that the value of the lands must be very much greater than it was twenty years ago.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, but the whole country was available then ; you could put down scrip anywhere.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, but if so much land is taken up and there is such a very little percentage that can be put into the market, it is only a question in economics, and we need not come down to the facts at all ; we know very well that the value per acre must be greater than it was. We know, as a matter of fact, that the companies that have lands to sell now, are selling them pretty well ; and even the hon. gentleman's department is selling lands better than in former years, except in certain boom years when there was a special value attaching to land. I have visited some of the districts where the half-breeds that will be benefited by this arrangement are, and I can bear testimony to what an industrious, intelligent class of farmers they are ; and I am very much inclined to think that if, instead of giving them the option, they were shut up to taking land as satisfaction for their claim under this head, a great many of them would take the land, and take it willingly, while the freeing of others from the temptation of scrip would be an advantage. I think it would be worth the hon. gentleman's while to try the experiment anyway ; but if he does not do that, the suggestion of my hon. friend from Provencher would be of advantage to the half-breeds. As we are proceeding to settle, once for all, the claim under the Indian title in the North-west Territories, why, let us do it in the most advantageous way for the half-breeds. Let us consider the interests of that interesting class of our population ; and the suggestion of my hon. friend from Provencher would certainly be a better solution than the issue of scrip. It would amount to the same thing for the Government, because it means three-quarters of a million dollars out of the pocket of the Government in the end.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) knows one thing—he will agree with me that in this measure the first thing that the Government must have in view is to have peace, harmony and satisfaction among that class of our population. There is absolute force in the statement made a moment ago by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, that the half-breeds hold that they have a right to the soil, and nobody knows better than my hon. friend, who has been a resident of the North-west Territories for a long time, that every half-breed on the bank of the Saskatchewan who was not fully settled with in 1885, has a grievance, and of this fact the Government must not lose sight. Every child born in the North-west Territories since 1870 who has not been settled with, has a grievance. The basis of the settlement must be, that we recognize their claim and give them compensation. We determined at the outset, when we acquired the territory of the Hudson Bay Company, that we would treat the half-breeds as we would the Indians—that is, as first occupants of the soil. It has been the policy of the British Government from time immemorial not to take a possession of any lands without having in some way settled with the first occupants and giving them compensation. The British Government has always recognized the title of the Indian, and has also extinguished that title before allowing white people to settle in the Indian country. The question arose in 1870, how we should deal with the half-breed. We could not deal with them absolutely as Indians, nor could we deal with them as white people. We adopted a peculiar settlement—that is, we gave them compensation, but instead of dealing with them as we dealt with the Indians, giving compensation to the tribe, we decided to give compensation to the individual half-breeds, and that compensation we fixed at 240 acres. Now, we all recognize that we should settle with the half-breeds in the Athabasca district, which we are now invading. The only question is as to the mode of settlement. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) says : Make an experiment. For my part, I would not be inclined to do so. The one thing we must do is to give satisfaction to these people. If you make a settlement satisfactory to them, even though it is not profitable to them, you have, at all events, settled the question ; you have satisfied them and removed the cause of discontent. But if you make an experiment and leave a feeling of hardship in their hearts, you have the same thing as you have now—latent discontent among this class of our population. We must all agree, I am sure we do all agree, that we must have everybody satisfied in this country, whether Indian or half-breed, that the British Crown is giving him his full due, and is recognizing his right to everything to which he is entitled. I wish for my part that we could devise some settlement different from that which has been followed hitherto. My hon. friend has referred to the opinion of Archbishop Taché upon this subject, and no one could speak with greater authority than Archbishop Taché. As far back as 1869, he tendered to the Government of that day advice that the half-breeds ought not to be settled with by scrip in the Territories as they had been in Manitoba, but that it would be better to settle with them by giving them lands and keeping them somewhat as wards of the nation. That advice was not followed, and why ? Well, probably because the officers of the department at that time thought, and thought with some truth, that the half-breeds would not be satisfied to be dealt with as wards of the nation. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that those half-breeds, a mixture of Indian and white blood, are a very independent race, very independent in their nature, and very intolerant of any kind of subjection. However, the department would not treat with them; the only mistake which was made at that time was to do nothing at all. It would have been far better to make a settlement of some kind, although it might not have been the best possible settlement. But I say again we must settle this question. We cannot allow it to go on from year to year as it has been going on. We have now reached 1899, we are invading the Territories of the north where the Indians and half-breeds have not been disturbed up to this moment. White settlement has not gone north to the Saskatchewan hitherto, but now it is going as far as Slave Lake, Lake Athabasca and Mackenzie River. In order to meet the Indians and half-breeds, we have sent a commission to deal with them; we must deal with them, we must satisfy them. Again I say, that for my part I wish we could make a profitable settlement with them, but even if it be not a profitable settlement, we must make some arrangement that will make every one of them feel that they have received the compensation to which they are entitled. My hon. friend says some of them are good agriculturists. I know some of them were pretty well advanced in agriculture, and these have, no doubt, received their scrip and will take up land. But there are others who are not so advanced, and who will get rid of their scrip. No doubt many will squander it, I am pretty sure of that. But how that can be prevented is more than I can tell. If my hon. friend will suggest to me any method that will satisfy them, and at the same time be profitable to them, I will be glad to take it. But if he cannot do so, I can only repeat that we must settle with them anyhow, and in a manner to give them entire satisfaction.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me my hon. friend is more anxious to settle than he is to find some reasonable means of improving on the old settlement which he himself acknowledges to be faulty and a wasteful one. I do not know whether we quite understand what this question means. If the Minister of the Interior should come down to-night and ask for $750,000, this House would begin to wonder what that was for, and they would require a most approved plan for the economical and useful distribution of that money. Although my hon. friend does not come down and ask for that sum of money, it is exactly the same thing, for this $750,000 worth of scrip just means even as respects what it is sold to a broker or middleman—it just means $750,000 of an appropriation by this Parliament out of the funds of the Crown. Now, I do not think any of us want to rush in too quickly to the disposition of $750,000, unless we can make all that a wise Parliament ought to be able to make, in provision for a useful distribution of the money. Push the argument of my hon. friend to its conclusion, and it means that whatever may be the whim, the wish of these people, who have rights undoubtedly which we all acknowledge, and which we are all anxious to satisfy—whatever may be their whim or their wish, even though it be positively dangerous to them, we must gratify it in order that they may not feel a grievance. Now, let us ask ourselves whether a man is best treated who has a desire to have his right recognized, and when a Government offers him a substantial recognition of that right, which, taking an extreme case, we will say that man barter for drink, or for $5, or for a small sum, and wakes up the next day or the day after, to find that he is not one whit better off than he was before his rights were recognized, and that he has to face the world just as poor and just as badly equipped as was before; and that for ten, or fifteen, or twenty, or forty years of his life. Is it better to fling into that man's way an opportunity for damaging himself, or is it better for us to sit down and think out, even though it takes a little time, some plan which whilst we recognize his fullest right, we may also place the recognition of that right on a basis where it will be an actual good to the man himself. Now, is it not possible to do that? I believe it is, and although these children of nature may have their whims, and although they are independent as children of nature will be, and feel that they have a right to something, and to do with it as they like, there are no men more amenable to their proper guides and their true friends than are the half-breeds of the North-west. I believe it is possible by consultation, by some method of machinery in conjunction with those in whom they have confidence, to adopt a plan by means of which this grant may prove to the greatest extent useful to them. The Minister of the Interior has said that these men are mostly engaged in rural occupations, and are not scattered over a wide extent of territory. That is favourable to some method being adopted which may tend to conserve the interests they have. If they are agriculturally inclined, is it not possible that if their rights are recognized to the full by a grant of land, our purpose would be attained? When we went there and took possession of that territory the half-breeds had nothing but land, they had no money. It was the unfortunate substitution of scrip for land which gave them the idea that they had a right to something outside of what they possessed in the North-west when the white man invaded that portion of our country. That right is absolutely satisfied when they get their proper proportion of the land, all of which was theirs before, and on that was based the settlement. Now, if they are agriculturally inclined, would not the larger part of them think that they were justly dealt with if 240 acres of land were conserved to them and put at their disposal? Perhaps you would find some of them who would say: No, we have land enough. If they have land enough, and are agriculturally inclined, if they have the wheat they want, if they have the implements they want, and instead of getting this miserable scrip, which may go out of their hands for a mere song, could there not be, through a commission of their friends, acting with the Government, a plan by which those who have lands enough at the present time could get improved stock for their lands, agricultural machinery if they wanted it, which would be actually useful to them, and of great benefit to them? Then, after you exhaust all this, you will find remaining a remnant who will say: We don't want land, we don't want ploughs or harrows, we don't want stock; we want our scrip such as you gave to the Indians of the Northwest. You have a minority who will take that unreasonable position. If the matter is properly dealt with, and that minority can very easily be dealt with, I think, by a Government which is considerate and at the same time firm, and by their own friends, who would be in the arrangement, I think a satisfactory settlement could be made. There is another thing that I strongly object to: it was done before, but that is no argument. When I became Minister of Finance in the Government, I set my face strongly against any one having the power to issue currency—that is what it means. Here we are under our financial system, and under our currency system, and the issue of currency is a matter of the greatest moment. Here under cover where few understand it, and with the great bulk of the country knowing nothing about it, where there is no way of accounting for what he issues at all, you give to any Minister, in any department, power to issue scrip to the amount of hundreds and thousands and millions of dollars. I do not know how much has been issued, but it is something like $2,000,000 altogether. Does the hon. Minister know?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The whole amount contemplated here?

Mr. FOSTER. No, but that which has been issued.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think over $2,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Over $2,000,000 has been issued, and here we will have an addition of $750,000 or thereabouts. It is really an unlimited currency which is set afloat in this country redeemable in land. It all comes back and is redeemed in the equivalent of hard money so far as the treasury is concerned. I do not think it is a healthy power to place in the hands of any individual Minister, not saying anything about any particular Minister, the power of issuing money or scrip up to a certain limit, unlimited here. It is actually unlimited, but because it goes into the hands of two thousand, three thousand, four thousand or five thousand persons, and in this way the hon. Minister issues his redeemable currency, limited to a certain extent and sets it afloat in the country. I do not think it is proper finance or a proper thing to do. I am not saying this because I would object to this Minister any more than I would to a Minister in any preceding Government. I am trying to argue this on no party ground; I give the fullest recognition to the rights of freemen of the soil to the extinguishment of their claims. They have a right to it; we are strong enough and generous enough to give it to them, but cannot we give it to them with benefit rather than injury. Is it not possible to have a plan by which it will be bestowed in such a manner that it will be of actual advantage and by which it will not be wasted? Of this $2,000,000 of scrip, not one-tenth of it has really been a benefit to the men who were supposed to get it, and who have these great natural rights to the land which a generous people are willing to recognize. What these freemen of the soil should have is soil. Give them soil and give them something to work the soil with; give them agricultural implements, cattle, improved stock, and if this is properly gone about I believe that these people will be benefited. It will go to make their lands valuable and to help them to work the land. But, rather than give them this scrip, I would say: Let us make an end of these currency debts circulating through the country and give these men their money. Let us settle with them for so much money in lieu of their lands. That will not hurt them any more than the scrip, and I do not think it would hurt them so much. If scrip is given all the profit goes to the speculator, but if you give money that goes into general circulation and into the general line of trade, and benefits the community in that way, it might be arranged with those who do not want land and who just want money to have it paid in instalments from year to year as it is wanted under a commission constituted in some such way as I have hinted at. It would be a sterling benefit to these men and not liable to be wasted. I do not know whether these suggestions that we have made are at all acceptable or not, but I would make a plea for the sake of these people. What these men want to see, certainly, is an expression of the desire to satisfy their claims; and they want to see the machinery put in operation. If it is put in operation it does not matter so much whether it is done with a rush and in a few months or whether it is done in a reasonable way and they are approached in a reasonable way with the idea always that what is being done will inure to their greatest advantage.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, a few years ago I had a case, which will illustrate how these people get value for their scrip, placed before me in connection with a matter of public business. A gentleman, who had purchased scrip in the North-west Territories of the second issue, not of the first, which shows that scrip was bought also by speculators in regard to the second issue, as well as the first, owed the Department of the Interior $1,250. He told me that he was paying that amount by paying the Government $50 in cash and by giving them $1,200 worth of scrip which he had purchased from the half-breeds for $90. The Government were giving the half-breeds $90 and actually paying out of the treasury $1,200, or its equivalent, to a speculator who had purchased the half-breeds' scrip. The right hon. Prime Minister has said that it is his desire above all things, that there should be peace, harmony and satisfaction. The only difference between the position of the right hon. gentleman and the contention on this side of the House is that this side of the House desires that there should be peace, harmony and satisfaction amongst the half-breeds with the greatest possible advantage to the half-breeds themselves. It appears to me that the right hon. Prime Minister has insisted too strongly upon the necessity of dealing with these half-breeds as other half-breeds are dealt with. You are giving them no advantage whatever. You say: Here is scrip which is redeemable in land. You have scrip which will represent 240 acres of land. Why cannot you give them an option? Why cannot you say to them: We will give you scrip, as we gave it to the other half-breeds, or, if you like, we will give you so much cash. Can the half-breed be less satisfied, can he be the less contented, can there be less peace and harmony if he has his choice of money or scrip than as though you gave him scrip and gave him no choice of the money? The right hon. Prime Minister shakes his head.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would rather have the plan suggested by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster).

Mr. MONTAGUE. It comes to the same thing exactly, because you give him his choice, and, as I understand the plan of the hon. member for York, it was to give him his choice.

The PRIME MINISTER. It was to give stock and implements but no money.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not saying whether it should be cash or implements, but my suggestion is, that they should get value which they can use themselves, and which will not pass into the hands of the speculators. The incident I have given to this Parliament shows that the scrip does not get into the hands of the half-breeds at all, but goes to the speculator, and in the suggestions made from this side of the House—and they are not made in a party sense at all—the idea is to give the half-breeds more value. Do you mean to tell me that the half-breed in the North-west Territory is not able to do some sort of figuring? Do you mean to tell me that he does not know himself that he will sell that scrip for $25 or $50; and do you mean to tell me that he would not rather accept a proposal made on the part of the Government, that they will give him $50 this year, and $50 the next year, and $50 the next year, and $50 the year following, and $40 for the final year, instead of scrip? I believe that the half-breed, with $240 paid to him in five years, will be much more contented and satisfied than by getting a scrap of paper, which the day following he will turn over to a speculator for $25 or $30.

Mr. DAVIN. This letter has just come to me by the post from Fort Qu'Appelle:

Fort Qu'Appelle, Assa.,
June 29th, 1899.

Dear Mr. Davin,—It is rumoured here that the half-breeds born between 1870 and 1885 are to receive scrip, and in consequence the majority of them are selling their claims for $40 and $45, getting $5 or $10 down. The uselessness of giving them negotiable scrip is thus easily seen.

Would you mind asking the following questions in the House:—

1. Is the Government going to issue scrip to the half-breeds born in the North-west Territories between the years 1870 and 1885?

2. Will the scrip, if issued, be similar to the former issued, or will the Government make it only for land, and arrange it so that the latter cannot be disposed of, thus proving a benefit to the poor people entitled to it, and not for the advantage of the speculators who traffic in it?

3. Is the Government aware that half-breeds at Fort Qu'Appelle and Touchwood Hills are already disposing of their claims to such scrip for $40 and $45?

If the Government want information as to the third question, ask them to refer to the police detachments here and at Touchwood.

The matter is a serious one, for at the prices mentioned the Government virtually makes a present of $100 to speculators for each scrip issued, and it does no good to the half-breeds, as the small sum received is mostly spent in whisky.

Yours faithfully,
GEORGE F. GUERNSEY.

This letter is not marked "private," and the gentleman who wrote it is a notary public and conveyancer, a well-known man, and I do not believe he would have any objection to having his name mentioned. Mr. Guernsey has been in the North-west Territories since 1878, and you see the impression made on him in regard to that question. He used originally to be in the North-west Mounted Police, and his testimony is very valuable at this time. I do not think that my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) caught exactly the point of the argument I endeavoured to make. I did not say that every one of the half-breeds would say he was satisfied, if the Government decided: We will give you $240 each in the way that has been suggested. I am quite certain a number of them would be more satisfied to put a few dollars present money into their pockets. But the leaders and the more thoughtful amongst them will be more satisfied if the Government make the proposal which has come from this side of the House, and even those who now would be more pleased to get a few current bills into their pockets, will in the end be much more satisfied if the present Government follows a wiser policy than that adopted by their predecessors. I do not think the argument, as put by the right hon. gentleman, is very cogent. What he says is this: Whether the half-breeds squander it or not, let us satisfy them. I do not think that is the way in which the question should be regarded by the Parliament of Canada, and the Government of Canada, and the right hon. the Premier, and the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. Without treating the half-breeds too paternally, without treating them as we treat Indians on the reserves, I think we might feel we have a special responsibility towards them, as we have a responsibility towards all citizens, and that if we can make an arrangement—taking into account the moral qualities and the social development of any section of the community—an arrangement that while satisfying the demands of justice, will also be in the end highly beneficial to that class, we should make that arrangement rather than take a course that will be simply washing our hands of it, and by which we will permit a large sum of money to be simply thrown to the dogs, or worse.

Mr. CLANCY. There is no difference of opinion as to recognizing the claims of the half-breeds, but the difficulty exists only as to the best mode of dealing with the question in order that the half-breeds themselves may get the most benefit from it. It seems to me that some plan can be adopted as an alternative. The half-breed might first be offered the 240 acres, or scrip to the extent of $240. As I understand the Minister, scrip in the hands of a half-breed would purchase more land than in the hands of anybody else.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No. The half-breed might take 240 acres of land, if he wishes, or he might take $240 scrip. If he takes the $240 scrip, when it is presented, it goes in at par, dollar for dollar.

Mr. CLANCY. I was endeavouring to make that clear. The land is not allotted where it is only worth $1 an acre. The half-breed may get 240 acres of Dominion lands anywhere, and, since he can take 240 acres of land or $240 worth of scrip, he may have land more valuable than another person's land with that $240 worth of scrip in his hands. I would suggest, for the consideration of the Government, that in order to prevent the possibility of these speculators trafficking in scrip, the half-breeds would first be offered the land, and the land alone.

I would not confine them to that choice, however, because, as the First Minister says, we must deal with these people justly, and we must satisfy them. I have no doubt that it is often very difficult to satisfy them. The first proposition which the Government would make to the half-breeds, under my suggestion, would be this: We will give you the land, and if you do not want the land, we will give you scrip, but we will give you, as an alternative, the value which that scrip would be worth in the hands of a third party for the purpose of purchasing land. In other words, it would be determined by the value of the land purchased. That would give him all the advantages he would have by selling it, and a great deal more. It would completely drive out the middleman who purchases the scrip at a nominal sum. The half-breed would get what the scrip was worth, measured by the price of the land. It seems to me that is a reasonable proposition, and it would obviate the difficulty which the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) points out.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me that it is not possible for the Minister now, after the letter which has been read by my hon. friend from West Assinibola (Mr. Davin), not to consider this matter as to means. That is just the practical fact, that the very moment the word has gone out that there is going to be an issue of scrip, that very moment, like a swarm of wasps, you have these men lying in wait for every possible half-breed they can find, and by different arguments, getting his claim from him.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Let me point out to my hon. friend what has been done already. The practice in former years was to issue to the half-breeds a certificate which was so drawn that one might fancy it had been drawn for the express purpose of making it as easy as possible for a broker to get hold of it. Notwithstanding all the years I lived in the North-west, I never saw one of these original certificates until I came to the department.

Mr. FOSTER. That is because you were not a half-breed.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. When I came to examine the certificate, I found that it simply said: "This certificate entitles John Smith or the bearer to $240 worth of scrip," setting out the particulars. So that when a certificate was issued, all that a broker had to do was to get possession of it without making himself liable for stealing it, and he would be entitled to come here and make a demand for the scrip. I decided to have the form altered to say that the assignee would be recognized upon a proper assignment being filed in the department. I venture to say that assignments cannot be filed in the department for a large number of the certificates, for the simple reason that probably two-thirds of the half-breeds are now under age, and are not legally qualified to make an assignment, and the certificate would be simply held by them until they were qualified. At the same time, they would feel that their rights were recognized. The chances are that the people buying scrip, to whom the hon. member for West Assiniboia refers, are people who think that the certificates are going to be issued in the same form as in previous years, but they will be woefully disappointed when they find that the half-breed no longer gets a certificate which he can simply hand over. In former years the certificate of minors were issued in this form, and the result was that the practice to which my hon. friend refers was practically encouraged by the action of the department; but everything the department could do to stop that practice has been done, and I fancy that the simple step I have taken will go far to prevent it. It is a matter of notoriety in the North-west that when certificates for scrip were delivered in former years there was a free use of whisky in the immediate neighbourhood of the proceeding, and a great many half-breeds, while under the influence of liquor, imprudently gave away their scrip for trifling sums. I do not want to make any insinuation against the friend of the hon. member for Haldimand, but it looks as if he had in his possession $1,200 of scrip which he got for $90. The half-breed knows very well the value of his scrip, and unless he is got under the influence of liquor by unscrupulous persons, he gets within a reasonable percentage of what the scrip is supposed at the time to be worth on the market. Cases arose of this kind. Certificates were issued perhaps to a man with a family of five. They were all handed to the nearest relative, and sometimes the half-breed was got under the influence of liquor, and all of them were turned over to some one else for a mere song. That cannot be done under the arrangement I have made, in the large proportion of cases. Those hon. members who think these half-breeds can be treated like children are suggesting an arrangement that cannot be carried out. In answer to the suggestion of the hon. member for York as to the immediate necessity of dealing with the half-breeds, I may state that it was brought to my attention by men familiar with the whole question that the half-breeds living in the Athabasca district are in more or less constant communication with those who live in the more southerly portion of the North-west Territories; and it was pointed out to me by these men that it would be utterly impossible for the Indian commission to undertake to deal with the Indians unless some arrangement were made for dealing with the half-breeds too

Mr. SIFTON.

They live and associate with them very largely, and the half-breeds have a great deal of influence with the Indians, and I have been assured by men best posted on the subject that it would be quite useless to send out a commission to undertake to deal with the Indians unless they were in a position to satisfy the half-breeds at the same time. We would not be in a position to make a satisfactory arrangement with the half-breeds of the Athabasca district without dealing with the whole of them. Therefore, is it necessary to take power to deal with the whole question at once. I recognize fully the difficulty, but every one must recognize the fact that when you are settling a political grievance you have to settle it in a way satisfactory to the men who have it—of course I do not mean to satisfy any whim they may have. If the late Government had never issued the scrip, I would be the last to suggest it, but since a certain course of action was followed, these people claim they are entitled to the same treatment. If they were willing to take anything else, we would be willing to give it to them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Give them the option.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The best opinion I can get from the men best posted leads me to suppose that there is no immediate prospect of settling this question except by giving them land or scrip, redeemable in land, as we suggest, with any limitations we can place to prevent immediate alienation. If prevented from alienating the scrip for the first three months, the immediate danger is averted, that is the danger of their being induced to part with the scrip by people who will follow the commissioners and resort to those peculiar means of obtaining the scrip which are resorted to in such cases. That is the only means I can suggest as likely to improve the position of affairs and make the assistance we are giving more beneficial.

Mr. HAGGART. What will this scrip be received in payment of?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Land.

Mr. HAGGART. Only land?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Only land.

Mr. HAGGART. The other scrip was received in payment of mining licenses, the purchase of coal lands, the purchase of ranches. Is this Bill drawn differently?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There is nothing in the Act that authorizes the scrip to be received in payment of anything except land.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman proposes to issue scrip, and I understand that in the case of alienation, an assignment must be lodged in the department in order to make the alienation effective. I suppose the course taken by the agent of a private bank or broker would be this. They would have an attorney present and have an assignment when they would be lodged with the Department of the Interior, and that would give them the title to the land.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. How will they do that in the case of a minor?

Mr. DAVIN. Let us deal with one who is of age. The assignment will be with the Department of the Interior. What safeguard is there in that?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The safeguard is what the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, namely, that in four cases out of five the broker never could get an assignment executed at all. The scrip issued by the late Government did not require any assignment or endorsement, but was practically like a note of hand payable to bearer. Why was it made thus? Does the hon. gentleman suppose that the men who passed that law did not know what they were doing? The scrip was made out in that way because of the difficulty of obtaining an assignment. You can get a certificate out of the possession of a half-breed when you could not get an assignment from him signed before a witness.

Mr. DAVIN. That is a certain safeguard. But my hon. friend said that that would create some dissatisfaction, and in that respect he is going contrary to the principle laid down by the Prime Minister, who said the great object was to satisfy these people.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. What I say is this. I want to do everything possible to protect the half-breeds, without treating them as a ward. If he says: I wish to sell this scrip and am prepared to execute a legal assignment just as if he were selling a farm, there is nothing to prevent his doing so. If we prevent his doing that we are simply refusing to recognize him as a citizen and treating him as a ward or an infant not fit to deal with his own property. But I do not propose making it as easy for him to part with his scrip as he would with a promissory note, payable to bearer, but to subject him to the legal formality of making an assignment, and this will protect him to some extent. The hon. gentleman knows very well that the half-breed may be got very readily to dispose of his scrip, especially if under the influence of liquor. But when the person who desires to purchase it has to get an assignment in proper form attested by a witness, he is under certain restraint, and an inquiry can be made at any time into the manner in which this scrip was obtained. If the half-breed would afterwards say that he had not parted with the scrip, or that he was under the influence of liquor when he parted with it, that assignment is of record and the facts can be investigated and the scrip cancelled or steps taken to call it in, if it has not already been presented for payment. So that it is not at all the same thing to permit a man to hand his property over without any assignment at all and to compel him to make a formal assignment of it before the transfer is complete. It will make the difference of perhaps two-fifths of the scrip being disposed of very quickly and a very small fraction being disposed of it.

Mr. DAVIN. But does not the hon. gentleman see what an argument that puts in the hands of the Opposition against the contention of the Prime Minister, which was that we should satisfy these people?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think they will be satisfied.

Mr. DAVIN. A few moments ago the hon. gentleman said that no doubt that would not be as satisfactory to them—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. What?

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman said that the new departure would not be as satisfactory to them as the old arrangement. He said they preferred the old arrangement.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood me.

Mr. DAVIN. No, the hon. gentleman will find it in "Hansard." But even without trying to pin him to anything he said a moment ago, does he suppose that this arrangement will be as satisfactory, at the first blush, to the half-breeds, as the old system.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). This is an arrangement which, it seems to me, they could not object to when it was presented to them. We say: You are getting the scrip, as people got it before, and when you want to dispose of it you are in a position to dispose of it by executing a legal document, and this safeguard is placed there in order that the document may not be transferred without the exercise of your capacity as a citizen to dispose of your property. They may say: We want to dispose of it by simply handing it over. But I do not think many of them would take that position, but would be satisfied with the arrangement we propose.

Mr. DAVIN. Then why not go further and offer them the land? Would not the same intelligence that the hon. Minister relies upon justify him in taking that step? Land is really worth more than $240, or $1 per acre. Why, the time is coming very soon when you will not be able to get an acre of land in the North-west Territories for less than $10.

Mr. MONTAGUE. After a change of Government.

Mr. DAVIN. No doubt, there will be a change of Government before that time; but I would not attribute this increase of value to a change of Government, but to the real cause—that the country is settling up and land becoming scarcer. Taking the reasoning of the hon. Minister of the Interior himself, we are forced to the position suggested by this side, namely, that we should trust the wisdom of the half-breeds and say: We will not give you scrip for those who are improvident amongst you to squander: what we will do is to give you land that your best friends, like Archbishop Taché, hold should not be made alienable at your hands; we will give you lands, which as it accretes in value will be a great resource for you and your children. You will raise their self-respect and you will do the best thing both for them and for Canada. The Minister sees the viciousness of the old course. But why should he not depart further from it? He says it was a vicious thing to make an arrangement that enabled the half-breed to alienate his scrip the moment it came into his hands.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. We have a check upon that.

Mr. DAVIN. But why not adopt a more effective check?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It is perfectly effective, within the rights of a citizen to dispose of his property.

Mr. DAVIN. But the hon. gentleman knows well that the moment this is published, that moment you will have not merely the broker's agent, but accompanying the broker's agent you will have a solicitor, and that solicitor with his assignments all ready and witnesses that will witness anything.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the Minister of the Interior has answered himself. He stated very fairly and plausibly that a change in the old practice would cause dissatisfaction among the half-breeds when the settlement was entered upon. Now, as I understood the hon. gentleman will not issue certificates for scrip to minors. Am I correct in that?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Let me explain. The commissioners who were sent up on the occasion of former settlements did not issue scrip directly, but issued to the half-breed a certificate for scrip. The certificate gave power to claim scrip. The certificate which is being issued to the half-breeds of the Athabasca district will not entitle the bearer to claim the scrip, but will enable the person to whom it is issued or his legal assignees to claim it.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And a minor cannot assign it?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Now, we quite understand the hon. Minister. Under the old system, the father of seven children came to the commissioner and said: I want eight certificates for scrip. And having got them, he could sell them, and the party who bought them could get the scrip for them. Now, let us see how it is at the present time. The half-breed, who is such a delicate and peculiar character to deal with, and is suspicious that he is not being dealt with as fairly as his brother was a few years ago, walks up with his seven children and asks for certificates for himself and them. He gets a certificate for himself, and if he assigns it properly he can sell it. But when he comes to dispose of the certificates of his children, he finds he cannot dispose of them, because he cannot assign them; consequently he says to himself: I am not treated the same as the half-breed was a few years ago. Now, I am supposing he is as improvident as can be and desires to get rid of this scrip belonging to his children. He recalls the fact that his brother, ten years ago got scrip for his whole family and could dispose of it at once, while he is hedged around with difficulties. This will cause dissatisfaction. The Minister said that if the half-breed would take anything else than a certificate for scrip he would be glad to give it to him. But he does not offer him anything but the certificate.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. We have the power to give him the land or the scrip.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is to say, he can assign his scrip and take the land. But suppose he would prefer to take the money, you have not power to give it to him?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I was dealing with the proposition we should make to Parliament. I said that we would be happy to make an arrangement, if we thought the House would accept it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What we contend for is that the half-breed should be given an opportunity to take cash if he wants it. The Minister said that if he would prefer to take that, he would rather see him get it than the certificate for the scrip. What we say is that the Minister should give him power to take scrip or an annuity for a certain number of years, if he wants it, instead of giving him a certificate that he can dispose of for a song. Now, I want to refer to what the Minister said in regard to the figures I gave him. I have no personal knowledge of the deal. It was a gentleman who came here to purchase some lands of the Government, and who gave me the figures—that was in 1888. What have we now? He paid $18 for the scrip ten years ago, five certificates at $18 each, $90, and my hon. friend produces a letter from the field where operations are begun at the present time, and where they are only paying $40. Notwithstanding that the Minister says that the half-breeds know the value of scrip pretty well, here is a statement directly from the North-west Territories, where these certificates will be issued, saying that they are actually selling them for $40, and accepting $5 in cash for them.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I thought the hon. gentleman said that his friend got $1,200 in scrip for $90.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, I did say that. I said that he got $1,250 worth of scrip, for which he only paid $90, and under the price which seems to rule at the present time, he paid $200. Now, there is not such an awful difference between $200 and $90, when you count nine years of increased enlightenment, and increased intelligence, and increased arithmetic, in the minds of the half-breeds of the North-west Territories.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think my hon. friends on the other side of the House see a difficulty in dealing with this question which they did not realize when they were in office, because when they were in office they had the doing of it. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that all these things were brought to their attention at the time. They did not even take the small step I have taken in the way of changing the certificate, they let the certificate go fixed up just to suit the broker. One would think the broker must have drawn the certificate himself, or got a lawyer to draw it, because there is no other explanation for it. It was drawn to enable the broker to get hold of that scrip in the easiest possible way. I think my hon. friends opposite lose sight of the fact that this is not a new question, is not a thing that we are beginning to deal with now, is not a thing which we have no knowledge about in so far as the disposition of the people we have to deal with, is concerned. Every man there knows exactly what he thinks he is entitled to from the Government; he knows, or thinks he knows, that he is entitled to $240 in scrip, and I do not believe any arrangement could be made with these people except by giving them 240 acres in land or the equivalent in scrip. I am inclined to think that the limit of interference on the part of the Government will be reached when we say to these people: We will do our best to prevent an improvident alienation of the property. We may be able to devise other and more effective means to prevent alienation, but I think that is as far as the Government will be able to go.

Mr. DAVIN. There is no form of certificate here. Where does he provide for the form?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That is a departmental matter. It was never put in the Bill, and I would not care to put it in, because experience might suggest some change. It is a matter that will go on for the next three or four years. As a matter of fact, the Athabasca half-breeds are the only ones that will be dealt with this year by the commission that has gone up there. I do not expect that we will deal with the half-breeds of the more southerly portion of the North-west Territories until next year, and we will have time to give a good deal of consideration to this measure.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman states that the late Government made no change in that respect, that they issued only scrip to the half-breeds. If my memory serves me right, instead of issuing scrip altogether to the half-breeds, there was some provision suggested by the hon. member from Saskatchewan by which three or four townships were reserved to them, which it was intended to give them instead of scrip.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think they had the privilege of taking land, and we intend to give them the same privilege; but they took scrip.

Mr. HAGGART. But the whole issue of scrip was not given them; three or four townships were retained for them.

Mr. LARIVIERE. That was a different scheme altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand the Minister to say that there have been some townships reserved north of the Saskatchewan, under Father Lacombe's patronage, where he is now trying to get the half-breeds to go?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it proposed to give the half-breeds who are willing to go there a certain amount of land?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If they go there they will go there simply as homesteaders, they will take up a homestead in the ordinary way under the Act; they will get no special privileges.

Mr. FOSTER. So, any of those whose title you extinguish by this method would not get any added advantage there?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No.

Mr. FOSTER. I still believe it is practicable for the hon. gentleman, in the coming year, to form a commission a little different to the present one, that is, a commission one of whose members would be Father Lacombe, if he would undertake it, to see what might be done in the way of confining this to lands, and to agricultural implements, and to cattle for those who have as much land as they wish; or they might take up part land and take stock for the farm as well. As for the residuum, those who will say: We don't want lands, nor scrip, nor anything like that; the commission would say to these: Well, if you don't want that, commute it for so much money, and let that money be paid to you, so much per year. Now, if the half-breed knows, as he can be told, that the House is a unit, that the House has given its adhesion to his rights, and is trying to do the best it can for the half-breeds, it seems to me that you will overtake the great mass of that difficulty which you see in the way of the half-breeds wanting to be treated just as they were treated before. You have departed from that; you are not treating him in the same way; you are keeping his children's scrip until they grow up. There you are making a change. Commissions have been appointed for trivial purposes, and on some occasions unworthy purposes; it would be rather a good thing to have a commission appointed here to try to do as much good as possible for these half-breeds. How does the hon. gentleman propose to enumerate the half-breeds who are to partake of this benefit?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. We have appointed a commission of two men.

Mr. FOSTER. Will they be enumerators for the North-west half-breeds as well as for those in Athabasca?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They will be later. I do not expect they will get to the North-west half-breeds this season.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up too much of the time of the committee on this question, but I may say that, perhaps, the best ideas that we can express upon this question may not be practicable on account of the class of people we have to deal with. In this matter, unless we can go one better than has been done in the past, it will not be acceptable to the half-breeds. These people will not stand any tutorship. They think, and I say they are right, that they are entitled to be treated as white people are treated and that they are entitled to look after their own affairs. But, Sir, at the same time, I think that we made mistakes, first, when we granted a large area of land in Manitoba which the half-breeds sold for a mere song, as has been stated, and second, when we issued scrip that was negotiable with anybody except with the Government which issued it. This scrip should have been negotiable with the

Mr. FOSTER.

Government, either in land or cash, and I still contend that instead of issuing certificates which are transferable to Tom, Dick and Harry, that is to say, to the speculators, scrip should be issued to the parties who are entitled to receive it, and then those parties should be entitled to get as many acres of land as that scrip called for. If they did not choose to take land the Government should make that scrip negotiable in the monetary institutions, and at the Government offices, for its face value. This would do away with the speculator and the middle man. This scrip would be negotiable in the market at the face value of $240, and the half-breeds would know that they were entitled to get $240 for their scrip. Therefore, they would not accept less money for it. But what is being done? The commission sits; a claim is made by a half-breed; it is examined by the commissioners, and the moment they find out that it is a good one a certificate is issued. The hon. Minister of the Interior says that these certificates will not be good hereafter to the bearer, but it comes to the same thing. He will accept an assignment of these certificates; these assignments will be prepared by members of the legal profession, who will be entitled to a fee and that fee will be paid, not by the purchaser, but by the poor half-breed, as has been done on many former occasions in Manitoba. Therefore, these assignments, being acknowledged by the Government, will come here by the bundle; they will be handed over to the speculators who will have got these certificates and scrip will be issued to these speculators. No certificates should be issued, but this scrip should be issued by the Government direct to the parties entitled to receive it. This scrip could be used to purchase 240 acres of land, or the Government could pay the face value of it, $240, either in the departmental office here, or it could be made negotiable in the banks and acceptable by the Government from the banks. In this way you would, in effect, reduce the modus operandi by which this scrip is issued, and the Government would not lose a cent from the fact that they accepted this scrip afterwards from the speculators at the face value, at the rate on the dollar, for the purchase of land and whatever difference there is between what the half-breed receives and what the Government accepts it at, goes to the speculator and not to the half-breed. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has just read a letter which says that scrip has already been bought in advance for $30 or $40 which is worth $240. This scrip will be accepted at the face value of $240, and, therefore, $200 will go to the speculator, and the poor half-breed will receive only $30 or $40. The Government should pay the half-breed $240 for his scrip, or give 240 acres of land for it. In that way there would be no middleman, and the half-breed would get the full value and be perfectly satisfied, because he would, under this arrangement, be better treated than he has been on former occasions.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am utterly at a loss to find out just what the committee is intending to do. I hold in my hand the Bill which we are now considering. By clause 4 it is intended to strike out section "f" of clause 90 of the Dominion Lands Act and substitute therefor the words :

Grant lands in satisfaction of claims of half-breeds arising out of the extinguishment of the Indian title.

It seems to me that we have, for the last two hours been discussing some question that is not really before the committee. What is really before the committee is the consideration of granting lands in satisfaction of these half-breeds claims, and not scrip at all. I would like to ask the hon. Minister where we would find the law relative to the granting of scrip, or under what authority he proposes to grant scrip? Certainly, there is nothing in the Bill before us, and I can find nothing in the Act which he proposes to amend. While I am on my feet I would say that, if there is a law anywhere authorizing the Government to grant scrip, and if it is the desire of the Government to prevent that scrip getting into the hands of speculators, I think a very simple plan could be adopted, and it would be printing across the face of the certificate, in plain letters, in red ink, that "This certificate is not transferable." If it is bought by any speculator he buys it on the distinct understanding that he cannot realize one cent on it. The half-breed would be entirely protected. He could not be imposed upon by any speculator, and he could only have the scrip redeemed by surrendering it for land or surrendering it to the Government for its full price, so that the money would go into the pocket of the half-breed instead of into the pocket of the speculator. I would like the hon. Minister to give the information to those of us who have not been following the debate very closely, and to say under what statute scrip is granted?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Subsection "f" of section 4 is the clause under which authority will be given to the Government to issue scrip. The words are substantially the same as they were in the old Act, and are held by the Department of Justice to be sufficient for the purposes suggested. As to restricting the negotiability of the certificate and printing that across the scrip, I may say that the late Government when they first issued scrip tried that, and for reasons best known to themselves they abandoned it. The department found that, notwithstanding the fact that they placed across the face of the scrip a statement that it was not negotiable, yet others took an assignment of the scrip as they would of a farm, and ultimately the Government had to recognize it. You cannot say to a man that he shall not sell his property.

Unless he is a minor or insane, he can sell his property and you cannot make any arrangement that you can adhere to, by which you refuse to recognize the right of a man to sell his property when once he gets it.

Mr. HENDERSON. That to me is very strange reasoning. If the Government advances a certificate to a half-breed, on the distinct understanding that the money will not be paid or that the land will not be given to another person but the half-breed, no law in the world, it appears to me, can compel the Government to make that good to a third party. We have in Ontario a law with regard to notes given for patents, and across the face of the note is printed these words, "this note is good for a patent right." and if any man purchases that note he takes it at his own risk. If the maker does not owe it, the maker has not to pay it.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. We cannot say we did not owe it?

Mr. HENDERSON. But you can say that you do not owe it to the third party who has possession of it. If the law is properly carried out, I do not think any power could compel the Government to make that scrip good to a third party. It was something that he had no right to receive and concerning which he had abundant notice that he could not possibly collect. I commend to the Minister a plan of that kind with regard to the scrip, and that he should adhere to it emphatically and distinctly that none but the original holder of the scrip shall benefit by it. I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me strange if the courts would not bear the Minister out in his refusal to pay the money to a third party under the circumstances. The danger the Minister fears is that for some reason or other, not known to the House, but apparently known to himself, he might be forced to do it, but most certainly the law would not force him.

Mr. McMULLEN. The question appears to be surrounded by a great many difficulties. It is quite clear that a loss would be sustained by the half-breeds, but if you print across the face of the scrip that it is not good for anybody else, then the half-breed to whom the scrip is given will at once cry out that he is not treated as the others have been treated, and if you can get another Louis Riel in the North-west, these men would be ready to go into rebellion. The cry would be: Why not permit us to sell our scrip as the others have been permitted to sell it. The hon. gentleman from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) suggested that we should pay money instead of scrip. I do not think the country should pay $240 to a half-breed simply because he refuses to take 240 acres of land.

Mr. DAVIN. Is my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) under the impression that the country will not have to pay the $240 in any case ?

Mr. McMULLEN. I quite understand the Government will have to accept it in payment for land. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. LaRivière) suggests that it should be redeemed in money and not in land.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think it is right the country should be called upon to do that. If a half-breed sells his scrip for a song or for a glass of whisky, as some hon. gentleman said, that is not the fault of the country. These half-breeds have the inheritance of the land and the proper way is to give it to them. I hold that if you refuse them the permission to use their scrip as they wish, there will be a great deal of trouble amongst these half-breeds.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) says he does not want to see the Government give the half-breeds the money, but he would rather see the Government give the money to the speculators. The Government has got to give the money.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government absolutely has to give the money.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend will not force me to admit what is not a fact. The Government issues the scrip to the half-breeds worth 240 acres, but to any other person it is good for $240 worth of land. That is not money.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, suppose my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) is a half-breed, and suppose I am a white man. He gets his scrip for $240, and he can walk into the land office, and take 240 acres of land, and pay for it with that scrip of $240. But suppose he does not want to do that. The contention of my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) is: I do not want to see the Government give money for that. Well, I am a white man and I am buying 500 acres of land from the Government and I have to pay the Government $3 an acre or $1,500. I can either pay the $1,500 in cash, or I can buy your scrip and hand the Government $1,260, and the $240 worth of scrip. Is not that money? I say that money should go into the hands of the half-breeds, and not into the hands of the speculators. Why should the Government give me $240 for what I bought from the half-breed for $10, when the half-breed himself got it for $240 in value or for what was better, if he took it, namely, 240 acres of land. What I want the Government to hold in mind is this: that they must ultimately pay for every dollar in scrip at least $1 in hard cash. I say: Pay to the man to whom you owe it, and not to the speculator, and even though the man to whom you owe it squanders it, let him have the pleasure of squandering the whole of it. My contention is that it could be so arranged by proper machinery, that it would be paid to him gradually. My first contention is that nothing should be given but land; but if that will not satisfy, and scrip has to be given let the man to whom you give the scrip get the full benefit, and not the speculator; and my contention is that it could be given to him in annuities of, say, $40 a year, which would be likely to secure for him the whole benefit of the scrip. Then, if he squandered the whole of it, it would be his own business.

Mr. McMULLEN. We are doing all we can to get the North-west settled, by spending money on immigration agents and in other ways; and when we pay out the $240 in land, it is not the same as paying $240 in cash. It secures another settler in the North-west. If the half-breed chooses to sacrifice his interest in the land, and hand it over to somebody else, you cannot prevent that, unless you adopted the annuity which my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) loses sight of the fact that if this scrip issues now, it will be all paid back by parties who owe the Government for land which they purchased last year. They will pay in scrip when they would otherwise have paid in money.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I have had the pleasure of being in the North-west as early as 1867, again in 1869, in 1872, in 1874, and so on. I had the pleasure of living there for a number of years, and if the Opposition in this House think that these half-breeds are fools, they do not know whom they are talking about. These men are quite as able to make bargains as any other men in this country. They are quite able to take care of themselves in most positions in life. When scrip is being issued to the half-breeds, there are a number of people going around to the different towns where it is given out, for the purpose of bidding for it, and to my knowledge it has gone up to $170 or $180. In Calgary, in 1886, the larger proportion of all the scrip that was issued brought $175, and the half-breeds used the money in buying horses, wagons and other articles required on their farms. It is true, there are a few among them who spend their money freely, but you could not find any communities in Ontario or Quebec where the same would not be the case. If you try to make a bargain with these people, you will find that they make as close a bargain as almost any other people you meet. So I do not think the loss as between the native and the purchaser would be very great. When the scrip is issued, you have bankers, brokers and speculators going about, all anxious to get the scrip, and willing to pay the highest market price for it. If it is sold at once to the highest bidder, I am satisfied that the half-breed gets all there is in it for him.

Mr. DAVIN. I am fully sensible of what my hon. friend says. I know very well that you can find as shrewd traders amongst the half-breeds of the North-west Territories as amongst any other class in the world—and as shrewd farmers, too. But I have met thoughtful and able men amongst them who were thoroughly convinced that if the course had been taken which it is admitted was suggested by Archbishop Taché, of giving them land and not its equivalent in scrip their interests would have been better served. I would ask the Minister of the Interior, for he must know, whether Father Lacombe is in favour of the issue of scrip?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I could not speak positively as to his views.

Mr. DAVIN. If the Minister has conversed with Father Lacombe, I am inclined to think that Father Lacombe, unless he has changed his mind, would have impressed him strongly with the view that the giving of land was the better course.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I always hesitate to express any other man's opinion. I may say that I discussed this matter with Father Lacombe, and, according to the best of my recollection, he did not express himself positively to me. We spoke generally of the question of giving land, and, if I remember correctly, he approved of that as an alternative, but did not express himself positively as to the giving of scrip.

On section 5.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I move that sections 5, 6 and 7, as printed in the reprint, be added to the Bill. To save time, I will explain them all together. They are for the purpose of dealing with the board of examiners for Dominion land surveyors. The board at present consists of eight members, which is an unnecessarily large number. The Surveyor General has strongly recommended that the number be reduced to three, and these three sections provide for recasting the board.

On section 7,

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. This section provides that if any member of the board be unable, through illness or other cause, to attend a meeting, his place may be temporarily filled by another duly qualified Dominion topographical surveyor, to be appointed by Order in Council, as the occasion requires.

On section 8,

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The only difference between this and clause 119 of the present law is, that, under the present law, a member is not entitled to any pay if he does come more than 100 miles.

There were eight members of the board. In the new clause, he will be entitled to pay, if ordered to come and attend the meetings. Under the new provision, there will be only three members, but they will be working members and come when wanted, upon instructions, and consequently be entitled to pay. This Bill will reduce the cost of the meetings.

The committee rose and reported.

LAND TITLES ACT.

Bill (No. 149) further to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894 (Mr. Sifton) read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I explained the first clause, when introducing the Bill. It simply provides that plans may be cancelled in cases where town sites were registered against lands that are not required for town site privileges, without certificates of title being taken out for the separate lots. The law at present requires that certificate of title be taken out for the different lots. The difficulty is, that in some cases the proceedings to get a certificate of title would cost more than the whole land is worth. The next clause provides for an omission in the law; it provides that we may register a plan of the survey of an Indian reserve.

The committee rose and reported.

GAME PRESERVATION ACT.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 153) to amend the Unorganized Territories Game Preservation Act, 1894.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and House resolved itself into committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I move that all after the words "thereof" in the first section be struck out. I may explain that the Bill is for the purpose of extending the protection to the buffalo. It runs now to 1900. The proposition is to extend it to 1902. A couple of clauses inserted here state what might be done after 1902; but it is thought that the better way would be to wait until nearer that time, when the House can decide what is to be done.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill, as amended, reported.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson) moved second reading of Bill (No. 154) further to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Section 63 of the Customs Act provides that, in cases where entry has been made of goods and there has been an error in the invoice and some goods have not come in the shipment covered by the invoice, within ten days after the entry a correction can be made and a refund of duty given. In many cases, entries are made before the goods arrive at the port, and it is found that the time is too short in some cases for the party to make a claim within ten days of the entry. It is proposed by adding the words "or landing" to allow ten days after the landing which will give an opportunity for the deficiency to be ascertained.

On section 2,

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Section 245 of the Customs Act empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations for a great many different purposes, arranged under sections distinguished by letters of the alphabet. It is proposed to add to the Act giving the Governor in Council power to make provisions that will permit the export of deer under conditions to be determined upon. As hon. gentlemen know, under the laws of the several provinces the killing of deer is permitted to those who take out licenses from the provincial government. In Ontario I believe each licensee is permitted to kill two deer, in Quebec five or six, and in New Brunswick some other number. Now, chap. 16 of 61 Victoria absolutely prohibits the export of deer or any part of the carcass of a deer. The sportsmen from other countries want to take back a deer that they have shot as a trophy. It is proposed, under this section, to empower the Governor in Council to make regulations that will permit the export of deer.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is there any export duty on deer?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The export is prohibited.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it intended to put an export duty on?

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is a change of policy; what is the reason for it?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I cannot say that it has been asked for by the provincial government of Ontario, but they have no objections to it. Representatives from the province of Quebec have spoken to me saying they were anxious to have such a change, and I believe it is the wish of the government of that province.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the hon. gentleman heard from the Fish and Game Commissioner with regard to this?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There can be no danger in this. Under the provincial laws sportsmen are allowed to kill deer. I suppose the reason for the law forbidding the export of deer was that it was found that deer were being slaughtered too rapidly and there was danger of destroying them as game altogether. It is proposed, under proper regulations, to allow a sportsman from a foreign country to take home a deer as a trophy just as the sportsmen of Ontario may do.

Mr. CLANCY. The object of the game laws in the province of Ontario is to minimize as much as possible the number of deer that might be killed, and you prevent that object by this Bill, because you induce men from a foreign country to kill within the regulation, and, by allowing exportation, to destroy the number of deer in the country. This will entirely undo the object of limiting the number. You might just as well increase the number each man might kill, as to increase the number of men who may come and kill. The hon. gentleman, by this Bill, will increase the number of sportsmen who might kill, for the simple reason that they can take the carcass home.

Mr. FLINT. What is the objection to allowing them to take it home?

Mr. CLANCY. It was thought to be a serious objection that you induce men to come from a foreign country. The number of sportsmen is great enough in this country to kill off the deer more rapidly than they are being reproduced. For that reason you limited the number of men who might kill. The hon. gentleman is doing away with the protection given in Ontario for the deer, and I think there ought to be some expression from the game commission. I am afraid this is being done without their having known about it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think it was the game warden of Quebec that came with the members, and he is very anxious for it. You see, the provincial government allow the slaughter of deer anyway. The American sportsman comes over and gets his license from the provincial government, and goes out and kills deer.

Mr. CLANCY. But he will not come if he cannot take the carcass back.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The province of Quebec went to great expense last year in making an exhibition of game in

New York, and aroused quite an interest among the sportsmen. These men came and spent large sums of money in the country. There is a clause in the game laws of the province of Quebec that they must not allow the carcass to be destroyed or wasted. The Dominion law says they shall not take it home with them. So, where is the danger?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman is giving a privilege to a few persons, namely, sportsmen from the United States and sportsmen here, while there is a general feeling that there are others who have rights.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Supposing, under the present arrangement, a few sportsmen from other countries do come and shoot, though they are not permitted to take away the deer, the number of those who will come when this arrangement is in force will be much greater than it is at the present time. I am not a sportsman myself, and, therefore, am not au fait with the circumstances, but I would suggest to the Minister that he should make haste slowly. It is a matter regarding which the province of Ontario, I know, has spent a great deal of money and careful thought, and now they believe they have a pretty perfect system for the protection, especially, of the larger game. I think the Minister has not had formal consultation with the provincial authorities, and has not acted upon the advice of the game commissioners. He should leave this over for the present, rather than legislate at the request of a few private individuals, or even at the request of one province, when it is a matter that affects the provinces. I know there is a strong feeling among the sportsmen of this province for the better protection of game, instead of lessening the regulations.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The question has been discussed in the press, and the game associations, while they have not communicated with me directly, are fully apprised of this measure. The provincial governments have it in their hands at any time to grant or withhold licenses. Granting licenses to shoot is wholly within the power of the provincial governments; this does not interfere with them at all. It simply removes the embargoes that prevent a customs duty, allowing a man, if he shoots a deer under a provincial license, to take the deer home. The reason I propose the amendment in this way is, that if there should be any danger, such as that apprehended by hon. gentlemen opposite, it will not need an Act of Parliament to repeal it. We are only taking power by Governor in Council to make certain regulations.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman knows that to increase the slaughter of deer in the province of Ontario for one year or two years, while he is finding out whether any harm is done, is a very serious matter to the game interests in the province of Ontario. With regard to the laws of the province of Quebec, how are foreigners treated?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. They are licensed to shoot, the same as Canadians; all have to take a license.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So, we are treated the same as aliens. Each province is trying to protect its game interests in its own way, and I think unless the Minister has had the formal approval of the provincial authorities, he ought to hesitate.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The provincial government need not grant the licenses; it is they who are charged with the preservation of the game.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Now, who is this Bill going to benefit? Is it for the benefit of the sportsmen of Ontario and the sportsmen of Quebec? It certainly is not; it is for the benefit of foreign sportsmen, and that is just what this Parliament should not pass.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They do not object.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Our sportsmen should have the first call on our game.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We are doing this at the request of the sportsmen of the provinces.

Mr. MONTAGUE. At the request of one of the provinces, but will the hon. Minister (Mr. Paterson) say that it is at the request of the sportsmen of Ontario or of the Ontario Government?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Montague) think that we should object to American sportsmen coming here? On the contrary, within limits, I think we all desire that they shall come over. We advertise Canada as the sportsmen's paradise. We contribute to the exhibitions in the United States, and in every way we can we picture the attractions that Canada possesses. The hon. gentleman says he is not much of a sportsman; neither am I, but I have observed the extraordinary pride that a man takes when he carries home his own game. No man knows what that pride is, unless he be a Scotchman with his bagpipes, except a man who takes a salmon and carries it home. When an American comes over here and spends a few thousand dollars in trying to shoot a deer, if he is not allowed to take his game home, he has paid his money for nothing. I do not think we ought to deprive him of that privilege. I quite agree that if this were going to lead to the slaughter of deer we should not encourage it, but I think it is only a little recognition of the pride of the sportsman to allow him to carry home the result of his own prowess. The Order in Council on the subject and the provincial regulations would provide such limits as will restrict the sportsman to a limited number.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That matter of pride enters into other things as well. It is a matter of pride for a Canadian to go over to the other side and win success in business, but it is not his privilege. It is a matter of pride for the American manufacturer to supply the Canadian market, but that sentiment does not prevail even under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. Will the hon. gentleman tell me of the purpose of the laws in the provinces is not to restricting the killing of deer?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. To keep it within reasonable limits.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What was the object of this clause which said that deer should not be exported? It was necessary for the protection of our game that it should not be exported.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The provincial laws were not in force at the time. It may have been to protect the game.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is lots of time to get a report in regard to the matter. I have no objection to the fish and game commissioners, although they are strong opponents of mine. There is no reason why we should not have the Bill submitted to the fish and game commissioners and get their opinion on it.

Mr. ELLIS. It seems to me it is rather churlish, when the provinces allow the shooting of game under certain regulations, that because a man lives across the line, to say that he shall not take his deer across to where he lives. If a man comes in and kills a deer he finds that he is not able to take it home with him because the Dominion law prevents him doing so. These deer having been killed in accordance with the provincial regulations, it seems to me that the Dominion should not prevent them being carried away. There is another view of it. Our own sportsmen are, so far as I am aware, always glad to see these sportsmen come into the country. They are liberal spenders of money, and while I dare say that the price mentioned by the hon. Minister of Finance, which they pay for killing a deer, is rather high, I have no doubt it costs a very large sum, and I do not think that we should deprive them of the privilege of taking their game home.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What proof are you going to have that the sportsman shot this game that he takes away?

Mr. ELLIS. The local game wardens.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is all very well, but a man comes across and into the hunting grounds—

Mr. FIELDING.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He must have his license first.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But the license does not direct his shot. He may buy the deer, and he will get outside of the law entirely.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I propose that I shall designate certain ports at which alone deer can be exported. A party comes to make an export entry; he will have to bring his provincial license and everything to show that he had a right to shoot the deer and the right to export. I propose to limit the number that any man may take out, not by the number in the province of Quebec, but by the limit fixed by the province of Ontario. For each license not more than two deer may be exported. We must make regulations providing that the deer must go out at certain ports and that the license must be produced. It is a matter in the hands of the provincial legislatures which grant these licenses. If they find that the deer are being slaughtered faster than they desire they must limit the number of these licenses. All we propose is that, if a sportsman, having a license from a provincial government, shoots two deer he may be allowed to take them away. We do not give him the privilege of shooting them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. Minister of Customs says that the provincial governments must limit the number of licenses in order to prevent the slaughter of deer. No province will do that. No province will say to the first ten men that they should get their licenses and that those who come afterwards cannot get their licenses.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They can limit the number of deer to be shot or establish a close season.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They have done both. They have done their very best to preserve the game, and I am saying that of a Liberal administration, as I am willing to say on all occasions when they have done their best. They have done their very best to prevent that which is being encouraged by this Bill. What evidence is there that the party shot the deer?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Governor in Council may make regulations.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The regulations will provide that the party must give satisfactory proof that he shot the deer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No matter how much sentiment there may be in favour of this Bill, you are loosening the strings which the provinces have tightened. What province could ever have suggested such legislation?

Mr. ELLIS. New Brunswick wants it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Quebec wants it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman will not say that Quebec wants it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. My hon. friend (Mr. Champagne) says that Quebec wants it. The province spent a large sum of money in making an exhibit in New York last year for the purpose of pointing out the resources that they have in the way of game, and they are anxious for it. The railways are interested because these people travel. There is a large expenditure of money wherever they go. If you are weakening that protection, it would be a different thing, but the provincial government can make whatever regulations they please, and they can suspend all licenses, if they think it necessary. All this Bill proposes is to allow a man who shoots a deer to take it home with him. We can make regulations under this Act. For instance, we could require the sportsman to produce his license, we could limit certain ports as ports of export, and when a deer was exported at one port the collectors at the other ports could be notified that the holder of such a license had exported a deer. This would insure that he could not export more than he was entitled to kill by sending them out at different ports.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister (Mr. Paterson) must see that my contention is not unreasonable. There is no reason in the world why this Bill should not be sent to the Provincial Secretary of the province of Ontario, who would at once consult the Fish and Game Commission of the province. There is lots of time, and the Bill can stand over for a few days. If there is nothing in it which is opposed to the spirit of the game protection laws of the province of Ontario, there is no reason why it should not be submitted for their opinion. If it is the province of Ontario against the province of Quebec, let them discuss it. I submit that while the sportsmen of the province of Quebec should have the very fullest consideration of the Minister, the sportsmen and game authorities of the province of Ontario should have the same consideration. If this Bill is in their opinion prejudicial to the game laws of the province, I do not think it should be allowed to pass this House.

Mr. QUINN. I think the Minister should adopt the suggestion of the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). The Minister states that notice of this Bill has been given in the papers, but I am perfectly certain that our game protection societies in the province of Quebec have heard nothing about it, and I should like to have this Bill reserved and submitted for their consideration. We have several societies in Montreal which take a great interest in the protection of game, and I am satisfied that their opinion would be opposed to this Bill. The Minister says that this Bill merely permits a sportsman of the United States to take the game which he kills home. There is no such restriction in the Bill. It gives permission for the export of game shot by any person, and it is not necessary under the Bill that the man who exports it should be the person who shot it. It is not even necessary under the Bill that the person who shot the game and exported it should be an American who came to Canada for sport. He may come here for sport, or buy this game from the person who shot it and then export it. Once the permission exists, it would be impossible under the law to prevent him taking the game with him, which he may have purchased in Canada.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This Bill is not a permission to export, but merely a power to make regulations.

Mr. QUINN. Why, the Bill says :

(s) For regulating the number of deer and parts thereof which may be exported in any year, when shot, under provincial or territorial authority in Canada, by any person for sport.

Mr. CLANCY. I have a vivid recollection of a heated discussion in the Ontario legislature on this game protection question. My recollection is that great reliance was placed on the fact that the export of game was not allowed. And under the Ontario law, any person killing even the limited number of two deer is not permitted to sell the venison to his neighbour, the idea being that it should be of no use to any person except the one who killed it. That being the case, if you open the door for exportation, it will be a very dangerous thing.

Mr. MONTAGUE. A man could buy the game and export it under this law.

Mr. CLANCY. But he cannot purchase it under the Ontario law, unless, of course, he evades the law. The Hon. Mr. Gibson takes a great interest in this matter, and is well acquainted with the opinions of sportsmen on this matter, and I think the Minister should let the Bill stand until it has been submitted to Mr. Gibson for his consideration.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The notice of this Bill has been published in the Montreal "Star" and the Montreal "Gazette," and I think the "Mail and Empire," and it has been discussed since May 27th. If there were any objections to it, I would be sure to have these objections stated to me before this.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What objection is there to let the Bill stand ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There is no necessity for it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is no danger in my suggestion, but there is danger in the suggestion of the Minister.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What possible danger?

Mr. MONTAGUE. You may be running against the wishes of the province of Ontario, which is strongly in favour of the protection of game.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The province of Ontario has the matter entirely in their own hands. They need not issue licenses nor need they allow a single deer to be shot, if they wish.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. It seems to me that the proposition of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) is a most reasonable one. I have read the Toronto papers, and other papers of the province of Ontario pretty regularly for the last month or two, and I have never seen any notice with regard to this proposal of the Minister of Customs. The Minister, speaking on the Bill, says it is for the benefit of Americans, to place them on the same footing as Canadians who shoot deer, and to allow them to export the deer they shoot. But this proposed amendment clearly states that the deer, when shot under provincial or territorial authority in Canada by any person for sport, may be exported. It seems to me that this amendment is the suggestion of those who perhaps have herds of deer. It certainly looks as if the intention were to encourage Canadians to supply the American market with venison, and not for the purpose of sport at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the Minister will read the clause, he will see that it is not restricted at all to citizens of any other country. At the present time, no one can export a deer, whether he is a citizen of another country or a Canadian. That provision was for the purpose of protecting our game. Under this provision the Minister takes power to say that a man who comes in from the United States and shoots two deer, or whatever number he may legally shoot, may take them to his own home. It also says that a Canadian may export the deer he shoots. I submit, notwithstanding the opinions of his supporters who have spoken to him, and the press opinions which his friends may have collected for him, that in making this provision the Minister is undermining the whole strength of the protection of deer in the province of Ontario.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think it is only fair to say that among the different extracts from papers which I have, I do find that the Toronto "Telegram" of May 17th, has an article that is not in favour of the measure. I think that is the only one. I speak subject to correction, but I believe that I have in the office a letter from the Hon. Mr. Gibson, of Ontario, saying that he does not object to the measure. But I do not wish to use that to-night, as I am not certain, and I am willing that the Bill should stand for its third reading so that I can see if I have got that. I thought it best to deal with the matter, as we deal with so many other subjects, by giving the power to the Governor in Council. Then, if it were ever represented by the provincial governments that they would like to have the export forbidden again, all that would be necessary would be to repeal the Order in Council, which could be done at any time without having to wait for Parliament to act. I cannot myself see where there is any danger. Everything is not laid down in the Bill, because we propose to make regulations by Orders in Council so that it shall only be a bona fide licensed sportsman who will be permitted to take home the deer which he has shot. The papers I have show that the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario all favour the measure.

Mr. MONTAGUE. With every desire to advance the Bill, if it is one that is unobjectionable, I do not feel inclined to accept the suggestion to let it go out of the committee stage and go to the third reading, where debate is very much restricted. I submit that the hon. gentleman is either ingenious or he does not clearly see what his Bill does. There are two classes of people affected. The first is the man who wants to encourage the export of deer for his own profit. The other is the man who wants to restrict the killing of deer in every possible way except for the purposes of legitimate sport. This Bill is in the interest of the man who wants to make money out of the game.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, no.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What does the game law do? The protection of game is partly in the hands of the provincial authorities and partly in the hands of this Parliament. The provincial authorities can make regulations as to the number of deer that can be killed, the open season, and the exposure of those deer on the open market, and this House can determine whether any of those deer may be exported. The hon. gentleman is going further than he did when he explained the Bill.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. In what way?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman told us that the intention was to allow foreign sportsmen to carry home their deer, and the appeal of the Finance Minister was along the same line. Yet the Bill itself, as suggested by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) permits any man who shoots deer in the province of Ontario to export them.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If the hon. gentleman has no faith in the Governor in Council doing what I say I propose to recommend, then, of course, he would want to have the Bill framed with all the provisions in it that would be in the Order in Council. But I think the better way is to make the provisions in the Order in Council, so that if any harm resulted at any time, it could be at once stopped by rescinding the Order in Council. When the Governor in Council adopts the regulations, the things which the hon. gentleman desires will be provided for. The export of deer will be limited to foreign sportsmen who have been licensed to shoot deer, and the export will be limited to two deer and to certain specified field sports. The object is only to give the American or the Briton or the resident of any other country who may come here to shoot deer under provincial license, the privilege of taking with him the hides and horns, which are forbidden to be exported now. Every precaution will be taken to prevent the sport being engaged in for the sake of the money, and to confine it solely to sportsmen. If an American sportsman comes over here, pays for his license, and spends his money, he will be allowed to take his deer home. The regulations will be made as stringent as possible, and the advantage of an Order in Council is, that these regulations may be at once revised, should they be found wanting in any respect.

Mr. CLANCY. Under the law, a Canadian now is limited to two deer, and an American is prevented from taking any deer away, so that the one restriction is the equivalent to the other. A Canadian cannot sell to his neighbour, and the object is to do away with every incitement to kill more than two deer. The provincial legislatures have not power to prevent the export.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Now that they have abundance of deer, they want to encourage foreign sportsmen to come in.

Mr. CLANCY. Not in the province of Ontario.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In New Brunswick.

Mr. CLANCY. If the hon. gentleman will confine his Bill to New Brunswick, I have not a word to say.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I understand that a man in Ontario, or any other province, must take out a license to kill deer, just the same as an American. He cannot shoot more than two deer, and these two deer he can shoot only for his own use; he cannot sell them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He can sell them in the open market between the 1st and 15th of November.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Then, it is the worse for the hon. gentleman's argument. When a man comes from the United States, and pays for his license, and spends hundreds of dollars here, ought he not to be allowed to take back with him for his own use the two deer he has shot, especially when a man belonging to the country can sell to his neighbour?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman misses the main point, which is this: whether you do not encourage the killing of deer to a greater extent by allowing the export?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). There is not a sportsman from the other side who is coming here for the sake of two deer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am not suggesting that.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). If that is not the point, how is this going to encourage the killing of deer. The only way in which encouragement could be given would be by making it profitable. But there can be no money in it under this Bill. A man is allowed to kill only two deer, and I venture to say that it is not for the meat of the animals that he wishes to bring them home with him for, but for the horn.

Mr. CLANCY. Suppose it has none.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Perhaps that is the kind they have in Ontario. In Ontario they often kill calves for deer. In the lower provinces the animals, like the men, show just what they are.

Mr. CLANCY. Has the doe horns in the hon. gentleman's province?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Under our law he does not shoot does.

Mr. CLANCY. You can in season.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). If that is the law in Ontario, then it requires amending, because a great protection is to forbid females being shot. A sportsman will come over here for the shooting in the first place, and, secondly, to get the horn. If a sportsman gets a license and spends his money here, he should be permitted to take home any part of the animal he likes.

Mr. QUINN. There is just one objection. The object of enacting a law to prevent the export of deer was for the protection of game. The provincial laws not only limit the number of deer that may be shot, but prevent the export to any other province of any of the deer shot in one province. An Ontario man cannot send a deer to Quebec, nor can a New Brunswick man send a barrel of partridge to a friend in Quebec. But the Minister of Customs wants to put the American sportsman on a better footing by letting him come across into any one of our provinces for the purpose of shooting here, and then allow him to take the deer home with him, although a Quebec man cannot cross into Ontario and shoot a deer and bring it back to this province. Is that the intention? If not, how is my hon. friend going to meet that? Is he going to compel the provincial legislature to pass a law allowing the Quebec sportsmen to go into New Brunswick, shoot a deer and bring it in Quebec, or go into Ontario, shoot a deer, and bring it into Quebec? Or will he compel the province of Quebec to pass a law of that kind with respect to sportsmen of other provinces. If not, he puts the American sportsman on a better footing than the Canadian sportsman is in his own country.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Did the hon. gentleman say that each province prohibits the export of game that is killed?

Mr. QUINN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I never heard of that except in the province of Manitoba, which prohibits the export of prairie chicken. It is not the case in the lower provinces.

Mr. COWAN. Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) to say that no game shot in the province of Ontario can be exported to another province?

Mr. QUINN. I do not know what the game law of Ontario is on that subject.

Mr. COWAN. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the game laws of the provinces prohibited the export of game into other provinces. If the hon. gentleman said so he is incorrect. You can export duck from the province of Ontario to the United States.

Mr. CLANCY. Can you export deer?

Mr. BEATTIE. Can you export quail from Ontario?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. BEATTIE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. COWAN. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that he has not read the game laws of Ontario.

Mr. BEATTIE. I am a member of the quail preserve, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that quail may not be exported from the province.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not rise at all to deal with the details of the game law of Ontario. I am ignorant of a good many subjects, and probably more ignorant of that than of many others. But I do know that the provincial authorities have taken the greatest possible pains to protect our game. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and other members from the province of Ontario, know that it has been a labour of anxiety and a labour of love for the legislature of Ontario to throw around the destruction of our game every restriction. All I ask is whether this proposed law will relax those safeguards?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No.

Mr. QUINN.

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course it will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I prefer to take the opinion of the game commissioners of Ontario rather than that of a representative of Quebec, who sits by the Minister and urges this Bill through. I prefer to take the opinion of men who have worked out the question with great pains and with great patriotism, so far as their own province is concerned, and with the greatest regard for the manly sport sought to be protected by the laws of Ontario. All I ask the hon. Minister to do is to hesitate, to wait three days, to wait two days.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He said he was willing to do that. He will let the third reading stand.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davles) knows that on the third reading debate is restricted. Is there any reason why we should hesitate at the third reading that is not as strong a reason for hesitating now? Unless there is some sinister motive which I do not think there can be, for I know the hon. Minister too well for that, there can be no reason why this Bill should not stop here. It may be that there is not the weight of a feather of what I am saying or in what has been said by hon. gentlemen on this side. We do not pretend to minute knowledge, but we ask the Minister of Customs, before he takes this radical step, to consult those people in Ontario who are specialists in this matter, who are paid to protect our game, who have made regulations at very great expense for its protection. And notwithstanding the eloquence of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), I ask the Minister to consult these people before he takes down the bars. I may be entirely ignorant on the subject, but it seems to me that the bars which he proposes to remove are the main protection to game in the province of Ontario under the provincial regulations.

Mr. McHUGH. I do not think it is going to make any difference to the provinces whether this Bill is passed or not—they will still be able to protect themselves. They now grant a license to foreigners coming in to shoot deer, a fee being paid for each license. If too many of these foreigners come in, the provincial authorities can refuse to grant further licenses, except to residents of the province. But so long as they grant licenses to these parties to shoot deer, the people who pay for the privilege ought to have the right to take the deer away.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me we have missed a very pertinent point in the discussion. I would ask the Minister whether he has considered the question whether the province of Ontario has passed laws prohibiting the exportation of deer?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. How could they do that?

Mr. HENDERSON. Very easily, I think. They have prohibited the export of logs.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They do not prohibit the export.

Mr. HENDERSON. They do, absolutely. They say that logs cut upon certain lands shall not be exported. They allow the American licensee to cut the timber, and then forbid him to export the logs from the country.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is a condition of the license.

Mr. HENDERSON. And they can make the non-export of deer a condition of the license to shoot. And if the Ontario Government has made such a restriction, this Government should not usurp their powers and interfere with the protection which they have thrown around the game in the province.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The province owns the logs, but they do not own the deer.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then who owns the deer? The province owns them in the same way as it owns the timber. No man can cut timber on Crown property without a license from the provincial government, neither can he shoot a deer without their license. It seems to me that if the Minister has not caused inquiry to be made into that point as to whether the Ontario legislature has prohibited the export of deer, he should do so before passing a law which may conflict with that of the province. As to the proposed Order in Council, the Minister admits that it will not be so broad as the power he is asking the House to give him. In fairness to the House, he should limit the power he has taken. I, for one, am very much opposed to this system of passing laws allowing the country to be governed by Order in Council. In the province of Ontario we have overstepped all reasonable limits in that direction. As I have stated in this House before, by simple Order in Council, we have sunk the province in millions of dollars of debt, the legislature of Ontario having no control whatever, because they have handed over the power to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. I think Parliament should control everything as much as possible, and in all the discussions to-night, I fail to see any good reason why this power should be taken out of the hands of Parliament and placed in the hands of the executive. So much does the province of Ontario value her game laws and her game that the legislature would hesitate to permit the Government to exercise absolute control.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The regulation of the details of this matter is left to the Government by Order in Council, and the Minister has already explained the necessity and the benefits of that, and so the Bill is put in a shape that it can be abolished if found to work badly. I rise for the purpose of appealing to my hon. friends. As the Minister of Customs has explained, this matter is not sprung upon the country, it has been before the country for months, it has been discussed in the press. Now, we have had the advantage of a very lengthy discussion in the House; and with that, and the statement from the Minister that he does not propose to ask for the third reading to-night. I hope my hon. friends will allow the Bill to take this stage.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am always willing to admit when I am wrong. If I had read the Ontario statute half an hour ago, I would not have made the contention that I have made. I fancy the hon. gentleman knows that I was not raising a point for technical purposes, but simply for fear that some licensing restriction might be made by the Minister against the desire of the province of Ontario. But I see that what he is going to do is provided for in the statute:

Any person not a resident and domiciled in the province, who has for any year been granted a license under the provisions of section 4 of this Act, and has paid the fee therefor, shall, so far as the authority of the legislature of the province of Ontario extends, be at liberty to export out of the province the two deer which, under the provisions of this Act, he is allowed to kill.

Now, I only ask that when hon. gentlemen opposite see that they are wrong, they shall be equally ready to admit it as I am.

Bill reported.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 4th July, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon.

Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) when the further supplementaries are likely to be down.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Well, they are in an advanced state, but I am not able to name the day to my hon. friend. I will try to do it as early as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. It is stated outside by the press that is supposed to know the inside, that there are Estimates to the amount of seven millions coming down. Members are really leaving for home, and it is somewhat of an imposition to have a large amount of supplementary Estimates kept until this time of the session when it is perfectly impossible to give them any fair consideration by the House as whole.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well, there is really some force in my hon. friend's criticism. I can do no more than promise to expedite their preparation as much as possible. They are in a very advanced stage, and I hope soon to be able to fix a day when they can be brought down. My hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) stated that he hoped to have them on the Table early this week. That is perhaps a little too much to promise, but I hope before the week is out that they will be on the Table.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 146) further to amend the Act respecting the Department of the Geological Survey.—(Mr. Sifton.)

Bill (No. 147) further to amend the Act respecting the Department of the Interior.—(Mr. Sifton.)

Bill (No. 149) further to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894.—(Mr. Sifton.)

Bill (No. 153) to amend the Unorganized Territories Game Preservation Act, 1894.—(Mr. Sifton.)

DOMINION LANDS.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved the third reading of Bill (No. 148) to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister, before this is read the third time, whether anything is to be done this session in regard to the subject that I brought to his attention early in the session, namely, the seed grain indebtedness, and the seed grain liens against lands, and the bonded indebtedness. Also, in regard to some other lands, I am inclined to think that I brought to his attention a petition that was presented to him by some persons around Regina in regard to lands that are in the names of certain parties, all of whom have left the country, and here are the lands with no occupants on them, and yet people who come in cannot settle on them.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I may say that I am afraid that I cannot undertake this session to deal with the question of these seed grain liens. I fully recognize that there is much in what has been urged by the hon. gentleman and by other members of the House upon the question; but I have not yet been able to settle in my mind definitely upon a plan concerning which I could give the House any information. I think, however, I can give the hon. gentleman a pledge that I will take it up and deal with it next session. I intend to give it my immediate attention, and arrive at some definite conclusion as soon as the press of the sessional work is over. As to the second matter the hon. gentleman has brought up, I understand he refers to lands which were settled under the auspices of the Canada Settlers Company and others; is that not the case?

Mr. DAVIN. No, it refers to lands around towns, like Regina. I think the hon. gentleman has had a petition from certain residents in and around Regina in regard to the lands. They are lands that are locked up; people entered for them, and have done a certain amount of improvements; then they have gone away, and there are the lands.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Why cannot they be cancelled? Anybody can cancel them.

Mr. DAVIN. That is my own opinion. But nevertheless, these people have sent petitions to my hon. friend. I have written back that in all cases like that—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There must be something more than that. If a man has taken up a homestead under the Dominion Lands Act, and he is in default, he can be cancelled. There must be something more than that in it.

Mr. DAVIN. I rather think these people think that the department is in some way withstanding cancellation.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The circumstance to which the hon. gentleman refers has entirely escaped my memory. There are a great many petitions in the Department of the Interior, and I would not undertake to say that there is not a petition there on this subject. But I can only say that I will look into it at once. The rule is very definite and clear. When a man takes up a homestead under the Dominion Lands Act and he is in default, he is liable to be cancelled. The only way he can avoid having his claim cancelled is by making special application to me, and if he sets out what I think is reasonable ground for delaying the matter and giving him more time, I very often extend his time, or give him a little consideration. But that is not done in a wholesale way, only when some special reason is given. I have no recollection of any special circumstance in relation to the matter the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. DAVIN. There is a grievance back of that which will be very hard to deal with, cases where men have not only entered for land, but have got a patent, and have gone away years ago, and apparently never intend to return. It is a very hard thing to deal with.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They own the land; we do not own it.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, I understand that.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have no more right to deal with it than I have to take possession of a lot on Sparks Street.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not see how you could deal with it.

Mr. FOSTER. I understood the hon. Minister to say that there really would be no action taken on that portion of this Bill which refers to the extinguishment of the title of the half-breeds in the North-west Territories this year.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I do not think it is at all likely that we will be in a position to issue any certificate or scrip this year.

Mr. FOSTER. In that case we may have a chance to debate it again, and in the interval the hon. Minister may come to the conclusion that some method may be found which will obviate the difficulties that we all acknowledged to exist last night.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It is not impossible.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

SALE OF SCHOOL LANDS.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Last evening, while the debate on one of the Bills before the House was proceeding, the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), asked me to furnish him with certain information in regard to the sale of school lands. I have had a statement prepared giving the information which the hon. gentleman asked for. The area of school lands sold down to the 1st May, 1899, in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, is 87,775,57-100 acres. The total amount for which such lands were sold is $674,210.10. The amount paid on account, including interest, is $569,029.99. The hon. gentleman will see that that bears out the information I gave last night. I thought the payments had been pretty well made up. The amount of principal still due is $177,196.03. There is of course a considerable amount of accrued interest upon these last payments which I have not calculated because it is a matter of great labour and involves a large amount of detail. There is some interest still due. I will hand the hon. gentleman a copy of the statement.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Mr. Chairman, we are now in the first week of the new fiscal year and the public service might soon become embarrassed if there were not some understanding in regard to the supplies for the year which we have entered upon. I need hardly point out that, although we have made some progress with our Estimates, we have not yet got any Supply Bill. We have disposed in Committee of Supply of all the supplementary Estimates for the year which closed on Friday last, and concurrence has been taken thereon. We have also discussed in Committee of Supply, and taken concurrence on, a number of items in the main Estimates, but these are not of legal effect until they are incorporated in the Supply Bill and passed through their final stage. We desire that that stage shall be taken as quickly as possible, and we also desire that temporary provision may be made for supplies for the year upon which we have now entered. We desire that this step shall be taken by what is commonly known as a vote on account. I have had a conference with the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), who has kindly agreed that we shall proceed to take a vote for one-tenth of the Estimates which are before the committee. There are precedents for that which the House, no doubt, is familiar with. I shall move a resolution that the House shall appropriate to the supply of Her Majesty one-tenth of the amounts contained in the Estimates that have not been passed by the committee. It is understood that in passing a vote of this character neither the House nor the committee will commit themselves to any question involved in these appropriations, but that every matter relating to them shall remain fully before the committee and be subject to discussion at all future stages.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is correct in saying that I talked the matter over with him. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have no desire to embarrass the public service to any extent at all nor to drive hon. gentlemen opposite to any dubious expedient to raise the wind, provided we do not give them these Estimates. I know, that in giving assent, a generous assent is always best, but there is a good deal of human nature yet around this House, and some on this side of the House, and in giving this frank and prompt assent to a measure which will facilitate the operations of the Government, that the public service may not be embarrassed, to any degree at all, I do it asking hon. gentlemen opposite to contrast this period with a certain period early before the end of the financial year of 1896, when it was absolutely certain that months after the next fiscal year, at least one month, and may be more, must have passed before any of the supplies could be obtained from Parliament and before any special vote could be taken in any way, and when it was asked that one-tenth of the vote should be allowed in order that the public service might not be embarrassed, hon. gentlemen opposite put their feet down and declared that not a cent should be given and not one cent was given. Well, we are strong, and we propose to be generous, so we agree with the Finance Minister in this step to-day. The object lesson, however, read by comparison is instructive.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend (Mr. Foster), will find a more apposite subject of comparison in the year 1891 than in 1896. The hon. gentleman remembers that the session of 1891 lasted through May, June, July, August and until September, and if my memory serves me rightly, and I do not think it fails me, we gave him, not one, but two votes on account, for July and August.

Mr. FOSTER. That was in your earlier and fresher period.

The PRIME MINISTER. I applaud the hon. gentleman's generosity, still I can point to a mark showing that we are standing ahead of him yet.

Resolution reported, and read a first and second time.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House again resolved itself in Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved :

1. Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending the 30th June, 1899, the sum of $2,522,054.44 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

2. Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 30th June, 1900, the sum of $6,978,585.72 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolutions to be reported.

Resolutions read the first and second times and concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER.

SUPPLY BILL.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 169) for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service for the financial years ending respectively 30th June, 1899, and 30th June, 1900, and for other purposes relating to the public service.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In moving my resolutions in the committee, I omitted to state that as respects one item, that of pensions, we have taken one-half, and not one-tenth, as these pensions are paid half-yearly.

REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Mulock for the second reading of Bill (No. 126) respecting representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) has the floor.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was understood that my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) would speak when this question came up.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) moved the adjournment and he therefore has the right to the floor unless he sees fit to give way to another hon. gentleman. With reference to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), technically he has already spoken, because he moved an amendment to the motion, which was lost, and the hon. gentleman, therefore, has exhausted his right to speak. If he addresses the House now it must be with the unanimous consent of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We will give him that consent in return for the generosity which has just been displayed by the gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a small favour for the large amount of money we have just given you.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I thank hon. gentlemen opposite for their favour in permitting me to address the House on this occasion. Let me call attention to the attitude of the Prime Minister and of those who are promoting this Redistribution Bill. The Premier, who is generally so amiable in the House, apparently lost that good nature which characterizes him when this Bill came up for discussion on a former occasion.

The PRIME MINISTER. Oh, no.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. The right hon. gentleman seemed determined, in a way I never saw before in this House, to force this Bill through, and he wanted to get the leader of the Opposition to pledge himself that the debate would conclude the following week, a pledge which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) pointedly refused to give. The proposition which the Premier made to the House is startling, in its attempt to prevent discussion on this important measure, and no more important measure could come before this Parliament, especially in this case where fifty-four seats in the province of Ontario are gerrymandered, or changed, or turned upside down, at the will of the Administration—or will be if the Bill should become law. The Prime Minister used some very violent language, such as this :

We have seen so many things that are not seemly. We have seen the debate on the Address protracted by a repetition of the same things over and over again for four weeks or more. That was not seemly. We have seen the business of the Government obstructed at every turn.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am fairly in the judgment of the House when I say that that statement is very inaccurate. We found, when Parliament met, that the Government had no business to present, and it was quite within our right to debate the Address on which we could discuss the affairs of the nation in a general way. The right hon. gentleman, instead of censuring us, should have given us his high commendation for relieving him of a very great difficulty, because he was confronted by Parliament, and his Government were totally unready, and more than unready, to present any business for the consideration of Parliament. They were unwilling, Mr. Speaker, to comply with the demands of Parliament and to furnish those documents and papers which are necessary for the consideration of this question by the House. The Bill itself was not introduced until sixty-five days of the session had elapsed; the second reading of it did not come up until the ninety-third day of the session; and now, at the 111th day of the session, is the third time we have had an opportunity of discussing it.

I must say, when the Postmaster General proposed the second reading of this Bill, it struck me as the crudest and most ill-considered Bill which had ever come before the House for its consideration. There was only one feature in it, and that was the determination, which was emphasized by the words of the Postmaster General himself, that this was to be a vindictive measure—that we had done wrong in 1882, and that now had come the period for reprisals and vengeance. Mr. Speaker, I propose to contrast the Redistribution Bill of 1882 with the Gerrymander Bill of 1899; and I think I shall be able to show that this is a most unfair and unjust Bill—that it does an injustice to dozens of Conservative constituencies; while that of 1882 was, in its main provisions and in the general carrying of it out, a fair redistribution of the constituencies.

Mr. McMULLEN. No, never. You never said it was.

Mr. WALLACE. I say it now, and I shall endeavour to prove it, notwithstanding the angry and unseemly interruption of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). When the Postmaster General got up to explain this Bill, and point-blank refused to give information, when he evidently did not understand the Bill himself, it struck me, why, this is all on a par with the previous course of the Postmaster General, when he passed an Act, saying, "I, William Mulock, arrange that foreign postage shall be less than our local postage." When he found that he had not the power to do it, he made another blunder, and another, and another, and so on through the whole course of his acts with regard to the Post Office Department; and we find the same series of blunders characterizing the Bill which he has now proposed for the consideration of the House.

Then, Sir, we come to the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). With an assurance and a want of modesty characteristic of him, with that magnificent fog-horn voice of his, he told the House that he was going to confine himself to a discussion of the Bill itself; and, Mr. Speaker, it is within the remembrance of all those members who heard him that during the several hours he addressed the House he scarcely ever alluded to the Bill. He discussed the Bill of 1882, and he made a series of misrepresentations of that Bill from one end to the other, such as he has made for 17 years, until I suppose that he actually believes himself that they are true. I remember 13 or 14 years ago, in an election in the county of Haldimand, I think it was, when I came back at 1 o'clock in the morning from a meeting we had held, there was the then member for South Brant making the identical speech which he made here the other night, spreading himself out, and telling how this constituency was torn from that and flung into the other, and how the constituencies had been gerrymandered. The other night, the hon. gentleman made this statement with regard to the leader of the Opposition :

He has not used an argument worthy of being considered in this debate.

Mr. Speaker, I think this House will conclude, both sides of it, who listened to the hon. leader of the Opposition, that he made a marvellously grasping speech—one that covered the whole situation—and we on this side could fairly leave the case just as it was left by the leader of the Opposition. He discussed the constitutionality of the question, and since then we have not heard a word from those who were before claiming that it was constitutional, and that it had precedents to justify it. He discussed the question from every point of view, and made an able and exhaustive speech, and the sneer of the Minister of Customs was as ill-timed as it was inaccurate. But the Minister of Customs said further:

How was the Bill of 1882 prepared by these hon. gentlemen themselves? Did they want this matter argued by both political parties? No; in a chamber, with closed doors, they summoned their heelers and their party workers from all the different counties, and there they sat down, with a map before them, took this township out of that riding, that township out of this riding, placed this township into that riding, and that township into this riding.

And so on, and so forth—a repetition all the way through. Who were the men who were entrusted by the Conservative party with this work? So far as my information at that time went, they were the Hon. Mackenzie Bowell and the Hon. J. C. Aikens, who had the province of Ontario in charge—to comply with the law, to add six new members, and to readjust the constituencies on the basis, contradictory to the statement made by the Postmaster General, of representation by population, as I shall show.

Mr. McMULLEN. Ah.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I repudiate any such statement being made with regard to these gentlemen. They are men who have occupied, and who occupy to-day, a high place in the esteem of the people of this country. It will not be pretended even by their political opponents that those two gentlemen would stoop to anything dishonourable or mean.

Mr. McMULLEN. Oh, no, not at all.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for North Wellington does not apparently know those courtesies which are required in this House, and I suppose we shall have to excuse him on that account.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the House will observe order, and that members will not interrupt unless they ask the permission of the member who has the floor.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the contrast between the work done in 1882 by the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the Hon. Mr. Aikens, and the work done by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1899? Do we not know, Mr. Speaker, that the heelers were brought in, in 1899, to assist in the Gerrymander Bill now before the House? Do we not know that Captain Sullivan was in the city of Ottawa?

Mr. BENNETT. Hear, hear—here for a week.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. Here for a week, assisting them in the readjustment of the Gerrymander Bill now before the House. Do we not know that Simeon Hewitt and others were here; and the courts have since declared that these two gerrymanderers are out-laws in this country. These are the men who were in this city of Ottawa to assist hon. gentlemen opposite to gerrymander the constituencies in Ontario. I understand that they were cheek-by-jowl with the Minister of Customs assisting in this gerrymander.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Who did the hon. gentleman say were with me?

Mr. WALLACE. Captain Sullivan and Simeon Hewitt.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know Captain Sullivan. Simeon Hewitt. I have no recollection of being in the city at all, nor do I think he is.

Mr. WALLACE. Exactly so. Is it not a remarkable circumstance that the Minister of Customs tells exactly the same story as John Dryden did in South Ontario, and MacNish in West Elgin. He never knew them—a perfectly innocent gentleman, who went through the riding with these men, assisting them to perform the most nefarious acts of corruption that Canada has ever seen politically—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman made a definite statement with reference to my having consulted with Captain Sullivan and Mr. Simeon Hewitt about this Bill, and said that we were sitting side by side and jowl by jowl. I gave that statement an emphatic denial. The hon. gentleman did not accept my denial, and is in a peculiar position.

Mr. WALLACE. Has the hon. gentleman the right, Mr. Speaker, to make a speech, as well as to raise a point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think he is right in saying that he made a personal statement, which the hon. gentleman must accept.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not refuse to accept that statement. I did not say one word in rebuttal of it, but I said: Was it not a remarkable coincidence that the denial of the Minister of Customs was precisely, in similar terms, the denial of John Dryden in South Ontario, and of MacNish in West Elgin, who made a similar denial that he never saw, never knew, never dreamed of these men being there, did not know of the corruption going on all around him?

Mr. FOSTER. And they were all Liberals.

Mr. WALLACE. All Liberals together. It is a wonderful coincidence, a fact which I shall not deny, that the Minister of Customs was just as innocent as the two other innocent birds to whom I refer. Mr. Simeon

Hewitt, of his own town, brought up under his own tuition—brought up by the Minister of Customs—taught his political exercises and his political games, was here in the city of Ottawa, and the Minister of Customs—we accept his statement unreservedly—never saw or knew he was here. I think the hon. Minister of Customs might repeat the words of Preston, and say: "Hug the machine for me."

There is another matter on which the Minister of Customs waxed eloquent. He waxed eloquent when he referred to the assassins, no less, on this side of the House, Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the Hon. J. C. Aikens and those who assisted them, whom he charged with attempting to assassinate—whom? The bright and genial James Trow, member for South Perth. All of us who were in the old Parliament, knew the genial James Trow. We admired his personality, and I think, politically, he had as many friends upon the Conservative side as upon the Liberal side. There was not a man in my experience who ever said an unkind word politically of the genial James Trow. Yet the Minister of Customs says that we attempted to assassinate him. I fling back the assertion in his teeth. He was assassinated, but by men on that side of the House and their political friends outside. What is the history of that? In South Perth the candidate against James Trow said: It is no use for the Conservatives to run in South Perth against Trow, because he produces the speech of Sir John Macdonald, in which Sir John said: We hope to see Trow back in Parliament again: we hope to see his genial face here again in Parliament. Sir John was kindly to Mr. Trow personally, and he declared so on the floor of Parliament. Mr. Trow, as was quite proper, made the best use of that speech, and the Conservatives decided there was no use in trying to defeat him, and he was elected again. But there came another day. At the by-elections he was defeated by Mr. Pridham. What happened? The leaders of the Liberal party in the House and the then hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), who appears to be one of them, by his position to-day as Minister of Customs, threw him over, and Mr. Trow bitterly bewailed the fact that he was assassinated by his own political friends. Instead of having the election trial go on, it was settled behind his back, contrary to his wishes, and he was thereby thrown out of political life, for which he had a very strong liking. He died broken-hearted, owing to the conduct of his political friends, and not because of anything done by his opponents. That is the history of genial James Trow, and when those gentlemen get up and say, as the Minister of Customs did, that we had assassinated Mr. Trow by taking out a township from his county which gave some hundreds of a Liberal majority, what is the history? Mr.

Trow's majority in 1878 was 77. After the Redistribution Act of 1882 we went to the country. According to the Minister of Customs, he was assassinated by that Act, his constituency was torn, and divided, and gerrymandered. But what occurred? His majority, after the redistribution of 1882, was 179, as against 77 in 1878. That did not look like being assassinated. That did not look as if any injustice had been done to Mr. James Trow, and I would like to ask the Minister of Customs that question, and have an answer now.

With regard to other men, the Minister of Customs said that there were Mills, Alex. Mackenzie, Joe Rymal and himself—all of whom we attempted to politically assassinate. But what is the history of Mr. Mackenzie in Lambton? The county of Lambton was one constituency in 1878, and Mr. Mackenzie had a majority in that year of 146. He was thrown out of Lambton by his own political friends. What did we do? We divided it into the constituencies of East and West Lambton. Mr. Mackenzie had been member for the constituency of Lambton for many years, and presumably he could have had his choice of either division, or he ought to have had his choice, if his political friends had been true and faithful to him. But they thrust him out. They did not permit him to run there. They did not give him the opportunity to which his declining health fairly entitled him, but they threw him out, and Lister became member with 341 of a majority for one of the Lambtons, and Fairbanks became a member for the other with a majority of 165. The constituency was fairly divided, and each had the population necessary to elect a member, and there was no gerrymander. It was a fair distribution, and no injustice was done. But Mr. Mackenzie was brought down to East York, where there had been a Conservative majority in the previous election of 108. The sympathy cry was raised. Here, they said, is the grand old Canadian statesman; it is the duty of every citizen to set politics aside and elect this man to a seat in Parliament. That influenced many Conservatives, and Mr. Mackenzie was elected by the Conservative vote of East York. Yet the Minister of Customs tells us that we attempted to assassinate him. Who attempted to assassinate him, except his own political friends? Take Bothwell. Mr. Mills, now Senator, had a majority in Bothwell. There was a redistribution in the county of Bothwell. There had to be a redistribution somewhere, for you had six new members to place. The principle adopted, as I shall show, was the principle of representation by population. In 1872 Mr. Mills had been elected by 592; in 1874 by 463, in 1878 by 285, and in 1882 by 12—a constantly decreasing majority, but still Mr. Mills was returned from Bothwell in 1882 by a majority of the electors. Then we are told that Mr.

Joe Rymal was attempted to be assassinated also. I think his successor, the hon. member for Wentworth and North Brant (Mr. Somerville) is in this House to-day; and in the general election of 1882, he had a majority of over 900. I should like to know what evidence of attempted assassination there was there? Take the case of the Minister of Customs. His majority in South Brant in 1874 was 44; in 1878 it had dwindled to 198, less than half what it was before, and in 1882 when this infamous gerrymander was imposed upon him, he had still a majority of 174, or within 24 of his previous majority. I would like to know, judging by the facts—and that is the only way you can judge—where there was any infamous gerrymander in that. It is true that the hon. gentleman got a larger majority in some succeeding elections; but it was the same constituency, and he kept it until 1896, when it was discovered by the electors of South Brant—what we knew in Parliament years before—that he was trying to ride two horses going in different directions; and as soon as the electors of South Brant found that out they left him behind by a majority of 91 in 1896. These are the facts with reference to all the parties the hon. gentleman named in his speech that were assassinated or were attempted to be assassinated by the Conservative party. If they were assassinated, it was by their own political friends as I have demonstrated in every case.

Now, as to this Bill itself, the right hon. First Minister when he introduced it on the 19th of May said that there was one principle on which this Bill was founded:

We think it is a principle which will commend itself universally to public opinion that the basis of representation in this House should be the municipal county organization.

And the Postmaster General, when he proposed the second reading of the Bill on 16th June, said:

We have taken the ground in Parliament and before the public that county boundaries shall govern, that no county should be divided into two or more divisions and broken up to provide for constituencies.

He said, further, a sentence I would like him to rise and explain:

If it is that a county's population is not sufficient to entitle it to have two members, it shall have only one; if its population is not sufficient to entitle it to three or more than two, or between two and three, it shall be limited to two or three. In any case, where there is a fragment of one county detached politically, that one county shall be annexed to another in order to create a constituency.

Where is the system of county boundaries there?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is not a correct report.

Mr. WALLACE. I listened to the hon. gentleman as he spoke these words, and they seemed to me just about what is reported here. But I shall be glad if he will correct what is wrong.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Does the hon. gentleman wish me to correct it now?

Mr. WALLACE. Well—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. What I said was that if a county was too small for one member—if there is such a thing—the only way you could represent that county was to annex it to another. I am not aware of such a case.

Mr. FOSTER. That was done in the case of St. John County, N.B., I suppose.

Mr. WALLACE. And the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said:

We have maintained to county boundaries as we said we would.

Why, you have not to go outside the boundaries of this very city to find that principle violated. New Edinburgh, which is part of Ottawa municipally, is a part of the county of Russell for Dominion electoral purposes. Take the county of Carleton, the very first outside this city. Notwithstanding that the Premier says: We have adopted a principle "which commends itself universally to public opinion," the principle of respecting county boundaries, what have we in Carleton? I am not finding fault with it myself—

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, I will refer to that later on. I am calling attention to the fact that these gentlemen started out to establish a principle to make that principle of universal application, and there was to be no exception. And right outside the city of Ottawa, the townships of Fitzroy and Huntley belong to the county of South Lanark for Dominion electoral purposes. The county boundaries are not respected here, because politically it does not suit these hon. gentlemen. Then take Gloucester and Osgoode in the county of Carleton—they are attached to the county of Russell for Dominion electoral purposes, and these gentlemen do not propose to change this so as to leave them attached to the county of Carleton. For, if they did, it would be necessary to give two members for the county of Carleton, because the population would justify it, and these two would, presumably, be Conservatives. And so the county of Carleton is not distributed according to the principle which the Prime Minister, the Postmaster General, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and every hon. gentleman on the other side who has spoken on the subject say is the principle to be followed. Then take the county of Addington. I have a list showing that county as it is for local and as it is for Dominion electoral purposes. In the case of the Dominion there are thirteen townships from Frontenac added to Addington, and for the local legislature they have ten townships taken from Frontenac and added to Addington. If county boundaries are to be held sacred, if the mere fact that they are county boundaries is to end the discussion—a principle that I deny—what about the township boundaries? Local interests are more closely combined in a township than in a county, and if the county boundaries should be respected, much more should the township boundaries be respected. Do we find that to be the case? Look at the acts of the local government. These gentlemen may say: We are not responsible for the acts of the local government. I say they are responsible, for they are of the same political party, the same lines divide the parties, and the Ontario Government is, as the Prime Minister said not long ago, the right arm of the Dominion Government. And what do we see in the ridings for the local legislature? We find the county of Huron divided into three ridings for the local legislature. The south riding, it is provided:

Shall consist of the townships of Tuckersmith, Osborne, Stephen, Hay and Stanley, THAT PORTION OF THE TOWNSHIP OF GODERICH SOUTH OF THE LINE KNOWN AS "THE CUT LINE" and Huron road, the town of Seaforth and the villages of Bayfield and Exeter.

"A portion of a township." Then you come to the east riding, and it gives a list of townships; then it says:

That part of the township of Hullett which lies east of the road commonly called the Gravel road, and so on.

They are dividing townships. Then you go to the west riding, and you find there a number of townships:

Colborne and that part of the township of Hullett which lies west of the road commonly called the Gravel road, and that part of the township of Goderich north of the said Huron road and "cut line" and the township of Goderich, &c.

So they are not content with dividing counties, but they are dividing townships, cutting through the smallest municipality, and giving part of it to one county and part of it to another, when hon. gentlemen declare to this House that county boundaries are so sacred that when once they state they have established county boundaries that disposes of all. Well, I have this to say of county boundaries, that it is desirable that they should be respected where the principle of representation by population is not violated. But I do say that they have violated it in the province of Ontario, at any rate, where that battle was fought by hon. gentlemen opposite, and where the principles of representation by population, founded on fairness, on justice, are respected, where they have been respected in all the redistribution Bills that have been passed since confederation, and I say that in contradiction to the statement of the Postmaster General, as I shall endeavour to prove before I sit down, that principle is a sound one, it has been carried out by Conservative Governments when they were in power, and it has been violated by this Bill. They do not make even a pretense of advocating it, but they say: Oh, the Conservative party, when they were in power, did not advocate it either.

I was going to refer, though, to the county of Brant, where the same state of affairs prevails as in the county of Huron. There they have divided up townships:

The north riding of Brant shall consist of certain townships, and the northerly portion of the township of Brantford and the town of Paris. The south riding shall consist of the township of Burford, Oakland and the southerly portion of the township of Brantford, and the city of Brantford.

Showing that they have violated the principle upon which they started out in their Bill as the keystone of the whole system, and one which they say would commend it to the electors. But I say that they have violated it in the fact that they have not respected county boundaries as in the case of Carleton and Frontenac, and they have not respected the municipal boundaries of townships, as in the cases in the counties of Brant and Huron.

Now, with reference to the redistribution of 1882, which the Postmaster General described as iniquitous, and which was the justification, he said, for the present Bill. They do not propose to discuss much the Redistribution Bill of 1892. Well, the Postmaster General, I believe, is a medallist in mathematics in the University of Toronto, and I would invite him to analyse the statement I now make, and to contradict it if he can. In the elections of 1882 the Conservative majorities, where they elected their members, aggregated 13,740, and they elected fifty-three members. The Reform majorities were 9,561, and they elected thirty-nine members. The average Conservative majority was 259, and the average Liberal majority was 248. Subtract the Reform majorities from the Conservative majorities and you have 4,179. The Conservative majority in the province of Ontario was fourteen members. Dividing that number into the 4,179, and we have an average majority of 298½. I think most of us members of Parliament would be highly gratified if we were sure in the next election of having a majority of 298.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. And I presume a good many of those hon. gentlemen behind him would say "hear, hear." too.

Mr. MCGREGOR. How about those behind you?

Mr. WALLACE. I am not complaining at all. So I say that is a demonstration that there was no gerrymander, that there was no improper redistribution, the figures I have given prove it in general terms. Then, take up the constituencies. The Postmaster General told us that we had hived the Grits, and he mentioned a number of constituencies in which he said the Grits were hived. These were North Brant, West Brant, West Elgin, South Huron, South Middlesex, West Ontario, North Oxford and South Oxford. Well, if you add these eight constituencies together you will find a population of 176,000. Divide that by eight, and it gives you 22,000 as the average of population. The unit of population for 1882 was 20,900. It comes remarkably close when we consider that North Brant had in 1881 a population of 11,800, West Elgin had 14,000, North Oxford had far over the unit of population, 25,300. But when the redistribution took place there was as near as could be the principle of representation by population thoroughly carried out. If you take the individual constituencies, West Bruce had 24,000, since come down to 21,000, West Elgin had 23,000, South Huron 21,000, South Middlesex 19,000, West Ontario 20,000, North Oxford 24,000, and South Oxford 24,000. So that the principle of representation was adopted for these. But we find these 176,000 in constituencies which they claim were gerrymandered, giving them eight members in Parliament, while 200,000 in the city of Toronto to-day have given them, tardily, five members of Parliament, an average of 40,000 each. That is the difference between the conduct of the Conservative party towards Liberal constituencies, and the conduct of the Liberal party towards Conservative constituencies. We recognized the principle of representation by population in those Grit constituencies, while they have totally ignored it, and have come down with a Bill giving us four members for 200,000, which was so flagrantly unjust that they have had to amend it, and give five members, which is still a gross injustice, because it means that there is only one member for over 40,000. Go over the whole of this Redistribution Bill of 1882. They say that in some places there was an injustice done to the Liberal party. I would ask them what Liberal lost his seat through the redistribution of 1882? What injustice was done all around? Every one of those that the hon. Minister of Customs referred to, I think, except the member for North Bruce, was returned at the next election. I do not remember of any other case where the redistribution worked to the injury of the candidate: it may have been that his majority was reduced just as Conservative majorities were reduced. It may be that a man was put out of his constituency, as the hon. member for East Grey was, when the redistribution took place. He found himself in South Grey instead of in the constituency to which he formerly belonged. Cases of that kind might have occurred, but I venture the assertion that the Conservatives could find as much fault, if fault could be found, with that redistribution as the Liberals. Let us take for instance the two constituencies that are wiped out. We put two Conservative constituencies together, Cornwall and Stormont, and gave them one member, displacing a Conservative candidate and a member of Parliament. The same thing was done with Niagara and Lincoln. Of course there could be no justification for Niagara retaining a member because its population had decreased while that of the surrounding counties had increased. It was allowed to retain its member no doubt on account of historical associations, but the time had arrived when it had to be wiped out and the Conservative party, although it was a Conservative constituency, without a moment's hesitation, did their duty in that regard. The Conservatives had two members of Parliament from Simcoe. The population was largely increased and we might have made three Conservative constituencies, but we made two constituencies, by the redistribution, which gave two Conservatives and a third one which returned a Liberal, Mr. Cook. Since then I am glad to say that we have the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett), who sits in this House as the Conservative representative of East Simcoe, the new constituency to-day. But I am speaking of the election of 1882 and of the immediate results of the Redistribution Bill. Next, take the county of Brant. One of these constituencies had a population of about 11,800, and the other one had a little over the unit of population, 21,975, according to my figures. A readjustment was made and South Brant had 20,482; North Brant, while it did not come up to the unit of population, came largely that way as the population was increased about 6,000, so that it totalled 17,645. In that regard the county of Brant received justice. Take the county of Elgin. One constituency there had 28,000 and the other 14,000. A readjustment was made giving East Elgin 25,000 of a population and West Elgin 23,000 instead of 14,200.

Mr. McMULLEN. When did it have 14,000?

Mr. WALLACE. By the census of 1881.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have the figures which show that the hon. gentleman is mistaken. East Elgin had a population of 25,745 and West Elgin 23,480.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) can make his speech when I get through. In his endeavour to correct me he is simply making, as he always does, another stupid blunder. I say that West Elgin, according to the census of 1881, had a population of 14,214.

Mr. McMULLEN. It had not; it had 23,480.

Mr. WALLACE. And by the readjustment the population was made 23,480. The boundaries of West Elgin were changed, but the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) does not appear to have any knowledge of that fact. If he would study up a little before he attempts to mislead the House it would be better for him. Lambton had a population of 42,600 by the census of 1881. By the readjustment of 1882 it was made into East Lambton with a population of 21,700, and West Lambton with a population of 21,890. So it goes all the way through. Many constituencies were not touched and county boundaries were respected. This is a commendable thing to do where the principle of representation by population is not violently interfered with, as for instance, in regard to Glengarry, which was kept the same with a population of 22,200. Prescott was kept the same with a population of 22,887. Ottawa city was not changed for reasons that we all know. The national question had been coming into the city of Ottawa and it was recognized that, notwithstanding that its population was a little lower than the unit, it was a growing city. We had to realize what would occur in the future, and the city has since attained a population which justifies what was done at that time. The county of Carleton was readjusted so that, instead of having about 25,000 the population was reduced to nearly 19,000, coming closer to the unit of population than previously. It has since grown so rapidly that it is to-day beyond the unit of population, justifying the course that the Government took on that occasion. South Leeds with a population of 22,200 remained the same. South Lanark was readjusted. It had 20,000 of a population; it was reduced to 18,000, but North Lanark, which had a population of 13,900 was given a population of 19,855, or very close to the unit of population which was 20,900. So we might go through all these counties where no changes were made. In most of them the population was nearly such that it would justify no interference and permit of a respect being shown for county boundaries, so far as that could be done. If you take within 3,500 on either side of the unit of population, there were 61 constituencies in Ontario in 1882, which would conform to that rule, and 3,500, I think, is a fair margin to allow one side or the other of the unit, having regard to the fact that you are respecting county boundaries so far as you can possibly do it. But there is a higher principle than county boundaries and it is the principle of representation by population. North Perth had a population of 34,000. South Perth was close to the unit of population and its population was scarcely changed while that of North Perth was reduced by 8,000, or to 26,000. Wherever changes were desirable, in establishing the principle of representation by population, these changes were made by the Redistribution Bill of 1892. But they say: We are establishing this principle of county boundaries, which is a correct principle. I would like to ask these hon. gentlemen what is there about county boundaries that is so sacred. The right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) quoted a speech of the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald on that question, in which he claimed that he was advocating county boundaries. The whole tenor of that speech read by the right hon. gentleman was something entirely different from that. It was outlining the experience that men acquired before they became members of Parliament. He said, that a man became a member of the municipal council, reeve of a municipality, and warden, and he came to Parliament surrounded with municipal experience that qualified him for being a member of Parliament, and that that was the true system. I see the First Minister across the House. Did he come into Parliament by that circuitous route? I think he will answer "no." Did the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or the Postmaster General, or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, come into Parliament in the manner indicated by the late Sir John Macdonald? I think each one of them will have to answer "no." Therefore, I do not see the appositeness of the statement made by the First Minister in that regard. And suppose the principle of county boundaries is to be held sacred as these hon. gentlemen say. We must not forget that for twenty years Sir Oliver Mowat, the most astute of Liberal politicians, has been gerrymandering the province of Ontario. I will give you one example. There were a number of counties adjoining that were pretty close politically, and Sir Oliver Mowat conceived the idea of creating a new county called Dufferin. He took the township of Amaranth, with 212 Conservative majority, Melancthon, with 125 Conservative majority, Mono, with 350 Conservative majority, the town of Shelburne, with 100 Conservative majority, Garafraxa, with 201 Conservative majority, East Luther, where there was a tie, Orangeville, with 150 Conservative majority, Mulmer, with 250 Conservative majority, a total Conservative majority of 1,388. Sir Oliver Mowat made these townships into a county which was a Conservative hive, and he weakened the Conservative vote in all the surrounding constituencies. Those that were pretty evenly balanced before became Liberal, because the Conservative townships were taken away. Every municipality in Dufferin, with the exception of East Luther, which was a tie, had enormous Conservative majorities, and these were taken from four or five electoral districts so that these electoral districts might return Liberals to the local legislature. And yet we are asked to fall down and worship this form of respecting county boundaries; county boundaries that have been gerrymandered by Sir Oliver Mowat for twenty years whenever it suited his purpose. It is the same thing all over the province of Ontario. These gentlemen opposite want us to respect such gerrymandered county boundaries, but I do not think the people of Canada will tolerate that. The Postmaster General, after elaborating his Bill the other day, gloated over the fact that he thought the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) was going to lose his constituency under this gerrymander, and no wonder the Postmaster General said: Great is the power of the gerrymander. Well might he say it, if his Government can get this gerrymander through. This iniquitous Bill is, I claim, unconstitutional, and unprecedented, and was never contemplated by the Act of Confederation. As the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has clearly proved, there never was any previous attempt to change constituencies until the time mentioned in the Confederation Act, viz., after the decennial census, when the population is ascertained up to date, and an immediate redistribution of constituencies is provided for. The strongest objection to this Bill is that it does not deal with the state of affairs existing to-day. The promoter of the Bill (Mr. Mulock) told us that the judges were not to consider the present population and not to consider the many changes that have taken place since the census was taken in April, 1891. The judges are not to consider these changed conditions, nor did the Government consider them in their gerrymander, and so, we are asked to legislate on a condition of affairs which does not exist. Such a thing has never been proposed in Parliament before. If they pleaded that in the Rossland district, or in any other district where population had increased, there should be changed, a person could understand that; but the Government tell us that we are to shut our eyes to everything that has happened in Canada for the last nine years, and that we are to legislate to-day as if we were legislating nine years ago. I challenge them to produce a piece of legislation in this or any other country, parallel to this old fogey, fossilized attempt they are making to redistribute the constituencies in the interests of the Liberal party. And why do they introduce this Bill? As pointed out by the leader of the Opposition, they are doing it because they are afraid, even to meet the constituencies that returned them to power. They are afraid to go back to these constituencies; they are afraid to wait for a year or two until the census is taken, and when they, or some other Government, can make a proper redistribution of seats.

Another objection to this Bill is, that it would introduce constant changes into our representation. If this be permitted to become law, it will form a precedent, and any new Government coming into power, being dissatisfied with the distribution of the constituencies, can make any change they desire when they have a majority at their back. This Bill would create such a system of unrest, and such a system of change, as would be very disastrous to the best interests of the country. I contend that the Parliament of Canada would be justified in relegating this Bill back to the gentlemen who have promoted it, until the census is taken and until it has been ascertained what changes are justifiable, and legal, and constitutional, and in the interests of the country. The leader of the Opposition gave some instances to show that the Redistribution Bill of 1882 was not an unfair one, and I will repeat his figures with regard to the province of Ontario. In Ontario, at the general elections in 1896, there were 191,052 Conservative votes polled, and 43 Conservative members elected; there were 166,335 Liberal votes polled, and there were 44 Liberal members of Parliament elected. Does that look as if there was a gerrymander in the province of Ontario? To my mind it conclusively proves, that the Conservative party had, as always, been too generous to their opponents.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. WALLACE. In 1896, there were 413,000 Conservative votes polled in the whole Dominion, and 397,114 Liberal votes polled, or a majority of 16,000 Conservative votes. Yet the Liberals are sitting on the Government benches and the Conservatives are in Opposition. Does that prove that there was a gerrymander in 1882, or that the elections were held under a gerrymander redistribution Bill? It disproves it, to my mind, entirely.

The PRIME MINISTER. Everybody ought to be displeased with that Act. We do not want it, and you say you do not want it either.

Mr. WALLACE. I say that when an Act gives the Liberal party more than fair-play, they cannot complain of injustice.

The PRIME MINISTER. But we do. We do not want more than fair-play.

Mr. WALLACE. But the Liberal party were not satisfied with having more than their share; they want to gobble up the whole of this country. They want a gerrymander that will give two members to the county of Brant, with its 33,612 of population. These figures I get from the Act of the local legislature. Then, in the county of Norfolk, with about 30,000, is to have two members. Both of these are Liberal counties, taking the population as a whole; but, being Liberal counties, they are to have more than their share; while the county of Carleton, if it were given the municipalities that belong to it, would be more than entitled to two members; but as those two members would certainly be Conservatives, that is not to be permitted. So it goes all through the Bill. It is hiving the Conservatives in such a way that even though they had a majority of the electors of the province of Ontario, the members they would have in this House would be in a large minority. Therefore, I say that this Bill is unjustifiable, it is illegal, it is unconstitutional. There is no necessity for it to-day except on the ground that these hon. gentlemen are afraid to meet their constituents without having a measure of this kind passed through the House. For all these reasons, I think we ought to reject the Bill. I am afraid, however, that I have not made that impression on the members on the opposite side of the House that I should desire, because I am afraid they are attached to their idols. But, Sir, we do not despair. The public conscience is not dead. It looked a short time ago as if all kinds of rascality in election matters would be condoned by the electors. But the local government of Ontario are shivering in their boots to-day, and that shivering process will reach the members of this Government, if it has not done so already. It will react all over this country, and the public conscience will be awakened to every act of wrong-doing on the part of this Government and their henchmen outside. When the people of this country are demanding progressive legislation, these men do not bring in anything to promote the prosperity of the people. They simply bring in disturbing legislation for the promotion of the interests of one political party, and the attempted destruction of the other.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). Mr. Speaker, I do not know that there is any member of this House except the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) who would undertake to present the statements that have been presented to-day by that hon. gentleman. He has given the population of several counties, and in doing so he has committed very serious errors. I do not know where he got his figures—certainly not from the census of 1881 or the census of 1891. The hon. gentleman made some reference to a gentleman who was at one time a very popular and distinguished member of this House, the late lamented Mr. Trow. He stated that that gentleman was knifed in his own riding by his own friends, and that he had made extended use of a note which had been sent to him by the late Sir John Macdonald, expressing sympathy with him after he had been unseated, and hoping to see him back in the House. I may say that I went through South Perth with Mr. Trow, and was at every meeting he attended, and I never knew him in a single instance to use that note; but I know that if any one thing injured him more than another it was the fact that the Government of that day, headed by Sir John Macdonald—

Mr. WALLACE. I rise to a point of order. I understand the hon. member for North Wellington to say that I made the statement that Sir John Macdonald had written a letter to Mr. Trow regarding his defeat. I made no such statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is not a proper point of order, simply to deny a statement that has been made by an hon. member.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was going on to state when I was interrupted—

Mr. WALLACE. I simply claim the right to say that I made no such statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that no point of order can be raised by simply denying a statement that has been made by a member who has the floor.

Mr. WALLACE. I may say further—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. WALLACE—that Sir John Macdonald was not alive when the gentleman was defeated.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman has the habit, which has become chronic with him, of interrupting members of this House when they undertake to address the House, especially when they follow himself. I was going on to state that Mr. Trow, after he had been unfortunately unseated, received from Sir John Macdonald, either by word of mouth or by note, an expression of regret and sympathy, and a hope that he would see him back in the House. He was under the impression that Sir John Macdonald was not opposed to his being returned in South Perth; and therefore what amazed him and what tended to break his heart more than anything else, was the fact that a member of Sir John Macdonald's Government then came to South Perth to try to defeat Mr. Trow. The hon. member for West York says it was the feeling that his own friends had gone back on him. I say it was the feeling that while a member of that Government expressed sympathy for him and appreciation of his fair-mindedness in the discharge of his duties as Whip of this House for many years, his courtesy and kindness to members on both sides of the House, and his desire for peace and harmony and good-feeling, yet, when he was in the throes of his last election, a member of the Cabinet came to South Perth to try to defeat him.

My hon. friend made some reference to the constituencies of North and South Perth. It is amazing with what an amount of sincerity, apparently, my hon. friend approaches this question, and I was amused at the great appreciation which his leader evinced, as he energetically cheered his utterances. If there ever was an Act put upon the statutes of Canada that constitutes the blackest page of its history, from confederation down to the present, it is the Gerrymander Act passed in 1882. There never was an Act that carried with it such evidence of injustice and unfairness, of a desire to tie the hands and cripple the efforts of the Reform party. The hon. leader of the Opposition to-day realizes what an advantage that Act gave them, and was never more unwilling than now to go before the country, except under that Gerrymander Act, which tied up the hands of the Liberal party.

I am amazed by the manner in which the hon. member for West York treated those who are to carry out the measure now proposed. It must be a compliment to the judges to know that my esteemed friend has given them such a high and dignified name as "heelers." According to the hon. member, they are nothing better than a set of heelers.

Mr. WALLACE. I was referring to Capt. Sullivan and Simeon Hewitt.

Mr. McMULLEN. The present Administration have a mandate from the people to carry out the measure now proposed. That was one of the reforms laid down by the convention in Ottawa. Every Reformer appealed to his constituency on the principles contained in that platform of that convention, one of which was the abolition of the vicious Gerrymander Act.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say we have made no effort to carry out our pledges. The hon. leader of the Opposition made this charge several times, which I would rather attribute to a loss of memory on his part than to intention. We are endeavouring now to carry out a pledge which the people exacted from us, and on which they returned us to power, and that is the pledge to abolish the Gerrymander Act. What does my hon. friend from West York say by the course he takes this afternoon. He virtually admits that if it were not by virtue of the gerrymander, he would not be here. He says to the electors of West York: I am afraid to trust my political existence in your hands. If I cannot have an addition made to you, brought in from Toronto, I am afraid to trust you. I am astonished to find a man who occupies the very distinguished position my hon. friend does in this country—a man at the head of an influential party—so scared of his political life that he is going to fight for the Gerrymander Act because if West York is ungerrymandered, that county will no longer be safe for him. I thought my hon. friend had a better opinion of himself. He has told us that he is in this House by the grace of gerrymander, and he wants to continue the gerrymander, so that he may be elected again.

Mr. McMULLEN.

But what we want is to go back to the condition that existed before any of these measures were ever brought into life—to the condition that existed before 1882. We are willing to meet hon. gentlemen opposite on a fair field, but do not want to go before the electorate with our hands tied behind our backs. The hon. leader of the Opposition would like to see us forced to do that, but the feeling of the country is, that we have had enough of gerrymander. We know perfectly well that Sir John Macdonald himself held that county boundaries should not be interfered with. My hon. friend tried to abolish them, but, nevertheless, he went on to say why he thought the county boundaries should be preserved. He said that men came out for the purpose of seeking municipal honours, that after being elected to the council, they became elected to the office of deputy reeve and reeve, and that then, if they showed ability, they were elected wardens, and after that became members of Parliament. In that way the counties had an opportunity of picking out the best men, but the moment you break down county boundaries, you destroy that opportunity. I hold that county boundaries are the proper thing, though I do not say that in every case you can give to the population in every county the representation it is entitled to; but, taking all in all, the county boundaries should be preserved, whoever may lose or gain.

My hon. friend said something with regard to the manner in which the Gerrymander Act of 1882 was inaugurated, in so far as Ontario is concerned. He said that Mr. Bowell and Mr. Aikens were the two individuals chosen for the purpose of readjusting the province of Ontario. Well, Mr. Bowell was, in my humble opinion, a very fit man to perform the piece of manipulation that was performed in connection with the Gerrymander Act of 1882. Mr. Aikens was at one time a Reformer, but he left the Reform ranks. He held by the coat-tails of George Brown and the "Globe" for many years, until he got the position of Cabinet Minister in a coalition Government, and chose to remain there, for reasons we do not know. He did, however, remain there, and has been with our opponents to this day. And he helped to carry out that arrangement, feeling, I presume, somewhat bitter over the castigations and criticisms that were poured upon him owing to the manner in which he had deserted the principles that he had told us he held so dear in years gone by. Now, in regard to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, my hon. friend said that he left West Lambton and came to East York, in fact the hon. gentleman said he was turned out of West Lambton, that the people of that riding did not want him any more. If my hon. friend has familiarized himself with the history of Mr. Mackenzie's life—and I hope he has, because, I am sure, it would do him good—he will know that Mr. Mackenzie could have had West Lambton, that, in fact, it was offered him ; but he was urged to take East York, because, as he had removed to Toronto, it would be more convenient to his home, and he could easily carry it. He took East York and carried it. And the best evidence that he could have had West Lambton is the fact that Mr. Lister, who is now a judge, was elected by something like a thousand majority in that constituency. But my hon. friend, to throw a reflection on the memory of a dead statesman, a man whom political friends and political opponents alike know to have been an upright, patriotic man, one of the best that Canada ever knew, says that he had to leave West Lambton and go to East York. The facts are as I have stated. Mr. Mackenzie was greatly appreciated by the people of Canada, and I can tell my hon. friend that he will not gain in popularity by this attempt to cast a slur upon his memory.

The hon. gentleman mentioned also the case of Bothwell and Mr. Mills. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that Bothwell was gerrymandered, and gerrymandered for the purpose of turning the Hon. David Mills, the present Minister of Justice, out of his seat. That was at first accomplished, but through a protest, the seat was opened, and the Hon. David Mills was returned. We know perfectly well that one of the most iniquitous features of the gerrymander was the abolition of the seat held by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). That was done because of his marvellous ability and his fighting qualities. His opponents thought it would be a grand thing if they could get him out of Parliament altogether—and they made a big attempt to do it. But the hon. gentleman got his seat and is here to-day. Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) knows perfectly well that the gerrymander accomplished a great deal for his party in 1882. Notwithstanding the fact that a few years before they had inaugurated the National Policy, and spoke loud and eloquently in praise of that policy, they were not willing to go before the electors and risk their political lives without tying the hands of the Reformers—and that was the reason why they gerrymandered the counties. Take my own case. I have the honour to represent North Wellington. My constituency, Sir, is composed of parts of three counties, Dufferin, Wellington and Perth. After my nomination took place, the riding was gerrymandered. A township which gave a very respectable Reform majority, was put out of my riding, a township from North Perth, which gave 176 Conservative majority, was put in. This was not done to equalize population, as will be seen clearly if you look at the manner in which the Bill was drawn, for when they put in the township of Wallace, they brought up the population to within a few hundred of what it had been before. The purpose was, if possible to secure to hon. gentlemen opposite a representative from that constituency to support them. But, after all, North Wellington did not return a man in sympathy with them but returned a man in opposition, and he has been in the House ever since and he is here to-day, notwithstanding the fact of the gerrymander and of persistent protests. Yes, that was carried to the Supreme Court at Ottawa. Hon. gentlemen opposite thought North Wellington was a little Tory inheritance that they were entitled to have, and that I was virtually an interloper. They sought by means of the law and by every scheme they could think of to keep me out ; but I am here still. So far as I am concerned, I have no great desire to part with any township in my riding ; still, I am willing that the riding should be adjusted. My hon. friend talked of the county of Dufferin, and said that Sir Oliver Mowat had created Dufferin in order to give the Tories. That statement is as true as many of the other statements the hon. gentleman made to-day, and those statements and the truth are just as far apart as are the north pole and the south pole. If my hon. friend knew the history of that movement he would know there was not a single township in the county of Dufferin that had not memorialized the Ontario Government in favour of that county formation, and the people adopted it by vote. Some portions of the territory now forming the county of Dufferin were, in those days, very far from the places where the people had to go to do their county business—50 or 60 miles. Some of them went down to the county of Peel, some to the county of Grey—up to Owen Sound—and some to the county of Wellington, a distance of 50 miles. The people felt that it would be a decided advantage to them if they could form a new county, and these townships, every one of them, by their municipal officials, by resolutions or otherwise, memorialized the Ontario Government to set them up as a county by themselves. And, allow me to say, the Bill was not introduced by the Government, but was introduced by a private member of the House. It was not carried through by a force vote by the Reformers, but was carried through by the hon. gentleman's own friends. But, notwithstanding that, and though hon. gentlemen opposite knew that in 1882 the county of Dufferin was entitled to a member, they gave it no member. Why ? Because it was so solidly Conservative that they thought they could make better use of it by diffusing its votes amongst the surrounding counties to give them a Tory complexion rather than by giving them a member to themselves, who would be elected, as my hon. friend said, by twelve or fifteen hundred majority. A portion of it does duty in assisting my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to get elected. Another portion of it is in my riding—nice, decent people, they are. The township of Amaranth, in which they live, rolls up a majority against me, but they are getting better all the time, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I think so much of them that I should hate to part with them. But I am willing that Dufferin should have representation, and I believe it will. Another portion of Dufferin is put into the riding of Centre Wellington in the hope of defeating my hon. friend (Mr. Semple) who represents that riding. So, Dufferin is represented by sections.

An hon. MEMBER. Cardwell.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, Cardwell, and so the main part of the county of Peel, and part of the county of Dufferin, and Simcoe. Now, my hon. friend has denounced this Bill in very strong terms, he said it was an iniquitous Bill. Sir, I cannot understand how any gentleman can get up and pronounce a Bill iniquitous that goes back to a condition of things that existed before gerrymander was known in Canada, and proposes to recognize county boundaries, to recognize a principle that was declared by the leader they delight so much to honour, should never have been violated, and a Bill that will be left entirely to the judges as to the internal arrangements of each county and each riding. I cannot see how hon. gentlemen opposite can fancy that any injustice will be done them. For my part, although the Government have power to pass a Bill that would do them injustice, I would scorn to support a Bill that had in it the vicious features of the Bill of 1882. I would never want to occupy a seat in Parliament and to be charged by the people of this country with having lent my aid to put upon the statute-book a Bill with so many vicious features and injustices as the Gerrymander Act of 1882. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was in this House at the time that Bill passed, and I hope that he is now possessed of that spirit of fairness, having arrived at his advanced age—we are sorry that he is not younger—I had hoped that in the evening of his political existence, for once in his life he would admit that whereas an iniquitous Bill had been passed years ago, he was now willing to undo that and to go back to a just measure such as the one now introduced. The Conservative press in the country also are disposed to pronounce it a Gerrymander Act. The "Mail and Empire," of Toronto, for instance, has been loud in its denunciations of this Bill. It calls it the most vicious act that could be conceived in the breast of any man in order to bring about some advantages for the Reform party. That is the daily outpouring of the "Mail and Empire." I often wonder how the political editor of the "Mail and Empire" was ever able to compile, day after day, the fabrications and untruths that are heralded forth to its readers without the slightest foundation in fact. I have often thought that if his Satanic Majesty was domiciled in any place in this country, it certainly must be in the "Mail and Empire" office; and if he is not so specially domiciled in the "Mail and Empire" office, he certainly runs a big risk of losing one of his honorary titles, that of the father of lies, for the political editor of the "Mail and Empire" can beat him every day in the year. Sir, it is an amazing thing to watch the never-ending stream of fabrications that are published in that paper every day in order, if possible, to convince its readers that the present Government are corrupt, that they are robbing this country, that they will not consent to anything that is fair, and decent, and honest, that everything they do is characterized by mismanagement and extravagance, and that the Act now proposed is one of the worst Gerrymander Acts that have ever been introduced. Sir, I do not believe that the people of this country are disposed to take stock in any such utterances, whether made by the "Mail and Empire" or any other paper. I believe that the people are sick and tired of the never-ending outpouring of such statements as those. I believe they see in this Bill evidences of honesty, evidences of a desire to do what is right, evidences on the part of the Reform party not to mete out to their opponents the measure of injustice that they meted out to us in 1882. While they did an injustice, that is no reason why we should do an injustice; and we contend that the Bill now before the House cannot be characterized as anything else than an entirely just measure. No doubt it will place some men on the other side of the House in an awkward position, but it also places men on this side of the House in an equally awkward position. Men that are supporting the Government to-day will be deprived of their seats altogether. But notwithstanding that fact, it cannot be said that we are manipulating the constituencies, that we are seeking to destroy our political opponents. We do not care, to use a common phrase, whose ox is gored. The Bill itself has got to go through with that measure of equity and fairness that I believe it is the desire of the First Minister to mete out to his opponents, taking no advantage and asking none.

Now, some remarks were made about the gerrymander of 1892. After the census of 1891 we had a Redistribution Bill, but when hon. gentlemen opposite went over the several constituencies they found that if they interfered with the existing conditions at all they could not better their own position politically, on the other hand they would virtually injure themselves. I dare say that every man who held a seat here was anxious to continue and enjoy all the advantages that he had under the existing arrangement; and the result was that although there was some small changes made, on the whole the Bill did not make much change unless in the case of Haldimand and one or two other places. Let me point out where no changes were made in the constituencies in 1892. Under the census of 1891 the population of South Brant was 23,359, while the population of East Bruce was 15,853. The population of North Brant in 1891 was 16,993. Then take Cornwall and Stormont, which had a population of 27,156, while the population of East Durham was 17,503, virtually 10,000 of a difference. But after all no change was made to bring about equalization. West Durham had 15,397, and East Elgin had 26,724, a difference of nearly 11,000, but there was no proposition to make any change. Then again in North Essex there were 31,000, while in Frontenac there were only 13,445. Then you have in North Grey, 26,341, while you have in Haldimand 16,365. Then you have in Kent 31,134, while you have in Lennox, 14,000, but little over one-half the population of Kent. Then you have again in Middlesex East, 25,569, while in Middlesex West you had only 17,288. And so on through the whole list of ridings in Ontario, you find that very serious discrepancies exist. In North Perth the population in 1891 was 26,907, of South Perth, 19,400, nearly 7,000 of a difference. Although that difference existed, and although it was at a time when readjustment ought to take place, as a fact no readjustment did take place, no change was made simply because it suited hon. gentlemen opposite to keep things as they were. Then, you have East Simcoe with a population of 35,801, while North Victoria has a population of 16,840, South Wellington with a population of 24,375, and Wentworth with a population of 14,591. So that, in all these different constituencies, the discrepancy between the populations, as they then existed, shows clearly that, although there should have been a readjustment, there was no readjustment, because it did not suit hon. gentlemen opposite to have a readjustment. It suited them better to keep the constituencies as they were, because, if they had been readjusted, and if each riding had been brought up to the proportion of population, as near as possible to the unit of population, they would have interfered with the gerrymander of 1882, and it was for that reason that, in 1892, hon. gentlemen allowed these constituencies to remain largely as they were. The electoral district of Brockville, with two townships attached, had a population of 15,855; South Leeds, adjoining, had a population of 22,449, yet no change was made. Cardwell had a population of 15,382, while we had North Wellington with a population of 24,956, within a few of 25,000; South Wellington with a population of 24,373, Durham West with a population of 15,324 and Ontario South with a population of 19,033, just 4,000 of a difference. Notwithstanding the fact that these differences existed in 1891, no change was made. There was no attempt at representation by population, simply because it did not suit hon. gentlemen opposite to make any changes, because, if they had made changes, the probabilities are that some hon. gentlemen who are here to-day would not have been here. There is Frontenac, which had a population of 15,445 in 1891, while South Leeds, adjoining, had a population of 22,449, showing a serious discrepancy between these two ridings. South Grenville had a population in 1891 of 12,929, a few short of 13,000, while you had the adjoining county of Dundas, with a population of 20,132. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that, unless you break county boundaries and bring together minor municipalities, you cannot equitably adjust the representation. But I am now showing that, while they broke county boundaries and while they pitchforked, from one place to another, minor municipalities, it was not to produce representation by population, but it was for the sinister purpose of helping themselves politically, because the population, as shown by the census of 1891, clearly proves that there was no attempt to adjust the representation by population at all. It was to further their own purposes and to carry out their own schemes that the gerrymander of 1882 was perpetrated and they did not want to touch it in 1892, knowing that they could not make it better serve their own political ends. There was no occasion to attempt to make any improvement upon the gerrymander of 1882; it had been so complete. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) this afternoon pointed out some irregularities in regard to the Bill before the House. The Bill is now up for its second reading. It is subject to amendment when we get into committee, and I am quite sure that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), if any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House will point out where any just or equitable amendment can be made to the Bill as it has been introduced, is open to conviction, if hon. gentlemen can show that such a condition exists. But I am quite sure that he is not open to the criticism that was made in 1882, because after the Gerrymander Bill had been introduced in that session, and when it came up for its second reading, the Opposition, headed by Mr. Blake, challenged the Bill on the ground that it was not the same as that which had been introduced, and which had got its first reading. Under the rules of the House he compelled the then Government to withdraw the motion for the second reading of the Bill, and it was read a first time again because it had changed its countenance so completely that it was no more like what it was then, compared with its appearance when first introduced, than a Chinaman is like an African Hottentot. There was no comparison at all, and they had to introduce the Bill a second time. Now we come to some other counties which go further to show that there was no attempt made to approach the unit of representation, as nearly as possible, either by the Gerryman-der Act of 1882 or by the readjustment of 1892, because it would not suit their political purposes to have representation by population. Representation by population is a principle that they never liked, nor have they ever practiced it, and it would not be practiced as long as they were in power, but we are going to try to do what we can to give the people proper representation. Under the constitution of this country it was the duty of the Government to increase the population of counties where it was far below the unit and to readjust it by increasing the representation when it was far above the unit, so as to make a proper representation. North Leeds and Grenville had a population of only 13,521 in 1891, while the adjoining county of Carleton had a population of 21,746. Their desire to readjust the constituencies so as to approach the unit of population as nearly as possible, was such that they left constituencies of this kind. They had adopted the principle of transferring minor municipalities from one county to another, and, although this is a practice that would largely facilitate the readjustment of the population, it did not suit them to do so. They had so manipulated the constituencies under the gerrymander of 1882 that they could not interfere with their friends who held these constituencies in order to bring them up to the unit of population, and they were, therefore, allowed to remain as they were. Lennox had a population of 14,000, while Addington, adjoining, had 24,151, so that there was very nearly 10,000 of a difference between these two counties, one alongside of the other. The census taken in 1891, the constitution calling for a readjustment every ten years, but no readjustment took place because it did not suit the political convenience and advantage of hon. gentlemen opposite, and these constituencies were allowed to remain as they were. Northumberland West had a population of 14,949, and alongside of it was the east riding of the same county, with a population of 22,000—14,000 in one riding, 22,000 in another, the census taken, the returns made, the constitution demanding a readjustment, but no readjustment was made, and the reason was that the political advantage enjoyed under the gerrymander of 1882 might be interfered with, and these hon. gentlemen would not be able to hold their seats. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) is very fond of pointing to the constitution and of calling upon the Government to obey it, but when he was a Minister of the Crown, and he sat as a Cabinet Minister at that time, he sang very low as to the readjustment of these counties, because it did not suit his own purpose.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Take Cardwell, having 15,466, and place that alongside West York, with a population of 41,857. My hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) has a very large constituency, and in order to properly adjust the representation, it is necessary that West Toronto should be taken from West York and put into the constituency of Toronto, where it belongs; so that West York can have the honour of a member for itself, as it has a right to. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) go back to the people of West York and tell them that that is infamous? Will he tell them: Although there are 41,000 people in my riding, I am so suspicious of your loyalty to me that I do not want to trust my political life in your hands, and I am going to fight to keep West Toronto in West York in order to elect me? He (Mr. Wallace) has lived in the constituency for forty years, and what sort of confidence is that to have in his people. If I were a voter in West York, and if I were represented in this House by a man who had so little confidence in his constituents, I would say to him: If that is all the confidence you have in us, then we will have no more to do with you. That would be the proper reply for the people of West York to give to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace). The hon. gentleman has a good deal of hard-headed common sense, and I was astonished to find that he would make such a statement in the House, and leave himself open to such a charge from his constituents. It is a most infamous thing for my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) to treat his old constituency in that way. The same applies to any hon. gentleman who gets up in this House and protests because some little adjustment is made in his county in the interests of justice. I would like to know how many gentlemen in this House who oppose this Bill, are willing to admit that they never would have been representatives of the people, were it not for the infamous gerrymander of 1882. Sir, I believe that the true patriot is the man who is willing to face his constituents without the help of a gerrymander, present his principles and his deeds before his people, and ask for their support on his merits. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) apparently thinks that if this Bill passes, his chances before the country are very slim. I tell him that if he could go before the people of this country and show that the Liberal Government have been recreant to the best interests of the Dominion, that they have sacrificed its interests, or squandered its resources, he would stand a thousand times a better chance to get the confidence of the Canadian people than he would by clinging to a mean, contemptible Gerryman-der Act. The people of Canada would appreciate a man who had the manliness to stand up and repudiate this infamous gerrymander that has been pronounced by all fair-minded people as a disgrace to any political party. Now that I have answered all the points raised by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), let me express the hope that this Bill will become law, because I believe it is a fair Bill in itself, and bears the word "justice" written upon the face of it. Above all, it is introduced by a man in this House, and introduced by a Prime Minister, that would scorn to take a mean, contemptible advantage of any one. We are willing to go before the people of the country, and fight our battle on the high principles of statesmanship, and we want no gerrymander to help the Liberal party to be returned to power. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman from West York (Mr. Wallace) should give expression to such language as he has given expression to to-day. I am sorry for the respectable and intelligent constituency he represents. I do not know but that he was born in the riding; at all events, he has lived a long time in it, and I am sorry he should have forgotten himself so far as to express unlimited want of confidence in its people, and to tell them they will not elect him unless he has the gerrymander to support him. I trust that this Bill will pass through its various stages without any unnecessary delay. If hon. gentlemen opposite have any just and reasonable suggestions to make, I believe the Postmaster General is prepared to open his mind and his ear, and to receive them in a good spirit. In conclusion, let me say that I believe the Bill is so fair and so just at the present moment that it will meet with unanimous approval by the people of the country.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). The House will agree with me, I think, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has discussed almost every other subject except anything which is pertinent to this Bill. The House will, no doubt, be amused at the patriotism and courage of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), in view of the fact that he has not been entirely unselfish in having obtained a rearrangement of his own constituency. Is he afraid to go back to North Wellington, that he must have his position strengthened by the addition of Liberal votes? Why, the confession is still warm on his lips, that he is afraid to meet his old constituents. Let him apply the argument to his own case that he applied to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and he will have the answer from himself that he is afraid of his present constituents. And what is the position of his leader? Why, the Prime Minister is himself afraid to go back to the constituencies in the province of Ontario which gave him their confidence in 1896.

The hon. gentleman could not have made a stronger case against himself if he had been discussing it the whole day than he did in the closing remarks of his speech, namely, that the hon. member for West York was afraid to go back because it was possible that his constituents might reject him. The hon. member for West York has pursued a very different course from what the hon. gentleman did on a different occasion. Those who consult "Hansard" will see that the Minister of Customs did not take that course. He pleaded for his life; he asked why his head should be taken off. I do not think that was a patriotic or courageous course to take. So far as I am concerned, I would disdain to ask any favours from hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with the redistribution of the constituencies. The interests of a single member of this House are not to be weighed against the great general interest. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been denouncing the Act of 1882 from that time up to this moment. One of the chief sinners has been the Minister of Customs (Mr. Pater-son), who has declared it to be one of the most infamous Bills ever passed. The hon. member for North Wellington declared that the blackest page in the history of Canada was the Redistribution Bill of 1882. Yet, will you believe it, the hon. gentleman sat down without mentioning a single case; and I defy him now to point out a single constituency in the forty-eight now under consideration, in which a Liberal candidate was defeated as the result of the redistribution of 1882. Yet the hon. gentleman declares that it was the blackest page in the history of Canada. Is it not too idle, too silly, too unworthy of a full-grown man to make a statement of that kind so utterly at variance with the facts? He says the Liberal members have been hived and hampered. I will sit down if the hon. gentleman will accept my challenge to point out one single case in which a Liberal candidate has been defeated as a result of that Act. If he cannot do that, he has made an exhibition that it utterly unworthy of any member of this House. I ask him will he sit silent, or will he take the challenge? No, he will not take the challenge. The exhibition that was made by the hon. gentleman to-day was faint in comparison with that made by the Minister of Customs, or with that made by the Postmaster General; I mean in exaggeration. These hon. gentlemen might have been excused in 1882; they might have had grave fears at that time; but what excuse have they, 18 years or more afterwards, for rising in this House and declaring that the Act of 1882 had tied the hands of Liberal members, had enslaved them, had legislated them out of their seats, when they cannot put their finger upon a single case to prove that that was the result? I am going to give an example of the hon. gentleman's comparisons. In speaking of the inequality between the constituencies, he selects cases which are not sanctioned by reason or honesty. He takes the county of Essex, which is divided into two ridings. No municipality is broken. The county is too large for one constituency and it is divided into two. Then he takes the county of Frontenac, although its county boundaries are not touched. Yet he declares that this is one of the infamous features of the gerrymander of 1882. I do not think he was acquainted with the provisions of that Act, because I do not think he knew what he was talking about, or he would not have talked such rank nonsense. He takes East and West Northumberland, and shows a disparity in the population. Does he know that the county boundaries are not touched in the case of East and West Northumberland? I shall not pursue the subject further in reply to what the hon. gentleman said. I think he has so completely answered himself that it would be idle to take up the time of the House in doing so.

I want, however, to refer to one remark which he made to the effect that the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, in a speech in this House, declared himself to be somewhat in favour of county boundaries. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition made that matter so perfectly clear that the hon. gentleman, if he had not a short memory, ought to have been satisfied. While Sir John Macdonald made that statement, yet in the light of ten years' experience, he saw the error of pursuing a course of that kind. Hon. gentlemen talk about the unit of population, and take exception to the existing law because it does not provide an absolute unit. Nobody pretends that it is possible in the Dominion of Canada to have an absolute unit of population. If not, what is the next reasonable step to be taken? It is that we shall have as near a unit of population as possible, always taking into consideration that some counties are very small and others very large. Hon. gentlemen know that the eastern counties of Ontario are all small and the western counties large, and that it would be utterly impossible to have absolute equality of population, either by maintaining or departing from county boundaries. But while there is a great difficulty in having equality of population where county boundaries are broken, I am sure the House will agree with me that the difficulty is greatly intensified when municipal boundaries are adhered to.

Now, I am going to point out the difference between the attitude of the Conservative party in 1882 and that of the Liberal party to-day. It is a well-known fact that the Redistribution Bill of 1882 was imposed by the constitution on the Government of that day. What was the result? I will venture to say that by that measure the Government gave as nearly as possible a fair unit of population, and also the most conveniently-shaped constituencies. They gave no party advantage to the Conservative party, but, on the contrary, they gave a great advantage to the Liberal party in the Redistribution Act of 1892. Now, what was the prime excuse given by the Postmaster General for introducing this Bill? I would like his friends to mark the excuse he gave. This is what the hon. gentleman said:

Mr. CLANCY.

It has not been the custom in the Canadian Parliament to make changes in the constituencies except in the session immediately succeeding the decennial census, but it has happened that, ever since confederation, the census and the succeeding redistributions have always taken place while our political adversaries were in power.

In this the hon. gentleman disclosed the whole case, namely, that it has not been customary to make a redistribution except immediately following the taking of the decennial census, but that the Liberal party were not in power during those periods, and now these hon. gentlemen want to seize upon the opportunity, when they are in power, to make redistribution at a time when it is improper to do so. Keeping that in mind, we can intelligently follow out the argument which the hon. gentleman adduced. If in moving the second reading he were able to show, even though redistribution be wholly indefensible at this period, that the Liberal party had been placed at a disadvantage and were not given the representation they were entitled to, he would have established a case of at least hardship, although not a case to warrant the Government in entering upon a rearrangement of the seats at this time. I wish to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact in this regard, because he has been imposed upon. I have a better opinion of him than to suppose that he would make a statement in this House, knowing it to be without foundation, and I think I will be able to show him that he made an egregious error, that he did not compile the figures properly or examine them after they were compiled, but took it for granted that the compilation was correct and strove to make out a case on a statement wholly at variance with the facts. What does the hon. gentleman say:

Well, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted now to prove a proposition that I advanced a short time ago? Taking the votes cast in the constituencies, the names of which I have read—46 of them in the general election of 1882, 46 in the general election of 1887, 46 in the general election of 1891, and 43 in the general election of 1896; and, adding together the majorities obtained by the Liberals and Conservatives in all these elections, let us see if we can find out what ought to have been a fair representation of parties in this House.

He proceeds further:

At the general election of 1882, the 46 constituencies that I refer to gave a Liberal majority at the polls of 8,574. The election returns gave for those 46 seats, 15 Conservatives and 31 Liberal members.

Take those 46 seats, and if the majorities which they gave in the election of 1882 to the Conservatives and Liberals had been in proportion to the votes cast, instead of the Conservative party having had 15 representatives in this House in that Parliament, they would only have had 10, and instead of the Liberals having only had 31 they would have had 36.

I ask the hon. gentleman if, after having seen his speech in print, he still adheres to that argument because I do not care to mislead him ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. What I said was in proportion to the majority and not in proportion to the votes cast. If the hon. gentleman's quotation reads in proportion to the votes cast, I am either not reported or not quoted correctly.

Mr. CLANCY. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has made himself definite, because I propose to show by his system of calculation of majorities that he has taken the most absurd means, which, when worked out to a proper conclusion, shows the hon. gentleman to be entirely wrong. I will take the 48 ridings to which the hon. gentleman refers.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Forty-six.

Mr. CLANCY. I include West York and West Elgin which are in the same group.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I was dealing with the ridings affected by the Gerrymander Act of 1882. I did not take account of any riding that had not been subjected to that legislation and the succeeding legislation of 1892.

Mr. CLANCY. It does not alter the case whether you take 46 or 48. I will take the 48 instead of 46. In the 48 now under consideration, because West York is under consideration and West Elgin as well, the Liberals polled a total vote in 1882 of 78,473 and the Conservatives 72,309. What was the result ? The Liberals elected 32 members on a vote of 78,437 and the Conservatives only 16 on a vote of 72,309. But the hon. gentleman was not satisfied at having elected 32 while the Conservatives elected 16, but concluded that the Liberals should have had 36 and the Conservatives only 12 in these 48 constituencies. Suppose we take it on the basis of the votes cast, what would be the result ? Why, the Liberals would have elected 25 out of the 48 and the Conservatives 23. I will take 16 seats out of that group, namely, Middlesex West, North Wentworth, North Wellington, Peel, South Wentworth, North Grey, South Grey, Bothwell, North Ontario, South Ontario, South Norfolk, West Huron, East Bruce, North Perth, East Middlesex and Grey. Take 16 out of the 48 and work them out on the hon. gentleman's plan. The Liberals polled in these, in 1882, 25,084 and the Conservative 25,691, or a Conservative majority of 607. But what was the result in the election ? The Liberals elected 13 and the Conservative elected three. Let us take it on the majority basis, and what would have been the result ? Instead of the Liberals having 13 and the Conservatives three, the Conservatives were entitled to 11 and the Liberals to five. I ask the hon. gentleman what he has to say to that ? But if you put it on account of the aggregate vote, they are so nearly alike, they would have elected eight members each. But I would go one step further with the calculation for the benefit of the hon. gentleman. Let him take five of these constituencies, North Wentworth, South Wentworth, Peel, East Grey and East Middlesex. The total vote polled by the Conservatives in these five constituencies was 7,767, and by the Liberals 6,952.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Is the hon. gentleman dealing with the election of 1882 ?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, I am dealing entirely with that election. The Conservatives had a majority in these five counties of 815 ; and yet these ridings returned two Conservatives and three Liberals. The total of the Liberal majorities in these constituencies was ninety-four, while the total of the Conservative majorities was 909. And if it were worked out according to the plan of my hon. friend, the Conservatives would have elected their man in every one of these constituencies and the Liberals would have elected none. A more absurd statement than that of the hon. gentleman I never heard. Had I not heard it, I would not have believed that the Postmaster General of Canada would have made himself responsible for such figures as the hon. gentleman has advanced. I do not think that he or any of his friends saw the absurdity covered by his calculation. But this is only a fair sample of what the hon. gentlemen are offering in support of this Bill, for, as they say, undoing the infamous gerrymander of 1882.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CLANCY. When you left the Chair at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with the hon. the Postmaster General's (Mr. Mulock's) effort to show by counting up the majorities, that the Liberal party were entitled to a greater number of members than they were able to return at the general elections of 1882. I wish to be entirely fair with the hon. gentleman, and to show that when I made the statement that he spoke of, the vote cast as well as of the majorities, I was quite correct. I will read what he said. He is thus reported at page 5366 of "Haasard" :

Take those 46 seats, and if the majorities which they gave in the election of 1882 to the Conservatives and Liberals had been in proportion to the votes cast, instead of the Conservative party having had 15 representatives in this House in that Parliament, they would only have had 10, and instead of the Liberals having only had 31 they would have had 36. In other words, while the Liberal party got only 15 seats in Parliament.—

I think there is an error there, and that the hon. gentleman means the Conservatives.

—a fair representation of that party, according to the vote cast,—

So he says "the votes cast" again—

—would have been 26,—

I think the hon. gentleman means thirty-six, which gives a consistent meaning to what the hon. gentleman said before—

—so that the Liberal party was deprived of ten votes on a division in this House.

My contention was that whether the hon. gentleman contended for greater representation on one ground or on the other, he was wrong in either case. But the hon. Minister made his calculation particularly on the majority. I endeavoured to show that, in the forty-eight ridings now under consideration, in the elections of 1882, the Liberals polled 78,473 votes and elected thirty-two members, while the Conservatives, polling only 6,164 votes less, were only able to elect sixteen members. Also I contended that on the votes cast the Liberals should have elected twenty-five out of forty-eight, and the Conservatives twenty-three, while, according to the hon. gentleman's contention, which, I think, he will see now is entirely unfounded, the Liberals should have had thirty-six and the Conservatives only ten—or, as I included forty-eight ridings instead of forty-six, I suppose the conclusion should be that the Conservatives should have had twelve. I pointed out further to the hon. gentleman by way of showing that he has been imposed upon by those who prepared the statement for him, that by taking that plan of determining the representation of the respective parties in this House, and by taking 16 of those ridings—because my hon. friend will agree that if the rule be a correct one it does not matter whether you take 48 ridings or 16 ridings, the result would work out correctly in both cases. Now, take 16 of those ridings; the Liberals polled 25,084 votes, and they elected 13 members; the Conservatives polled 25,691 of the votes cast, and they only elected three members. Then, if we take the other plan proposed by the hon. gentleman, take it on the vote cast, they would have elected eight members each, because there is only a fraction of difference. But if the hon. gentleman's contention was followed out, the Conservatives would have had 11 seats in this House, and the Liberals would only have had five. Then, I go further and take five ridings out of the same group in which the Liberals polled 6,952 votes, and they elected three members; the Conservatives polled 7,767 votes, and they only elected two. Now, on the popular vote polled, the Liberals should have only elected two, and the Conservatives would have elected three. But we will take the hon. gentleman's plan—and this is entirely in favour of the Conservatives—in that case there would have been no Liberals elected, and five Conservatives would have been elected, ac-ording to the hon. gentleman. I think, Mr. Speaker, I need not pursue that argument any further. I think hon. gentlemen on that side of the House must see the unfairness, I say the entire absurdity, without characterizing it by any stronger terms, of the argument of the hon. gentleman attempting to show that the Redistribution Bill of 1882 had done an injustice to the Liberal party.

I am going to point out now the bankrupt condition of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were forced to take so extreme, so unworthy, I was going to say a course unsanctioned by common sense and by reason. Now, the hon. gentleman goes further—and that is one of the reasons he gave for introducing this Bill, and I leave it to hon. gentlemen on that side of the House whether the hon. gentleman has made a case on that ground. The hon. gentleman says that the Liberals have been greatly weakened. This is what he says; I am unable to give the page of the "Hansard," but I am quoting him correctly:

They succeeded in weakening a large number of the surrounding ridings, detaching municipalities having Liberal majorities from this, that and the other riding, and grouping those detached municipalities into one riding here and one there, they succeeded in weakening the fair strength of the Liberal party in a large number of ridings, and in that way carried constituencies for the Conservative party which otherwise they never could have carried.

Now, I ask the hon. gentleman if he can tell me one constituency that was weakened. That is a broad statement to make, and I challenge him to put his finger upon one constituency. He has studied this case, he has looked into it well, he was the member who moved the second reading of the Bill. I ask the hon. gentleman to put his finger upon a single case where the Liberals were weakened as a result of that Bill. I am sure the hon. gentleman cannot do it. Now, let me give him some of the results.

Let us hear what the "Globe" has to say. That is a great public journal, the teacher of the Liberal party, and one that I will do it the fairness to say is not disposed to be a false teacher. I think a great public journal cannot afford to be a false teacher. But if the people have had their minds wrongly impressed, if the hon. gentleman has indulged in false utterances, and if the "Globe" has repeated them, then I am sure we shall have to come back to the hon. gentleman who is the author of those false statements. The "Globe" repeated practically what the hon. gentleman has stated in this House, because they believed his statements, they felt sure he would not make a statement that was not justified by facts. This is what the "Globe" says:

The 46 constituencies in Ontario affected by the remarkable gerrymander of 1882 gave a Liberal majority of 8,574 at the general elections held in the same year. According to the relative voting strength of the parties, these constituencies should have returned 10 Conservative members, but the vote of the party was so judiciously distributed by the arrangement that they elected 15. The party representation was 50 per cent higher than was warranted by the party vote. A Liberal vote that should have carried 36 constituencies was so judiciously hived that it carried only 31, so the Government secured a net gain of 10 in a division in the House by their nefarious scheme.

Now, I do not think that that great public journal, if it had not been misled by the hon. gentleman, would have made such a statement, I do not believe any great public newspaper can afford to do that. But let me give the hon. gentleman the result. He says there were many members elected to this House that would not otherwise have been elected had it not been for the Redistribution Bill of 1882. Let me give the hon. gentleman the result of the election in 48 constituencies, 43 they then stood, but five were afterwards added. I need hardly state that in 1882 two Conservative constituencies were wiped out as having too small a representation. One, Niagara, had only a population of something over 3,000, and Cornwall had something over 7,000. These were Conservative constituencies, and they were wiped out by the Conservative party. The province was entitled to four new seats by the increased population under the decennial census of 1881. Well, with the four new seats to which this province was entitled, and the two seats which had been wiped out, the Conservative party had to find six new seats somewhere. Where did they find them? They gave Toronto one additional seat and they took the 48 ridings now under consideration, for the purpose of getting four new seats. Now, what was the nature of that nefarious Bill, the one that has been described as a blot upon the history of Canada, the one that shackled hundreds of Liberals, the one that legislated Liberals out of office, the one that was a lasting disgrace upon the good name of the country? Now, let us see what the result was. In the election of 1882, after the redistribution, out of 43 seats, the Conservatives elected 21 and the Liberals 22. Take that same group of counties with the additional five seats, and the Conservatives elected 16 and the Liberals 32. I want to call the attention of the right hon. First Minister to that, because he introduced this Bill, I thought, in rather apologetic terms. The right hon. Prime Minister did not go very far—

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) repeat those figures, as I did not catch them?

Mr. CLANCY. I stated a moment ago, as my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) will see, that in the constituencies under consideration, which return 48 members now, 43 then, because five new seats were added, the Conservatives got 21 and the Liberals 22. That was before 1882 and before this Bill, that hon. gentlemen opposite have called an infamous Bill, was passed. When the Bill was passed the Liberals elected, in the same group, 32 members and the Conservatives only 16. Will any hon. gentleman say that there was anything more than mere declamation against that Bill? Will the hon. gentleman who has just now taken his seat, and I am glad to see him at his place, the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), say so? When the hon. gentleman spoke in such heated tones, when he was almost beside himself, when he was declaiming against the infamy of this Bill, will he say that his statements were justified? I will have to repeat what I said a moment ago for the benefit of the hon. gentleman, because I do not believe he has ever worked it out, and I do not believe that the hon. gentleman would have made such a speech if he had. I believe that he is too high-minded to have made the speech he did if he had known that in 1878, out of 43 constituencies the Liberals elected 22 members and the Conservatives 21 members, and that in the same group in 1882, after the redistribution, the Liberals elected 32 and the Conservatives 16. Will the hon. gentleman say that the hands of the Liberals were tied by that measure? Take the instances in which constituencies were given an additional representative and we will see that the Liberals won the new seats. The changes were entirely in the interest of the Liberals. Lambton had an additional representative, and the Liberals won that. Middlesex had an additional representative, and the Liberals won that. Ontario had an additional representative, and the Liberals won that. There was an additional representative given to East Simcoe, and the Liberals won that. Ontario had another additional representative, three instead of two, and the Liberals won that. But that was not all; it was not all that every additional seat that was made in consequence of the redistribution of 1882 was won by the Liberals, but the fact was that five other seats were so weakened that the Conservatives lost them. We lost one of the Elgins, two of the Greys, one of the Norfolks; we lost Peel, and we lost one of the Wellingtons. The hon. gentleman who spoke here this afternoon (Mr. McMullen), may thank the Redistribution Bill of 1882 for his seat in this House. The hon. gentleman would not have been sitting here had it not been for the Bill of 1882. I am surprised that hon. gentlemen, in the face of these facts, should have made the statement in this House that the Liberals had been hived and unjustly dealt with. Hon. gentlemen say that that may not have been the intention of the Conservatives. It is not a matter to be settled here what was the intention of the Conservatives. The facts are before the people that the Liberals were the sole gainers and hon. gentlemen, now coming to this House with that as a pretense and an excuse for introducing this Bill, have absolutely no case to justify them, even in adopting a more moderate course than they are adopting now. Let me deal with some more of the statements of the hon. Postmaster General who introduced this Bill. The hon. gentleman says that there has been no attention paid to the unit of population since the time of confederation. It is a very convenient thing for hon. gentlemen to repudiate their past principles in order to make a case for themselves now. That has always been the contention of the great Liberal party in this House before and after confederation. I do not know whether it ever reached the right hon. Prime Minister's ears, but the cry in Ontario at one time was against French domination in Quebec, and the great fight of the Liberal-Conservative party was against that cry. That was a cry which was a dangerous weapon. It was one that misled men in Ontario, and, unfortunately, I could mention many instances in that connection. The hon. Postmaster General may deny that they always contended for the unit of population, as nearly as possible, but will the hon. gentleman say that it has never been a real factor since confederation? I will call some very responsible and respectable witnesses. We will see what Mr. Mackenzie had to say in 1882 in this House in 1882 in regard to the Redistribution Bill of that year:

He would not go into the discussion of the measure to-night. Certain amendments would be moved on concurrence, when he would state his views. He would say, however, that the Bill set at defiance the principle of representation by population adopted at the time of the union. It might be said that was adopted with reference to the old provinces only. While that was true, he contended that it was still intended to apply to the different sections. The Bill did not do this.

Mr. CLARKE. Who said that?

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Mackenzie said so. I would like to offer another witness, a gentleman who is not in this House now, but who, I believe, had a hand in the preparation of this Bill. I will quote what the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills) had to say in this House in 1882 in regard to the Bill:

I am in favour of representation by population, but I deny that it is the only point to be considered.

It was one of the points to be considered in the mind of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills) at that time. I think that most effectively disposes of the contention of the hon. gentleman, so far as the principle of any unit of population being at all to be considered, as showing the conduct or attitude of the Liberal party in this House. Hon. gentlemen have contended for it in the past, and if they have abandoned it now as a matter of convenience they must answer this. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that it is not possible to have a complete unit of population, but he knows equally as well that it is essential, so far as it is possible to do so, to have a fair unit of population in all the constituencies in this province, and in all the other provinces. I am not acquainted with the municipal arrangements of the other provinces, but I know that in Ontario the principle is a very sound one. The contention of hon. gentlemen for county boundaries, I think, most people will say is a mere myth, because, to say that there is any relation between the operation of the municipal organization and this House is idle. We have in Bothwell an experience of that. We have as hon. members know, in Bothwell a portion of Kent and Lambton. Did they ever discover any jar or inconvenience? They were oblivious of the fact of its being outside of the municipal boundaries. Nobody ever knew or contended, not even the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), who was the representative of the riding, for a change. He never was disturbed by it, and, as far as that is concerned, what hon. gentlemen are putting forth is a mere pretense, a bald pretense, and there is absolutely nothing in it. Everybody knows that the voters' lists are sent to the candidates and defeated candidates under the law. This is a law that is strictly obeyed. What is more to be done? Municipal organizations have nothing to do with political organizations, and, therefore, I say it is perfectly idle to set forth that contention. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) spoke of what he called eight Liberal hives, and the hon. gentleman's ingenuity is wonderful in discovering them. Here are five of his eight hives: North Brant, West Bruce, South Huron, North Oxford and South Oxford. Is there a gentleman in this House, even though he comes from the maritime provinces, who does not know that these counties are strongly Liberal even from a county boundary point of view. In 1886, following the redistribution of 1882, and we may take that as a fair expression of the electorate of these counties; in North Brant the Liberals had a majority in the local elections of 657, and in these local elections no municipal county boundaries were interfered with. Yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) says that constituency was made a hive by the Act of 1882. In West Bruce the Liberals had a majority of 347 in the local elections of 1886, in South Huron a majority of 507, in North Oxford a majority of 833, and in South Oxford a majority of 591. How did the Postmaster General ever discover that these five constituencies were made hives by the Redistribution Act of 1882. There are three remaining to make up his eight hives, and one of them is West Elgin. West Elgin had, in 1878, a majority of 112, and there were 291 votes added to that as a result of the redistribution. That is not much of a hive. As to South Middlesex, any one who knows anything of the municipal county of South Middlesex knows it would be utterly impossible to carve a riding out of that county which would not be overwhelmingly Liberal. I care not whether the Government make the division or whether the judges make it, they cannot help having a division which will give anything but a large Liberal majority. Let me ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) again, where was there a gerrymander as shown by these results? I say that these counties would be Liberal in spite of the intentions of any political party? There is one other of his eight hives remaining, and that is West Ontario, and if the Postmaster General thinks he can make that single case a basis for his denunciations of the Redistribution Act of 1882, he is quite welcome to it. Surely the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) must see now, in view of these facts that five of his eight Liberal hives are irrevocably Liberal. Whoever knew one of the Oxfords to return a Conservative? Why, there is from 800 to 1,000 Liberal majority in each riding, and the fact is that very often a Conservative does not run there because he sees he has no chance.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. What is the opinion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) with regard to West Ontario?

Mr. CLANCY. I am going to frankly say that there was a majority of Liberals in West Ontario, not as a result of the redistribution, but in spite of the redistribution. The Liberals seemed to be in there anyway. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) may say to me: Well, you took some townships off the county of York for that constituency. It does not lie in the mouth of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) to complain. I tell him that West Ontario was a Liberal hive, and the others were Liberal hives as well, and they elected the whole three members in the election after the Redistribution Act of 1882. If the hon. gentleman was able to say: You made a Liberal hive in West Ontario—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. You know it was that.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend says I know it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. You know that, if you know anything.

Mr. CLANCY. I tell the Postmaster General what I do know. I tell him that whether West Ontario was made a Liberal hive or not, two other Liberals were made perfectly safe, and were elected in the municipal county of Ontario.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It was the righteousness of the people.

Mr. CLANCY. It was because the Liberals were there in the municipal divisions, and the Act of 1882 had nothing to do with it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has shown that there is one hive in three constituencies, and he elects the whole three of them. The hon. gentleman succeeded in proving that he has set up a contention which is a little unworthy of a Minister of the Crown.

Let me deal for a moment now with the speech of the Minister of Customs. I always like to hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) speak in this House, for he always appears in earnest. However, lately I have had some misgivings as to his sincerity. I never could imagine that any member of this House could pump up such imaginary indignation as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) seemed to. I thought it was impossible that any hon. gentleman could look so honest while defending such a dishonest case. I could not think that an hon. gentleman could speak in such pathetic tones unless he were injured. I could not imagine that any member would take so much pains to be so wrong as the hon. gentleman was all through his speech. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) told us there was wonderful indignation, but I think I have shown the House that that indignation was due to wilful misrepresentations of the facts from one end of the country to the other. These hon. gentlemen opposite talked for the sake of victory, rather than for the sake of truth. I hold that no hon. member can afford to make a misstatement in this House or outside of this House, because there is no better evidence of the weakness of a man's case than when he is obliged to resort to colouring which amounts to a misstatement, in order to mislead the electors. I will not charge the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) with that, but if he maliciously and wickedly intended to mislead, he could not have done it more successfully than he did. I acquit him entirely of that, but I will say that I think he was misinformed. Let me read what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) said, because in my very scanty vocabulary, I would not be able to invent such splendid sentences, or words so calculated to arouse indignation in the country. I took the trouble to read the speeches of the hon. gentleman in 1882, and I find that his present speeches are nearly, though not quite, so exaggerated as they were then, and in that respect there is some improvement. Here is what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) told us during this debate:

There was a great deal of indignation expressed and a great deal of denunciation of the Bill of 1882.

That is true, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) contributed his share to it.

I can remember how some of the hon. members who were struck at, distinctly and evidently struck at, voiced their indignation. The then member for South Brant had a voice that could be heard, and it was heard denouncing that Bill as iniquitous; the voice of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills) was also heard in strong denunciation. And there was a reason for that. If hon. members who were not present then will take the "Hansard" of 1882 and read the twenty-two amendments that we moved to the Bill, which recite the iniquities of the measure, I believe that they, like many Conservative members of that day—save and except a few who were lost to all proper feeling of what was due between man and man—will blush when they read and when they understand the nature of that gerrymander.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. I wonder the hon. Minister says "hear, hear." I venture to say that even now, with all his acting, a good deal of it bad, he cannot get up an argument let alone a blush. Let me go further and see what the indignation was? He said:

A majority in the Parliament of Canada, elected not upon that issue, used their power in this Chamber, without debate and in dumb silence,—

I wonder if the hon. gentleman will still adhere to that statement, although it is only a few days old.

—to vote down amendment after amendment, and not daring to lift their heads when they understood the iniquities which they supported by their votes.

I ask the hon. gentleman if he adheres to that statement, that there was not a fair and vigorous defence of the measure, but that the 22 amendments were voted down in dumb silence, and that the Bill was so iniquitous that its supporters hung their head in shame and would not stand up to defend it. If the hon. gentleman looks at "Hansard," he will find that the amendments were moved on the third reading of the Bill, and that the discussion all took place before that. He knows that the debate was practically over, and that the amendments were introduced with a very few sentences, some of them with not 20 lines, and that they were all disposed of on the same day, practically without debate. Now, let us see whether that statement be true, that the Bill went through in dumb silence, and that men held down their heads—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I did not say that.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman said that the 22 amendments were voted down in dumb silence—that men dare not stand up in their places and defend the Bill. Let me read another sentence which I did not read, because I think he went further than that:

The Bill was fought against; 22 amendments were moved, each one reciting an iniquity, and these amendments were voted down in dumb silence—42 yeas and 99 nays; vote after vote, not a word of defence from the Conservative Government supporters who, though they might with downcast heads vote for the gerrymander of 1882, could not for very shame stand up and defend it.

Is that a fair statement to go to the country? I appeal to the hon. gentleman if that represents the facts of the case, because I am now prepared to produce evidence to show that no such state of affairs existed.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Read the amendments.

Mr. CLANCY. I will come to the amendments shortly. I find, on reference to "Hansard," that 20 members on the Conservative side made vigorous speeches in defence of the measure: Sir John Macdonald, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Messrs. Rykert, Plumb, Haggart, Rochester, McCarthy, McCallum, Arkell, Shaw, Kirkpatrick, White, Sproule, Farrow, McLellan, Bergin, Boulton and Orton. Then, turning to the Liberal side, how many spoke? Seventeen on one side, and 20 on the other. I challenge the hon. gentleman to find a single case beyond that. And yet he would have it go to the country that the Bill was so bad that members on the Government side hung their heads in shame, and did not rise in the House and defend their votes by a single word. I have no hesitation in saying that the statement of the hon. gentleman is not worthy of him. Now, the hon. gentleman says there were 22 amendments reciting the iniquities of the Bill. What were they? One was moved by the hon. gentleman himself, and it was to take the village of Port Elgin out of the township of Saugeen and put it into North Bruce.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That was done.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman had influence enough to carry it, and so the iniquity was perpetrated at his own instance. Then, the hon. gentleman tried his hand a second time. He thought he would try Saugeen, but he failed in that. His influence seems to have ended when he got Port Elgin detached from Saugeen and put into North Bruce. That was one of the 22 solemn amendments that recited the iniquities of the legislation. There was another. Mr. Mills moved one, and what was his? It was a vague, colourless motion, relating to no constituency, and having no object or political effect whatever, probably based on some of the theories which that hon. gentleman held then, and no doubt still holds. It was a motion having relation to how the western boundaries of the province of Ontario would be determined by this Bill. Then, he moved another, that five ridings might be made out of Kent, and Bothwell, and Lambton—not preserving county boundaries. Was that reciting one of the iniquities of the Bill? Then, Mr. Blake moved a resolution; what was that? That the returning officers should not be under the control exclusively of the Conservative party. Is there any proposal in this Bill to abandon that? I ask my hon. friend, has he proposed such an amendment now? Mr. Blake moved another resolution; what was that? That the deposit of candidates should be reduced from $200 to $50. That was another burning question set forth in these 22 resolutions. What does the hon. gentleman think of them now? Have they lost their value? What were the other 16? They were simply a multiplication of the same thing. They were padded out so as to express in a dozen resolutions what could be expressed in one. I defy the hon. gentleman to gainsay the fact. I can pick out two or three that are in effect the same, although the townships were mixed in such a way as to make them appear new resolutions. I think I have shown that these resolutions simply propose to restore these townships to the counties from which they were taken. I say that they were unnecessarily multiplied. I shall not trouble the House with reading those resolutions, because I have stated what they were.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The House would be pleased to hear the amendments, I am sure.

Mr. CLANCY. I will read some of the amendments to show that I am absolutely correct. I cannot undertake, for the hon. gentleman's amusement, to read all of them. This is Mr. Mills' resolution:

That the Bill be recommitted to a committee of the whole House with instructions that they have power to amend the same by providing that the settlements lying eastward of the limit settled by the ward as the westerly boundary of Ontario, and not provided for under the Bill, be embraced for electoral purposes within the electoral district of Algoma, inserted instead thereof.

That is one of the resolutions. Does that emphasize any wrong-doing in the Bill? Is it not a colourless resolution? I would read Mr. Blake's resolution if the hon. gentleman cares, but do not propose to take up the time of the House reading resolutions that were meaningless then and are meaningless now.

The hon. gentleman says that the people declared at the polls for a repeal of the Redistribution Act of 1882. I do not think the hon. gentleman can lay any claim to that himself, but I will give his language:

The people have declared at the polls that they want this Bill. They have declared themselves in favour of this Bill by a majority of their representatives in this House, and with that declaration of the people the Bill will go to the Senate.

The hon. gentleman went into his own constituency, talked as loudly and earnestly there as he has here, and his own constituency rejected him. His constituents declared by their vote that they did not want the Act repealed. There is no better example, therefore, than the hon. gentleman himself that the people do not desire this measure. With the exception of the Minister of Justice (Senator Mills), the hon. gentleman was loudest in his declamation against the Bill, and his county rejected him. The Minister of Justice went into his own riding, and made similar declamations and met a similar fate. I would like to know then what claim the hon. gentleman has for saying that the people have declared in this measure. His own experience is that they declared against it. No doubt that is the reason why he was defeated, because he is a very estimable gentleman and much respected. The people, however, did not take much stock in his appeal for the repeal of the Redistribution Act of 1882.

The hon. gentleman says: We made a lot of pledges and must fulfil them. What does he say about the pledges:

They know that the people of this country pronounced for the repeal of the Franchise Act, and the Franchise Act was repealed. And, Sir, we are here to-day carrying out one of our pledges in the platform adopted by the great national Liberal Convention that met in this city in 1893. Almost all of the pledges then made have been carried out. This pledge remains to be fulfilled.

I tell the hon. gentleman that the people will absolve him from that pledge. He may carry it out by a majority of his friends in this House, but it will be the only pledge he ever carried out. Did he carry out his pledge with regard to the Franchise Bill, when he handed over to the provinces the framing of our franchise to suit the exigencies of parties in those provinces? If the hon. gentleman had ever declared such a policy as that with regard to the franchise, he would have been hooted and stood the risk of being pelted. It is a disgrace to the Liberal party that they were driven by their majority to repeal the Franchise Act, but did not have the courage—I will not say they lack the ability, because I do not wish to be offensive—to replace it with anything of their own, but were obliged to resort to the shifty means of leaving our franchise to the mercies of the province. It is a national disgrace that we are to-day without a Dominion franchise. We are now in a position that is humiliating. We have given ourselves up to not only what exists now, but what may happen in the future, over which we have no control. The hon. gentleman says that we may recall the measure. Is not that an unworthy proposition? These gentlemen should have introduced such legislation as they would stand by or repeal, and not leave the provinces to frame our franchise.

Has the plebiscite been a fair redemption? The hon. gentleman says the people expect the Liberal party to redeem their pledges. They know that their pledges are worth nothing. They talk about being bound to redeem their pledges—why? The people care as much about their pledges as the hon. gentlemen themselves. The people know very well that these gentlemen are making no honest attempt to redeem their pledges, but are simply trying to make some pretense of doing so. Did the hon. gentleman redeem his pledges on the 'tariff? On the expenditure? On the public debt? Nobody would hold the hon. gentleman to his pledges. In fact, the people are grateful, not for what the Government have done, but for what they have not done. The Ministers stand self-convicted of having made false statements in the country, statements which they should have known to be false; and if they did, they were guilty of canting hypocrisy and not fit to occupy the positions they hold to-day.

The hon. gentleman dealt with the question of equalization. I thought he would have dealt with that in a somewhat fair manner. I am bound to say that he will conclude himself, when he sees the other side of the question, that he was seeking some defence without having any thought of what it would lead to. He declared: You will find greater inequality in the constituencies under the redistribution of 1882 than you will find in the present Bill. That is making comparison with the constituencies framed by the Liberal party in the province of Ontario. Now my hon. friend repudiates his Liberal friends. But he cannot escape the responsibility; he has upheld them over and over again, and his friends have defended them from end to end of this province.

An hon. MEMBER. The right arm of the Dominion Government.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, as my hon. friend suggests, they are spoken of to be the right arm of the Dominion Government. Whether they have done right or wrong, I am not now considering; but what I say is that the only way to make a fair comparison is to take the constituencies confined in the county boundaries by the Liberal party in the province, and to take them as they would be, as confined to county boundaries under this Bill.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). As divided by the judges?

Mr. CLANCY. That has nothing to do with it. No matter by whom they are divided these inequalities will arise. Now, the hon. gentleman points out 22 ridings to show inequalities in the population: Brockville, South Leeds, Cardwell, North Wellington, East Wellington, West Durham, East Durham, Frontenac, South Grenville, Dundas, North Leeds and Grenville, Carleton, Lincoln, Addington, West Middlesex, East Middlesex, East Northumberland, West Northumberland, Peel, West York, East Peterborough and West Peterborough. Now, if the hon. gentleman wanted to be fair would he have selected these eastern counties that he knows are small, ranging from 13,000 in Frontenac up to 30,000? Twelve of these constituencies are precisely the same for the Dominion as for the local House, and never were changed, the reason being perfectly obvious—that they were too small and could not be rearranged. But the hon. gentleman selects these for the purpose of showing that there was inequality in the redistribution, not that he proposes to remedy it in these cases. But he has gone over the whole province to make the selection that will best fit his argument. The hon. gentleman knows that the judges or anybody else could not equalize the population in these eastern counties without departing from county boundaries. I appeal to the hon. gentleman if he thinks that a fair mode of comparison. Take these 22 counties and make a comparison with those under the redistribution of seats for the local House. The Postmaster General stated that while the unit of population was a little over 20,900, there should be some little elasticity and the unit might be counted as from 19,000 to 22,000. Make the comparison on that basis. Of the 22 ridings that the hon. Minister of Customs has selected as the worst examples—going outside of the 48 constituencies now under consideration, and many of these 22 being, as I say, incapable of being equalized—we find that there are five of them within the unit of population for the Dominion and only four for the local; there are 12 below the unit of population for the Dominion and 13 for the local; above the unit of population there are five for each. But take the 48 ridings affected by the Bill, coming down to a practical dealing with this measure. Compare these 48 ridings for the Dominion as they stand under the Redistribution Bill of 1882 with the constituencies covering the same ground in the province of Ontario for provincial purposes. Those coming within the unit of population number 19 for the Dominion and only 10 for the province: below the unit there are only 10 for the Dominion and 12 for the province; while above the unit there are 19 for the Dominion and 23 for the Ontario legislature. Now, I am not going to ascribe what the hon. gentleman ascribed even to his friends—a willingness to be unfair—but I will point out that, being hampered by county boundaries, it is not as easy to equalize the population as it would be if the county boundaries have not to be considered.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) say that the judges would make these unfair divisions?

Mr. CLANCY. I say it is impossible for the judges to approach as near the unit of population when they are confined to county boundaries as they could if county boundaries were not to be considered. I challenge the hon. gentleman to show the contrary. It is not the question what the judges will do, but what it is possible for any one to do under the circumstances. So I say that hon. gentlemen opposite may well repudiate every doctrine they have ever preached in the past as to unit of population, because the course they are taking deprives them for ever of the means of defending it. Now, I come to the constituency in which the hon. gentleman himself resides and which he long represented. I have said from the outset that hon. gentlemen opposite are not in a position to declaim against any measure on the unit of population. I think I can show that the hon. gentleman has not been quite unselfish in this matter. he has not been so courageous as the hon. gentleman for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) would have Liberal members to be. He has taken a course that is not a very creditable one to him and to the hon. gentleman who is credited with having framed this Bill—I mean the Minister of Justice. Now, we have adopted the same franchise as that for the Ontario legislature, so we shall have the same number of votes in a constituency for the Dominion as for the local, if the boundaries are the same. And the population must be the same of course. The hon. gentleman's own county of South Brant has a population of 32,217, and not over 36,000, as the hon. gentleman said.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Either the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) is wrong or I am. Read the figures for the several townships.

Mr. CLANCY. I will send over the figures to the hon. gentleman. When the Indians were disfranchised in Ontario, a certain township in his own county was left out entirely. The hon. gentleman knows that it was.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he does not know that the township of Tuscarora is not included for the local? I tell him that that township is not included either in North or South Brant.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But the population is there.

Mr. CLANCY. But I speak of the voters.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman has just been speaking of population.

Mr. CLANCY. Why, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) might as well go into his barnyard to count his cows as to count the Indians, who have no votes, in order to swell the figures of population. I am astounded that the hon. gentleman should resort—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What about the children—would you leave them out?

Mr. CLANCY. Children of whom?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Of the white people—they have no votes.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly that that is not fair; he has no right to count the Indians. If the hon. gentleman had allowed the Indians to retain their votes he might count them. But he helped to disfranchise that part of his constituents, and now he wants to count them for purposes of population. If his constituency had 50,000 people, he would not be so anxious to count them. What does this contrivance—I was going to say this job—arranged between the hon. gentleman and the Minister of Justice effect? I will send him these figures to show that Tuscarora is not included in the riding for the local legislature, because the Indians have not votes any more than the cattle or the horses have.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, this is a question as to the population of municipal counties, as ascertained by the census of 1891. The hon. gentleman says that under the municipal census of the county of Brant in 1891, the population is returned as 32,000. I say, no. It is returned in this official document—I speak subject to correction, but every one may see it—at over 36,000.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that I did not count Indians.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But the census does, and you are appealing to the census.

Mr. CLANCY. Let us go a little further. Let him show that the township of Tuscarora is included in those figures. Let the hon. gentleman foot up the figures and see whether there are more than 32,217. The hon. gentleman knows that while the population is put in there, if he foots up the figures, he will find that there is a township excluded, that its population is not there. When we count on representation by population, who are we counting? Are we counting people living upon the other side of the line? Are we counting persons who have no votes, who are disfranchised? If we mean anything by county population, we mean the voting strength of the county.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There are numbers of white people in those townships that do not vote.

Mr. CLANCY. Then, so much the worse for the hon. gentleman, who has disfranchised a portion of them by this Bill.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It was your law that did it. Your franchise law disfranchised more than the present Bill.

Mr. CLANCY. It enfranchised the Indians, and the hon. gentleman has undone that. After disfranchising them, what does he do? He wanted to pad out a little his own county, and he can only do it by counting a class of people that had no votes. He says now that the county of Brant ought to have two representatives. Let us see how he dealt with Kent—because I think he and the Minister of Justice sat down to frame this Bill. Brant has a voting population of 32,217, excluding the Indians. They are not included, because they have not votes ; they are just so many sticks, as far as this is concerned. Kent has a population of 58,019 votes. The hon. gentleman proposed to give Kent three representatives, with 19,000 each; afterwards he proposed to give Brant two representatives, with 16,000 each. But he took that back, and what has he done ? He still retains Brant, with 16,000 votes for each member, and he gives Kent two members, with 29,000 each. I tell the hon. gentleman that Kent is infinitely better entitled to 19,000 than the hon. gentleman is to 16,000. But they receded from that position and what was the hon. gentleman's excuse ? That the newspapers had discussed it, and thought that Toronto ought to have an additional seat ; that while he did not see any need for it himself, as the people were living in a small area and could be easily brought together, still, as it had been declared by some of the Conservative newspapers that Toronto ought to have an additional member, the hon. gentleman was gracious enough to yield. I ask how much sincerity there was in that. The hon. gentleman perhaps thought that, with the aid of the team that has been going from one constituency to another, under the lead of Capt. Sullivan, he could capture some of the seats in Toronto. Thinking possibly that he could not carry Bothwell, that was snuffed out. I am not complaining of that. I should not attempt to discuss this question on so narrow a ground as to urge my own case as a reason against this Bill. I put it on different ground, and I say that the hon. gentleman was not fair. What was the attitude of the Minister of Justice at the time that this Bill was before the House ? Let me read one of the speeches made when this motion of indignation was before the House:

If the hon. gentleman were to take the township of Harwich and village of Blenheim from Kent as it now stands, there would still remain 20,572 of a population within the limits of that county. The eastern division of Kent might be formed with a population of nearly 20,000, and within the limits of Kent and Bothwell an electoral division might be formed containing a population of 22,000, which would be a very much more equal division than that which the hon. gentleman has made, and which would not interfere with the existing divisions.

Where was the trouble about municipal organizations there ? This is one of the resolutions of indignation the hon. gentleman referred to ; this is the resolution the Minister of Justice moved on that occasion. I want to show the consistency of the hon. gentleman then and now ; I want to show that the Minister of Justice was bound to retain Bothwell, that he was not inclined to return to county boundaries on that occasion, and he proposed a different course to save himself, while he proposes another course now. I say that is not creditable to the hon. gentleman. Now, what does he say in this resolution :

Mr. CLANCY.

The municipal counties of Kent and Lambton comprise the electoral districts of Kent, Lambton and Bothwell, with a population of 106,344, making, for five members, an average of 21,268 per member.

That is the resolution of the hon. gentleman in 1882, and it goes further :

That the electoral district of Lambton comprises 42,616, and may be properly divided into two ridings.

That the electoral district of Kent comprises 36,626, and may, by the restoration from Bothwell of some of the municipalities of Kent, be divided into two ridings of about 21,000 each, leaving Bothwell with about 21,000.

He goes further :

That the proposed Bill needlessly disarranges the existing organization for Kent and Bothwell, takes from Kent and adds to Bothwell, Chatham and Wallaceburg, takes from Bothwell and adds to West Elgin Orford, Howard and Ridgetown, and takes from Bothwell to add to West Middlesex Euphemia.

That the said Bill be recommitted to a committee of the whole House with instructions that they have power to amend the provisions for the representation of Kent, Lambton and Bothwell in Parliament inserted instead thereof.

What is the position of the hon. gentleman after a statement like that has been made ? I say it shows—I was going to say, manifest dishonesty, but I will use a milder term, and say that the hon. gentleman was either insincere then or he is insincere now.

I have only one more phase of the question to deal with, and that is with regard to the hon. gentleman's conduct in relation to my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). The hon. gentleman complains that there was great iniquity in North Bruce. I am going to read this as a last instalment of the hon. gentleman's indignation on this occasion. It is a little bit long, but it is worth repeating and putting on "Hansard." The more we repeat the hon. gentleman's indignation, the better it is for us in this country. So I propose, with the permission of the House, to read what the hon. gentleman had to say about mangling and strangling at that time. It was something dreadful to contemplate. Let us see what the hon. gentleman's language was. I thought I had here what the hon. gentleman said in regard to the township of Oakland, but the hon. gentleman stated in the most explicit terms, and he repeated it more than once, that the township of Oakland had been taken out of the county of Brant and put in a county twelve miles away, or in other words, that it was detached from the county of Brant and attached to the county of Oxford, twelve miles away. This is almost the precise statement of the hon. gentleman, and if he denies it, I will refer to "Hansard." The hon. gentleman made that statement and it has gone to the country on the wings of his own words for the purpose of making it appear that the Conservatives were guilty of taking a township twelve miles apart from the county to which it belonged and attaching it to another county for the purpose of carrying out what he calls the infamous Gerrymander Bill. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if that is a fair interpretation of his words?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) want me to say?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, I think the hon. gentleman will say that it is.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman is perfectly at liberty to read what I said. I said that they took this little three-cornered township of Oakland, which squared out the county of Brant, away from that county, that it is twelve miles across the township of Burford, which lies between the township of Oakland and the county in which this township was put; I said that the township of Burford and this three-cornered township of Oakland were detached from South Brant; that one of the amendments I moved was, as far as I can remember now, that the township of Oakland, that was almost within sound of the bells of Brantford, should be taken back from South Oxford in which it had been put and attached to the riding of South Brant, and yet it was voted down in dumb silence.

Mr. CLANCY. Now, the hon. gentleman has modified his statement, but I am going to read to him what he said. He says if Burford had not been taken and if Oakland had not been attached to that, it would have been twelve miles. That is not the statement the hon. gentleman made. I am going to read it, and perhaps he has not corrected it even in the revised "Hansard." He may have wanted to say one thing to go to the country in the newspapers and another thing to this House, and he may have eliminated it from the "Hansard." I do not say he did, but it is greatly to his discredit if he has not eliminated it. I will read to him:

There was the little township of Oakland, a three-cornered township that squared out the county of Brant,—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That should be the township of Brant.

Mr. CLANCY—

—and that was 12 miles from the nearest point of the county into which they put it.

Twelve miles from the nearest point of the county in which they put it. The hon. gentleman was not satisfied with stating that, but he was so wilful that he repeated it. Let me show what he said further on that subject:

The township of Burford they took out of South Brant and joined it to South Oxford. This little township of Oaklands was 12 miles from the riding into which it was put.

Twelve miles from the riding into which it was put. I will read the balance, because he may say that I am not doing him justice. He might have corrected it even by inference afterwards, but I will show that he did not do that.

It was almost within sound of the bells of Brantford city, the main town of the riding, and the main town of the riding into which it was put was 50 miles away. On the third reading of that Bill I rose and recited these facts, and said that I wanted to ask a question of the gentleman who had charge of this Bill. I wanted him to look me in the eyes, but he sat with bowed head, and dared not raise his eyes.

Dared not raise his eyes, Mr. Speaker. I say such an exclamation is unworthy of that hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is true.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman deliberately conveyed that apparent fact to the country that that township was taken twelve miles away for the purpose of gaining a party advantage, and that it was put in another county twelve miles away.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. From the county.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the township of Burford belongs more properly to Oxford than to Brant. I dare him to dispute that. If he does I will bring the "Hansard" of 1882, and quote to him a statement in which he declared that it does. Yet while that is the case, while it belongs more properly to Oxford, the hon. gentleman declares that it is twelve miles away.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Is it not that far from Oxford?

Mr. CLANCY. It is not that far from the electoral district of Oxford; it is just as much in Oxford as any other county. It is no more away from Oxford than one electoral district of Ottawa is away from the other. In regard to West Bruce, the pretense of this Bill is that it is desirable to return to county boundaries. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman why he submits the case of West Bruce? I say that it is to strike a blow at the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill), as the worthy representative of one of the ridings there. The hon. gentleman talks about taking a township away twelve miles, which is at variance with the facts, but what does he do? He is the only hon. gentleman that ever proposed so infamous a proceeding as to take the village of Port Elgin and put it into another riding. I say that nobody, either in or outside of this House was guilty of making the proposal that the hon. gentleman has made, namely, that Port Elgin, which is entirely surrounded by the township of Sauguen, should be carried into another riding. He is attempting to strike an unfair blow at the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). I care not whether it be the judges or the Liberal party that do it, but I must say that I would not trust the Liberal party if they were going about it. Let us take the four townships of West Bruce. Any change that the hon. gentleman could make would not make the arrangement fairer than it is to-day, but he might do what the legislature did, zig-zag across the county.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We do not do it at all; the judges do it.

Mr. CLANCY. Why should the hon. gentleman propose to go to Bruce? Will the hon. gentleman say that, as far as the constituencies are cut out now under the Redistribution Bill of 1882, that they are not as fair as they could be made under the judges or any one else? Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) say that the ridings are any more irregularly shaped than they are under the Ontario Act of 1885?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If they are, how does he make out that my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) is struck at? If they are as fair as they could be, and the judges are sent to make a division, does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) deliberately say that judges of the Supreme Court will do an unfair thing, and if they do not, how is my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) struck at?

Mr. CLANCY. I will tell my hon. friend. What I am now arguing is that there was no excuse whatever for interfering with Bruce. And if the Government had any hope in the matter, it was that the judges might make a mistake and change the constituency from what it is now. I am not reflecting on the judges, but I want to know why the Government have interfered with Bruce, since the county boundaries are not touched there. The Minister of Customs is the chief offender himself, and he has given no excuse. He is guilty of the grossest infamy, if infamy it be, that stands to the credit of any public man in Canada, for it was he who succeeded in taking the little village of Port Elgin from the township of Saugeen and hitching it on to North Bruce. He is the only one who ever proposed such an absurdity, and yet he speaks about the absurdity of the Bill of 1882.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The whole Conservative party were guilty of that infamy, if it be an infamy.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) wants to shelter himself behind what the Conservative party assented to, but he was the inventor of the evil, and he was the one who succeeded in getting it done. Are we to understand that the Minister (Mr. Paterson) played a role of insincerity then.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. CLANCY. I ask him, is that what we are to understand.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Do you want an answer?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman can make his answer later on.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Oh, yes.

Mr. CLANCY. I will take the acts of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) and not his words. We know what he did in that case, and no explanation can make it any different. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have endeavoured to discuss this Bill without any heat, and without, I hope, being offensive in any way. I think I have been able to show that the Bill of 1882 was not a menace to the Liberal party, that it fairly equalized constituencies and that it gave the Liberal party a decided advantage in the councils of the country.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman says no; but I venture to say if a man stood at a street corner in Ottawa and declared that two and three made six, he would get some people to believe him, and he would just be about as right as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) is in that statement. I challenge him to point out one single case where the Liberals did not win every new seat that was made. I challenge him to deny the fact that the Liberals elected five more members, in addition to the five they gained by the Redistribution Bill of 1882, as a natural consequence of weakening Conservative ridings.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then what is your objection to our changing that state of affairs?

Mr. CLANCY. My objection is that this is not the proper time to pass such a Bill as this, and that even if the Liberal party had a substantial grievance, they had no right to remedy it at this time. Even if they had a real grievance, and not a grievance that exists only in loud words and misrepresentations, they have no right to redistribute constituencies at this juncture. If they could show that the Redistribution Act of 1882 did not give a fair representation to the Liberals, they might have some show of reason, but no justification for introducing such a Bill at this date. I challenge the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) now and here, to point to one single Liberal who lost his seat as a consequence of the Redistribution Bill of 1882. Will the hon. gentleman answer me that question?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I speak subject to correction, but I think one of the effects of that Bill, that was deplored by right-thinking men in all parts of the Dominion, was that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), who sits in front of me, was legislated out of his seat, and was out of the House for a year. I also think, but subject to correction, that my friend John Gilks lost his seat in consequence of that Bill. Am I right in that?

Mr. CLANCY. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman has pointed to many of these gerrymandered ridings and said they were carried by the Liberals. It is true; and let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) take this comfort out of that fact: That the reason the Liberals were elected under the conditions in which they were placed by this Act of 1882, was that in these counties a certain number of high-minded Conservatives said that the Bill was so infamous they would not stand it, and so they cast their vote for the Liberal members. I myself had to be elected by Conservative votes. I had a strong Reform riding, and the Reformers were put in the minority, but decent Conservatives were indignant at the Bill and they voted for me. Nevertheless, the hands of the Liberals were tied; Burford was thrown into Oxford. The election of these Liberals proves that there is a sense of justice in the minds of the people of this country, and that no matter what their past political feelings may be, they will punish iniquity when it is perpetrated in this House.

Mr. CLANCY. Now you are making another speech. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) says that the Conservatives elected him because they were in a fit of indignation against the Bill, but let me ask him what became of this fit of indignation when he last appealed to his constituents? He told us that he appealed to his constituents last time, on this very question, and, therefore, he was defeated on this question. It is easy for him to talk about moral consequences, but let us appeal to the hard facts, and the hard facts are against the Minister of Customs. He tells us that the Conservatives voted for the Liberals to rebuke the Conservative Government because the Redistribution Bill of 1882 was so bad; but, at all events, we have the fact that the Conservatives rebuked the hon. gentleman in the end, for denouncing the Bill of 1882.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes. The hon. gentleman was rejected in his own constituency.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Just let me say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CLANCY. I will give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to reply, if he promises not to make a speech.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman asked for some instances of what had been accomplished by the Gerrymander Act, and I pointed to the defeat of my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Mr. CLANCY. What constituency was the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) legislated out of as a result of the Bill of 1882?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Centre Huron, if you want to know. Centre Huron was destroyed and wiped out of constituencies for having elected me.

Mr. COCHRANE. Served them right.

Mr. CLANCY. And what does the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) now deliberately assent to at the Council Board? He deliberately proposes to wipe out Bothwell because it has elected me.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Serves you right.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) decides that he will inflict the same penalty on me that he imagines was inflicted on him. Well, he can wipe out Bothwell, and if it were in the interests of the country I would not object. But what happened in Huron? The Conservatives in 1878 elected one in Huron, and they elected precisely the same in 1882. Where is the hon. gentleman's complaint. Did the county of Huron elect any different members as the result of the Bill of 1882? No, it elected the same. I again ask the hon. gentleman to find a case where it affected any Liberal member. He may get up and talk in generalities, but that is all he can do. There is nothing so difficult to prevail against as one who is arguing an absurdity. You can reach the man who has something of a case, but the man who has no case is absolutely helpless. That is the position of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now, what is my objection to the Bill? Hon. gentlemen have no right to enter on legislation of this kind, without reference to whether there is or is not a grievance. The only excuse hon. gentlemen offer is the state of things following on the redistribution of 1882. We are proposing by this legislation to do what? To set an example that was never set by Canada before, namely, that we are to have a tussle to overhaul the constituencies whenever we get a chance. I am not going to discuss what the effect of the measure is. The objection to it is that whenever a party come into power, they may, without reference to the decennial census, have a redistribution of seats. What would be the effect if hon. gentlemen were defeated at the polls, of which there does not seem to be much doubt? Would not the Conservative party have as much foundation as the Liberal party have now for saying: You legislated us out of office, and we are going to put the constituencies back again where they were?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. By the judges.

Mr. CLANCY. It does not matter who does it. The tribunal before which the matter goes does not affect the principle. It is the very fact of hon. gentlemen opposite undertaking it at all which would justify the Conservative party in taking the same course if they thought proper. It means that the Parliament of Canada has adopted a precedent for rearranging the whole system of constituencies at any time.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. By the judges.

Mr. CLANCY. I hope the House will not commit itself to such a course. I hope that hon. members from other provinces of this Dominion will not commit Canada to such an example. What follows? It may be pleaded that this was sanctioned by a majority of this House; but I put the question on that highest ground—not how it affects me or any one else in this House; but on the ground that it brings about a state of political demoralization in this country that never existed before. I think I may appeal to Liberal members to hesitate before they commit this House to a proposition so vicious in principle. I am not going to argue the constitutional question. I am going to leave that to the legal members of this House. The hon. leader of the Opposition made a strong argument in regard to the right of the Parliament of Canada to enter on legislation of this kind, which no hon. gentleman on that side of the House has attempted to answer. Hon. gentlemen on that side who are able to discuss the constitutional question have up to this minute failed to make even a reference to that argument. They have passed it by, because they have no case.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. They are waiting to deal with that when the legal gentlemen on the other side take the responsibility of stating that the Bill is unconstitutional.

Mr. CLANCY. I may be pardoned if I put this proposition to the lawyers of the House. They may or may not argue that it is within the power of the Parliament of Canada to make a redistribution of seats now if it thinks proper. I shall not discuss that; but I am going to discuss the wisdom of doing so as a matter of public policy. I will put it to the lawyer who sits behind the hon. gentleman, one of the able men in his profession. That hon. gentleman will not say that it is beyond the power of this Parliament to expropriate private property and devote it to public uses without giving a farthing of compensation to the owner. It is not necessary to discuss what the powers of this Parliament are. I discuss the wisdom and the fairness of the proposition, and I appeal to the lawyers as well as to the laymen. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have occupied more time than I intended at the outset. I have attempted to show that hon. gentlemen opposite have no case, no grievance, and I hope that this Parliament will reject the Bill.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Clancy) has sent forth two challenges. First, he has dared the Liberals to point out a case in which the gerrymander or rearrangement of 1882 has injuriously affected or defeated a Liberal member. Then he has closed with another, stated in terms similar to those used by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). He has stated that the leader of the Opposition has dealt with the question of the unconstitutionality of the measure before the House, and has demonstrated it so completely that no hon. member on the Liberal side of the House has even attempted an answer. Well, I will venture an answer. I do it, of course, with some hesitation, because I recognize that the age and position and intelligence of the hon. leader of the Opposition entitle any statement that comes from his lips to be received with due consideration. Now, Sir, I start with this proposition, if it be true, that we have no power in this House to legislate along the line proposed in this Bill, this discussion may just as well close, and close immediately. So that it becomes us, in the first place, to ascertain precisely where we stand upon the constitutional question. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition states his argument on page 5395 of the unrevised "Hansard":

It has always been recognized that the only time such a measure should be dealt with by the Parliament of Canada was after the decennial census. Section 51 of the British North America Act says:

"On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority and in such a manner and at such a time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides."

There is an absolute direction that this measure shall take place after the decennial census, and then to show in the most emphatic manner that then and then only could such a measure be dealt with, it is said in section 92, in reference to the exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures:

"In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the class of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say: 'The amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this Act, of the constitution of the province, except as regards the office of lieutenant-governor.'"

The British North America Act is not contented with stating that the only time provided for a redistribution Act is after the decennial census; not satisfied with that, you have on the face of the same Act, a broad distinction drawn between the Dominion of Canada and the various provinces by saying that the provinces can pass a Bill of this kind at any time. It would be difficult to find anything more conclusive as to that.

That is the argument of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and these are the reasons upon which that argument is based. Let us try and understand exactly where we are on this question. I turn to section 51 of the British North America Act. It reads in this way :

51. On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such a manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules :—

(1) Quebec shall have the fixed number of 65 members.

(2) There shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number 65 bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained).

3. In the computation of the number of members for a province a fractional part, not exceeding one-half, of the old number requisite for entitling the province to a member shall be disregarded; but a fractional part exceeding one-half of that number shall be equivalent to the old number.

4. On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the provinces is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards.

(5) Such readjustment shall not take effect until the determination of the then existing Parliament.

52. The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the Parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this Act is not thereby disturbed.

What is the meaning of all this? Different interpretations may be given by lay members of the House, but it seems to me, from my limited knowledge of the interpretation of statutes, that the Act means exactly what it says, and nothing more. It proposes to deal with the relative voting powers of the several provinces. It lays down that Quebec, when it came into confederation, had 65 of a voting power, Ontario, 82; Nova Scotia, 19 and New Brunswick 15. It lays down the rules that are to govern after each census is taken. The population of the provinces will increase. After each census there shall be a readjustment of the voting power of the several provinces. The Act does not attempt to deal with any other question except simply that of determining how many members shall come from Quebec, how many from Ontario, how many from New Brunswick, and how many from Nova Scotia; in other words, what the relative voting powers of these provinces shall be in the federal legislature. That is what the section means, and that is all it means. I think now I will be able to show the leader of the Opposition that the opinion he has expressed upon this section of the Act and upon the measure before the House is different from that which he held at the time of confederation. I look back at the discussions that took place prior to confederation, and I find there a resolution to which the hon. leader of the Opposition gave his assent, and it is this :

That the local legislature of each province may, from time to time, alter the electoral districts of the provinces for the purposes of representation in the House of Commons and distribute the number of representatives to which the province is entitled, in any manner such legislature may think fit.

What is the meaning of that resolution? I find it was afterwards concurred in at a meeting of the delegates, but nevertheless, it was subsequently dropped out of the Confederation Act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why?

Mr. BELL (East Prince). I will endeavour to show the reason why. It is simply because, in the opinion of the delegates, on maturer consideration, it was not deemed advisable that the rearrangement of the constituencies should be left with the local legislatures, and they were right.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). But what I specially refer to this resolution for is this: I want to point out that this identical question of the rearrangement of the constituencies within the particular provinces was submitted specifically to the consideration of the delegates, separate and apart from the question as to the relative voting power of the several provinces in confederation. I wish to emphasize that at confederation Sir Charles Tupper recognized and acted upon these distinctions—that the question now before the House was specifically called to the attention of the leader of the Opposition, and he proposed to deal with it, in the first place, by relegating that power to the local legislature. Afterwards he changed his mind,—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BELL (East Prince)—as he had a right to do, and gave it where it belonged, to the Federal Parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). The argument, then, stands in this way, that if you look at the wording of sections 51 and 52 of the British North America Act, and then look at the resolution I have referred to, both lead to the inevitable conclusion that the Dominion Parliament, by section 51, only intended to deal with the question of the relative voting power of the several provinces in this legislature, and never intended to deal with the other distinct question as to the redistribution of the seats in a particular province. The question still arises: What power has this Parliament to deal with the measure now before the House—the power to legislate upon it is conferred by several sections. Section 18 of the British North America Act, as amended by 38-39 Vic., 38, reads as follows:—

The privileges, immunities and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the members thereof respectively, shall be such as are, from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that any Act of the Parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities and powers shall not confer any privileges, immunities or powers exceeding those at the passage of such Act held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the members thereof.

That is to say, the powers of Parliament to deal with this question are absolute, unless it is specially prevented from legislating upon it by the provisions of the British North America Act; and we saw a moment ago that the provisions of that Act do not apply to or prevent this legislation. Now, let me read the latter part of my hon. friend's argument again:

It is said in section 92, in reference to the exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures:

"In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the class of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say: 'The amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this Act, of the constitution of the province, except as regards the office of lieutenant-governor.'"

His argument is this: that because the British North America Act has specifically stated that the local legislatures have the power to deal with this question at any time and under all circumstances, and is silent upon the point with regard to the Federal legislature, it is to be inferred that the power was never conferred or intended to be conferred upon the Federal legislature. To my mind, the argument only proves the intense eagerness with which the hon. gentleman has been reaching out and groping around to find within the four corners of the constitution some shadow of argument upon which to base his case. What is the necessity of specifically stating that this Parliament has power to deal with this question when the power is given among the general powers conferred by the Act. Another argument is advanced by our Liberal friends—

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell, East Prince) whether he understands the word "powers" in section 18 of the British North America Act refers to and includes legislative powers?

Mr. BELL (East Prince). I think it might include legislative powers.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is the hon. gentleman aware of any authority for that contention?

Mr. BELL (Prince East, P.E.I.)

Mr. BELL (East Prince). No, but the wording at first sight seems large enough to include legislative powers. If my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) puts any other construction, it seems to me the onus is thrown upon him to prove his contention.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would only suggest to my hon. friend that if that argument is correct, it would be a simple way to confer wide powers on the Parliament of Canada and would have rendered other sections of the Act entirely unnecessary.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). I admit to my hon. friend, candidly, that, so far as legislation is concerned, the powers must be conveyed by this or other sections of the Confederation Act. However, I was going to say that my friends of the Liberal party present an argument something in this form: They urge that the Conservative party legislated along the lines on which we are now legislating, that they passed similar statutes to this and under similar conditions, and therefore this Act must necessarily be constitutional. Now, for myself, I do not quite see the validity of that argument; I do not think that the conclusion is fairly reached from the premises. It is obvious that the Conservative party may have thought that they had the power to legislate, and yet they may have been wrong in that conclusion. Neither the exercise of the power by them nor any concurrence on the part of the House would give jurisdiction. It is a question which does not depend upon the fact that legislation has taken place or even upon the fact that both sides of this House have concurred in that legislation. All that the argument amounts to is this: That if the Conservative party have legislated under similar conditions, along the same line, then, when we propose to legislate along that line, the mouths of our opponents are closed. Now, what has been done by the Conservative party along this line? I am not speaking of the Acts passed after the decennial census; I leave these out of consideration; they are considered to be manifestly within the power of this Parliament. But I speak now of cases that have occurred in the intervening time. Take, for instance, the Act of 1895. By that Act the boundaries of Berthier and Joliette were essentially changed. The township of Courcelles and the north-east part of the township of Joliette were detached from the county of Berthier and annexed to Joliette. Now, here are two important changes, first, detaching two townships from one constituency, and next, adding two townships to another constituency. The question naturally arises, had the Conservative party power by the Act of 1895 to make these changes? Our Conservative friends say: Of course we had. Then it is a fair argument to say: If you had the power in 1895 to detach or attach two townships, we have the same power in 1830 to detach or attach fifty townships.

But the argument goes further. By the Act of 1892, Provencher, in Manitoba, was composed of certain towns and rural municipalities; by the Act of 1893 the rural municipality of Hanover was added. By the Act of 1892 the electoral district of Rouville comprised certain villages and parishes; by the Act of 1893 the parish of Notre Dame de Bonsecours was added. By the Act of 1892 the electoral district of Bagot was constituted; by the Act of 1893 the parish of St. Liboire was added. By the Act of 1892 Richelleu was constituted; by the Act of 1893 the town of Sorel was added. The Act of 1892 did not constitute the electoral district of St. Hyacinthe; the Act of 1893 constituted that district, and we find that it was made up of the city of St. Hyacinthe and certain parishes. The Act of 1892 constituted Nipissing; the Act of 1893 changed its composition and introduced a number of new materials. The Act of 1892 constituted Hochelaga; the Act of 1893 gave it a different make-up.

Now, had the legislature power in 1893 to make all these changes? It has been argued by my hon. friends opposite that these changes were made for the purpose of correcting clerical errors. If so, there was not much responsibility to be placed upon the clerks that these gentlemen had at that time. The only intelligent ground upon which it can be excused is that it was intended to correct certain errors, certain defects of geographical knowledge in the minds of the gentlemen who framed the Bill, and that it was done for the purpose of correcting mistakes. If that be a valid ground—I do not say that it is; I say that it is not—but if it be a valid ground, then we have the right in this House to go back and to correct what Dalton McCarthy called the "gross mistake" created by the Conservative party in the gerrymander of 1892.

Another objection is urged by our Conservative friends to this measure. They say we are tinkering with the bounds of the constituencies. They do not object on the ground that the legislature has no power; they object on the ground of policy of expediency. They say that the boundaries of electoral districts ought to be defined and settled, and when once settled, they should be permanent, and never be disturbed, except it may be for the purpose of giving additional representation, and then changed only as little as possible. Now, I say to my Conservative friends I am perfectly in accord with them in that sentiment. I do not believe in tinkering with the bounds of constituencies. I say more, it was one of the gravest complaints we had against the Conservative party in the past that they had been constantly tinkering with the boundaries of constituencies. Our opponents will please remember that this is the very first time that the Liberal party of Canada have made an effort to arrange the boundaries of districts in the past thirty-two years. It will be time enough, after we have been in power fifteen years or more, and when we shall have been guilty of the tinkering that has characterized the legislation of our hon. friends opposite, then it will be time enough to charge us with the crime of tinkering with the constituencies.

My hon. friend who took his seat a few moments ago (Mr. Clancy), referred to this measure as a gerrymander. All the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, have denounced it as a gerrymander. Well, I want to tell my hon. friends that they are mistaken in the features of a gerrymander. Let me paint the main features of a genuine gerrymander, a gerrymander that may be classed A1 at Lloyds, in order that these hon. gentlemen may be able to distinguish its lineaments when they see it, and may be able to avoid it, and if they think fit to denounce it. For the purposes of my illustration, I will assume that I have the power and the will to gerrymander the province of Ontario, for the purpose of stealing four or five seats that naturally belong to hon. gentlemen opposite. In what way will I go about the business? Why, Sir, I will take, as the basis of my operations, the election returns of the year 1896. First, I will take the counties which are to have a representation of two or more members. What will I do with these? I will divide them, not by judges, nor by independent means, but by the heels of my party. I will give the Conservatives in one portion of the county in order to carry the other one or more constituencies. But I would do more. I would look around and endeavour to find out the Grit hives. Perhaps my eye might light upon North Oxford with its majority of 1,801, or South Oxford with its majority of 750, or South Middlesex with its majority of 740, or North Wentworth with its majority of 1,121, or Russell with its majority of 1,603, or East Peterborough with its majority of 615, or West Ontario with its majority of 739, or Lincoln and Niagara with its majority of 432, or Algoma with its majority of 1,827, or West Bruce with its majority of 433, or West Elgin with its majority of 726, or West Lambton with its majority of 1,158. What would I do with these Grit hives? I would scatter them—scatter them to the four winds—scatter them where they would be of the most benefit for the purpose of assisting my friends or weakening my opponents. Then I would look around to see if I could find where the Tory hives were. It might be difficult to find them because it might have been contrary to the policy of these hon. gentlemen to create hives, but my eye might light upon South Leeds with 483 of a majority, or North Hastings with 743, or East Grey with 521, or Glengarry with 734. What would I do with the Conservative hives?

Mr. CLARKE. You might introduce minority representation there.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). No, I would preserve them. I would not only preserve them carefully, but I would add to them. If I found them 500 strong I would leave them with a thousand strong because I would know that every vote added to them would weaken other constituencies. Then I would look around to see where the weak Tory constituencies were. Perhaps my eye would light on Addington with a majority of 87, or Bothwell with a majority of 59, or North Bruce with its majority of 31, or West Northumberland with its majority of 70, or North Ontario with its majority of 1, or East York with its majority of 3. What would I do with these majorities? I would weaken them, and if possible, wipe them out. If possible I would create adverse majorities in their place. I would then look around for weak Liberal districts and perhaps my eye would light upon South Grey, which my genial friend (Mr. Landerkin) represents.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Gerrymandered in 1882.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). Yes; or East Lambton with its majority of 40, or North Leeds and Grenville with its majority of 9, or North Renfrew with its majority of 63, or North Ontario with its majority of 62. What would I do with these weak constituencies? I would encourage them; I would strengthen them; I would enable them to more successfully carry the liberal standard to victory at the next election. These would be the main and distinctive features of my gerrymander Bill. First, I would take certain counties and hive the Conservatives; then I would take the Grit hives and scatter them, the Tory hives and nurture them, the weak Conservative constituencies, wipe out the majorities, the weak Liberal constituencies and add to them. But I must be prepared to go farther; I must be prepared to uphold my measure in the House of Commons. I must be prepared to come here and defend it by strong arguments. I would take my stand, in the first place, upon my honesty—upon my good intentions; I would boldly declare to this House that it was not my intention to do any injury to any man, or to any constituency, and that, if an injury was done, it was not the result of design, but of accident. I would go farther. I would contend that my sole object in arranging the constituencies upon this principle was for the purpose of equalizing representation. Then, when some hon. gentlemen opposite would raise the question and reply: Look at the result of your equalization; you have eight constituencies with only 13,000, and eight more with 26,000 of a population; how do you defend your equalization with such a result? My answer would be: Every rule is subject to exceptions, and it takes exceptions to prove the rule. That argument ought to be conclusive. I would go farther. I would take the ground that it is impossible, in the nature of things to create a gerrymander. You cannot do it. Why? Because there is not sufficient fixity in human nature; there is not sufficient continuity in political sentiment to enable a gerrymander to be created. You might try to arrange your constituency to-day, but you will not be able to say that it will remain fixed. Therefore, it is not possible to create a gerrymander. But, if I found these arguments were not as potent and convincing as they should be, I would turn around and say: You call this a gerrymander, do you? If it be a gerrymander, I am prepared to support it on the ground that it is expedient in the interest of this country that the Liberal party should be perpetuated in power. Why, what has taken place in the past? Here we have been eighteen long years waiting for the dawn of prosperity, but the dawn never came. We saw the effect of the National Policy was to exile our population and paralyze our commerce. But now there is the dawn of prosperity in Canada, the day that has not yet reached the noontide of its splendour. If you call this a gerrymander, can you not see it is justified in view of the best interests of this country. I would say to these hon. gentlemen: Why you are lacking in the instincts of government. Why should you be permitted to govern this country? I would say more: You call this a gerrymander, do you, but wait till the next redistribution, when I shall apply the principles of my measure, not only to the province of Ontario, but to the province of Quebec and throughout Canada. You howl now, but wait until you hear the howl when you find that you have been legislated out of power for all future time.

Now, that being the argument upon which I would propose to justify my conduct in this House, I can easily understand that my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) would rise in indignation and denounce me as an infamous tyrant who had abused the power of a majority to crush the minority. I can readily understand how the hon. gentleman would denounce in strong language and with a flush of indignation on his brow, such an iniquitous measure as that which I have supposed to be perpetrated. But let him look back at the year 1882, and he will find there a measure which bears all the characteristics of the gerrymander I have described, and upon which his indignation may find legitimate vent. Why, Sir, is it possible that these gentlemen opposite propounded a gerrymander in the year 1882, based on such principles. Look at it and see. Is it true that they hived the Grits in certain portions of a county, in order to carry the other ridings? What have we to say about the constituency of the independent member (Mr. McNeill) for North Bruce? In 1882 his majority was eighty-eight, but Saugueen, with a Liberal majority of 161, had been detached at his instance from North Bruce and added to West Bruce, otherwise the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) would have been defeated by 73.

Mr. CLANCY. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell), but may I make a remark?

Mr. BELL (East Prince). I would prefer the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) to wait until I get through.

Mr. CLANCY. I can only speak with his permission, and if he will not allow me I cannot.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). When I have had as much experience in debate as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy), I will not be disturbed by his interruption.

Mr. CLANCY. I simply wanted to set the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) right.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Set yourself right first.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). Let me further illustrate how these gentlemen opposite hived the Grits in 1882. In 1878 West Ontario had a Liberal majority of 583, North Brant 723, South Oxford 680, North Oxford 1,165, South Middlesex 581, West Bruce, 956, and West Elgin a Liberal majority of 463. What did the Conservatives do with these constituencies? They added Liberals to them wherever it was possible and then abandoned them to their fate. The result was that in the elections after the gerrymander, West Ontario had increased its Liberal majority to 739, North Brant increased its Liberal majority to 951, South Oxford increased its Liberal majority to 750, North Oxford to 1,801, South Middlesex to 740. West Bruce had 892 majority, and West Elgin 726. Now, then, how did they manage about the Tory constituencies? It was a very hard matter to find them, but nevertheless wherever they existed, they scattered them. And you will find this peculiarity, that the largest average majority left to a Tory constituency was from 300 to 350—just about enough to carry the constituency surely, and no more. Was all that the result of accident or was it premeditation? As to the weak Liberal constituencies, the Gerrymander Act of 1882 weakened them still more. On the other hand, they strengthened the weak Tory constituencies. Look what was done in the case of Carleton. There were two townships taken from that county and added to North Lanark to strengthen the latter. Was that accident or was it design? Is it not true that Carleton was a strong Conservative county—carried in the elections of 1882 by 500 or 600 majority, and therefore it could well afford to lose a few of the strong Conservative townships.

Mr. CLANCY. Did the Liberals suffer by that?

Mr. BELL (East Prince). Yes, and I will show you how. These Conservative townships, as I say, were taken from Carleton and added to North Lanark. While in 1878 there was a Liberal member from North Lanark, in 1882, by virtue of this gerrymander, Mr. Jamieson a Conservative, was returned. Does the hon. gentleman want any better instance of where a Liberal member was politically assassinated by that Act? It is true that in a great many instances the action of the Tory Government in 1882 failed in its purpose, but that was no fault of theirs—the intention was there all the same. South Ontario, with a majority of 206 in 1878, was weakened by 198, and Bothwell, with its majority of 285 in 1878, was also weakened. I call the special attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) to this. We find that if we take the additions to Bothwell and the detachments from it, 345 good Liberal voters were lost to that constituency, and an adverse Conservative majority was created, with the result that Hawkins, a Conservative, was elected in 1882 by sixteen majority.

Mr. CLANCY. No, he was not.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). He was afterwards turned out, but he was elected in that year, according to the official returns, by sixteen.

Mr. CLANCY. No.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). More than that. Other changes took place in Bothwell in 1892. In consequence of that what do we find? Why, that my hon. friend's (Mr. Clancy's) majority in 1896 was eighty-seven votes.

Mr. CLANCY. And against an adverse majority before of 550.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). How was that majority created for him? The secret of it lies in the fact that 445 Liberal votes had been taken from that riding; and this gentleman now sits in this House by virtue of and thanks to the gerrymanders that were enacted in 1882 and in 1892; and yet my hon. friend has the cheek—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). The presumption, I will then say, to sit in this House and challenge Liberal members to point out one instance in which a Liberal member for any constituency was politically assassinated or materially injured.

Mr. CLANCY. I hope the hon. gentleman is strong enough and fair enough to allow me to set him right.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). The hon. gentleman can do that at the close of my remarks.

Mr. CLANCY. Then, the hon. gentleman is not fair.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). I want to go further along this line. We will take North Ontario. It had a Liberal majority in 1878 of 54; it was weakened by 260, with the intention of carrying the constituency, and we find that subsequently, in 1896, it was carried by the Conservatives by a majority of 1. North Bruce had a majority of 156 in 1878; it was weakened by 493—weakened partly by the detachment of the township of Saugeen to the extent of 161, with the result that in 1882 it was carried by my Conservative friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) by 88 majority. North York had 16 majority in 1878 for the Liberals; it was weakened by 184; but, owing to the personal influence of my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), it was carried by him with a majority of 109. South Brant, with a Liberal majority of 198 in 1878, was weakened by 241, and afterwards carried by the Conservatives. North Norfolk, with a Liberal majority of 144 in 1878, was weakened to the extent of 94; but the weakening did not have the effect contemplated. South Perth, with a majority of 77 in 1878, was weakened by 205, and was ultimately, I believe, captured by the Conservatives. These are only some of the examples which I might give. I think they prove that the Conservative party gerrymandered along the lines that I have indicated. First, they took the counties that had a representation of two or three or more members, and they hived the Grits in one constituency for the purpose of carrying the others. Then they took the Grit hives and added to them, and left them to themselves. Then they took the Conservative hives, and scattered them where they would be of the greatest service to the surrounding constituencies. They strengthened the weak Conservative constituencies. They took the weak Liberal constituencies and weakened them still further—in some cases taking away the Liberal majority and creating an adverse majority in its place. These are the main characteristics of the gerrymander which these hon. gentlemen enacted in 1882. And how did they support the proposition in this House? How did they argue it? First, they said they had the same power to deal with the constituencies that they had to deal with the tariff—that they had the right to adjust both in any way they saw fit. They declared that they did not intend to create a gerrymander at all, and that if any injury resulted to any individual, it was the result, not of design, but of accident. They said to the Liberals: "In the very nature of things it is impossible to create a gerrymander; if we create one to-day, to-morrow you cannot rely on the insistence or fixity of it. When they found that the Liberals were not convinced by these arguments, what did they then say? They argued exactly along the lines adopted by the leader of the Opposition in this debate, viz.: that it was in the interest of the country that the gerrymander should be successfully perpetrated. Why, Sir, the Liberal party in this country had no right to exist. If it unfortunately were allowed to have the control of the government of Canada, it would place the country under commercial subjection to the United States.

Mr. BELL (Prince East, P.M.I.)

Mr. MILLS. They would have done so if they had carried out their promises.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). If you put the Liberals in power, you will apply the axe to the root of the great National Policy, and destroy it. Put the Liberals in power and the great Canadian Pacific Railway that is running across this continent is going to stop short at the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. MILLS. They tried their best to stop it.

Mr. BELL (East Prince). These were the arguments the hon. gentlemen used to support their measure. But not satisfied with that, the leader of their party, Sir John A. Macdonald himself, at a banquet given to the Hon. Mr. Taillon, in Montreal, in the year 1889, as reported by the papers, made this statement:

He would live long enough to direct the redistribution of the counties after the census of 1891, and that it would make the Grits howl worse than in 1882.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder, when insult has been added to injury, that the Liberal party of this country registered a vow that at the very first opportunity that offered, the iniquitous gerrymander of 1882 should be repealed? It is no wonder this measure is now before the House. It is not before its time.

Now, Sir, a word with regard to the measure itself. There are three main distinctive characteristics of the Bill. The first is what I have already indicated, namely, a determination upon the part of the Liberal party to remedy the iniquity by the gerrymander of 1882; the next is that the Liberal party propose to return to the system of municipal county boundaries; and the third is that where a county is entitled to two or more representatives, the division of that county will be made, not as heretofore, by the heelers of the party, but by judges of the Supreme Court.

To my mind, there is no one of those three features to which our hon. friends opposite ought reasonably to object. What about the first of them? I want to ask hon. friends opposite this question. Suppose you put yourselves in our place, what would you do under the circumstances? Suppose you had been treated as we were would you be satisfied merely with the introduction of a measure, just and equitable, such as this is, or be prepared to go further? I am perfectly satisfied that my hon. friends opposite would go a great deal further.

I think this is a measure which the Conservative party, as a general rule, will favour. So far as the honest and independent Conservatives in this country are concerned—and there are many of them outside of this House—I believe a majority will be found to approve of the step now being taken.

I look back to the year 1892, and I find that Mr. Dickey, then in this House, a Conservative who occupied a high position in the confidence of his party, expressed himself as follows :

The Act of 1882 does not commend itself strongly to my judgment. Looking at it through the vista of years, it seems to me a very objectionable measure.

Did not Mr. Dickey express the feelings of tens of thousands of Conservatives in this country, when he said it was a very objectionable measure? Then, I find Mr. Dalton McCarthy thus expressing himself in 1892 :

Perhaps it will be said that I was as deep a sinner as any of those in 1882. My hon. friend (Mr. Howell) says I was a bigger sinner. I can only reply that if so, I, at all events, have the merit of not persisting in my iniquity. I am not going to apologize for my conduct in 1882, or do more than say I fully realize at present that, in every sense, party and political, that act was a gross mistake.

That was the statement of a statesman whose memory is yet held in the highest possible esteem by both parties in this country, and I believe that there are tens of thousands of good Conservatives throughout Canada who would say, in the language of Mr. McCarthy, that this Act of 1882 was a gross mistake. Therefore, I think I am justified in saying that both Liberals and Conservatives in this country will hail this enactment as a measure of righteousness and justice.

The other features of the Bill have been discussed to such an extent already that I shall not now enlarge upon them. I desire merely to point out that if we look at the British North America Act, we will find that it was not the intention of the fathers of Confederation to do more than create counties and ridings of counties. It does not say or mean ridings made up of different counties, but ridings of one county. It means that if there is a county with sufficient population, that county should be divided into ridings. That was the view held by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1872. Of course, it was not the view held by him in 1882—not because he had grown riper in experience, but because he was then carried away by the lust of power. The arguments that were advanced in 1872 by Sir John A. Macdonald have never been answered or attempted to be answered. They are simply to the effect that the county boundaries have always been regarded by the people as something sacred, and that ought not to be disturbed. He points out that wherever these county boundaries have been disturbed, dissatisfaction has always resulted. That has been the experience both in England and here, so that the experiments on both sides of the Atlantic indicate that any attempt to ignore county boundaries would result in complete failure.

The other argument advanced was that the country representatives in this House are men who naturally graduate, and ought to graduate, from the township and county councils. No doubt, the very best men in the county go into the county council, and there they become thoroughly acquainted with the people and identified with their wants, interests and necessities. If you change that, if you cut up county boundaries, the result will be, that the member will not know his constituents or their wants or necessities, and will have to begin at the bottom of the ladder and become acquainted with the people and their necessities over again.

In addition to these arguments, there is another I desire to impress upon my hon. friends opposite. This proposition of county boundaries is one which Conservatives ought to be delighted to accept. What is the Liberal party proposing to do? They are introducing a measure to tie up their hands in the matter of county boundaries, so as to make a future gerrymander of the constituencies absolutely impossible. You may gerrymander to some extent within a particular county; but in laying down the principle of maintaining county boundaries, the Liberal party is proposing in a most essential respect to tie its hands in the approaching contest that is coming on a year or two hence. I say, therefore, that the Conservative party ought to be delighted with the chance of accepting the measure, and ought to congratulate themselves that it has been proposed and introduced by the Government. Why, if you have not a restriction to county boundaries, what then? There is only one other thing practically possible, and that is you will have your constituencies arranged by the heeled of the party and by them alone. I appeal to my hon. friends opposite to say, is that a condition of things that it is desirable to have perpetuated? There was a time when we had no such thing as a Civil Service Act in Canada—when the spoils belonged to the victor. But the good sense of the people—Liberals and Conservatives alike—put upon the statute-book a law which virtually tied the hands of both parties. That was a measure for the benefit of both parties in this country. And that is what I say with reference to the measure now before the House. It proposes to say that county boundaries shall not be infringed—it proposes to tie the hands of the Liberal party, which introduces the measure. The Conservatives ought to be the first to rejoice at the introduction of the measure and accept its provisions as something not only in the interest of the Liberal party, but in the interest as well of the Conservative party.

The other feature I wish to refer to for a moment is that which proposes to leave to the judges the division of the counties. How have the counties been divided hitherto. They have been divided, by the members, divided by the workers and advisers of the party. The proposition is to change all that, to say that there shall be no more dividing of the counties in that way, but to hand over that duty into the hands of independent judges to divide the counties into ridings, where there are two, three or more representatives to be elected. Now, Sir, this is a proposition which, especially our Conservative friends, ought to rejoice to see introduced and ought to hasten to accept. Why, supposing that does not take place, what then? We should have to divide the counties as heretofore after consulting the members, after consulting the heelers of the party. The Liberal party might have brought in a measure to divide the counties, keeping the matter in their own hands. Is there any question in the minds of hon. members in this House as to which is the better mode of procedure? I think that members on both sides will come to the conclusion that this feature is one that is just and equitable, aye, and generous, on the part of the Liberals, and that it ought to be accepted without hesitation by hon. members opposite.

Now, these are the main features of the Bill. Another kind of Bill altogether might have been introduced. The Liberal party might have introduced a Bill based on the principles of the gerrymander of 1882. They might have taken a leaf out of the book of hon. gentlemen opposite. They might have been prompted by instincts of revenge. If so the mouths of our opponents would be shut. But the Liberals have not been prompted or inspired by revenge. They chose to introduce a Bill the principle features of which are such as to recommend themselves by their honesty, justice and generosity to members on both sides of this House.

Mr. JOHN ROSS ROBERTSON (East Toronto). Mr. Speaker, I did not hesitate to speak, as an humble adherent of the Conservative party, against the Redistribution Act of 1882. I denounced that measure to the full limit of my power as a newspaper man. The Redistribution Act of 1882 was wrong—that was my opinion in 1882 and that is my opinion this minute. From a party stand-point, the gerrymander of 1882 was unnecessary. The Conservatives were then strong enough to win without such unfair tactics. The gerrymander of 1882 was a mistake from the country's stand-point, because it looked like an attempt on the part of the Government to load the dice. I do not believe that any party should play the game of politics with loaded dice. And let me say here that I have just as much respect for the Government that first loads the dice and then throws those loaded dice on its own account as I have for a Government that first loads the dice and then calls in a commission of judges to throw those dice on its behalf. I was saying that the gerrymander of 1882 did not work out to the lasting advantage of the Conservative party—and I think I can make that statement good. For example, North and Centre Wellington were arranged under the Act of 1882 to return Conservatives. These two constituencies are represented by Liberals in this House, and South Wellington, which was untouched in 1882, is represented here by a Conservative. Middlesex County was carved so as to return three Conservatives and one Liberal. Middlesex returned three Liberals and one Conservative. South Perth was divided so as to give two or three hundred majority for the Conservative candidate for this House. It is represented here by a Liberal. South Perth was divided so as to give a Liberal majority of 300 for the local House, and it is represented at Toronto by a Conservative. North and South Ontario were constituted for the Dominion so as to return two Conservatives, and it was divided for the local House so as to return two Liberals. The Government has two followers in this House from North and South Ontario, and at the last provincial elections the supposed Liberal strongholds of North and South Ontario both went Conservative. Grey County was gerrymandered so as to return three Conservatives to this House, and two Liberals and one Conservative to the local House. Grey County is represented by two Liberals and one Conservative in this House, and by three Conservatives in the local House. Huron County was gerrymandered to return two Conservatives to this House. Not a Conservative from Huron County sits in this Chamber. The same county was gerrymandered to return three Liberals to the local House, and at the last general election the Conservatives carried two of the three Huron seats, although West Huron was subsequently regained by the Government.

To illustrate my argument I have taken two of three Wellingtons, and all the seats in Middlesex, Perth, Ontario, Grey and Huron counties. The returns from this group of counties will show the political value of the gerrymander to the Conservative party. These counties were divided in 1882 so as to return fourteen Conservative and two Liberals; these same counties are represented in this Parliament by thirteen Liberals and three Conservatives. The gerrymander which was to give the Conservatives thirteen seats out of sixteen has done its worst, and the Liberals have thirteen seats and the Conservatives have only three seats in sixteen of the gerrymandered districts. That is how the gerrymander worked for the benefit of the Conservative party.

In view of these figures, the Government could well have afforded to go back to the country which supported them in Opposition, and not attempt to cure the old gerry-mander by the perpetration of a new gerrymander which is born out of due season. I have been greatly impressed during the course of this argument with the spectacle of the whole Liberal party and the Liberal press struggling in a spasm of admiration for the judiciary of our country. Liberal opinion has not always run this way. I have a dim recollection that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had a few words to say about one member of the judiciary in Canada, I think his name was Tuck, of New Brunswick. The right hon. the First Minister will remember how away back in 1892 his chief organ roared against the highest judges in the land. The Supreme Court itself did not escape the censure of the Liberal party when the appeal from Mr. Hargraff of West Northumberland was struck off the list without a hearing. Then was there not a judge in London, Elliott, I think, was his name; who came in for some slight attention on the part of the Liberal leaders in this House? And the two judges of the High Court of Justice of Ontario who tried the election petition against my hon. friend from London (Mr. Beattie) were denounced as partisans by the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now, I am not here to quarrel with what the hon. gentlemen or their newspaper friends have said about the judges in the past. Speaking for myself, I am free to say that in Ontario at least there is a tendency to unduly exalt our judiciary. There are no finer men on top of the earth than some of the judges of the High Court of Justice of Ontario, and some of the members of the judiciary are just ordinary material. It goes without saying that all our judges are honest. Honest men are surely not so scarce in Canada that we have to make a fuss over honesty, which should be taken for granted in the case of every judge under the British flag. As to the impartiality of our judges in political cases I do not care to speak. I will just read the words of Mr. James R. Stratton, a distinguished Liberal and a member of the Ontario legislature—and a prospective Minister as an hon. member beside me suggests. He has been on the hunt for that for a great many moons. In the debate on the Constable Bill, as reported in the "Mail," of August 9th, 1898, he said:

What the Attorney General is asking us to do, said Mr. Stratton, is to provide for cases where the decision of a possibly partisan, narrow-minded trial judge might construe the law of the land different to what it was intended and to prevent long and tedious delays in appeal.

In the "Globe," of the 9th of August, 1898, Mr. Stratton is reported on this question, as follows:—

But the learned judges took a lofty stand. They say they have no regard for the expense this province might be put to, and they must have a few days fishing. Nero fiddled while Rome burnt, and the judges go fishing while the Opposition is trying to rob a great many of the electors of the province of their franchise. The law is not intended to rob constables of their votes.

I find that the hon. gentleman opposite, even the leaders of the Government, are not wholly free from Mr. Stratton's distrust of the judiciary of Ontario. Any judge is good enough to carve the country to suit them. But still they retain the power to nominate the judges who will suit them best. They could have left the judges to name three of themselves to do this work, just as the judges always choose two of their number to try each election petition; or, better still, they could have left the division of the counties to the Ontario Court of Appeal and then the members of this special tribunal would not have been discredited by the suspicion of having been chosen with reference to their probable usefulness to the Government. The Government rebukes the Opposition for its unwillingness to trust the judges who have been Liberals, but it reserves power in such a way as to show its unwillingness to trust judges who have been Conservatives. First, the Government shows that it is not willing to trust any judge by reserving power to name three judges who will do its work, and the Government is afraid to trust even these three judges because it further provides that a majority of two can carve up a district irrespective of a protest from a dissenting judge. They profess to trust any member of the judiciary, and they are afraid to abide by the unanimous action of their own nominees. It only requires the united verdict of 12 men to send a horse thief to jail; and yet these hon. gentlemen will allow a man to be excluded from this Parliament by the verdict of two out of three judges. I was going to say that since the Government has acquired such a profound respect for the entire judiciary that it would be a graceful act on the part of the Senate to relieve the hon. gentlemen opposite of all responsibility in this matter, and nominate the three judges who would be far above the suspicion of favouring the Liberal party.

But I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this Bill will not be amended. I want to see this Bill annihilated, and I am prepared to justify any constitutional means which will protect the people I represent from a contemptible attack on the sacred right of representation by population in this House. The hon. gentlemen talk about Sir John A. Macdonald—and as I said, I am not going to justify the redistribution of 1882—which I regarded and do still regard as one of the great mistakes of his career. It was charged against Sir John A. Macdonald that he hived the Grits in constituencies like West Ontario and South Middlesex. In those two constituencies Sir John hived a Liberal population of 37,598 and gave them two members, or a member for 19,000 people. The right hon. gentleman the First Minister, hives over 40,000 people from East and West York in the city of Toronto, and gives them only one member. The hon. the First Minister excused this act by saying that in every place where there are representative institutions, rural municipalities are given more representation than cities, because many members living in cities represent rural constituencies. I suppose the right hon. the First Minister will recognize the United States as a country blessed with representative institutions, and he could not mean to tell this House that the rural population has greater representation in the House of Representatives than the city population for the reason he names, that is to say, because members representing rural constituencies, live in cities. The hon. the First Minister was long enough in Washington to know that this reason would not apply there, because of the requirement that no candidate is eligible for Congress—I mean the lower branch—who does not reside in the district that he aspires to represent.

The hon. the First Minister was in error as regards the United States, and he is in error as regards England, which I suppose he will admit is a country working under free institutions. The over-representation of Ireland is one of the conditions established by the Act of Union; but even in Ireland there is no discrimination against city population. South Belfast with 8,917 electors has one member, and the rural district of South Mayo with 9,696 electors, has only one member. St. Patrick's division of Dublin city has a member for 7,998 electors, and the rural district of Mid-Tipperary has a member for 7,632 electors. There are bitter complaints that one vote in Ireland has as much weight at Westminster as two or three votes in England. In England the principle of representation by population is more or less closely followed, and I would give a few figures which will show the right hon. the First Minister that he is in error in supposing that England is governed by the principle which he has improvised for the sake of disfranchising the city of Toronto.

The Bethnal Green division in London, England, has a member for 8,043 electors, and the rural division of Enfield, Middlesex, with 15,464 electors, has only one member. Central Hackney, a division of London with 8,707 electors has only one member, and the Harrow division of Middlesex with 17,387 electors, has only one member. In Scotland, the right hon. the First Minister will look in vain for his favourite principle of denying a great city the right of representation by population. The Aberdeen City division has a member for 9,788 electors, and the rural division of East Aberdeen has 12,142 electors and only one member. Edinburgh West, with 8,677 electors, has only one member, and East Lancashire, with 15,030 electors, has only one member. I do not argue that there are no inequalities in England, but I do insist that these inequalities are equal as between city and country districts, and that in England there is no general tendency to give rural populations more representation in Parliament than city populations. Elections to the British House of Commons are not run on the one-man-one-vote principle. There might be some force in the theory of the First Minister, if he retained the old system of allowing people to vote wherever they could get on the list. I grant you that under that system there might be some pretext for depriving Toronto of representation by population. When a man could vote wherever he was on the list, then Toronto could decide the result in a good many constituencies. I remember reading a speech in which Lord Salisbury assured the Liberal Opposition that when they got down to one-man-one-vote, they would have to come down to one-vote-one-value; that is to say, that under the one-man-one-vote system every vote must have the same weight in Parliament. This Government has introduced the one-man-one-vote system in Canada, but the companion principle of one-vote-one-value has yet to come. I can tell the hon. the First Minister that he can only cite one precedent for the disfranchisement of the city population of Toronto. He poses as a British statesman, but he cannot find the act of a British statesman which would serve as a model for his attack on the rights of the people of Toronto. He will have to go down to the Southern States, and there, among the leaders of the shot-gun democracy, he will find the statesmen who treat the negro population of the South as he has treated the Canadian people in the city of Toronto. Toronto holds one-tenth of the Ontario population; Toronto population is measured at census time, and Ontario secures representation as compared with Quebec, partly on the strength of the Toronto population. Toronto population is counted for the purpose of increasing Ontario representation in this House. They use Toronto population to secure more members from Ontario, and then ignore Toronto's population in choosing constituencies which shall elect those members. The Democrats down South count the negroes at census time for the purpose of securing representation in Congress, and then keep the negro population away from the polls with shot-guns. Toronto's population is counted at census time to give Ontario representation in this House, and then the right hon. First Minister ignores the principle of representation by population in a redistribution scheme which is less noisy, but not less deadly, than the Southern shot-gun of the double-barrel pattern. It would not be so bad, if the hon. First Minister fairly applied his double standards for the representation of rural populations and city populations. This measure gives some cities representation according to the rural standard, and sets up a so-called city standard for the special purpose of disfranchising Toronto. The cities in Ontario outside of Toronto—London, Ottawa, Hamilton and Kingston—which are directly represented in this House, have a population of 126,058. Thus a city population of 126,058 is represented in this House by 6 members, and a city population of 174,414 in Toronto is represented in this House by 5 members. There is a member of Parliament for every 21,010 of city population outside of Toronto, and a member of Parliament for every 36,465 of city population inside of Toronto. And still the right hon. First Minister suggested that Toronto was represented according to the principle governing the representation of city population generally. I am forgetting the argument of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor), who rose and asserted that Toronto was the home of Messrs. Edgar, Mulock, Campbell, Osler, McCarthy, Bertram, Wallace, McLean, Clarke and Robertson. He might also have said Mr. Craig, of East Durham. Woodbridge happens to be the post office address of Mr. Wallace. Toronto Junction is the home of Mr. Campbell. Toronto, then, with 174,414 people is told not to ask for its right to representation by population, because that city is the post office address of eight or nine members of Parliament. But Windsor, with 10,322 population, is the post office address of two members of Parliament. It will be just as reasonable to argue that the 31,523 people in North Essex should be disfranchised because the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) lives in Windsor, as to argue that the citizens of Toronto should be deprived of representation in this House because a few representatives of outside constituencies live in that city. According to the standard which the hon. member for North Essex applies to Toronto, his good city of Windsor, with two resident members, and only 10,322 population, is the most over-represented town in the Dominion. Toronto would need to be the post office address of 40 members of Parliament before it would have the representation which Windsor now enjoys, according to the theory of the hon. member for North Essex. I was surprised to hear the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), whom I was glad to see in his place this afternoon, echo the argument which the hon. member for North Essex urged against the city of Toronto. I have heard no proposal to disfranchise the city populations of 19,267 in Kingston because that city is also the home of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). And how about Ottawa? Ottawa—and all these figures I am quoting are from the census returns of 1891, except my estimate of 40,000 for the added portions of Toronto—has a member for every 18,634 of city population, and yet Ottawa is the post office address of more members of Parliament than Toronto. The hon. member for North Essex, with the endorsement of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, insisted that Toronto wanted the earth and the fullness thereof. So far as I am concerned, I stand here as one of the representatives of the chief city of Ontario, to insist that the city population of Toronto should be represented according to the standard which applies to the city populations of Ontario and the other provinces. I would be ashamed to ask for the setting up of a special standard to unfairly enfranchise my fellow citizens, and I am here in my place to enter my solemn protest against the setting up of this special standard to unfairly disfranchise my fellow citizens. The citizens of Toronto who were in a position to directly control the representation of six constituencies, and indirectly decide the result in 12 or fifteen outside constituencies, have been reduced to the control of five seats. At the time of the last redistribution I protested that four seats did not give just representation to the people in East, West and Centre Toronto. The defenders of the last Government pointed out that there were hundreds of Toronto citizens who voted in outside constituencies. I could not deny that fact as an excuse for giving Toronto the benefit of representation by population. There is no such excuse now. This Government, in its wisdom, has applied the one-man-one-vote principle to Ontario. I approve of that principle, but when you get down to one-man-one-vote, you have no right to say that one vote in this constituency shall have the same representation that is given to two or three in that constituency. The city of Montreal, not counting Maisonneuve and Hochelaga, has a member for every 36,539 people. Toronto under this Bill will have a member for every 34,878 people. The difference seems to be in favour of Toronto as against Montreal, but Montreal is not working on the one-man-one-vote principle. The citizens of Montreal can vote wherever their names are on the list, and, therefore, there is still some excuse for denying them the right of representation by population. I do not want to use these figures unfairly; I have a telegram to-day from a friend of mine in Montreal which states:

In Quebec a man can vote in every division in which his name is on the electoral list; for instance, it is stated that Senator Ogilvie, who is a large property-owner in various parts of the Island of Montreal and neighbouring country, has voted as often as twelve times in one day, as, of course, he had a perfect right to do.

I have counted the population of the five constituencies of Montreal in with the population of the ten leading cities of the Dominion, except Toronto. There are 509,694 people in the cities of St. John, Halifax, Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, Hamilton, London, Winnipeg and Victoria. These cities elect twenty members to this House, or a member to every 25,490 people. Toronto is asked to be thankful for a member for every 34,878 people. Outside of Toronto it takes 25,490 of a city population to elect a member of Parliament; and inside of Toronto, it takes 34,878 people to elect a member to this House. The discrimination against Toronto averages, in round numbers, about 10,000 for each of the five seats, and this Bill disfranchises nearly 50,000 people, who are denied the right to representation according to the standards which govern the representation of city populations outside of Toronto. I would not ask one member more than Toronto is entitled to, and I will not support any Bill which gives Toronto even one member less than the city should have if it enjoyed the rights granted other city populations.

The hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who thinks that Toronto should not have representation according to population because a few members of Parliament have their homes in that city, should ask: How many outside members of Parliament have their homes in the city of Montreal? The right hon. the first Minister thinks it is right that there should be only one member of Parliament for every 34,878 Canadians in the city of Toronto; but he also thinks it right that there should be a member of Parliament for every 21,030 Canadians in the city population of Quebec. Quebec, with a city population of 63,090, has three members—Toronto, with a city population of 174,414, has five members of Parliament. It takes nearly 35,000 Canadians in the city population of Toronto to elect a member to this Parliament, while 21,000 Canadians in the city population of Quebec can do the same work. Mr. Speaker, I can rest my case on these figures. The right hon. the Prime Minister refuses the right of representation by population to Toronto because members of Parliament live in the city; but he allows Montreal and Quebec, yes, and every other city in the country, to be more generously represented, although most of these cities are the homes of not a few outside members of Parliament. The right hon. the First Minister may be proud of his work. I wish him joy of it. The right hon. gentleman is ready to apply one principle for the disfranchisement of Toronto—of Canadians in Toronto—and another principle for the enfranchisement of Liberals in Montreal, Quebec and other places.

If I understand the sentiment of the people of Toronto, they do not expect me to beg for favours from this Government. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has the power in his hands to do as he pleases. Toronto, I can tell him, is not to be bribed by the hope of favour from this Government—nor bulked by the injustice of this Bill. I repeat, that so far as this Bill applies to Toronto, the First Minister has revealed an unfair spirit. I know that it is useless to appeal to the majority in this House; but I trust that there is a majority elsewhere which will protect the rights of the disfranchised Canadians in the city of Toronto.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON.

I have been trying to speak in defence of what I conceive to be the rights of the people of my native city, and in the few words I have yet to say, I want to refer to the most dangerous aspect of this Bill. I am not justifying the redistribution schemes nor the gerrymanders of the past. The principle of representation by population was supposed to be the basis of these schemes. The hope of securing party advantage may have been the motive for these schemes. The Tories are said to have gerrymandered the country in the name of representation by population. The Liberals are going to gerrymander the country in the name of respect for county boundaries. I know that "gerrymander" is a strong word and an unpopular word on the other side of the House; but, in the name of heaven, what name can you give to this Bill, which is a first step, and a long step, towards the establishment of a system which will enable the minority of the people of Ontario to elect a majority of the members for Ontario? Where did this principle of respect for county boundaries get its sanctity? Surely the British North America Act, with its provision for a redistribution after every decennial census, contemplates representation by population. The enforcement of the one-man one vote principle in Ontario implies representation by population. Every man, woman and child in Ontario is counted for the purpose of giving the people representation in this House. As between the provinces, representation by population is the rule; and where is the justice in this idea of representation by counties as between parts of the same province? The Conservatives have incidentally violated the principle of representation by population, but this Liberal Government has put that principle to open shame. The Conservatives may have ignored the principle for party advantage, but this Government has boldly abolished that principle. The Conservatives had the excuse that they did not accept the idea of one-man-one-vote, and should, therefore, not be called upon to apply the principle of one-vote-one-value, or in other words, representation by population. The principle of representation by population is a national principle. The so-called principle of respect for county boundaries is not a principle at all. It is a dodge to be used where it can help the Government, and dropped before it can hurt the Government. This Bill tears down a national standard of representation and sets up a local standard. Respect for county boundaries is the shibboleth of the Government, and when it gets west of Lake Superior, where will it find the county boundaries to respect? I understand that there are no counties in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories, and in British Columbia, I am told that the counties are very roomy—as big as eastern provinces. We all believe that Canada is a nation, and it follows, therefore, that this House is a national Parliament. The principle upon which representation in this Parliament is based should be equally applicable to every province. You cannot apply the principle of respect for county boundaries in every province, because there are not counties in every province. This Bill is evil because it exalts the policy of respect for county boundaries above the principle of representation by population. The Parliament is not representative of counties; it is supposed to be representative of the people. It is not an assemblage of county delegates, but a governing, a sovereign body, deriving its powers from the people. I oppose this Bill as a Gerrymander in the worst sense of the word. Carried to its logical conclusion, the principle of this Bill—but it has no principle—will enable a minority of the people of Ontario to elect a majority of Ontario members of this House; and gerrymander is the only word to describe a measure of that character. I oppose this Bill because I think it is unnecessary, and because it may stand as a precedent to encourage every other party to juggle with the constituencies as soon as it takes office. I regret that I was not in the House when the hon. leader of the Opposition alluded to the part that the hon. member for West York had in placing the Opposition on the treasury benches. I agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition when he speaks of what the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) did to bring the Opposition into power. I know that the hon. member for West York acted on principle. His principles in that matter were and are my principles. If he had to do it over again, I am sure he would give up office rather than desert his principles; and if I were a candidate, I would follow him again as I did before. I think that the Government is trying to run the hon. member for West York out of Parliament. He does not hold a gerrymandered seat. I understand that the bounds of his constituency have not been disturbed for fifty years. Of course, the First Minister will say, in the words of Brutus, "Not that he loved Cæsar less, but that he loved Rome more." His excuse will be, not that he loves the Grand Sovereign less, but that he loves his new sacred white elephant, municipal boundaries, more. The hon. the First Minister is able to leave Conservative parts of the city of Ottawa in the county of Carleton for the sake of helping his Liberal friends; and he is taking Conservative parts of the city of Toronto out of East and West York for the sake of hurting his enemies. I am not afraid that the hon. gentleman will be able to make any division of West York that will put Clarke Wallace out of his seat. The old idea of treating free Canadians as if they were the chattels of either party is dying out. The people of the suburbs of Toronto are neither Grits nor Tories when they are brought face to face with a cowardly attack on any public man. The spirit of independence and fairplay, which is outraged by this Bill, will take care of the hon. member for West York, no matter how the constituency may be divided. The present Government, Mr. Speaker, may be a very clever organization, but it seems to suffer from a chronic lack of time. Whenever there is a proposal for the country's benefit, this Government is too busy. It is too busy to declare a policy which would permit a man to spend his own money in building a railway. It is too busy to pass a Copyright Act, which would give employment to thousands of Canadians. It is too busy to deal with the question of an insolvency law. It is too busy to frame a policy of justice between the farmers and elevator men in the west. It is too busy to try to create machinery to regulate the railways. Why, I am told by an ardent prohibitionist that it is too busy even to pass a prohibitory law. In fact, when anything is to be done for the country's sake, this Government has not a minute to spare; but when anything is to be done for the party's sake, it has oceans of time. This Government is prepared to spend months upon an unnecessary gerrymander, which proposes to guarantee votes to the party; and it is not prepared to spend minutes upon measures which would give profit to the country. It is a pity that this Government does not look to the party for its pay. The Government forgets that there is a country except on pay-day, when it draws its salary from the country and keeps right on working for the party.

Mr. C. B. HEYD (South Brant). Mr. Speaker, we always have a reasonable anticipation, when our friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) speaks, that we shall have the pleasure of listening to a few epigrammatic sayings. He always tries to tell us something interesting in a very short way. We have heard sometimes of men speaking through their hat, but to-night we on this side of the House have had the opportunity of seeing a gentleman reading through his hat. Some of the arguments which the hon. gentleman has advanced as reasons why this Bill should be opposed are not at all satisfactory to those who do not expect a man to talk through his hat. One of the reasons he gave us was that Toronto is being unjustly treated. If the hon. gentleman had raised his voice in protest against the law that has governed the country for the past twenty years, we might have believed to-night that he was sincere; but the very conditions which he deplures with such vehement language to-night, have continued in this country for the past seventeen years in a more intensified form than this Bill is intended to perpetuate, because East Toronto, during the last nine years, has had one representative for 43,564, while the new Bill proposes that the hon. gentleman shall represent only about 36,000 people. Now, it strikes me that if the magnificent oratory which we have heard to-night had manifested itself in a newspaper in Toronto about nine years ago—

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. It did.

Mr. HEYD—it would have been much more valuable than the speech which we have heard to-night.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. It did, nearly twenty years ago.

Mr. HEYD. It did manifest itself, but not in so emphatic a way—not with the desire of embarrassing the powers that then were, so much as the intention is to embarrass the powers that be now. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has expressed his opinion of the Gerrymander Bill of 1882 by saying that it was a bad Bill; but I am sorry he did not use the same emphasis some seventeen years ago that he used here to-night. If there is one thing that the people of Canada like, whether they find it in politicians or not, it is consistency; and when we have certain opinions of our own which we think should be put in the form of law, we would like to have them expressed some fifteen or sixteen years ago as well as to-night. Now, what my hon. friend takes so much exception to is that Toronto is not properly represented. You would think, from hearing the hon. gentleman speak, that Toronto was the hub of the Dominion of Canada, that the sun rises and sets in the city of Toronto, and that this House, in everything it does, should consider Toronto first, last and always. While I have the very highest regard for the gentlemen who represent Toronto in this House, they are all animated apparently with the same desire to advance the interests of Toronto, no matter how; and they generally unite, whatever their political convictions may be, in promoting those interests. With our knowledge of the representatives from that burg, if it were to have more than five, we do not know what they might convert this Parliament of ours into. I do not say that it is not now represented by very intelligent and very earnest men, who are doing the best they can for this country; but the attack on the present Government because they are trying to give Toronto one representative for 36,000 by the hon. gentleman, who was satisfied in past years with having one for 43,000, is rather far-fetched on his part. He opposes the Bill, he says, because it is unnecessary. It is always unnecessary to redress a grievance, in the opinion of the man who has brought about the grievance. He never needs anything redressed; but the poor victim who has been suffering from his misconduct, wants redress. The object is not to redress the grievances of persons who have brought about this trouble, but to give to those who have been suffering under it during the last eighteen years, redress at last. That is why I am supporting this Bill.

But I do not want to weary the House with too long a discussion of what my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) has said. I wish to allude very briefly to what fell from the lips of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). I do not know exactly what spirit animates a man who can imagine a condition of affairs which he has no reasonable assurance of having existed. When a man attacks as villains two men who have not yet had an opportunity of defending themselves before the courts, and introduces their names into this House for the purpose of casting an aspersion upon the character of a very worthy member of this House, he does something which I, at least, politician though I am, would hardly stoop to. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) branded Captain Sullivan and Mr. Hewitt as felons, which he had no right to do, because they have not had the opportunity, up to the present, of vindicating their character. One gentleman whom I know well denies positively the truth of the accusation—but first to brand them as felons and then associate them with my hon. friend who sits at my left (Mr. Paterson)—

Mr. WALLACE. The judges branded them in that way before I did.

Mr. HEYD. No, they did not.

Mr. WALLACE. They did.

Mr. HEYD. These men have the right to appear before the Speaker and vindicate their character. They have the right to deny these charges, and probably they will be able to disprove them. We have no right in this Parliament to brand Captain Sullivan or Mr. Hewitt as felons on the testimony produced up to the present. They have not had the opportunity of defending themselves before a proper tribunal. When these men are convicted it will be time enough to brand them as felons, but do not associate them with the Minister of Customs in the hope of creating the impression that he is a felon too. I have heard that they were not in the city at all.

Mr. BENNETT. Captain Sullivan was in the city. More than that, I asked another member of the House, who has known him intimately for years, to come with me, and we saw Captain Sullivan in the reading room. From that room he disappeared, but I cannot tell what other room he disappeared into.

Mr. HEYD. If he was in the reading room, the statement was that the Minister of Customs, Captain Sullivan and Mr. Hewitt, concocted and helped along this Gerrymander Bill. The Minister of Customs says he does not know Captain Sullivan, and Hewitt was not in the city of Ottawa at all, so that disposes of that statement.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What about the man who made the statement?

Mr. HEYD. What degree of belief can you attach to the statements of a man who deliberately would make a charge like that, without the slightest foundation and with the idea of injuring the character of an honourable and respectable man. If there was a shadow of justification for the charge, I would say that the hon. gentleman had been misled, but in this particular instance he does not appear to have a shred to build on, and when he was told by the Minister of Customs: I do not know Captain Sullivan and had not seen Hewitt, he should have frankly and decently accepted that statement. But he did not. He took it back, but in such a way that he only intensified the manner in which he made the first charge. Had I made such a statement on a foundation so flimsy, I would have begged the hon. gentleman's pardon honestly, and said I took it back, and would not try to squeeze out of an apology that was honestly due.

Mr. WALLACE. Take back what?

Mr. HEYD. That the Minister of Customs and Hewitt and Captain Sullivan conspired together and assisted in framing this Redistribution Bill, when the hon. gentleman ought to have known that the Minister did not know Sullivan, and that Mr. Hewitt was not here.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not the statement I made.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What was it?

Mr. WALLACE. It was that these two distinguished citizens were in the city here. The Minister of Customs made the statement, in his speech, that the ward heelers and manipulators from all the ridings of Ontario came here in 1882 and manipulated what he called the Gerrymander Bill of 1882. I said that, so far as my knowledge went, Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Mr. Alkenus were the two gentlemen who had charge of the Bill and were promoting it for the province of Ontario, and I repudiated the statement that there were heelers connected with them, and said that they were honest and upright men. Then addressing myself to the Minister who made the charge, I said that two distinguished citizens of his party were here in Ottawa at the time the Gerrymander Bill of 1880 was being prepared, and I asked if the hon. Minister was one of those men who had charge of that, because if he was, then probably he was in collusion with those two citizens I have mentioned.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The "Hansard" will show what you said.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, and I do not take back what I said, like the Minister of Customs did to-night in the case of the hon. member for Bothwell.

Mr. HEYD. If the hon. gentleman simply intended to convey the impression he is trying to make out, I certainly was deceived. But a statement of that kind would not have caused our friends opposite to thump their desks so vigorously as they did. These gentlemen became demonstrative because they thought the hon. member was charging that the Minister of Customs had hobnobbed with Captain Sullivan and Mr. Hewitt for no good purpose. The impression which the hon. gentleman left on the mind of his hearers was that there was crookedness between Hewitt and Sullivan and the Minister of Customs, and he did not take back his statement in the way he should and remove that impression. However, I am not going to run foul of the hon. gentleman. If he thinks that is fair politics, I have nothing more to say. I was not sent here from South Brant to make an attack on the personal character of any man. I have never done it, and do not propose to do it now.

The question before us is one of considerable importance because there are grave principles involved in it. We have before us the duty of redressing the wrong enacted some seventeen years ago, and the question arises how can we best do it. Those of us familiar with the difficulties that beset the Government in 1881, when a redistribution Act was imperatively demanded, can easily suggest what scheme this Government might have adopted to make such an Act effective. They might have adopted the numerical principle, and divide the population of each province by the number of representatives they were entitled to, the electoral unit being 20,908. That would have been attended with grave difficulties I am free to confess, but it has been urged to-night, that that was the principle followed by the late Government. Is that true? According to the census of 1881, 20,908 is the electoral unit and each 20,908 people are entitled to a representative. Was that the principle that guided the late Government in establishing constituencies as they did? We find that in Ontario there were 12 constituencies that were 4,000 each short of the electoral unit, and they are represented by nine Conservatives and three Liberals. In Nova Scotia four constituencies have from 5,000 to 10,000 less than the electoral unit. In New Brunswick there are four constituencies with from 5,000 to 14,000 less than the electoral unit. Take Restigouche—I do not desire to say a word against its representative (Mr. McAllister), nor do I select it in order to asperse him in any way—but it happens to be a constituency that in 1881 only had 6,651 people, and yet it elected a representative. So you see that the electoral unit was not taken as the basis of representation.

A great deal of fault has been found with the fact that in the present Bill there are a great many constituencies that have more than the electoral unit. But that is not peculiar to the present Bill, because that existed in 1881 and 1891 and was never charged against the Bills as being a particular act of injustice.

We have heard a great deal to-night from the member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson), who finds fault with the fact that in Toronto it takes some 40,000 to do exactly what it takes 20,000 people to do in the rural constituencies of Ontario. What does he say when he finds out that it takes 41,000 in Westmoreland to do what 8,308 in Restigouche can do—5 to 1, or West York, 41,851—5 to 1; or Algoma, 41,856—5 to 1; or East Toronto, 43,564—5 to 1? A man in the county that our hon. friend (Mr. McAlister) comes from counts for as much as five men from any of these other constituencies. Yet, not one man on the other side has lifted his voice against this terrible iniquity which they charge is in the Bill. Now, if they have lived through 19 years with this condition of affairs they can live for two or three years longer under an Act by which this difference is not intensified but is somewhat lessened. That is the condition of affairs existing now; and why people should take so much offence at the intentions of the Government when they have borne with the horrible evil so long, I cannot fairly comprehend. But there is another plan that might have been taken, and that is, confining themselves to county boundaries. The fact that we are here to-night trying to put through the Bill is the best evidence that the Government of the day did not confine themselves to county boundaries. There are two plans, either of which they might have adopted—either to maintain the county boundaries or to assimilate the constituencies to a unit of population as fairly as they could. That would be a hard task. It was easier and more necessary to make what might be called a political geography and change the constituencies according to that than to try to arrange them according to an electoral unit or according to county boundaries. I do not intend to go over the province of Ontario to show that the idea of political advantage was at the bottom of the Redistribution Bill of 1882, and that of 1892, but I do so that they advanced the interest of one political party. If the Government of that day had started with the idea to do right; it would not have mattered whether they had adopted the idea of an electoral unit or the idea of the county boundaries or any other plan. But we on this side believe that the animating principle was to advance the interests of the Government then existing and to do injury to their political opponents; and we believe that still, and we have heard no argument—at least I have heard no argument—to convince me that anything else was in the mind of the Government. Reference has often been made to South Brant to-night, because South Brant is a historical constituency in this country. I regret to find some members of this House so ill-informed as to the number of people who live in South Brant. I heard an hon. gentleman say that the people who live in Tuscarora were not counted in the population. They were counted in the population when the electoral lists of 1881 were prepared; they were counted in 1891. It is said they had a right to be counted in 1891 because they had votes, while now they have no votes. But they were counted in 1881 when they had no votes. So that the whole argument, as well as the personal discussion that took place between the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) only showed that the hon. member (Mr. Clancy) was wrong, and that the Indians had been counted in.

Mr. CLANCY. That makes it all the worse.

Mr. HEYD. But it does not make the hon. gentleman's statement any truer. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to justify their statements when they are false by saying it is good they are no worse. That is no argument. A gentleman who represents an Ontario constituency should tell the facts in a matter of this kind, especially when he challenges the accuracy of another gentleman's statement. He should be sure of his facts or say nothing. Nothing can be clearer than that the people of Tuscarora were counted when the lists were made in 1881.

Now, take the county of Brant about which so much has been said. I have satisfied myself that the intentions of the late Government in dealing with South Brant were not honourable, and from that I infer that the same applies throughout the length and breadth of the country. In 1867, the constituency of South Brant was represented by the late Hon. E. B. Wood. For over 20 years both North and South Brant had had representatives in the Parliament of this country. In 1872, Mr. Wm. Paterson was elected over Sir Francis Hincks by a majority of 262, after one of the most strongly contested political campaigns we ever fought in this country. In 1878, Mr. Paterson was elected by 198. In 1881 the census was taken and what was the result of that census? Let us divest ourselves of all political ideas, if we can for a short time, and let us look at the figures as practical men would do who are not animated by a desire to get an advantage over a political rival. South Brant had a population of 21,975. Brant is divided by the river running east and west. That portion of it north of the river is North Brant and that south is South Brant, and that is the way the constituencies have been for municipal purposes for the last 50 years; that is the way it has been for provincial purposes since confederation, and for years before. Now, the electoral unit was 20,908. South Brant, with its 21,975, was just as close to the unit as it was possible for a constituency to be. It was difficult to find anywhere a constituency closer to the electoral unit than South Brant. It might naturally have been expected that the Government would say: South Brant has been organized for municipal purposes in its present form for 40 years, and it is as close to the electoral unit as we can make it; therefore, we had better leave it alone. It is true that North Brant had not enough population to entitle it to a representative, for it had only 11,894. The only thing the Government would have been justified in doing was to add to North Brant in order to bring it up to the electoral unit. But what did they do? Instead of quietly attaching a little to North Brant to bring it up to the standard, they took a piece of Oxford and added it to North Brant, and they took a piece from Wentworth and added it also, constituting North Brant out of three counties. We have the right to look at it critically to see what was the motive in it. North Brant was a strong Liberal constituency. They could increase their majority as they might deem it necessary. But in South Brant, as constituted by the Act, there was the town of Paris and the township of Onondaga, which voted Tory and could increase the Tory majority if it was necessary; but being so greatly outnumbered by the Liberals throughout the rural part of the riding, the voting strength of Onondaga and Paris was never brought out. But Paris and Onondaga were taken out of North Brant, for they could do the Government no good there. Beverley was added to North Brant, and another portion from Oxford, making it a Grit hive in the true sense of the word. In 1887 the majority was 1,174; in 1892 it was 1,114; in 1896 it was 1,117—and they could have made it more if necessary. I do not go into further particulars, because North Brant is not even mentioned in our "Parliamentary Companion," whether through typographical error or because they did not want to show how much the Grits were hived. I do not know. But this is what I want to object to, that while South Brant had a population of 21,000, they added Paris, with 3,173, and Onondaga with 1,739 more. Why did they do that? Because these places were the only two in North Brant that gave Conservative majorities, and as the intention was to hive the Grits there by adding Beverley on the one hand and Ancaster on the west end, they might as well take the Tory sections out and attach them to South Brant, and that is what they did. With what result? According to the census of 1881 South Brant had a population of 21,947. But Mr. Paterson had a majority of 198, and all it was necessary to do was to put about 200 Tory votes into South Brant, and they had some hopes of defeating my hon. friend, and that is just what they did do. They did not need to take 5,000 people out of North Brant and put them into South Brant, because to do that they would have to take 5,000 people out of South Brant and put them into South Oxford—they had to take people that for 40 years had been doing their business in the city of Brantford, and carrying on their municipal affairs in county work and township work, and put them into a strange county with whom they had no business arrangements, with whom they have no political interests, and what for? In order to take 225 Grit votes out of South Brant and put them into South Oxford. They had already 500 or 600, or 700 more than they knew what to do with. Now by taking that 225 votes out of South Brant, and taking Paris and Onondaga out of North Brant and putting them into South Brant, it gave the Conservatives a majority of 43. That is the position of affairs, and when our friends examine that they must come to the conclusion that the intention of the people who had carved the constituency was to defeat the men who had represented it for so many years in this House. All they had to do was to take off 198, and they gained their purpose.

Now, what was the object? They desired to get rid of Mr. Paterson. He has been a thorn in the sides of our friends opposite, much as they admire him personally. It is a singular thing how you can like a man personally and how you can differ from him politically. I see opposite a lot of men that I think a great deal of, but when it comes down to politics they appear to me to be the crookedest lot of men I ever saw. In the ordinary private relations of life I regard it as an honour to be associated with them. Politics are a curious thing when it leads men to do such things as they did in the Redistribution Bill of 1882, with the idea of killing Paterson. What harm had he ever done them? He had been trying to represent South Brant to the best of his ability, and all that time he did it to the satisfaction of his people. But he had to be got rid of, to be legislated out of existence, and when they could not do that by the Redistribution Bill, they tacked on the Indians. They thought that the Indians, being the wards of the Government, and having some 600 votes, could be easily coerced, and they expected to kill Paterson that way. They also tacked on the Franchise Bill. Gentlemen on the other side know that that was designed all for the purpose of killing Paterson. Now, we, in South Brant, have got the notion into our heads that Brant was gerrymandered for the purpose of injuring the Liberal party, and that was quite manifest, because all the Conservative party felt quite jubilant. They denied having anything to do with it; they would not be guilty of such nefarious work. But it was done—I do not say it was done by Mr. Aikens, or Sir Mackenzie Bowell. I do not know how it was done, but, whoever did it, did it very skilfully. The statement was made to-day, and a challenge was thrown across the House to show one constituency that had been injured by the gerrymander. I can show you one, South Brant, because Mr. Paterson would have been elected in 1896, in the old constituency, as it existed in 1882, by a majority of 400 votes, and he was killed by the votes that were tacked on by the gerrymander of 1882 and that of 1892.

Mr. BERGERON. He was elected twice after that.

Mr. HEYD. He might have been, but the very men that were added to his constituency, when it came to a final trial, were able to put him out. The city of Paris, the township of Onondaga and Tuscarora defeated Mr. Paterson, and Paris, Onondaga and Tuscarora were added to South Brant for the purpose of doing it, and they succeeded. In 1896, had the old township of Burford and Oakland been left in the South Riding, and Paris, Onondaga and Tuscarora been left off, Mr. Paterson would have been elected by 400 votes. So there is a clear case where the gerrymander of 1882 and 1892 defeated a candidate, and we have solved the problem of who struck Billy Paterson.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). And we have got South Brant under a good honest election, and a good man to represent it.

Mr. HEYD. Now, Mr. Hewitt is a nice fellow, there is not a man on the other side of the House that would not like to be acquainted with him. He is a gentleman who has been maligned here and elsewhere, but he will have an opportunity of re-establishing himself in the confidence of the people who know him. Now, what is all this fuss about? You would think from the complaints that have been made in this House and from the editorials that have been written, that the Government is going to perpetrate one of the greatest wrongs that it is possible to perpetrate upon a free people. We have heard the acts of our friends characterized in language that is most execrating. We have heard it said that it is a cruel wrong, that we were exulting with fiendish glee. But what are we exulting over? For simply restoring the conditions that existed in 1881, that is all we are trying to do. We are not trying to do any harm. We are not appointing revising barristers. We are not cutting up constituencies ourselves, we are leaving that for the judges to do, whom I do not need to defend here—although I think our hon. friend from the city of Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) went about as close to attacking them as any man could that admires the judiciary of our country. We simply call upon the judges to redress a wrong that was done in 1882, and we are told that we are doing a grievous wrong to the people. What people? The people are not grumbling at all. It is the politicians in this House who have unjustly gained their seats owing to that wrong that was perpetrated then, that are making all this noise. You take the receiver of stolen goods to the police court and make him disgorge, and he thinks the process is all wrong, and so it is with the men that have held stolen seats for the past 20 years and who are now asked to disgorge. I suppose if you put a man behind the bars of the penitentiary, he will condemn the laws of the land, he does not like these things. Neither do these men that have stolen these constituencies and who have enjoyed the benefits for twenty years. I would like to see a move made in order to make them restore their ill-gotten gains and give back these goods that have been stolen from the people. That is all this Bill is trying to do. The only fault I have to find with the Government as a politician is that they do not go further, though, as an honest man, I think they have gone far enough. But it takes a good deal to be an honest man under such provocation as the Grit party have had to endure for the last eighteen years. If we gave you fellows a dose of your own medicine, would not you squirm? If we attempted to do it behind revising barristers, men of our own appointment, men against whom there was no appeal, after we have got the power to do it, would not you groan? If we attempted to use you now as you used us for eighteen years, we would hear a wailing and gnashing of teeth, and a weeping throughout the length and breadth of this country that would surprise the people. But we do not propose to do that, all we propose to do is to do what is right. We simply want to go back to the conditions of 1881, and ask the judges in whom we have all confidence, to divide up these constituencies in order to do justice to the people.

A great many people said when our friends wiped out the old Franchise Bill last year that we made a great mistake. As a politician I say we did make a mistake, as a politician I would put the screws on you fellows. But as an honest man, I think the Government did right. But I would like to give you just one dose of that electoral list under returning officers appointed as they might be, scientifically appointed, just to give you one dose of the medicine you have been giving us for the past eighteen years. Then you would wonder how we have stood it so long. But we are only going to do justice, and we are simply asking the judges of the land to do what you ought to have done some nineteen years ago.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that the debate be now adjourned. I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), who is in charge of this Bill, to be in his place to-morrow, if he can conveniently do so, as I shall have something to say to him.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 5th July, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PURCHASE OF LAND FROM AUGUSTE LANGEVIN.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

What disposition has been made of the vote of $1,000 authorized in 1898 to purchase certain land from Auguste Langevin (dit Bergevin), Supply Bill No. 174, page 24 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The land has been purchased and $1,000 paid therefor.

Mr. BERGERON. To whom, that is what I want to know ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have just given the answer furnished to me, but I will get that information and give it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BERGERON. I want to know to whom the money has been paid.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman did not ask his question in such a way that the officer who has charge of that would have understood it, but I will see if I can get the information for the hon. gentleman.

EXTENSION OF LOBSTER FISHING SEASON.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. In granting extension of lobster fishing season to 31st July, for sections between West Point and Carleton Head, in Northumberland Straits, has any consideration been given to section between Cape Bear and Charlottetown ?

2. If not, why not, the condition in regard to lobster fishing being the same in both sections ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The extension recommended for the lobster fishing season this year has been confined to those localities recommended by the Lobster Commission for an extension.

POSTMASTER AT HUMBERSTONE.

Mr. McCLEARY asked :

1. How long was James O. Rose postmaster of Humberstone ?
2. Were any charges made against him during his term of office ?
3. If so, what were they, and were such charges inquired into, by whom and with what result ?
4. What was the nature of the report made by the commissioner who held the inquiry ?
5. Was Mr. Rose continued in his position after such inquiry had been made ; if so, how long ?
6. Has he been dismissed ?
7. If so, did he receive notice from the department of such, and what was the date of same ?
8. What was the date of his dismissal ?
9. What reason can be given for his dismissal ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. From the 1st of October, 1881, to the 1st of December, 1898. The answer to the other questions is as follows:—Certain charges of mismanagement of the office and political partisanship against the postmaster were made and inquired into by the inspector. The report was dated the 17th of September, 1897, but no action was taken thereon. In the month of November, 1898, complaint was made to the department that the postmaster was engaged as a general merchant, and that the post office was in his store, and that it was not fair to the other merchants of the place that he should have the advantage which the post office gave him over others in the same line of business ; accordingly the office was transferred to a person who was not engaged in any business in competition with any others in the same place.

I. C. R.—EXPENDITURE ON ROLLING STOCK.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), whether his attention has been called to the question I asked the day before yesterday respecting the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, then, I would ask the hon. gentleman if he will kindly look up "Hansard," and let me know to-morrow.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE YUKON.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assinibola). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say, as I see the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in his place, that the reply he gave me—and if necessary, I will put myself in order—on the third reading of the Dominion Lands Amendment Act was unsatisfactory, taken in connection with the fact that in all other things we have been promised in the North-west Territories, we have been disappointed. The hon. Minister told us that nothing will be done in regard to what is a vital question at this moment in the North-west Territories, namely, the settlement of the seed grain indebtedness and the seed grain liens. The hon. Minister told us, when he took charge of his department, that he would insist on having a free hand, and there can be little doubt that he has had a free hand. Three sessions have passed away since the hon. gentleman took charge of that department, and an important question like that is not settled, an important question like the elevator question is not settled, and, more than all, the promises that were made to us respecting relief, as regards implements, have not been kept. The North-west Territories and Manitoba feel that the hon. Minister has treated them badly in all these things. All these things have been treated with "to-morrow" or "next session," and there is naturally a great sense of disappointment and a sense of disappointment that has been expressed, Mr. Speaker, by the leading paper in the North-west Territories on the Government side, regarding one of these important questions. To crown all, on a vast tract of these territories still remains a cloud of obloquy that there is no intention, apparently, of having cleared away. Although we are into the dog days there is sufficient time yet before this session closes, if the hon. Minister wishes to direct his attention to some of these matters, such, for instance, as the seed grain question, to accomplish something. If the hon. Minister will direct his attention to this matter alone something may still be done through a brief Bill that could be passed rapidly through all its stages to confer an inestimable boon upon the Territories.

Now, Sir, it is not merely that, but as I say, and as the newspapers there feel, over what amounts to a vast kingdom belonging to Canada there is a cloud unremoved, and yesterday in the "Star" is published a cablegram giving the leading article from the London "Times" on this question. After some complimentary reference to the Prime Minister, the London "Times" says :

We have less hesitation in expressing regret at the rather serious mistake which the Canadian Government seem to have committed within the last few days.

On Wednesday Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, son of the well-known Dominion statesman, who is now one of the few surviving fathers of confederation, brought very grave charges of incompetence, neglect and corruption against certain officials employed in the Yukon district.

The charges are not new so far as their general features are concerned.

Nearly a year ago our special correspondent in the Klondike declared that they were widely made and believed in by the population on the spot, natives and Americans alike.

We were told that the officials were accused not merely of incapacity but of a pecuniary corruption.

Mr. DAVIN.

The facts stated by our correspondent, from her personal observation, were sufficient to prove that at least the administration was suspiciously bad, and that a searching investigation by competent and impartial commissioners was required.

A commissioner of high reputation was appointed, but, whatever his other qualifications, he can hardly be said to have possessed the judicial experience desirable for such a post.

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, who held the offices of Attorney General and Minister of Justice in the late Government, repeated these accusations in the House, and alleged that Mr. Sifton, the present Minister of the Interior, was personally responsible.

He moved for an inquiry and a Royal Commission, and offered his own unpaid services as Crown prosecutor. We do not say that the charges are true, still less that any of the individuals named by Sir Hibbert are guilty; but it certainly seems regrettable that a matter so serious should have been treated by the Laurier Government as a strictly party question.

The Minister of the Interior fell back on Mr. Ogilvie's report, which is still incomplete, and that it was the duty of the Cabinet not to resign their political responsibility to a commission of judges.

There is, perhaps, something to be said for this position from a purely constitutional standpoint, but the Government would have been better advised had they shown a deeper sense of the serious character of the charge and the necessity of meeting it.

The right hon. the Prime Minister will remember that some twenty-six years ago a similar state of things took place. The newspapers, first of Canada, were filled with strong and vehement charges against the Government of that day, and the London "Times" led the press of England and the press of the continent in making observations almost on all-fours with those which I have had the honour of reading to the House. I need not remind the Prime Minister that to have a paper like the London "Times" bringing this matter thus before the world, calls not merely into question the honour of the Government, but the honour of Canada. What occurred at the time I have referred to? When the member for Shefford, Hon. Mr. Huntingdon, first made his charges, immediately the Prime Minister of the day moved for a committee, and when the work of that committee, for reasons I need not go into, was unsatisfactory, then Lord Dufferin, the Governor General, had a commission of judges appointed in order to inquire into the charges. Remember that the charges which were made at that time against the Government were charges of taking money from a public contractor who had succeeded in getting a public contract, and that that money had gone into electioneering expenses. They were not as serious as the charges which have been flung broadcast in the present instance, and which are that this domain, an entire kingdom, a mighty wealthy district, in fact, a northern Golconda, that the administration of it has been sown with corruption, and that money—money of the citizens of Canada—has been improperly taken and placed in the pockets of people who were violating the trusts reposed in them, and abusing the privileges they had. I will read to the House part of the observations made by Lord Dufferin on the 13th of August, 1873 :

Under these circumstances I have concluded, on the advice of my Ministers, and even if I differed from them as to the policy of such a course, which I do not, it is a point upon which I should be disposed to accept their recommendations to issue a Royal Commission of inquiry to three gentlemen of such legal standing, character and authority as will command the confidence of the public, by virtue of the powers conferred upon me by the Act Vict. 31, chap. 38. On the other hand, I have determined, in proroguing Parliament, to announce to the members of both Houses my intention of their assembling immediately the commission in question shall have concluded their labours. By these means an opportunity will be afforded for preliminary expurgation of these unhappy matters before a tribunal competent to take evidence on oath. Ample opportunities will be given to the members of the more distant provinces to make their preparations, in view of an autumnal session, and within two months or ten weeks from this date a full Parliament of Canada will take supreme and final cognizance of the case now pending between my Ministers and their accusers.

And, Sir, the view that was stated some time ago by the Victoria "Times," a Liberal newspaper, holds good to-day :

In the opinion of the "Times," the course which the Government should take is quite clear. All charges should be thoroughly investigated, and by a commission having the confidence of the country. The Government and not the Opposition, must take the lead in prosecuting such an investigation. If officials have done wrong, they should be exposed and punished, it matters not what their politics or by whom appointed. Now that direct charges have been formulated on the floor of Parliament by a prominent member of the House, nothing short of an exhaustive inquiry by a non-partisan commission will properly meet the situation. The investigation by Mr. Ogilvie may be good enough in its way—his findings may be absolutely fair and just, and cover the whole ground ; but partisan politicians, who think more of making a point against the Government than of reforming abuses, will not accept them as final. An investigation that does not silence criticism has failed in its object.

Now, Sir, I had expected, when the Government voted down the resolution a few days ago calling for an inquiry, that ere this we should have heard that steps had been taken to have such an inquiry as Lord Dufferin obtained some 26 years ago ; and I saw in one of the papers—I think it was the Montreal "Star"—a call made on the Governor General for a Royal Commission, whether the Ministry wished it or not. In that connection I want to read one or two sentences written by Mr. Goldwin Smith in 1873, which voiced the sentiments of a vast number of the people of Canada. He wrote as follows :—

But the doctrine that the sovereign can do no wrong, which we all loyally accept as applied to the acts of Her Majesty, is applicable to the acts of Her Majesty alone. All her officers, from the Prime Minister of the Empire downwards, and governors of colonies among the rest, are responsible for their use of their powers, amenable to the censorship of public opinion, and in the last resort liable to removal from their offices for maladministration.

He is arguing that the Governor General was responsible to the Empire, to the home Government, and to the people of this country, for seeing that charges in nature like those that have been made now for more than a year against the administration of my hon. friend in the Yukon district, should not be slurred over. Again, he says :

We hold that it was a case in which the Governor General might most properly have put to his Ministers the very simple question which the published evidence suggested, and in default of a perfectly satisfactory answer have told them that he could no longer incur the responsibility of retaining them as the advisers of the Crown. Such, we incline to believe, would have been the decision of men of the character of Pitt, Castlereagh, Canning, Wellington, Grey or Peel. This is not a trial for larceny or an action of ejectment. It is a moral not a legal, question. It is a question whether, in view of certain disclosures, the persons now in power are morally fit to remain heads of the nation and advisers of the Crown. Lord Melville, on the strength of far less damaging disclosures, was removed from office and struck off the Privy Council before the commencement of the judicial impeachment which, through the leniency of the court, ended in his acquittal.

Here is another sentence, and I commend it especially to the Prime Minister :

Of the two modes of inquiry, a committee of the House of Commons and a Royal Commission, we avow our decided preference for the latter, supposing that it can be invested with sufficient powers, and provided that it be appointed "with the full consent of Parliament," to use the words of Mr. Gladstone with reference to the Royal Commission recently appointed to inquire into the subject brought before the legislature by Mr. Plim-soll.

And again :

Another obvious condition is that, in any case affecting the personal conduct of Ministers, the commissioners shall be nominated, not by the accused, but by the Governor General himself, with such disinterested advice as he may be able to obtain. If the legal action of Privy Councillors in this or any other matter is required, there are Privy Councillors who are not Ministers.

And so on. The whole trend of the argument of that powerful paper, written by a publicist who, at that time, had an unimpaired prestige, and who has always had an almost unequalled power of expressing his ideas, is towards establishing a doctrine that compels the Government under the present circumstances to advise the Governor General to issue a Royal Commission ; and, if they fail to do it, that morally compels the Governor General of Canada to insist that a Royal Commission shall be issued. These are matters which affect closely the portion of the country whence I come. The first are minor matters, from one point of view, compared with the last subject which I have brought before the House; but they are subjects which touch the North-west closely; and in regard to them, there is still a locus penitentiæ for my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, and I would urge on him to redeem his pledges to the North-west while still there is time in this very Parliament; and I would urge on the Government to see that steps are taken so that this dark cloud which rests on a vast portion of those Territories shall not grow blacker, but that means shall be taken to pierce it, to discover what has caused it, and to punish any persons who may be culpable. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the motion which has just been moved by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is an unwarranted abuse of the privileges of this House. It is a well-known rule of parliamentary government that the motion to adjourn the House should not be resorted to except to bring to the attention of the House some matter of pressing or urgent necessity. If something suddenly occurs to which the attention of Parliament should be called, the motion to adjourn is a proper means of effecting that object. But when a matter has been debated in the House for a long time, as this one has been, and when there is no urgency at the moment, to move the adjournment of the House when we are engaged in an important debate is, I repeat, an unwarranted abuse of the privileges of the House. I may say to my hon. friend, though I would not be lacking in courtesy to any one, that I would not have risen to reply to those remarks, in which he brought up matters which occurred 26 years ago, and which have no relevancy, but for the fact that he cited the opinion of the London "Times"; and I may, perhaps, give to the London "Times" some attention which I would not have given to my hon. friend under different circumstances. The "Times" is a paper which carries great weight and respectability to whatever it says; but we are all familiar with the fact that this is not the first time that the "Times" has been the victim of a hoax. Some few years ago the "Times" was the victim of a very cruel hoax at the hands of a perjurer named Richard Pigott, when it did not hesitate to associate the name of Mr. Parnell with crime in Ireland. There was not the slightest foundation for the accusations then made by the "Times" against Mr. Parnell, who was able to vindicate his character most successfully. All I have to say to my hon. friend on the present occasion is that we have another Richard

Mr. DAVIN.

Pigott, another slanderer in the land, and that the "Times" has once more been made the victim of a hoax, written by somebody from this side of the ocean. The debate on the motion of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was concluded on Thursday last, and the editorial in the "Times" appeared yesterday. It was physically impossible that the editor of the "Times" could have had before him the text of the debate that took place in this House when he wrote that article, and, therefore, it was based upon insufficient evidence or on no reliable evidence. When the facts have been placed before the English public, I am not without hope that the "Times" itself will have to recast its judgment on this matter. My hon. friend says that there is a dark cloud on the country, and that we should do something to dissipate it. We have nothing to do at the present time but to let events take care of themselves. Let events go on. This has already largely dissipated the dark cloud. The motion has not even been fully debated, the vote had not been taken, when the dark cloud had been pretty well dissipated, when the suspicion which was sought to be cast on the Minister of the Interior, when all these charges of corruption set forth in the article of the "Times," had been disproved and dispelled.

If anything would show the extreme, the unpardonable levity with which those charges were brought against the Government, it would be an article which we read to-day, not in a Government organ, not in a Liberal paper, but in the Montreal "Gazette." An infamous accusation was made against Judge Dugas. This accusation we refused to submit to a commission of judges. We knew, as did all those who have had dealings with Judge Dugas in the past, his probity and high character, and would not credit any accusation against him unless based on something more than a mere motion, unaccompanied by evidence of any kind. Well, what do we see in the Montreal "Gazette" to-day? We find the editor of the Klondike "Nugget" defending Judge Dugas, and thus there is another cloud removed from the gaze of my hon. friend. Here is what the "Gazette" says:

Vancouver, B.C., July 4.—A. F. George, editor of the "Klondike Nugget," who arrived in Vancouver with the Heywood-Trotter party of Yukoners, was seen last evening and talked freely of things in the far north. He said: "The story of Sir Hibbert Tupper's late attack upon Judge Dugas, of the Supreme Bench of the Yukon, is all news to us, and has shocked us immeasurably. I, myself, as editor of the 'Nugget,' have, as you know, been very active in the agitation in the Yukon for fair regulations and honest administration, but I want to say right here, if you will allow me, that the judge's record up there is above reproach or even the breath of suspicion. He has earned the admiration, respect and esteem of every man with whom he has been thrown in contact. Sir Hibbert has been badly misled in this case, and the Yukoners, in whose interests the agitation has supposedly been maintained, will be much exercised to learn of the attack upon a man whom they have come to regard as the one strong arm between them and wrong. Since Judge Dugas's incumbency, the alien population of the Yukon has acquired an immense respect for British law and its courts, while the Canadians point to him proudly as a sample of what manner of men Canada can furnish when in a favourable mood. I talk strongly on this matter, for a great injustice has been done, and I can verify everything I say from the returning Yukoners, who will now be arriving at Vancouver every few days since we have pioneered the way. By the way, I am surprised that others have not come out this way before, for it is time saved to all eastern points, as well as by connecting with trains to Seattle."

Now, what a mistake would we not have made, had we agreed to accept the motion moved by the hon. member for Pictou? We would have consented to an inquiry into the conduct of a man who receives the certificate of character from one who was most active in the agitation regarding the administration of the Yukon. The cloud is, therefore, dissipated upon this point, and my hon. friend need not have any anxiety with regard to the other points, for I venture to say, the more light is thrown on the subject, the more rapidly will the clouds roll away.

In conclusion, let me repeat what I have already said on another occasion. We have ordered an inquiry into the charges made upon the Yukon administration. Possibly, wrong has been done in the Yukon, and we have no intention of shielding any one. We have ordered an inquiry, which we hope will prove thorough. We have only received part of the report of the commissioner, and another part is now on its way. Again, I repeat, if the inquiry we have ordered is not sufficient, another one will be ordered, so as to have every item probed to the bottom, and every delinquent punished, if delinquents there are.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). The House will have listened with a good deal of surprise to the statements of the right hon. First Minister. I challenge in the outset his statement that my hon. friend the member for West Assiniboia abused his privilege of making this motion on the present occasion. The hon. gentleman says that it is an abuse of the privilege which a member has, on the Orders of the Day being called, to make a motion for the adjournment of the House, unless for the purpose of bringing up something of grave importance that cannot possibly wait. I will undertake to say that those who will search the parliamentary records, will find that the right hon. gentleman himself has again and again moved, under similar circumstances, the adjournment, and without half the grounds that my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) had on this occasion. I had no knowledge whatever that my hon. friend was going to bring the matter he did before the House. I had not received the slightest intimation that it was to be brought up to-day, nor was I at all prepared for it; but when the right hon. gentleman says that this motion is an abuse of privilege, he is bound to produce his authority, and I will not only meet whatever authority he may bring, but will give a dozen instances in which the right hon. gentleman himself took advantage of this privilege. The right hon. gentleman has abused to a ten times greater extent the privilege of making a motion to adjourn, which is given to members in order to deal with any subject that is of importance, in their judgment. The subject does not necessarily require to be important. So long as the hon. member believes, in his own judgment, that it is his duty to submit his views on any question, the forms of the House provide that, on a motion to adjourn, he can do so.

Why does the right hon. gentleman exhibit so much heat on this occasion? Why does he propound a rule that has no existence in the government of this House? It is because he is extremely tender at the present moment, because he occupies a very extraordinary position on this question. He speaks in contemptuous terms of the "Times" newspaper. He says that its editor has been the subject of a hoax, because, as this debate only concluded a few days ago, it is impossible he can have been correctly informed of what took place. Does the hon. gentleman forget that this subject was brought to the notice of the House by the speech from the hon. member for Pictou and the long discussion which followed, and which weeks ago has been in the hands of the "Times" newspaper? I do not wonder that the right hon. gentleman shrinks from the attack of his friend the "Times" newspaper. Everybody knows that it is part of the policy of that great organ of public opinion to give the Government of the day all the support and assistance it can properly give it, and the right hon. gentleman knows that never was there a party more indebted than the Government and party now in office to the London "Times" for the strong support which again and again they have received from that great organ of public opinion. The hon. gentleman knows that nothing but the strongest possible circumstances could impel the London "Times," as matters now stand, to attack him, and to attack the Government of which he is the head; that nothing but an overwhelming sense of the public importance of such an act, nothing but the strongest possible conviction on the part of that great organ of public opinion that the Government had forgotten what was due to themselves when they voted down a motion for an independent judicial inquiry into the facts that have rendered Canada notorious throughout the civilized world, could have induced them to publish such an article. Now, Sir, what information had the "Times"? They had before them the fact that, weeks ago, when challenged, when these matters were discussed and ventilated in this House, the Government—aye, and the Government supporters—refused to support a motion for a thorough investigation, but gave it the go-by, by moving an amendment stating that they were satisfied with the commission that had been issued. But that was qualified by the Government and the Government's supporters, stating that if the present investigation was not satisfactory, they would insist upon a commission, they would require such an independent—I will not say judicial, but it carries that with it—such an independent commission of inquiry as would satisfy in the fullest and most complete manner the necessities of this case. But has that been done? Why, Sir, the right hon. gentleman knows, and no doubt the "Times" newspaper, with its sources of information, knows, that this very commissioner was dependent upon the Government, this man who is connected by close ties of relationship with the gentleman who is primarily responsible for the administration of the Yukon—this dependent relative of the Minister of the Interior—has himself declared that the commission with which he is entrusted is altogether insufficient. The Government had it in the very evidence published and placed in the hands of this House, this declaration by their own commissioner regretting the fact that his hands are so tied that he is unable to give that complete examination to the subject that is required, and the statement made by the commissioner himself that he has applied to the Government to enlarge his powers so as to enable him to do his duty. And yet, what does the right hon. gentleman do? Challenged as no Government in this country or any other country ever was challenged, they shrank from the challenge to have an independent judicial investigation. They could have an investigation by judges appointed by themselves, and selected by themselves, but known as men of standing and independent character. Challenged to have the conduct of several Ministers, but especially that of the Minister of the interior, who is charged with such gross incapacity and neglect and corruption on the part, at all events, of the improperly selected and badly qualified officials that he had sent into that country—they evaded that challenge by the declaration before this House and before this country, that if the present investigation was not found sufficient they would have an independent and satisfactory investigation made. And now I say that the Government, in refusing to implement that undertaking, have pleaded guilty to the indictment. That is the position in which they stand. They themselves declared that if the investigation was not found to be a complete and sufficient means of vindicating the character and reputation of this Government and the officials against charges of wrong-doing, they would see to it that means were provided of fastening crimes on those who were criminal and punishing them; that they would satisfy the country; that, to use the words of the right hon. gentleman himself, they would probe this matter to the bottom and let the full light of day in upon it. But have they done so? No, Sir. Challenged, I say, in the face of this Parliament, in the face of this country, challenged by an hon. member of this House, whose standing, position and character are second to those of no man who ever sat in this Parliament—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say, Sir, that no man who ever sat in this House of Parliament has a brighter or more undimmed record than the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). And, when this blatant challenge was flung across the House, that, if anybody would take the responsibility of making a charge, that charge would be fully investigated, that hon. gentleman, having attained the standing and position in this House, this country, this Empire, which he has—for where is the man who has had more flattering communications from the present Chief Justice of England and the Attorney General of England, gentlemen on opposite sides of politics congratulating him on the distinction which the Crown has conferred upon him?—accepted this challenge of these hon. gentlemen, and said: I place at stake my position in this House; give me a judicial commission, select the judges yourself, and I will give my own time without the slightest remuneration, I will give my time and attention to establish the truth of these charges. That challenge flung down by the First Minister, was repeated in blatant terms by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). But when the challenge was taken up, these hon. gentlemen, overwhelmed with the mass of testimony that they knew could be adduced from many sources in this country, from hundreds of men of the highest character and the highest standing that would abundantly prove every charge that has been brought against these gentlemen, resorted to mere sophistry. They met this acceptance of their challenge with one of the most childish sophistries that any member of Parliament ever ventured to use in this House. "Why," they said, "who ever heard of a Minister being put on trial before judges." That was the ground taken by the hon. Minister of the Interior, who shrank—naturally and properly shrank, knowing what he knew would be the result—from that investigation by an independent commission. And that was then taken up and echoed by the First Minister, who backed up his colleague, backed up the man who was assailed. Charged as not a man in this House has ever been charged before, the Minister of the Interior was backed up by the First Minister stating that it was inconsistent with British parliamentary practice to put the Government of a country on trial before judges. Nobody pretended to suggest such a thing. The Government were not to be put upon their trial before judges. But what was proposed was in accordance with the precedents of this House and of Parliament, again and again repeated—and that was that when a charge, a grave charge, was brought, an independent judicial commission was appointed to investigate; not to deal with the case, not to punish, not to turn the Minister out of office, but to ascertain the facts, to report those facts to Parliament, and let the Parliament deal with them. And yet there was the evasion, an evasion that could only spring from conscious guilt, that was resorted to by the Minister of the Interior, backed up by the First Minister, who found he could in that way obtain the cheers of hon. gentlemen who sit behind him, and who seem to be unwilling to part with gentlemen on the front benches, as they feared they would have to do if this commission was allowed.

Now, Sir, what have we to-day? When members of this House ventured to refer to Mr. George, the editor of the "Nugget" as a person who was acquainted with the facts and who had come from the Yukon, who had given certain information not only to the press there but to members of Parliament here, he was met with a peal of derision. The editor of the "Nugget," indeed! This is the style of man, this Yankee renegade, this is the style of person that you expect us to pay attention to and to give credence to. Why, the story was at once started that he had asked for $8,000 from the Conservative party for the purpose of maintaining him in his position to give evidence. So far as I am aware, no man connected with the Conservative party ever showed the slightest indication of having been approached. I am not aware that such a proposition was ever made, but if it was made it was treated with contempt. Not a single dollar was ever contributed, directly or indirectly, by the Conservative party or any member connected with it, so far as I am aware, in connection with the matter. But when gentlemen came here and over their own signatures made statements to members of Parliament which they had previously made in the strongest terms in the public press of the country, we felt it was sufficient justification to bring that matter to the notice of the House. Now, all that the hon. gentleman wants to clear Judge Dugas and to cover the Opposition with confusion in relation to these charges, is this magnificent evidence he has got of Mr. George, editor of the "Nugget." Why, Sir, three months ago he was a low Yankee speculator who was looking for somebody to buy him. Now he reappears on the scene, and having found there was no Conservatives prepared to invest a dollar in him, directly or indirectly, he comes as a champion of the great king of the Klondike, Mr. Alexander McDonald. I leave the hon. gentleman to infer what his inspiration is.

Mr. TAYLOR. Who bought him?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not say he has been bought, but I say that hon. gentlemen opposite said that he was a purchasable commodity, hon. gentlemen opposite discredited anything he could say on the ground that he was a purchasable commodity; and if that be so, is it at all unlikely that, having met with no purchaser on the Conservative side, the king of the Klondike might possibly be induced, in a matter in which he was attacked and his right questioned to a great property that was handed over, one of the most important charges—I say is it at all unlikely that he may have been led to see himself in a somewhat different light? But when did he arrive in Vancouver? Has he the facts before him? Does he know what the member for Pictou said in reference to Judge Dugas? There is no proof of that. But there is proof that the right hon. gentleman, unable to defend himself, unable to defend his Government, and especially unable to defend the Minister of the Interior, found it was easier to defend the judges of the Supreme Court than the men sitting on the Treasury benches. That was the position. The hon. gentleman knows that Judge Dugas was never assailed as a judge. Had he been so assailed, my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) has given proof to the House of its being a perfectly right and legitimate thing for the highest judge in the Empire to be attacked on the floor of the House of Commons and driven out of office, as was the case with one of the most brilliant Lord Chancellors that ever occupied the woolsack in England.

Now, Sir, the first plea of my hon. friend was: You cannot appoint a commission of judges to sit in trial upon the case. Granted, but you can, if you are not afraid of obtaining independent testimony, secure any men holding high and responsible positions, holding the independent position of judges of the Supreme and higher courts of Canada, to take the evidence and to put that evidence in the hands of Parliament as their report of what they have ascertained to be the facts, and let Parliament deal with the Government. So away goes the first story. Then away goes the second, when my hon.

friend from Westmoreland shows that when Lord Westbury was Lord Chancellor, one of the most brilliant men that ever sat on the woolsack, and when he was accused of favouring his relations, accused of partiality, accused as Lord High Chancellor of England of conduct that was not becoming in a judge, and which laid him open to attack, the House of Commons took that up, and Lord Palmerston, who I presume knew as much of constitutional and parliamentary government as the right hon. gentleman does, not only allowed the attack to be made upon the Lord Chancellor of England, but allowed a resolution condemning his action to be carried, calling upon him to resign his seat. So away goes the second story. Judge Dugas, the moment he took an official position outside of his judicial character altogether, that of a member of the North-west Council, is as open to attack as the right hon. gentleman or any other man in this House. If that were not so, what would happen? If you wanted to screen a judge from public censure and public examination of his acts in this House, you would only have to appoint him a member of the executive council, and no man in this House could say a word or move an indictment of him. Sir, that is not the doctrine of Parliament, that is not British parliamentary doctrine, that is not the practice of the Imperial Government, nor of any country where parliamentary government exists. You have chosen to take, Judge Dugas out of his position as a judge, and to charge him with official duties which render him as much amenable to censure in this House, if he should deserve it, as the humblest individual in the whole country. Therefore, your second defence falls to the ground, is swept aside as a mere cobweb, brought here for the purpose of protecting gentlemen who have no argument, who are unable to justify their position, or to protect themselves from that parliamentary inquiry that is demanded in this Canada of ours, if any inquiry was ever demanded in the history of any other country. Well, Sir, what next? We had a Minister of the Interior, that admirable Minister of the Interior who the hon. gentleman turned round and declared had endeared himself to the hearts of every Liberal by the assaults of his opponents. Well, Sir, do hon. gentlemen behind the Ministers take the ground that any crime may be committed by a gentleman on the front benches, and that he is to be taken to their bosoms as an admirable Minister the moment he is attacked for improper conduct by the Opposition in this House?

Mr. GIBSON. Because the charges were not true.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I tell the hon. member for Lincoln that it is because he knew the charges were true, it is because the hon. gentlemen knew that their Government was gone if they granted this inquiry.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

It was on that ground that the London "Times" is compelled to declare that they have been badly advised when they refused an independent inquiry, demanded as every intelligent man in the British realm knows it is, that knows anything of these circumstances. The hon. gentleman brought up the question of Mr. Parnell's trial. Well, what took place? The "Times," he says, was misled. So it was; I admit that, but the fact that the "Times" was misled did not prevent an inquiry. When Mr. Parnell, that great man, who so long held such undisputed sway in Ireland, was attacked and assailed by the London "Times," he was not such a coward as to shelter himself behind a miserable pretext and not to immediately challenge an investigation on the floor of the Parliament of the country. The reason was that Mr. Parnell was not guilty. Therein lies the difference. Parnell could afford to challenge inquiry, because, in his conscious innocence, he knew that he was prepared to meet his opponents in open court, in the face of day, and with the strongest and ablest defence that could be adduced by anybody standing his trial. Do you mean to say that if these hon. gentlemen had felt that they were in that position, they would not have had a judicial commission now appointed and now charged with the duty of investigating this subject and probing it to the bottom? Hon. gentlemen have not heard the last of this. The London "Times," the Great Thunderer, is weak and impotent compared with the voice of the independent electorate of Canada. These hon. gentlemen, willingly or unwillingly, will have to stand at the bar of public opinion to be tried in the light of the evidence such as has already been produced and such as will be enough, and is enough, to carry conviction, and unmistakable conviction, to the heart and conscience of every independent elector in this country who reads the evidence that is already produced. Notwithstanding the declaration of the gentlemen and the friends behind them, that if the commission was not found to be able to deal with the matter, a commission entrusted to a dependent relative of one who is connected with this transaction, to a gentleman closely connected with him, they will appoint an independent commission, the time has come when we are able to adduce evidence, and the gentleman entrusted with the commission, deploring the fact, that he is not in a position to do justice to this great question. He has reported to the Government, and he has asked the Government to so enlarge his powers, or provide for such an independent investigation, as would meet the case. I do not intend to go into the conduct of that investigation further than to say: How can hon. gentlemen opposite require more and higher and stronger testimony, as to the absolute necessity of their vindication and the vindication of the fair fame of Canada, than that which is presented to them by their own officer when they charged him with a duty that he is unable to perform, when the facts, already brought out, brand the strongest asseverations of the hon. Minister of the Interior, the right hon. Prime Minister, and other hon. gentlemen who took part in this discussion, as unwarranted, and when they stand in the position that their own commissioner has declared, and the fact has been shown, that he cannot do justice to the subject? Yet, where is the commission? The commission is asked for, not by the Liberal party in the House of Commons, but by every independent Conservative that sits on the floor of the House of Commons, strengthened and aided and supported by three hon. gentlemen who would not permit their names and characters and reputations to be dragged in the dirt, as they must be, at the heels of the Government who have pleaded guilty. I say that the Government stand in this position to-day, that you have no alternative. You are on the horns of this dilemma; you must now at once appoint that independent judicial commission and give Canada the means of clearing her reputation from the foulest stigma, that by the maladministration of public affairs, has besmirched the fair fame of Canada, or be held by every independent elector of this country, guilty of everything that has been charged against you. That is the position, and I leave it for hon. gentlemen to choose whichever horn of the dilemma they please.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Mr. Speaker, it is gratifying indeed to the House, and, I am sure, to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, to find that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) comes to the rescue of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). The first hon. member on the Opposition side of the House that has said a word in favour of the hon. member for Pictou is the hon. leader of the Opposition. The hon. member who brought up this motion (Mr. Davin) never said a word in reference to that hon. gentleman, and in that debate in which the hon. member for Pictou spoke 22 hours, in which he presented all the fiction that he could possibly collect, only 29 members of the Conservative party would demean themselves to vote for the resolution he moved. Where was the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) when that hon. gentleman brought in his charges? Where was the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) when the hon. gentleman brought in his charges and when the division bell rang? These hon. gentlemen thought too much of their reputations to come and vote for a scurrilous lot of accusations such as those made by the hon. member for Pictou. Talk about combinations in the House; we have them—the Tupper and Tupper combination. It is the only combination on that side. When I heard the hon. leader of the Opposition speaking to-day in defence of the hon. member for Pictou, and when no other hon. member of the House attempted to do it, I thought it was much to be regretted that no other hon. gentleman was so poor as to do him reverence. The hon. member for Pictou made his second speech and ran away again. Where is he to-day? He is not in the House. He turned away from the frown of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. If the great Thunderer only knew that, after his 22 hours of speaking, on the Opposition side of the House, only 29 hon. members would so demean themselves as to support the statements that were made in the resolution and which were proved to be false before they were submitted to the House, it would not have much confidence in what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, I would not have said anything on the present occasion—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh. oh.

Mr. SPROULE. Hon. gentlemen may laugh. They are laughing at their own shame, but they will be held responsible when the day of judgment comes. I would not have spoken, but for the statement made by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), that members of the Conservative party deserted the impeachment that was made against certain Ministers of the Crown on that occasion. As one of the members of that party, I desire to say that I did not desert the party, nor did I desert the impeachment that was made on that occasion, because I believe it is right. I believe that it was one of the strongest indictments, or impeachments, ever made against Ministers of the Crown during my 21 years of parliamentary experience.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why did you not vote?

Mr. SPROULE. I believed that it would be impossible for any Governor General, or for his advisers, entrusted with the public administration of affairs, to ignore an impeachment of that kind. I did not think it possible that the debate could be closed so early as it was, or that it could be brought to an end by the hon. Minister of the Interior and his friends inside of the time that the division was reached. I thought there would be plenty of time, as I believed the debate would be considered of such importance that it would take two or three days at least, and I intended to speak on it. That was the reason for my being absent when the division was taken. I hold that any member in this House who rises to defend the Minister of the Interior or the Government in refusing to issue that independent commission, which would report to Parliament, is condoning offences which are regarded as most destructive of the fair reputation of Canada. I, for one, did not consider that the Government would dare to refuse that commission, or would dare to vote it down. What is the nature of the impeachment? It is an impeachment that has few parallels even in the long history of the British Parliament, as to the enormity of the offences charged. The impeachment involves four responsible Ministers of the Crown. It is to the effect that the first of them was not only involved in it through the conduct of his own officials, but that he was involved in it indirectly by his own conduct as well. If that evidence which is already taken, holds good for anything, the allegation is made there that the late partners of the Minister were trafficking in dredging leases, in which, according to the statement of his own partner to another whom he endeavoured to get interested in it, the Minister of the Interior and the Gold Commissioner are interested in this case, although for obvious reasons their names cannot appear. If that allegation holds good, and we have nothing to prove to the contrary, then I say that the Minister is directly interested in the charges himself. And, with that charge hanging over his Ministers, the Prime Minister should not hold them in their positions one day, unless they clear themselves at the earliest possible moment. Did they make an attempt to clear themselves? Did they allow an independent commission to be appointed? No. It is a matter of surprise to me, and will ever be a matter of surprise to me, that the Governor General should retain these men as his responsible advisers with that dark cloud hanging over them, and without an effort being made on their part to clear themselves. I believe that if Lord Dufferin was here, they would not remain his advisers one week, and I am justified in that statement by the language of Lord Dufferin read to the House to-day with reference to the Pacific scandal.

Is it to be wondered at that we should feel some alarm at the condition of affairs now existing in Canada when the Government are obliged to call to their rescue the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), whose son is one charged, or, if not charged, at least connected with it in such a way—not to his discredit, because there is nothing said against him—but showing that he is indirectly an interested party. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Landerkin) comes to their rescue to-day and tries to bolster up one of the most rotten acts of a rotten Government. I regarded that motion of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) as a motion of great importance, and to my mind it was so important that I believed the debate could not possibly be ended in such a short time. I thought it would be followed up by one of the most vigorous debates that ever took place in this Parliament, and, believing that I would have ample time before the debate closed to speak in favour of it and to vote in favour of it, I was unfortunately accidentally absent when the vote was taken. I can tell the House that I would gladly have voted for the motion of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and spoken in favour of it, had I been present. I cannot understand, and the country cannot understand, why the Ministers voted that motion down, if they were not afraid to meet the charges hanging over their heads. Surely, if there was nothing to be kept in the dark, they would themselves seek the earliest inquiry by a respectable, and responsible, and independent tribunal. In view of their action in voting that down, they stand to-day condemned before public opinion as being afraid to meet these charges. Their conduct justifies all the suspicion that either the London "Times" or any other respectable newspaper can entertain with regard to them. The conduct of the Government justifies the suspicion and belief that the administration of their officials in the Yukon was rotten from beginning to end, that these officials were men of incapacity, men of no integrity, men of no honour, men unsuited for the duties which the Minister of the Interior appointed them to discharge. In my judgment, when the time comes, the voice of the country will speak out with no uncertain sound in condemnation of the conduct of the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the House with regard to that question. Sir, the last of this is not heard to-day in this House nor in the country. When the time comes that the electorate can express their verdict upon it, it will be a sorrowful day in the history of the career as politicians of these gentlemen opposite. When that day comes, they will be convicted and condemned by the people of Canada for their conduct in refusing to allow a proper inquiry into their maladministration of the Yukon.

Mr. HAGGART. I thank the hon. member from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) for the opportunity which he has afforded me in putting my opinion on record with reference to the motion of my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). I held the same opinion as the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that there would be no vote that evening upon the question, and to put myself right before the country and before my constituents, I wish to say that I certainly should have supported and voted for the motion of the hon. member (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). I listened with a good deal of attention to the remarks made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) in support of his motion, and I listened with a good deal of attention to the defence made by the Minister of the Interior, and, before this session closes, I shall take the opportunity of bringing before the House some of the statements made in reference to that matter. I intended on that occasion to give my reasons for not being here when the vote was taken, but I none the less thank the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) for giving me the opportunity of stating that I cordially approve of the motion of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper).

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The House will no doubt accept the statement of the hon. gentlemen (Mr. Sproule and Mr. Haggart) as to how they would have voted, but they themselves will not find fault with us if we entertain the opinion that on that occasion they did not display as much zeal to record their votes as they have on other occasions. I shall not enter upon a general discussion of this question, because as has been well said by the Prime Minister, the bringing of the matter up in this form is somewhat of an abuse of the rules of Parliament. The leader of the Opposition has very strongly disputed that position, but without quoting any direct authorities to prove it, I think the common sense of hon. gentlemen should teach them that the proceeding is somewhat irregular. When a question has been debated in the House at great length, fully and exhaustively, on a substantive motion, after notice, for the purpose of bringing the question before the House, it seems to me that it would be in accordance with the judgment of almost any hon. member to say that it was not a reasonable or desirable proceeding to spring that question on the House again. No possible object could be served by hon. gentlemen on that side of the House repeating the speeches they made the other day, nor in my hon. friends on this side repeating what they said, because that is what a debate, if it took place to-day, would resolve itself into. I think the only possible purpose that could be served by raising a discussion to-day would be simply to cause a repetition of the positions taken by both sides of the House in the former debate. I do not imagine that my hon. friend from Western Assinibola (Mr. Davin) thinks that after a question of this kind has been thoroughly and exhaustively discussed in the Canadian House of Commons, and after the members of the Government have carefully and deliberately considered the question and taken a position upon it, we are going suddenly to turn round and reverse that position because an English newspaper, on what must necessarily have been a telegraphic summary of what took place, not necessarily correct, we have no means of knowing whether it was correct or not—expresses a contrary opinion. I have no desire to minimize the importance or weight of the position the "Times" newspaper occupies, and justly occupies, throughout the British Empire; but I must say most emphatically that it is not a function of the "Times" newspaper to decide the policy of this Government, especially without that full and accurate knowledge which is necessary to form an intelligent opinion. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friends on the other side of the House will follow the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) in the intimation which he has expressed, that the distinguished personage who now occupies the position of the representative of Her Majesty in this country, is not capable of properly performing the functions of his office. If I understood the statement of the hon. member for East Grey, it was to the effect that if Lord Dufferin had occupied the position, a different and in his judgment, a more proper course would have been taken. I apprehend that this House will not approve of that suggestion of the hon. gentleman, and I fancy that the hon. gentleman himself, after consideration, will not repeat the statement which intimates that there has been anything in the conduct of His Excellency to warrant any reflection on the part of any hon. member of this House.

That which has called me to my feet more particularly is a certain phase of this question which appears constantly and regularly whenever it is discussed by any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House or in any part of the press which supports them. It is this. It will be noticeable that in all these discussions there is a vein of insinuation which seems to take it for granted that some personal charge has been made against some member of this Government; and a deliberate and determined attempt is made to create the impression that although charges have been made, an investigation of those charges has been refused. That is the attempt which has been made, and it is being made to-day. The hon. gentleman who brought this matter before the House read a precedent, but it was a precedent in a case where the most grave and scandalous charges of malfeasance in office and personal corruption were made against members of a government. The memory of the hon. gentleman is short, for it is within the memory of this House that the other day when I reached that point of the resolution of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), I said: "If the hon. gentleman has any charge of that kind to make, let him make it, and we will have an investigation within 15 minutes." I repeat that statement to-day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. By a committee of this House.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I say I made that statement when the hon. member for Pictou was in the House. Sir, I cannot keep that hon. member here; it is quite impossible for me to keep him here; it is not my business to keep him here; and if there is no person on the other side of the House who is prepared to vouch for him or carry on his proceedings, his proceedings must go by default.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That is not my fault nor the fault of the Government. I then and there challenged him, as I had challenged the hon. leader of the Opposition when this question came up before, to make any charge of any kind reflecting on me personally or in the discharge of my duty, and I said that it would be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections within 15 minutes after the charge was made. That was the challenge I made, and I repeat it now. As I pointed out when discussing the resolution of the hon. member for Pictou, we have a studied attempt to create the impression on the minds of the members of this House, and upon people who read that resolution in the country, that a personal charge has been made when it has not been made. I brought that matter to a point by then and there challenging the hon. gentleman to make a charge, and I challenge him and his party to make it now; and I say that if they want an investigation, they will get it, and get it in the least possible time; and I apprehend that the result of the investigation will not be satisfactory to them. I call attention to that in order to emphasize the fact that these gentlemen do not discuss this question fairly. Whenever they make charges against officials, they mix them with insinuations against the Government. I repeat that if any charges can be made against the Government or any member of the Government, which implicate us in improper conduct of any kind, we will send the charge to an investigating committee without any delay whatever, and every possible facility will be given for the production of papers and witnesses, and everything will be done to make the investigation as thorough and complete as possible. I am unable to understand on what ground the suggestion has been made that a charge has been made against this Government or against any member of it and an investigation refused. I repudiate that suggestion. We stand prepared to investigate any charge that may be made. But the hon. gentleman has failed to take up that challenge, and I venture to say that he will endeavour to get away from it by a side wind, as has been done ever since this question was first raised.

The hon. leader of the Opposition referred to the course which had been taken by the hon. member for Pictou in staking his reputation upon the statements which were contained in his resolution, and in offering to resign his seat and politically to efface himself as a public man if he did not substantiate his statements. Sir, I marvel at the audacity of the hon. gentleman, if anything the hon. gentleman could say would surprise me or any other member of this House. The hon. member for Pictou solemnly produced his resolution, made there statement after statement, and said he would prove those statements or politically efface himself; and here in this Chamber I proved conclusively that he had falsified the record. So that he stands convicted now of having failed to carry out the pledge he made, because if he had been prepared to carry out his pledge in good faith, he would have resigned there and then.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House laugh. I do not wonder that they laugh. I felt inclined to laugh too, when the hon. gentleman made that statement. They take it as a joke that we should consider that the hon. member for Pictou was serious when he made the proposition that he would resign. It was shown to be a joke, because when the question came up, and statement after statement which he made was shown to be false, did he have any idea of resigning or implementing the pledge which he had solemnly made to this House? Why, Sir, he did just what hon. gentlemen opposite have done; he treated it as a joke, and if we had had an investigation, and the hon. gentleman had failed, as he would have, to make out a single substantial charge, would he then have been any more likely to resign? Not in the least. We would have had him laughing and treating the whole matter as a joke, just as he does now. I can hardly conceive that the hon. leader of the Opposition is serious in the suggestion that this Government is taking a wrong position when it says that such statements as were made in certain portions of the resolution of the hon. member for Pictou should not be referred for investigation to a commission of judges. Is it possible that the hon. gentleman takes the position, or that any member of the House would take the position, that a charge of neglect or delay or of maladministration in the Government of the country, should be referred to a commission of judges to investigate and report. Why, it is the function of Parliament to do that. No member of any Government that respected itself, that has the least conception of the principles of the constitution under which we live would ever think of allowing a proceeding of that kind to be taken.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If the charge is made that a certain person, be he simply a member of Parliament or of the Government as well, did a certain thing which is alleged to be a dishonest or corrupt act, it is for Parliament to decide whether they will send that to a committee or to a judge. But no such statement has been made with regard to any member of the Government. The charges made were purely political and not personal, and I venture to say that no member of the House would suggest that political attacks should be referred to a commission of judges for adjudication or report.

My principal object in rising was to point out again the attempt constantly made in this question to confuse the issue, and lead the public to believe that hon. gentlemen on the other side have made personal charges against members of the Government. I say they have not done so, and when they are prepared to do so, an investigation will follow in short order.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). If I had any doubt as to the propriety of the course I have taken in bringing this matter before the House, it would have evaporated the moment I heard my right hon. friend, because until I heard him speak here to-day it could never have occurred to me that the Government had determined to take the course it seems now they have decided to adopt. Of course, I saw in that debate, to which I can only refer in a very casual manner, that the Minister of the Interior seemed to think that all he had to do was to defend the actions of his subordinates, no matter how black the crimes with which they were charged, but there was a note in my right hon. friend's speech that led me to hope that the Government was fully alive to its duty. But after the speech of the right hon. gentleman to-day, I am perfectly convinced that it was the duty of any member, who feels on this matter as I do, to take the course I did in order to bring before the House the weighty article of a great journal like the "Times," and also inform the people what is the position taken by the Government in this matter. My right hon. friend began by saying that I have abused the privilege of making a motion to adjourn on the Orders of the Day being called. Does he forget that in 1891, shortly after Sir John Macdonald's death, he, under circumstances that were at that time thought wanton, moved the adjournment of the House when the Orders of the Day were called, in order to discuss the ministerial prospects of the Conservative party. And surely, when charges are made of such importance that an echo, such as that in the "Times," comes all the way across the Atlantic, that is a justification for the course I have taken. What was the defence of my right hon. friend? He resorted to the kind of defence which the Minister of the Interior nearly always makes, and which, though very clever, is but the defence of a special pleader. The Minister of the Interior thinks that if he can take the exact wording of any given charge, without having regard to the gravamen of the charge, he can get a favourable verdict. I can assure him that the conscience of the people will not be satisfied in this way.

Let me call attention to the main defence made by the right hon. First Minister. He read to us an interview with the editor of the "Nugget," in which the editor declares that no charge can be made against Judge Dugas, and the right hon. gentleman says that settles the matter. Surely I need not tell the Prime Minister, who is a lawyer, that a charge made against Judge Dugas may be provable before a commission though the greater editor of the "Nugget" tells a man in an hotel parlour, that he has a high opinion of Judge Dugas. All that the interview which the Prime Minister read with such élan and éclat proves is that Judge Dugas stands high in the estimation of the editor of the "Nugget." But a short time ago the Minister of the Interior and the whole Government stood low in the opinion of that same editor. Then, however, the editor of the "Nugget" was a person of no account, but now, when he comes forward in defence of Judge Dugas, he is a person of the greatest consequence, and his chance conversation dispels a charge made under the solemn circumstances in which that charge and others were made by the hon. member for Pictou.

Let me say with reference to my hon. friend from Pictou, who is not here to-day, that we heard a kind of ring in some of the sentences that fell from my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, as though there might be some fear in the breast of the hon. member for Pictou. Whatever any mortal man might imagine of the hon. member for Pictou, there is one thing that would never be attributed to him, and that is timidity. If there is a man in this House with moral courage, that does not know a quiver or a flaw, it is the hon. member for Pictou. I doubt if there was ever a man, not even his distinguished father, more ready to give or take fight than that same gentleman. The idea that because his business may call him to the Pacific coast, there is any fear in him, is perfectly absurd. Let me say, with reference to the language that fell from the hon. member for South Grey (Dr. Landerkin) that if, in the late debate, I did not refer to the hon. member for Pictou in the same language as did the hon. leader of the Opposition, it was because I felt, as I feel now, that it was wholly unnecessary; there is not a man in the House who does not know that what the leader of the Opposition says of the member for Pictou is true. He has been long in this House, and we know him intimately. We have met him in private and in debate. Hon. gentlemen opposite have crossed swords with him, and his public, just as his private, reputation stands absolutely without a stain. He wears on his breast the honours of his sovereign, as does the Prime Minister. He has served in great departments of government, he has been a long time a member of this House, and he says before the whole world, I make these fifty or sixty charges, and if I cannot prove them I will stand disgraced before Canada, and resign my seat and declare my incapacity of ever holding office again. He put his position in the scale, and the Minister of the Interior met him in a way which was too clever by half. Well, the Minister said, his seat is not secure, because he happens to be living now on the Pacific coast. But I happen to know from the constituents of the hon. member for Pictou that if he wishes to go back to that constituency, although he lives on the Pacific coast, he can carry it again beyond a doubt. And the idea of the Minister of the Interior saying there was not much of a gage when the member for Pictou said he would be ready to surrender his chances of again holding office, that that chance looked remote. Mr. Speaker, I remember well, and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister remembers well, and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) remembers well, that in the spring of 1878 there was not a bosom on the Treasury benches that did not grow with perfect confidence that when the elections came on they would sweep the country. You could not speak to a Reformer—and I knew many of them—but believed that the Conservatives were not in it, that they had no chance whatever. And there were some Conservatives who were foolish enough and wanting enough in insight to share that opinion. And, Sir, a lady that was loved and honoured, not only by Reformers but by Conservatives as well, and whose memory—she has now passed away—like :

The action of the just

actually arranged for a ball to celebrate the anticipated triumph. But that triumph never came, and the invitations had to be cancelled. And, absit omen, I may tell the right hon. gentleman, and I may tell the Minister of the Interior, that there could be no clearer prognostic of defeat than the confidence in the bosom of those hon. gentlemen and—in a few of their followers—the bigheadedness. The heads of some of these hon. gentlemen, I am sure, have taxed the latter; many of them are swelling so that, if they go on growing, they will require to be hooped. Now, the hon. gentleman read and attached great importance to what was said by the editor of the "Nugget." Here is a man whose words I am going to read, who was up there, who observed what was going on with the eye of a friend :

For myself, I did not believe the Government knew anything of the dirt here, even if it really existed as charged, though many good friends have indignantly declared to me that it is their business to know. Since I have reached Dawson I have almost been forced to a like conclusion, and have no hesitation in declaring that if they do not take strong and speedy steps to end the orgie that is in progress here they will not only have become partners in the dirt themselves, but shall have permitted the continuance of a system which must result in very great financial and moral injury to the Dominion. I have been here now for two weeks, and have been noting and inquiring on every hand, and though I cannot yet give you facts and figures, I have seen enough to convince myself that it is worse even than the mind of an honest man can conceive. That the mining laws are being set aside on a colossal scale is beyond all question, and that barefaced bribery is the rule of the day is equally certain. But why go on? I have already told you it was high time to draw this letter to a close. And, doubtless, you have heard of the seamy side of Dawson from a number of other sources. Believe me, you can accept all you hear in that line—no matter how extravagant—as within the bounds of probability.

That is signed by R. C. Miller, and is to the editor of his own paper, the Pembroke "Observer." And where is he to-day? His voice is silenced by $1,500 a year. Now, the right hon. gentleman said of the "Times," that it had been hoaxed. But that idea has already been dispelled by the leader of the Opposition, who has referred to the fact that almost identically the same charges a month before had gone across the Atlantic. And, remember what the "Times" itself says. It says there is nothing new in the charges, and that its own correspondent had brought, generally, the same charges. So, these are not accusations made up by the hon. member for Pictou that the "Times" says should be investigated, but they are the charges made by Miss Shaw, the Klondike correspondent of the "Times." The right hon. gentleman said that the "Times" has been hoaxed as it was in the case of Mr. Parnell. But what did Parnell himself do? He demanded an inquiry, because he felt confident that he would come out of that inquiry as he did. But hon. gentlemen opposite do not want an inquiry; I do not know why. But I will not probe that too close. It is a very clever thing to take up one or two items in the charges, to take up some characteristic of the form of charges and to deal with that. But the charges themselves are numerous; and surely we are not to be told, the country is not to be told that there is no charge against the Government, that it would be nothing that the Government should take notice of, if it could be proved, that men in the employ of the Government, that trusted appointees of the Minister of the Interior, had used their official positions to feather their own nests or to rob the public. Look at the sort of charges made :

That the Crown prosecutor, F. C. Wade, declined to act in the enforcement of the laws, ordinances and regulations of the North-west Territories.

Who first made that charge? The hon. member for Pictou? No, Sir. But one of the leaders of the Liberal party in the North-west, Mr. Bulyea. He was up there to enforce the laws of the North-west Territories in that portion of the North-west Territories; and he went to Mr. Wade, who was practically in the position of Crown prosecutor, and Mr. Wade refused to act for him. Mr.

Bulyea had to remain there. He went to one of the lawyers and asked him to act for him, and the lawyer said: I am afraid of Wade. So that Wade not only refused to act for Mr. Bulyea, but his name terrorized lawyers, so that Mr. Bulyea could get no lawyer until a lawyer came up from Victoria, and then his views were carried out. Take charges like these:

That the acting Dominion Lands agent, registrar, clerk of the court, Crown prosecutor, has accepted retainers, fees for remuneration to procure or for procuring, or attempting or promising to procure, grants or title or possession of Dominion lands and mining claim.

That an officer of the Government was guilty of blackmailing persons engaged in the sale of spirituous liquors and keeping of gambling saloons.

That Mr. Wade, while holding the position of registrar of lands, clerk of the court and Crown attorney, was financially and personally interested in the disposal of lands known as the water front.

Why, Sir, the Minister of the Interior knows well that Mr. Wade declared that he had broken the law, and broken it with the authority of the Minister of the Interior. Suppose that can be established, is that not a thing that should be inquired into? Should we not know whether Mr. Wade went to the Minister of the Interior and said to him: I am in the employ of the Interior Department, and I am in the employ of the Department of Justice—and McGregor the same—shall we take up mining claims? Should we not know whether the Minister of the Interior said: Yes, take up as many mining claims as you like. And should we not know whether the raid on Monte Christo Island, held by McGregor, actually had over it the absolving banner of the Minister of the Interior? Should we not know that? Are we to be told, for instance, because there was some slight error in taking one or two items out of the return of 1883, or because the typewriter made a mistake of "6," instead of "8," that charges of this kind are not to be inquired into, and that the public must go on doubting whether to believe that the Department of the Interior is officered by corrupt men or not? I may tell the Prime Minister that the high and lofty position taken by him of calling the "Times" a hoaxed organ, and the high and lofty position taken by the Minister of the Interior, who says the Government are not going to be directed by the "Times"—will that satisfy the country? Does the "Times" pretend to direct them? All the "Times" presumes to do is to play the part of critic. It criticised the Government, and says the Government is wrong in refusing an inquiry that will have the confidence of the Canadian people.

The Minister of the Interior said that he would not rise only for this, that there is a vein of insinuation running through the speeches and the articles in newspapers on this article. He knows well there is not. Is there any vein of insinuation in any speech I have made on this subject? Is there any vein of insinuation in any charges I have read here? The hon. gentleman, surely, is not going to take the position that, no matter what infamies an officer of his department may commit, he has no concern with it. If it be true that the Yukon is honey-combed with corruption and blackmail, that the employees of the public are an army of bandits, and he contends that that is no concern of his because a charge is not made that he himself is one of the banditti, Sir, I do not think that is a position that the people of Canada will allow any Government to take up. We will hold the Minister of any department responsible for what is done by the officers of that department, and if the officers of that department are all bad and all corrupt, and if the officers of that department in any quarter of it seem systematically to act oppressively to the people, then is that not a concern of the hon. gentleman? He knows that in his legal studies he found a maxim, "noscitur a sociis"; you know a man by the company he keeps. Surely, the people of Canada, if they are to be allowed to remain under the idea that all these officers, men like Wade, men like McGregor, men like the Walsh brothers, behaved badly up there, and that they are friends and confidants of the Minister of the Interior, how can they hold him guiltless? I think, when charges of a grave kind are made, the hon. gentleman will find that he is making a mistake, and the Prime Minister will find that this Government is making a mistake, if they take the view that the charges are of such a nature that they need not be answered, and need not be probed into, and need not be dealt with in such a manner that the people of Canada will feel that their outraged conscience has been satisfied. I have in my hand a letter from a man in a high position. I will show it to any one that likes to look at it. If I do not read the letter, it is because of a laudatory personal reference in it to myself. This gentleman gives his address in Paris, and he says that if there be any satisfactory inquiry, he will be ready to go before it, and will be ready to bring numbers of his friends to prove these very charges that have been referred to here as if they were of no consequence whatever. Sir, I do not regret, but, on the contrary, I am glad, that I brought this matter up. I thought it was better that I should bring it forward as a private member on his own responsibility, without communicating with any one. I thought that was the best thing to do, because it will show that there was no idea of making a concerted attack upon the Government, but that the sole object was to bring before this Parliament the serious position of things, when charges of this sort have been made, and a paper of the standing of the London "Times" declares the Government of Canada has made a great mistake in refusing an inquiry.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I now rise upon a question of order. I stated a moment ago that the motion of the hon. gentleman was an abuse of the privileges of this House; and I stated that the well-understood principle of parliamentary government in this matter was, that a motion to adjourn should not be made unless to call the attention of Parliament to a matter of great urgency and public importance. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition challenged me to bring authority on this point. I have the authority in my hand. English procedure in this respect is more severe than ours. The principle was well laid down before the year 1882; the rule was then made more severe by an amendment to the rules of the House. Now, this is what May says, on page 240 of "Parliamentary Practice":

According to past usage, it was in the power of two members to move and second a motion for the adjournment of the House, rising for that purpose either whilst questions to members were being put or at any moment before the commencement of public business, and to raise thereon a general debate.

Experience impressed upon the House the necessity of placing upon that power some restrictions. Accordingly, in 1882, standing order No. 17 was passed, and the following procedure and practice have been founded thereon. A motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of raising a debate may only be made when all the questions to members upon the notice paper have been disposed of, and before the commencement of public business. The member who desires to make such motion, having previously delivered to the Speaker a notice in writing of the definite matter of urgent public importance which is to be discussed, rises in his place and asks leave to move for that purpose the adjournment of the House.

Well, our rule does not require this; it has not been amended, as the British rule has been amended. I call attention to these words, "a matter of urgent public importance." On page 241 May goes on to say:

A motion under standing order No. 17 must be restricted to a single specific matter of recent occurrence; and as the matter to be discussed must be of an urgent nature, no notice should be given of an intention to resort to the motion on a future occasion.

A matter submitted to the House in pursuance of this standing order, which fails to obtain the requisite support, cannot, during the same session, be again brought forward in the same manner; nor can more than one such motion for adjournment be made during the same sitting of the House. Though the responsibility of bringing forward a matter, as a matter of urgency, rests with the member who desires to exercise the right given by the standing order, still there must be some colour of urgency in the proposal; and the Speaker has declined to submit a motion for adjournment to the House because, in his opinion, the subject to be brought forward was not a "definite matter of urgent public importance."

Of course the Speaker has not this power with us, but the rule is the same, and a motion to adjourn the House should not be made unless it be to call the attention of the House to some matter of urgent public importance. The reason is obvious. The Order paper gives notice to Parliament, and to every hon. member, of the matters that are to be brought before the House, and if there is a matter of urgent public importance that has to be brought up, of course, it is quite allowable that such a matter may be brought up, but, otherwise, the business of the House should not be interrupted. Take the case of the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin). He brought in a motion that it was quite within his power to bring again if he so chose, but the constitutional method of bringing that matter forward was to bring it up when the House was moved into Committee of Supply. Upon the House being moved into Committee of Supply, it would be open to him to make the motion that he made to-day, but every hon. gentleman must agree with me that the hon. gentleman had no warrant to make this motion, because it was not a matter of urgent public importance.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that my right hon. friend quite misunderstood me. I did not challenge him to produce an authority from the British House of Commons for the position that he took, that my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) was abusing his privilege in making this motion. I had reference entirely to the rules of this Parliament, and I said that, if my right hon. friend would adduce an authority for his statement, that this was an abuse of parliamentary privilege on the part of the hon. member, I would undertake to produce a dozen instances in which my right hon. friend had himself committed that abuse of parliamentary privilege. While the right hon. gentleman has shown that, in the British House of Commons they have guarded this privilege by greater restrictions than exist here, he has not said anything to indicate that my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) was at all abusing his privilege. In fact, if we had the practice of the House of Commons of Great Britain, instead of our own, all that would be necessary for the hon. member for West Assinibola would be to inform Mr. Speaker of the subject that he intended to bring up. It would be a very difficult thing for any hon. gentleman, on either side of the House, to bring up a more urgent public matter than that which has been discussed on the motion of the hon. member for West Assinibola.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has referred to me as having been guilty of an abuse of this privilege. I am not conscious of it. I do not remember that I ever moved the adjournment of the House, except once, after the death of the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, to call the attention of the House to the new Government that had been formed. I was obliged to move that motion because the Government did not offer me an opportunity of bringing the matter up on going into Supply.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to call attention to the fact that the course that the right hon. gentleman took on that occasion is remarked as an exception to the English rule in Bourinot's "Parliamentary Practice." This work says that motions for the adjournment of the House :

—are not unfrequently proposed in the Canadian Commons with the view of bringing before it some question in which a member is immediately interested, and which he believes should be explained by himself with as little delay as possible. Consequently we find they have been sometimes made for the purpose of giving a positive denial to certain charges made against members. In 1878 a member brought to the notice of the House, on such a motion, that certain Dominion officials were taking part in the provincial elections in Quebec. In 1891 Mr. Laurier initiated in this way a long debate on the formation and policy of the new Administration, formed on the death of Sir John Macdonald, Premier of the Ministry, consequently dissolved ipso facto.

I think the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) might very well contend that the matter which he brought up was of the same public importance as the matter which the right hon. gentleman brought up on that occasion.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand that the hon. leader of the Opposition, speaking to the question, referred to the Canadian "Parliamentary Practice." The rule that was quoted by the right hon. leader of the Government is not exactly the same as that which governs our conduct in this House, as outlined by Dr. Bourinot, who says :

Motions for the adjournment of the House or of the debate are generally made in the Canadian Houses in the course of a discussion, in order to give an opportunity to members who have already spoken to speak again, or to make certain explanations which, otherwise, they might not be able to make. Substantive motions for the adjournment of the House ought to be reserved for occasions when it is necessary to discuss questions of gravity.

It says "ought." It does not say "they are."

They are not unfrequently proposed in the Canadian Commons with the view of bringing before it some question in which a member is immediately interested, and which he believes should be explained by himself with as little delay as possible. Consequently we find that they have been sometimes made for the purpose of giving a positive denial to certain charges made against members.

Showing plainly that this has been often resorted to for the purpose of allowing private members to go into explanations of matters of special importance.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Perhaps the House will not accept my view of the question, but, nevertheless, I may be allowed to express my opinion. As the motion for the adjournment of the House has been disposed of, there is, properly speaking, no point of order raised now, because there will be no use in me declaring that the motion, so disposed of, was in or out of order. I find in Bourinot, page 415, the following case, where, probably, such a motion as the one which was brought up to-day, would not be absolutely in order :

But even this practice, which is liable to abuse, has its limitations. No member will be permitted, on such a motion, to discuss an order of the day or a notice of motion on the paper, or a motion which was dropped owing to a count-out or what has taken place in a former debate.

This question, as I understand it, has already been discussed before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I mean the Yukon charges.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is the "Times" article, and it has not been discussed before.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not say that the motion was entirely out of order, but certainly these motions should not be brought up except in very special cases.

Mr. BENNETT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) a question. In answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary), the hon. Postmaster General stated that he had seen fit to dispense with the services of the postmaster of Humberstone, Ont., owing to the fact that the post office was carried on in the premises owned by the then postmaster, where he conducted a general business. I beg to ask the hon. Postmaster General if orders have been issued by his department stating that, in respect of every post office conducted in a general store, the postmaster's services must be dispensed with; if such orders have been circulated amongst the postmasters throughout the Dominion, and if the services of a postmaster will be dispensed with, whom I can name, who carries on a general business in the same place as the post office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett), I beg to say, as to his first question, that no instructions, such as he indicates, have been issued. As to the second question, every case has to be considered upon its own merits.

THE WEST HURON AND BROCKVILLE ELECTIONS.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would wish to inform the right hon. the leader of the Government that when motions are called to-morrow, I will move :

That the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery be ordered to attend at the opening of this House on the following day with all poll-books, voters' lists and all other papers, letters, documents and memoranda which may have been transmitted to him by the respective returning officers, or which may otherwise be in his possession relating to the last election for the electoral district of Brockville, and to the last election for the electoral district of the west riding of the county of Huron.

I will do that for the purpose of following that motion up, if it should pass, by a further motion that these documents shall be read and be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for the purpose of inquiring into and investigating the conduct of the respective returning officers, and of the several deputy returning officers at and in connection with each of the said elections ; with power to send for persons and papers and records and to report thereon with all convenient speed. I thought it was desirable, if it is in order, to bring the matter up in this way, and to give the Government notice of the motion. I do so accordingly.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I call the attention of the Minister of Railways to a return brought down on the 23rd of this month, in answer to an order of the House, with reference to correspondence between parties at Grand Narrows and others and the Department of Railways on the subject of leasing a piece of land. I notice the Minister of Railways is not here, but I will continue my reference. I find the papers are not complete. I find a letter addressed to the engineer at Moncton by the General Manager, dated the 26th of October, 1897, which appears to be the first document among these papers, and it proceeds to say :

Dear Sir,—At Grand Narrows allow a man named McNeill, under lease, to erect a building on the railway property alongside the platform, &c.

There is no correspondence previous to that among the papers, and I am aware there was communication between the applicants for the property and others for them and the Minister of Railways, and also by other parties on behalf of the applicant, among whom was the hon. the Premier of Nova Scotia. There is none of that correspondence here which took place previous to the date I mentioned. In further evidence of that there is a letter of the applicant dated December 31st, 1897, saying that he made "application to the Government over two years before that date for a piece of land, &c." This application is not among the papers.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day, I call the attention of the Postmaster General to Return 105-D, in which I asked for correspondence in re the quality of postcards. I am not sure whether the word "correspondence" would cover resolutions of boards of trade, but I think it would. I meant it for that at least, and I would like the Postmaster General to supplement the return by some resolutions of the boards of trade transmitted to the department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I would think that any expression of opinion would be covered by that order. But the hon. gentleman may not be aware of what I learned in the department—I think, speaking from memory, that this order had to do with postcards printed under the contract made by the present Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There was a misapprehension. The late contractor furnished some postcards that were probably issued during the regime of the present Government, and it may be that these resolutions had to do with postcards printed under the old contract.

Mr. FOSTER. When they are brought down, we will see.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. They would not in themselves indicate that.

SUPPLY BILL.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved second reading of Bill (No. 169) for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service for the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1899, and the 30th June, 1900, and for other purposes relating to the public service.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Bill considered in committee, read the third time, and passed.

REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of (Mr. Mulock) for the second reading of Bill (No. 126) respecting representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. ALEX. McNEILL (North Bruce). Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible in the observations which I have to make to the House in reference to this matter. In view of the very full discussion which the measure has had, I probably would not have said anything on the subject, had it not been for certain observations which were made in reference to myself and my own constituency by the hon. gentleman who has charge of this measure. Before saying anything on the question immediately before the House, I should like to make one observation in reference to a remark that fell from the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) last night. I do not very often take notice of what falls from that hon. member; but this observation I do not feel that I should allow to go without comment. After having described the Redistribution Bill of 1882 as a monstrous and disgraceful measure, the hon. member thought fit to say that Sir Mackenzie Bowell was a very fit instrument to carry out a measure of that kind. I just wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that Sir Mackenzie Bowell is, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the people of Canada, and in the opinion of the fair-minded men, the respectable men, of the Liberal party, as honourable and straightforward a man as is to be found in public life in Canada, or in the public life of any other country to-day; and I do not feel inclined to allow an observation of that kind, even coming from such a source as it did, to pass unchallenged in this House.

With regard to the measure we are about to discuss, we are met, Mr. Speaker, on the very threshold by the fact that it is a new departure. This is the first occasion on which any party in Canada has set about a delimitation of the constituencies and a redistribution of seats immediately before, in place of after, the decennial census. This is not merely a measure for the delimitation of some constituencies, but it is also a measure for the redistribution of the representation. It creates new constituencies, it gives additional members to constituencies, and it abolishes some constituencies that now exist. I say this is an absolutely new departure. Attempts have been made, by reference to measures which have been introduced from time to time, to show that something of this kind has been done previously, at a time not contemplated by the constitution; but, as was shown conclusively, I think, in the most lucid and able statement in reference to that matter—if I may presume to say so—which was made by the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), all those measures which were referred to, as explained, at all events, by those who introduced them at the time, were measures for the purpose of explaining ambiguities or correcting clerical errors in measures which had been passed at the time recognized by the constitution. If any of those measures went any degree further than the hon. members who had charge of them at the time explained that they did—though I am not prepared to say that they did go further—the changes they made were insignificant; whereas this is a great measure of change, an absolutely new departure.

Now, I think it is admitted on all sides that the constitution contemplates, so far as the provinces are concerned, that the redistribution shall be made on a basis of population, and that it shall only be made when measures have been taken to discover what the population is. The hon. gentleman who has charge of this measure says that the Liberal party have always agreed that, as between provinces, the representation should be based upon population; but he says they have never admitted that that principle applies to counties or to constituencies. Now, the very basis of our representative system is population. Every election which takes place for a member of this House is based upon the principle that those who represent the greater number, and not those who represent the less number, shall have seats in this Chamber. That is the very root of our representative system—representation by population. I want to know on what principle you say that the province with the larger population shall have a greater representation in this House than the smaller province, and refuse to say that the county with the larger population shall have greater representation in this House than the county with the smaller population. There is no distinction. If the contention be right as regards the one, it is right as regards the other. The basis upon which the redistribution of seats, as between province and province, is effected under the constitution is the basis of population; and, in so far as the hon. gentleman asks the House to agree to a measure for a delimitation of constituencies and a redistribution of seats in the dark, so far as this essential element of population is concerned, he asks the House to do something which is absolutely inconsistent with the principles which lie at the basis of the constitution of this country. The hon. gentleman, I say, asks this to be done in the dark. He says the judges are to exclude every ray of light with regard to change of population. He says they are not to take into consideration the population of to-day at all. They are to do justice, he says. He carries justice in his right hand with regard to this measure, and the judges are to do justice as to the condition of things to-day without knowing what the population of to-day is. They are to shut their eyes to any information which they may have as to the population of to-day, and they are to deal with this matter on the basis of the population of 1891. Was there ever a more preposterous proposition? If the hon. gentleman were consistent, he would say that they should go back to 1881, and deal with the matter on the basis of the population then, when this iniquity of which he complains was perpetrated. But to say that they are to go back and take the population of 1891, and shut their eyes to the many changes which have taken place in population since that time, seems to me to be absolutely contrary to common sense, as well as a violation of the meaning and intent of the constitution. Now, the hon. gentleman has not only violated the principle which lies at the basis of population—and I am not speaking of technical points at all—but he asks us to accept a new principle, which is utterly bad and mischievous. I say that the principle which he asked us to introduce, namely, that any Government or any party in power which believes that the arrangement of the constituencies, for the time being, is not sufficiently satisfactory to it, shall have leave, whenever it pleases, to tear the constituencies to pieces, is a principle which, if you accept it by establishing this precedent, can only be viewed with dismay by any one who has at heart the welfare of our democratic institutions. If you can tear constituencies to pieces today because some friends of the Government in western Ontario are not satisfied with the arrangement of the constituencies in that section, you can tear them to pieces tomorrow in any other section because some other friends of the Government are not satisfied with their arrangement.

Mr. BERGERON. You can rearrange them every year.

Mr. McNEILL. As my hon. friend says you can go on rearranging them every year. Every year the party in power may tear to pieces the constituencies and rearrange them to suit themselves. What would be the result? If one party does this, the other party will do it, and the result will be that while we have the opportunity given to us, by the interval of ten years between these rearrangements, of allowing the vexations and the heart-burnings which are produced by legislation of this kind to be forgotten and all the bitter feelings to be assuaged, if you, on the other hand, allow this rearrangement to go on constantly, you will produce such a feeling of irritation and bad blood between the two sides of the House that we shall have a condition of things with reference to this matter much worse than has ever obtained in Canada before.

Nothing could be more mischievous. The measure of 1892, was, in the main, a moderate measure. I do not think that any one on the other side will venture to say anything else. It showed that the Government of the day were ready to accept moderate counsels, and I am free to admit that, in so far as this measure recognizes the establishment of an impartial tribunal, it is a step in the right direction. But while admitting this, I am sorry to see that the hands of the tribunal are tied, as they are by this measure, and of course I cannot fail to recognize the many cruelties and injustices that it sanctions. In so far as it does recognize the principle of an impartial tribunal, it is a step in the right direction.

Mr. McNEILL.

But all that has been done by those on both sides of the House who urged moderation and who have caused this advance to be taken in the right direction, will be lost and undone if the root principle of this measure is accepted, namely, that any party in power can, whenever they think that the constituencies are not sufficiently favourably arranged to suit themselves, set to work to alter the constituencies when and how they please. I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but I will call attention to this fact, that while hon. gentlemen opposite claim by this measure to redress the grievances that were inflicted in 1881 or 1882, they are interfering with two constituencies, the constituencies of East and West York, which were certainly not gerrymandered in 1882 and to which, therefore, that plea cannot apply.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). East York was.

Mr. McNEILL. East York was not, so far as I know.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. A part of East York was.

Mr. McNEILL. West York was not anyhow, and that constituency is deliberately interfered with, although the hon. gentleman says his object was simply to redress the grievances that were inflicted in 1882.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. member for West York desires his riding to be left as it is, putting into Toronto what belongs to Toronto, it seemed fit when parts of the county were taken away—

Mr. WALLACE. Why was not that principle recognized in Ottawa city?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am addressing myself to my hon. friend from North Bruce. When we had to interfere with any county at all, it was thought wise and fair to leave the whole county to the judges; but if a fairer proposition is submitted, it will receive every consideration.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman says that when it was necessary to interfere with the county it was right to leave it to the judges. But I say it was not necessary to interfere with that county at all. The hon. gentleman has deliberately assailed the constituency of the hon. member for West York without a shadow of an excuse that I can see. That constituency is now as it has been for the last forty or fifty years. It may be that at some time or other a change should be made, but the hon. gentleman has to show some special reason for a change being made at present. It is only because of some special reason that he can even pretend to justify bringing in the measure at all. What is the urgent reason for interfering with the constituencies of West York and East York? I take it that the urgent reason is that the country shall be deprived of the services of two of the most useful members of this House, and that gentlemen who would be prepared to vote for the Yukon Railway deal or the Drummond Railway deal or to burk the Yukon inquiry, shall be substituted in their place. That, I presume, is the reason for that interference. Then these gentlemen say that they promised to introduce a measure of this kind, and we have been told, over and over again, that the people have called on them to introduce this measure and are in favour of it. Will these gentlemen say that they pledged themselves to their constituents that they would introduce a measure of this kind just before the taking of the census instead of just after it? I do not think so. I do not think that any such statement was ever made. If they made a pledge, it would be understood by those whom they addressed as meaning that they would do this thing at the time when it ought to be done. I just wish to call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that his original proposal would have deprived some 35,000 or 40,000 people of those constituencies of East and West York of their franchise by putting them into the city of Toronto, where their franchise would be practically valueless, so far as giving effect to their political inclinations is concerned. I think there is another reason why one member, at all events, of the Government should have held his hand and should have refused to allow a measure of this kind to be introduced at the present time. I mean the Minister of Justice. I think it was, to say the least of it, a very unchivalrous thing to have a measure of this kind introduced at the present time in order to strike down the gentleman who defeated him fairly in his constituency in a fair contest at the last election.

Now, I will just say a word with regard to what, I may say, was an unexpected, and, I venture to think, an unprovoked attack that was made upon me the other day by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) who has charge of this measure. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that for seventeen years consecutively I have had the honour of a seat in this House. The hon. gentleman is very angry at that. And he cannot avoid having a fling, in passing, at what he is pleased to designate as the "great orations" which I have embalmed upon "Hansard." Mr. Speaker, the phraseology is, perhaps, a little peculiar, but, no doubt, the sneer, is well deserved. I do not hope, I do not presume, to emulate, Mr. Speaker, those graceful and eloquent periods with which the hon. gentleman is wont to ravish our senses and set our hearts aglow. But I will venture to say—and I hope I am not guilty of an impropriety in saying it—that during these seventeen years I have not been distinguished in this House for want of fairness to my political opponents. And, out of it—would it be ungenerous if I were to remind the hon. gentleman that the very last occasion before this Parliament met, when I attempted, in my humble and ineffectual way, to address a public audience, was on the occasion when I travelled from Warton to Toronto in order to bear public testimony to what I considered the service the hon. gentleman had done for the country in reference to Imperial penny postage.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Will my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) allow me?—

Mr. McNEILL. I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) would not wish to interrupt me. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the hon. gentleman desires to be specially unfair to me. I think it is merely that the kindly courtesy and genial good nature with which the hon. gentleman has made us, perhaps, too familiar in this House has been overborne for the moment by that fine sense of justice for which he is so distinguished, and which has induced him, constrained him, forced him, to introduce this measure at this unseemly time and has constrained him to redress an inequality in the distribution of population in the county of Bruce made in 1882, which his own figures show to have been redressed by the course of events in 1892. That sense of justice also has constrained the hon. gentleman to describe as a gerrymander the detaching from the north riding of Bruce of a village situated five miles away from it, embedded in the territory of the west riding, unapproachable except through the west riding of that county. Therefore, I say, I do not suppose it is any desire on the part of the hon. gentleman to be unfair to me. I suppose it was the same sense of justice which compelled the hon. gentleman, when I said that I would be satisfied to have any of the judges come into the county of Bruce and say whether it was fairly divided for Dominion electoral purposes, to say that I could make a virtue of necessity. The hon. gentleman knows what my position in reference to this question has been. But I suppose there are members of this House now present who do not know; and I shall therefore, I am afraid, be obliged to ask the indulgence of the House while I read from the official report what my position in reference to this matter has been. After saying that if it were left to members on either side of the House to make these divisions, we never could arrive at a conclusion as to what was fair or not fair, because one side would declare to be a fair division what another side would consider unfair, I said:

I think we require to get a tribunal which is independent of politics; we want a tribunal which will take this matter up and deal with it in such a manner that both the public and members of this House will have confidence in its decision. I was not in the House when the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) dealt with this matter, but he told me afterwards what he had said with respect to it. I had some conversation with him, in which I suggested the appointment of a commission composed of our judges; but he was opposed to that suggestion, and brought forward a very forcible and strong objection, namely, that as our judges have so much political work thrown on them at present, a danger would arise if more work were thrown upon them lest, however fairly they might discharge their duties, they might be discredited in the eyes of the public. That is undoubtedly a grave and serious objection, but whether it is sufficiently grave and serious to outweigh the objection to any other scheme that may be proposed, I am not prepared to say. Johnson was in the habit of saying that objection might be taken to a vacuum and a plenum, but one or other must be true. It is not sufficient to take objection, but it must be shown that there is more serious objection to one proposal than to another proposal submitted. But if it be that we are afraid to trust our judges, or that we are afraid of discrediting them, then let us secure the services of judges from some other part of the Empire, who would not be in any way under suspicion in the minds of the people in regard to this matter.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, that being my position, and the hon. gentleman knowing that to be my position, thought it was worthy of an honourable opponent to throw the taunt across the floor of the House—when I said I would be satisfied with any of our judges—that I could make a virtue of necessity. I think that the hon. gentleman's sense of what is just is, perhaps, not exactly what would commend itself to the people of this country.

Now, the hon. gentleman has accused me of gerrymandering the north riding of Bruce in 1892, inasmuch as I asked that the village of Port Elgin should be detached from North Bruce and left in the riding to which it belonged. The hon. gentleman has charge of this measure, he is a Minister of the Crown, he is responsible for the measure—and I want to ask him on his responsibility as a Minister of the Crown and as the Minister who has charge of this measure, which is referred to in the Speech put into the mouth of His Excellency at the opening of Parliament, whether he is prepared now to rise in his place and tell this Parliament that it was improper at that time to take the village of Port Elgin out of the north riding of Bruce, to detach it from the north riding of Bruce and leave it in the west riding, in which it was situated.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). If the hon. gentleman refers to my speech, I ask him how he could consistently press for the return of Port Elgin in the township of Saugeen on the ground that it was separated from North Bruce by a portion of Saugeen, when, at the same time, he supported a similar condition of affairs in the case of North Bruce, namely, the separation of East and West Flamborough from the south part of the north riding of the county of Wentworth and Brant? There is an inconsistency. If the hon. gentleman was consistent—that was my argument—he would not have supported or permitted to remain upon the statute-book a similar condition of affairs in regard to the other riding.

Mr. McNEILL. Now, I want to ask the hon. gentleman to answer my question. He said that I had gerrymandered the north riding of Bruce by asking that the village of Port Elgin be detached from it and left in the riding of West Bruce to which it belongs. I am not talking of Wentworth, we will deal with Wentworth when we come to it. But I am dealing with the charge the hon. gentleman brought against me in his speech. He said nothing about Wentworth till I rose and explained about Port Elgin. He charged me with having gerrymandered North Bruce by asking that the village of Port Elgin be taken out of it. I want to ask him now—he is a lawyer and understands this very well—whether he is prepared to rise in his place and say that it was improper to take Port Elgin out of North Bruce and leave it in West Bruce?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I say that I do not believe the hon. gentleman removed Port Elgin from North Bruce to South Bruce for the purpose of equalizing population because—

Mr. McNEILL. That is not an answer to my question at all.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Then, the hon. gentleman may finish his speech, and I will answer him.

Mr. McNEILL. No, I ask the hon. gentleman now if he dare rise in the House and say, on his responsibility as a Minister of the Crown, that he considers it was improper to take Port Elgin out of North Bruce and leave it in West Bruce?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Will the hon. gentleman give us his reasons for taking it out, and I will explain what—

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman is afraid to answer the question. I will give the hon. gentleman now another opportunity, perhaps he may be a little more courageous. I will ask the hon. gentleman whether he is prepared to rise in his place and say that it was not eminently right and proper to take that village out of the north riding?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to finish my sentence, then I will answer him. I think that in 1882, it was improper to have removed the township of Saugeen, which includes Port Elgin, from North Bruce. The population of North Bruce was already below the unit, and the removal of Saugeen reduced it from about 20,000 to 18,000; and its addition to West Bruce increased the disproportion, giving West Bruce nearly 6,000 of a population greater than North Bruce. I believe it was stated in the House at that time; I believe Mr. Blake charged that the hon. gentleman had something to do with that suggestion—I am not aware whether it was true or not.

Mr. McNEILL. That is quite true; I stated so.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Then the hon. gentleman is responsible for the gerrymander of North Bruce by the Act of 1882, that reduced from 20,000 to 18,000 the population of North Bruce, and increased the disproportion between the adjoining ridings. I think that the township, including the town, should have gone into North Bruce. For ten years the difference existed. The hon. gentleman having obtained a seat in Parliament, in 1891, after his majority fell to 31, he pressed and secured the return of Port Elgin to West Bruce. I think it was improper to have detached a portion of a municipality such as Port Elgin from West Bruce. But the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that it was done; and it was followed by a motion by the hon. member then representing South Brant, at present Minister of Customs, that the whole township of Saugeen, including the village, should be made part of North Bruce. But that was not permitted, and it was the Government majority of the day that prevented Saugeen, with the village of Port Elgin in it, being made part of North Bruce. That should not have happened, a portion of the municipality in that way should not have been separated from the county and attached to North Bruce. But the hon. gentleman's party violated that principle in several cases, in the case of North Wentworth and Brant, notably. In the case of North Ontario they detached Scugog and made it necessary for the people of Scugog, in order to vote, to travel through another riding. The point I am making against the hon. gentleman is that he was wrong in the case of North Bruce, and he had redress, but he did not see any wrong in the case of North Wentworth and Brant, nor of North Ontario. I say if he was acting from conviction and principle all round, he would have administered the same measure of justice to these other ridings that he insisted upon securing for his own.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to say before six o'clock, that the hon. gentleman has not attempted to answer the question I put to him. I shall repeat it after six, to see if he has found new courage after dinner.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 139) respecting the Nova Scotia Steel Company (Limited).—(Mr. Fraser, Guysborough.)

REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was endeavouring to elicit from my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Mulock) an answer to a very simple and straightforward question. I asked the hon. gentleman whether he was prepared to rise in his place in this House, and, on his responsibility as Minister of the Crown in charge of this measure, say that it was not eminently right and proper that the village of Port Elgin should have been detached from the north riding of Bruce in 1892 and declared to belong to the west riding of Bruce, in which it is situated. I asked the hon. gentleman to answer that question; I gave him an opportunity to do so. The question could have been answered in one or two words. The hon. gentleman made a speech on the subject; I did not interrupt him, but I allowed him to finish it. In that speech the hon. gentleman did not venture to say that it was not eminently just and right that the village of Port Elgin should be detached from the north riding of Bruce. The hon. gentleman did not venture, on his responsibility as a Minister, to say that it was not eminently right and just to do this, although he did charge me with gerrymandering the riding, or being a party to the gerrymandering of the riding, when I asked that Port Elgin should be declared to belong to the constituency in which it is situated. Now, I want to ask the hon. gentleman another question, because it would seem that there is some confusion in his mind or in mine. I want to ask him whether he withdraws the charge that I was guilty of being a participator in a gerrymander in 1892, when I asked that the village of Port Elgin should be detached from the north riding of Bruce and declared to belong to the west riding of Bruce, in which it is situated. I ask the hon. gentleman whether he says now that I was guilty of being a participator in a gerrymander, when I asked that that should be done.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I would prefer it, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) would make his own speech, but, since he desires me to give my view on the point, I will do so. I myself am of the opinion that no riding should be broken up into parts, with pieces of other ridings intervening, and that it is proper that all portions of the riding should be in contact. That is my view, and I think the hon. gentleman would have been perfectly justified in detaching Port Elgin from North Bruce, if, at the same time, he had insisted upon applying that same principle of restoring to other ridings territory removed in departure of that view. What I am complaining of in this case is, that he is inconsistent, inasmuch as, when he saw an abuse which injured him, he had it redressed, but he did not see an abuse when it injured the Liberal party, and so he supported a measure which redressed the abuse in his own case, and at the same time created an abuse against the Liberal party in the case of North Wentworth and Brant.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman withdraws the charge of gerrymandering. The hon. gentleman says that it was an abuse which I was having redressed, and if it was an abuse I was having redressed, he cannot say that it was a gerrymander. Let us have that clearly understood. The hon. gentleman has changed his ground entirely.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No.

Mr. McNEILL. He withdraws the charge of gerrymandering, and he now says I was guilty of inconsistency. I want it clearly understood by the House and by the country that the hon. gentleman, having from his place in this House charged me with having gerrymandered the north riding of Bruce in 1892—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. And in 1882.

Mr. McNEILL. I am not speaking of 1882; I am coming to 1892. The hon. gentleman should not interrupt me in that way. He is too old a parliamentarian not to know that it is an improper interruption. The hon. gentleman, having charged me with gerrymandering the riding in 1892, now withdraws that charge.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not withdraw it.

Mr. McNEILL. He does not withdraw it? He says that I corrected what was improper at that time.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman—

Mr. McNEILL. I will not allow the hon. gentleman to interrupt; I have given him every latitude. He has made his speeches here without interruption. He has distinctly stated that I corrected an abuse, and, though he says that I corrected that abuse, he is not prepared to say that he withdraws the charge of gerrymandering. Does the hon. gentleman say that one can be correcting an abuse and gerrymandering at the same time? He refuses to withdraw the charge of gerrymandering, although he says I was correcting an abuse. The hon. gentleman cannot impose upon the good sense of this House and of the country in that way.

Mr. McNEILL.

The hon. gentleman stands here convicted of having brought a charge against me which he cannot substantiate, and which he is practically obliged to withdraw. Not being able to substantiate the charge that I was guilty of something which was improper and unworthy, he now says that at the very moment I was doing this thing, I was correcting an abuse.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. And creating one, too.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman says I was creating an abuse in North Bruce.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In North Wentworth.

Mr. McNEILL. There was an abuse in North Bruce. That is at the time I was having the village of Port Elgin withdrawn from North Bruce. I think it is unworthy, when we find a mistake brought to the knowledge of the hon. gentleman in regard to a colleague who has sat with him in this House for seventeen years, that he will not, like a man, get up and say: I was mistaken; I am sorry I was mistaken; I am sorry I brought such a charge; I admit that the hon. gentleman was correcting an abuse, and I withdraw the charge. The hon. gentleman will not do that in words, although he has admitted the fact. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that he could not venture to say in this House that it was not eminently right and proper that the village of Port Elgin should be withdrawn from the north riding of Bruce at that time, because he knows that if he did say so, he would say that he approved of the village of Port Elgin being left in the north riding of Bruce, when his own colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, described it as an evidence of an iniquitous gerrymander to leave it there. In 1892, when this matter was up in the House, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) declared that it was an iniquitous gerrymander to put the village of Port Elgin into the north riding of Bruce. I should like to know if the village of Port Elgin gave a majority of eighty-eight in my favour, what the hon. gentleman would have said about it? I venture to say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) and those beside him, would have pointed to it as the most flagrant instance of gerrymander in the Dominion of Canada; and the hon. gentleman would have made the welkin ring with his denunciations of the gerrymander which was being perpetrated and continued in the north riding of Bruce, because the village of Port Elgin was there. But because the village of Port Elgin gives a Reform majority, and gives, therefore, a better chance to the Reform candidate in the north riding of Bruce, the hon. gentleman is prepared to reprove me for not leaving the village of Port Elgin in the north riding of Bruce.

Mr. TOLMIE. Would the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) allow me to ask him a question? If it can be proven to you that the west riding of Bruce has 2,000 more population than the north riding, would you have any objection to putting Port Elgin back in your riding?

Mr. McNEILL. I most certainly would have an objection to arranging population by going into another constituency and picking up a village five miles away.

Mr. TOLMIE. Why did you not raise that objection before?

Mr. McNEILL. I was not in the House when it was done in 1882.

Mr. TOLMIE. Oh, you were not.

Mr. McNEILL. No, and I could not raise the objection. The question of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tolmie) is a good example of the view which is held by his friends in this House in regard to this matter. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tolmie) thinks it is perfectly right to go away five miles into another constituency, and pick out a village there to balance the population, and give a majority in favour of the Reform candidate.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) allow me to ask him a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McNEILL. I am speaking now, and the hon. gentleman can ask me the question later on.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I want to ask—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. McNEILL. I cannot have all these interruptions. I must apologize to the House for taking up so much of its time on a mere personal matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McNEILL. I am not only complaining of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) having accused me of gerrymandering the riding at that time—a charge which he has now been obliged to withdraw; and he has been afraid to rise in his place and say that what I did at that time was anything else than eminently right, and proper—I am not only complaining of that, but I am complaining that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) said that I not only gerrymandered the riding, but that I did it in a hypocritical manner, and I object to that a great deal more than to his statement that I gerrymandered the riding, bad as is the first charge. Here is what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) says about me:

He was afraid to face the music again with that majority of only 30, and something else had to be done. Saugeen could not be detached, but there was a municipality that had been showing up badly so far as the hon. gentleman was concerned. There was the little town of Port Elgin, which, in the year 1891, had given a Liberal majority of 88, it was in my hon. friend's constituency. Now, if Port Elgin could by hook or by crook be detached from North Bruce it might save the hon. gentleman once more; and then, in 1892, for the first time, he argued about the importance of equalizing the population, and to that end he detaches the small village of Port Elgin from North Bruce and puts it into West Bruce, because at that time North Bruce had become slightly more populous than West Bruce.

There is not only the imputation, but the distinct charge made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock), that when I asked that the village of Port Elgin should remain in the constituency to which it belongs, I pretended that I was doing so merely in order to equalize the population. What are the facts? I will ask the indulgence of the House while I read what I said at that time, and the House can then judge as between me and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock):

Before passing away altogether from this matter I would like to make one remark with regard to this village of Port Elgin, of which we have heard so much, and which my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) seemed to think it was such an improper thing to interfere with. That, I do think, is another example of how hard it is for men who are influenced by party considerations to take a fair view of any political question. The facts with regard to the village of Port Elgin are these: Port Elgin is in the township of Saugeen, and is miles away from the north riding of Bruce, entirely surrounded by foreign territory, and the riding of North Bruce has the larger population of the two ridings. I quite admit—and I do not conceal the matter for a moment—that I am very glad to get rid of Port Elgin, very largely because there is a majority against me there.

Was that pretending that I was doing this simply in order to equalize population, or was not it frankly stating to the House what my views were:

I ask my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, who is a fair-minded man, whether it is right and proper that I should be forced to go five miles out of my constituency into a foreign territory and take a village belonging to my friend from the west riding of Bruce to give a majority of 88 against me? I do not think it is fair, and I think that any hon. gentleman who argues in favour of Port Elgin being left in North Bruce is arguing in favour of a gerrymander.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Read the next line.

Mr. McNEILL. I shall:

Mr. LAURIER. Let us wipe out all the blemishes of the Act of 1882.

Mr. McNEILL. We will do it by degrees.

That is the statement I made to the House at the time. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) accused me of having pretended here that I asked the village of Port Elgin to be removed from the north riding of Bruce merely upon the ground of equalization of population. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) think that is fair? Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) think that that is worthy? Does the hon. gentleman think it is a fair thing for him to hold up a colleague of his in this House to the odium of the House and odium of the country under circumstances such as these? There is the statement that I made to the House, and there is the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock), and I will leave it to the House and to the country to decide which is the ingenuous and which is the disingenuous statement. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has spoken of Wentworth in this connection. With regard to Wentworth, when the hon. gentleman says that the redistribution of that county was parallel with the leaving of the village of Port Elgin in the west riding of Bruce, he makes a statement which is not borne out by the facts. There was no breach of continuity of the riding in the case of Wentworth. It is quite true, as I understand, one had to follow a roundabout way to go from one part of the riding to the other; but there was no breach of continuity. In the case of Port Elgin, there is an absolute breach of continuity. It is entirely surrounded by foreign territory, and it is impossible to get to the village at all without passing through territory not belonging to the riding. Therefore, the two cases are not parallel. I am not prepared to say that there were no blemishes in the Act of 1892, but I do say that the Act of 1892 was on the whole a moderate measure and a great step in advance. And as such I supported it. I do not think any hon. member who was in the House at the time, and whose opinion is worth anything, will deny that it was a moderate measure.

The hon. gentleman speaks about the Act of 1882. He says there was a terrible gerrymander in the county of Bruce in 1882. Now, I wish very much that the hon. gentleman would try, when he is making statements in this House, to be a little more accurate as to his facts. The hon. gentleman told us that in 1881 the north riding of Bruce had a population of 20,700 odd, and that the southern township was the township of Saugeen. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I called his attention to the fact at the time, but he seemed to be so anxious to make out a case against me and against the Conservative party, that he would not accept the correction I made at the time. The population of North Bruce was not 20,700 odd, but it was nearly 25,000 in 1881; and in stating that the township of Saugeen was the southern township of the constituency, the hon. gentleman was entirely mistaken. The township of Bruce was the southern township. Now, the fact with regard to the county of Bruce at that time was this. It consisted of two ridings; and because the province of Ontario had increased in population and was entitled to additional representation, the county of Bruce, which had increased in population more than any other county in Ontario, was entitled to one of those additional members. For that reason, there had to be three ridings made out of the two ridings, and in order to do that it was necessary to take a portion of each of the other ridings to form a third riding. The hon. gentleman entirely misled the House—I do not mean to say that he did so wilfully—as to the condition of things at that time. He led the House to believe that without making any change in the old north riding of Bruce the population would have been fairly divided, although, as I have pointed out, the population of North Bruce was not as he supposed 20,700, but almost 25,000. Now, when the two ridings had to be divided, the question arose as to what the division should be. I do not deny for a moment that it would have been competent to divide the county at that time into three ridings, and to have left the township of Saugeen in the north riding of Bruce, and that by doing so you would at the moment have balanced the population better than it was balanced by the division that was made; and it is quite fair to argue—I do not find any fault with that—that the township of Saugeen ought to have been left in the north riding. I wish to say, as the hon. gentleman asked me the question, I answered it at the time; but I wish to say here again, from my place, that I was one of those who were responsible for advising that the township of Saugeen should not be left in the north riding at that time, but should be placed in the west riding. I wish to say further that in making that recommendation I was partly swayed by considerations of a political and party nature. As long as these matters are left in the hands of the two parties, each party will be swayed less or more by political considerations; and if two possible divisions, fairly good divisions, can be made, the party in power will always select the division which suits its own party interest best, and if in doing that it does not do anything that is unjust, it is entitled to do it as long as the matter is left in the hands of the parties. I do not think it should be left in the hands of the parties at all. I think it should be taken out of the hands of the parties; I have always said so since I have had the honour of a seat in this House; but I say that every one who knew anything about the condition of the county of Bruce at that time knew that if the township of Saugeen had been left in the north riding, although it would have equalized the population for the moment, it would have necessitated another division of the county at the very next taking of the census, and I think it is fair to say that these things should be done as seldom as possible, and not as often as possible. The northern part of the county was increasing rapidly in population, and every one knew that if an equality were provided at the moment it could not continue; and what did the result prove? Was that a just contention or not? The result proved that at the very next census, the north riding, from which the township of Saugeen had been taken, was the more populous riding of the two. It had increased from over 18,000 to over 22,000, while the west riding had decreased from over 24,000 to over 20,000. Therefore, the result proved that the contention that was made at that time was a fair contention, and that the division of the county which was made was a fair division, so far as distribution of population is concerned.

The hon. gentleman desires to have a shy at the county of Bruce in this Bill of his. He has dragged that county in, although it is not one in which any of the ridings are outside of the county lines. They are within the county lines, but the hon. gentleman has dragged it in, in order that he may have an opportunity of altering the county divisions. I do not know whether he had anything to do with the leaving of it to the judges or not, but, at all events, it has to be left to three judges of the Superior Court of Ontario; and for my part I am perfectly satisfied that the matter should be left to any three independent men, and we can get no better independent men than are to be found on the judicial bench. After what has passed in this House, for my part, I would prefer that the matter should be left to three independent men, and that they should have the opportunity of deciding whether the division which is made to-day in the county of Bruce is a fair or an unfair one for elections to this House. So far as I am able to judge, no fairer division can possibly be made. So far as I am able to judge, whether you take the question of the geographical distribution, and the shape of the riding and their compactness, or the question of population, you cannot make a better or a fairer distribution than that which exists to-day. The hon. gentleman seems to think that because the old north riding of Bruce was more strongly Reform than the new, after a third riding had been formed in that county, that is some proof that injustice has been done. And my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Paterson) spoke the other day of my opponent, Mr. Gillies, having been sacrificed by the change. Now, my hon. friend knows perfectly well that the result of the change was this, that at the next election there were two Reformers elected and one Conservative in the county, and he also knows that the west riding of Bruce was there for Mr. Gillies, if he had chosen to take it, and if his friends had desired that he should have it. The west riding of Bruce was there, two of his strongest townships were in that riding, and if my hon. friend had been so anxious about the fate of Mr. Gillies, why did he not exert himself to have Mr. Gillies nominated for the west riding, where he would have been sure of election? But my hon. friend's plan was a different one. It was to strengthen, if possible, the new north riding of Bruce, to endeavour to make it as much Reform as possible, and in place of using his influence to obtain a nomination for the gentleman whose defeat he so much deplored the other night, in place of trying to get that gentleman nominated in the constituency in which he would have been sure of election, he tried to increase the chances of the Reform candidate in the north riding by adding to it the village of Port Elgin. Had the sympathy of my hon. friend been as sincere as his voice was loud and pathetic, he would have endeavoured to find a seat in the west riding of Bruce for Mr. Gillies.

The hon. gentleman spoke of the result of the various elections in the north riding of Bruce. I am not going to weary the House by going through the particulars of what the hon. gentleman said. But I may just say this with regard to the first election. The hon. gentleman said that if the township of Saugeen had been in the north riding of Bruce, my majority would have been entirely wiped out. He said that the township of Bruce had given a majority of 101, and that my majority was 88. That is to say, that there would have been a majority of 13, which he said was almost equal to the majority I obtained. It just shows how far my hon. friend's party feeling will carry him when he actually said on the floor of the House that 13 is almost equal to 88. With regard to the election of 1891, I think it would have been, perhaps, fair for him to have mentioned to members of the House who were not here at that time, a fact of which he was very cognizant, namely, that in the middle of the electoral campaign, I met with an accident, which very nearly proved fatal, and that his friends canvassed the constituency on the ground that there was no use in any man voting for McNeill because he was dying anyhow. The hon. gentleman is perfectly aware of the fact of my having met with an accident. Every one who was in the House at the time knew it, because I was unfortunately obliged to use crutches during the whole of that long session, which lasted six months. My hon. friend behind the Postmaster General was not here that session, but the Postmaster General was.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I am really not conscious of that.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend does not, perhaps, remember, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that I was going about on crutches during the whole session of six months, which, unfortunately, my hon. friend did not happen to observe. I may mention also to my hon. friend, who, perhaps, is not aware of the fact, that I was served with a protest on the very day I left my bed, by his friends at that time. I may mention, with regard to that election, something which the hon. gentleman does not know, and that is, that owing to family matters, which I will not refer to, I was quite unable to attend to the revision of the voters' lists on that occasion. I thought there would be another revision of the lists, and I felt it my duty to write to Sir John Macdonald that I considered it quite impossible, under the circumstances, to carry the north riding. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the fact that my political opponents claimed to have 300 majority on the lists, I carried the riding, and in spite of the fact that I was incapacitated from taking part in the elections owing to the causes to which I have already referred. So that I do not think the hon. gentleman can make very much of the fact that my majority was reduced on that occasion. Then, the hon. gentleman spoke of the last occasion on which I contested the riding. He did not mention to the House, as I think in candour he ought to have, that there were three candidates in the field, and that the third candidate polled about a thousand votes. He was a Patron and a P.P.A. and a McCarthyite, and I do not know what else, but he took a great many of my votes, at all events; and I think I would not be going too far if I said that it was the opinion of many of those best informed in the riding, that if that gentleman had not been placed in the field and kept in the field, there would have been no contest in North Bruce on that occasion. So much for what the hon. gentleman has said regarding elections.

I have to apologize to the House for having taken up so much of its time with reference to matters purely personal. I will only repeat what I have already said, that I oppose this Bill on the ground that it is a new departure, and a very dangerous departure, for which there is no precedent, and which, in my judgment, will lead to confusion and mischief of the gravest kind in this country, should it become law. I think that the hon. gentleman has brought forward no sufficient reason for the acceptance by the House of the measure which he has in charge. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) showed in the most conclusive way last evening that the grievances of which the hon. gentleman complains, which he says he wishes to redress by this Bill, if they ever existed, certainly do not exist to-day. So, the hon. gentleman is left without an excuse for bringing forward this measure at this unexampled and, I venture to say, unseemly time.

Mr. PETER MACDONALD (East Huron). I rise to take part in this discussion with mingled feelings of regret and pleasure—of regret that the opportunity to repeal the Redistribution Act of 1882 did not come before, of pleasure to know that the time has arrived and we are now in a position to remove what I consider to be one of the most iniquitous Acts ever passed by the Parliament of Canada. It was placed on the statute-book with the design and for the purpose of gaining in the country an undue advantage for the party then in power. That party came into power with a great flourish of trumpets. They established in 1879 the National Policy, which was to be the panacea for all the country's ills. The country did become more prosperous in 1880 and 1881. But on the eve of the elections which were to take place in 1882, that very party which boasted so much of the National Policy, was afraid to meet the electors of this country on the merits and virtues of that policy. They met in solemn conclave, with their leader at their head—the able leader that they had at that time—and they devised a Redistribution or Gerrymander Bill to be brought in for the purpose of cutting, and carving, and shaping into grotesque figures the constituencies of the province of Ontario, so as to allow the Conservative party to legislate into the House supporters of the Government of that day. We were told yesterday that the Minister of Customs had two men assisting him to get up the Bill now before the House. There was no need of assistance, because the principles underlying this Bill are quite plain. We are just doing what we said we would do when power came into our hands. We opposed the principle of breaking up the counties in 1882. We opposed it in 1872, and Sir John Macdonald and the whole Conservative party agreed with the Liberal party in that year, that the breaking up of the county boundaries was contrary to sound principle in reference to this matter. Sir John Macdonald, in a speech he made on the introduction of the Redistribution Bill of 1872, pointed this out emphatically, and said he was opposed to breaking through the county boundaries for the purpose of forming any electoral divisions. He gave many strong, solid and substantial arguments in favour of the position he took on that occasion. Every Conservative who supported Sir John Macdonald at that time, and who expressed himself, declared in favour of his leader's views upon this subject. And Hon. Edward Blake, speaking for the Liberal party at that time, expressed his concurrence with the views put forth by Sir John Macdonald in reference to this point. Both parties agreed that even considerations of population were a secondary matter, and that, as far as possible, county boundaries should be maintained. Now, in 1882, when the Conservative party had made up its mind to gerrymander the constituencies, the principles advocated in 1872 were egregiously violated. The leader of the party was the same man as in 1872, and many of the same men were behind him. And there had been no change in the principle. If it was a good principle in 1872, it was not less a good principle in 1882. Now, in 1882 the Liberals fought that gerrymander with all the ability and all the energy characteristic of them in every war for good laws. They declared that if they ever got the opportunity, if the people of this country returned them to power, they would make it a point to repeal that law and to undo that wrong, as far as lay in their power. In every election since 1882 this has been before the public. We presented to the public on every platform on which we spoke, the injustice of the law, by which no less than 50 constituencies were cut and carved to suit the exigencies of the political party in power for the ostensible reason that they wished to find room for six additional members and to equalize the population. Now, you know, Mr. Speaker, as well as I can tell you, and those hon. gentlemen who have paid attention to the matter know, that population was not equalized by the law of 1882, that that argument was not vindicated by that law. The equalization of population was not even as well carried out under that Gerrymander Bill of 1882 as it could have been without interfering with county boundaries. My hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) last night stated that the Liberal party went back on representation by population altogether. I am satisfied that that hon. gentleman has not studied the figures of population for the several electoral divisions. If he had, he would have concluded that there was a wider difference between the larger and smaller electoral divisions under this Bill of 1882 than there ever was before.

I have stated that it was the intent and purpose of the Conservative party at that time in introducing this Bill to gain a political advantage. One of their ablest members, a gentleman who stood high in the ranks of the party in 1882, one whose ability has not been equalled in the Conservative party, probably, for twenty years, a gentleman who remained in the Conservative party for many years afterwards, stated in this House, in my own hearing, and in the hearing of many of those present, that what was done in 1882, with his assistance and with the assistance of other members of the Conservative party, was a gross blunder. He said: After ten years' experience, and looking upon this question from a political stand-point, I am forced to the conclusion that the Conservative party committed a gross blunder when they forced that law through Parliament and placed it on the statute-books of this country. Now, when an eminent man of their party, after viewing the question from every stand-point, makes such a statement, a man who was consulted and helped to carry that law through—when such a man makes such an acknowledgment before the entire country, in the open Parliament of Canada, we must attach considerable importance to it. Now,

I can show that the action of the party in connection with this matter was designed. Instead of calling in two men, as it has been said—wrongfully said—that the Minister of Customs had done, to assist in preparing this Bill, the leader of the Conservative party called in the whole party to assist in the gerrymander of 1882. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) shakes his head. I know whereof I speak, and I will give him an instance which will convince him, as well as any other person who is open to conviction, that the instructions came from the various counties and electoral divisions to assist Sir John Macdonald in making up the Bill brought before this House in 1882.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman said the whole Conservative party. I was a member of the Conservative party, and I was a member of Parliament, and I was never consulted.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I mean those they thought worth while to consult, and if he did not happen to be one of those, he can't blame me for it. Now, I take my own county. In the first draft of the Bill that received its first reading, my county was divided into three ridings, south, centre and north, certain groups of townships being in each. The party in the county of Huron saw that the division was not going to gerrymander the county, which had a Liberal majority of over 800, and they were bound to get two out of the three seats. Circulars were sent out broadcast to different parts of the county, and the ringleaders of the party held a large convention in the town of Wingham in April, 1882, and they divided the county entirely different from the division in the Bill, they divided it into south, east and west. Now, let me tell you how things stood when the division was made. According to the election returns of 1878, the only basis of information that these men had, they made East Huron, which I now represent, have 89 of a Conservative majority, and they made West Huron, which is now represented by our hon. friend from that riding (Mr. Holmes), have a Conservative majority of 105, as based upon the election returns of 1878. In the south riding they hived the Grits, and gave them a majority of over 800, according to the election returns of 1878. Now, here were two Liberal-Conservative constituencies hewn out of a county which was largely Reform. But how did they reason after they did this? They said: There is North Middlesex, which, in 1878, only gave a majority to Tim Coughlin of eight, we must come to his support. Now here is South Huron, they said, with a Liberal majority of 800, and there is the town of Exeter with a Conservative majority, according to the last returns, of 115. We will take Exeter out and send it away 15 miles, and make it part of North Middlesex. And so they took Tim Coughlin out of his trouble, and he came back in 1882 with 109 of a majority instead of eight as he formerly had.

Now, let us go to the adjoining county which was affected by the gerrymander, we will take the county of Perth. I think my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) referred to Perth, and to Mr. Trow who represented it. I want here to show the fallacy of the argument which the hon. gentleman used last night when he said it was Mr. Trow's own friends that defeated him. Now, Mr. Trow represented South Perth for a number of years. The Liberal-Conservative party said: If we can take South Easthope which gave a majority of 193 to Mr. Trow in 1878—if we can take that away from him and add to it the township of Osborne, one of the townships of the county of Huron which gave a majority of 60 against Mr. Trow in 1882, we will be sure to defeat him. Well, in 1882 Mr. Trow ran for South Perth and carried it by a larger majority than he had before. Then our friends opposite say: Don't you see that the gerrymander Act did not affect Mr. Trow, and, therefore, it was an innocent thing. Is that correct reasoning? Would a subtraction of 193 Liberal votes in his constituency and an addition of 60 Conservative votes help to elect Mr. Trow? I trow not. Mr. Trow was elected partly on account of his popularity in his riding, secondly on account of the policy that he advocated, but thirdly and principally, by a large number of Conservatives, who had become disgusted by the action of the Conservative party in gerrymandering the county as they did, refusing to vote, and some of them voting for the Liberal candidate. After that was settled, just take North Perth and see what they did. They said: Now, there is North Perth, Mr. Hesson's majority is gradually lessening, he will probably be defeated this time, and how can we serve him best? We will take from him, they said, North Easthope, which gave the Liberal candidate at the previous election a majority of no less than 309, and we will put that into North Oxford. Now North Oxford gave a majority to Mr. Thomas Oliver in 1878, of 903. There were 193 votes taken away from South Perth to assist Mr. Oliver to carry that constituency at the next general election. There were 309 votes now taken from North Perth and given to Thomas Oliver, which gave him 503 votes altogether. Now, they said to Mr. Hesson: We have made you safe, more than safe; we have taken 303 votes that were polled against you at the last election, and now you can afford to lose a little north of the county of Perth. Don't you know that North Wellington is not very safe? Now, since we took away 303 Liberal votes from you, just allow us to take 68 Conservative votes and give them to Mr. McMullen in the form of the township of Wallace. Then Wallace was taken from the north of Perth and added to

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

North Wellington, and at the next general election gave 116 against Mr. McMullen, the present member for North Wellington. Now was it the 116 votes that enabled Mr. McMullen to carry the north riding? Was it by reason of the gerrymander, or in spite of the gerrymander? Everybody knows that in spite of the gerrymander Mr. McMullen carried North Wellington.

Now, in regard to population, did they equalize population? Did any Conservative ever hear any argument in favour of the gerrymander of 1882 other than it would equalize population? Not a single argument has ever been adduced, not even the hon. member for West York has adduced any argument in favour of that gerrymander other than it was supposed to equalize the population of the different electoral divisions. I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to give a single argument in favour of breaking up the 50 different constituencies for the purpose of attaining that object. Well, was the object attained? Let me give you a few figures to show that it was not. Take these 14 ridings, and remember that I have excluded the cities, because if included, the comparison would be more in favour of the contention that I am making. East Elgin, North Essex, South Grey, East Grey, Kent, East Middlesex, North Perth, Russell, North Simcoe, East Simcoe, Welland, North Wellington, Centre Wellington, South Wellington. These all possess a population of 365,825. Now, you will see that 14 members represent a population of that number, making for each member 26,345, or 18 per cent above the unit of representation which in Ontario was 22,481. Now take another group of 14 where, we will suppose, the population was to be equalized. Brockville, Frontenac, South Grenville, North Leeds and Grenville, Monck, West Peterborough, North Wentworth, South Wentworth, Peel, Lennox, Cardwell, West Hastings, South Lanark, East Hastings. These fourteen electoral divisions contain a population of 218,965, or an average population of 15,625 for each of the fourteen members returned. On the one hand you have 26,345 for each member, and on the other hand only 15,625, or more than 10,000 of a difference. Is that an equalization of population? Will a single member of the House say that there has been an equalization of population when you have 150,000 more people in the larger fourteen electoral divisions than in the smaller, or in the one case 18 per cent below the unity of population and in the other 43 per cent above it? If the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) were here to night, he would not be able to answer these figures. But there is a worse condition in Lower Canada. I am not going to deal with the gerrymander in that part of the country, but take the group composing the ten following divisions:—Jacques Cartier, Argenteuil, Laval, Montmagny, Napierville, Souanges, Three Rivers, Vaudreuil, Montmorency and Chambly. These ten divisions contain a population of 118,542 or 11,854 for each member. Take another group, containing the following divisions:—Champlain, Beauce, Lévis, Richmond and Wolfe, Nicolet, Ottawa County, Rimouski, Temiscouata, Hochelaga and Portneuf. These divisions have a population of 313,729, or an average for each member of 31,372. In one case each member represents three times as many people as in the other, and this is under the present Gerrymander Bill. Will any hon. member venture to say that that measure was successful in equalizing the population? The only argument adduced in support of the Bill of 1882? Can a better condition of matters be obtained by the retention of county boundaries? I think so. I went carefully over the counties of Ontario, and it entailed a good deal of work. I divided these counties, irrespective of party politics, and found that I could make a more equitable division as to population by the retention of county boundaries than obtains under the present law. If that is true, which it is, I hold that we can go back to county boundaries with perfect justice and retain the standard of population upon a more equitable basis than that which we now possess. I find that, under the present law, there are twelve electoral divisions under 16,000 population. Under the division, which I have made, there would be none under 16,000. I find that there are fifteen electoral divisions under 18,000 population. Under the division which I have made there would be ten under 18,000. I find that there are thirty-one electoral divisions under 20,000. Under the division which I have made, there would be only thirteen. Under the present law there are thirty-three electoral districts with a population of over 23,000. Under the division which I have made there would be only sixteen electoral divisions with a population of over 23,000. Under the present law there are eighteen electoral divisions with a population of over 25,000. Under my division there would only be eight divisions with a population of over 25,000 retaining county boundaries in every case. There is another reason for the retention of county boundaries. There are nineteen counties in Ontario which require no division at all, the county being entitled to but one member, and, therefore, the opportunity of gerrymandering these would not exist. No gerrymanderer's hand could touch these counties, because the boundaries are of a permanent character. They could not be touched by any party that might happen to be in power. There are fourteen counties which only require one division. You cannot gerrymander such counties without everybody seeing it, and therefore the power to gerrymander these fourteen counties would be reduced to minimum. There are ten counties which require two or more divisions, and therefore in those only can the hand of the gerrymanderer be successfully used. By retaining county boundaries it would be impossible, every time we had to change the Redistribution Act of this country, after the decennial census, that the hand of the gerrymanderer could interfere with the majorities, because county boundaries would become permanent, and these local affairs in which the people are all engaged would be put on a permanent basis in the various counties. There is another point I wish to bring out strongly, and I would be glad if any hon. gentleman who answers me would give an explanation of the figures which I am about to present, if the reason which I propose to give is not in accordance with his views. It was said last night by some hon. members, that the previous gerrymanders did not affect the Conservative party beneficially as a whole, and there were various reasons advanced by various speakers, in support of that contention. Hon. gentlemen took groups of counties, here and there, and compared the majorities, but this comparison of majorities must lead to wrong conclusions. We are agreed that we must compare the whole vote of the province. I have, therefore, taken the trouble to go over the whole vote of the province of Ontario after the election held in 1891. I also took the returns as corrected by the by-elections, a number of which followed the general elections. I found that there was, in Ontario, 186,000 Conservative votes polled, in round numbers, and 182,000 Liberal votes polled. It will be admitted by everybody that ten Conservatives should have as much power and influence at the polls as ten Liberals, or that 100 of one party should have as much power and influence at the polls as 100 of the other, or 1,000, or 100,000. Is that not a sound doctrine to advance? If it is, let me proceed to my argument. If the argument is sound, 182,000 voters should return within one member of the number returned by 186,000 votes. Adding 186,000 and 182,000 gives you a total of 368,000 votes polled altogether in the province of Ontario. There were ninety-two members elected, which made 4,000 votes as the average for each member. It will be admitted that every 4,000 Liberal voters should have the same power and influence at the polls as every 4,000 Conservative voters. But did they? Let us see how we stood in this House? We had thirty-three members representing the Liberal party after the election of 1891, and we had fifty-nine Conservative members representing the Conservative party, or, in other words, we had thirty-three members representing 182,000 votes, and fifty-nine members representing 186,000 votes. How did that disparity come in? Did it come in by chance? Not at all. It came in by the action of the gerry-mander in hiving large numbers of Liberals together in different electoral divisions, thus nullifying and neutralizing the power which they otherwise would have had of expressing themselves at the polls. For every 3,150 votes polled by the Conservatives they obtained a member to represent them in this House, but it required 5,550 votes to be polled by the Liberals to elect a Liberal member to represent them in this House. Can that be explained upon any other ground than that the influence of the Liberal party was neutralized as it was in South Huron and in North Oxford? Here were 500 electors who had no influence in North Oxford, whose influence would have been felt if they had been allowed to remain in South or North Perth, and if they had not been put in a constituency where there was a Liberal majority of 903. The whole thing was wrong from beginning to end, and need you wonder that, at the first opportunity which is presented we are going to undo the wrong, as far as we can, that was perpetrated in 1882 against the Liberals of this country. I want to draw the attention of the House to a few other things and I am done. What are we going to accomplish? What are the results of the Bill that we are now repealing? I feel glad that I have had the opportunity of giving it a last kick, as it withdraws its slimy coils from the statute-books of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). That is all right. I have proven those facts. It rendered null and void a fair expression of public opinion, and I challenge any person to controvert that statement. It failed to secure a fair representation of the population in the electoral divisions. I have shown that by the figures taken from the returns. It has disregarded geographical compactness, because it has cut and carved and shaped into grotesque figures, fifty of the electoral divisions of this province for the purpose of securing room for six Conservative members. It has rendered stability impossible, by disregarding any permanent lines. We had nineteen counties that could not be touched, fourteen that only required one division, and, therefore, there is a stability in connection with our county lines that cannot be obtained under the existing Act. It has neutralized the power of the Liberal party at the polls. Did I not show you that, when I proved that it takes 5,500 Liberal votes to get a member, and only 3,150 Conservative votes. It was unconstitutional in spirit. I do not know whether it was unconstitutional in fact or not, but certainly it was unconstitutional in spirit, because it robbed the people of a sacred trust, and a sacred right and privilege, when it nullified the power that the constitution purported to give the people. It enabled the Conservative party to legislate into this House their own political friends.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Did it not do that? Will the hon. gentleman who shakes his head, be kind enough to explain on any other ground, how fifty-nine members came into this House on the same vote as thirty-three members, unless they were foisted in by this Act. Instead of being elected by the free and independent electors of this country, they were legislated into the Parliament of Canada to assist the Conservative party who put this iniquitous Bill on the statute-book. It ignored the community of interests and destroyed those that did exist. You all know that there is a community of interest which grows up in counties. The people of a county meet as jurors, as county councillors, they meet in a hundred ways, and this community of interest has been broken up by this law, and one part of a county put in one direction and the other part of a county put in another direction, as I have pointed out.

Now, what does the Bill which we are now considering propose to give us? This Bill proposes to restore the county boundaries, and make something permanent in the boundaries of electoral divisions. It preserves the community of interests. It enables the people of a county to meet together on all occasions for the purpose of considering these interests that grow up amongst them, and it enables the people to become acquainted with each other. As Sir John Macdonald said: Young men who have the ability to represent their constituencies in Parliament, may commence by going to the township council, and then to the county council, where they become acquainted with the Reeves, and in the process of time they may develop into politicians and wish to be elected to this House. Sir John Macdonald told us that when a county is broken up, that acquaintance between them is also broken up.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the hon. gentleman allow me?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Certainly.

Mr. SPROULE. If that is the result of this Bill, and if it is so desirable, why does not the hon. gentleman carry it out all over the province? Why does the Government allow eastern Ontario, where the county boundaries are broken up, to remain broken up?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). We have commenced at this present time to go as far as we deem necessary. We have commenced the work that we will complete, probably in 1902. We will be in power in 1902, and after the census are taken, we will complete the work we have commenced, and try and undo all the evil done by the Gerrymander Bill of 1882. This Bill secures to a very great extent the permanency of the electoral divisions. Gerrymanders will be reduced to a minimum. It will secure a fair expression of public opinion on all matters brought before the people, and it has been admitted by those who spoke that the principles underlying the Bill are good. A large number have expressed themselves in favour of maintaining county boundaries, and several speakers have acknowledged that the proposal to submit the subdivisions to a committee of judges is of the very best character. If we wished to take advantage of the Liberal-Conservative party, as they took advantage of the Liberals in 1882, could we not sit down and gerrymander, and cut, and carve, and give ourselves an advantage which nothing could overcome at the approaching election. But, Sir, we are willing to do what we all said was right and just. We have come here with fifty-five majority, and can carry anything we wish, but we propose to be fair. We say we will restore the county boundaries which we have said we would restore, and after we go that far, we hand the whole matter over to a commission of judges, who are above suspicion, and above the influence of political parties, and we say to them: Go to work and make the subdivisions in the interests of the country, and not in the interests of party. If we had taken the opposite course, we could gain the advantage that the Liberal-Conservative party gained in 1882, but we are above that. The Liberals are ready to stay out of power unless they are sent here by the fair and independent vote of the electorate of this country. Every Liberal who comes here as a supporter of the Government and as a supporter of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) comes here with the consent, and by the votes of those who gave him their confidence, and he does not wish to come in any other way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have one or two more points to refer to. The leader of the Opposition always uses strong language, and in this case he hurled some very strong epithets against the Bill. I wish him, or any other of his friends, to try and justify the words he used. He told us the Bill was grossly unfair. In what respect? Does it not return to the old condition that existed from confederation up to 1882, the condition of retaining the county boundaries, and in favour of which Sir John Macdonald made such an eloquent speech in 1872. Is it unfair because it does that? Is it grossly unfair because it leaves the subdivisions to the judges of the land? The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) said that this was an infamous Act and a monstrous Act, and an outrage upon the electorate, but not one of his supporters who spoke dared attempt to prove that. Does it outrage the electorate by restoring county boundaries, and by leaving the subdivision to the judges? If it does not outrage the electorate, how can it be called an outrage against the electorate? Does it not equalize population as well as the old Bill? I have shown that it does that better than the old Bill, notwithstanding what the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) said last night. I challenge him to prove that the Bill of 1882 made a more equal division of the population than the Bill of 1872. I challenge the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ross Robertson) to prove that this Bill is a violation of the principles of representation by population. He complained bitterly of the Liberal party for not giving Toronto a greater representation. Does not this Bill give Toronto a greater representation than any other Bill you ever had? It makes a more equitable distribution of the population of the city of Toronto than the Bill of 1882. To prove this, I will show you what the distribution of the constituencies of Toronto under that Bill was. West Toronto had 22,983; Centre Toronto had 24,867, and East Toronto had 38,565—not a very fair distribution of the population. There were three members given to the city of Toronto at that time, which gave a population of 28,805 for each. Now, come forward with me 10 years, when Toronto received an additional member under the Redistribution Bill of Sir John Thompson. Sir John Thompson was a fair man, and he sought to do the very best he could for the city of Toronto in 1892. He increased the membership for that city by one. The population of Toronto had increased from 86,000 in 1882 to 144,023 in 1892, so that by Sir John Thompson's redistribution Toronto received a representative for every 36,006. That is what the two Conservative redistribution Bills gave to Toronto. Now, we propose to give that city five members. We did propose to base that representation on the population of 1891, on which basis Toronto would have a member for every 28,804, or 8,000 less for each member than in 1892.

Mr. CLARKE. Might I ask my hon. friend if he overlooks the fact that by this Bill there is over 30,000 being added to the population from the county of York?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Well, we will take the present population of about 180,000, which would give a basis for each of the five members of 36,000. Sir John Thompson in 1892 made the basis 36,006, and you did not blame him. You did not cry aloud in the various papers belonging to the party. You made no fuss at that time.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Dumb as oysters.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). But now, when the Liberal party are giving you the same representation by population which you received under Sir John Thompson's redistribution in 1892, you blame us.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the hon. gentleman now kindly give us the figures for the county of York?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I have separated the city of Toronto wholly and entirely. As I said before, every constituency that has a community of interests should be separated from others that are different; that is a fundamental principle in making electoral divisions. A farming community should not be allied with a city community, because the community of interest among the farmers is wholly and entirely different, and no man can represent the two at the same time because they are opposed.

Mr. CLARKE. If the hon. gentleman has no objection, however, it would be interesting to have the figures regarding the county of York put beside those which he has given of the city of Toronto.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I have not the figures of the county of York. I am answering the argument made by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) last night, when he claimed that Toronto was not sufficiently represented; and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) is drawing a red herring across the trail in order to avoid a rebuttal of the argument of the hon. member for East Toronto. Another thing said by the hon. member for East Toronto last night was that when we on this side of the House said that many members living in the city of Toronto and representing other constituencies would look after the interests of the city, we might as well say that they would look after the interests of this city because their post office addresses were here. I expected a sounder argument from the hon. gentleman than that. Although our post office addresses are here, our interests are not here, whereas the interests of a large number of gentlemen who live in Toronto and represent other constituencies are in Toronto. They are manufacturers, money lenders, or are engaged in various kinds of business in that city. As Toronto prospers they prosper; consequently, their interest becomes identified with the interest of Toronto to some extent, and, therefore, to my mind Toronto is better represented in Parliament than any other division in the entire country. We have four able-bodied men—and I speak literally when I say that—from the city of Toronto. Three are sitting on the opposite side; one I am glad to say is sitting behind me, and probably two or three more will do so after the next election. We have four members from the city of Toronto—Mr. Clarke, Mr. Bertram, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Osler. These gentlemen are specified by the electorate to come here and look after their interests. But in addition, we have Mr. Mulock, whose interests are more largely in the city of Toronto than in North York, and who, while not neglecting North York, will certainly look after the interests of Toronto. Then we have Mr. Maclean, whose whole interests I believe are centered in the city of Toronto, although he represents East York, and he will certainly look after his interests in the city of Toronto. Then we have our honoured and highly respected Speaker, who presides with such dignity over us, and who to-day represents a rural constituency. But whose business interests are in Toronto.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Then we have the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who represents that constituency well; but that does not prevent him also representing the interests of Toronto, which I am sure he will stand by when necessary. Then we have Mr. Craig, who I understand has gone to live in the city of Toronto, and who will look after its interests. Toronto has a right to claim a proper recognition.

An hon. MEMBER. It wants the earth.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). My hon. friend says it wants the earth. It has already a good deal of it. In addition to these hon. members, Toronto is very largely represented in the other House. We have senators there who will look after the bad Bills of the House of Commons, as they call them, and give them the six months' hoist sometimes, especially if the interests of Toronto are involved. There are Senator Allan, Senator O'Donohue, Senator Cox, Senator Reesor, and Senator Aikens, all from Toronto. There are fourteen able-bodied men representing the interests of Toronto, and still these hon. gentlemen will get up and declaim against this Bill on the ground that Toronto is not fairly represented on the floor of Parliament. Do you want two or three more citizens of Toronto down here to look after its interests? I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite that if Toronto sends men down here who will give a righteous support to a righteous Government in dealing with the affairs of this country upon broad and statesmanlike principles, they will get more for Toronto through the application of those principles than they can by opposing a Government that seeks to do the best it can for the interests of the country.

Mr. CLARKE. That is the principle.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). And remember, Toronto is awake; Toronto is on the tip-toe to shake off men like the hon. member for East Toronto, who makes short speeches of fifteen minutes, taking seven and a half minutes to condemn the Conservative party, and seven and a half minutes to condemn the Liberal party, and, when he has condemned both parties and shown that they cannot do anything, he sits down without suggesting anything himself. I have remarked his speeches, short and concise as they are, as if he had them by heart. I never heard from the hon. gentleman any suggestion as to what he would do on any public question, if he were elected to lead either party in this country. I believe in a man finding fault and criticising the actions of any Government or party which he does not approve, but if he is capable of criticism, he ought to be capable of giving some solution of the questions he is discussing. I have never yet heard, however, a solution enunciated by the hon. member. I have never heard from him anything but a condemnation of either party, just as the whim takes him, when he rises to address the House.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Macdonald) has certainly been kind to the House in this respect, that he has not treated us to one of the ordinary four-hour speeches peculiar to him. But if he has not given us a lengthy statement this time, he has still given us the old elements which have always characterized his speeches, namely, sanctimoniousness of expression and righteous contempt and disgust for everything not truly pious and eminently holy. In that particular line, he has always posed and excelled, while at the same time professing an amount of humility that would make Uriah Heep blush; and, were the Pharisee standing near by when the hon. gentleman was declaiming about the vices and wrong-doings of others, he would have at once given up his place to the hon. member for South Huron. The chief burden of his complaint was a vehement denunciation of the so-called Gerrymander Act of 1882. While he did not adduce any particular argument or show that it was very bad, he did at least one thing, and that was to denounce in the most unsparing language the Act itself and those connected with it. It is not to be wondered at that the hon. gentleman should denounce a gerrymander, because he comes from a county where gerrymanders are laughed to scorn, as being puny and pigmy efforts to throttle political opponents. It is not to be wondered at that he should look upon an ordinary gerrymander with scorn, because he represents part of a county where the hon. gentleman and his friends pride themselves on the fact that, instead of resorting to gerrymanders, they are township throttlers. In that county they never attempt to kill a political opponent in the ordinary Christian style of annexing him to another riding, but they go up and down, from one township to another, in order to change political limits. They are not content to divide people who have lived in counties for years, side by side, but the people who actually live in the townships.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Not in my riding.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman at once seeks cover with the pharasaical excuse that it is not in his own particular riding, but just across the road. It is really wonderful to see how the hon. gentleman is willing to run away from the wrong-doing that has been practised in his own county of Huron. Take a glance at the map, showing how that county is divided by the local House, and what do you see? We see exactly an example of what this hon. gentleman would, in his vindictiveness and spleen, apply to the Conservative party all over the province, if he had his own sweet will; that is, he would go in—if the hon. Minister of Customs will pardon my resorting to his language—and tear assunder, throw to the winds, hurl to pieces, and batter to atoms, all semblance of townships, towns and villages; and I must apologize to the Minister of Customs for not being able to deliver in the tone of voice which distinguishes him. The choice selections I have taken from his vocabulary. What did they do in the county of Huron? Finding it utterly impossible to divide the county, having regard to boundary lines and keeping the townships and villages intact, so that they could secure supporters, what did these truly pious gentlemen do in that riding? They took the township of Hullet and placed part of it in the riding of West Huron, and it is worth while noticing that the hon. gentleman, with the assistance of Capt. Sullivan and the rest of the machine, secured a majority of one in that riding for Mr. Garrow, the Liberal candidate. The way they got that majority of one was by taking half the township of Hullet, which gave 44 of a Liberal majority. Had they not split the township of Hullet in half, the Liberals would not have secured that riding, and a Conservative would have been elected.

Then, they came to the riding of South Huron in the local House. They found that the Conservatives had been beaten by about 20 of a majority, and they took from the riding of South Huron a large portion of the township of Goderich, which gave a Conservative majority of 120 odd. Had that Conservative majority of 120, which was placed in West Huron and taken from South Huron, been left, as it should have been, in the south riding, the result would have been that a Conservative would have carried that riding, too, and there would have been two ridings in Huron Conservative, whereas to-day only one is represented by a Conservative at the local House.

Yet this hon. gentleman mourns and deplores political immorality, when he lives in a county where the grossest outrages have been committed, where municipalities were torn apart in order that party gains might be effected. All through the speech of the hon. gentleman, as through every speech he has ever made, there is an amount of hypocritical cant and pharasaical indignation that can only be equalled by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen).

This Bill is before the people in the guise of what? As announced by the hon. Postmaster General, it is not a Bill for the apportionment fairly of all these constituencies in the Dominion. There is no principle in it, as I think I shall be able to show, but it is, as stated by the Postmaster General, and other gentlemen on that side who followed him, a Bill simply intended to deal out vindictiveness to political opponents and attempt to destroy them. Where does the great Liberal party stand on the question to-day before the House? Every one of them who addressed this House, justified the action of the Government on the ground that it is a redemption of their pledges. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am bound to say that the whole country is laughing at this great party in its attempt to redeem its pledges. Talk of the Government party trying to redeem its pledges. Why, they have issued postage stamps which they will not redeem to-day. The Postmaster General actually went about the country, hawking postage stamps, and sold them to an unsuspecting public, and, when to-day you go to his department and ask for cash, they actually refuse to redeem the stamps. Worse than that, they will not give you in exchange for the larger ones smaller stamps that might be useful. And this party that cannot even redeem a postage stamp stands up and roars about redeeming its pledges. This only makes themselves absurd in the eyes of fair-minded and right thinking men. But they are doing one thing and the Premier, no doubt, will claim credit for it—they are breaking the principles which are hardly cold upon their lips, declared when a Bill of this kind was before Parliament to be dealt with. On that occasion what did we hear from the present Premier. That hon. gentleman, then the leader of the Opposition, did not stand up in his place and ask to have the matter referred to the judges of the country, but he moved this resolution:—

That all the words after "That" in the said motion be omitted, and the following be inserted instead thereof:—"That Bill No. 76, an Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, be referred to a conference or committee to be composed of both political parties, to agree upon the lines or principles on which a redistribution Bill should be drawn."

The right hon. gentleman had not then the power to carry out that resolution, not having a majority in the House. But to-day when he has a majority and can carry the declaration of that resolution into effect, not a word is heard about it; and the right hon. gentleman then so anxious to be fair to everybody that he wished to have the Government of Sir John Thompson have a conference between the two political parties, forgets that he made that pledge or rather took that stand, and to-day, is perfectly oblivious to his action some ten years ago.

Well, Sir, the next great question that is involved in this, outside and apart from dealing out vindictiveness and spleen to political opponents, is the question of the constitutionality of the Act. All I can say on that score is that the law has always been looked upon as common sense, and no man ever anticipated that every year the political party that happened to have a majority in this House would come down and rearrange the constituencies with a view to party needs and party benefits.

Mr. BENNETT.

And the present Premier himself, in 1892, made a statement on that ground clearly showing that his present position is not tenable. Speaking in the same debate he said:—

The periodical redistribution of seats in this House is a standing order of our constitution. It is not a matter as to which the Government are free to act, which they can repudiate or which they can accept; if it were so, it would be open to each party to deal with it in a manner best suited to its own interests, in the conception which both parties hold of their own rights. But it is not such a matter. The Government, in introducing this Bill, are simply carrying out an organic disposition of constitutional law, and we submit that it would be a monstrous consequence if, when the Government are carrying out an organic disposition of the constitutional law, they were to carry it out in such a way as to steal an advantage over their opponents.

So that idea was accepted, and has always been accepted, that the only and proper time to make a readjustment of the constituencies is after the decennial census. But these hon. gentlemen no longer take the ground that they are within their legal rights but, as announced by the Postmaster General and echoed by the hon. gentleman who has last spoke in plain English they intend to take every means to endeavour to get even with their political opponents. That being the merits of the case, they must recognize that they are on a par with the Government of the province of Ontario, they are endeavouring to throttle their political opponents and are throwing to the winds all ideas of fair play or constitutional rights and privileges. Now, the hon. gentlemen prate largely of county boundaries. I am free to say that it is desirable to observe as far as possible, the existing county boundaries; but we cannot be bound by county boundaries at all times, by reason of the fact that the counties are of such sizes and shapes that the principle is not always applicable. It never can have been anticipated that we should be bound down to that principle for all time. Hon. gentlemen opposite all agree that up to the year 1882 there was a popular and fair distribution of the constituencies of the province of Ontario. If that is the case, why do not they revert to it? Why do not they accept the constituencies which then existed? Why blot out Bothwell, Cardwell and Monck—for all these existed prior to 1882. The real reason is that these hon. gentlemen see in the signs of the times warning that they must begin to put their house in order. That is the reason why they are blotting out Cardwell and Bothwell. Monck, I may say, was dealt with in the redistribution of 1892. And among the chief declaimers in support of this Bill is the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who is to be greatly benefited by it. Of all men who have secured a seat in this House by misrepresentation,—if that is a parliamentary phrase—before the electors, I will be bound to say, and I am in the judgment of the House, none is more noteworthy than the hon. member for North Wellington. Knowing the closeness of his constituency, he is afraid to go back to that riding; so on bended knee he is obliged to beg the Government to cut out this riding of Cardwell as it exists to-day. And what is the result? The cutting out of Cardwell will remove from the hon. member for North Wellington two townships which at the present time give him a great deal of concern. He will be pleased to lose the townships Amaranths, which goes into the new county of Dufferin, and Wallace, which goes back into Perth. By these means the hon. member, who is afraid to meet his constituency, will be relieved of an adverse majority of three hundred odd. This, on the very face of it, shows the insincerity of the hon. gentlemen, when they whine about the return to the state of affairs as they existed before 1882; because if they did return to that state of affairs, Cardwell would continue to exist as it does to-day.

Now the hon. gentlemen are taking great credit to themselves for the fact that they are not going to carve the constituencies. Well, I am free to admit, and I have no doubt other hon. gentlemen will agree with me, we must all feel much safer in the hands of the judges of the Superior Court than we should in the hands of some of the Judge Jeffreys who sit on the other side. We find at least this consolation in the Bill. But here is the trouble with the judges—that they are not allowed to exercise the power of re-arranging the constituencies fairly having regard to the geographical position and having regard to the population. Take the case, for instance, of the county of Simcoe. There is a county with a population of some 82,000. There should be 27,000 in each riding. And yet, I will be bound to say, the judges will rearrange it in such a manner as that Simcoe will have 23,000; East Simcoe 31,000 and North Simcoe 28,000. It is utterly impossible, owing to the way in which the townships lie alongside each other, that there should be any other arrangement of these three constituencies in this county than the one I have given. For that reason, I protest against the Government introducing and passing the Bill in its present shape, for the county of Simcoe is entitled fairly to have four members instead of three. But these hon. gentlemen hope that, custom being the law of the land, they may get some party advantage in cutting up the townships. As I understand it, there are to be no particular instructions given to the judges. For that reason they may accept the principle which has been accepted in arranging constituencies for the local legislature—they may cut up townships. And if that is done, I say it is worse than the present arrangement. Now one question which has been dealt with is the question of population, as well as this other question of county boundaries. If these hon. gentlemen are going to contend for principle at all, why do they not as they have been repeatedly asked, apply the principle to the whole province of Ontario of the preservation of county boundaries.

Why, right in the county of North Leeds, the representative of that constituency lives in the town of Smith's Falls, and if county boundaries were observed he would be swept into the next riding, and politically dead; and that is the reason why, in that county they break county boundaries. And so you can go through different portions of eastern Ontario, and you will find that these gentlemen have studiously avoided the application of the principle of county boundaries because it would be a death-blow to some of their political friends. They talk about principle in the Bill. Let the ordinary citizen of Ontario listen to their declarations about principle, and then look at their performances. Look also at the question of population and the absurdities that result. Take the case of Brant, which has been so much discussed in the House. There are to be two ridings, which will have, if they are equally divided in point of population, about 16,000 people. Now, my hon. friend, after disfranchising the Indians and preventing them from voting, asks to have them brought into the computation. But, for the sake of argument, I will accept his own statement that there are 36,000 people in the county of Brant. Now, what follows? The county of Brant will be divided into two ridings, and the city of Brantford—I am within the mark when I make the statement—has over 15,000 people. So, there is a riding with 18,000 people, 15,000 of whom live in a city. So that, in effect, you are giving a representative to a city with a population of 15,000, plus 3,000 who may belong to an agricultural section. I suppose the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) will stand up and object to that law, because, before he sat down, he protested against cities and agricultural districts being coupled together. Now, they are going to apply the argument to the city of Toronto, and they say the people of that city shall not have the same representation as rural people; and yet here is a constituency that, with the exception of 3,000 people, is made up of the city of Brantford in its entirety.

Now, take the riding of Algoma, which to-day has a population of over 50,000 people, which is increasing every year by reason of the great mining industry that is being developed there, yet that riding is only entitled to one member. I need not go into the reasons, but I could tell the House very well why these hon. gentlemen do not wish to see Algoma divided into two ridings. But here is the absurdity in a Redistribution Bill of giving 50,000 people in Algoma only one representative, while the county of Albert, which is represented by a gentleman supporting the Government, with a population of less than 11,000, has a representative. Go through the province of Quebec, and what do you find? You find the small county of Verchères has a population of 12,200, Vaudreuil less than 11,000, Soulanges less than 10,000, Jacques Cartier under 14,000, Montmagny some 15,000, and so on. Then, take another riding represented by a supporter of the Government, Victoria in New Brunswick, that has a population of only 12,400. Now, let it be plainly understood that this Bill has no regard whatever for population, that the Government say frankly that in the province of New Brunswick 9,000 or 10,000 people shall have a representative, while the district of Algoma, with 50,000, shall have only a solitary representative. To go a little further and to make the absurdity even greater, we find that because Brant is looked upon as a Liberal riding, and although it has a population of only 36,000, of which 15,000 live in a city, it is entitled to a representative, while I have pointed out that the people of Toronto, whose political predilections are otherwise, are only entitled to one member for each 40,000. The hon. gentleman cannot help throwing off the mask, they cannot help confessing that this Bill is not a Bill for a fair and adequate representation of the people, that it is not a Bill that even dreams of giving fairness to political opponents; but it is, as the Postmaster General stated fairly the other day to the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), a Bill simply brought in to gain a party advantage over their political opponents.

Once again I want to refer to the old ridings of Cardwell and Monk. If these gentlemen wish to be honest in their declaration as to a return to the condition of affairs that existed before 1882, they have it in their power to-day, by virtue of their majority, to go back to Menck, to go back to Bothwell, and to go back to Cardwell. But I point out that a return to Cardwell means the political death of the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and probably the political death of the member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple). If they go back to the old riding of Monk, then it means that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) will have a closer fight than he otherwise would. It means more than that. Welland is a constituency that has existed for thirty odd years, and Welland, with over 30,000 people, is only to have one member, while Brant, almost abutting on it, because it is Liberal, with a little more population, is to have two members.

Well, a great ado is made about the judges. On that question, I have only to say that it would have been a great deal more manly if these hon. gentlemen had come down to the House, as Mr. Hardy and Sir Oliver Mowat did in their Redistribution Bills, and submit their figures and take the full responsibility for the measure. Then, the party would have known just what the Bill was going to do, because the session will have passed when this Bill is completed. I join in every word that was said last night by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) about the judges participating in this work. It is to be regretted that the judges are to be dragged into what will be actual politics. I am free to believe that there is not a gentleman occupying a place on the Superior Court bench of the province of Ontario who will not fairly endeavour to carry out the redistribution of representation. But when these gentlemen are so hampered, when they are so corralled, when they are only given certain premises to work upon, it is virtually impossible for them to make a fair redistribution of the province as a whole.

Now, Sir, what do hon. gentlemen hope to gain by this Bill? They have been challenged from this side of the House to show the unfairness of the Bill of 1882. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Ciancy) yesterday pointed out the fact that of all the constituencies affected by the Bill of 1882, the hon. gentlemen opposite did not lose one seat by that arrangement, but, on the contrary, they gained by it. Well, I have only this to say in conclusion, that if this Bill is placed before the public on the plea of its being the redemption of a pledge to secure a fair representation, it is far from being so, because they are not bringing about a fair representation even of the western part of the province of Ontario, much less the whole province. They are not redistributing the seats of the House of Commons, as the Bill states, either on the ground of principle or upon the ground of population. If the Bill becomes law it will become an act to aid and assist some party friends of the hon. gentlemen who are to-day sorely in need of assistance, and it is for this very reason that, although the hon. gentlemen have to-day in this House a majority at their back, they are afraid to face their opponents fairly and squarely where they to-day have a majority and where already they have the endorsement of the people.

Mr. GEORGE LANDERKIN (South Grey).
Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words upon this question before the motion is put. In the discussion that has taken place a good deal has been said in defence of the Bill passed in 1882, and, also, in defence of the Bill passed in 1891. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) pronounced the Bill of 1882 a good Bill, and said it was fair and just. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) said that the Bill of 1882 was a bad Bill, that he condemned it at the time and was very much opposed to it then. The hon. members for East Toronto and West York are not a united party on this question, although the hon. member for East Toronto praised the hon. member for West York because he had defeated the old Government. I think if there is anything in the history of the hon. member for West York that will entitle him to the commendation of the people of this country and of future generations, it is the fact that he contributed to their downfall. I think he is to be commended and I hope that posterity will remember the hon. gentleman for having done this great service in his public career. The hon. member for East Toronto said that it was a bad Bill that was passed in 1882, that it was an unfair Bill. Still, he condemns the Government because they want to remove something that is bad from the history of this country. I do not understand the position which the hon. member takes in this connection, when he says that a Bill is bad. I have the idea that it is the duty of the Government to remove that which is bad from the history of this country as far as it is in their power. Now then, it does appear to me that we scarcely ever hear, in this session, anything said about broken pledges. During the first session that we met after the general elections, the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), day after day, spoke against the Government for breaking their pledges because they had not enacted everything that was laid down in the platform of the Liberal party, in the first session. Now, we hear nothing about broken pledges, for, session after session, the Government are redeeming every pledge that was made and every plank that was placed in the platform of the Liberal party. Consequently, hon. gentlemen on the other side have not a single word to say in regard to that. It is to be noticed that when the Government are attempting to redeem the pledges that they made, they are meeting with the most strenuous opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite, which would indicate that they do not desire that the Government should redeem their pledges. It appears to me that the Government would meet with their approval if they did not redeem their pledges, and, in this connection, it is very desirable and it is very proper that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) should introduce this Bill, because, at the great national convention held in 1893 in the city of Ottawa, that hon. gentleman introduced the resolution stating that the Liberal party, if returned to power, would remove this iniquity from the statutes of the land. He is showing, by his introduction of this measure, that he is bound to redeem this pledge. Now, Sir, I have an idea that the principle, laid down by the Government, is a correct principle. I believe it is a wrong thing to disturb county boundaries.

An hon. MEMBER. Why?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I will tell you why, if you will listen. What I have to say may not be right, but I have my opinion on that subject. The people live in localities throughout the country; the first idea of the children and the young people is that they are living in a school section. Every school section belongs to a city or a rural municipality. They go from the school section to the township, or the village, or the city, as the case may be, as they grow up, and increased in knowledge, and they look upon them as their home. Whenever a change is made in the township, or when a township is removed from the county in which they were born, they look upon it as an outrage upon the family circle. The township is identified with the county; they go from the schools to the township councils, from the township to the county councils, from the county councils to the provinces, from the provinces to the Dominion, and step by step the people are identified with these successive stages in their progress and learn the first lessons of loyalty to their country from the institutions of the municipality, from the schools, the local councils, the local parliaments, and the House of Commons, until they become imbued with the feeling that the township is their home, that it belongs to the county and that their homes are part and parcel of it. Their highways are concerned in the administration. The administration of justice is concerned; the work of the county councils is identified with the county and they pass along from the township to the county, and it is worse than body-snatching to take a township from the county to which it belongs and place it in another county for the purpose of electing some one to Parliament that you may desire to have elected. This is the intention of the gerrymander, and I say, it is prejudicial to the development of national life. It is unworthy of a political party to take a township out of a county and place it in another county so as to disadvantage their opponents. It is not fair play. It has been the custom in England of the commissioners appointed to act in these matters to be instructed never to violate county boundaries in the divisions that they are about to submit to the House of Commons. That is one reason why I am opposed to the law that exists to-day. I am opposed to it because there was no fair play in it. I think parties should manifest fair play, one to another, and I think, when I show you the changes that were made under the Bills of 1882 and 1891, the House will agree with me that fair play was not the guiding star of the party that enacted that legislation, and that it was not intended to give fair play to their opponents as it was their duty to have done. The hon. member for West York said that the Government were afraid to face the people. In the thirty-eight or forty by-elections, that took place since the last general elections, every riding declared in support of the Administration with the exception of two. Only two constituencies out of thirty-eight or forty were favourable to the Opposition, or, at least, the Opposition only held two seats which they had held previous to the by-elections. Now, I think this shows to the hon. gentleman, or should show him that the Government are not afraid of the people, but that, on the other hand, the Opposition are afraid of the people and are afraid to appear before them in divisions formed on principles of fair play and upon county limits. I have here a list, which I will give to the House, of the changes that were made under that Act, and, I think, it will be found to be accurate on the whole. The House will observe and the people of the country will see that the Government are not introducing this measure ore bit too soon. I propose to show the changes made in the electoral divisions in Ontario by the Redistribution Act of 1882 which divisions are affected by the Redistribution Bill. I will give the name of the electoral division, the population in 1881, the population after the passing of this Bill, the nature of the changes, the population of the divisions transferred in 1882 as per the census of 1881, and also the votes cast in the elections of 1878 :

Cardwell.....		16,770
Toronto, 1891....			Put St. Andrew's and St. Mark's in West York, which gave Conservative majority 255.
" 1891....			Put St. Paul's and St. Mathew's in East York, which gave Conservative majority 261.

Now, these were the changes made at that time, and I propose to analyze them for a moment. Take the county of Simcoe. That is a county with a large population, and it had three members given to it. In that county which was large enough to have three representatives, they took West Gwillimbury and the village of Brantford out of the old historic county of Simcoe and put them into North York. They took Adjala and Mono out of the other side and put them into Cardwell, and in order to compensate for that change they took five townships out of Muskoka and put them into Simcoe. If you look at the vote given you will see that the change with regard to Gwillimbury and Brantford, was made to defeat the Postmaster General in North York, and it was done also to make Cardwell a strong Conservative constituency. It was done for no other purpose. The boundaries of the grand old county of Simcoe were changed at the west side, at the east side, and at the north side. Of course, when they took a township from the south-east corner of the county, they had to add some townships at the north-east side from the county of Muskoka; and then Ajala and Mono were added to Cardwell. If you take the county of Bruce, you find that in the Bill of 1882, Saugeen and Bruce were taken from North Bruce to which they belonged and were added to West Bruce, and the village of Port Elgin was left in North Bruce, although it was five miles from North Bruce, and the people of that village had to pass over the township of Saugeen in order to reach the constituency to which it was attached. It was said this was done for the purpose of equalizing the population. It was done for no such purpose at all. It was done for the purpose of defeating John Gillies, and it succeeded in doing that. In Grey, the township of Artemesia was taken from the centre of East Grey and was added to South Grey, because it gave a Conservative majority of 150 or 200. One township was left at the lower end of East Grey, and the people of that township, in order to go to the other part of the constituency, had to pass through the township of Artemesia. This was not done altogether for the purpose of strengthening the Liberal party in East Grey, but purely for the purpose of defeating the Liberals in South Grey. It was not needed for the purpose of equalizing the population; for Proton, which was at the lower end of the county could have been added just as well, but it did not suit to do that, because Proton would have given a Liberal majority; but the district of East Grey was very largely Conservative, and they could have afforded to add the township of Proton.

If you examine the statement which I have given to the House, you will find that all these changes were made purely for the purpose of getting a party advantage, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen if it is not a duty on the part of this Government to correct this injustice, and to restore county boundaries, and thus cultivate that spirit of loyalty and devotion which the people of this country should have towards their townships, their counties, their cities, their towns, and their villages. In the great city of Toronto, wards were thrown into adjoining constituencies for political purposes, and the harmony and unity of that city was destroyed for the purpose of gaining a poor, contemptible party advantage. When partyism runs so far and so wide and so wild, it should be checked, and the gentlemen who represent the city of Toronto should be the first to support this Government in removing this iniquity, and uniting that great city again. I am surprised that all the members for the city of Toronto do not support this Bill. This Government has dealt with the city of Toronto in a manner that no other Government has ever done. It has given that city more members than it had before, and it should show gratitude to this Government for having done it that justice which was denied to it before. It cannot be possible that the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) in opposing the Bill, is moved by fear that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) will move up to East Toronto and give him trouble there. Is it that which raises his indignation? There were certain omissions in the hon. gentleman's speech last night which were very noticeable to the House. He did not say a word about Wm. Mackenzie or Dan Mann, nor did he mention Van Horne. When he made these omissions, I thought it was because he was afraid that those powers might combine to assist the hon. member for East York to take East Toronto from him. Well, the hon. gentleman might move further. We do not know what divisions the judges may make. Leaving that work to the judges is the honourable British practice, and I understood that the hon. gentleman was devoted to Great Britain and the Empire. The sincerest form of admiration for Great Britain is imitation of what she does, and the hon. gentleman should be willing to follow the example set in England and preserve the county boundaries. The hon. gentleman said another thing last night to which I might refer. He spoke about the representation in the city of London. He did not tell us how many members there were for the city of London, but he led us to believe that there was a member for a very small population. The city of London proper has only two members; but in the whole city, with the boroughs around it, there are 5,000,000 people with 62 members. The hon. gentleman, being quite a mathematician, can soon find out what the unit of population for a member in London is. He will find that the unit there is about 73,000. While in the rural parts of England it is about 55,000, a difference of nearly 20,000. So that he should not complain if this Government is following the example set by Great Britain herself, and is giving representation in keeping with that which is given in the city of London and in England. Then, I did think that the hon. member for East Toronto said what he should not have said about the judges. I do not think he should have held up the judges as he did, because if there is a feature of this Bill that I like it is this feature, that the Government have discarded the party advantage which they might have had under this Bill, and have handed over to the judges the formation of the ridings in the different counties, in keeping with the convenience, the welfare and the population of those ridings. They have divested themselves of all partyism, and have left the judges to do justice between the contending parties in this country. There is something magnanimous about this step, and I do not wonder at the Opposition being surprised at the Government taking such a step. After laying down the principle that county boundaries shall be maintained, they leave the judges to divide the counties in accordance with fair-play and justice and the convenience of the people generally. This is something that should appeal to Britons, because this is what was done at the last revision in England. There they appointed a commission, which brought in a report, and that report was adopted by the House, and the counties were not disturbed in a single instance, though many boroughs were removed. The work was left to a commission of judges, just as the Government are doing here.

The Government have approached this question in a statesmanlike spirit, which should commend itself to the people. They are giving it to the judges to decide—something that was never done under the late Administration. They are taking a new course; they are not asking for any advantages, but are asking that the opponents of the Government shall be on the same footing as themselves. They do not ask the judges to take a township out of one county and put it in another for the purpose of gaining a party advantage. But they let the judges decide, and they have confidence in the judges. In all the years this side of the House was in Opposition, there never was heard a word from us in disparagement of the judiciary. I have to congratulate the Government on the course they have taken, and also for having carried out the pledges to which they were committed by the great convention that was held at Ottawa. The Government have redeemed their pledges, and now I believe this is the last plank in their platform that has to be carried. They have repealed the Superannuation Act and the Franchise Act, and given a plebiscite to the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes, that is one of the things to which they had committed themselves. They have reformed the tariff, and also given the preferential clause, which lowers the duty 25 per cent. Their pledges they are redeeming one by one to such an extent that hon. gentlemen opposite can no longer speak of broken pledges.

I think that this measure should go through. The hon. gentleman says it is unusual to introduce Bills of this kind at this time. Well, the late Sir John Macdonald, two years before the census was taken in 1859, readjusted the constituencies in Upper and Lower Canada. That is a precedent in addition to those already cited by the Government. I hope that this measure will pass, because it will remove from the people an Act everybody believes is bad and which most of the members, if they spoke with the same degree of sincerity as the hon. member for East Toronto did, would be willing the Government should replace by an Act based on the principles of justice and fair-play to both parties, and allow the decision to be given by the judges.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would not have had any remarks to make with regard to this Bill, were it not for some of the observations made yesterday on the other side of the House with respect to the constitutional aspect, and I desire very briefly to say a few words on that point. Before doing so, I would say to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that I think the country will hardly be so fully satisfied as he is that the Government have maintained all their pledges. The last vestige of protection has not yet been destroyed, I believe, and I also think some few pledges made, first and last, by nearly every member of the present Government throughout the country, with regard to economy, have not been quite fulfilled in their entirety. There are also a few people who have something to say about the question of prohibition. In fact, some suggest that, whereas formerly the Liberal party were in favour of prohibition as it is in Maine, and free trade as it is in England, they now seem to be going in for prohibition as it is in England, and free trade as it is in Maine.

With respect to the county boundaries, the hon. gentleman laid a great deal of stress on the Imperial example, which he invites us to follow. I venture to bring to his attention that throughout the British North America Act, where it touches this matter, I see every reference and stress laid upon representation by population, but do not see any particular reference to or stress laid upon county boundaries. Therefore, if we are to follow the intention of this Act, we shall devote our attention entirely to preserving in provinces, as well as between provinces, the principle and practice of representation by population.

The remarks with which I desire principally to deal are those which were made by the hon. member for East Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Bell), who undertook, on behalf of the Government, to answer the constitutional argument which had been so ably presented by the leader of the Opposition. Some time had elapsed since that argument was made to this House, and I wondered why no attempt was made to answer it. The Government, seeing that it was necessary to make some answer, put forward my hon. friend from East Prince to enlighten the House and to show that the argument of the leader of the Opposition is fallacious and incorrect. Now, the hon. member proceeded to deal with that argument in this way. He said that section 51, which was referred to by the hon. leader of the Opposition, had nothing at all to do with the matter under discussion, but that the point was entirely dealt with and controlled by section 18 of the British North America Act. I do not wish to do any injustice to the hon. gentleman, and shall quote what he said :

Now, there is another phase of this argument. I find that the question still arises : What power has this Parliament to deal with this question ? That question is still to be answered. I find that section 18 of the British North America Act, as amended by 38-39 Vic., chap. 38, reads as follows :—

Then, the hon. gentleman read the section, as amended, and went on to say :

The powers of this Parliament to deal with this question are as absolute as words could make them. There is no denying the point that there is absolute powers vested in this Parliament to deal with the question, unless it is specially prevented from legislating upon it by the provisions of the British North America Act.

I could hardly believe the hon. gentleman to be serious, and later on I asked this question, after he had reiterated that statement:

May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he understands that the word "powers" in section 18 of the British North America Act refers to and includes legislative powers ?

He said :

Yes, it includes legislative powers.

Then, some further discussion took place between us, which I need not quote. Therefore, the position of the Government, as put forward by the hon. member for East Prince, is that they depend upon section 18 of the British North America Act for the constitutionality of this measure. Well, now, let us look at section 18. That section, as amended, and quoted by my hon. friend, is as follows :

The privileges, immunities and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the members thereof respectively, shall be such as are, from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that any Act of the Parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities and powers shall not confer any privileges, immuni-ties or powers exceeding those at the passage of such Act held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the members thereof.

Now, there are so many answers to the absolutely indefensible position that the hon. gentleman took that it is difficult to know where to begin with them. In the first place, the powers shall be "such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada"—well, if there was any possible argument in the construction of my hon. friend, the first answer to it would be that the powers have not been defined by the Parliament of Canada. Of course, as against the ridiculous position which my hon. friend and the Government are obliged to take in this connection there is the fact that no human being would ever suppose the Imperial Parliament intended to give to the Parliament of Canada such general powers of legislation as the Parliament of Canada might define for itself. There is the further point—which would indicate that he had not read the section—that the powers are to be such as are enjoyed "by the Commons House of Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland." The Commons House of Parliament has no power of itself to legislate. My hon. friend surely recollects that, and when it is stated to him he would, I think, at once withdraw from the position he has taken on behalf of the Government. The powers referred to in this section are not legislative powers. No one ever supposed that they were legislative powers. I have heard this section discussed in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and also in the Privy Council in the case of Thomas vs. Hallburton, reported in the Privy Council as Fielding vs. Thomas, and no counsel and no judge ever suggested that there could be any construction placed upon this section such as my hon. friend has seen fit to place upon it. But if my hon. friend desires an authority, I can produce one which has been highly lauded in this House. I refer to Mr. Clement, who is now the legal adviser of the Executive Council of the Yukon. Members of the Government have told us about his great abilities, and I, for one, stood up in this House and said that I recognized the fact that though, as I believed, he had not an extensive practice at the bar, he had certainly written a most excellent text book on the Canadian constitution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He has had a large practice too.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not dispute that. I believe he is a very able man. But he dealt with this section 18, and with the word "powers," upon which my hon. friend relies—

Mr. BELL (East Prince). Will my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) allow me a word of explanation. I put a fair construction on section 18, but I did not insist on it. But there are other sections conferring legislative power on this Parliament. Section 91, for instance, gives power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada. What such laws are to be is largely in the discretion of Parliament. This measure could be authorized, for instance, under section 91.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the hon. gentleman bases it on sections 91 and 92, he will find he is as far astray as in basing it on section 18. I am not dealing with what the hon. gentleman had in his mind, but with his language—which I have quoted—in his speech and in answer to a direct question put by me. I asked him if he thought that section 18 included legislative powers and he answered as directly as a man could that he thought it did include legislative powers. Now, when the hon. gentleman interrupted me—and I may say that I extended to him a courtesy which he did not see fit to extend to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) last evening, and I thought that it was unfair that he did not do so—I was about to quote the language of Mr. W. H. P. Clement, which I think no lawyer in this House on either side will dispute. He says, dealing with section 18 and the word "powers," which is the word upon which my hon. friend bases his argument :

The reference is, of course, to powers other than legislative ; as, for example, the power to compel the attendance of witnesses and to procure the production of papers, which may be described as inquisitorial and punitive powers in aid of intelligent legislation.

If the hon. gentleman desires further authority, I can refer him to another text book written by Mr. Lefroy, which has been rightly characterized by my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), in this House, as, perhaps, the ablest book that has been written on the Canadian constitution. At page 749, it will be seen that Mr. Lefroy treats the word "powers" as meaning the same thing as stated by Mr. Clement—that is, that it refers to powers other than legislative. And, as a matter of fact, for the reasons I have stated, it could not refer to anything else, because the reference is to the powers possessed, not by the Imperial Parliament, but by the Commons House of Parliament of Great Britain. Why, Sir, if the argument of my hon. friend which has been put forward as the constitutional basis of this Bill, stated the real construction of this statute, the result would probably be that the Parliament of Canada would possess all the powers that the Imperial Parliament possesses. As suggested by an hon. member on this side of the House last evening, this Parliament might proceed to pass a Bill granting Home Rule to Ireland or a Bill extending the doctrine of protection to England and giving us a real preference, which we do not possess under the present tariff policy of the Government. But I think my hon. friend, on reflection, will come to the conclusion that he did not base this power, if it exists in this House at all, on the right section of the British North America Act, when he saw fit to base it on section 18.

Now, it does not follow, because my hon. friend is evidently wrong in regard to that argument, and the Government are evidently wrong in putting him forward, to make that argument on their behalf, that the power does not exist ; and I, for one, should be disposed to say that if it exists at all it must exist under section 40 of the British North America Act, under which it is provided :

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall, for the purposes of election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts as follows :—

And it states what they are. One would naturally say : Here is a provision that the electoral districts in the province shall be so and so until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides—therefore, the Parliament of Canada has the right to otherwise provide. Exactly that construction has been applied to section 41, where the same language is used :

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces relative to the following matters, or any of them (naming certain matters), shall continue to be as they are at present.

Well, if this section 40 does give the power, the question remains whether it must not be construed with the section to which the leader of the Opposition has referred, namely, section 51 of the Act, and upon which he based so able an argument. The matter is one that is not free from doubt, but I think there is a great deal to be said, independently of authority altogether, for the view which the leader of the Opposition put forward. In the first place, there is the undoubted authority of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition who has had so great a parliamentary experience in dealing with the construction of statutes for so many years, and his authority is a strong argument in itself. But further than that, you have this to consider. You are, under section 51, to increase or to decrease the number of members of Parliament for the different provinces after each decennial census. Now, that section does not say, in the first place, that the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted as between themselves ; it says the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted. And you might well say that the Imperial Parliament, in dealing with section 40, were looking forward to the provision made in section 51, and for this reason, that there is no occasion for interfering with the boundaries of the electoral ridings in any province until you have occasion to increase or decrease the number of members in such province. That is the reason why I say you should read section 40 in connection with section 51, because there can be no occasion, so far as I can see, for altering the boundaries of electoral districts within the provinces until you come to an occasion after the decennial census, when you are either to increase or decrease the number of members for that province. I think that is a good reason for suggesting that these two sections should be read together. When you look at section 40 and afterwards at section 51, you find that, when you are redistributing as between the provinces the number of members for each province, you shall also take occasion at the same time to deal with the electoral districts in each province, and if the occasion has arisen by reason of the census to increase or decrease the number of members for each province, you shall at that time alter the boundaries of the electoral districts in that province as may be necessary. At all events, whether that is a sound rule of construction, it is certainly common sense, because every argument which can be urged in this matter points to the desirability of not interfering year after year, as one party or the other comes into power, with the electoral districts in the different provinces for party purposes. The argument from common sense and from expediency points entirely to the view that a party should not exercise any such power, that no such power should be given to it under the circumstances, and, therefore, if you find any grounds whatever for reading that construction into the language of the constitution, you should by all means adopt it, and both parties should be at one on that point. I think both parties have been at one on that point. I will point out that as far back as 1882 this matter was incidentally referred to in the House by the late Sir John A. Macdonald, who at that time was conducting a running conversational debate with the Hon. Edward Blake. Mr. Blake did not in the slightest degree dissent from Sir John A. Macdonald's view. The Bill respecting the township of Tuckersmith is referred to in Sir John Bourinot's work, page 473; he instances that Bill as one which the Senate threw out. It was a Bill which altered the electoral divisions of a county, and was introduced in 1874, and not on the occasion of a redistribution after a decennial census. Sir John A. Macdonald, in the presence of the Hon. Edward Blake, in dealing with that in 1882, used this language:

Legal power is right, but the expediency of exercising that power is a different affair. The only matter in which the House of Lords cannot interfere is the Supply Bill. We know that when the Senate threw out the Tuckersmith Bill the hon. gentleman did not deny the constitutional right of that House to interfere in the matter.— And this is the language to which I direct the attention of the House:

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

—and they interfered rightly and well on that occasion, because they prevented a breach of the British North America Act by so doing.

Now, Mr. Blake spoke immediately after Sir John A. Macdonald, the debate for a time was a conversational debate; he spoke two or three times, as reported on that same page, and he did not dissent at all from the views Sir John A. Macdonald then laid down.

I well remember that in the debate of 1896, when the late Dalton McCarthy, a gentleman whose memory is very much respected in this House, and whose legal attainments are particularly respected by members of the legal profession—I recollect that he was dealing with the statute relating to a Governor General's warrant, and although he was supporting the views which was being argued by gentlemen on the other side of the House, he frankly stated that his impression of the statute which was then in question had been the view that was advocated by gentlemen on this side of the House. He said that Sir Oliver Mowat, a very eminent jurist, had given an opinion to the contrary; and while he did not propose to give up his opinion to any man, nevertheless, he said, any one who would get up in the House and venture to say that Sir Oliver Mowat's view was absolutely incorrect, would be a rash man. And so I say that when Sir John A. Macdonald has stated in explicit terms that the Senate of Canada interfered rightly and well on that occasion because they prevented a breach of the British North America Act by so doing, he stated as directly as could be the view which I am now presenting to the House, the view which has been so ably advanced in this House by the leader of the Opposition as the correct view. And I say that when the Hon. Edward Blake, in speaking two or three times immediately afterwards, did not dissent from that view, we must understand that he assented to it; and if there had been the slightest ground for Mr. Blake's dissent from that view, we would have had his dissent, for the reason that he was criticising the Senate at that time, and it would have been his object as a matter of argument to show that Sir John A. Macdonald, in stating the right of the Senate on that occasion, had stated something which was not constitutionally correct. If any such argument had existed in the mind of Mr. Blake at that time, he was the last man to forget it, and the fact that he did not use it leads me to believe that he assented entirely to the view which Sir John A. Macdonald then laid down.

Now, look at the question of expediency. While there may be a division of opinion between hon. gentlemen in this House on the constitutional question, I for one fail to see any grounds on which there can be any dispute on the point of expediency. What occasion can there possibly be, or ought there possibly to be, for dealing with a matter of this kind, except after a decennial census. When the population of each province is ascertained, at each decennial census, you may find that the population of the province remains the same, or has not so increased, or decreased, that there is any change in the number of its representatives. In such a case there is no occasion to alter the boundaries of the electoral divisions. Of course, you may have the extremely improbable event that the population has moved within the boundaries of the province, so as to make a change necessary. But I do not think that is a matter of probability or that the idea was present to the framers of this Act. Then you have the case where the representation has increased or decreased so as to alter the number of representatives to which a province is entitled. You deal with that once and for all for the next ten years. You deal with that on the basis of the population within the province just as you deal with the representation of the provinces as between themselves, on the same basis. The matter is settled, and should be settled, to all intents and purposes, for the next ten years. I hope we shall not have the spectacle of one party after another coming into power and seeking to benefit themselves on the eve of an election, or, as in this case, on the eve of a census, by making such a change in the electoral boundaries of the provinces as will inure to the advantage of the political party that happens to be in power at the moment. Is that or is it not common sense, and is it or is it not the right way to interpret the constitution? That is the way that it has been interpreted for the last thirty-two years, or, at all events, since 1882, when Sir John Macdonald, in the presence of Mr. Blake, laid down this principle. Why should we depart from it now? Is it not a sound and healthy rule? Is there any reason or any justification for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, endeavouring to pass this act on the possible eve of a dissolution, and certainly on the eve of the census, for the possibility of any small party advantage that may inure to some half dozen or dozen hon. members of this House? I think I can appeal with some confidence to the right hon. leader of the Government on this point, because it is a matter that affects more than the Liberal party. In the future you may find the very same thing done in 1902, or 1903, or 1904, or 1905, by the Conservative party. I should deplore that such a thing should be done by the Conservative party. I should deplore that the Conservative or the Liberal party should lay down this principle and act upon this rule, that whenever a party comes into power and is not satisfied with the distribution which has been made after the last decennial census, it should immediately seek to gain an advantage by an act of this kind. Particularly should I deprecate an act of this kind on the eve of a census.

Before passing from that point, I would like to make this suggestion, that usages of this kind may well become engrafted upon the British North America Act, and may acquire, imperceptibly and gradually, the force of law. The right hon. gentleman knows well that the constitution is not confined within the four corners of the British North America Act. I can give him very good authority for that if needs be, and authority that, I think, he will not dispute. He knows very well that in England they do not have a written constitution as we have, but nevertheless they have a bill of rights and some statutes which, to a certain extent, form the written portion of the constitution. Taswell Langmead, in his history of the progress of the constitution since the revolution, says:

As might be expected in a living organism, the constitution has not remained stationary during a period of nearly two centuries. But its greatest changes have been brought about not by legislative enactment. Whilst the legal code has remained substantially unaltered, there has grown up by its side a purely unwritten and conventional code, which, firmly established as a part of the constitution, though still unknown to law, has so completely modified the practical working of the legal code as to form a present constitution which would be scarcely recognisable, except in its fundamental principles by the authors of the Bill of Rights.

The same language has been used in regard to the American constitution, which is a written constitution like our own. Prof. Bryce, in his book on the American Commonwealth, uses this language, quoting from a very eminent constitutional lawyer:

Thus the American constitution has necessarily changed as the nation has changed, has changed in the spirit with which men regard it, and therefore in its own spirit. To use the words of the eminent constitutional lawyer whom I have more than once quoted: "We may think," says Judge Cooley, "that we have the constitution all before us;—

That is, in its written terms.

—but for practical purposes the constitution is that which the Government in its several departments, and the people in the performance of their duties as citizens, recognize and respect as such; and nothing else is."

So then, in Canada, where we have a written constitution, as they have in the United States, we must not expect to find the constitution entirely within the walls of the statute. In the very nature of things, in the growth of this country, the constitution, written though it may be, will grow just as the American constitution has grown, and this is one of the things, it seems to me, that has grown with it, namely, that the power conferred upon Parliament by the British North America Act to deal with the boundaries of electoral districts in the several provinces, shall be exercised only at the time pointed out in section 51, that is to say, at the time when the representation of the provinces as between themselves, is dealt with.

Of course, I need not point out to my hon. friend the leader of the Government that there is a difference between the legal power to do this and the matter of its constitutionality, using the word constitution in the broad sense in which I have endeavoured to explain it just now. For example, as was pointed out by my hon. colleague from Halifax (Mr. Russell), in a debate in the session of 1896, in regard to Governor General's warrants, there are a great many things which the executive of the country even have the legal power to do, but the doing of which would probably bring about the indictment of the Ministers for high treason. I will read a portion of the selection to which he referred, and then I will read a sentence or two more which he did not then read. For example, Bagehot says :

But this is nothing to what the Queen can by law do without consulting Parliament. Not to mention other things, she could disband the army (by law she cannot engage more than a certain number of men, but she is not obliged to engage any men) ; she could dismiss all the officers from the General commander-in-chief downwards ; she could dismiss all the sailors too ; she could sell off all our ships of war and all our naval stores ; she could make a peace by the sacrifice of Cornwall, and begin a war for the conquest of Brittany. She could make every citizen of the United Kingdom, male or female, a peer ; she could make every parish in the United Kingdom a " university " ; she could dismiss most of the civil servants ; she could pardon all offenders. In a word, the Queen could, by prerogative, upset all the action of civil government within the Government, could disgrace the nation by a bad war or peace, and could, by disbanding our forces, whether land or sea, leave us defenceless against foreign nations. Why do we not fear that she would do this, or any approach to it ?

He explains the reason why, which the hon. gentleman did not read, and which I will read in a moment. I may mention that the English Parliament could do a great many things also. It could pass an Act to pension members of Parliament ; it could pass an Act continuing its existence for twenty years or as long as the hon. member would live. The provincial parliaments could do the same thing, as far as I understand, but they do not do these things, and therefore, the right hon. leader of the Government, in looking at this Act, must not look simply at the legal power, but he must look at the question of the constitution in the broad aspect which I have endeavoured to place before the House. What does Bagehot say further with respect to the quotation I have just read from. He says a Minister dare not advise the Crown to so act :

Because there are two checks—one ancient and coarse, the other modern and delicate. The first is the check of impeachment. Any Minister who advised the Queen so to use her prerogative as to endanger the safety of the realm, might be impeached for high treason, and would be so.

Nevertheless, the Queen, strictly speaking, has a right to do these things ; but any Minister who advises her to adopt such a course, would, as this learned text-writer says, be probably impeached for high treason.

I have not attempted to deal with the details of this Bill ; I have endeavoured solely to place before the House, as briefly as I could, my view on the doubt which exists as to the legal power to pass this Act ; and next, the point—it seems to me an unanswerable point—that whether or not there is a legal power to pass this Bill, yet the spirit of the constitution, in the broad sense that I have endeavoured to express to the House, will not sanction the passage of such a measure. On this ground, and on the ground of expediency—which I think is perhaps the strongest ground of all—I again submit to the right hon. Prime Minister that this is not a Bill which at this stage, almost at the end of this Parliament, and on the eve of a census which will bring about the proper time for dealing with a measure of this kind—I submit that this is not a Bill which this House ought now be asked to pass, and that the right hon. gentleman, upon more mature reflection, may see fit, I hope, to concur in that conclusion.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Halifax). I have listened with a great deal of interest to my learned and hon. colleague from Halifax (Mr. Borden), because I knew that if there was anything that could be urged in support of the strange contention made by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), it would be discovered by my hon. friend (Mr. Borden). But I listened to the hon. gentleman very attentively and patiently without discovering that he deemed it prudent to back up his leader on the constitutional point which that gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) raised. Having heard the leader of the Opposition approach this question in the manner he did, and having seen him left alone in his contention, I was reminded of a discourse I once heard delivered by the late lamented Benjamin Butler, when he was giving his reminiscences from his early experiences as a practitioner somewhere in the state of Massachusetts. He told us that he was confronted with the difficulty of desiring to get a question reviewed by the court in which there did not seem to be very much merit. He was very diffident about pressing the matter upon the attention of the learned judge, and, he said, he went to a practitioner who was afterwards chief justice of Massachusetts, and subsequently judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and asked him if he would kindly make an application to the judge to have the point reserved. " No," said Mr. Gray, " I will do nothing of the kind. I have a reputation to lose, and I am not going to stake it on such a flimsy proposition." "Well," said Mr. Butler, "I have no reputation to lose, and I intend to take that point and have the benefit of it." I am inclined to think, Sir, that the legal luminaries of the Opposition, having a reputation to lose, were unwilling to stake their reputation upon the contention that there was anything in the faintest degree unconstitutional in the proposal which is now before the House. But, Sir, I do think it was not generous of them to allow their honoured and revered leader—a gentleman whom we all in this House sincerely admire—to put forward a contention which not a single man of them, I venture to say, will back up on his reputation as a lawyer. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden) has dealt with the question, as presented by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Bell) but he has taken good care to entirely steer clear of all the strong points that were made by that learned gentleman. The hon. member (Mr. Bell) pointed out, with perfect logical precision and emphasis, that the provisions of the British North America Act in reference to redistribution have relation, not to any redistribution as among the various electoral districts of any given province, but that the whole stress of that provision of the British North America Act is laid upon redistribution as among the various provinces of the Dominion. That was the strong argument of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, and the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Borden) made not a single passing reference to it, but took up some little side issue which was thrown in merely as a make-weight to an argument, which in itself needed no such make-weight at all. If my hon. friend (Mr. Bell) had considered the matter further, he probably would not have used that make-weight in his argument at all, because it was not necessary in support of the forceful and learned contention which he made to this House. It was that which the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Borden) laid hold of. That is, of course, a plausible method, and an ordinary method, but it is not a method which in the slightest degree is going to influence or bewilder this House.

What is the constitutional position of this Parliament, under the provisions of the British North America Act, with reference to redistribution? Every one knows that, in so far as the powers of this Parliament are concerned, we may well say we have an unwritten constitution. A large part of the powers which can be exercised by this Parliament, do not need to be set down in any categorical terms in the statute. Every one knows that when you are seeking for the powers of provincial legislatures, you have to find some express provision in the British North America Act granting those powers, but every one knows, as well, the converse of that proposition—and none better than my learned friend from Halifax—that the powers of this Dominion Parliament are plenary, and that it has power to do anything which cannot be done by the provincial legislatures, unless it comes within an express prohibition in the constitutional Act, or a prohibition contained in some other Imperial statute. This Parliament, therefore, is invested with abundant authority, and the idea of any one with a reputation to lose, saying that this Parliament cannot from time to time, as, in its wisdom, it may deem necessary, readjust the representation of the various electoral districts in any given province of this Dominion, is a monstrous absurdity. Perhaps I should not use such strong language; it is not necessary to use strong language, and I will, therefore, content myself by saying that I do not believe there is to be found a lawyer in this House, or in this Dominion, who will undertake to seriously state that there is anything unconstitutional or anything illegal in this Parliament from time to time readjusting the representation of the people in any particular province of the Dominion. No lawyer has in this Dominion put forward any contention against the power of this Parliament to do so, and no lawyer on either side of the House will stake his reputation on such a proposition. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden) had an opportunity of doing so, if he wished. He refrained from doing so, although I think it was his duty to give the House the benefit of his real opinion on the subject. To-night in this House he was not a lawyer with a fee in his pocket, whose tongue and whose lips were his client's, and who was bound to conceal, possibly, in the interest of his clients, what his real opinion about this question was. The hon. and learned gentleman is not practising in a court of law this evening; he is putting forward his bona fide opinions in the Parliament of his country, and he is bound to give us his real honest opinion about the legal and constitutional question involved in the discussion before the House. I do not know whether he has done so or not—I am almost certain he has not done so. I should think less of his ability and standing as a professional man than I do, if I had to come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) was putting forward his genuine opinion, when suggesting that this Parliament has not a perfect and absolutely constitutional power to pass this Act, if they see fit to do so, and that the question is, as I think he felt inclined to admit, simply a question of expediency, whether it be right or wrong, wise or unwise, to pass the statute which this House of Commons is now called upon to assent to. Now, what are the provisions of the British North America Act to which my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island called attention? I really think that one should hardly be asked to argue in this House a matter which is so absolutely elementary and indubitable as the proposition which I am endeavouring to establish. The first section of the British North America Act bearing indirectly on the question is section 8 which provides :

In the general census of the population of Canada, which is hereby required to be taken in the year 1871, and in every tenth year hereafter, the respective populations of the four provinces shall be distinguished.

This is one indication from which you might almost forecast what the purpose of that decennial census was. It is the populations of the respective provinces that are to be distinguished, in order that the distribution of the membership in this Parliament may be readjusted from time to time in accordance with the changes which have taken place in those populations. From that we could make a very shrewd and intelligent guess, if we had nothing further to go upon, but it would be only a guess. Then, we find the provision in section 37 to the proportion of membership in this House of Commons :

The House of Commons shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, consist of 131 members,—
Which has since been increased—of whom 82 shall be elected for Ontario, 65 for Quebec, 19 for Nova Scotia, and 15 for New Brunswick.

The ratio which these figures bear to the respective populations of the various provinces has to be maintained in any readjustment of seats made for this Parliament, the province of Quebec still retaining its 65 members ; or, if you choose, you may increase that number, so long as the proportion among the various provinces is duly maintained.

Then comes the section to which my hon. friend referred, and which I will read—section 51 :

On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such a manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules :—

The representation "of the four provinces" shall be readjusted. There is not a single word as to the different counties or the different electoral districts within the province. You can give the additional representation to which a province may be entitled in any way you please. You can give it all to one city or town or to one rural community if you choose. There is no constitutional limit imposed in that respect. The only constitutional limit is that you must preserve the representation by population as between the various provinces of the Dominion. Now, I am not presenting anything to the House which was not presented by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, which my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) undertook to answer, but in answer to which he made not the slightest impression, except to raise a little side issue which was not relevant to the discussion at all.

Quebec shall have the fixed number of 65 members ; there shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number 65 bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained).

Not electoral districts, counties, or cities, but provinces and only provinces, were in the mind of the statesmen who drafted and of the Imperial Parliament which passed that act—

In the computation of the number of members for a province, a fractional part not exceeding one-half of the whole number requisite for entitling the province to a member shall be disregarded ; but a fractional part exceeding one-half of that number shall be equivalent to the whole number.

Province again, you see—not counties or districts, or cities—

On any readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards ; such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing Parliament.

That is the provision in regard to the readjustment of the membership of this House among the various provinces of the Dominion. That imposes a duty upon this Parliament, but it does not say a single word by way of diminution of the powers of this Parliament as they would have undoubtedly existed even if that section had never been passed. It does not say that this Parliament shall not have the same power as to any particular province that the Imperial Parliament has to readjust representation in the United Kingdom from time to time. It does not say one word to establish any constitutional limitation whatever, except that the representation of the various provinces shall remain stationary from one decennial period to another, and shall then be readjusted according to the results of the decennial census. Then, as if to make the matter more abundantly clear, section 52 provides :

The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the Parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this Act is not thereby disturbed.

Now, that is all the direct legislation you can find, so far as I know, bearing upon this subject at all. Would any lawyer say that anything stated there for the purpose of compelling you to have a fair and adequate proportional representation as among the various provinces, and for seeing that that representation shall be readjusted from time to time according to the changes of the populations of the provinces as indicated by the decennial census, could be held, directly or remotely, or by any implication whatever to take away the power of this Parliament, from time to time, as it might deem it expedient, to readjust the representation in any particular province, so long as it did not violate that section 51 and disturb the proportionate representation of the various provinces of the Dominion? I do not believe there is a lawyer in this country, who has any reputation to lose, and I am sure there is no lawyer in this House, whether he has a reputation to lose or not, who will put himself on record as saying that there is any such limitation as was suggested by the hon. and learned leader of the Opposition in opening this discussion.

Then, of course, so far as precedents and authorities are concerned, this House has repeatedly recognized the principle for which I am contending. The right hon. gentleman who leads the House referred to two occasions when this was done—not immediately upon the completion of a census—in 1895 and in 1893. Looking at the statute, chapter 9 of 1893, which I think was referred to by the leader of the Government, you will find a long section occupying nearly two pages substituting for the description of the electoral district of Nipissing, as given in the Act for the Readjustment of the Representation, a new section describing another electoral district of Nipissing. I have not compared the two sections, but I venture to say that they do not both describe the same territory in different words but involve a change in the constituency. But I confess I have not made the comparison.

If you go over the ten sections of that Bill, some of which are unimportant, and merely clerical changes, as the leader of the Opposition has said, you will find that no less than three make distinct changes in the representation as fixed by the Redistribution Act of 1892. The districts of Rouville and St. Hyacinthe were both changed, and you will find at least three distinct changes, every one of which would be illegal and unconstitutional if the proposition stated by the leader of the Opposition were sound in law. But everybody knows they were perfectly legal and constitutional, or they would not have been adopted by that Parliament. In 1895 you have another Act, the effect of which the hon. leader of the Opposition sought to minimize by saying it was only to correct a merely clerical error. One section was, in fact, only to correct a clerical error that had been made in the Act to readjust representation in the House of Commons. But here is a section which reads :

That the township of Thurlow and the north-east township of Joliette are hereby detached from the county of Berthier and annexed to the county of Joliette for the purpose of representation in the House of Commons.

I am not well enough acquainted with the geography of Quebec to know just what effect that would have, but reading plain English it does seem that it makes a change in the representation of the ridings that the section relates to, and that must have been an illegal and unconstitutional Act if this Parliament cannot, at any other period than that of the decennial census, readjust the representation of the people in this House. I am simply repeating what was said, and said with great emphasis, propriety and convincing clearness by the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Bell). Previously to either of these acts there was an Act of Parliament in 1868, exactly of the same character, entitled an Act to annex a portion of the seigneurie of Belair to the county of Quebec and another to the county of Portneuf. Surely these are Acts which, under the contention of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) would be unconstitutional, if done at any other time than immediately following the taking of the decennial census. There certainly cannot be anything in that contention. The question is reduced of course, as my hon. friend has practically admitted to a question of expediency, propriety and wisdom, and we are prepared to argue it on those grounds. Every hon. member on this side has argued it on that basis.

Now, surely if a wrong has been done it is right to correct it, and if you are going to correct a wrong done the right time to do it is at the first convenient opportunity. There is never any more suitable time for undoing a wrong than the present time. Let us for the purpose of argument suppose that this Bill is as "infamous a gerrymander" as some hon. gentlemen opposite say it is, although I notice that their adjectives are not quite in so superlative a degree as on some occasions. They do not lay as much emphasis and stress on those strong adjectives as they have done with regard to other measures. I notice a degree of weakness in their adjectives as compared with those they usually make use of—except on the part of two hon. gentlemen who have, I suppose, pronounced their valedictory as the gladiators of old did in the "morituri te salutant." I trust, however, that those were not valedictory addresses and that we shall see these gentlemen here for many a Parliament to come. I hope they will be longer here than some persons anticipate. But, as I was about to say, let us suppose this measure is as infamous as it is sometimes described, and let us suppose that instead of being passed in 1899 that it were being passed four or five years earlier. Suppose the Liberal party had been returned to power eight or nine years ago and had then passed this Act assuming it to be of the character attributed to it by hon. gentlemen opposite, does my hon. friend say, assuming this to be an infamous, unjust and oppressive Act which does not give a fair representation to the various districts throughout the Dominion, would any hon. gentleman opposite say that one of the very first acts of hon. gentlemen opposite, should they have been in such a suppositious case returned to power would not be to undo immediately the moment they could get the political power to do so the infamous, unjust, improper Act which had been passed, as I have been supposing, in 1892 or 1893, so that at the next election the remedy would be immediately operative. Suppose an "infamous gerrymander Bill" were passed by any Government midway between two decennial periods, shortly after the decennial census had been taken, would it not be the bounden duty of the Government returned to power, which had opposed the infamous Government, which had put that infamous gerrymander Bill through, to repeal that Act and place those constituencies back in the position in which they were before and readjust them in such a way that at the very next election the people would be properly represented in the various provinces. My hon. friend says no, they would have to leave that wrong unredressed for eight or nine long years and perhaps have two or three elections held in the meantime with these constituencies gerrymandered. According to his contention the constitution of this country which is supposed to be a miracle of wisdom is such a botch and bungle that we would have to leave a wrong like this unredressed and leave the constituencies misrepresented perhaps through two elections until the decennial period had arrived and a Redistribution Act could be passed. That is the logical and obvious conclusion to which my hon. friend's argument leads him and to which the argument of the leader of the Opposition leads. That conclusion is monstrous. It can never be conceived that this is the wisdom embodied in the British North America Act, in the preparation of which so many bright geniuses and strong intellects were employed and which received the careful consideration of some of the best minds in the Imperial Parliament. I say again, as my hon. friend has virtually conceded, that the question is not a constitutional or a legal question at all, but simply as to whether it is wise, just, reasonable and proper that such an Act shall be passed. And on those issues of the wisdom, the reasonableness, the justice and the propriety of it we on this side are prepared to challenge the vote of the House and the public opinion of the country. My hon. friend asks: If you do not accept my proposition, what result do you bring yourself to? That parties may for purely partisan purposes readjust the constituencies every time a new Government is returned to power. Well, there are many things, as my hon. friend has quoted, that can legally be done that never will be done in this world.

Mr. CLANCY. And this is one.

Mr. RUSSELL. I say that this which the hon. member for Halifax mentions is one. I take it that the hon. gentleman agrees with me.

Mr. CLANCY. I refer to this Bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. These things that the hon. member for Halifax says can be done under the reading of the British North America Act, that a readjustment can be made at other times than after the decennial census, will not be done; and the guarantee is that no Government will undertake to bring forward a Bill to readjust the constituencies, except to cure some manifest evil and except, as in the present case, when the Government knows well, as these hon. gentlemen opposite know well, that the general tenor and main purpose of the Bill have the strong endorsement of the people. Your guarantee against legislative improprieties like that are not in printer's ink or in written provisions; but they are in the hearts of the people and in the common sense of the country. That is the best guarantee you could have, for no Government will outrage the feelings of this country by repeatedly perpetrating a gerrymander. It has been done once, this Government proposes to undo it; but it will never be the practice prevailing in this country as it never has been. It has been resorted to only in desperate emergencies, as it was only once before, in 1882, and there is no danger of it becoming the practice with reference to the representation of the people in this House.

Now, I think I have exhausted all that I have to say with reference to the so-called constitutional question, which turns out to be not a constitutional question even on the authority of my hon. and learned friend. If it were not so late I should have liked to deal at some length with two other questions of principle which have been suggested in reference to this Bill, one being the question of representation by population and the other the alleged under-representation of the cities, especially the great city of Toronto. Now, to a certain extent and up to a certain limit, it is a proper principle that even apart from any interprovincial relations of the various provinces, the various sections of each province should be represented in this House, measurably speaking, according to population. To what extent is that principle a controlling one? I think the best way to answer that question is to ascertain what was the action with respect to it of the fathers of confederation, the founders of the union. Of course, it would not be fair to judge of that by the anomalies existing at the time of confederation, because the expedient then adopted was intended merely to meet an emergency and to exist only until a proper readjustment could take place; but I desire to consider how they used the opportunity presented to them after the first decennial census in 1871. It would be a very tedious thing to go through the figures which would show the representation of the various portions of the Dominion at that time, and, at this late hour, I would not weary the House with those details. But I may give some of the salient features presented by these figures, which will show how this idea of representation by population was then carried out. Beginning with the province of Ontario, there were four electoral districts having a population of over 30,000, that is, between 30,000 and 40,000; and there were four electoral districts having a population under 10,000: There were thirty-four constituencies having a population between 20,000 and 30,000, and forty-four having a population between 10,000 and 20,000. Consider whether that carries out the principle of representation by population with the strict and severe arithmetical exactness which is now being pressed upon us by some controversialists in this debate—an idea the fallacy of which was properly exposed by Mr. Gladstone in his great speech on the last Redistribution Bill in England. In the first group of four constituencies there were North Simcoe, with a population of over 33,000; Essex, over 32,000; Bothwell, over 31,000, and South Bruce, over 31,000, the average of the group being 32,435 people represented by one member. Then you had another group side by side with these: Cornwall, with a population of over 7,000; Algoma, over 7,000; Muskoka, nearly 7,000, and Niagara, 3,693. That is to say, you had a second group with an average population of 6,186, as against the first group, with an average of 32,435. Is that representation by population? Was it not an anomaly and a gross injustice that North Simcoe and Essex and Bothwell and South Bruce should have an average of 32,435 represented by only one member, and that another group should have a member for each 6,186? I do not say, for my part, that there was anything wrong about it. I think it is altogether probable that there were good reasons for it. Certainly, in the most striking case, that of Niagara, there were reasons why it should be left as it was. It was an old historic settlement, with a long record of representation and a continuous municipal life—a community whose representation, as Sir John Macdonald said, in the course of the debate, properly should be left undisturbed. To leave it as it stood was to preserve the county and municipal organization. But here, I repeat, you have one group of counties in which the people had five times the representation of the other group, and the highest on the list had ten times the representation of the lowest. That is not representation by population, which is the fetish of these hon. gentlemen now—though it never was their fetish before, and certainly not when the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald logically said that it involved the doctrine of universal suffrage—which, I suppose, was to him the abomination of desolation.

The unit of population in Ontario at that time was 18,420. But you have one county with a population of 33,000 and over, almost double the unit; and you have one county with less than one-fourth of the population it should possess on that basis. You have a group of four counties, and rural counties at that, averaging nearly twice as large as they should be, and a group of four having one-third of what they should contain on the basis of the unit. There are various other anomalies, which I shall not mention, in Ontario, and the province of Quebec presents the same features as adjusted by the Redistribution Act of 1872. I will not pause to refer to these, but will come to the province of Nova Scotia. I do that for the purpose of introducing the opinion of an hon. member whose opinion should be received with great weight in this House, upon another question of principle, which I shall not discuss at length, but with a single reference to which, as the hour is so late, I will conclude my remarks. In the province of Nova Scotia, we have the county of Halifax, in 1872, with a population of 56,963, having only two members, while the county of Pictou, with only 32,114 of a population, have also two members, the same as the county of Halifax, with its 57,000. Then, we have the county of Cape Breton, with a population of 26,454, also with two members. Now, mark that; the population of Halifax was 56,963, the half of which would be 28,481; that is to say, you had 28,481 people in Halifax electing one member, and you had by that readjustment, made in 1872, 26,434 people, more than 2,000 less than half the population of Halifax, electing two members. Now, that was not right on the basis of representation by population. But I am not going to say there was not good reason even for that anomaly.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Was not that on the basis of representation by population? Why were these three counties selected to receive two members?

Mr. RUSSELL. Well, if it is according to the basis of representation by population that Halifax, with 56,963, should elect exactly the same number of members as Cape Breton, with less than half that number, and if that readjustment was made upon that basis then I must admit that you can get any quantity of representation by population in the Bill you passed in 1882.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Would the hon. gentleman assign three members to each of these counties?

Mr. RUSSELL. You had already two members in Halifax, you had already two members in Pictou. In Cape Breton, before the readjustment, you had only one. East Halifax might very properly have said: Give us an independent representation; add one member to the two members that the city and county of Halifax have; we have twice the population that Cape Breton has, why give Cape Breton, with 26,000, two members and say that Halifax, with more than twice that population, shall still have only two? Why not give the new member to the county of Halifax, with its immensely large area, with its 150 miles in length from east to west, with a large rural population, with a fine agricultural district—why not give that odd member which you have to spare to the county of Halifax instead of giving it to Cape Breton, which has already one member to 26,450 of a population, while Halifax has only two for more than twice the number? That would have been a reasonable request. That suggestion was made when that Bill was under discussion, and I will show you how the suggestion was met. It was not met in the way the hon. member for Pictou would meet it, it was not met by any sophistical suggestion that it was really representation by population to say that fifty or sixty thousand persons should elect just as many representatives as twenty or thirty thousand. That never suggested itself to any intellect in this House. There was no intellect here then so brilliant as to discover that it was representation by population to give 26,000 people two members in Cape Breton, and to give 56,000 people only two members in Halifax. That is a peculiar arithmetical discovery which my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) has the sole and absolute right of appropriation, and no human being will ever dispute his property in it. This is what was said:

Mr. Powers said that the county to which it was proposed to give an additional member, the county of Cape Breton, had only 26,000, and would, therefore, have one representative to 13,000 people, while the county of Halifax was to have but one representative to 28,000.

My hon. friend says that is representation by population, of course.

He therefore moved in amendment that the Bill be referred back to Committee of the Whole, with instructions to so amend the same as to provide that one of the additional members allotted to Nova Scotia should be assigned to Halifax.

Now, the hon. gentleman who sits opposite did not then revel in the title of knight or baronet, or anything of that kind; he was plain Dr. Tupper, and he said:

He would say for the information of the House that in the course which had been pursued, so far as Nova Scotia was concerned, the Government had followed the practice which had been universally favoured in that province. It had never been the practice to give to the city and county of Halifax representation in proportion to population.

You see the hon. gentleman took an altogether different view of the matter from that of the hon. member for Pictou, who was not in the House then. Politically speaking, I think he was in short clothes at that time. Had he been here, he would have told his leader that that was an entire mistake, that it was really representation by population. But the present leader of the Opposition did not take that view. He said:

It had never been the practice to give to the city and county of Halifax representation in proportion to population for the sufficient reason that in that province it had been conceded that the wealth and influence of the metropolitan constituency was such as to influence other constituencies throughout the province.

“That the wealth and influence of the metropolitan city,” of any large city, “was such as to influence other constituencies throughout the province.” I do not say that that is not a good reason, that the wealth and power of a great city like Toronto, for instance, is such as to influence other constituencies throughout the province of Ontario, and such as to secure to it adequate representation, even without a technical arithmetical conformity to a numerically exact representation by population. We know that Toronto is very influentially represented here, I will not say over-represented, as I am sometimes tempted to think when I hear the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) speaking in tones of righteous indignation, ringing with almost the fervour and majesty of a Hebrew prophet, that hon. gentleman who always assumes a tone of unapproachable righteousness when he rises to address this House, and had almost made me one of his disciples, until I found him the other day misstating the facts in reference to popular representation in England and in the cities throughout the United Kingdom. The leader of the Opposition in this House fully recognized at that time that a great metropolitan constituency like Halifax influenced other constituencies throughout the province, and therefore he conceded that a city did not need to have the same numerical representation in this House as a rural constituency or a small town. The same thing is true of the city of Toronto, the same thing is true of the city of Montreal, the same thing is true of any large and influential centre of wealth and population. The same thing was true of the city of London, as was pointed out by Gladstone in 1866, in his speech on the Redistribution Bill of that day. I would refer to this at greater length if there were time, but I will only say in conclusion that I wish simply to draw the attention of the House, and particularly of the leader of the Opposition, to this fact, that when that Bill for the readjustment of representation was presented in this House in 1872, and the claim was made that Halifax ought to have a larger representation on the basis of representation by population, the hon. gentleman argued with great force, as I have quoted from the report, that cities, by virtue of the exceptional circumstances to which he referred, did not need to have the same numerical representation that was accorded to rural constituencies. The hour is so late that I will not elaborate that principle, but will content myself with reserving to a later occasion any further observations I have to make upon the question.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). For only a short time, at this late hour of the night, I wish to direct attention to one statement made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Russell). He said that unless there was a strong and justifiable reason for it, no Government would ever attempt as I understood him, between the times that the census was taken, to interfere with the representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. RUSSELL. I made one qualification—except under a desperate emergency, and that occurred in 1882.

Mr. SPROULE. If that allegation be correct, what justification can my hon. friend offer for interfering with it now, because the information given by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) and several other members has shown clearly and distinctly, that in the redistribution of 1882 there was no material change in the members elected between the new and the old arrangement of constituencies, and that, under the redistribution of 1892, there were very few constituencies touched, and there was no material change made then? If that be the case, how can the hon. gentleman contend that there is such an urgent need for this measure on the ground that the readjustment which was made on these occasions, was so very great? I am quite sure that he has no evidence to show that there was any urgent need for the measure which is now before the House. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) said that the principle of county boundaries is a correct one, and he pinned his faith to it. He said, in addition, that he and his hon. friends laid down the principle as a party in their resolution in 1893, and that they are now carrying out the obligations which they undertook to the electorate then, by introducing this measure, which was based on the principle of county boundaries. The hon. gentleman must have forgotten that the Bill violates county boundaries, because the number of constituencies where that principle is violated, to which the present measure does not apply, is greater than the number of constituencies to which they have applied the principle of county boundaries.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) allow me to ask him a question which I have asked of a great many hon. members: What are the constituencies in Ontario in regard to which the principle of county boundaries is disregarded by this Bill?

Mr. SPROULE. I can give the hon. gentleman a few, but I cannot give them all. Carleton is one. North Leeds and Grenville is another; Renfrew is another; Ottawa is another; Addington is another, and there are some others. There are several counties where the county boundary is not the boundary of the constituency, which have not been touched by this Bill, and there are counties which are changed by this Bill in accordance with the principle of adhering to county boundaries. Therefore, I say that if that is correct, and I am sure it cannot be disputed successfully, the contention of the hon. member for South Grey and several other members, that the principle of county boundaries is a correct one, loses its force by reason of the fact that the principle has been violated, because they have not acted upon the principle which they have laid down themselves. We are justified in looking for some other cause than a desire to carry out that principle, in connection with the measure. I took up the resolution, which I have here, that the hon. member for South Grey referred to, passed by the Liberal party in 1893, when he said: We laid down our platform, and we are redeeming every pledge in it, in every particular word and letter. This was one of the pledges laid down in that platform:

That by the gerrymander Act, the electoral divisions for the return of members to the House of Commons have been so made as to prevent a fair expression of the opinion of the country at the general elections, and to secure to the party now in power a strength out of all proportion greater than the number of electors supporting them would warrant. To put an end to this abuse, to make the House of Commons a fair exponent of public opinion, and to preserve the historic continuity of counties, it is desirable that in the formation of electoral divisions, county boundaries should be preserved, and that in no case parts of different counties should be put in one electoral division.

The hon. member for South Grey says: We have carried it out to the letter. Yet there are some counties where that principle is violated, and they have not touched them by this Bill, and there are other counties where they have remedied the grievance, if grievance it is. What becomes of the contention of the hon. member for South Grey? In the first place, if it be a sound principle, they have not carried it out, and they have not redeemed the pledge, which says:

And that in no case parts of different counties should be put in one electoral division.

I say that they have neither redeemed the pledge nor carried out that principle, if principle it is. Then, the principle of the division of the district by the judges is a correct principle, says the hon. member for South Grey, and other hon. gentlemen as well. I take up the Bill to ascertain if that principle is carried out. If it is a sound principle, you would expect to find it carried out in the Bill, but I find that the judges are only called in to divide constituencies in western Ontario, and in the city of Ottawa in eastern Ontario it is abandoned, while in respect to counties in eastern Ontario, where there are two or more members, the judges are not called in to make a division. I say that if the principle be a correct one, hon. gentlemen should recognize that principle, which has been presented as a reason for asking the support of the House for this measure. If it is contended that, in fairness to the people in dividing the constituencies, the judges should be called in, one would expect to find the principle applied in all cases. When I take the number of counties dealt with in this Bill, in respect to which judges are called in, and compare it with those in respect to which the judges are not called in, the constituencies into which they are not called, are more numerous than the others. What, then, becomes of that principle and of that contention? That is a principle that is not observed, but is flagrantly violated by the Bill which we have before us at the present time. Yet this is one of the strong grounds upon which they ask us to support this measure. Then, it is said that their division of the representation according to population is fair. We contend that ever since confederation the principle of representation by population, as far as it could be carried out, has been carried out by the Conservative party under their redistribution. There is no one who will make a comparison between the populations of the constituencies before the census of 1871 and the redistributions that have been made in 1872, in 1882 and in 1892, but must come to that conclusion. In the readjustment of the constituencies the effort to keep as near the unit of population as possible was always observed. Going over the Redistribution Act, I find that to be the case. The hon. member who sat down a short time ago, said that the representation of Toronto is not the same, according to its population, as the representation of other parts of the country: He said: We have applied the principle which was said to be applied in the city of Halifax, that the influence and intelligence of the city, or the constituency, should be taken into account in the representation, and that is the reason why the city of Toronto, with its 200,000 population, is only to have five members, each of whom will represent 40,000, while in other constituencies a member will represent 17,000 or 18,000. The justification he gives for it is, that the intelligence and wealth of the city shall be taken into account. Did they take that into account when fixing the representation of Hamilton, or Ottawa, or London. Not a bit of it. Hamilton has about 50,000 population, and has two representatives making the unit of representation about 25,000, or practically the same as all through the province. Ottawa, with about 50,000 population has two representatives, and the intelligence and wealth of Ottawa count for nothing, but they must count for a great deal in the city of Toronto which is only allowed one representative for about 40,000 people. I am reminded that the city of Brantford has one representative for 18,000 people, and I suppose that is because the Minister of Customs comes from there, and, therefore, the intelligence and wealth of that city count for nothing. These gentlemen opposite tell us that they are doing better for Toronto than the Conservative did, because previously it had only four members. That is not the fact. The member for West York (Mr. Wallace) took in part of the city of Toronto, and was practically a representative of that city. That made five members. Is it not also a fact that the member for East York (Mr. Maclean) had a portion of the city of Toronto and was representing that city. Sir, I contend that the city of Toronto was better represented under the old Act than it will be under the new, even with the recent proposal to give it an additional representative under this Bill. They have taken away portions of the city from East and West York, and they are doing no more justice to Toronto than under the old law. Again these gentlemen opposite tell us that this Act ought to be passed, because it is intended to remedy a wrong and to carry out a principle. It has been abundantly proved by several hon. members that there was no wrong to remedy. If the rearrangement of the constituencies in 1882 and 1892 had the effect of enabling a smaller number of Conservatives to return more members than a larger number of Liberals, then that claim might be well founded. But we all know that after the Redistribution Act of 1882, in every constituency where it was claimed that the change was intended to elect a Conservative, a Conservative was not elected. The representation so far as the party divisions went, was very much the same after the elections of 1882 as it was before, notwithstanding the Redistribution Act of 1882.

There has been a great deal said about this Bill being in violation of the constitution, and after the able and logical speech of the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Borden) it would perhaps be out of place for even a lawyer much less a layman to give an opinion upon that phase of the question. But every man has his opinion whether it be worth little or much, and I propose to give a few reasons why I believe it is unconstitutional to pass this law at this time. Section 51 of the British North America Act, says :

On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner and at such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules.

We are told from the other side of the House, that this only applied to the four provinces, and, therefore, because it did not apply to what is now the whole confederation, it does not apply in the present case. Well, the answer to that is simple. These four provinces were all there was of confederation then, and this Confederation Act was designed and intended to provide for all confederation. There is no other provision in the British North America Act specifying that redistribution shall take place at some other time, and in view of that, I am justified in the conclusion that it was never intended that redistribution should take place at any other time than after a decennial census. We are told by these gentlemen opposite that there is no clause in the British North America Act which says that you shall not redistribute. Well, it does not require a special prohibitory clause to make the prohibition effective. When we incorporate a company we say they shall hold their annual meeting on such a date, but we do not say they shall not hold it at any other date. And if the reasoning advanced by these gentlemen opposite is sound with reference to the British North America Act; that because there is no express injunction, you may do it at any other date, it would apply to any other Act of Parliament as well. Therefore, although it is expressly laid down that the annual meeting of a company shall be held at a certain date in the month of September, if this contention were good, it might be held on any other day of the year. I hold that if a law specifies that a certain thing shall be done it carries with it the assumption that the converse of that shall not be done. That is, an interpretation of the law which has been followed in this House in regard to several Acts of Parliament, and there is no good reason why it should not be held good with respect to the British North America Act. Although the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) cited every clause of the British North America Act that he thought might help his argument, he has not been able to quote a single clause that confers on this Parliament the right to redistribute the seats now. If I go beyond the British North America Act and look at the resolutions on which that Act was based, I think I can find the intention of the fathers of the confederation to put that power in the hands of Parliament, only after each decennial census. With regard to the local legislatures the right was intended to be allowed at any time, and we have it in the following language in these resolutions :—

Until the official census of 1871 has been made up there shall be no change in the number of representatives from the several divisions.

Following that we find this resolution :

Immediately after the completion of the census of 1871, and immediately after every decennial census thereafter, the representation from each section in the House of Commons shall be readjusted on the basis of population.

And for the purpose of that redistribution, it lays down the principle that Quebec having always 65 members, the population of Quebec shall be divided by the number of 65, and that shall be the basis of representation by population, or in other words, the unit of representation which shall prevail in other portions of the country. Now, if we look to see what powers are given to the provinces, we find that the resolution does not say that it shall be done only after each decennial census ; but it says :

The legislature of each province shall divide such province into the proper number of constituencies, and define the boundaries of each of them. The local legislature of each province may from time to time alter the electoral districts for the purpose of representation in such local legislature, and distribute the representatives to which the province is entitled in such local legislature in any manner such local legislature may see fit.

It is laid down that the Parliament of Canada shall do it after the census is taken, but it is not provided that it shall be done at any other time ; whereas the local legislature may do it from time to time ; and I say that was the intention of the fathers of Confederation when they adopted these resolutions which are embodied in the British North America Act, and on which we have been acting from that time to the present. Therefore when it is specially provided that the local legislature may from time to time alter the electoral districts, and it is not provided that the Parliament of Canada shall from time to time alter them, but after each census is taken, we are justified in coming to the conclusion that when it is done at any other time, it is done in open violation of the constitution under which we are acting.

Now, we are told that this is a fair Redistribution Bill. I have given my reasons for believing that it is not. If the principle of division by the judges is the correct one, I have shown that that principle has not been carried out in this Bill. Hon. gentlemen say : "We do not change the constituencies ; we only put certain municipalities within the boundaries of the counties to which they belong, and then assign to the judges the duty of dividing the counties." Do they carry out that provision in the province of Quebec ? Not a bit of it. They themselves change eleven constituencies in that province taking a portion of one constituency and attaching it to another—an open violation of the very principle which they advance in support of the Bill. If the division by the judges is the correct principle where a county or a city is to have more than one representative, why do they not call in the judges to subdivide the counties in Prince Edward Island which are to have two representatives? If I can show that the exceptions to the rule are more numerous than the instances which establish the rule, then the rule is of no value whatever; and that is the case with this Bill. Hon. gentlemen do not call in the judges with respect to the counties of eastern Ontario nor maintain the county boundaries: nor do they in Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. They only do so in western Ontario, where any division that may be made at all is likely to inure to the political benefit of the hon. gentlemen who are introducing this Bill. Why do they not carry out that principle in Leeds and Grenville? Because, if they do so, the hon. member (Mr. Frost) would no longer sit in this House. Let them come into Russell, and carry it out there, and the representative of that county who supports them would not be likely to be in the succeeding Parliament. If the principle is sound, they have violated it by not applying it all over the country.

The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) said that the redistribution of 1891 did not make the unit of representation nearer than it was before, and he cited the county of Grey as an instance of that. I thought the hon. member could not have looked up the population of the constituency, or, he would not have cited what he did. I find that the population of East Grey in 1891 was 26,000, the population of North Grey 26,000, and the population of South Grey 23,000. But at the time, when the change was made, the population of East Grey was nearly 8,000 larger than the population of South Grey, and 4,000 was taken from East Grey and added to South Grey, which made the populations of both very near the same. If an instance were required to show that in the change then made the principle of representation by population was carried out, no better instance could have been cited than the change which was made in South Grey. The hon. gentleman said that the Government had taken the township of Artemesia out of the centre of the county. It is true, it is in the centre of the county going from north to south: but it is more allied to the south riding than to the north or the east: and when they did that they equalized the population in the three ridings, and they are more nearly the same now than they ever were before.

I do not intend to continue this discussion longer, because I think that enough has been said to justify the conclusion that this Act is unnecessary at this time, and that it is an open violation of the constitution under which we are acting; and I shall be very much surprised if the other Chamber of the Parliament of Canada does not throw out this Bill on that very ground. I regard it as one of the important duties of the Senate, above all others, to safeguard the rights of the people by seeing that the principles of the constitution are fairly carried out; and I believe that the members of that Chamber understand quite as well as we do the object of this Bill. The hon. Postmaster General himself said it was for the purpose of strengthening the political party. He said they had been weakened in 1881, and now they were going to right that wrong by strengthening the party, and giving them the power to have more members elected to this House than they can in the circumstances that exist to-day. By that very Act they discredit the intelligence and integrity of the electorate who returned them to office. The people returned a majority to represent the reform party and yet the reform party are carrying out, as the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) contends, every one of their promises, they dare not go back to the constituencies that elected them. That is a standing acknowledgment that they dare not trust the electorate but are compelled to resort to some device to be again returned, and that device is the Redistribution Bill now before us.

We have asked on what principle will the judges act. Looking over the Bill, we can find no information as to the principle on which they will conduct their revision. It reads:

2. The letters patent appointing the commissioners shall direct them, in making the divisions, to consider the distribution of population according to the latest census of Canada, the public convenience, and such divisions as appear to them best calculated to do substantial justice.

The hon. Postmaster General was asked for information. He was asked whether the judges would hold open court and allow people to submit their representation to them, but the Postmaster General could give no information. We are left utterly in the dark and can only arrive at a conclusion as to what is intended to be done by what has been done already. What has been done has been done unfairly, and we can only come to the natural conclusion that the intention is to endeavour, under the shelter of the judges, to act unfairly. I am sorry that these hon. gentlemen are calling on the judges to do a very unfair, I was going to say a very dirty piece of work. I regret that they are imposing such duties upon the judges. I am not prepared to take the stand which these hon. gentlemen did in 1885, when it was proposed to appoint the judges revising barristers. I am not going to say, as these hon. gentlemen did, that the judges will act as partisans, because I am bound to assume that they will act fairly. But we know that there is a good deal of human nature in man, and we know the political record of some of the men who have been put on the bench, and are justified in coming to the conclusion that if it is in the power of these men, without violating any great principle, to serve their political friends, they will do it. Then it is provided that the decision of two judges out of the three will be sufficient. What is to be the composition of the court? In all human probability one man will be selected who, previous to his elevation to the bench, was a Tory, and the two others will be judges who, in politics, were Reformers. The decision of these two will be final. No doubt the Government will endeavour by some means or other to lay down principles for the guidance of the judges which will inure to their benefit, or endeavour to give them inspiration as to how they wish the divisions to be made, and, as far as possible, influence them on these lines. I am afraid that that is the desire and intention of these hon. gentlemen, because they refused to give any information with regard to the principles which the judges shall follow in dividing the constituencies. I consider myself in duty bound to vote against this measure, which, I think, was introduced for no other than a political purpose, notwithstanding any allegations to the contrary. I consider that it is an open violation of the constitution and am bound to vote against it, and even if passed by the subservient majority behind the Government, I shall be very much surprised if it is not thrown out by the Senate.

Mr. H. BOSTOCK (Yale and Cariboo). The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) referred to the Act of 1892 as being a fair one, based on a sound principle. As far as British Columbia is concerned, I do not think that the redistribution made under that Act was in any way fair. At the time Sir John Thompson introduced that Act of 1892, he gave the figures of population in the constituencies, as he proposed to divide them, and these figures, taken from his speech at that time, show that he contemplated that the district of Yale and Cariboo—the new district he proposed to create—would have a population of 20,500; that the district of New Westminster, to which he proposed to give two members, would have a population of 42,226; that the district of Vancouver would have a population of 18,229; and the district of Victoria, with two representatives, a population of 18,538. A great deal was said by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken with regard to this question of representation by population, and I think in this respect the province of British Columbia and its constituencies were not fairly dealt with, especially the constituency I have the honour to represent. Because we find that even then the calculation was that my constituency had a population of 20,500, and the constituency of Victoria, 18,538. Yet the constituency of Yale and Cariboo was left with but one representative and the constituency of Victoria was left its two representatives. If we go further and look at the area contained in these two constituencies, we find that the area of Yale and Cariboo is something like 214,000 square miles, and that of Victoria about 71 square miles. Therefore, the duty of representing a constituency of the size of Yale and Cariboo is one that becomes exceedingly hard on any one member, and, therefore, I think that in making the redistribution that was made under the Act of 1892, the province of British Columbia was not fairly dealt with. Certainly, if a member had to be taken away from one constituency in order to give another member to the New Westminster constituency—as it was considered necessary at that time and as I think it was necessary—what should have been done would have been to take away one of the members from Victoria and give it to this New Westminster constituency. Then, we should have had something like a fair division. Of course, at that time it was absolutely impossible to add to the representation of British Columbia, because the population of the province had not sufficiently increased to allow an increase in the representation. But I think at that time more care should have been taken in considering the development of the country. I propose to show by statistics that this constituency of Yale and Cariboo has increased in importance to such an extent since that time that it is deserving of consideration. Of course, we have no figures of population which bring us down later than the year 1891; but I think I have shown, by the figures above quoted, that the constituencies, as then divided up, were not fairly divided on this basis of population. If we take the development that has gone on in my constituency since that time, we find that a great injustice will be done to the people of Yale and Cariboo, if it is left as it is to-day, with only one member in this House representing the whole constituency. The constituency is of such extensive size, and the attention and consideration that must be given to the interests of the people of a constituency of that kind, are so great, that I do not hesitate to confess that it is utterly impossible for one man to even pretend to look after such a constituency as it should be looked after. Since the Redistribution Act of 1892 was brought into force, no less than ten towns in the constituency of Yale and Cariboo have been incorporated. Most of these towns were hardly in existence at the time this Act was passed. Yet to-day, for instance, the town of Rossland has a population of about 5,000 or 6,000, and Nelson about the same. A number of these other towns that have been incorporated within the last few years, are increasing so fast that they will soon catch up to these two towns that I have already mentioned. In addition to these, we have also a large number of other places that have been founded and that show signs of developing very fast. I do not wish, at this late hour, to detain this House by going too fully into this matter; but when you have a district opening up and developing as this part of British Columbia is doing, with the building of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, the Columbia and Western and the other lines coming in from the United States to the south, and when you have the mining development that is going on all through the Kootenay and the southern part of Yale district, the need for change in the representation becomes pressing. In addition to the towns I have already referred to, within the course of the next two years a number of other towns will grow up, and the people will quite naturally consider that they are entitled to more representation in this House than they have at the present time. The people of that district naturally think that such a part of the country as Kootenay, which is developing so fast, which has done so much to draw attention not only of the greater part of the Dominion, but also of the rest of the world, to our resources, should have greater consideration than a town like Victoria, which, although it shows steady growth, is not developing to anything like the same extent as is the Kootenay country. I should much like to see some means devised to deal with this matter and put it in such a way that people of my constituency, and especially in the Kootenay part of the country, might hope, before very long, to have greater representation in this House. To show the development which has been going on all over that part of the country, I think I cannot do better than quote some of the returns from that district of the different departments since 1896. I find that the Post Office Department shows a very large increase of revenue in my constituency between the years 1896 and 1898. In 1896 the total postal revenue of my constituency amounted to $43,667. Taking the same constituency for 1898, we find the total postal revenue for the year was $98,059. And all through we see that this revenue shows a steady increase. There has been a large number of offices opened in that time, and, of course, if that growth continues, the revenue goes on increasing. When we take the returns of the customs and inland revenue, I think we can show that the growth of that country has been very considerable. I find that in the year 1891 the revenue from the customs in what was known as the Kootenay district amounted to $21,399. The revenue that was collected in the rest of the constituency amounted to $7,418. Now, I find that at the time this Act of 1892 was under discussion, no reference was made to the development that was then going on in the Kootenay country, and attention was not drawn to the fact that the Kootenay country ought to be considered when the House was dealing with the question of representation. Mr. Mara, who was member for Yale at that time, in discussing this question, said:

It is to be regretted that Cariboo, one of the oldest districts in the province of British Columbia, and one that has probably contributed more revenue to the province than any other, is to be merged into another district; but as Cariboo has decreased in population and New Westminster has increased enormously, and as we have to deal with the population as we find it to-day, I am afraid there is no help for Cariboo, but that it must lose its representative.

I think that at that time he should have drawn attention to the development of the Kootenay, and to the fact that the population of this constituency, Yale and Cariboo, was larger than that of the constituency of Victoria, and that the disparity in area was so great that the constituency of Yale and Cariboo was much more entitled to two members than Victoria. To show the development that has been going on in that country since then, I will mention that the customs revenue for the Kootenay country in 1895-96 amounted to $249,971, whilst the revenue for the Yale and Cariboo portion amounted to only $10,954. In 1897-98 the revenue from Kootenay amounted to $360,957. Then, the inland revenue shows possibly a greater advance in the Kootenay country, because, while in 1895-96 it amounted to $36,346, in 1897-98 it had increased to $91,049. These few figures, I think, will show that a greater development, possibly, is going on in that part of the country than in almost any other portion of the Dominion. I also think the population is increasing in an equal ratio. I find that at the last provincial election there were, in the district of Cariboo, Lillooet and Yale 3,350 votes polled, which was slightly more than the total vote, 3,303, polled in Yale and Cariboo at the time of the Dominion election. The vote polled in Kootenay at the last provincial election was 4,107. These figures show that there has been a very large increase in the electorate of that part of the country, and I think we are justified in assuming that the population of Yale and Cariboo is to-day somewhere between 55,000 and 60,000 at the very least. That is a large increase in population, but when we take into consideration the large area of this constituency, you will see how difficult it is for a large population of that kind spread over so great an area, to be properly represented in this House by one member or even by two. I would like to see something done, if possible, to give a better representation, especially to the people of the Kootenay part of the country, because I feel they would not be fairly dealt with if they are left to be represented in this House by only one member. The probabilities are that by the next census the population of this constituency will be somewhere about 75,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the few figures I have given to the House will show that a condition of things exists in this constituency of Yale and Cariboo which should not be allowed to continue any longer, and that some arrangement ought to be made whereby a better representation can be given to this constituency.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). I am pleased that the hon. member who has just taken his seat has set the example of the western representatives entering into this discussion, for now I can follow in the same direction without any apology to the House. Although the province of Manitoba has not been affected by this Bill, still I desire to enter my protest against its adoption by this House, first, because I consider it is contrary to the provisions of the British North America Act to pass such a Bill at any time other than immediately after taking a decennial census; and, secondly, even though it were perfectly constitutional, I think it is uncalled for at the present time. It seems to me passing strange that though the Government make a pretense of adopting county boundaries as the lines of demarkation between constituencies, they are putting this principle into operation in only a portion of the country, simply in those districts where they think it will result beneficially to their own party, and ignoring it in those districts where they imagine that it will result disastrously to the interest of their party candidates. There is therefore no uniform principle prevailing in this measure except that one paramount principle of party advantage. What has become of their great cry of representation by population that we heard so much about in years gone by? That was their stock-in-trade when the former Redistribution Bills were up for discussion in this House. But an analysis of the Bill now before the House discloses a gross infraction of that principle; apparently not the slightest heed has been paid to it, and what was formerly looked on as the great foundation principle on which the whole superstructure of a redistribution should be constructed, has been ruthlessly shattered at the hands of its former champions. I would ask, has it also been silently laid to rest in that grave of discarded policies, repudiated pledges and broken promises to be left unwept and unhonoured and unsung. Surely a principle that was considered to be of such vital importance a few years ago, should be equally as important to-day. We are, therefore, compelled to look below the surface to find the motives that prompted the Government to introduce this measure at this time, in opposition to their repeated declarations of the past, and it does not require much probing to locate the cause.

Is it not a palpable sign of weakness, nay cowardice, for a political party so numerically strong in this House, with times prosperous throughout the country which is bound to be of great assistance to any Government entrenched as they claim they are in the confidence of the electorate, with all those advantages, and still resorting to the unprecedented course of changing the boundaries of the constituencies, not for the purpose of giving increased representation to the country, for that they admit cannot be done except after a decennial census, but for the purpose, as has already been pointed out, of packing the jury in anticipation of their trial when next they appeal to the people? And what is the pretended reason given for the unusual proceeding. The right hon. Prime Minister has said, the Postmaster General has re-echoed it, and the lesser lights who have spoken on the subject have all followed suit in declaring it is for the purpose of rectifying an injustice that had been done their party by the Redistribution Bill of 1882. Now, admitting for the sake of argument that in some few instances, an apparent advantage had been taken of their party by the Act passed by the Conservative Government. Can it be denied that the so-called advantage was taken only at the proper time laid down by the constitution for the redistribution of seats to give increased representation to the people, and not as in this case just before holding a general election. In 1901 a new census will have to be taken, the increased population will demand increased representation; why, therefore, does not the Government wait until the ordinary time to introduce such a measure? Why have a readjustment of the constituencies now to be followed in less than three years with another readjustment? Why go back eight years to the census of 1891, and make the population of that time the basis of a redistribution Bill, when we are within a year and a half of the time for taking another census? In this new country where our population is increasing by thousands year after year, how nonsensical it is to adopt such a course. We do not have to seek far to find the reason. Notwithstanding their pretense of confidence in their tenure of office, in spite of their professions of ability to retain their hold in the Treasury benches, notwithstanding the satisfaction that they claim exists with their administration, they fear the honest verdict of the electors and particularly of the province of Ontario, and hence we have the attempt made under the guise of adopting county boundaries to fix the constituencies in the interests of the Liberal party by putting that principle into effect only where they see a chance of making doubtful seats more safe and gaining a few others from their opponents.

Representation by population, so far as that can be carried out, having due regard to identity of interests, is in my opinion of far greater consequence in the redistribution of seats than the mere adhering to county boundaries, and to say that it is right and proper for a Conservative to represent from 30,000 to 40,000 of a population, while on the other hand a Liberal, in a neighbouring constituency, represents but 16,000 or 17,000 people, is to set at defiance the past contentions of the Liberal party and to perpetrate a gross injustice, not only on the Conservative party, but on the electors generally. It is simply an impossibility to pay any attention to representation by population and adhere strictly to county boundaries, and under those circumstances it is of far more consequence that the people should be represented rather than the territory. Members of this House are not sent here to represent so many square miles of territory, but so many people, and even where a county is large enough to require two or more representatives it is impossible to have equality of population without dividing the townships, and this would be much more reprehensible than dividing the counties. To be sure we have had the very bad precedent set us by Sir Oliver Mowat, who, when Premier of Ontario, in that notorious gerrymander of his, which in comparison the redistribution of 1882, pales into insignificance, and who did not content himself with dividing counties only, but townships and villages. So that if this is prohibited you are bound to have one constituency in the same county with considerably larger population than another.

And as for calling in the judges to run this line of demarkation between constituencies within the same county, the whole proceeding is simply a farce calculated to delude and deceive the electors by a pretended sense of fairness. If the Government were anxious and desirous of seeing a fair and equitable distribution of seats, if they were animated solely and wholly in the interests of fair-play, if it were their main object to undo an injustice that had been done them in the Bill of 1882, why not have removed the whole affair beyond the realm of politics and relegated to the judiciary the entire redistribution of the constituencies to deal with as in their judgment seemeth best, and not merely confine their operations to running a dividing line within the limits of a county to give more than one member. The best proof in my opinion that this measure is mainly intended for party advantage, is the fact that they would not trust the judges to deal with the entire matter, a policy that would have commended itself to all parties if done at the proper time, but have merely allotted to them the nominal duties of running this dividing line and thus using the judiciary as a cloak for their own questionable actions. Possibly the explanation for not doing so is to be found in this: had the judges been requested to undertake the task they would have said, come to us at the proper time, and we will do so, but as for doing so now, it is contrary to the British North America Act, and we cannot be a party to doing an unconstitutional act. And again by leaving everything in the hands of the judges their avowed purpose to down the Tories would not have been carried out to their satisfaction.

For a party that has always laid claim to superior virtue in public life, raising their voices against anything savouring of a partisan character in the legislation enacted by their opponents, denouncing the old Franchise Act and the Redistribution Bill passed during a Conservative regime, not only on the grounds of expense, but also because of their supposed partisanship, it is rather a curious commentary on their past professions to study the nature of the Franchise Act adopted by this Parliament last session, and the present Redistribution Bill the Government are forcing on Parliament at this time. With those two measures embodying the most vicious principles which formerly met with the condemnation of the great and only party of purists, they, no doubt, imagine they will have the Tories sufficiently at their mercy to ensure for themselves another lease of power, and what matters it to them if principles are trampled under foot so long as they are in the enjoyment of the emoluments of office. Look at the unworkable character of their Franchise Act; they broke the law in regard to that Act, during the first year of its existence, by refusing to have the lists printed, the reason given being because of the expense involved, but that was the great objection made against the old Franchise Act. The difference between the two parties is this, whereas, when the Conservative Government desired to do away with the printing of the lists during any particular year, they came to Parliament and obtained the necessary authority, but our present autocratic legislators put themselves up as being superior to Parliament and ignored the expressed wish of Parliament, without deigning to ask for this authority. And what has been the result? We have seen the important constituency of the city of Winnipeg left without a representative during a whole parliamentary session because there was no list on which to take a vote. The lists that have been prepared in that province within the last two months by the provincial government, and on which members will be elected, from that province to this House, have been prepared under the provisions of the notorious and partisan Franchise Act that every person has heard so much about, notwithstanding this Government promised to use their influence with the provincial premiers to make their Acts more in accordance with right and justice. The sunny ways evidently had not much effect with Mr. Greenway, if called into action at all, and when during the session of 1898 of the Manitoba legislature Mr. Greenway promised Mr. Roblin, leader of the Opposition in the House, if he would lay over some amendments he proposed making to the Election Act, that he, the Premier, would himself amend the Act at another session which would be held prior to an election. What has been the result? Another session was called last March, after being in session a month or so it was adjourned ostensibly to allow the members to look after their spring work ; in the interim legislation clerks were appointed and new lists prepared under the old order of things, and evidences are coming to light where scores of doubtful names have been added by the Grit party after the closing of the lists, 103 such names having been added in Greenway's own constituency. This is the manner in which Liberal premiers keep their word, and those are the lists upon which members from that province are elected to the House of Commons. Not satisfied, however, with the advantage they have obtained by their Franchise Act, to cap the climax, this Government now introduces its running mate as a sequel to take still more advantage on their opponents ; this Gerrymander Bill almost as obnoxious, if that were possible, as its fellow the Franchise Act.

Why, Sir, it is simply amazing when you come to review the legislation enacted by this Government since their accession to power in 1896, to find that in almost every instance the great underlying principles of those measures which they championed when on this side of the House have been ignominiously abandoned since coming into power, and the loudest and most enthusiastic advocates of those principles in the past are now the most docile and abject apologists for their abandonment.

Time-serving politicians is, Sir, too complimentary a term to apply to those hon. gentlemen ; self-seeking politicians, whose specialty is humbug, is a more appropriate application. As the leader of the Opposition has truly said, and has challenged successful contradiction, no precedent for such an unusual and unconstitutional proceeding can be cited where such a measure has ever been introduced into the Parliament of Canada and been crystallized into law in the history of our country. It remains for our present constitution wreckers to trample under foot the traditions of the past, to ignore precedents, to disregard the intent and purpose of the British North America Act, and under the pretense of rectifying a wrong do the very thing they accused their opponents of having done. And still we hear them declaiming against wrong-doing, unfairness, and partisanship, as if those terms are not synonymous with modern Grit rule. Why, Sir, they are past masters in those devious and questionable methods by which they obtained power in the first place, and now are trying to retain power, that they have it. It comes with very bad grace from the members of the Liberal party to accuse their opponents of dishonest political methods after the recent revelations in the courts, particularly in the counties of Huron, West Elgin and South Ontario. Evidently the Minister of Justice, for, I believe, it is to him the credit is due for being the architect of this wonderful production, is not nearly so big a man as some of his admirers would have us believe. Smarting under his defeat at the hands of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), he must needs vent his petty spite against that hon. gentleman by wiping out his constituency. Why, Sir, instead of harbouring ill-feeling against the member for Bothwell, I consider he owes him a debt of gratitude, for is it not a fact that he owes his present position in the Senate to that hon. gentleman ? Does any one for a moment suppose that had the Minister of Justice been elected to this House in 1896, the constituency of Bothwell would be wiped out by this Bill ? Oh, no ; that would have been one of the seats where county boundaries would not apply. It is rather small politics and unworthy of a Minister of the Crown to try and legislate his successful opponent out of the House, a gentleman who reflects credit on his constituents, and does honour to their sound judgment in selecting him as their representative, but possibly the hon. Minister has reckoned without his host. The hon. members for East York (Mr. Maclean), and West York (Mr. Wallace), also seem to have been selected for special treatment at the hands of the Government, and most likely in those cases the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) was the advisory committee. Being a Toronto man himself, and failing to convert that city from Conservatism, the next best thing he imagines he can do is to gerrymander the Yorks so as to benefit his party by taking away a large Conservative vote and adding it to the city.

It seems very strange that the Government after glancing over the whole province and sizing up the situation, have decided to put into operation the county boundary system only in those cases where they feel sure the net result will be to the advantage of the Liberal party and deeming the principle of no consequence whatever where its adoption would likely result in increased Conservative representation. How they can defend this Bill on the grounds of its fairness passes my comprehension. Had they boldly come out and candidly admitted that this measure, after having given it a careful study, is their best production from a party standpoint, and designed, as it is designed, mainly for the purpose of assisting their party, they, at least, would be free from the imputation of hypocrisy and political dishonesty that they have convicted themselves of. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said, this Bill does not affect the province of Manitoba, and I will not debate it at greater length, but I object to it, not only because of its unconstitutionality, but also because it is entirely unwarranted at this particular time.

Mr. LEIGHTON G. McCARTHY (North Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I would not dare to address this House, were it not that I feel it incumbent upon me to do so, from the fact that this question interested the hon. member for North Simcoe who preceded me. The principle adopted by the Government in this Bill is the principle of county limits, having regard to representation by population in so far as that is practicable. Hon members on both sides of the House have discussed this question at length, and I do not propose, and would not have proposed even if the time were not so short, to discuss it at any length. On the second reading of the Bill I understand that the discussion should be limited to a discussion of the principle involved in the Bill, only referring to details so far as that is necessary in order to discuss the principle. What have we before us at the present time? I submit that there are only three questions that should be dealt with at this time. First, have the Government power to legislate in this way? Hon. gentlemen of the Opposition have argued that this Bill is not constitutional. Hon. gentlemen on the Government side have argued that it is constitutional, and they have cited cases wherein hon. gentlemen opposite have changed the representation at other times than after a decennial census. If that be so, no man can deny that a precedent exists for the alteration of the constituencies at a time other than that. Whether that precedent is right or wrong, is another question. I am perfectly free to admit that two wrongs do not make a right; but, looking at the question from the standpoint that it is constitutional, and assuming that hon. gentlemen opposite, when they acted as they did, acted constitutionally, and that hon. gentlemen on this side, through the Department of Justice, have declared that this Bill is constitutional, it would be a rash thing on my part to declare that it is not constitutional. I assume that it is constitutional, and leave it to some older members to settle that question. And, if it is not constitutional, there is a means of having it declared ultra vires of this Parliament. A question in which I am more interested is the question whether or not the Government have a right to introduce this measure, and whether this House should pass it, assuming that it has the power. We are told that there is no necessity for it. Now, I say without fear that I herald with delight a Bill which embodies, even partially, the principle to which I have referred. A Government coming into power should endeavour to fulfil its pledges—pledges which, I believe, were forced upon them by the independent movements which existed in this country. In 1891 the Association of Patrons of Industry for Ontario, which formed no small element in the last election, at any rate in the province of Ontario, adopted the following plank in their platform:—

Conformity of electoral districts to county boundaries as constituted for municipal purposes, as far as the principle of representation by population will allow.

Then, the other movement, which was led by my late lamented uncle, adopted a similar plank in its platform, and he moved a resolution in this House in 1892 to the same effect. His plank was:

To require in the readjustment of the constituencies that the distribution of seats shall as far as practicable be based on equality of population, county and city boundaries being taken as the natural limits of electoral districts, with equitable divisions thereof where the population entitles the city or county to two or more representatives.

I point that out for this reason. The late hon. member for North Simcoe argued then, and I argue now, that this was, and is, the proper basis for the representation of Ontario. In this respect I agree with the contention of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson), when he says that Toronto has not sufficient representation. In his speech on that occasion, the late member for North Simcoe—I quote from "Hansard," volume 2, 1892—said that, in his estimation, Toronto should have nine or ten members, and I congratulate the hon. gentleman who now represents Toronto, for the way in which they are espousing her interests. On that occasion, in 1892, the three representatives of Toronto, Messrs. Denison, Cockburn and Coatsworth, who were then representatives of that large city, all declared that the city should not be bound by county limits, and should not, therefore, have the increased representation asked for by the hon. member for North Simcoe. Upon that occasion these hon. gentlemen did not see fit to support him. Now the hon. members for Toronto complain, as I do, that Toronto has not that representation to which it is entitled, but that point can be dealt with more at length in committee.

By this Bill the county I come from is not given sufficient representation. We have there a population of over 83,000, and I think we are entitled, upon the numerical basis, to at least four members, but that also is something that should not be debated here. We are here discussing whether it is proper to confine constituencies to county lines, and it will be a matter for us to discuss when the Bill is in committee whether or not it would be advisable to increase the representation of that county as well as of the city of Toronto, and also of any other county.

The next and all important question, if these two other propositions are answered in the affirmative, is, have the Government adopted the principles as enunciated in these planks in the platforms I have read, and whether this House should adopt them as a principle to be acted upon? What is the converse principle suggested by hon. members on either one side or the other. It is, if I did understand the hon. gentleman who last spoke, representation by population. No one can contend that the last Redistribution Bill, and the one preceding it, which I also agree with the hon. member for East Toronto, was a disgrace to the party that introduced it—

Mr. BERGERON. By whom was it framed ?

Mr. McCARTHY. By the Conservative party.

Mr. BERGERON. By Mr. Dalton McCarthy, member for Simcoe.

Mr. McCARTHY. The late member for Simcoe is, I deeply regret to say, not here, but, speaking for him, I deny that, so far as the Act of 1891 is concerned.

Mr. BERGERON. I am speaking of the Act of 1882.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me a moment while I refer to "Hansard." The hon. member for Beauharnois will find in Vol. 2 of "Hansard" of 1892, that Mr. McCarthy said he did have a finger in the pie in the matter of the Redistribution Bill of 1882, and was prepared to take the responsibility for his share of that disgraceful Act, and would accept whatever punishment the country saw fit to mete out to him for it, and you will find that the country did not mete out to him very grave punishment, judging by the result of the last election, (perhaps his repentance may have accounted for that); but the fact still remains, in my opinion, and apparently in the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite, if we are to believe what they say in regard to the Bill of Sir Oliver Mowat, that the Bill of 1882 was also wrong, because if you put the two Bills side by side, they are almost identical. Perhaps that of Sir Oliver Mowat goes further and is more stringent in its effect, but the intention of each was the same, so far as the attempt goes, no matter what the actual result was. Both were intended to accomplish the same purpose, and for that reason both these Bills should never have been introduced in any Parliament.

Assuming that representation by population is the ideal of some hon. gentlemen you cannot say that the Bill of 1882 carried that out, if you compare the constituencies You have, for instance, the following large constituencies :

Algoma	41,856
Kent	31,434
Russell	31,643
Simcoe North	28,203
East York	35,148
Essex North	31,523
Muskoka	26,515
Simcoe East	35,801
Toronto	144,023
West York	41,857

Compare these with the smaller constituencies :

North Brant	16,993
Cardwell	15,382
Frontenac	13,445
Haldimand	16,307

Lennox	14,900
Peterboro' West	15,808
Brockville	15,853
Durham West	15,374
Grenville South	12,929
Leeds and Grenville	13,521
Monck	15,315

Nobody can say that the man who drafted that Bill drafted it for the purpose of an idealistic representation by population. If representation by population is your ideal, wipe out all your lines and limits and make a block of counties with the unit of 20,908 in each. Then you would have an ideal representation by population, which might perhaps be the best system, but which, in my judgment, is not the best. We have grown up in this country as in England—and I am proud to say we are great worshippers of British institutions—with county lines paramount, and with the idea that county representation and feeling and pride should be engendered in the people. Then, county lines being paramount, subsidiary to that should be representation, so far as practicable, by population. That is the theory on which I am prepared to support this Bill. I asked the question of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to night: What had been the effect of this present Bill on those eastern Ontario constituencies? To which he replied county lines had been disregarded. And therefore, I desire to put myself in this position with regard to this Bill. I am going to vote for the second reading on the ground that it carries out the theory of county limits. But if in committee I find that that has not been carried out, and if any hon. member is able to suggest an amendment to the Bill which will better solidify a constituency so far as county lines are concerned, he may count on my support, whatever that may be worth.

I would call attention to this point. I have some great doubt as to whether the constituencies of Bothwell and Cardwell should be wiped out. Those are constituencies which have been counties since confederation, although not for judicial purposes. There interests have been created by that great length of time, and it may be thought advisable that the constituencies should not be wiped out. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs), I think, will agree with me, and would desire to protect himself in that way; but if in committee the county of Cardwell can be protected in accordance with the views that I have endeavoured to express, we would, I think, consider ourselves free to support any such arrangement.

There is only one other point remaining. Why should not the Government introduce this measure. It seems to me most reasonable and fair that when a party has perhaps been forced by the views of the independents, which element is, as I have said, extremely strong in the province of Ontario, to pronounce these principles as just, that they should at once introduce a Bill embodying that principle, if they desire support in that province from persons believing in those principles. The Government have adopted them in this Bill, perhaps not so far as they should have done but I herald with delight something that lays down some principle on which we can act in the future, and if it appears to be a good principle, we will have some stability with regard to the distribution of seats. Hitherto it cannot be said that any principle was acted upon. Whether the gerrymander worked out with the effect expected or did not, has nothing to do with the consideration of this question. The Bills of 1882 and 1892 were intended to cut some hon. members out of their seats and did not; that makes no difference, but if county limits as the paramount idea and representation by population as a subsidiary is the best, as against the principle of representation by population pure and simple, I think that the Government is to be commended, in so far as it has gone, at all events, and to that extent I am prepared to support the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. POWELL (Westmoreland). The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat made no remark to call for any special reference from myself, except one. He commenced with a reference to the late member for the county of Simcoe, whose demise we all regret. But I think it is time that this hon. gentleman rose above what I might call, to coin a phrase, necropolitan politics. So far as his reference to the late lamented member for Simcoe is concerned, strange to say that gentleman, if he is any authority for the present member, if the present member respects the virtue and ability of the deceased, gave the House, as a result of his handiwork, the Redistribution Act of 1882. That that hon. gentleman framed and had the main part in passing through this House the Redistribution Act succeeding the census of 1881.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) allow me to ask him a question? As I understand it, he was not in the House at the time he speaks. Will he give me the name of his informant, for what he says has been denied?

Mr. POWELL. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) gave us the information in the book that he himself read when he quoted the late hon. gentleman as stating that he took upon his shoulders all the ignominy attached to it.

Mr. McCARTHY. If my hon. friend will allow me to interrupt him, I would say that when he quotes he should quote correctly. The statement that I quoted as made by the late Mr. McCarthy was that he accepted all the ignominy that he was entitled to.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Mr. POWELL. I can inform the hon. gentleman that there are those within the walls of this room who know that there was no division of honour in respect to that matter, but that the late hon. member for North Simcoe had the complete monopoly. The hon. junior member for Halifax challenges the legal members of the Opposition to come to the support of the leader of the Opposition in his contention that the Bill before the House is unconstitutional. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) went so far as to extend to the leader of the Opposition his sympathy and gave the House an expression of his great regret that there was no one versed in law, upon this side of the House who had taken compassion upon the leader of the Opposition and seen to it that his views on constitutional law were in accord with the most advanced authorities. I listened with a good deal of attention to the hon. member for Halifax and I am using no word of hackneyed conventionality, but I am speaking the words of truth and soberness when I say that when that hon. gentleman rose my views were completely antagonistic to those expressed by the leader of the Opposition, and before he sat down he worked a marvellous conversion in my mind. Before proceeding to discuss the constitutional point I may say that the leader of the Opposition requires no sympathy. The gentleman who formulates opinions on constitutional law that are shown to be backed up by the authority that attached to the name of Sir John Macdonald need not ask for the sympathy of even the junior member for Halifax. If there is one man more than another in the political history of this country whose opinions on every point of constitutional law and practice were authoritative, he was the late lamented father of this confederation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) however, might well have reserved his sympathy for the leader of the Government. That right hon. gentleman when he made his speech in this House respecting the Bill now before us gave his reasons for thinking the Bill was constitutional. He did not enter upon any elaborate discussion of constitutional principles, he placed himself solely upon two or three precedents which he quoted but in which he was shown by the leader of the Opposition to be completely at sea. However, Sir, supposing the contention of the leader of the Opposition was correct, supposing for one moment that this Bill is completely unconstitutional, does not the hon. leader of the Government know that nobody entrusted with power can be said to be functus officio so long as that power is not completely executed. If it is executed in mistake, that is a case where incomplete execution of the power was made. In respect to case cited by the hon. gentleman, it was a case which the House was not well informed at the time, and blundered and the Act of parliament, a rectification of what the House had done, or rather a completion of what the House had undertaken to do but failed to do.

I stated that the member for Halifax had wrought a change in my own views as to the constitutionality of this Bill, and I shall proceed to show the House the manner in which my conversion, as I may call it, was brought about. If hon. gentlemen will look into this matter they will find that there are three sections of the British North America Act which apply. The hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell) introduced a fourth section, which, however, the hon. junior member for Halifax eliminates from the discussion by saying that it has nothing to do with the case, and then proceeds to damn the hon. member for East Prince with faint praise by attributing an argument to him that he never made, and then congratulating him upon it. These three sections are sections 40, 51 and 91. The process of reasoning is rather close and I would ask the careful attention of hon. gentlemen, and I would ask the House to bear with me in what may be a dry discussion, for every construction of the meaning of the statute is necessarily a dry discussion. Section 40 says :

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall, for the purposes of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts as follows :—

That section has been cited by hon. gentlemen opposite who have discussed this matter as being conclusive, if that section stood alone I should say that it was conclusive. But it does not stand alone. Arrangements existing under this section were to stand until the Parliament of Canada otherwise determines or enacts. These words "otherwise provides" are given full scope to by section 51. If we turn to section 51, we shall find that provision is made in accordance with which this Parliament of Canada can otherwise provide; and section 40 unquestionably contemplates the procedure under section 51. That disposes of section 40. But hon. gentlemen opposite say that by virtue of the powers inherent in this Federal Parliament which are conveyed by section 91 in general terms, we have the power to deal with this matter. Now, I will read section 91 :

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to resist the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared, that notwithstanding anything in this Act, the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say :

Then follows the list of subjects of jurisdiction that are expressly and by enumeration given to the Parliament of Canada.

Now, my argument is, notwithstanding the general words of that section, it is qualified by every section outside of section 91 which applies to a specific subject that might be covered by section 91. These sections must stand together—sections 51 and 91 and section 51 governs. I might cite several cases of the Privy Council of constitutional matters referred to them in which they have given decisions in support of this construction. I might cite also the principles of statutory interpretation which are well known to the legal gentlemen of this House. If section 91 is general, section 51 specific, section 51 cannot be overridden by the general words of 91, the principle of statutory construction which applies being that general words will not control specific words. A specific enactment must be taken as being an exception to a general enactment, a specific clause to a general clause. I come to section 51, which hon. gentlemen opposite say refers simply to interprovincial readjustment. Now, mark you, if section 51 refers exclusively to the interprovincial readjustment of representation, how easy a thing it would have been to have said so in short terms, how easily could the British Parliament have said: The representation for the provinces of this Dominion shall be on the basis of population, allowing 65 members for the province of Quebec. That is all; those few words would have completed the enactment and made every necessary provision. But this section not only refers to interprovincial readjustment, but it also necessarily implies, as much so as if it was stated in express terms, redistribution as well. I will read it :

On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules.

Now, what is the necessity of this long and elaborate legislation, if all that was sought to compass was a declaration that the representation from the different provinces shall be according to the ratio their population bears to the population of Quebec, which is to have 65 members? But here is something elaborate. And it must be remembered that if this section deals with and provides for distribution, it must be looked to exclusively for the mode of procedure. It is not a legislative declaration as to the relative representation in this House alone, for it provides for a distribution necessarily. Parliament provides an authority—and that authority may be itself, I admit—to make the distribution "in such manner and from such time, &c." It is to lay down the principles that are to determine the distribution. Now, I call the attention of the House particularly to the words "shall be readjusted by such authority." We will say that it authorizes the issuing of a commission—and such a course is in contemplation—by such authority. If the commission was appointed to-day, would not hon. gentlemen in this House say that, after the commission had been appointed under that section and had done its work, the statutory power was spent, if the work was completely done? If the power was completely executed, that must end the power which must last until the work is renewed after the next decennial census. This is rather a bold statement, considering the weight of legal authority on the other side of the House; I assure you that I feel considerable comfort in being backed in this matter by the opinion of such an able constitutional jurist as Sir John A. Macdonald. Now, I wish to call the attention of the legal gentlemen of this House particularly to these words. In one place it says, with respect to one thing, "from such time"; in the same clause it says, "from time to time" in respect to another thing. These expressions must mean "once," and "as often as Parliament sees fit," respectively. "The representation is to be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time," that is, once, and until the statute after the next census. Parliament is to provide the method by which this authority is to act and to make such provision from time to time, as often as is necessary. The readjustment is from a certain time. But the powers of this Parliament, say, to constitute a commission, to lay down regulations, so to speak, which shall guide the commission, are to be exercised as often as this Parliament sees fit to exercise them. It may change them from session to session, or change them during the session, and that is the significance of the words "from time to time." The execution of the power by the authority entrusted with it, is not "from time to time," but until the requirements of the section, that is, until the next decennial census, calls for its exercise again. I arrived at this conclusion, as I said, this evening, and while I speak positively, on reconsideration my opinions might change again; but at present I feel somewhat like the Hon. Joseph Howe, the celebrated statesman in Nova Scotia, who was taxed on one occasion with changing his opinions. "Well, gentlemen," he said, "if it is any satisfaction to you to twit me with a change of opinion, all I can say is, that there are no opinions for which I entertain so little respect as my discarded opinions."

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Perhaps that may come yet.

Mr. POWELL. If this argument be correct, Mr. Speaker, this Bill is unconstitutional. But suppose that the Bill is perfectly constitutional, then I ask: Why is it before the House? I tell the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government, that when he stated, in his speech in support of this Bill, that the trend of public opinion in British-speaking countries, and especially in England, was, that urban constituencies should not be as fully represented as rural constituencies, he is entirely in error, so far as England is concerned. I tell him that in England, from the day the Reform Bill was placed upon the statute-book in 1832, down to the last Reform Bill in 1885, there has been a gradual evolution in legislation towards the cardinal democratic principle, one vote, one power. I do not say that movement has reached its end, but the movement is well defined. Let me give a few facts. In 1832 the hon. gentleman would have been in a perfect paradise, had he lived in England. What has taken place there? Even before the conquest, but largely after the conquest, there had grown up in England certain little municipalities, 'imperia in imperio,' so to speak, upon which depend both the genesis and perpetuation of the principles of British liberty. These little communities, boroughs, had existed for hundreds and hundreds of years. The Act of 1832, instead of recognizing their existence and continuing their dignity, actually struck out of existence a large number of them. I do not remember how many were wiped out in that way, but it is immaterial to my argument. In addition the Act took fifty of these boroughs, these independent municipalities with their glorious histories, with the attachment on the part of the people to their local government which could not be broken, and united them to counties and created new constituencies. The Act divided counties, ignoring the sanctity of county boundaries, and created separate constituencies. In addition to that the Act created four new boroughs in London and gave them representation. In 1868, when the Conservative Reform Bill was passed what was the trend of popular opinion and legislative action as evidenced by it? The Act took one member from each of thirty-five small boroughs; it allowed no borough to have representation that had less than 10,000 inhabitants. There is a recognition, at least, of the principle of representation by population not carried out, it is true, to a very radical extent, but still recognized as a principle. But, nevertheless, in order to give three representatives instead of two, as previously, they subdivided several of the counties and created new constituencies, regardless of the sanctity of the county boundaries. We come down to the Act of 1885, which wiped out seventy-nine of the small boroughs entirely and united them to counties. What does the right hon. Prime Minister say to this action on the part of the British Parliament, or to its maintaining county divisions or its maintaining borough divisions. That Parliament united them just as the Conservatives did in New Brunswick when they united Sunbury and Queen's and as they did in different parts of Ontario.

The Act disfranchised two boroughs altogether, but that was on account of corruption, and I need not refer particularly to them. It wiped out one hundred and thirty-two seats which were divided among the counties and towns. When the right hon. Prime Minister says that this principle of rural as against urban representation prevails in England, I point out these facts to him proving that he is entirely in error. The right hon. gentleman has only to refer to the Bill of 1885, which gave London a representation of 61 members, including the old city of London and the contiguous municipalities, and the other parts that came within Greater London. With an electoral unit of 50,000, that would make the population of London over 3,000,000, while the population was only a little over 4,000,000, so that the discrepancy was small. Liverpool had nine; Birmingham, seven; Manchester, six; Bristol, six; and so on; I need not go over them all. I shall bring my remarks to a head on that score by quoting from an eminent man in his line, Mr. J. Lowes Dickinson, a Fellow of the University of Cambridge, upon the general trend in England of popular opinion towards the principles of democracy as evidenced in legislation. In the United States, from the time of Thomas Jefferson, who, on this continent, may be said to be the father of democracy, when he put in the Declaration of Independence that all men are born equal, to the present time the advance has been towards his ideal. After narrating the history of what I may call the evolution of the principle, Mr. Dickinson says:

The member for a constituency is no longer conceived as the spokesman for a particular district.

How does the right hon. gentleman's theory accord with that?

He is regarded as the trustee of a certain definite amount of political power,—

How does it accord with that?

—determined by the measure of a certain definite population.

How does it accord with that?

The process of redistribution has been, like that of the extension of the franchise, a transition half reluctant and half unconscious to the democratic principles.

I shall not enter into any criticism in detail of this measure. When an hon. gentleman or a Government brings forward a Bill like this which seeks to make a change in what is one of the most fundamental matters in the parliamentary government of the country, that hon. gentleman or that Government should set forth some necessity for it. What reason has he brought forward? The right hon. gentleman has given us several pretexts, but I would like to know what is his reason. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, when they look at the pretext.

will ask whether that be the reason, and they will come to the conclusion that the reason is a political reason, and not the reason contained in the statement that was given to the House. What principle underlies his Bill, I would ask, which would commend it to any independent body. Suppose the hon. gentleman were arguing this matter before a board of judicial men? What would be put forward to these judges upon which he could ask for judgment in his favour? He says we want county boundaries, but the rule that he attempts to lay down is more honoured in its breach than in its observance. The hon. gentleman's rule reminds me very much of a coloured preacher who was the possessor of the hallucination that the millennium had arrived and that Satan was bound for a thousand years. "Beware my friends, notwithstanding the fact that he has been chained, he may catch you, and you and you," said he, pointing to different persons in his audience. One of his dusky hearers said, "Why, massa, the old fellow might as well be loose." In respect to this observance of county boundaries it is violated in so many cases that the rule may be considered as non-existent. There are three things that the hon. gentleman might have as underlying principles—county boundaries, representation by population and the restoration of constituencies to their former conditions. As to population which is a cardinal principle of advanced liberalism in England, has the hon. gentleman based his Bill upon it. He has not. He proposes to make enactments in entire disregard of population, and of the electoral unit. Does he restore constituencies to their former condition? No; only those constituencies from which the hon. gentleman hopes to have some aid at the next general elections are restored. These are all the things that might have been expected as underlying principles of the Bill. There is no principle in it. It is based upon no principle but political gain: it seeks to compass no honest principle. The statement which is made is simply a pretext and the real reason is to obtain some political advantage at the next general elections. In respect to what the Conservatives did in 1882 I will say that there was a large number of new members in Ontario and some new members in Nova Scotia, and it was necessary to make provision for them that there should be some readjustment of the constituencies. Whatever arrangement was made fault would be found by hon. gentlemen opposite. If Conservatives made an arrangement looking to their own political aggrandizement, they did wrong. I for one, regret that at that time the means contemplated by the constitution in section 51 were not resorted to, and that an independent body with authority to divide the provinces into constituencies and to allocate the representatives to them was not constituted. The redistribution of seats should be a matter above politics. It is a matter that should be taken in hand by the leaders of both parties so as to have an absolutely fair non-partisan division of the electorate. Mr. Speaker, I will say no more except this: That in view of the authority of Sir John A. Macdonald, the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was justified in making the statement he did that this Bill is absolutely unconstitutional; and so far as I can see—giving full importance and full force to every section of the British North America Act—withstanding any arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is unconstitutional.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). Mr. Speaker, as it is the intention to close the debate and have a division to-night, I shall not at this very late hour occupy the time of the House for more than a few minutes. The duty that would ordinarily devolve on a member representing a Toronto constituency, has been so efficiently discharged by my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson), and he has so forcibly presented the disabilities under which Toronto will labour if this Act becomes law, that little is left for me to say. But, Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to refute as far as I can some of the criticisms which hon. gentlemen opposite have directed against my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson). The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) was particularly severe on the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ross Robertson) and he accused him of speaking a certain number of minutes on behalf of the Government and then a certain number of minutes on behalf of the Opposition. He declared that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ross Robertson) never made any suggestions in this House that were particularly valuable. I can tell the hon. gentleman from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) that the hon. member from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) since he has occupied a seat in this House has always been able to give a reason for the views he holds, and he has never hesitated to express his opinion by casting his vote on one side or the other as by him was deemed right. I was more particularly struck with the closing remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) when speaking of the political views which are held by the great majority of the people of Toronto. He declared that it was the duty of the representatives of Toronto to support this Bill because it gave greater justice to Toronto than was formerly given, and he told us that if the citizens of Toronto had greater confidence in the administration and sent members here to support their legislation, the city would probably get a larger representation in this House than it was now getting. Are we not justified in concluding from that statement, that, as has been pointed out again and again, the sole object of hon. gentlemen opposite in introducing this measure at this stage of the life of this Parliament, is to secure a party advantage for themselves?

Mr. MACDONALD (East Huron). Permit me to correct my hon. friend (Mr. Clarke) in the statement he has made. He alleges that I said that if the city of Toronto sent representatives here to support the Government, that city would receive greater favours at the hands of the Government. I did not say that. I said that if the city of Toronto was looking to its own interests it would send members here to support this Government, which takes a statesmanlike view of all the affairs of the country, and therefore that Toronto would receive greater benefit than she does at the present time.

Mr. CLARKE. I do not know that the explanation just made by the hon. member (Mr. Macdonald) is any better than the statement which he tries to explain. I am in the judgment of the House when I say, that the sum and substance of his argument was, that if the city of Toronto expressed more frequently its confidence in the Liberal party and Government, it might look for greater favours from the Government than it now receives. But, Mr. Speaker, the people of Toronto have long memories, and they can look back upon the treatment which their city received from hon. gentlemen opposite and their political friends and supporters. They are not unmindful of the fact that that city has been dealt with by friends of hon. gentlemen in the province of Ontario, as unfairly and unjustly as it was possible for them to treat it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) suggests that we should support this Bill because of the measure of justice it metes out to Toronto, but surely he must have forgotten that the Bill as first introduced by the Prime Minister contained no provision for additional representation in that city. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) did not express any disapprobation with regard to the great injustice which was intended to be perpetrated. I have no hesitation in saying, that if it were not for the universal condemnation which that particular feature of the measure met with from hon. members on this side of the House—and to their credit be it said, from many hon. members on the other side of the House—the tardy half measure of justice which is being done to the city of Toronto by increasing its members from four to five would not have been accorded. In order to demonstrate, if demonstration is necessary, that the object of this Bill is purely political, one has only to look at the way in which the Bill affects the city of Toronto and the county of York taken together. When the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) was speaking as to the representation of the city of Toronto, I invited him to give some figures with respect to the representation which the county of York would receive under this Bill, but he apparently could not comply with the request. As at present constituted the county of York, with its three ridings has a population of about 97,000. By the present Bill the population of the county of York is being reduced from 97,000 to about 62,000, but notwithstanding that, the Government do not propose to reduce the representation of the county of York in this House. Why is that done? If the Government had acted fairly, when they reduced the population of the county of York by one-third, they would have reduced the representation of that county in this House by one-third, but they knew the result would have been disastrous to them. If instead of continuing to give it three members they had given the county two members with a population of 60,000, making the unit of representation the same as in the city of Toronto, the Government would not have had a ghost of a show to elect either one of the two members for the county of York. But, after depriving the county of one-third of its population, they still give it three members in the hope that they may succeed in depriving of their seats the hon. gentlemen from West York (Mr. Wallace) and from East York (Mr. Maclean). That is one of the iniquities of the Bill which is apparent to all; that is one of the features of this Bill that is worthy of condemnation. The hon. gentleman from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) also thought that justice was being done to Toronto by this Bill. He went so far as to say that in previous redistributions, wards of the city of Toronto had been taken and attached to some of the ridings of York, for the purpose of giving unfair representation in this House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Landerkin) must have been misinformed because no ward of the city of Toronto has ever been added to any of the ridings of the county of York for such a purpose. What has happened was this: As additions have been made from time to time, under the authority of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, of certain municipalities in the county of York to the city, these added portions while entering the city municipally, have been left in the county for parliamentary purposes, where they had been from time immemorial. They have not been taken into the city of Toronto for the purpose of representation in this House. They remain where they have always been; but the intention of hon. gentlemen, when they took these additional wards into the city of Toronto for the purpose of representation in this House, was not to recognize that the population of the city of Toronto had been increased by that action by nearly 40,000, because they proposed to give it no additional representation, but to gain an advantage in the county of York, and we do not thank hon. gentlemen opposite particularly, because they have been forced by the unanimous opinion practically of the province of Ontario to do this act of simple justice to the city of Toronto. The Postmaster General, in moving the second reading of this Bill, made the statement that the practice had not prevailed in Canada in the past to give as full representation to the cities as to the more sparsely-settled districts of this country. I make bold to say that an examination of the facts in connection with the representation of urban constituencies will not sustain the statement of the Postmaster General. My hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) last night pointed out, and gave sufficient reasons I think to demonstrate, that the Postmaster General's statement was, to say the least, inaccurate. What has been the unit of representation of the various cities in the Dominion? Not counting the city of Toronto, the population of the cities of the Dominion amounts to 481,095; they have 19 representatives, and the unit of representation is 25,321. If the Bill which the hon. gentleman introduced into this House had not been amended in the particular in which it has, by giving Toronto an additional member, the population of Toronto would have been 174,414, and the unit of representation 43,604; but, notwithstanding, a discrimination has been practised and is still being practised against the city of Toronto. Even with this additional member for Toronto, the unit of representation is 34,883. In view of these facts the representatives of the city of Toronto in this House would not be doing their duty, no matter on which side they hold their seats, if they did not rise and enter a protest against this discrimination, which cannot be justified, against the Queen City of the west. While I do not say that the other cities should not have the representation which they have in this House, I do say that if they are entitled to that representation, the city of Toronto is entitled to equal representation in proportion to its population. The four cities of the province of Ontario—Ottawa, Kingston, London and Hamilton—are represented in this House by six members, and their total population, according to the census of 1891 is 131,270, so that the unit of representation is 21,878, which is about the unit of representation of the constituencies generally.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman is giving the population of the other cities from the census of 1891, and he is calculating the population of Toronto as it stands at the present time.

Mr. CLARKE. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman has given me by his interruption an opportunity of emphasizing a fact which I might otherwise have forgotten, that in giving the populations of the different cities, I have taken the census of 1891, and I have also taken the census of 1891 in giving the population of the city of Toronto.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The city of Toronto in 1891 had a population of 144,000. Now it has about 171,000, into which the hon. gentleman divides the representation which makes the unit 34,000.

Mr. CLARKE. Without meaning to be disrespectful to the hon. gentleman, I certainly would not have taken up so much time in referring to misstatements which he made but that I thought he was familiar with the population of the different cities of this province and of the Dominion. I can only assure the hon. gentleman that he is entirely mistaken as to the figures he gives of the population of the city of Toronto. I am giving the populations of the cities of Ontario as they are found in the census of 1891. The city of Toronto, as it is to be constituted by this Bill, including the wards taken from East and West York, according to the census of 1891, has a population of 174,414. We are asked to be satisfied with five members for a population of 175,000, while the other four cities of Ontario which I have named, with a population of 131,000, have six members. I appeal to the hon. gentleman's sense of fair-play, that when he next makes a speech with regard to the representation of cities in this House, he will do justice to the city of Toronto. I have refrained from saying what the probable population of the city of Toronto is now. Might's Directory estimates the population comprised under this Act, to have been on the 1st of January last no less than 235,000. If there were a desire on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to do simple justice to the city of Toronto, in view of the enormous increase which has taken place in the population of that city during the past five or six years, they would have given it the same unit of representation in this House that other cities of the Dominion possess.

The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) spoke in the highest terms of the late Mr. Dalton McCarthy. He quoted him as an authority with regard to the redistribution Bill of 1892. He cited his action as one which might be followed by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to-day; and he made use of arguments presented by that hon. gentleman in 1892 with respect to the unfairness of some provisions of the Redistribution Bill of 1882. Will the House bear with me while I quote some of the statements made by the late Mr. Dalton McCarthy respecting the representation of cities in this country and in the old country? The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) said of my hon. friend from East Toronto that he had less confidence in him because he had not stated correctly what the practice was in regard to the representation of urban constituencies in the Imperial Parliament. The late Dalton McCarthy, speaking in this House on the 7th of June, 1892, made reference to urban representation as follows:—

Mr. CLARKE.

There is, I believe, a general impression prevailing that cities are not represented on the same basis as counties. That is a mistake. The unit for counties and the unit for cities are practically identical. The population of all cities is added up, and the total is divided by the unit of 53,700, and the result is that the cities as a whole are represented just as the counties are.

He further said:

Taking the cities as a whole, they secure, according to their population, as many representatives as the counties; that is what I want to impress on the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for East Toronto quoted any statements that misled the hon. member for Halifax, I am sure that he erred in good company, and that the figures he presented to this House were figures which he believed might be thoroughly relied upon. Hon. gentlemen opposite are asking us to support this Bill in view of the additional representative being given to the city of Toronto. Let me draw their attention to the fact that the course which they have pursued in their dealings with Toronto for the past ten or fifteen years does not justify the representatives of that city giving them any confidence or help. The city of Toronto was represented in the Ontario legislature since confederation by two members, but the population increased so largely that in 1885 Sir Oliver Mowat was compelled to give it an additional representative. But, contrary to every principle of justice and fair-play, he united the two constituencies, which had been distinct and separate from confederation up to 1885, and, while he gave the people of Toronto, as one constituency, an additional representative in the legislative assembly of Ontario, he took good care to provide that, while Toronto should return three members, each elector should only have the opportunity of recording two votes. So that, when they could not influence the voters of Toronto in any other way, these hon. gentlemen did not hesitate to introduce the principle of minority representation, which had been tried in the old land and abandoned because found impracticable and unworkable.

The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) asks us to support this Bill because it is based on principles which prevail in the old land. I may say to the hon. gentleman and also to those who take an interest, as most of us do, in the affairs of the old country, that there is a serious agitation there with regard to representation in the House of Commons. It has been the subject of animated discussion in the old land, but, notwithstanding the pressing importance of that question and the keen public interest which is being aroused to the anomalies that now exist in the representation of the people, the impropriety is generally recognized of having any redistribution of seats in the Imperial Parliament until after the next census is taken. So far as I have been able to judge from the arguments presented by hon. gentlemen opposite, I am unable to come to any other conclusion than that the sole object of this Bill is political and party advantage. The hon. member for Simcoe quoted the opinion which the right hon. leader of the Government expressed, when leader of the Opposition, on the 31st May, 1892. I think I may requote that opinion to advantage, as showing the attitude of the right hon. gentleman, some seven or eight years ago, on this question of redistribution :

The periodical redistribution of seats in this House is a standing order of our constitution. It is not a matter as to which the Government are free to act, which they can repudiate, or which they can accept ; if it were so, it would be open to each party to deal with it in a manner best suited to its own interests, in the conception which both parties hold of their own rights. But it is not such a matter.

I have only to say, further, that the right hon. gentleman, in introducing and pushing through this Bill, is establishing a very bad precedent for the future. It is one that may be taken advantage of to stifle, for a time at any rate, the voice of the people and commit an injustice to political opponents. If this measure is persisted in, the people will recognize more clearly than at present that political advantage, and not principle, is the mainspring which has actuated the presentation and forcing through of this Bill, and political parties will not be slow in the days to come to take advantage of the precedent thus established to secure party gain. We are asked to support this measure because it has a provision that the judges shall sub-divide the constituencies. Did the right hon. gentleman always entertain the view that it is wise to delegate the power of Parliament, as to the formation of constituencies, to the judges. I do not think that the position which the right hon. gentleman takes now is in accord with the position he took formerly. I notice that in the " Hansard " of 1892, vol. 2, page 3126, he is reported as saying :

In some quarters the suggestion has been made that the duty of redistribution should be referred to a commission of judges specially appointed ; in other words, that Parliament shall divest itself of its powers in this most important particular. Sir, I am bound to say at once that this is a proposition which my friends and I would not favour upon this or any other subject. I am bound to say that we would not entrust to any this duty and privilege, which belongs to Parliament. Moreover, this proposition implies a singular want of confidence in parliamentary institutions. It implies that in a matter of this kind the majority would never be able to rise above the low temptations of strengthening themselves at the expense of their opponents. I am sorry to say there is some ground for such a conclusion ; but, on the other hand, I am happy to say also that the mother land affords an example where the majority composed, I am still more satisfied to say, of the Liberal party, showed itself equal to the highest conception of equity and justice upon such an occasion ; and the majority in this country are charged with having on similar occasions abused their power, still the conclusion to which I and my hon. friends have come is, not that Parliament should on that account deprive itself of its power, not that a sound principle should be departed from, but rather that we should appeal to the majority to rise to a nobler conception of their duty, and do in this country what the majority, composed of the Liberal party, did in Great Britain. On this side we are not disposed, even with this glaring abuse of the powers and majority, to come to the conclusion that Parliament should divest itself of its rights and privileges. We stand by the principle that the inherent power of Parliament must on all occasions be exercised by Parliament itself.

To-day, within a few years after the right hon. gentleman gave expression to those views we are asked to sustain the opposite view and vote for the passage of his Bill because he has in a measure called in the judges to assist him in this uncalled for and unworthy act. Further on he said :

Moreover, I may say that if a majority of Parliament cannot be trusted to do justice in a matter of this kind, to refer the matter to a commission would be begging the question and not solving it, because what would happen ? If the majority of Parliament could not be trusted to do justice in such a case, the commission would be appointed by the same men who, according to that, could not be trusted to do right. The commissioners would be stamped with their own image, swayed by their own spirit, and no greater justice could be expected from the commissioners than from the body that appointed them.

Yet we are asked to hold up our hands in admiration and praise of the Government for providing for the selection of three judges the decisions of two of whom shall be final, to redistribute within certain limits constituencies in portions of the province of Ontario. The right hon. gentleman concluded by saying :

What we propose is that this measure of redistribution should be framed by a committee appointed in the same manner as the standing committees of this House.

That was the view then entertained by the right hon. leader of the Government. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite or on this side whether, now that the right hon. First Minister has the advantage and opportunity of giving effect to the view he believed was sound in 1892, he should not take the Opposition into his confidence in the preparation of this measure and ask hon. gentlemen on this side to assist a committee on that side to make a fair redistribution Bill if such a measure be necessary ?

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) also placed himself on record at the same time in support of the position taken by the right hon. gentleman.

So much for the position which these hon. gentlemen now take on having judges called in to subdivide the constituencies which they had already shaped out in their own interests. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in discussing the redistribution Bill of 1892, laid great stress upon the principle that there should be no double constituency, no constituency sending two members to this House. The hon. Postmaster General, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said :

The Bill restores the county lines to the province of Prince Edward Island. That island is entitled to five members, and the counties have, until very lately, been represented each by two. A change was made. Portions of one county were detached and given to another, and the number of members reduced from six to five. It is now proposed to restore to each county those portions that necessarily belong to it, and to give representation accordingly—one to King's, which has the smallest population, and two each to the other counties, whose population exceeds that of King's.

That is the way hon. gentlemen opposite propose to give effect to the views which were enunciated by their leader when in Opposition, and which were never challenged by any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. The present Minister of Justice, who was then an important member of this House and the gentleman who spoke most frequently on constitutional questions on behalf of the Opposition during the time when hon. gentlemen sat on this side, in discussing the Redistribution Bill of 1892, said :

There is another point which is important, and it is that there should be single constituencies. It is not proper to have two constituencies united into one. In the first place, it is extremely inconvenient. In the case of a by-election in this city, why should a candidate be called upon to ask the suffrages practically of two constituencies in order to obtain a seat in Parliament. The same may be said of Pictou, Halifax and Hamilton, as well as of Ottawa. All these constituencies ought to be divided, and in no case should there be two representatives for the same constituency.

And the lat hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) expressed his concurrence in that view :

I agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that the principle of double constituencies is one that ought not to be increased, but, so far as possible, it ought to be put an end to. I quite agree that the constituencies ought to be single in every point of view.

That was the opinion entertained regarding double constituencies then. In making a redistribution have they acted on that principle? What have they done in regard to such constituencies as Hamilton, Ottawa, Pictou County, the city and county of Halifax and the constituencies of Prince Edward Island? They have ignored the principle they professed to believe in, and they have done so because they hoped to gain political advantage, to make political capital by so doing. Why not divide the city of Hamilton? That is one constituency represented by two members on the floor of this House. If the rule is a good one that no constituency shall send two members to this House, why should Hamilton and Ottawa be allowed to send two? Why is it that of all these constituencies in Ontario sending two members only one is done away with, and that one West Toronto? It is fair to infer that the reason is that it would be utterly impossible for hon. gentlemen opposite or for the judges to subdivide Ottawa or Hamilton so as to make capital for the Government. If they subdivided them, what is almost a certainty, would become a certainty, and they would lose both seats in both cities; and so they swallow their principles, and leave every double-member constituency intact except one—the constituency of West Toronto. And that act of justice and fair-play and discrimination as far as the city of Toronto is concerned, I presume, in the opinion of the hon. member for East Huron is an additional reason why hon. gentlemen on this side should support this measure.

I have but a few words more to say. As I understand it, there are 51 constituencies in Ontario affected by this Bill, the constituencies westward of and including the county of Ontario. These are represented in this House by 31 Liberals and 20 Conservatives. These constituencies are as they were framed and made by the redistribution Acts of 1882 and 1892. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) in addressing the House threw a challenge to hon. members opposite which not one of them has yet accepted, to show wherein political advantage was gained by gentlemen on this side by the Redistribution Bill of 1882. Whether that challenge is accepted or not, I draw the attention of the House to these facts—that in the 51 constituencies affected by this Bill there is a population of 1,254,554. The unit of representation is 24,600. The 31 Liberals who occupy seats in this House representing constituencies in this group represent an average population of 22,186, while the 20 Conservatives represent no less than 28,338 on the average. The unit of representation so far as these 51 constituencies are concerned, is exceeded by nearly 4,000 in the case of the Conservatives, while in the case of the Liberals it falls short by about 2,500 on the average.

Now, take the whole province of Ontario, and what do we find. We find that the constituencies supporting the Government in Ontario number 52, and have a population of 1,157,992. The unit of representation for these constituencies is 22,269. And in the case of these 52 constituencies, the unit of representation is 1,640 less than the unit of representation for constituencies represented by Ontario Conservatives in this House. Whether the law of 1882 or the law of 1892 acted injuriously or not, the fact remains that, so far as the representation is concerned in this House, if you take it over the whole province of Ontario or that portion of it affected by this Bill, the unit of representation for those who represent the Conservative party in this House is nearly 2,000 higher than for the constituencies of hon. gentlemen who occupy seats on the other side.

An hon. MEMBER. Question.

Mr. CLARKE. The hon. gentleman will have to bear with me, and I am sure he will afford me a few minutes longer, because—and I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker—I do not often trouble the House, and I did not know until a few hours ago that this debate would close to-night. Another principle that hon. gentlemen opposite advocated was that we should restore municipal county boundaries. I need not dwell on that at greater length than to say that these hon. gentlemen have restored the municipal boundaries where they found it to be to their political advantage, and where they found no political advantage they left those boundaries severely alone, and as fixed by the Acts of 1882 and of 1892. If hon. gentlemen will look at the constituencies affected by this Bill, they will find that the 59 constituencies from Ontario county westward contain a population of 1,467,360. The unit of representation in these 59 constituencies is 24,870. Of the 59, 37 are represented by Liberals, the unit of representation for their constituencies being 23,061; while the 22 Conservatives who make up the contingent of the party from the part of the province of Ontario affected by this gerrymander represent an average of 27,912 souls. Now, I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that while the portion of the province of Ontario affected by this gerrymander, has constituencies averaging 24,870, they have left that part of the province religiously alone, so far as county boundaries are concerned, where the unit of representation is less than 20,000. They were continually complaining that the eastern portion of this province was over-represented, and declaring for additional representation for the western part of the province. They made distinctions, and drew attention to the fact that there were a number of small constituencies in Eastern Ontario that might be amalgamated, and additional seats found for the western part of the province, which was thought to be increasing more rapidly in population and was entitled to a larger representation. But what have they done in this Bill? Have they carried into effect the views they expressed time and again when they occupied seats on this side? Have they taken away any of the representation of constituencies east of the county of Ontario? Not at all. They have left them alone. The Minister of Justice pointed out, referring to volume 1 of the Census of 1891, that it was only necessary to look at the Census to see that the portion of the province lying west of the city of Toronto was under-represented, and the portion lying to the east, between the Ottawa and St. Lawrence rivers, and the eastern portion of Lake Ontario was over-represented. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) also drew attention to this fact, and pointed out that it was unfair to the people of Ontario that this section of the province should be over-represented, while the western part was under-represented; and suggestions were made as to how this over-representation could be done away with in the eastern portions of the province. But, Sir, notwithstanding the opportunity now presented to these hon. gentlemen to do justice to the western portion of Ontario, they have left these eastern constituencies just as they were. The reason is not hard to find. When they were contending so loudly for additional representation in the western part of Ontario they had only three or four followers from that part of the province east of the county of Ontario, while the Conservative party had 28 representatives. That was the reason that they advocated a re-adjustment of the representation of eastern Ontario. But since that time they have increased their representation in this House from the counties east of the county of Ontario from 4 to 15. They have now 15 representatives while their political opponents have 18. Previously their political opponents had 28 and they had 3 or 4. Because they have been successful in the elections of 1896, because they succeeded in capturing 10 or 12 seats in eastern Ontario, they have abandoned every profession, every principle, they have ignored altogether the over-representation in this part of the province, which still continues; and I repeat, the reason they have taken that course is because they find that if they adopted the municipal boundaries in those counties in the eastern part of this province, they would make no gain. As a matter of fact they would make some losses, as the return of friends of hon. gentlemen opposite from the eastern part of the province to the Legislative Assembly clearly shows. So we are justified in concluding that they are prepared to abandon every principle of representation that they advocated while they occupied seats on this side of the House, if by so doing in this Redistribution Bill they can make some political advantage for themselves. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) said that they had fulfilled practically every pledge they had made to the electors prior to 1896. If they believed in representation by population they have not attempted to put that principle in force in this Bill. If they believed that the eastern part of Ontario was over-represented and that the western part was under-represented, they have not attempted in any thing they have done in this Bill to give the western portion of the province that representation to which it is entitled. They have acted in this matter as they have acted in respect of every other feature of their policy since they came into office ; they have sought, we must admit, a party advantage before endeavouring to carry out those high strung principles of political morality which they gave expression to when they occupied seats on this side of the House. Sir, I claim that in view of the utterances of the right hon. Premier he is not justified in bringing this Bill before the House now. The only justification that he can present to the House and to the country for so doing is that he is afraid to make another appeal to the constituencies of this province to which he appealed in 1896, because he must feel that the policy and actions of the government have fallen so far short of their professions that when another opportunity presents itself to the electors, they will not hesitate to express their disapproval of the course of the hon. gentleman and of those who are associated with him.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). I crave the indulgence of the House for only a few minutes. I rise to speak on the legal question that has been raised by the leader of the Opposition. In the early part of this debate, I asked him if he thought these two Acts, one that I cited myself, and one that was cited immediately afterwards by another hon. gentleman, were unconstitutional. The hon. gentleman did not answer then, but later on in his argument, instead of answering that question, he admitted that these Statutes were perfectly constitutional, but that they were made to correct a clerical error. To-night we have had from the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) conclusive evidence that these were not merely clerical errors but they were important acts changing the boundaries of electoral divisions in this province. So that argument stands as it was put to the leader of the Opposition. But what have we got now as a presentation of this legal question ? We have got from the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) a presentation of it, and he admits himself that he is in doubt as to whether this Act is constitutional. He says that he is not convinced, but that the best reading that he can give of it leads him to think it is constitutional. Then he calls to his support the opinion of Sir John A. Macdonald as to the constitutionality of it. Then we have the presentation of the case by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). He says that until almost a minute or two before he rose to speak he was firmly convinced that this Act was constitutional, but he says that the speech of the hon. junior member for Halifax convinced him that the leader of the Opposition was right. In fact the instantaneous conversion of Saul on his way to Damascus was not to be compared with the suddenness of the conversion of the hon. member for Westmoreland. And still he tells us that we can have no assurance that he will not change his opinion back again before this Bill passes the House. Now I submit that the arguments that have been adduced show that this Act is constitutional. It was stated by way of answer to the hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell) that he invoked the aid of section 8 to show that there was authority in this House to pass this Act. But both gentlemen admit that section 47 is ample in itself to give authority. And the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) says that section 91 also adds to that. I do not think that section 91 has very much to do with it, but supposing that it has, then it only makes the case so much the stronger. Now, section 91 is from his stand-point the most important section. It says :

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the class of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces ; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared, &c., &c. :

Now, if these sections together, or either one of them, give the power, then the power exists subject to some limitations, if there are any limitations in any section of the Act that will prevent this Bill being passed. Now the section that pretends to limit that power for any purpose whatever in section 51, and any one who will read it in connection with the subsections if he is not convinced that there is no limitation to this legislation, as it is proposed to be passed now, then, I will say, that I cannot read plain English in a matter of this kind. It seems to be clear that there is no limitation as to a matter of this kind, but that it is mandatory in its character upon this Parliament as to what after every decennial census, they are to do in reference to the adjustment of the representation as between the different provinces. Now, then the argument is said to be supported by the opinion of the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald that this Bill is unconstitutional and it is said that he gave that opinion in reference to the Tuckersmith Bill. He only gave that opinion incidentally. When the Senate threw out the Tuckersmith Bill he incidentally remarked that it was a good thing that the Senate had done so because that prevented this House from passing an unconstitutional Act. That Tuckersmith Bill was passed by this House, of which Sir John Macdonald was a member. There were, in the House, plenty of men of great legal ability, yet the constitutional question was never raised, and, if it was never raised in respect to the Tuckersmith Bill and in respect to these other two Bills referred to, I ask this House, as a matter of judicial fairness, to come to the conclusion, whether the right view to take as a legal matter of this question is the opinion expressed by this House in the passing of this Tucker-smith Bill, or the incidental or casual remark, made by Sir John Macdonald, that he is said to have made in reference to the Senate not passing the Bill because it was unconstitutional.

Mr. RICHARD TYRWHITT (South Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at this late hour and at this late stage of the debate to delay the House more than a moment or two, but, my chief object, in raising, is to join with my colleague from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), in protesting against the injustice done to that county by having only three members allotted to it with a population approaching 90,000, whereas, York County adjoining, with a population of 60,000, has the same number of representatives. Now, Sir, any references I may make to the début in the political arena of my colleague from the North Riding of Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who is the friend of a lifetime, I make more in sorrow than in anger. I have watched that hon. gentleman's career, and during his election which resulted in his return to this House, he studiously attempted to represent both political parties. He, on almost every occasion, represented himself as being a member of both political parties, and now, Sir, in the debate in this House to-night, he has announced that he proposes to vote for the second reading of the Bill, at the same time reserving to himself the right of opposing it later. I suppose that is a right which will be conceded to all of us, but, it appears to me, being rather an old-fashioned Conservative, that it would have been much more honest for him, posing as a Conservative in his riding, to have joined with the Opposition in opposing a measure which is introduced to the detriment of the political party to which he professes to belong. A good deal of time has been occupied by the legal members of this House in discussing the constitutionality of this measure. For my own part, possibly from my want of knowledge, it appears to me that the hon. gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill (Mr. Mulock), never claimed for the Bill that it was constitutional, but he referred to the fact that the Redistribution Act of 1882 had worked to the detriment of the political party of which he was a member. He said that his Bill proposed to undo what was done in 1882. In the whole of that hon. gentleman's speech I do not think that he claimed any virtues for the particular Bill now before the House. He simply claimed that it was in the interest of his party. That hon. gentleman alluded to my hon. friend for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and another, on this side of the House, as holding their seats by the gerrymander of 1882. But, Sir, being a constituent of that hon. gentleman, and knowing how his elections have been carried, I can say to this House that he owes his presence here to the tactics of such men as Captain Sullivan and to gentlemen whom we have heard so much of lately. I think it ill-becomes that hon. gentleman to assign such a reason for the presence in this House of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), and the hon. member for North Bruce. I have already said that I only intended to delay the House for a moment or two. I am as anxious as any hon. gentleman that the division should be taken, and I only rose to protest against the injustice done to my riding. A great deal has been said, and well said, by hon. members on this side of the House, in opposition to the Bill, and I can only say that I heartily concur in everything that has been said against the measure.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. OSLER. I do not believe that there should be any "oh, oh" on that side of the House because, I do not think I was ever accused, whatever my other faults may be, of making long speeches. I do not believe there is anything in the world more tedious than making long speeches unless it be listening to them. But, I cannot record my vote on this Bill silently. I must give, shortly, expression to my feelings as to the Bill itself. It is the one egg that the Government have proposed to hatch out of all their election promises. They have kept the egg under them so long, that I do not think it should produce a very healthy chicken. I do not think it will be a chicken that will bring much of value even should this Bill pass. I am not capable of judging as to the constitutionality of the Bill and do not propose to touch upon that. But I think I am capable of arriving at an opinion as to whether it is a fair and proper Bill. I can only arrive at the conclusion that it is not a fair Bill; it is a Bill brought in at this late date, simply and solely, for party purposes. It is purely a party Bill from beginning to end. As my hon. colleague from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), has said, the right hon. Prime Minister had swallowed every principle and profession that he had when he was in Opposition on this very question.

This Bill is brought in as a party measure, and in order to secure for the Liberals a party advantage. The great injustice done to the city of Toronto has been already referred to, and I shall not dwell on it at this late hour. The country will easily see that this Bill is not a Bill which lives up to the professions and principles which the Liberals announced before they attained power. It is not a Bill of representation by population, it is not a Bill of county boundaries, it is not a Bill of single seats; it is purely and simply a Bill to help the Liberal party. Here is the most important measure of the session brought on in midsummer, forced through the House, and after two days' discussion, we are called upon to vote at half-past three in the morning. It is not fair to the Opposition that we should be forced to vote on it, after such meagre discussion. But the gentlemen who lead the Government have found that their followers are being discredited in the western part of Ontario, and so they had to resort to what is called the "Machine." They and the provincial Government are partners in what is called the "machine." I am new in politics and I did not know until to-day that the machine was a threshing machine under the joint partnership of the two Governments, which they sent with men around the country pretending to thresh for the farmers, but really for the purpose of bribing the voters. The days of this machine is now ended, and the Dominion Government find that the government of Ontario which they called their right arm is of no more use to them. The joint ownership of the two Governments in that machine will soon disappear, and this Government knows that full well. They know that the days of the Ontario Government, the days of the Prime Minister of Ontario, whom the right hon. the First Minister called his right arm, are numbered, and that he can no longer count on his support. They are now trying at this late hour, and at this late date in the session, to force through this Bill to give them some advantage to compensate them for the loss they will sustain by the discredit and the defeat of the Hardy Government. I do not believe this Bill will do them one iota of good. I believe that they are so discredited in Ontario, that no Gerrymander Bill will prevent the people from casting them out of power.

Mr. BERTRAM. So much has been said in relation to the representation of the city of Toronto, that I do not feel inclined to cast my vote without giving utterance to the idea, that I as a representative of the city of Toronto have come to a different conclusion from the other gentlemen representing that city. I desire to tell them that with five members allotted to the city of Toronto, as this Bill proposes, that city will have a larger representation under a Liberal Government than it ever had under a Conservative Government. During all the years of power of the Conservative party, they neglected the city of Toronto, and it is now left for a Liberal Government to give it a larger and a fairer representation. I did not feel satisfied that only four members should be allotted to the city of Toronto, because I believed that when 35,000 of a population was brought in from the county of York, the representation of the city should be increased. The Government have increased the representation of that city and have done us an act of justice. I believe most of the citizens of Toronto will agree with me, that the city representation should be confined to the city of Toronto and that the county of York should be kept separate. At this late hour

Mr. OSLER.

I shall not detain the House, but I cannot help remarking that the two hon. gentlemen from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke and Mr. Osler) never make a speech in that city without painting in glowing terms how soon the Conservative party will come back to power. They do not seem to be able to make a speech in this House without bringing that same idea uppermost, but I can tell them, that there are no signs of it anywhere. I am glad to think that the Liberal party is giving the city of Toronto better representation in this House than it ever received from the Conservatives. The Conservative party represented by the hon. gentlemen from West Toronto, are under the impression that they own that city, politically, but they will soon find they are mistaken in that respect. They had a hard struggle to retain the seat for both of these gentlemen, and when the time comes they will have to fight hard for all the seats in that city. They think that the Liberals are weak in Toronto, but the Liberals will give an account of themselves in that city, and when the elections come around these gentlemen may be considerably surprised.

House divided on the motion for the second reading of the Bill.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE—CONTRACT FOR CLOTHING.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

Who supplied the clothing for the Royal Military College at Kingston previously to the present firm, and was it by tender and contract, and for what length of time?

Who now supplies the clothing for this institution ; were tenders called for, and if so, was the contract given to the lowest tenderer ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). This is a matter which is under the control of the College itself. As soon as I saw the notice of the question I asked for the information to be sent from the College, but I have not received it yet. I would ask the hon. gentleman to let the question stand.

MEMBERS' MILEAGE ALLOWANCE.

Mr. MAXWELL (by Mr. Morrison) asked :

How many members represent the county of Pictou, N.S., in this House ? What are their names in full ? What is their place of residence ?

What is the mileage paid to each member, and the difference in amount, if any ?

What is the authority for changing the amount paid to each for the session of 1898 ?

Has any authority been given to the Government to pay any further amount to either of the members other than the regular mileage allowed between them previous to the session of 1898 ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The members representing the county of Pictou, I need hardly say, are those whose names are well known, and given in the books: Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, and Mr. Adam C. Bell. The matter of mileage paid to members of this House is not in any way under the control of the Government. It is authorized by statute, and members are entitled to draw mileage from the place of their residence, as declared by themselves. Mr. Bell is resident at New Glasgow, in the county of Pictou, and his travelling allowance amounts to $171.40; Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper gives his residence as the city of Victoria, B.C., and he has received travelling allowance to the amount of $573.20.

MR. MARTIN JEROME, OF MANITOBA.

Mr. ROCHE asked:

1. Is Mr. Martin Jerome an employee of the Interior Department in the province of Manitoba as forest ranger or in any other capacity?

2. If so, is he the same gentleman who is the Liberal candidate for the constituency of Carillon in the ensuing elections in that province?

2. Will his services be continued by the Government while he is engaged in party politics?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The officer who has charge of this matter has not been able to call my attention to this question until a few moments ago. In order to answer it, some information will have to be procured from Manitoba, as we have not got it in the department. Mr. Martin Jerome is in the employ of the department. As to whether he is a candidate or not we have not any information, but I will get the information and answer the question as soon as possible.

BROCKVILLE AND WEST HURON ELECTIONS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). With respect to the matter which I mentioned to the leader of the Government yesterday, I now desire to make a few remarks in explanation of the motion which I then stated to the House I would make. The motion which I propose is, that the papers, poll-books, records and documents of every kind relating to the Brockville and West Huron elections, and in the possession of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, may be laid upon the Table of the House, and for that purpose that he may be summoned to appear and bring them, so that they may be read. That motion is one which has been made at various times in this House, it being brought up as a matter of privilege the last time in 1892, when Mr. Lister, then a member, made a similar motion in connection with the London election. I shall make this motion for the purpose of following it up with another motion, to the effect that these papers, when produced by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and laid upon the Table, may be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to inquire into and investigate the conduct of returning officers and deputy returning officers in the Brockville and West Huron elections, for the purpose of reporting thereon, and that the committee be given all usual powers in such cases.

Mr. FIELDING.

The objection may possibly be made, inasmuch as Parliament has relegated to another tribunal—the courts of justice—matters connected with the holding of seats in this House, and which are dealt with by the Controverted Elections Act, that it is not proper that such a motion as this should be made. In anticipation of that, I have taken occasion to look at the authorities which have been laid down by eminent constitutional lawyers, some of whom are not now in the House, and some of whom are in the House, and I find there is no difficulty whatever on that score, so far as the question has been dealt with by lawyers in this House and by the authority of the Speakers of this House. In 1875 the Hon. Mr. Blake used this language, reported at page 808, "Hansard":

He would be sorry to believe that the House had been deprived by the passing of the Controverted Elections Act of its power over returning officers and deputy returning officers, of its power to investigate complaints made against them and to punish them for improper conduct.

Sir John Macdonald used language of the same character, reported on the same page:

He was glad that the hon. member did not propose to ask the House to consider the point raised in the petition: that the election case was before another tribunal. At the same time, it was not to be supposed that the House had abandoned its right to control, censure and, if need be, punish returning and deputy returning officers.

In 1887 a similar question came before this House in connection with the Queen's County, N.B., election, and matters connected with the practice and procedure of the House in such cases were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and a number of legal gentlemen of very high standing on that committee whose opinions were entitled to very great authority, made a report. After that report had been received, Mr. Dunn, the returning officer, was called before the Bar of the House, and counsel appearing on his behalf raised distinctly and explicitly the question of the jurisdiction of the House. Sir John Thompson, then Mr. Thompson, Mr. Weldon, and Sir Louis Davies all gave expressions of opinion on the subject. Sir John Thompson, in answer to the argument which had been addressed to the House by counsel, said:

Notwithstanding the general operation of the principle that a man ought not to be punished twice for the same offence, it is a well-recognized principle that the enactment of various penalties sometimes has merely the effect of establishing cumulative penalties against the offender, and not substitutive penalties. The effect of that would be, in this instance, that a returning officer who offended against a provision of the Elections Act, would be, in the first instance, liable to the public for the wrong done to the public by indictment, or by any other suitable procedure, for an offence against the Elections Act, and he would, in addition to that, be liable for the pecuniary penalties which the Act declares may be recovered by any individual aggrieved, and notwithstanding the establishment of those penalties he might still be liable at the hands of Parliament for contempt committed against its privileges. I might illustrate my view of this question by changing for a moment the offence for which the person at the Bar is charged, by supposing it was a case of libel, in order to give an illustration more familiar to the House. Assuming that you, Mr. Speaker, or any individual member of this House acting as such, had been libelled, it would be quite clear that the offender would be liable, first, to criminal prosecution for libel; second, to a civil suit, at the instance of the person aggrieved; and, third, the offender could be summoned for contempt against the privileges of this House. Under these circumstances, I, as one member of this House, entertain this view: that this House should persevere in the question proposed; and I only presume to express these opinions now because it may be convenient on both sides of the House, according as questions of law arise, that those conversant with such questions should express their opinions, and, consequently, lead the House more clearly to a decision.

The very case suggested by Sir John Thompson on that occasion did afterwards arise in connection with the provincial legislature of Nova Scotia—a case in which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had the good fortune or the ill-fortune to be a defendant. That was the case known in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia as Thomas vs. Halliburton, and in the Privy Council as Fielding vs. Thomas. In that case a person outside of the House circulated an alleged libel against the present Speaker of the House, the Hon. F. A. Lawrence. He was summoned before the Bar of the House, and was reprimanded. He failed to obey an order of the House and was arrested under the Speaker's warrant issued upon a resolution of the House. He was discharged from custody under a habeas corpus, and then brought an action against all the members of the legislature who had voted for the resolution. After a full discussion, the majority of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia gave judgment in his favour, which was reversed by the Privy Council. That was the very case suggested by Sir John Thompson. Here was a man who had committed an offence for which he probably could have been indicted under the criminal law of Canada. It was suggested that the provincial legislature could not punish for this offence, which was a criminal offence; but the Privy Council held, as Sir John Thompson pointed out it would no doubt be held, that Parliament, in dealing with a matter of this kind, is not punishing a criminal offence, but a breach of its own privileges, or a contempt against itself. To illustrate that in another way, a court has power to punish for contempt of court even though the act of contempt would amount to a criminal offence. In such case the court might or might not see fit to pursue the remedy for contempt and punish in that way.

Then, Mr. Weldon of St. John, whose memory we all very much respect, and who was a very eminent constitutional lawyer, presented the same view. He said:

We are not trying Mr. Dunn at the Bar for penalties, but he is here simply for the purpose of interrogating him with respect to matters connected with the privileges of this House, and I fail to see that by the statute respecting election trials this House has divested itself of its ancient rights and privileges in that respect. While the judges are entrusted with the power of trying election petitions, a power conferred on them by Parliament, Parliament has not divested itself of the right to investigate into any subject. We find, not only by the cases referred to before the Committee on Elections, which are on the Journals of the House, but we are also aware that in many cases to which the learned counsel has alluded, the House of Commons of England has investigated election matters ever since the Election Act came into force. The person at the Bar is not being cited on any criminal charge. That is a fallacy on the part of the counsel.

Then a little further on the hon. gentleman continued with these very significant words:

In this case Mr. Dunn stands here as a witness, as a servant and officer of this House, for the purpose of offering explanations to this House for its information with respect, not merely to what took place in that particular election, but with regard to the public policy of retaining and maintaining in its efficiency, and in purity, honesty and uprightness, the election law of the land. It is not, therefore, a matter of this particular election, simply, but it is a matter affecting the public at large and the rights of the people, and, therefore, it seems to me that when it is put forth that this person is standing here subject to penalties, or that there is a second charge for a particular offence, I maintain that he does not stand charged with any offence, but that under the direction of the House he is brought to its Bar to give explanations as to his conduct.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) took the same ground on that occasion. He said:

The other point the learned counsel suggested was, that because certain penalties attached to an act of malfeasance on the part of a returning officer he may be punished for that act in the courts of the land, and that, therefore, Parliament should not try his action at all here, is an argument which I think is unfounded, and for this reason: The penalties which the law prescribes for any act of misfeasance on the part of its officers, are penalties which are payable to any person who is individually damaged, and they can only be recovered by the person who alleged that he suffers that damage. If the gentleman who, we think, ought to have been returned in place of Mr. Baird, brought an action, it would be necessary for him first to institute a suit before the judges of the court, and only after we have a declaration by that court of his right to be returned could he maintain an action for damages. That action is one personal and peculiar to himself; it does not affect the rights of the people, and it does not in any sense affect the privileges of the House, and, therefore, so far as Mr. Dunn is concerned, if Mr. Dunn was liable to damages at all, at any time, those damages cannot be recovered against him now, because the time for filing a petition has expired. I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind as to the jurisdiction of the House.

Though the hon. gentleman did not, like Sir John Thompson and Mr. Weldon, deal with the effect of the creation of the supposed offence into a criminal offence, nevertheless the line of argument he adopted, and rightly adopted on that occasion, leads exactly to the same conclusion. I deduce, therefore, from these authorities this proposition, that it is perfectly competent to this House to refer to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for inquiry and investigation the conduct of its officers, both deputy returning officers and returning officers. Not only is it the right of the House to do that, but inasmuch as the purity of elections is a matter in which this House is particularly interested, inasmuch as it is one of the privileges of this House that its officers should conduct elections in accordance with the law and should not be guilty of any fraudulent conduct or corruption, it is not only the right of the House but its duty, when a prima facie case is made out for investigation, to at once pass the resolution referring the matter to the select standing committee appointed for the purpose of investigation and inquiry in such cases. And I venture to say that in this case I can bring to the attention of the House some facts which would indicate that it is the duty, as well as the right, of the House to make such an investigation.

In the first place, with regard to the election for the west riding of the county of Huron, in that case the election was held, if I remember correctly, on the 21st February, 1899, and the result was that Mr. Robert McLean, Conservative, and Mr. Robert Holmes, Liberal, having been nominated as candidates, Mr. Holmes was declared elected by a majority of 140. In the electoral district of West Huron, in the town of Goderich, poll No. 3, the ballots were counted at the close of the polls, and it was found that the number cast for Robert McLean was forty, and for the sitting member seventy-two. Declarations under the Evidence Act have been made with respect to that polling district, which I have not here in my possession, but which can be produced, as I am instructed, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and which have all the force and solemnity of an oath, and which, if they are untrue, would render those making them liable to the same penalty as if they had committed perjury. Electors have made declaration to the number of between fifty and sixty, that they deposited their ballots for Mr. Robert McLean, and of these ballots, numbering fifty to sixty, only forty were found in the polling-box at the close of the poll. It may be possible, of course, that the deputy returning officer can show that that occurred through no fault of his, but when we find that between fifty and sixty ballots were cast for a particular candidate at that poll, and that only forty of those appeared at the close of the polls, it certainly is a case which calls for some inquiry or investigation at the hands of this House, to ascertain what became of the ten or fifteen ballots which were, or should have been, deposited by the returning officer in the ballot-box, and were not found in that box at the close of the polls. Another curious circumstance in connection with that particular polling subdivision is one as to which I have a declaration under the Evidence Act. It is this:

Dominion of Canada,
North-west Territories.

In the matter of the election of a Member for the West Riding of the County of Huron to serve in the House of Commons.

I, Robert W. Clark, formerly of the town of Goderich, in the county of Huron, but now of the town of Calgary, in the province of Alberta, engineer, do solemnly declare that I acted as one of the agents at polling subdivision No. 3, at the said town of Goderich, for Robert McLean, a candidate at the election held for the west riding of the county of Huron on the 21st day of February last. That James Farr, of the said town of Goderich, was the deputy returning officer at the said election at the said polling subdivision. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the said 21st day of February, while standing near the door leading to the polling booth in the town hall, I noticed a ballot with the counterfoil detached on the floor. I picked it up and saw that it was properly marked for the said Robert McLean.

Up to this, probably the statement of Mr. Clark is perfectly neutral, but what follows is a significant thing and a thing which gives colour to the suspicion that these ten or fifteen ballots which were missing out of that office, were missing with the collusion of that returning officer, because what do we find he did:

I held it out in my hand and asked the said James Farr what that meant; he quickly took it out of my hand, tore it into pieces and threw them on the floor.

And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath, and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

ROBERT W. CLARK.

Declared before me at the city of Calgary, in the district of Alberta, this third day of May, A.D. 1899.

JAMES A. LOUGHEED,
A Notary Public for the N.W.T.

The pieces of this ballot, which were torn up by the deputy returning officer for some reason he did not see fit to explain, and which, it seems to me, can only have one meaning, were picked up and have been preserved, and are now in the possession of a member of this House, who will speak later on this question if necessary.

As regards another polling division, polling subdivision No. 4, in the township of Colborne, Mr. Donald Cummings was the deputy returning officer. I do not know, although at one time I did make some inquiry, whether he resides in that constituency or was brought in from outside. At all events, at the close of that poll, it was found that thirty ballots were marked for Mr. Robert McLean, the Conservative candidate, and that is the number which was returned by this deputy returning officer to the returning officer, as the number deposited. I have now in my hand the solemn declaration made under the Canada Evidence Act of 1843, of forty-three men, who swear that at that election they were electors, and deposited, each of them, a ballot in favour of Mr. Robert McLean, the Conservative candidate. Forty-three men say that they handed in forty-three ballots to the deputy returning officer at that polling subdivision, for the purpose of being deposited in the polling-box, yet when the polling-box was opened at the close of the polls, only thirty of those ballots, so marked, were found. Is it possible to say that this could have occurred without the direct intervention of the deputy returning officer? Is it proper that this House should allow itself to be placed at defiance by a deputy returning officer in this way? Is it right that this House shall, under circumstances of that kind, hold its hand and decide that this matter shall not be subjected to the very fullest investigation? It is absolutely necessary, in the interests of this House, in the interests of the good name of Parliament, in the interests of public credit and the good name of Canada, that a circumstance such as this should be investigated to the very end, and I think the proper course to be taken is to refer it to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that this is a matter which should be dealt with by election petition. But suppose it is not, by some arrangement made between the two candidates or the two political parties, is that any reason why this Parliament, having these disgraceful facts brought to its attention, should fail to take the very last step in its power of investigating the conduct of the man who had forty-three ballots placed in his hand, and who, at the close of the polls, opens the box which presumably was in his possession, and under his control in the intervening time, and only produces thirty ballots? What became of the forty-three ballots? Is that not a proper question for this House, through the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to put to that man and demand from him an explanation that will be satisfactory, not only to this House, not only to gentlemen on the other side, and to gentlemen on this side, but to the country itself? This is a matter on which there should be no politics; it is a question of the dignity of the House, of the privileges of the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite are strong enough in this House to deal with a matter of this kind from the standpoint of the dignity and privileges of Parliament. Surely they do not want it to be heralded from one end of the country to the other that deputy returning officers who, to all intents and purposes, are officers of this House, may be guilty of conduct of that kind. I will read one of these declarations—they are all couched in the same form—that hon. gentlemen may see what these men have declared:

Dominion of Canada,
Province of Ontario,
County of Huron.

To wit:

In the matter of the election of a Member for the West Riding of the County of Huron to serve in the House of Commons.

I, James McWhinney, of the township of Colborne, in the county of Huron, yeoman, do solemnly declare that I was on the 21st day of February, 1899, a duly qualified elector, and voted on that day at polling subdivision No. 4, township of Colborne, for Robert McLean, one of the candidates at the said election.

That I properly marked a ballot on the white circular space opposite to the name of the said Robert McLean, and before leaving the said polling place handed the same so marked to Donald Cummings, the deputy returning officer.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath, and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

(Sigd.) JAMES McWHINNEY.

Declared before me, at the township of Colborne, in the county of Huron, this 30th day of March, A.D., 1899.

(Sigd.) M. O. JOHNSON,
A Commissioner, &c.

There are forty-two other declarations in precisely the same terms. And these ballots so handed to the deputy returning officer for the purpose of being deposited in the box failed to materialize to the extent of thirteen when the box was opened at night. I observe a smile passing over the countenance of the right hon. gentleman and those of some of the hon. gentlemen on the other side. I suppose that smile is due to the fact that they are pleased with the effective working of the machine.

Now, in the case of Brockville, I have in my possession a report of an investigation made in regard to certain matters concerning the deputy returning officer of that election. I state that it can be established, as I believe, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that ballots of exactly the same character in every respect as the official ballots—in fact official ballots—were in pleantiful use in the hands of the workers for the Liberal party in that constituency. I have now in my possession a ballot which was picked up in the street. It was found by a boy who saw a man throw it away. It was picked up and brought to two gentlemen, who placed their initials upon it. It has been compared with the official ballots which were used and found to have the same marking upon it, the same little defects, the same little irregularities as the official ballots. We also find on this ballot a cross neatly marked opposite the name of Mr. Comstock. It is supposed that, for some reason or other, it had been secured but was not used; some other ballot was used in its place, or the person for whom it was designed did not see fit to use it. We also find that another ballot, duly marked, was presented by a Liberal worker to a voter in the constituency, who was asked to vote by depositing that ballot, and who did not see fit to do so, but placed the ballot in the hands of gentlemen who are prepared to produce it before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Perhaps I had better make my statement on that point a little more explicit and give the circumstances a little more in detail. I forgot to say that certain gentlemen in that constituency came to this voter after the ballot had been handed to him and desired very much to get it back, and, as I understand, offered a very considerable sum of money to get it back; but the voter did not see fit to give it back, but retained it and placed it in the hands of the gentlemen to whom I have first referred. I say, Sir, it can also be established, as I believe from the report of the investigation which has been made, and which I hold in my hand, that official ballots were in the hands of the Liberal workers in about every polling division in that constituency, and were used. And I say further that in polling district No. 4, Elizabethtown, a large number of ballots marked for Comstock in identically the same way and so folded that the upper part of the cross would be visible to the deputy returning officer, were found in the ballot box at the close of the day. Now, it is a somewhat suspicious circumstance, to say the least of it, that you find a large number of ballots folded and marked exactly the same way, and so folded and marked that it was easy for the deputy returning officer to ascertain exactly for whom the voter voted. I say that points to collusion between the deputy returning officer and those who are working for the Liberal candidate. It can be shown, as I believe, that the deputy returning officer of No. 1, east ward, Brockville, refused to destroy the counterfoils of the ballots and insisted on keeping them in his pocket. He also kept putting his hands in his pocket when parties went into the compartment to vote. He was asked by the scrutineer, Mr. W. W. Richardson, to destroy the counterfoils as directed by the Act. This he refused to do. Mr. Richardson says that he is satisfied that the deputy returning officer substituted a ballot for one given by a Conservative voter. When the ballots were counted at the recount, two that were marked for Mr. Comstock were rejected by the judge, owing to the fact that there were some distinguishing marks on the backs of them made by the deputy returning officer. It appears from the report of this investigation that the deputy returning officer at No. 3, Kitley, Mr. W. D. Livingston, was seen conferring with a Liberal worker with a ballot in his possession; and that is a circumstance that requires some explanation.

I say, further, that another deputy returning officer, the one for No. 2, Elizabethtown, also was guilty of a very grave irregularity in connection with this election. He was Mr. J. B. Truesdel. This man refused to seal the ballot-box, and has since said that he would be damned if he would give them satisfaction for doing so. He was asked by Mr. Foster to seal the ballot-box, in accordance with the provisions of the law, and he distinctly refused to do so. Now, there was either a motive or there was not a motive on that occasion. Judging this circumstance and the other circumstances I have mentioned in the light of a certain document which I propose to read, hon. gentlemen will see the significance of some of these things. I also understand—I do not see the statement before me at this moment—that one of the deputy returning officers at Brockville—I desire to be corrected, if I am wrong—was an accountant in the employ of Mr. Comstock, the sitting member, who was a candidate at that election. If this was so, it is a circumstance which does not reflect credit on the returning officer who appointed him. Now, what do all these things mean? I propose to read a document to this House which I think will throw a little light upon the meaning of some of these facts and circumstances which I have brought to the attention of the House. It has been stated that there is an organization in the province of Ontario, known popularly as the "machine." It is said to be the joint property of the Liberal party, working in Dominion elections, and the Liberal party working in local elections. Its true inwardness, I believe, has never been brought to the full light of day, so far as Dominion elections are concerned. But in a recent election proceeding relating to a local election in the province of Ontario, there has been a confession made, a very frank, but perhaps not a very full, confession, which throws a remarkable light upon the circumstances which I have brought to the attention of the House. Now, this confession, or document, to which I refer is signed by Mr. D. McNish, who was the successful Liberal candidate at the by-election in West Elgin for the local legislature of Ontario, and I will read it:

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

St. Thomas, June 26th, 1899.

Messrs. Crothers & Price, Barristers, &c., St. Thomas.

Dear Sirs,—We beg to advise you that Mr. McNish has discussed at length with his solicitors the charges contained in the petition which has been filed against his return as member of the legislative assembly of Ontario for West Elgin, and that they have to a considerable extent investigated the charges contained therein and other matters which have come to their knowledge in connection with the election. And the subscribers hereto make the following statements and admissions respecting the same:—

1. That a large number of persons were specially sent into the constituency by men working on behalf of the Liberal party for the express purpose of taking part on Mr. McNish's behalf in the election held January 12th, 1899, and we believe that fraudulent and corrupt means were used by some of such persons to secure his election.

Well, does not this shed some light on the possible means which may have been taken to cause the disappearance of 13 ballots in the one case and 10 to 15 ballots in the other case, in the west riding of Huron?

2. That several of the said persons illegally and without authority acted as deputy returning officers at the said election, and in at least three cases so acted in the names of reputable local men, having, under assumed names, been introduced to the returning officer by local agents of Mr. McNish.

Now, it is proper that the House should investigate this matter, for the reason that it may turn out that the gentlemen whom I have named, and who purported to be deputy returning officers in West Huron and in Brockville, may not have been deputy returning officers at all, and that these gentlemen, when they come before the House, will say: I was not deputy returning officer at that election; I was a hundred miles away. My name was used, it is true, but one of those gentlemen sent into this constituency by persons working on behalf of the Liberal party, was really the person who acted as deputy returning officer in my name at this election. So, it is right and proper, in the interests not only of the House, but of these deputy returning officers themselves, that some such inquiry should be made.

3. That in many of the polling subdivisions of the riding there were grave irregularities connected with the return of the ballot-boxes and their contents, the voting, and the counting of the ballots thereat.

Precisely similar circumstances to those I have referred to, showing that there was grave irregularity or something worse, where 13 ballots in one case, and 10 to 15 in the other, marked properly for the Conservative candidate, disappeared altogether between the time they were handed to the deputy returning officer and the time the ballots were counted.

4. That there were large numbers of persons brought into the riding for the express purpose of personating legitimate voters, and assisted by some of Mr. McNish's local supporters such persons did personate qualified voters in voting for Mr. McNish.

5. That the declared number of votes for Mr. McNish largely exceeded the number of bona fide votes cast for him.

Precisely the same state of affairs as here, where ballots disappeared and others are substituted for them, bringing this case exactly in the category of the confession of Mr. McNish, for the declared number of votes for Mr. Holmes at that election largely exceeded, must have largely exceeded—because we are probably only on the fringe of this thing—the number of bona fide votes cast for him.

6. That a large number of ballots cast for Mr. MacDiarmid were in some nefarious and corrupt manner manipulated, whereby the result of the election was rendered doubtful, and that in this connection the voting at Shedden and Middlemarch, and in the several divisions in St. Thomas where said strangers so acted as deputy returning officers, merits special mention.

So here a number of ballots, cast for Mr. Holmes or Mr. McLean on that occasion, were in some nefarious and corrupt manner manipulated, whereby the result of the election was rendered doubtful; that is to say, the number of votes for Mr. McLean in one polling district was reduced by 13 ballots, and in another subdivision by 10 to 15; and can we doubt that it was done in the same nefarious and corrupt manner which is referred to in this confession of Mr. McNish? If there is any other explanation, I would like hon. gentlemen on the other side to suggest what it can be. There can be no other explanation. Forty-three ballots are given to the deputy returning officer, and only 30 are found at the close of the poll. I say we have a right to believe, no reasonable person can avoid believing, that exactly the same statement may be made of this as was made there, that these returns were manipulated in a nefarious and corrupt manner, and that, as a result, the Conservative candidate was deprived of the votes to which he was legitimately entitled.

7. That there are good reasons to believe that there are many specific and well-authenticated cases where agents of Mr. McNish concealed at their homes some of those strangers, who there paid large sums of money to electors to induce them to vote for him.

8. That Mr. McNish will forthwith deliver to the Speaker of the legislative assembly his resignation as a member thereof for the said electoral district.

That confession was read in court, and evidence was given substantiating the facts therein referred to, so far as they were necessary to void the election, and the election was voided. And I suppose that, if similar facts were brought out before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the two Liberal gentlemen who represent these constituencies, would, no doubt, see fit to take the course which Mr. McNish saw fit to adopt, and send in their resignations to Mr. Speaker, so that proper elections might be held in these two constituencies.

Mr. BERGERON. They will not do that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am only suggesting that that would be a proper course to adopt. Now, I think, I have made out a fair case to go before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have made good my proposition, in the first place, that this is a matter which affects the honour and the dignity of the House, that it is a matter in respect to which the House has not been deprived of its jurisdiction by any legislation; that it is the right and duty of the House to inquire into the conduct of its officers or its deputy returning officers wherever facts and circumstances of this kind are brought to the attention of the House. In the next place, I think, I have set out and substantiated by evidence, in the presence of the hon. members of this House, facts and circumstances which indicate that the same persons must have been at work in the constituencies of West Huron and Brockville as were admittedly at work in the constituency of West Elgin. Can any person, who weighs the circumstances and the facts that I have brought to the attention of the House, and who reads that confession, doubt that the work, in one case, was done by exactly the same persons, and in exactly the same manner as in the other? After what was done I venture to think that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will find this a hard case to justify through the country if they see fit to vote down a proper inquiry into the conduct of the officers of this House who acted in connection with these two elections. In addition to all the facts and circumstances mentioned in this House, the last straw of all was the telegram which was produced in evidence at the trial of the case from a gentleman who has been by turns the candidate of the Liberal party in Ontario, and by turns an officer of that party in Ontario, and who is now an officeholder of this Government. I know men in my own constituency who were dismissed from office without the opportunity of an investigation at all simply because they asked a civil question of the Liberal candidate during the election campaign in which I had the honour to be a candidate. Without any opportunity given of showing that they were not offensive partisans, but simply because of the fact that the only part they took in the election at all was attending a political meeting and asking a question, they were dismissed without a single opportunity being given to them to say a word in their own defence and they even had to come here and beg for the refund of the money that they had paid to the superannuation fund. Here is a gentleman who has been, by turns, a candidate and an officeholder and who is now an officeholder, who sends to the successful candidate at this election a telegram:

Please hug the machine for me.

On the day on which he hears of the result.

Mr. SPROULE. What is his name?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The gentleman's name, I believe, is Mr. W. T. R. Preston.

Mr. BERGERON. And he gets a salary of $4,000 a year.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). He sent this telegram, which Mr. McNish stated he did not know the meaning of. We are bound to accept Mr. McNish's statement that he did not know the meaning of it, but I venture to say that no hon. gentleman will get up in this House and say that he does not know the meaning of such a telegram as that. If he does he will be about the only person in Canada who does not know the meaning of it. What does Mr. Preston mean by that telegram? He means that this machine had accomplished the dirty work; he means that the election had been won by means of these devices; I, an officer of the Government, but not an offensive partisan, drawing a large salary deem it my right and my duty to send to you a telegram congratulating you on the successful issue of the campaign of corruption. This is the gentleman who retains the confidence of this Government, the gentleman who has been by turns the party organizer and an officeholder of the Liberal Government in Ontario and who is now an officeholder of this Government. In view of all the authorities I have quoted, in view of the facts which I have brought to the attention of the House, I desire, and I do so with a great deal of confidence, that the motion will not be opposed, to move:

That the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery do attend at the opening of the House, to-morrow, with all the poll-books, voters' lists, and all other letters, documents and memoranda which have been transmitted to him by the respective returning officers, or which may otherwise be in his possession relating to the last election for the electoral district of Brockville, and to the last election for the electoral district of the west riding of the county of Huron, respectively.

If the motion passes I desire to follow it up with a further motion to which I referred yesterday.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) has brought to the attention of the House one of the most important questions which can engage its attention. We have always held, in years past, and we are prepared to hold now, of course, that the purity of elections must be guarded at all costs and all hazards. It was our duty while we were sitting on the other side of the House, on more than one occasion, to bring delinquencies which had taken place in elections to the attention of the House, as to which, we thought, that the House, possibly in its action, did not always do itself the justice which it should have done. The question which has been brought up by the hon. gentleman involves one of facts. It refers to two elections, the Brockville election and the West Huron election. With regard to the West Huron election I am free to say, at once, that having heard the statement that the hon. gentleman has made, and which I understand he is prepared to substantiate upon his standing as a member of this House, he has made a prima facie case which, I say, without any hesitation, must go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. With regard to the Brockville election I must say that, in my estimation, the case which he has made out is very, very weak, if indeed he has made a case at all. But such is the sanctity of the ballot, such is the sanctity of the rights of the people which they must exercise, whenever they are called upon at the polls, that though, in my opinion, speaking here in behalf of the Government, the case made out in regard to Brockville is more than weak, still the Government will not offer any objection to the case also being referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I do not believe that I should say one single word more. I have accomplished all that is required from the Government on this occasion. Let me, however, make one remark. The hon. gentleman is a leading counsel; he has gained in this House a position which does him credit and honour. He concluded his speech by expressing the hope and the strong confidence that his motion would not be opposed. He was right in that assumption. But if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) harboured no doubt in his mind, might I ask him why he spoke at length and with such heat, and why he went on the assumption that this motion would be denied by this side of the House. Why did he assume, because we happened to smile—it was a small matter to refer to—that we were smiling at what he said, or at the position he took. Sir, it may be that in the Brockville and Huron elections there were officers who were overzealous as partisans, and I take it that a prima facie case has been made there, but the matter will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I leave it to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) to determine if partisanship will not be found also amongst the members of the committee from that side of the House. I leave him to decide whether the tone he has adopted was the judicial tone he should have adopted in a matter of this kind. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that there is no question which can to better advantage occupy the time of this House, than that we should guard and watch carefully over the rights of the people at the polls.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. If wrong has been done in these elections nobody ought to be shielded. If any one has contravened the law, it is fair and right that this should be investigated, and that we should know now henceforth and for ever, that the will of the people must be expressed as the people wish to express it, however severe the consequences may be on one side or the other.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I congratulate the Prime Minister upon the decision at which he has arrived, and, indeed, I feel that no other course was open to him. I must say that I listened attentively to the statement made by the hon. the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), and I failed to discover in it any of that heat or partisanship which the Prime Minister has spoken of. The right hon. gentleman is anxious to know why the mover of this motion should have fortified his demand for a reference of this case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, by quoting so many authorities. The right hon. gentleman's memory is very short if he is at a loss to know why any Conservative member, bringing forward a question which attacks the position of any person connected with the other side of the House, does not feel that the time has come when he must fortify his motion with all the authorities it is possible to quote. My right hon. friend knows perfectly well that a motion very recently made in the most formal and solemn manner from this side of the House—touching on very much the same character of question, the question of corruption—was rejected by gentlemen opposite. I am glad that the right hon. gentleman appears to realize his position, in the light of events that are transpiring, in the light of the circumstances attending the West Elgin election, where have been brought to light these frightful election frauds that have been the staple commodity of gentlemen opposite for years in carrying elections, these indecent attempts, almost open and undisguised, at corrupting the electors of this country, of carrying elections by gigantic bribery, both public and private. I say, I am glad the right hon. gentleman feels that the time has come when it would be more than hardihood on the part of him and his friends to refuse to investigate such a case as has been put thus succinctly before the House. The time has arrived in the history of Canada when every man, be he Liberal or Conservative, who has regard for the purity of elections, who has regard for obtaining the independent judgment of the electorate, should find it necessary to put down this gigantic corruption that has for years been stalking and rioting throughout this land.

and has finally culminated in one of the most frightful exposures of electoral fraud and rascality that has ever been witnessed, and which has been carried on under the auspices of hon. gentlemen opposite for a long period. They boast of carrying by-elections, and how did they carry them? Did they carry them by honourable and just means? No. They carried them by the influence of the operations of this same machine invented and manipulated by W. T. R. Preston, an officer of this Government, an officer on the other side of the Atlantic, drawing a high salary from this Government, for the reason that I believe they felt it necessary to get him out of the country when these electoral frauds were being exposed. I ask the right hon. gentleman if this W. T. R. Preston is not to be recalled? I ask him if this man is still to be retained as a representative in Great Britain of the Government of Canada, in face of the evidence concerning him given by a man of high standing in the Liberal party, a candidate that by fraudulent means was elected, as he himself admitted, as a Liberal representative. I ask has a cable been sent telling Mr. Preston that he is a disgraced man, that his appointment is cancelled, and that he shall not draw another dollar of public money out of the treasury of Canada? If the right hon. gentleman has not done that he has failed in his duty. Mr. McNish has published a telegram sent to him from Mr. Preston, "Hug the machine for me." The machine! That odious and gigantic instrument of corruption organized by the Liberal party in this country, which has given the election after election in the province of Ontario, and other sections of Canada. I tell the right hon. the Prime Minister that from the hour Mr. Preston openly avowed the paternity of the "machine," every subsequent hour he remains an officer of the Government, is an hour which fixes indelible disgrace upon the Government of this country. My right hon. friend will find that the time has come when this matter has assumed a character that no Government dare, without forfeiting the respect of the public, resist the efforts that must be vigorously made to uproot this avowed and hideous evil, which destroys everything like free and independent government in this country. I see before me the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), whose prophetic eye saw all this years ago. Let me read what he said on the floor of this House, and let me point to the fact that his prophecy has now been realized by the party of which he is a component member. In 1882, that hon. gentleman, on the floor of this House, said:

I am sorry to have to say so, but every honest member here, if he would speak the truth as he knows the facts to exist, must admit that I am stating a most lamentable but at the same time a most certain truth when I say that as regards the 215 constituencies of this Dominion, with the exception of a very small percentage, the balance of power under our system is practically placed in the hands of the most corrupt section of the community.

What more did he say? Why, Sir, he pointed out what a Government in power could do; but it remained for hon. gentlemen opposite to come into power to be able to illustrate and give the evidence of the prophetic wisdom of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said:

I make this statement advisedly, as I make it with very great regret; but it is so, that to all the intents and purposes the only practical difficulty which stands in the way of a party possessing the reins of power, and having at their disposal sufficient sums of money, is simply the difficulty of bringing these corrupt means into direct and actual contact with the great masses of the electors. Were that mechanical difficulty, as I might almost call it, overcome.—

And Preston has overcome it. He has made a machine to bring these corrupt influences into actual contact, as the hon. gentleman stated, with the corrupt masses, who hold the balance of power in this country, in such a way as to enable any Government, with the public patronage and with millions of public money at their disposal, to fortify themselves in the way that has been attempted again and again; and hon. gentlemen opposite have the means of commanding, indirectly, through these same corrupt influences, gigantic contributions of money for those corrupt purposes. Well, the hon. gentleman says:

Were that mechanical difficulty, as I might almost call it, overcome, then I have no doubt whatever that the Opposition in this country would be practically exterminated at any general election that might take place.

What did the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) say? He boasted on the platform in Ontario that by the operation of these influences, which they were able to bring to bear in a general election tomorrow, the Opposition could not return five members in Quebec; and he went on to state that by a Redistribution Bill that the Government of which he was a member were going to bring in, they would wipe out the Conservative party in the province of Ontario. And I draw the attention of my prophetic friend, who after this will be recognized as a man possessing the most profound prophetic attainments, to the fact that he was able to forecast, not what existed then, but what would exist when a Liberal Government reached the Treasury benches. He said:

It is a danger which we know is continually increasing. It has increased, it is increasing, and most assuredly it should be diminished; and it is the necessity of obtaining the requisite funds to carry out that process of corruption that has been at the basis of all these infamous rascalities, which were in part revealed by the investigations of last session, and which have brought into existence the reptile fund, the details of which are being daily and hourly displayed to the people of Canada.

The hon. gentleman had only to look ahead for a short period when, as he declared, all he required was to be on the Treasury benches, with the machinery which Mr. Preston, the officer of this Government, has invented and has carried out in the most effective manner, and which has been used all through the province of Ontario. These hon. gentlemen boast of having carried by-elections. I say it is to their utter discredit that they have ventured to use the corrupt influences which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said that any Government once in power could invent the mechanical means of using—the machinery, as Preston has invented it, by which they could perpetrate a gerrymander on the constituencies, and completely wipe out and destroy any Opposition in this country. That attempt has been made, but fortunately has not succeeded; for the future has hope for every man who values electoral purity and wishes to see a fair and intelligent judgment given by the electorate of Canada. These parties, possessing this reptile fund, which they have been enabled to obtain in an indirect manner out of the treasury of Canada, have had the daring to go on, encouraged step by step by the results of their efforts, until they have reached a pitch of such open and shameless profligacy and prostitution of everything like honest electoral proceeding, as to awaken and touch the conscience of every man in this country who is not associated with those corrupt influences. That is the position, and it is fortunate that the hour has come when Mr. Hardy's Government is tottering on the brink of its fall. It cannot stand; it is impossible. Awakened as the public conscience of the great province of Ontario is to-day, it is impossible not to expect the downfall of a government that has been living and fattening upon these corrupt influences. That government is, in the first place, based upon an infamous Redistribution Act passed by Sir Oliver Mowat—a gerrymander so disgraceful that even the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) repudiated it. He said that two blacks did not make a white; and he admitted that Mowat's Redistribution Bill was as black as a negro.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. member to confine himself in some reasonable degree to the motion before the House, because I am perfectly clear that gerrymanders or redistribution Bills are not within the purview of this motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If you rule, Mr. Speaker, that I am not to give evidence in support of a motion of this kind—evidences of open, palpable corruption, with which this country is ringing from end to end—I submit to your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish my ruling to be misinterpreted by anybody. This motion relates to bringing the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery before this House tomorrow, to produce the papers connected with the Brockville and the West Huron elections, and there must certainly be some limit to a debate on that particular motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask you if you ruled that my hon. friend behind me was out of order when he fortified his motion and showed its necessity by reading the confession of Mr. McNish in the West Elgin election case?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member wishes my view on that point. It struck me at the time that it was not very relevant to this motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that your mind is of that kind—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER—that you see no relevancy—

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish to get into an altercation with any hon. member, and I do not wish the ruling that I was asked to give just now by the hon. member controverted. My rulings may be right or they may be wrong, but they are the best I can give.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not controverting your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I am expressing my regret that the debate should be limited by a ruling of that character. If, on one of the most important occasions that this House has ever had to deal with—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) laughs. Nero laughed when Rome was burning, and I have no doubt it was the same idiotic laughter that presaged Nero's coming doom. This House stands face to face with one of the most important questions that ever any free Parliament in any free country has had to deal with, and that is the question how is the hydra-headed monster of corruption, by means of which hon. gentlemen opposite are able to carry elections, to be put down? The time has come when the public conscience is aroused, when the staunchest newspapers sustaining hon. gentlemen opposite are compelled to come to the front and declare that every honest man, Liberal or Conservative, must join hands in putting down this corruption that has obtained such powerful influence as to startle every intelligent and honest elector in this country.

People, without regard to party, must join hands and take the most effective means of wiping out this giant disgrace that threatens to enthrall our liberty, this octopus that threatens to paralyze with its tentacles the electorate of this country and destroy that wholesome honest public opinion upon which the existence and character of every free Parliament depends. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), with a wonderful prophetic power which I did not think he possessed, has shown what can be done by a Government provided they have the means of doing it. He has pointed out how and why it is that everything like free and independent action on the part of the Opposition can be completely paralyzed by a combination of the Government, with all the great resources in their hands, and the machinery necessary to bring the corrupter and corrupting influences in contact with those who are susceptible of corruption. If there ever was a time in the history of the country, it is now, when every man should be free to express his sentiments in the most unrestrained manner and endeavour to arouse public opinion to the absolute necessity that now presents itself of stamping out this system of organized corruption.

The Franchise Bill has been passed—I wonder may I be permitted to refer to that? And what is the result? It is that day after day we are having publicly disclosed the disgraceful efforts of the local authorities to prevent proper preparation of the lists. Hon. gentlemen opposite were not satisfied until they had handed over the elections of members of this Parliament to laws made and passed where we have no power, influence or control. They have handed over this control to the local legislatures which, being influenced by their friends and supporters, they find they can use to break down and prevent everything like a free and independent action of the electors, by means of the grossest frauds in the preparation of the lists—lists that to-day may be used for local elections but to-morrow may be used for the elections to members of this House. I do not intend to further take up time than to say I rejoice in the hon. gentleman's recognition of the fact that in the face of aroused public indignation with reference to these gigantic electoral frauds, it is not possible to resist such a motion, but that he must at once allow evidence to be produced to show that the elections, both in Brockville and West Huron, were stolen by the machine.

THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). This House, at various times, has beheld very curious spectacles, I myself, in my thirty-six years' experience in the Canadian Parliament, have seen a good many curious spectacles, but the spectacle of the senior member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) rising in his place to condemn and expose corruption is one of those which I did not hope to live to see. I forget exactly under what circumstances Carlyle made use of the phrase—and I am open to correction if I misquote it—but I think this is one of those spectacles which that sage of Scotland would, if he were here, have declared to be one to make the angels and the very jackasses weep. There is an old proverb, and a good one, that the greater the sinner the greater the saint. What a superlative degree of holiness may we then shortly expect from the leader of the Opposition if, indeed, his conversion and future repentance bear any proportion to the acts of which, in former days, he himself and his colleagues were in the habit of being guilty. The hon. gentleman attributes to me prophetic powers, but he misinterpreted my words. I was not speaking from prophetic power but from my own experience and knowledge of the doings of himself and his colleagues, beginning in 1873, or at least first publicly revealed to the people of Canada in 1873, under circumstances which are tolerably familiar to all students of Canadian history, and going on prospering, under the able guidance of the hon. gentleman until—was it in 1891 or 1892—this House, or a former House, was presented with the spectacle of detailed statements and detailed evidence, showing how about a quarter a million of money had been expended by a colleague of the hon. gentleman in debauching some fifteen or twenty constituencies in the province of Quebec. We had the dates and the whole amounts given. I think it is idle and foolish to go on with incrimination which might, if I were so pleased, last from now to to-morrow morning, as to the doings of these hon. gentlemen. I am perfectly content that our acts shall be compared with theirs, whenever and on any occasions they choose to challenge comparison. With respect to this motion, I beg to call attention to the fact that if the elections of West Huron and Brockville were obtained by improper means, it was in the power of hon. gentlemen opposite or their supporters to have contested those elections and impeached the proceedings in the courts. They did not choose to do it, for reasons best known to themselves. Peradventure because there are such things as cross-petitions, and it has been known before now that gentlemen who went for wool returned very much shorn from the election courts. In the present instance, what are the Liberal party doing? Are they attempting to shirk inquiry, to delay, to take any objection? I do not think the course pursued by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), was, in all respects, in consonance with the position he holds as one of the very judges in the Committee on Elections and Privileges to which this case has been referred. I think it would have become him far better had he made a simple statement of the case and on its merits asked what he would have unquestionably have obtained at once, a full and complete reference of this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I fully subscribe to the doctrine that, even if you do not choose to go to the courts, this House has not divested itself, and should not divest itself, of control over its own officers. Sir, the Government invite investigation. Let hon. gentlemen opposite, in the case of the Yukon or anything else, dare to make their charges, dare to come forward, with what they are willing to prove—not lurk behind miserable, anonymous accusations, behind letters, the names of whose writers they dare not give, not quibble and equivocate, not bring forward charges which they are not able to prove, which were exposed as falsehoods, if I read "Hansard" aright, on the floor of this House—let them make themselves responsible, as you did, Mr. Speaker, on one occasion, as my friend the present Judge Lister did on another occasion, and as many other hon. members supporting the present Government did, when they were on the other side of the House; let them make themselves responsible for the charges, let them state their evidence and what they can prove, and they shall have their committee, they shall have their inquiry, they shall have their investigation, with full powers to bring forward their witnesses and their evidence—and we shall see what they will make of it.

Mr. GEORGE E. CASEY (West Elgin). It would be unbecoming for me to follow the bad precedent set by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) and the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), by prejudging the Brockville or the West Huron case either one way or the other. Therefore, I shall not say, whether my opinion is, that there is guilt or innocence there. But I have a few remarks to offer on the course taken by the leader of the Opposition and a few others about the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and whose name has been brought into this discussion. I, like my hon. friend the veteran Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) had never expected to see what I have seen to-day. The leader of the Opposition talks about open, shameless profligacy and prostitution in political affairs stalking and rioting through the land. Well, Sir, we have seen these things stalking for many and many a year. If it shall appear, as the result of a judicial investigation or otherwise, that our party contained any of these stalkers, let us bear the blame; but certainly, it does not lie in the mouth of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) or his associates to blow froth and fury about in the manner he has done to-day. If there has been political prostitution, Mr. Speaker, let not the reformed prostitute talk about the virtue of others.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is no evidence that he has reformed.

Mr. CASEY. But there is a pretense of reform. The hon. leader of the Opposition was evidently loaded up the wrong way on this occasion. He expected that this motion would be refused, and he was loaded up with a red-hot denunciation of the Government for refusing an inquiry of this kind. And, when the whole thing fell flat, and he found the Government were not afraid to have these documents brought before us and to inquire into the case, what had he to fall back upon? As I say, he blew froth and fury throughout this Chamber in a manner which does infinite credit to his physical powers at his time of life—whether it does equal credit to the preservation of his mental faculties, I leave it to members of this House to judge. A more extraordinary or ridiculously injudicious speech than that of the hon. gentleman has never been made on the floor of this House or put on record in "Hansard." He wondered that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House laughed while he was speaking. He even went so far as to garble history—tells us that Nero laughed while Rome was burning. We always understood that Nero played the fiddle while that conflagration was in progress. But our laughter was not caused by this conflagration which is supposed to be raging in the constituency, but it was due to pure joyousness of heart, downright infantile amusement at the spectacle presented by the hon. gentleman who was then entertaining the House. It would be impossible for the most stony-hearted, the most stolid and stupid creature imaginable, not to be amused when such an exhibition was in progress.

I shall perhaps be wandering from the strict limits of the motion, but certainly not beyond the ground over which the discussion has ranged, if I say a few words in regard to the election in West Elgin. That has been the subject of a great many speeches, editorials, jokes, and what not. We have had our share of that sort of fun with our friends on the other side in old times, and we do not object to anything in the way of fair criticism or good-humoured talk on these subjects. But the people of West Elgin and the Reform party of Ontario generally are not going to lie under the imputation that they are corrupt or have been corrupted. What is the charge in this case—the confession, if you choose to put it so, made in this case? It is, that a certain gang of outside parties came into the riding of West Elgin at the last local election and conducted a side campaign of their own, apart altogether from the campaign conducted by the candidate and his local organization, and conducted this campaign in such a manner that the member for West

Elgin, when he discovered what had been done, nominally on his behalf, took the open and honest course—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CASEY—the open, honest, straightforward course of saying: As soon as my attention was called to the facts, I felt it my duty to disclaim all right to this seat and to facilitate as much as possible the voiding of the election, in order that we may have a new, and free, and true test of the people's feelings. I had the honour of supporting Mr. McNish in that election, and I wish to say that I shall feel it doubly an honour, on account of the manly course he has taken on this occasion, to support him in the next election. And I do not need a gift of prophecy to say that, on the purest election that can be held under any circumstances in any riding, Mr. McNish will reap the reward of his honesty, his undoubted, unchallenged honesty, in this matter, by coming back at the head of a very substantial majority. We do not need to defend Mr. McNish in this respect, because he was not attacked by the petition, except in regard to his supposed connection with the irregular appointment of returning officers. His explanation of the matter—which I need not go into—is admitted to be satisfactory by all parties, and he comes out clear and clean of any suspicion cast by his opponents in the riding, who were aware of the fact. As to the people of West Elgin, we are told two contradictory stories. The first is, that corruption stalked, unblushing, gigantic, and generally in a Tupperesque way, throughout the riding, and that everybody was debauched with public money, with the reptile fund which was created by gigantic contributions.

The hon. gentleman must have been thinking of the days of the Pacific scandal when he used that phrase, that the people were debauched with this money. That is one story, that the people were corrupt or corruptible. Then, the other story is—and it is the only story in support of which an iota of proof has been offered before the courts—the other story is that this outside gang, finding that the people of that county could not be corrupted, set to work to get in a number of experts to stuff the ballot-boxes. The two stories are inconsistent. If a few experts were smuggled in by a gang of irresponsible men, not known to the local organization, not authorized by the candidate, if these men stuffed ballot-boxes, let them be ferreted out and punished, whoever they may be, whether Preston, or further back, I do not care where it hits—the people of that county demand that whoever instigated these fraudulent acts should be punished. But to charge the electors of West Elgin with being corruptible or corrupt in this case, is to say what has no foundation in fact, no foundation in any of the charges made or established before the courts.

Mr. CASEY.

A great deal is made of the fact that Mr. Preston is now an officer of the Dominion Government in Europe. Well, Sir, I do not think it is any disgrace to a Federal Minister to whom a former active worker in local affairs was recommended as a fit person for a public office, that he should, without knowing all we know now about that man, put him in that office. I have no doubt that the Minister's course towards Mr. Preston in the future will depend upon his matured opinion as to how far he is or is not guilty of the charges now laid against him. I do not presume to charge Mr. Preston, or anybody else, ex-cathedra in this matter. All I have to say from my own experience of the riding of West Elgin at the local election, where I was present for a few weeks, is, that if Preston and the machine had not been there, Mr. McNish would have been equally elected, and probably by quite as good a majority; for the presence of an organization of that kind, suspected whether rightly or wrongly, of being corrupt, did more to injure than to benefit the candidate at that election. The leader of the Opposition makes a great outcry, uses very Tupperesque language, to put it briefly, about this machine.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CASEY. An hon. gentleman calls for order, but the phrase has been consecrated by long usage in this House. It has been admitted that the adjectives "Tupperism" and "Tupperesque," having been long used in this House, are in order in describing certain kinds of language and certain kinds of statements in this House. I say that the hon. gentleman used very Tupperesque language about this machine, as if it was an invention of the Liberal party, as if it was something contrived by them. If there is such a thing as a machine, if that machine means what gentlemen opposite say it means, a corrupt machine, where was the model of that machine patented? Whence came the experts who operated it in London, the experts who operated it in Manitoba, the experts who operated it in other places I could name, long before there was any talk of such a thing as a Grit machine existing? If there is any corrupt machine organized, any hurtful weapon of that sort in the possession of the Liberal party, where do they get it? I do not say that if our people copied Tory methods in this matter it is any excuse for them; I only say that the inventors, the patentees of this machine, have not the right to throw stones at us for using it. The most they could do would be to apply to the courts to decree that they should have a royalty upon the use of that machine. If the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, is inclined to take that ground, to go before the courts and claim a royalty, I do not think anybody would dispute his claim to be the original patentee.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I desire to congratulate the leader of the Government for his honesty, for his frankness, and for his patriotic conduct when he says that purity of elections must be guaranteed at all cost. It is one of the healthy signs of the time, that at last some person arises amongst the party who believes that in the interests of the country it is important that we should have purity at elections. I congratulate the hon. leader of the Government and his friends that they have awakened to the importance of accepting this resolution. But I was somewhat surprised at the right hon. gentleman complaining that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) should have assumed that this motion would be voted down. Why did he assume that it would be voted down? Because every motion which has been made in this House during the present session, and during other sessions, having for its aim to bring out information that we thought desirable to bring out in the interests of the country to secure a more honest administration of public affairs, has been voted down. Last night we heard an hon. member opposite say: With fifty-five majority at our back, we are prepared to carry through any motion that we desire to carry through this House, notwithstanding the Opposition. Therefore, I say we were justified in assuming that this motion would be voted down, especially in view of the fact that only a few days ago one of the strongest indictments I ever heard, one of the strongest impeachments I ever heard against a Minister of the Crown, was voted down in this House, although it was made by a gentleman of eminence and of long experience, a gentleman of sterling integrity, who was for a long time an honoured Minister of the Crown himself. When he made those direct charges, and when hon. members opposite voted them down, I say we were justified in assuming that this motion also would be voted down.

Now, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that the Government invited investigations. Why did they not do so in the case of the Yukon scandal? One day the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) invited an investigation, and when one was proposed he skulked behind his subservient majority and asked them to vote it down. They are bold when there is no danger in the air, but when danger looms up, then they fall back upon their majority, and prevent any inquiry which would bring out damaging facts. Then, the hon. member spoke of something in the past, insinuating corruption. The information given to the House by the leader of the Opposition with regard to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce had made a prediction. He foreshadowed what might be done by the party in power with all the means at their disposal, with a heavy expenditure of money, patronage to dispense, and a large majority of supporters behind them, and in a few years hence he, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, was in a position to carry out and accomplish what he had foreshadowed. He was able, with his friends, to accomplish it by the organization of that machine, which has been so effectually working in the interest of that party, and of which we have heard so much from various parts of the country. It seems to me most appropriate that the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) should come to the rescue of his friends on this occasion, because the very stamping-ground, where the machine was able to do its most effective work and where the representative of the party, who, I assume, to be a man of fair and honest convictions, was obliged to sign a paper acknowledging the disgrace of the party, was the county which that hon. gentleman represents. The hon. member for West Elgin says that he was in that constituency and took part in the campaign. I have no doubt about that whatever; I have no doubt that he was cheek by jowl with Sim. Hewitt, with D. F. Macdonald, of Parry Sound, who has been operating for the party for the past seventeen or eighteen years to my own personal knowledge, in by-elections in various parts of the country; with Capt. Sullivan, and others. Having taken part with these men in this election, and being the representative of that constituency in the Dominion, is it possible that the hon. gentleman did not know what was taking place in that constituency? It is utterly impossible to believe that, when he was there taking part in the election, he did not know that the same members of this machine, who had so effectually operated in the by-elections for a number of years past, in the interest of the Liberal party, were there doing their nefarious work, as they had done it in other places. At the head of the machine was Mr. W. T. R. Preston, who has been the successful organizer of the party for so many years past, and whom they found it convenient to send out of the country at the time his presence was most desired to bring out information which would not have been creditable to the Government, but which might have been valuable to the country and to the courts. All these men were to be found there. I saw Mungovan in Brockville a short time ago. We know that the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) the other evening, said that he did not know Sim Hewitt, of Brantford.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I did not.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it was Hewitt that was under consideration. I understood the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to say that the hon. Minister had said that he did not know a man brought up in his own city.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I just happened to catch that remark, but otherwise it might not have been answered. I did not say anything like that. Of course, I know Hewitt. I said I knew him, but I said that I had not seen him in Ottawa and did not know that he had been in Ottawa.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he did not know him, but if he admits that he does know him, and if he is acquainted with him, that makes it all the worse, because he comes from Brantford, where he was schooled at the feet of Gamaliel for so many years. He was in North Grey when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) was a candidate there, and when the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) was also there.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. And you were there, too.

Mr. SPROULE. Hewitt admits that he was there with these hon. gentlemen, and he boasted of the effective work that he had done for them. They were cognizant of his operations there and yet the hon. gentleman got up a short time ago and endeavoured to leave the impression in the House that he was not conversant with the campaign work that was carried on there. The hon. member for West Elgin says that the two stories were inconsistent—the one that these same men were in West Elgin personally and that they were bribing in South Ontario as well. We have disclosures which have proven that the two proceedings were going on at the same time. Look at South Ontario, where votes were bought for from $2 to $5, and this Hewitt was one of the very men who was in West Elgin assisting to carry out the work of the machine. He was in South Ontario, in West Elgin, in West Huron and in all these constituencies, and yet the hon. gentleman did not know it. The hon. member says that it is not reasonable to suppose that both of these operations were going on at one and the same time. The disclosures we have bring us to the definite conclusion that they were. It is beyond any question; it is a matter as to which we have evidence that they were going on at the same time, and the Reform party were profiting by their operations. The hon. member for West Elgin says that, if there is any such thing as a machine, hon. gentlemen representing the Opposition ought to know it, and then he speaks about London. I wonder that he is not ashamed to mention the constituency of London, with its history of bacchanalianism and pig's feet and beer, after the practices that took place in London on the part of the friends of the hon. gentleman and the dodges which were resorted to. The hon. member for West Elgin spoke as if there were no such thing as the machine. We had the inventor and the organizer of the machine, the man who originated and manipulated the machine, Mr. Preston, telegraphing to Mr. McNish, after the machine had succeeded in putting him in power:

Mr. SPROULE.

Hug the machine for me.

It showed what that gentleman thought was due the machine from the party when they were carried to the extent that they had, to acknowledge their gratitude for what the machine had done for them in such an emergency as that. He might have sent the same telegram to Mr. Dryden in South Ontario, to West Huron, to North Grey, and many other constituencies. He could, with equal appropriateness, have sent it to the Hon. Minister of Customs, who has represented North Grey for several years in this House. When we took the trouble to investigate that election what did we find? We have in our possession to-day nearly 200 affidavits made by men who received money in that election to vote for the hon. gentleman who is now sitting in this House, and that work was done by the same men who manipulated the campaign for the party in other constituencies. Cap Sullivan and Sim Hewitt were there. Hewitt says that he was there, that he conversed with the hon. Postmaster General and the Minister of Customs. He told them how successfully he had operated there, that, when he met an Orangeman, he was an Orangeman, that when he met a Catholic, he was a Catholic; in fact, he was all things to all men, so that he might influence public opinion in the interest of the great Reform party in this way. In the face of the fact that we had, and still have, in our possession, about 200 affidavits from men who received money at the time, the hon. Minister of Customs has represented that riding ever since, I say to his shame and the shame of his party.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Do you say that he told me that which you said?

Mr. SPROULE. I say that he told this.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Do you say that he told me?

Mr. SPROULE. I distinctly say that what I said, as I understand it, is that he told others that he had conversed with the hon. gentleman and told him how he had succeeded in doing so much in his favour in reference to these men. That is my statement.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. You do not say that he told me that.

Mr. SPROULE. I say he told others, who gave the information to us. That is my information. I believe it comes from reliable sources, and I would not be surprised to find that the hon. gentleman knew all about it. He and the Postmaster General were there with him in that election. It is interesting to find that even now, somewhat late in life, the Liberal party admits that we should have honest elections. Only the other night the Minister of the Interior said, that the fair fame of Canada had never suffered at the hands of the Reform party.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Order. My hon. friend is referring to a past debate.

Mr. SPROULE. I am referring to a statement made by a Minister in this House.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) to the fact that he is referring to a previous debate, and in that he is out of order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I be permitted to inquire if any one can patent an ordinary expression so as to prevent its being repeated? The fact that a phrase was used by a member in this House surely does not prevent any one else from using it.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) stated that the Minister of the Interior in a debate the other day, made use of certain expressions, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) was proceeding to build an argument upon that. The hon. gentleman has no right to build an argument on what was said in another debate.

Mr. SPROULE. All right; every one in this House knows what the statement of the Minister of the Interior was. Let me ask, in the face of what we know of the Baie de Chaleurs transaction, in the face of what we know of Pacaud and of the Mercier gang that corrupted the province of Quebec until the Lieutenant-Governor was obliged to dismiss them; in the face of the revelations in West Elgin and South Ontario, and what is transpiring to-day in Manitoba, can the right hon. gentleman lay his hand on his heart and truly say, that the fair fame of Canada has not suffered in the hands of the Liberals.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has no right to refer to what was said some days ago in another debate, and to proceed to cause a discussion on that statement.

Mr. SPROULE. When the Reform party leave the impression upon this country that they are the emblems of purity, I have a right to point to the accumulating knowledge we have, that that statement is not true, and I am justified in speaking of the pleasure which the country feels, that the Liberal party has at last awakened to the necessity for condemning these corrupt practices. I have the right to congratulate the leader of the Government and his friends, that after being asleep so long when all this bribery and corruption has been going on, they have awakened to the fact that it is in the interests of the country, and in the interests of the moral status of the Liberal party, that these things should be inquired into. For years past the moral sense of the community has been shocked by the revelations of corruption by the Liberal machine, and honest men, Liberal and Conservative, now desire that an end should be put to it. I tell the country and the House, that the same men, the same gang, the same machine has been operating in the interests of the Reform party for years back. I remember that in the Algoma election a few years ago, the same Mr. Macdonald who was helping to work the machine in West Elgin, went into that county, collected the Indians in a house, brought them to the booths to record their votes, and then took them back to the same house, stripped them of the clothes they had on, and put these same clothes on the squaws and took them back to poll their votes also. All that came out, and to his own shame he admitted, he gloried in it, because he thought he had done a smart thing and by that means elected a Liberal representative. Again, I found this man in the Manitoulin Islands when I took part in that election of 1882. Everywhere there was the same machine and the same gang helping to return the Liberal candidate. We found them operating the machine in East and West Algoma and the Parry Sound district. Then in the North Grey election we found the same men cheek by jowl with the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). We found the same machine doing its nefarious work there, and doing it so successfully as to return the Liberal candidate. I was in the election in North Grey, and I never saw such bacchanalian corruption as revelled there. It may be asked, why did we not bring it out in the election court. We were prevented because the petition was sawed off and the opportunity was denied us, or otherwise we would have published to the world some operations which would have reflected lasting discredit on hon. gentlemen opposite. After they left North Grey we find the same crowd in North Wellington: "Cap. Sullivan, Sim. Hewitt, D. F. McDonald, W. T. R. Preston, the organizer and the manipulator of the machine. Then they tried to elect a Minister in South Ontario, and succeeded, and next we found them in West Elgin, and the day after that election the Toronto "Globe" pointed out: There is an honest expression of public opinion by the people at the polls; there is a justification for the existence of the Hardy Government. That, Sir, is the way that the manipulations of that nefarious machine were commended by the organ of the Liberal party. They elected a Minister in South Ontario, but he had to step down and out, and he said he did not know anything about it. There was that blissful ignorance and blindness about him which is the characteristic of those who have been elected by the machine. Mr. McNish was also innocent, but he gave certificates of character to the deputy returning officer, of the men who were brought in to corrupt the constituency, and he told the returning officers these were fit and proper parties to do the work. Yes, they were fit and proper parties to do the nefarious work of ballot stuffing and personating, and the other crimes known to the Reform party machine. The gang was in South Perth and in Brockville. And to such an extent did they carry on their work, that one of their own men in Brockville, I think a Mr. Manhart, who was appointed returning officer, when approached by some of the machine members, replied: No, I have been an honest man up to the present, I desire to see a fair election.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). A true Grit.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, there was one honest Grit there, and there are many of them in the country, but the regret is that the bad element in the Grit party dominates. There are many honest Grits in Canada who desire to see an honest expression of public opinion, but unfortunately the bad element is so powerful that it dominates the party, and so corruption runs riot. This deputy returning officer in Brockville said to the machine: If you want to do your dirty work bring in one of your own men to do it. for I will not, and he stepped out of the position, and they were obliged to replace him by a man who would do the dirty work. In that election ballots were found lying in the streets. Who supplied those ballots? Some people think it was the Brockville "Recorder." I think there is very little doubt that it was. At any rate, those ballots were printed for that constituency as they were for West Elgin, and they were used for the purpose of identifying the parties who voted for the Reform candidate. Mr. McNish admits that it is a fact, a regretful fact, that prominent Reformers in the riding sheltered these men in their houses, while they were paying out money in purchasing votes. So they did in Brockville. We knew they were there. I was in that election, and it was common knowledge that these men were for days and weeks in that riding, doing their nefarious work; and the hon. member for Brockville sits in this House by virtue of the nefarious work. Yet we are told that that election was the rebuke of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) for making his charges; we are told that that was the answer of the honest electors of Brockville. How was that answer obtained? By the most dishonest means that could be devised by any party in this country. It was the same in South Brant, I am told; the same men were there. I have no doubt that Simeon Hewitt was there, for he has been a very apt scholar for many years under the tuition of that great teacher, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Paterson). They were there, and did their work, and no doubt did it successfully.

Now, who are the parties implicated in all these scandals? They are the same crowd of men. They are officials of the local government, joined with officials of the Dominion Government, and they jointly work the Reform machine. W. T. R. Preston, the organizer of the party, is drawing his $2,000 or $3,000 a year to-day as immigration agent in England. Whenever you endeavour to bring these people into court, they cannot be found. They are sent out of the country by the party. Why was Preston sent out of the country? There are many who are uncharitable enough to believe that he was sent out by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), so that his evidence would not be available in that election trial. Others are in the wild west of Algoma, and cannot be found. Capt. Sullivan goes up there, and you cannot find him with a search warrant and half a dozen constables, when an election trial is going on. Simeon Hewitt is there, too, and cannot be found. D. F. McDonald is away also, after he has done his nefarious work. These men are all employees of the local government or the Dominion Government, both Reform governments. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) asks me why is it called the machine. I will tell you what one of his friends told me. He said: "It is because we have been so successful in threshing our opponents." This machine is not a modern device. Although it is not patented, and no model of it can be found in the Department of Agriculture, it has been none the less successful; and no man can endeavour to get up another just like it. There is no danger of any one attempting to infringe on the patent.

It may be said that this is a matter for the election courts. I have said over and over again, and I repeat it, desiring to give the utmost publicity which my voice can give to the statement, that I have always regretted the custom that has obtained of late years, of pairing off these election petitions. It tends to the demoralization of the country and the disgrace of both political parties. I have always claimed that when a petition is filed, it must be filed on the sworn evidence of some person, that he believes that corruption extensively prevailed in the constituency; and I assume that the man who takes that affidavit is not a perjurer, but that he has such information in his possession as to justify the belief, if not the actual knowledge, that corruption extensively prevailed, as was the case when the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Paterson) was elected. It was sworn in that election petition. We had the affidavits in our possession at the time. When that was the case, that election petition should have been fought out to the bitter end. If there is no evidence of corruption, the petition should never be filed at all; but if there is evidence that corruption extensively prevailed, that fact should be laid bare to the world. In either case the country would benefit by the result. If the election was an honest election, the member would hold the seat to which he was entitled; if it was a corrupt election, the country would see the degradation to which the party was sunk. The system of pairing off these election petitions which has been carried on for many years in this country, is, to my mind, a disgraceful one, tending to the demoralization of the two political parties and of the electorate of this country; and the sooner we are aroused to the importance of the situation, and the sooner we stop that practice, the better it will be for the country and for the credit of both parties. The Conservative party have been endeavouring to stop this practice. Only last winter a Bill was introduced in the legislative assembly at Toronto by Mr. Whitney for the purpose of punishing bribery that was known to prevail extensively, but it was voted down by Mr. Hardy, Mr. G. W. Ross, and their friends, who knew that the machine was operating in their interest. They dare not allow a law to be passed to punish those men for their nefarious operations. It was voted down by their servile majority, just as the majority in this House the other night voted down the proposition to lay before the world the scandalous transactions and the maladministration of the present Government in the Yukon. I say, the sooner we have a stringent election law, and the stronger we make the penalties upon those who are disposed to violate that law, the better for the political health of the country. What does the country desire? An honest, unbiased and unpurchased expression of public opinion as between the two political parties. Can it be got to-day? As the machine has been operating, I say it is not possible; and if public men, with these facts before their eyes, condone them, and do not undertake to punish the guilty parties, or make a law to punish them, the electorate cannot be blamed, because they are no lower in the scale of demoralization than the representatives of the people themselves. There is no other conclusion we can come to than this, that if members of Parliament condone it, we cannot blame the electorate if they become a purchasable and corrupt commodity. We are setting a bad example to the people to follow our example and do what they otherwise would not have done. Public sentiment desires that we should have an honest expression of public opinion, and with that end in view we should endeavour to show the country that there is not to-day an honest expression of public opinion. I, therefore, support this motion most cordially. I am glad to see that the right hon. leader of the Government has accepted it, and the evidence cannot be brought down a moment too soon in the interests of honest public opinion. You cannot stop these nefarious proceedings a moment too soon, and if we can succeed in doing so, even to a limited extent, we will have done a great good, because we will have taken a step forward in the direction of obtaining an honest and fair expression of public sentiment in every election, whether to a provincial or Dominion Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 126) respecting representation in the House of Commons.—(Mr. Mulock.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the right hon. Prime Minister to have said that he would inform the House who the judges would be and the instructions that would be given them.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am not prepared to do so at this moment, but will keep the inquiry of my hon. friend in mind.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not understand why the Government have provided that the city of Toronto shall be divided by the judges, and not have provided that the city of Ottawa shall be so divided. The same principle applies in both cases. If it is a correct principle with regard to Toronto, it ought to be equally correct with regard to Hamilton and Ottawa.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend cannot be ignorant of the motives which have impelled the Government to deal with the one question and not the other. There is some force in the objection laid down by my hon. friend, but, as I stated, when introducing this Bill, we are not undertaking at this moment to deal with all the objectionable features of the Acts of 1882 and 1892, but only with their most salient features. If this Bill has any fault, it is simply that it has not gone far enough. It might have gone further, but realizing that we were not dealing with this matter immediately after the taking of the census, when redistribution has to be made, we determined that we should not disturb the existing conditions of things except in so far as is absolutely necessary to do away with some of the more glaring objections. Whilst there can be no doubt as to our jurisdiction, I do not hesitate to declare that we ought to be very chary in the exercise of it, and should restrict ourselves to exercising it only in so far as is absolutely necessary to correct an injustice. The hon. leader of the Opposition, while strongly contending that Parliament had not jurisdiction to deal with this matter except immediately after the taking of the census, was obliged to admit that we had at other periods jurisdiction to correct clerical errors in the redistribution of seats. It does not matter whether it is a clerical error or a gross error; if we have jurisdiction at all, we have jurisdiction to correct the one as well as the other. The hon. gentleman himself contended that we had power to correct an error. As I say, it does not matter whether the error is slight or gross, if we have power in the one case we have it in the other. The hon. gentleman said a few days ago that his party, when in office, were justified in amending the Redistribution Act of 1892 in order to correct a clerical error. I take the ground that we have the same power to correct an egregious error as we have to correct a small error. If we have power to correct a purely clerical error, it is equally in our power and it is equally incumbent upon us to correct an egregious error. We do not undertake to do anything more than that. If we were redistributing the representation after a decennial census, we would be ready to consider his objection and deal with it. But having taken the ground that we are doing no more than to correct the most salient injustices in the Redistribution Acts of 1882 and 1892, we do not propose to go any further at present than is absolutely necessary, and, therefore, we leave many things which, perhaps, might be subject of consideration and amendment under other circumstances.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not propose to go over the discussion which has taken place on the second reading. I merely rise for the purpose of saying that although I desire to pay great respect to the statements just made by my right hon. friend, of course I do not at all agree with him that the right—because it is a question of right and not a question of power—to correct a verbal error or inaccuracy that is absolutely necessary in order to carry out the law, at all implies the right to pass a Redistribution Bill. I think that is pressing the argument altogether too far. But having discussed that matter, I do not propose to go over it again, nor do I propose to move, and I hope no gentleman on this side of the House will move, any amendments to this Bill. The Bill is, in my opinion, a violation of the constitution of the country according to which no Redistribution Bill can be passed except after a decennial census. Holding that view, I do not propose in any way to interfere or to take the responsibility of moving any amendment. But if I were to do so, I would not propose to separate Ottawa into two constituencies, nor to separate the city and county of Halifax into two constituencies. There is an obvious convenience in having cities like Ottawa and Halifax joined as a unit in electing two members. In Ottawa, as every person is aware, and the same may be said of the city and county of Halifax, the population is divided mainly into two religions, and the practice is to name a gentleman belonging to the Roman Catholic faith and a gentleman belonging to the Protestant faith by each one of the two parties; and in that way the electors have a better opportunity of making a choice than they otherwise would. For this reason I do not propose any amendment changing that system, because I think it is much more convenient for both parties to bring forward candidates of each religion. That argument is especially strong in the city of Ottawa where the people are divided into two races as well as two religions, and the present arrangement avoids a good deal of inconvenience that would arise from a division of the city into two constituencies.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the First Minister to say that the object of this Bill was to correct an injustice, and that the way to correct that injustice was to observe county boundaries where they were not observed before. But the Minister has shown that that was not his aim; if it was, he would have corrected county boundaries in every constituency in eastern as well as in western Ontario. He would not have done so in Grey and violated the same principle in Carleton; he would have corrected the boundaries in Lanark as well as in Bruce. Now, if the hon. gentleman's object was to correct this injustice, why does he not do so in one part of the country as well as in another part? Then he allows the city of Toronto to be subdivided by judges, but not in Ottawa and Halifax. Now, there may be a good deal in what the leader of the Opposition says, that there are special circumstances or conditions in cities like Ottawa, Hamilton and Halifax which might justify a departure from the rule. That may be the case, and I am not going to argue it. But it seemed to me that, the principle being applied in Toronto, we might with propriety say that it should apply in the other cities. However, if the exceptional situation justifies the departure, I have nothing to say with regard to it. But what the hon. gentleman said does not apply to the case which has been pointed out—their efforts to correct what they are pleased to call injustice and irregularities in the west, while nothing is done in the east.

Mr. CLANCY. The committee must be a good deal struck with the observation of the right hon. First Minister. He recites the case of the effort made in 1893 to correct clerical errors as a justification for this Bill. But, I would like to be clear upon the point. The legislation of 1893 was intended to do anything which Parliament had intended to do in a previous Bill, but, through an inadvertance, had failed to do.

The PRIME MINISTER. With the power or not?

Mr. CLANCY. For the purposes of what I am saying, I will assume that it was with the power. The object was to carry out the original intention of Parliament. But now the right hon. gentleman is introducing legislation to overturn the will of Parliament, as expressed in 1882. These are precisely opposite cases, as it seems to me. I rise merely to have the point made clear, because it seems to me that if the hon. gentleman's contention in one case is sound it cannot be sound in the other.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) is right in saying that we proceed from different motives. I agree that in 1893, when the Government introduced amendments to the Act of a previous year their intention was to complete the work of the previous year, which, in their opinion, they had left incomplete. We now move to amend the Act just as they moved to amend it. Their intention was to complete their work, while our intention is to correct their work. That is all the difference. The intention is different, but the result is the same, so far as the power of this Parliament is concerned. We want to amend the Act, just as they wanted to amend the Act. They amended it for one motive, we amend it for a different motive. They amended it because they thought—I am bound to assume that their intention was to serve good purposes—that it was necessary to correct an error made by them at that time.

Mr. CLANCY. But this that the hon. gentleman intends to amend was not an error; it was the deliberate intention of Parliament. There might be a want of wisdom in it, but no hon. gentleman can argue—and be consistent—that an Act deliberately passed by the Parliament of Canada was an error in the sense in which the right hon. gentleman now uses the word. The hon. gentleman cites a precedent of a Bill intended to correct clerical errors. But would that be fairly quoted as a precedent for altering the deliberate intention of Parliament? It seems to me that the two cases are as far as the poles asunder.

The PRIME MINISTER. Perhaps I might meet the views of the hon. gentleman if I were to say we are moved to correct the unwisdom of the Act of 1882.

Mr. CLANCY. I am glad that the right hon. gentleman is coming to my views. I hope he will go further and withdraw this Bill, and so correct the unwisdom of introducing it. I am not going to prolong this debate; I do not see any advantage in repeating what has been said in this House. But I have this to say—that hon. gentlemen opposite have been unable, up to this time, whatever they may be able to do hereafter, to show one reason growing out of the actual operation of the Redistribution Bill of 1882 and the results of it, for introducing this Bill. They have not showed that any hon. gentleman in this House was unfairly dealt with under the Redistribution Act of 1882.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is gratifying for me to find what I expected occurring. I said that when this Bill was discussed that it would be found so fair that no objection could be offered to it. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) said that the Bill is unconstitutional. But every one knows that he is alone in that conclusion. Even the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) while arguing in support of his leader, said that for the present he was of the opinion that it was unconstitutional, but guarded himself by saying that his opinion might be different the next day, or words to that effect. No one now takes the ground that the Bill is not within the constitutional powers of this Parliament to deal with. And now that every one is agreeing that it is a perfectly fair Bill, the result is very gratifying indeed. Even hon. gentlemen who said that they would fight it for days and days, now find that it is what it was designed to be, a perfectly honest Bill. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) says that there is no reason given for changing the redistribution of 1882. He has been told time and time again, but I repeat it now, that gross injustices were inflicted at that time, that member after member of the Liberal party was deliberately struck at and their ridings were made into Conservative ridings by Act of this Parliament. This Bill strikes at no one. In 1882 the party workers were called in to give counsel to determine what townships should be taken out of this riding or put into that, perpetrating an infamous gerrymander. But in the Bill now introduced, as hon. gentlemen can see, there is no effort at a gerrymander, there is no need to call in party workers or even to consult with members of this House. The House divests itself of the power to deal with the matter in detail and leaves it wholly in the hands of the judges. So, the constitutionality of the Bill is acknowledged. As has been said, no lawyer who valued his reputation would say that this Bill is unconstitutional. If hon. gentlemen are seeking relief from some other place—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS—by some other means than by combatting the Bill on its merits, that is another matter. But let it be understood that the Bill is constitutional, and that, so far as its provisions are concerned, no fault can be found with it.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock) moved :

That in subsection (e) the word "four" be struck out and be replaced by the word "five"; that in subsection (g), after the word "Elgin" the word "Kent" be inserted, and that the word "Kent," after the word "of," in subsection (h), be struck out.

Mr. BENNETT. Before the clause is adopted, I would like to say a few words in reference to the representation of Simcoe. As shown by the census returns of 1891 the population of Simcoe proper amounts to about 82,000 souls, and it must be remembered that a large portion of the county has been increasing in population to a very considerable extent since the last decennial census. If hon. gentlemen will refer to the map of Simcoe it will be seen that the present arrangement of dealing with North Simcoe is such, that according to the last census there is a population of 28,203 in such riding, and that after taking into account Muskoka which will be, if this Bill goes into effect, taken from the east riding of Simcoe, that riding, according to the last census will have 31,381. Then having reference to what may be termed the south riding, or the southern portion of the county of Simcoe, after deducting from that the township of Mulmur which will, under the Bill, go into the county of Dufferin, and adding thereto the township of Adjala, which will be taken from Cardwell, the population of South Simcoe proper, as I may call it, would be 23,143. The judges in arranging the county of Simcoe into three ridings will take first for the south riding the townships of Tossoronto, West Gwillimbury, Essa, Innisfil, Adjala, Tecumseth and the villages and towns included in these townships which will give a population of 23,143. North Simcoe, as it exists to-day, would have a population of 28,203, and taking the riding of East Simcoe, as it to-day stands, minus the portions that will go into the district of Muskoka, the population would be 31,381. By reference to the map it will be seen that some portion of North Simcoe would be added to South Simcoe if equalization of population were sought; it would be necessary to add to South Simcoe the town of Barrie in order to bring up the population. The result would be that South Simcoe, plus Barrie, would have a population of about 29,000. The town of Barrie, however has always been in the north riding of Simcoe, and I assume, that the judges, in making the division, would be very much averse to taking from the riding of North Simcoe a town which has been situated in that riding, I was going to say, almost from time immemorial, at least, since the formation of the riding. Then, if recourse were had to taking the township of Nottawasaga, and adding that to South Simcoe, it would result in adding to the 23,143 population in South Simcoe no less than 6,000 people from Nottawasaga. But another trouble would confront the judges, and that is that in Nottawasaga township are included the towns of Collingwood and Stayner, which would give a population of about 6,500 souls. The position then would be, if Nottawasaga were added to South Simcoe, that Collingwood and Stayner, which are both in Nottawasaga would stand, by this act, to be taken distinctly out of the township in which they are now situated. Referring to East Simcoe with its population of 31,381 a reference to the figures will show that the township of Tay had in 1891 a population of 4,714 souls. It is a comparatively new township, and, owing to the fact that it includes some villages which have been increasing very considerably, I have no doubt that the population of Tay to-day is much nearer 6,000 than 5,000. Then Midland is returned in the census of 1891 as having a population of 2,088, a town which now has considerably over 3,000 of a population, and which, owing to certain local circumstances, bids fair, in the next few years to grow considerably. The result is, therefore, if reference were had to the present population, that the riding of East Simcoe, being divided upon these lines, would have a population of not only 31,381, but a population of about 33,000 or 34,000. It is manifestly unfair that a riding should be so constituted that would have 34,000 of a population while, in the adjoining county of York, the ridings will have a population of only 21,000 souls, and in many other counties, which I might enumerate in Ontario, the population will amount to 14,000 or 15,000, while East Simcoe will have 34,000. To take from the present riding of East Simcoe the township of Tiny would increase the population of North Simcoe to upwards of 33,000, while East Simcoe would have a population of about 30,000, both of which, I submit, would be abnormally large representations as compared with other ridings, and having reference to the fact that there are many portions of East Simcoe in which the population is increasing vastly.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Pater-son). What would be the unit of population if the riding were divided evenly?

Mr. BENNETT. About 82,000 is the total population of the three ridings, but the trouble is that, while South Simcoe, having regard to its natural limits, has a population of 23,000, the townships which are adjacent to it in the north riding are so large and include such large towns—I refer particularly to the township of Nottawasaga—that South Simcoe would be a very large riding with a population of almost 30,000. In this dilemma I submit that it is the duty of the Government to make the Bill as perfect as possible, and the only thing to be done, under the circumstances, is to endeavour to bring out something like a fair proportion of population, and that can only be attained by bringing into effect in that county four representatives as against three representatives. That, of course, will result in the displacement of another riding in some other portion of the province. I have no doubt that the judges, being only permitted to assign three members, will, of necessity, have in the riding of East Simcoe over 34,000 of a population, and that must be emphasized by this fact that it includes towns that are to-day growing rapidly and also that there is in the riding a considerable portion of new farming land which results in the increase of population in the agricultural districts from year to year. I may mention, in this connection, that the county of Simcoe, for the purposes of the Ontario legislature, has practically four representatives, and it would be following upon the lines of the representation in the Ontario House if four representatives were given to the county in the Dominion Parliament rather than three as at present. I would call the attention of the Government to the fact that, if the present arrangement is carried out and only three representatives are assigned to Simcoe, it must result in this, that if any regard is to be paid to geographical appearances South Simcoe will have a population of 23,000, North Simcoe a population of 28,000, and having regard to the present population, East Simcoe will have very close to 34,000, if not more than 34,000.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Not by the census of 1891.

Mr. BENNETT. East Simcoe by the census of 1891 has 31,380, but that census gives Midland a population of only 2,088, when I know, as a matter of fact, it has over 3,000 to-day. Penetanguishene has 2,110 in the census of 1891, and I know it is considerably over 2,500 now. So with the town of Orillia, which has a growing population. I submit that if you want to make the Bill anyway fair, the county of Simcoe should have four members instead of three. That would make the unit of population in each riding something like what it is in other parts of the province.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Does the hon. gentleman suggest where this seat for Simcoe should come from?

Mr. BENNETT. Perhaps one of the Yorks could be knocked out, or Brant, or Durham. If I find the complaint, it is for the Government to find the remedy. South Simcoe, under this Bill, will have only about 23,000, while East Simcoe will have upwards of 34,000, and to my mind there is no defence for that. Why does not the Government give Simcoe four members as it would be fair to do?

Mr. CLANCY. Is the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) going to make two little hives with about 16,000 population each in Brant, while he allows only two members for Kent, representing a population of 29,000 each? Kent is much more entitled to three than Brant is to two. In Kent you would have three ridings with over 18,000 each, but yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) proposes to fix a hive for himself in Brant and to do an injustice to Kent county. I may tell him also that Kent county is growing far more rapidly than Brant. What has the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) to say to that injustice? Perhaps he has protested to the Ministers and failed, but anyway, I hope it is not by his consent that this injustice is perpetrated on the county of which he is so estimable a member. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) going to sit silent and allow this injustice to be perpetrated on his electors? Will he allow the Minister of Customs to make two little constituencies in Brant, with far below the unit of population, and not say a word for his own county? The Minister of Customs told us the other night that Brant was sacred, because it was constituted before confederation. If there is any common sense at all in that argument, then why touch Cardwell, and why touch Bothwell, which are in the same position as Brant? I tell the Minister of Customs that that is no defence for his conduct. He is helping to manipulate this Bill, and he is pretending to return to county boundaries, but he first takes care that he will have two little hives of his own, while he cuts down the representation that fairly belongs to other counties. Essex is much better entitled to three members than Brant is to two, and so is Lambton. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) gave as an excuse: Oh, we did not touch Norfolk. Is that a manly defence? Should he shelter himself behind that single constituency? I will be surprised if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) does not sit silent there in his seat, because it is much better he should be silent than expose himself to the ridicule of attempt to defend the course he has taken.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I do not know that I should allow the hon. gentleman to taunt me with silence, when we are discussing as to whether this Bill is a fair one or not. He seems to have a particular objection to Brant having two members. Whether it is because one of the Brants is my old constituency and my home for many years, I cannot tell, but I trust that, such a consideration does not prompt him to vent his ill-will against a county that does not deserve it. Surely he will admit that the people of Brant have equal rights with the others ?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman seems to think, more.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, not more. My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has stated that under the census of 1891, which is to determine in this matter, the largest Simcoe riding would have 31,000 population. I grant that is over the unit, but you cannot have an exact population in each riding. Under the present Act, which wholly disregards county boundaries, and under which there is far greater liberty to approach equality in population, greater divergencies exist than are found in this Bill. When the hon. gentleman appeals for another member for the county of Simcoe, of which the largest riding has only 31,000, another 28,000, and another 23,000, does he argue that the county of Brant, which has nearly 37,000, should have one member taken from it and given to Simcoe, although it has 5,000 more than the largest riding in the county of Simcoe ? I would ask him, further, if it is thought that any one of those counties to which two members are allotted, is not entitled to them, and that one member should be taken away, in common fairness and common honesty ; would you not take the member from that county which has the smallest population ? If you do that, you would not take a member from Brant, but you would take one from Norfolk, which has 5,000 souls less than Brant.

Mr. CLARKE. Not by the census.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, by the census of 1891. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), a useful member, who has been one of the Ministers of the Crown, has himself said that if that riding were divided, there was no doubt that the north riding would be a strong Liberal constituency, while the south riding would be a doubtful constituency. That was his estimate of the political feeling of that county. If that be so, it follows inevitably, that if you took away one of the members from Norfolk, and gave the county one member, you would make an absolutely safe seat for a Liberal and take away the seat of the present member for South Norfolk, a seat which he has won time and again. But the Bill leaves that gentleman in the same position that he now occupies. To show the exceeding fairness of this Bill, take the county of Wentworth, the population of which, I think, is within 1,000 of that of Norfolk, and a county which has almost from confederation returned two Liberal members, and two seats might have been given to that county, and two Liberals elected ; and one Liberal seat might be given to Norfolk and the Conservative shut out ; and this might have been done without wrenching. But this Bill recognizes the fact that Wentworth is less in population than Norfolk, though only slightly so, and, therefore, it gives Wentworth only one member and Norfolk two. So that, if hon. gentlemen want to take a seat away from any one of the counties having two members at present, they must, in common fairness, take that seat from the county which has the least population.

Mr. CLARKE. What does the hon. Minister reckon the population of the county of Brant to be, by the census of 1891 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is nearly 37,000. I have not the exact figures.

Mr. CLARKE. The reason I asked the hon. Minister is, that I have in my hand the return of the general elections of the province of Ontario which took place in 1898, and it gives the population of the north riding of Brant as 11,406, and that of the south riding as 21,811, making for the county, 33,217.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If the hon. gentleman will read the Bill carefully on that point, he will find that the judges, in availing themselves of information, are required to take, not the returns of elections of members to the legislative assembly, but the Dominion census, taken by Dominion officers ; and if the hon. gentleman will take the Dominion census, he will find that the population is nearly 37,000.

Mr. CLARKE. The figures I have given purport to be from the last census.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Then, they are not correct in that particular. Now, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) says there are some Indians dwelling in South Brant, and he is going to take out the Indian population, because they have not votes. Well, there are a great many white men in all the different constituencies who have not votes, or who did not have votes under the Franchise Act passed by hon. gentlemen opposite. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that these Indians and white men are not to be taken into account, and are not to be represented in this House ? Does not the man who represents a county, represent all the souls in that county ?

Mr. CLANCY. I do not think the hon. member would intentionally mislead the committee. I am sure he will agree with me, that the voting population counted in the province of Ontario is precisely the voting population that will be counted in Dominion elections, because hon. gentlemen opposite have adopted the provincial franchise. Now, I will give the hon. gentleman the population of the county of Brant, according to the census of 1891, and, in order to be perfectly fair, I will give the details of both ridings. North Brant has the township of Brantford with 3,693, the township of South Dumfries with 3,137, the township of Onondaga with 1,432, and the town of Paris with 3,094, making in all 11,406. South Brant has the city of Brantford with 12,753, the township of Brantford—which seems to be divided—with 3,261, the township of Burford with 4,939, and the township of Oakland with 858. There are no other townships. Tuscarora is not included. I care not how many Indians there may be in there, they are not counted under the system the hon. gentleman has laid down, and it is idle to pretend that the hon. gentleman has 36,000. What has he, according to the Ontario rule? He has 32,217, not one more nor less, and it seems an astounding thing to see an hon. gentleman here attempting to defend the position on a ground that is wholly indefensible.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Are you making this speech for me?

Mr. CLANCY. I am making it for myself, and I hope also for the benefit of the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The hon. gentleman talks of the judges, but the judges are not to take the returns of members to the legislative assembly of Ontario, but the Dominion census, according to the Dominion census tables, and you cannot begin to distinguish as between the one and the other. The hon. gentleman supposes that the judges are to go into every county and ascertain how many white men are going to be excluded from voting because they have not the proper qualifications. But you go by population. When the census was made in 1881, Tuscarora was counted just the same, and on that basis, when each 20,000 had a member given it by the Government then in power, if the hon. gentleman had taken the Indians out then, he would only have left the population between 16,000 and 17,000, just the same as now. It never entered the heads of that Government to take the argument of the hon. gentleman, but even if they had, there would be 33,000 according to himself, or 3,000 more than in the county of Norfolk; and if you take a member from any county, you must take him from the county that has the least. Will the hon. gentleman move an amendment that a member be taken from Norfolk and given to some other county?

Mr. CLANCY. I tell the hon. gentleman that there are two questions that may be considered. Norfolk has one riding of 15,006, and another of 16,692, and Wentworth has two ridings with even less. Is he prepared to wipe out Wentworth as well as Norfolk, because Wentworth is smaller than Norfolk?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Wentworth is wiped out.

Mr. CLANCY. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. It has two members.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There is only one member for Wentworth. The hon. gentleman must study the Bill. There is a very small difference between the populations of Wentworth and Norfolk, and if we had given the two members to Wentworth, the Liberals would have two members here, whereas, if we gave one to Norfolk alone, we would have a Liberal there. Norfolk has a little more population than Wentworth, and we said that since it has a little more population, we will give it two members, though by doing that probably Mr. Tisdale will be returned to this House again, and we gave one member less to Wentworth, though by giving two we would have secured the return of two Liberal members. If he proposes anything in that line he must go to the county that has the least population, and take a member from Norfolk before he can take it from Brant. Therefore, the strictures of hon. gentlemen opposite, as if I personally were fixing up a constituency, are utterly unfounded. The whole aim of the Bill is founded on absolute justice as far as we can understand it. We return to county bounds, and these bounds have not been made by the Liberal party. They were, in most cases, made years before confederation, we had nothing to do with the framing of them, and would simply say representation shall be confined within the municipal bounds created, not by this Act or Government, but forty or fifty years ago. How could there be anything more fair? Where there is a county only entitled to one member by population, as near as you can arrive at it, that county shall have one member, and you do not require to call in the services of a judge in that case, because there is nothing to do. But there are other counties entitled by population to two members, and others entitled to three members, and where there are counties which have to be divided so as to give them two members or three members, this Government does not undertake to do the dividing, although we have forty or fifty of a majority at our back, and are in a position to put through any kind of Act, if we were actuated by the same feeling as actuated hon. gentlemen opposite, and could stoop so low as to follow their example. But we said, no, we will have a Bill which will prevent any gerrymander. When any county is to be divided, we will hand it over to three of the highest judges in the land to make the division, and when the division is made, we will not reserve the right even to review the decision, but will accept it as final.

Mr. SPROULE. Did you do that in eastern Ontario?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What argument is that with reference to this Bill? It has been pointed out that we are simply repealing some of the gross features of the Gerrymander Act, and carrying out what the people at the last election told us to do, and carrying it out in such a way that there is not a fair-minded man who can say we are not doing right. One of these hon. gentlemen ventured to say the other day that party partisans had been brought here to help to frame this Bill. What would have been the use of bringing any one here to advise us? When they talk about heelers being consulted, and having the management of the business, they are simply implying that term to three of the highest judges in the land, for the whole control is absolutely in their hands. I recognize that there are discrepancies or differences in the populations of the different ridings. I confess that the county of Brant, having two members given to it, each member will not represent as many souls as are represented by gentlemen elected by some other constituencies. But that is inevitable, as has been pointed out, time and again, even in the Gerrymander Bill of 1882, where no attention was paid to county boundaries, but where a township was taken out of certain ridings and put into others, changing the whole map of Ontario, there are more discrepancies in population than in the Bill.

Mr. BERGERON. Why do you talk so much, why not let it go?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. My hon. friend from Bothwell asked me to explain, and I am giving the explanation. Just on that point, let me say to the hon. member for Toronto, who sits over there and who made a very moderate speech last night in reference to this matter, to which I listened with interest and attention, and who thought as did other members from Toronto, that in giving five members to that city we were not doing it justice, because each member would represent, on an average, 36,000 souls, that while that is more than a member from any of the rural constituencies will represent, yet, as was pointed out by the hon. leader of the Opposition, as well as by members on this side, if large commercial centres like Toronto and Montreal have not been given the representation their population would entitle them to, it is because they have a power and influence that carry weight independent of any representation. As I pointed out, when speaking the other day, if a question comes up here which affects the interests of Toronto, the able reporters for the Toronto papers who sit in the Gallery, and who are so thoroughly posted on every question, flash the news to their press. The announcement appears in the morning papers, and if there is anything by which the interests of the city are jeopardized and representations are to be made to the Government, they do not need to depend on their representatives in this House alone. The board of trade can be summoned within an hour, if need be; the city council can be convened, and deputations of prominent citizens can be sent to present their case. In rural constituencies the case is far different. They cannot be reached in that way, nor can they act in that way. The hon. gentleman talks of injustice to Toronto, but I want to say that this Bill gives Toronto greater justice than it ever had before.

Mr. CLARKE. Explain that, please.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Under this Bill there would be one member in this House for every 36,000 people, supposing you are able to get an even division; whereas now there is one member for 43,000 people. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) represents 43,000, and he complains and says he will oppose this Bill because it involves an injustice. It is true, the Bill does not give Toronto a representative for every 22,000 people, but comes 7,000 nearer to it than does the present law.

Mr. CLARKE. What population does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bertram) from Toronto who supports the Minister, represent—the hon. member for Centre Toronto?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Centre Toronto is much less. But, taking the population of Toronto at 180,000, as it is by the census of 1891—counting in those who come in from the county of York—there would be a representative for every 36,000 of people, whereas the hon. gentleman, who finds such grievous fault, represents at present 43,000. If it does not give the hon. gentleman all that he wants, why should he not be glad that it does go in the direction he desires? The hon. gentleman talks about the county of York. The county of York, apart from the city of Toronto, will be entitled to three representatives. I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman, and ask him to take note of it, that what raised the indignation in 1882 among the Liberals of this House—indignation that burns in my breast as I talk about it—was, that the Bill was directly aimed at this man, that man, and the other. By their voting strength, the Government of that day tried to assassinate politically member after member on the Liberal side. Alexander Mackenzie was struck at, Charlton was struck at, G. W. Ross was struck at, Gillies was struck at, Sir Richard Cartwright was legislated out of the House. Others were in the same way deliberately aimed at. Tory papers came out, gloating over the fact that the voices of Mackenzie, Mills and Paterson would be heard no more in legislative halls. The Bill was designed to politically assassinate the opponents of the Government. And, when we entered the contest, some of us, it was in a Conservative riding, and, if we won, it was only through the votes of decent Conservatives, who said: This is too infamous; we cannot support it. That is the answer I give to my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy), who says that Liberals came back after the election of 1882. It was not because the attempt was not made to politically assassinate them, but because they found enough Conservatives to repudiate the act of their leader. But time passed on, and that feeling died away, and a number of these seats, which were held by the force of that righteous indignation, have been lost to the Liberal party. And the Bill that is now before the House—and I am glad and proud, as a member of a Liberal Government and of the party, to say it—does not strike at any member of the Opposition.

Mr. BENNETT. You wipe out Bothwell.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But this is not a blow aimed at the present member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), for his present constituency, Bothwell, will be found in Kent, where the hon. gentleman can run.

Mr. CLARKE. What about York ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Let us look at this in a fair-minded way, let us talk coolly about it. I suppose that West Ontario, represented by the hon. Speaker, is a Liberal riding. And that is wiped out. South Middlesex, I suppose, hon. gentlemen will say, is a fairly safe Liberal constituency. And that is wiped out.

Mr. HENDERSON. How do you know ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I know by the Bill. Cardwell, for which sits a gentleman (Mr. Stubbs) who has given a fair support to the Liberal party of this House, is wiped out.

And the hon. gentleman will see that these things are not done with a view to striking at an individual, but to carry out the principle of maintaining the county boundaries. What the vicissitudes may be, when the divisions are made by the judges, I cannot tell; no one can tell. Some say the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) will be injured. Yet another gentleman tells us that the divisions of the county of Bruce are absolutely fair. If they are absolutely fair, I venture to say that no three judges of the Superior Court will change them to make them unfair; and, if they do not, the hon. gentleman is just where he was. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) spoke of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) as a lamb being led to the slaughter. Does he mean to say that the hon. member for West York is injured by this Bill ?

Mr. BENNETT. Certainly.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. In judging of the probable effects of the Bill of 1882, when it was under discussion, we took the figures of the previous election. I do not see how otherwise we can judge of the probable effects of this Bill. I have here the figures of returns of the last election in West York. I find that half of St. Paul's and St.

Stephen's ward and York township are grouped together, and I could not tell what proportion of the vote was cast in the wards and what proportion in the township. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), when speaking, said that under this Bill about half his constituency would be put into Toronto. The hon. gentleman represents something over 41,000 now. So, I have assumed that half the vote I have referred to was cast in the wards of Toronto, and half in the west riding of York, as it will be under this Bill.

Mr. CLARKE. Is the hon. gentleman referring to the figures of the election of 1896 ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. Surely, the hon. gentleman would not quote that election as showing the voting strength of the parties.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Why not ?

Mr. CLARKE. Because no Liberal candidate ran in 1896.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am glad to hear that statement, that no Liberal candidate ran, because, I think, he uses the figures of the "Mail," that counts every vote that was cast for the member for West York as a Conservative vote.

Mr. CLARKE. Give us the figures now.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. They count his 4,000 votes as Conservative votes. But he had two opponents, he had a Liberal Patron running against him and a Conservative as well. Let him take the combined strength of his two opponents, and he will see how he stands. Take now the portion that goes into Toronto, and he will still have one-half his constituency to appeal to, if he sees fit to stand for one of the ridings of West Toronto. I daresay my good friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) is loyal enough to his chief to let him run in one of those constituencies. Taking his last election as a basis, he would start with 1,544 of a majority. Yet he is in danger, they say. Now, suppose he is left in West York, when the city portion is taken out, what is the result ? He will start in West York with 1,784 of a majority; yet they speak of him as being hardly dealt with, and he speaks as if it was dangerous for him to run there. These are his majorities over two candidates with their combined strength. The hon. gentleman says there was no Liberal candidate there, and so they count all the votes cast for them as Conservative votes when they make up their Conservative majority. With the exception of the member for East York, I have not heard any one say that they were in danger from this Bill. I have not been able to go into the figures very closely for East York, but I know that the member sitting for East York, representing that large portion of the city for years, if he desires it, can try to share the representation with the hon. gentleman if he runs. Now, that constituency will be large enough for two. Therefore, they cannot point to one man that is struck at under this Bill. It is an absolutely fair Bill in contrast to their Bill. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) the other night found fault with me because I said, when we were protesting against the Bill of 1882, that we were voted down on amendment after amendment by the majority which sat here in dumb silence. twenty-two amendments, as the "Hansard" will prove. No defence was made of the Bill, when those twenty-two amendments were moved, and there was not a word out of their mouths in its defence, although every resolution enunciated an iniquity that was perpetrated under it, they dared not defend it. Let me read you one as a sample, and then contrast the operations of this Bill with that. The hon. member for South Brant at that time, whom I very well knew, made a motion. Before doing it, he recited the reasons that actuated him in moving it :

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I desire to get the attention of the chairman of the committee which was charged with the preparation of this Bill, and I shall be obliged to him if he will indicate his consciousness by looking at me. I see he keeps his head down.

I said they voted it with their heads cast down, and when that appeal was made to him, and I called upon him to lift his eyes and face the man he was striking at, his head was down still :

I think we have a right, if we cannot have any attention, at least to have an explanation of the arrangements made in South Brant and South Oxford. I desire to ask, whoever is in charge of the Government at this moment, if it was a principle of equalization of the population that was the basis of this change, and if that was not the principle, I think I have a right to know, and the House has a right to know, under what principle it was made ? They took from South Brant two townships, and they annexed them to the riding of South Oxford. Now, I do not lay much stress with regard to the case of Burford, from a geographical point of view, though there was no necessity of disturbing that riding at all, as it had the proper number of inhabitants ; but let me point out to you that in taking the township of Oakland from South Brant and adding it to South Oxford, you are taking a population of 939 from a riding which is only a little over 20,000 and attaching it to a riding which has a population of nearly 25,000.

They were boasting that their principle was the principle of equalization, and they took this township out of a riding that had 20,000, and put it into another riding that had 25,000 :

The township of Oakland does not belong geographically to the south riding of Oxford at all, for if it had not been attached to Burford on one side, which you are now attaching to South Oxford, Oakland would be 12 miles away at its nearest point from the county of Oxford, and as the township is three-cornered—the result of the change is to leave that county anything but symmetrical. This township comes within eight miles of the city of Brantford, a county town, where its inhabitants do all their business, and the town of Ingersoll, which is the main town in South Oxford, to which it is now attached, will be something like 40 or 50 miles distant, I move :

"That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the same by providing that the township of Oakland shall form part of the electoral district of the south riding of the county of Brant."

That was my resolution. They proposed as the fundamental principle of their Bill to equalize population.

Mr. CLANCY. What other Liberals spoke on that resolution and defended the hon. gentleman ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Did I need any Liberal to defend me ? Was it not so manifest that even a Conservative, having the least sense of shame in him, would have supported my amendment ? Does the hon. gentleman see no fairness in that proposition ? They were sitting there legislating professedly on the principle of equalizing population, and yet taking a township with a population of 939 from a riding that had only a little more than 20,000, and putting it into one that had nearly 25,000. Would they not have put it back if they had had shame enough to do so ? But they had not. Had they done so, it would still have left South Brant with less population than the riding into which they put it. I will read on :

Mr. PATERSON. I want an answer to my question.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Surely, after so pointed and repeated a request, an answer should be given.

Mr. PATERSON. Is there no hon. gentleman on the other side with sufficient spirit to answer ?

No answer, but in dumb silence they voted down the proposition with their ninety-nine to forty-two. And so on with every one of the twenty-two amendments moved here, each of them reciting an iniquity like the one I have pointed out. Not a word in defence of their Bill. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) stands up here, that hon. gentleman who professes to be a fair-minded man, and to do his duty as an independent man, and he says : I want the Bill framed in that spirit, and not a Bill that will allow the independent judges of this land to determine the boundaries of the counties. Now, I think I have answered the hon. member for Bothwell. He may repeat his question again and again, parrot-like ; he may talk about Brant again and again, parrot-like. He wants to take away from some counties that have two members under this Bill and give it to some other county. Why, then, let him, in all fairness, commence at counties that have a smaller population, and when he does that, he cannot begin with the county of Brant, even if he wishes to do that ridiculous thing which he speaks about, of excluding some thousands of Indian population there, simply because he claims that under the electoral franchise in the province of Ontario they have not a vote. They can get a vote if they are qualified, just the same as the white man can if qualified, and there are a great many white men in that riding under the Franchise Bill of hon. gentlemen who had no vote either. Does he propose to have the judges go and determine all the men in that riding that have no vote in order to ascertain that. To make such a statement is to show how ridiculous it would appear in that sense. I admit that there are inequalities, and that there must necessarily be inequalities, but, when they disregarded county boundaries in Ontario altogether, and were at liberty to go anywhere in the province where there was an opportunity to nearly equalize the population if they wished to do it honestly, the result is found in this Act that we seek to repeal, and which contains greater discrepancies than will be found in this Bill which we ask the House to adopt.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). I do not think that it is necessary that, if the hon. gentleman has a good case, to import so much heat and energy into it.

Mr. CLARKE. White heat.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Some of the old indignation.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman has the old indignation of eighteen years ago. I would have thought that time would have taught him a lesson in eighteen years. The figure he cut eighteen years ago was ridiculous. The hon. gentleman has had eighteen years of experience, which has shown the untruth of every statement he made then. The hon. gentleman knows that the Liberal party were not injured. It has been demonstrated beyond a doubt that there was—

Mr. GIBSON. The intention was the same.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend says the intention was the same. If people had to depend upon his intentions they would indeed be very unreliable.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I think that my conduct in this House, or out of it, is just as reliable, and will compare with that of the hon. gentleman. He need not speak of reliability. I call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that he has no right to say that I am not reliable.

Mr. CLANCY. I waited for your ruling, Mr. Chairman; I was not aware that there were so many tender-hearted gentlemen here. These hon. gentlemen are very sensitive; I do not wonder that hon. gentlemen are so sensitive. They have a lot of unredeemed pledges.

Mr. GIBSON. They are better than unredeemed notes.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I think the insinuation which has been thrown across the floor of the House is altogether out of order; it is not courteous.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) mention the point of order.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is a simple matter, but I think it is a slur that should not be thrown across the floor of the House from one member to another. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) said that unredeemed pledges were better than unredeemed notes, making an insinuation that he had no right to make.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Do I understand that the hon. member (Mr. Gibson) wanted to impute something dishonourable to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) or some other hon. member of the committee? If so, I would ask him to withdraw the expression.

Mr. GIBSON. No, Mr. Chairman, I asked for your ruling when the hon. gentleman accused me of being unreliable.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Do I understand the hon. member (Mr. Gibson) to charge some hon. members with not paying their notes or something of that kind? If so, I suppose the hon. gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Mr. Chairman—
Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) can speak for himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. BERGERON. The Chair has spoken.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am speaking to the point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Landerkin) has a right to speak, but I put the question to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), and I would like the hon. member for Lincoln to answer the question I have put.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I did not refer to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). He said that we had a great many unredeemed pledges, and I said that unredeemed pledges were better than unredeemed notes.

Mr. BERGERON. What does that mean?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) did not cast any imputation upon anybody.

Mr. GIBSON. I did not insinuate anything against anybody.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It was a general principle that he was applying.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I can assure you that, while the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) might have made an unworthy insinuation, I would not be disposed to be too particular with that hon. gentleman. I think he could do me quite as much service by making an insinuation of that kind as by praising me. The fact is that I would rather prefer the former to the latter. Anything unfavourable that the hon. gentleman could say of me I would regard as a good certificate of character, and, therefore, I shall not discuss the insinuations that he makes. To come now to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) who was so earnest and who spoke of twenty-two resolutions, each of which cited an iniquity, will the hon. gentleman turn to "Hansard," which is before him, and pick out of these six resolutions that had absolutely nothing to do with that measure? Yet the hon. gentleman has repeated that statement, and I venture to say that he will not rise now and repeat it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. I despair of convincing the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Hon. gentlemen can get "Hansard" and read it for themselves.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman read a part of it, but he will not read the rest. The hon. gentleman's statements stand entirely unfounded to-day, yet he repeats them and calls in question the name of a great man, and says that he held his head down in solemn silence and that he would not raise his head because of shame. I tell the hon. gentleman that that is not a worthy thing to say, and I venture to say that the hon. gentleman could, with as much propriety, or manliness, say that there has not been a word said in favour of or against this Bill during this whole debate. There would be equally as much consistency in one statement as in the other.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am able to look you in the eye.

Mr. CLANCY. I can tell the hon. gentleman that he has repeated here a statement—I wish to be perfectly parliamentary—but I will say that it is utterly destitute of a single element of that necessary inredient which would characterize it as having the slightest mark of truth in it. The hon. gentleman says that no one was injured. I would like to know why he goes to Bruce if there is no one injured. He goes to Bruce because he hopes to injure the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). It is not a matter of county boundaries at all with him; he will pass that over. I do not know but that the hon. gentleman will even undertake that, because there is nothing too great for the hon. gentleman to undertake in the way of making a statement. He seems to have become beside himself, and not to be strictly responsible for all he says. But the object of the Bill is not to help the Conservatives; the object is to injure them, and I will point to one instance, and that is the case of the hon. member for North Bruce. The hon. gentleman who presides over the Department of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) with great dignity, an hon. gentleman that I have learned to have more than ordinary respect for, he complains that he was legislated out of Huron. Now, I do not claim that the framer of this Bill or the Government is bound to take into consideration how it affects any individual member, myself or anybody else. I do not put it on so narrow a ground, and I do not believe that the promoters of the Bill of 1882 intended to legislate the hon. gentleman out of this Parliament. But may not the explanation be that the electors of Centre Huron wanted one of their own people to represent them. I think I have heard that, and I think it is not very far from the mark. I do not believe that they could get anywhere a gentleman who would so well represent them, but they wanted one of their own, and so the Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) was forced to go to one of those happy places where there was a Grit hive. What would the hon. gentleman do if he had not some Grit hives to fall back on? The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) walls in this House because the Bill of 1882 took a village out of his county, but that might happen under any Redistribution Bill. I repeat that it remains for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) and his friends to make out a single case where a Liberal member lost his seat in any of the group of forty-eight ridings now under consideration, as the result of the legislation of 1882. Hon. gentlemen opposite may talk as much as they like about this township and that township being changed, but their talk is all idle unless they can point out that a Liberal member was injured by the change that was made. They have failed to do that and they are utterly unable to do it.

Mr. WM. McCLEARY (Welland). I have a question to propound to the Ministers about this Bill, and I should like an answer to it. This Bill appears before the House in the name of the Postmaster General (Mr.

Mulock) and I am glad the Government have been able to find within their ranks a gentleman so well qualified to take charge of such a measure as this. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), however, seems to do most of the talking, and probably he will be able to give me the information I am looking for. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) said in the early part of his remarks that this Bill was based upon absolute justice, that it was intended to remove a great wrong that had been perpetrated upon the Liberal party. If he will look at subsection (b) of this Bill, he will find that the county I have the honour to represent is among the list of the gerrymandered constituencies. The old county of Welland, one of the oldest if not the oldest counties in the province of Ontario, one of the first settled counties in the Dominion of Canada, has ever since confederation, both in the provincial and federal elections, had the same electoral boundaries. For more than thirty-two years the people of Welland have been voting within the same boundaries of their riding, and it has never been touched by gerrymander or fixed up to suit party purposes, until now. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) has in this Bill added on to Welland, two large municipalities that were never connected with it for electoral purposes since confederation, and he and his friends have done that in order, if possible, to drive its Conservative representative out of Parliament, and to elect a Liberal follower of theirs in his place. They take from Lincoln county, the township of Pelham with a Liberal majority of from 250 to 300, and sometimes more, and they place that in Welland. They take the township of Wainfleet which in the last local election the Liberals carried by a majority of one, and they also put that in Welland county. By placing Pelham in Welland, they try to make Welland a Liberal hive, and secure a seat for one of their own friends. I trust the Minister of Customs will not leave the Chamber, because he is the man who has been talking about the absolute justice of this Bill, and I want to show him the small amount of justice he is giving to Welland. Now, according to the last census, Welland had a population of 25,000, and if the census were taken to-day it would be nearly 30,000, and will the Minister (Mr. Paterson) tell me where is the absolute justice in adding 6,000 population to that county, and giving it only one member? Can the hon. gentleman point out the first mark of justice in interfering with a county that has existed on present lines since confederation, and in fixing up the population of that county until it is nearly as great as the county of Brant to which he gives two members? What justice is there there? If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) was standing by county boundaries, all through the province, there might be a shadow of an excuse for that, but it would only be a shadow.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We stand by county boundaries in this Bill, do we not?

Mr. McCLEARY. And this Bill is to suit the nefarious purpose of the men who are trying to legislate Conservatives out of Parliament. It is not intended to render justice. The Minister of Customs falls back upon this Bill for an answer, but if he is going to maintain county boundaries why does he not maintain them throughout all Ontario. The county of Welland has a population that is growing year by year. When the census was taken, the population of that county was over 25,000, and with the townships of Pelham and Wainfleet added, we shall have 6,000 more. Where, I ask, will the hon. gentleman find one single spark of justice in the treatment of that county? On the contrary, is it not a low, mean thing to try to strike down a political opponent by the action contemplated in this Bill? I would like to ask what vindication there can be of this attempt to place the Conservative party in the county of Welland under this yoke of trying to overcome the adverse majority of 300 which will be added to it by this Bill.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman seems to speak as if Welland were a lost county to him by being put again within its municipal bounds. If that is so, I assure him I did not know it. That county is dealt with in the same way as other counties in this Bill: it is put within its municipal bounds, which is the proper thing to do. What the political effects of that will be, I cannot tell. If there be the iniquity in it which the hon. gentleman says there is, but which I do not admit, then the hon. gentleman can take this comfort, that he will not be damaged thereby, if his experience is the same as mine; for when the iniquity was done to me in 1882 of making a county that was safe Reform, into a Conservative county, there were enough respectable Conservatives in that county to give me a majority; and if there be the iniquity in this Bill which the hon. gentleman talks about, he need not be afraid. But Welland has been treated just the same as the other counties, and I can honestly tell the hon. gentleman that what he has just said is the first intimation of how the county might go politically.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). I am sure the Minister of Customs did not mean that the committee should infer, from his closing expressions, that this Bill had restored the county boundaries throughout the province of Ontario. Is it not the height of folly, in view of the facts, for hon. gentlemen opposite to iterate and reiterate that the leading principle of this Bill is, that it restores the county boundaries in the province of Ontario? An examination of the Bill itself will demonstrate that there is not a particle of truth in that statement, and I am sure that no political capital can be made by the repetition by hon. gentlemen opposite of a stale falsehood. The county boundaries in eastern Ontario have not been touched by this Bill. The county boundaries east of the county of Ontario have been allowed to remain as they were under the Acts of 1882 and 1892; and why will the hon. Minister of Customs and other hon. gentlemen opposite persist in saying that they have restored the old county boundary lines? They have only done so, as has been pointed out again and again, where a political advantage was hoped to be gained by the change. In the eastern part of this province, which they have declared over and over again was over-represented, they have not made a change, and the reason is obvious. They have recently, since 1896, made a substantial gain in that part of the province, and, following the old adage, they have decided to leave well enough alone. Hon. gentlemen have asked what counties have not had their boundaries restored. There are the counties of Russell, Carleton, Lanark, Frontenac, Addington, Renfrew, Peterborough, Grenville, Leeds. Every one of these counties were altered by previous Acts, and they have not had their municipal boundaries restored. They were conveniently overlooked, because that would best serve the party interests. This Bill is fearfully and wonderfully constructed. I was almost persuaded by the force of the remarks of the hon. Minister of Customs that justice was done by the Bill to the city of Toronto, but unfortunately the facts and figures are against him. The hon. gentleman mentioned the counties of Wentworth, Brant and Norfolk. If I took the figures of the hon. gentleman correctly, he said that the county of Wentworth had a population of 28,142, the county of Norfolk a population of 31,778, and the county of Brant a population of 33,217—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is not right.

Mr. CLARKE. These are the figures of the returns by the Clerk of the legislative assembly of Ontario of the elections of 1898.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is not what is before the judges. They are to take the Dominion census.

Mr. CLARKE. These figures are taken from the Dominion census. To give an idea of the justice meted out to the constituencies by this Bill, I may state that the total population of these three counties, if my figures are correct, amounts to 93,137 souls, who are to be represented by five members in this House, while the city of Toronto, with a population more than double the population of these three counties, is only to be represented by five members in this House. Surely, when the Government knew of the existing condition of things with regard to the city of Toronto, they should have been actuated by a desire to do that city scant justice. If they had given us even cold justice, they would have accorded us a larger representation. But that was farthest from their thoughts. The county in which the hon. Minister of Customs resides, and which he represented, has a population of 33,217, according to my figures, and about 36,000, according to the Minister's figures; and in that county a member represents 16,600 people, while the adjoining county of Wentworth, with 28,142 people, is only to have one representative. Upon what principle of justice or fair-play are the people of Brant, numbering 33,000 souls, to have two representatives in this House, while the adjoining county of Wentworth, aggregating 28,000 souls, is only to have one representative? What is there, after all, in this idea of adhering so closely to municipal or county boundaries, when, as a result of adherence to that principle, such gross inequalities of representation are perpetrated? If the hon. gentleman refers to the old redistribution law, he will ascertain that the unit of population in the various counties was much more in accord with the general unit for the province than is the case under this Bill. By what right can he say that two members should be given to the county of Norfolk, with 31,000 population, while the city of Toronto is given only one member for each 36,000; or by what reason can he say that Brant is given two representatives for 33,000 souls, while the adjoining county of Wentworth is given only one representative for 28,000, and the great district of Algoma, a province in itself, which ought to have representation at least according to the unit of representation for the province, has only one representative for over 40,000 souls? These inequalities are permitted in this Bill, notwithstanding the fact, which I have pointed out, that one of the principal complaints which hon. gentlemen made in reference to the Redistribution Bill of 1892 was, that the eastern section of this province was over-represented. Now, let me draw attention to what my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who, I regret, is not in his seat, had to say with respect to this question of representation by population. He said:

The hon. member for Simcoe advocated that Toronto should have its full share of representation. I do not for a moment challenge that statement. I think it is quite right that it should.

My hon. friend from North Wellington was referring to the late member for Simcoe, Mr. Dalton McCarthy.

It is utterly futile to grant people the exercise of the franchise if you do not, at the same time, grant them the right to the full exercise of that franchise, so they will be properly represented in this House. There is no justification for giving one man in one constituency two and a half or three times as much voting power as you give another man in another constituency. For instance, take the riding of East Simcoe, where you have a population of 35,000, and then take the riding of Frontenac, with a population of something like 13,000. The man who exercises the franchise in Frontenac has virtually two and a half times the voting power of the man who votes in East Simcoe. The less the population in a riding, the greater power has each voter in sending men here. That is unjust. I cannot understand on what principle ridings far below the unit should have the same franchise as those whose population is far above it.

Then, to clinch that argument and condemn the Government of the day for not doing justice by equalizing the populations represented in this House from the various constituencies of the province, he quoted from a letter of the late Right Hon. John Bright to a friend :

The franchise itself gives no real power unless accompanied by the right on the part of all the possessors of it to elect something like an equal number of representatives. I could easily frame a Bill which would give universal suffrage in its widest sense, and which would affirm more strongly than ever the supremacy of the English oligarchy over the English people. If your great city, with its great constituency, is only to send two men to Parliament, while an equal population and property in some other part of the Kingdom is to send twenty men to Parliament, then I say your franchise is of little avail.

Then, the hon. member for North Wellington concluded as follows :—

Now, I hold that if we are to place the entire electorate of this Dominion on an equal footing—and that should be the intention of the Bill—the constituencies should be readjusted so as to give, as nearly as possible, the same number of electors to each constituency.

Hon. gentlemen when in Opposition approved of those views. Why do they not now, when the opportunity is offered by the introduction of this Bill, give effect to the views they then believed to be sound and give us representation according to population? It must be patent to the people of this country that this measure of redistribution, affecting only one-half of the counties of Ontario, and those the counties that are under-represented, as compared with the counties of eastern Ontario, is so framed because hon. gentlemen hope to gain party advantage out of the western counties; whereas they know, from the experience of their friends in the local elections of March, 1898, that they have nothing to hope for from a restoration of the old county boundaries in the eastern part of the province. That is the reason they have abandoned their principles with regard to the redistribution of the counties in eastern Ontario. It is because, judging by the elections of members to the legislative assembly, which took place in March, 1898, they have nothing to hope from a readjustment of the county bounds in the eastern part of the province.

Let me go back to the representation of the city of Toronto and the county of York.

The population of the county of York, as represented at present, is 97,289. The ridings are made up as follows :—

East riding	35,148
North riding (represented by the hon. Postmaster General).....	20,284
West riding	41,857
Total.....	97,289

The desire to restore county boundaries prompted hon. gentlemen opposite to take from this population of 97,289, nearly 35,000 souls and add them to the city of Toronto. The unit of representation in the county of York is one for every 32,500 now, and while they have reduced the population by nearly 35,000, they still send three members from the county of York to this House. Why? Because they hope, by talking about half of the population from East York and more than one-half from West York, party advantage will be gained. But it does them no credit; their intention is not a laudable one, and I hope they will gain no political advantage. If it were a fair and wise thing to reduce the unit of population in the county of York from 32,000 to 21,000, might we not, in all honesty and fair play, ask the hon. Minister and those associated with him, to give us reasonable representation in the city of Toronto according to population? What right have hon. gentlemen opposite to ask us to give them credit for an additional representative to the city of Toronto, when they have added 36,000 to the population? Under the present Bill, taking the wards of Toronto represented now in this House, there is a member for every 36,005. In the past there was a member for each 36,000. We have nothing, then, to thank the Government for under this arrangement. In the redistribution of the constituencies we had a right to expect that when other constituencies in Ontario had their unit of representation fixed at one member for 23,000, simple justice would have been done to Toronto, and it would have been given at least two or three additional members.

I have looked over the provisions of this Bill carefully, and there is nothing to be found in it, from one corner to the other, in my humble judgment, except the desire, which permeates every line, to gain political advantage. They will not be successful in their object. Their object will be defeated by the electorate when an opportunity is given the electorate to express their opinion on this measure.

Mr. D. D. ROGERS (Frontenac). I was unavoidably absent yesterday, to my great regret, when the debate on the second reading of this measure took place, and the vote was recorded. I did intend to say something when the discussion was going on, had I been here, but I would not now say anything, if it were not for the continued references to the system of gerrymandering or hiving constituencies in the past. How is it you never hear any reference to this gerrymandering or hiving with regard to the cities? I claim that it is an insult to our agricultural population to say that such a township is a Grit hive and such another one a Conservative hive. It amounts to saying that the electors in those constituencies have no intelligence of their own. Any public speaker who would address an agricultural audience along that line ought to have his expressions of opinion resented in the strongest language. The rural constituencies may have been run on that line some years ago, but that day has passed; and when political men come before these constituencies now, they have to give a reason for the faith that is in them, and show that they know they are addressing men of intelligence, capable of forming an independent judgment of their own. They need no longer indulge in the old played-out shibboleths, as for instance: I am proud to come before the independent electors of this county, the bone and sinew of the country, whose fathers were Conservatives in the past, and who, no doubt, will follow in the footsteps of their forefathers. In fact, one would imagine that the electors in these constituencies never think or judge for themselves at all. That this style of thing is quickly dying out is due a great deal to the Patron movement that was started in 1891. The plank in the Patron platform dealing with this matter is:

Conformity of electoral districts to county boundaries as constituted for municipal purposes, as far as the principles of representation by population will allow.

The fact that that was in the platform is sufficient to show that there was a grievance to be remedied. It was felt all through the country that a grievous wrong existed. I never heard the matter talked over in a Patron lodge or on a public platform. It was taken as a matter of course that there was a wrong and Grits and Tories alike wished to see that wrong set right.

A great deal has been said about the cities not being fairly represented in this House. For my part, I feel that they have had more than their share of representation. I feel, and I am confident that the people in the rural districts generally agree with me, that the cities have run this country in times past, while the rural constituencies have very little to say. The cities have their boards of trade, their manufacturers' associations, their bankers' associations, their loan companies' associations, their labour unions—and the voices of all these have been unanimous in anything affecting the interest of the city, for there is no politics in a board of trade, a manufacturers' association or any of these others. Whatever is in the interest of the city is maintained by them all. It has been ably shown by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) that the cities also have the press which is at the beck and call of these various associations and voices their sentiments and wishes, giving them a means of expressing themselves which the rural districts cannot have. Another fact which makes the representation unfair to the independent agricultural class is our system of almost universal suffrage—and I never believed in universal suffrage, much less in this iniquitous registration system that has been established in the cities in Ontario. I do not speak from the Conservative stand-point only. I have heard not only Conservatives criticise this system, but I have heard Reformers also declare themselves against it and say it should be done away with. One representative of a city told me that the effect of the registration system was that they had to pay the men to register and then buy their votes after they had registered. Is it fair that the votes of such a class should be of equal weight with those of an equal number of members of the agricultural class, men having from $10,000 to $20,000 made by their own labour and saved by their own economy? And should the city to-day with so large a proportion of this class of voters have an equal representation in Parliament with the agricultural class? It is not fair or just. I think the cities are exceptionally well represented, in fact, they are doubly represented. Two members ought to be enough for the city of Toronto, with all its other means of forming and expressing public sentiment—its many associations and its great press. But Toronto gets five members. Many to whom I have spoken have criticised the Bill on the ground that too much representation is being given to Toronto. I have been told that the city of Toronto has six or eight residents who are members of this House and four who are Senators. These gentlemen, even those of them who represent agricultural constituencies, may be expected to speak for the city for they cannot have the same interest in or the same fellow-feeling for the farmers as if they lived amongst them. Objection has been taken to arranging our representation on the basis of the census of 1891, on the ground that there have been great changes in population since that time. I am very sorry to say that the change that has taken place is that the rural constituencies are not so populous as they were, while the city population has grown. It is worthy of reflection that under the great system of protection of which we have heard so much, the cities have grown and the country has gone down. I feel perfectly justified in supporting a Bill which proposes to rearrange the constituencies so as to maintain the county boundaries, and I only regret that I was not here last night to record my vote along that line. But enough has not been done in recognizing the rights of the rural constituencies to representation. I believe that before the rearrangement which will take place after the next census public sentiment will have so strongly expressed itself that in the Re-distribution Bill of 1902 fairer representation will be given to the rural constituencies.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). Last night my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) brought forward what struck me, in view of the circumstances, as a strange argument. He was dealing with the argument that it was inexpedient to set an example of tearing up the constituencies at the will of the party in power, that if that were done, as in this case, at a time different from the time it had generally been considered proper, that is after taking the decennial census, there was danger that this would be considered a precedent for such actions, and he said: We must leave that to the conscience of the people and of the people's representatives; we may feel perfectly safe in doing so, because, unless a great emergency arises, no party would be guilty of such an iniquity. Well, I just wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this very thing which my hon. friend said could not be done is being done at this moment. It has been established without a shadow of contradiction so far as I heard, that, at the present moment, whatever may have been the case in 1882, the Liberal party are not suffering from any disability in regard to representation. On the contrary, they are to-day in a majority in this House although they have a minority of the popular vote. So the very thing is being done at this moment which my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) said it was impossible to suppose that any party or Government would do. The argument has been unanswered that we are establishing a dangerous and mischievous precedent if this becomes law. I wish to make a remark with regard to the character of this Bill itself. My hon. friends on the other side of the House object to giving city populations as great a representation as rural populations, and my hon. friend the Minister of Customs is one of the hon. gentlemen who is in charge of this measure and who is specially responsible for it. I must consider that he is so, for two reasons: First, because he is one of the Ministers representing the province that is dealt with, and, secondly, because he has been, perhaps, the principal spokesman. Now, the hon. gentleman himself, when this Bill becomes law, will live in a constituency having a population of somewhere about 16,000 souls, perhaps a little more, speaking of the white population who are entitled to vote. Now, will the hon. gentleman tell me what the population of the city of Brantford is?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The census of 1891 showed 12,000, it is a great deal more now.

Mr. McNEILL. Then, my hon. friend is going to give a representative to that number, including that large urban population, while to Algoma, containing 40,000 of a rural population—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 33,000, by the census.

Mr. McNEILL. The population has increased enormously in Algoma; I think it is at least 40,000.

Mr. CLARKE. Nearer 50,000 now.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to know how my hon. friend reconciles that with the principle he has laid down in reference to urban and rural constituencies. In the constituency which he will represent, he is allowing one urban voter to count for as much as two and a half voters in a rural constituency. Now, if there be any constituency in the province of Ontario which ought to have two representatives it is Algoma. It is very difficult for any one member of this House to represent so great a district as that. But my hon. friend gives to his own county, which contains a population of 33,000, including a large urban constituency, two members, and he refuses to give more than one to Algoma. I wonder if any one can say that is consistent with the principle he has laid down.

Now, I want to ask my hon. friend how it is, under the principle of this Bill, that he interferes with the county of Bruce? I am not asking that the county of Bruce should not be dealt with; let there be no misapprehension about that. My hon. friend from Halifax referred to me yesterday as having made my valedictory address in this House. I can assure my hon. friends opposite that there was nothing of that nature in the address. I think that the action of the hon. gentlemen in regard to the county of Bruce has very much strengthened me in that county, because the people will understand that the hon. gentlemen opposite have gone deliberately out of their way to strike at me in that county. They profess that they are only dealing with counties whose constituencies are not contained within county boundaries; this is a county in which all the constituencies are contained within county boundaries, and yet they are dealing with it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We are doing it because the riding was gerrymandered in 1882.

Mr. McNEILL. There were other counties gerrymandered in 1882 which they have not dealt with. But they say that the principle upon which they are going is the restoration of county boundaries, and that the reason why they are dealing with these counties is to restore county boundaries. But they include Bruce, which is the only county altogether within county boundaries included in this Bill. As I say, I do not ask the hon. gentlemen at all to make any change, let it go as it is. For my part, I should be very glad to have three independent men go there and say whether it is fairly divided. Now, my hon. friend says they are dealing with the county of Bruce because it was gerrymandered in 1882. I dealt with that question last night, and showed that it was not gerrymandered in 1882. I showed that the division under that Act of 1882 was a just and a right one. My hon. friend says that in 1882 there was a distribution of the population made that was not an equitable one. What is the situation of to-day? The situation is that in 1892, by the natural course of events, that unequal distribution which he complains of, was remedied, and, therefore, the only gerrymander, if it can be so called, of which he complains, was remedied in 1892. Then why does he interfere with the county of Bruce? There is no allegation, there can be no allegation, that anything was done in 1882 with the county of Bruce that could be described as unfair, except that the township of Saugeen was placed in the west riding instead of being left in the north riding.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Was not that unfair?

Mr. McNEILL. That is the only thing that can be alleged as being unfair, and the only reason it is alleged to be unfair is that the distribution of population was not equal at that time. That distribution of population is equal now; in fact, the north riding of Bruce is more populous than either of the other ridings now, therefore, that injustice has been remedied by the natural course of events. If any evidence is required to show how utterly indefensible this Bill is it is found by a reference to what has taken place in Bruce where this injustice that they complain of has already been remedied. I wish to say one word more with regard to placing Saugeen in the west riding of Bruce, and to this point I wish to direct the attention of my right hon. friend. What I wish to call my hon. friend's attention to is this, that he will find, that the placing of the township of Saugeen in the west riding was geographically the proper course to pursue. The lake townships were left in the west; the eastern townships were left in the east, and the northern townships were left in the north; so that a natural division was made. Saugeen is the last of the lake townships which is south of the peninsula of Bruce, and it naturally fell into the west riding on that account. Therefore, there is no possibility of alleging any kind of impropriety, unless it was the impropriety of making the population of the north riding smaller than the population of the west riding. The reason alleged at that time, and I think it was a sound and justifiable reason, was, that the north riding was known to consist largely of unsettled lands, which were rapidly filling up, and it was known to everybody that if the population was left for the moment equal, at the very next redistribution which occurred there must be another tearing up in Bruce. Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) can explain to the House why it is, under these circumstances, that the county of Bruce, whose constituencies are wholly within county lines, has been included in this Bill?

Mr. McNEILL.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I do not want to take up the time of the committee. It is only out of courtesy to the members of the committee, and, I may say, to the hon. member for North Bruce, who always speaks in a courteous manner, that I offer these observations. If that hon. gentleman is under the impression that, in what was done, there was any design that he was struck at personally, I think he may divest himself of that. The committee will remember that the hon. gentleman alluded to an argument of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), to the effect that Bills of this kind should only be introduced when there was urgent need, and he thinks that there is no urgent need now. There is urgent need for this Bill. I think, if the hon. gentleman will recall the past, he will admit that. Could there be any more urgent request for the passage of a Bill of this kind than when the people at the polls have expressly voted upon that question. That was one of the questions, and a leading question, and when the party that had professed to stand upon a platform in which one of the principal planks was the introduction of a Bill like this, when that party succeeded in carrying the country and are in the House, the Ministry and the members of that party are bound to introduce that Bill. There is a mandate from the people: we have been sent here expressly, amongst other things, by the people, to introduce this Bill. If we failed to introduce this Bill, we should be liable to the charge that hon. gentlemen, without justification, have hurled at us, that we have broken our pledges. But when we have introduced this Bill and implemented this pledge, they try to prevent us from carrying it out. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) must admit the urgency of this measure, when the people of Canada, and notably the people of Ontario, say that one of the cardinal planks in the platform of the Liberal party is the introduction of a Bill looking to the repeal of the evil that was done in 1882. Being sent here for the purpose, this Bill is introduced, and that portion of the county of Bruce for which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) sits, being one of the worst gerrymandered counties under the Act of 1882, comes under the operation of this measure. As the right hon. Prime Minister says, without going all over the country and attempting to do everything, we are rectifying the grosser abuses in obedience to the mandate of the people, and Bruce has come in under this head. The hon. gentleman has referred to me as the hon. member for Brant. Of course, he knows that there was an unfortunate slip, and that I am not the member for that riding now, which I represented for so many years.

Mr. McNEILL. I apologize to my hon. friend.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It was only a slip. I can hardly say that I was defeated, because, if so, the gentleman who defeated me would be in possession of the seat, but I see that there is a good Liberal sitting for Brant. Therefore, I could not say that the seat was lost, although meanwhile it does not fall to myself. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) made the point that there was no mandate because I was rejected by the people. Did they reject me for a Conservative? If a Conservative had carried the riding, he would be sitting here for that riding now.

Mr. BERGERON. The machine was at work since.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. For him?

Mr. BERGERON. Against him.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The courts cannot take away a seat from the representative to whom it belongs. If the people pronounced for a Conservative, where is he? He is not here. The hon. gentleman who was elected by hundreds of a majority to represent that county, stands by this plank. I am here from another county, and I stood upon the same platform. Therefore, although there was a little slip there, the fact that I am here for another county shows that the people want this measure. The urgent mandate of the people cannot be disregarded; it has no right to be disregarded. We have received a mandate to repeal the gerrymander of 1882, and one of the worst features of that gerrymander was in the county of Bruce. One of the amendments that was moved and that was voted down in dumb silence, had reference to the county of Bruce. Mr. Gillies, one of the members for Bruce, which county gave over 600 of a Liberal majority, if I remember aright, until that Bill was passed, moved in amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be resolved, that the county of Bruce comprises a population of 64,774 souls, or an average for three ridings of 21,591.

That the said Bill detaches from the north riding of Bruce so large a population as to reduce North Bruce to 18,645, giving West Bruce 24,218, and South Bruce 22,355.

That the said Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the boundaries of the proposed three ridings of Bruce.

You can see how they violated the principle that he said was a sacred principle, and when the hon. member moved that and expected that he might get an answer, not a soul answered him. But what was the political effect of it at the time, as described by the gentleman himself. If that township of Saugeen, in which was the village of Port Elgin, had been placed in the north riding of Bruce, then the north riding and the west riding of Bruce would have been nearly equal in population; and if they did not put the township of Saugeen and Port Elgin into North Bruce instead of West Bruce, which would have nearly equalized the population, John Gillies would have to start in the political race with 160 Conservative majority against him. You would think that was tying a man's hands enough, but in spite of all fairness and all decency—I am not accusing the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill), for he was not in the House—they took this township of Saugeen, with 200 or 300 Liberal majority, out of North Bruce, and they put it into West Bruce, that was already a Liberal hive, so that it gave a Liberal majority of 1,100, I think. Mr. Gillies himself moved against that in the House, but it was voted down in silence. In face of that, we having received a mandate from the people that we should rectify these evils, I ask my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) how could we pass the county of Bruce. I think it is possible that in the course of time, in 1901, circumstances may have changed with reference to the population, and I am not prepared to say how the question will look after the census of 1901, as to the contiguity of the townships and the other matters that no doubt fair-minded judges will take into consideration. I will not acknowledge or deny the statement of hon. gentlemen that they are fair divisions now. But, I say, that if as at present constituted, they are fair boundaries with reference to population and contiguity, fair-minded judges will so decide, and no harm will be done. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) say that he has no fear that the judges will make other than fair and equitable divisions.

Mr. McNEILL. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That being the case, there is no grievance there. I pointed out to the hon. gentleman that the urgency of this Bill is that the people of the country returned the Government to power to pass it, and I say that in this branch of the legislature—and in the Parliament of Canada, too—it is our bounden duty to give effect to the will of the people. If at any time the will of the people changes, and they should return gentlemen opposite to power, to repeal this law, or any other that affects the representation of the people in this House, it will be the bounden duty of these gentlemen to do it provided it is in the constitution. I tell these gentlemen further, that if they introduce such a Bill as we have introduced this Bill, and if they determine that the divisions within county limits shall be fixed by three judges of the Superior Court, they will not find any Liberal in the Dominion of Canada to object to it.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Gentlemen opposite seem inclined to ask me questions in reference to this Bill, and in all courtesy I desire to answer them. They apparently think I had something particular to do with it, but the fact is I had very little to do with it. They seem to fasten on the point that Brant is getting two members, that Brant is Liberal, and they forget that there is another gentleman representing Brant more ably than I could, for I am not representing it now, and have no personal object in the Bill. Brant is a Liberal County, and if there be such a majority of Liberals that you cannot divide Brant in any shape which will not give two Liberal members, why should not the people of Brant send to this House the men they want? What injustice can there be in that? I grant you there is an inequality of population, but there is an inequality of population in this Bill we are now repealing, and in a greater degree than there is between Brant and one of the Torontos, which has been instanced. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) himself told us that in the Postmaster General's constituency the population was 20,000, and that the population of West York was 41,000. With this additional representation given to Toronto each member would represent about 36,000 with the added population.

Mr. WALLACE. According to the last estimate, 47,000.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Not with five members. 181,000 divided by five would be 36,000. The amendment before the Chair is to give five members. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) can see that this is approaching the equality which he wants. Let me see the position which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) takes as representing Toronto. Hamilton is the county town of Wentworth, so to speak, and the interests of the people of Wentworth are in Hamilton. Toronto is the centre of York County, and the farmers of York trade there and the public buildings are there, and their interests, the hon. gentleman admits, are identified in a large measure with Toronto. At the present time, under the existing law, which we are seeking to repeal, the city of Toronto, with the county of York—and he admits they are closely identified together—has seven members, and we have now on the Table an amendment that proposes to give these constituencies eight members. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) is voting against it, and if not voting against it, he is not supporting it. To be consistent the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) ought to hail this Bill with pleasure. For him to endeavour to destroy this Bill is to destroy our attempt to give the city of Toronto and the county of York one more member than they have at the present time. If the hon. gentleman defeats this Bill, he takes the position that he thinks the city of Toronto and the county of York are over-represented. I leave it with him to determine that point, but I point out to him that, at all events, we are seeking to do justice as far as the city of Toronto and the county of York are concerned.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. CLARKE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) has put words in my mouth which I did not use when he said that I declared that the interests of the city of Toronto and the county of York are identical. But be that as it may, I am prepared to accept the statement. He charges me with not doing my duty to the city of Toronto, because I am objecting to this Bill. I am objecting to this Bill, Mr. Chairman, not because it gives Toronto an additional representative, but because it does not give Toronto the representation it is entitled to. That is the reason I am objecting to it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We are giving one more member.

Mr. BERGERON. And you are putting in 45,000 more population.

Mr. CLARKE. The statement of the Minister (Mr. Paterson) will not be accepted by any hon. member on either side of the House who looks into the situation. The population of the county of York as at present represented in this House is 97,000, and the population of Toronto as at present represented is about 145,000. The hon. gentleman, who says that the interests of the city and county are identical, is taking 35,000 from the population of the county of York, reducing it to 62,000, and while he continues to give the county a member for each 21,000 of population, he has the hardihood to say that it is fair that that city should have only one representative for 36,000. If he believes that the interests of the city and county are identical, why does he not give the same measure of representation to the city as to the county? He has reduced the unit of representation of that part of the city and county represented by the three Yorks from 32,000 to 21,000, while he has not reduced the unit of representation of the city of Toronto by one; and yet he claims that this measure is doing justice to the city of Toronto and the county of York at the same time. It cannot be doing justice to both, because there is such an inequality in the representation of these two parts, which the hon. gentleman admits are practically one constituency. If he desires to do justice to the city of Toronto, surely we might ask him to give us eight representatives instead of five. Then he would be giving the same unit of representation to the city of Toronto as to the county of York.

An hon. MEMBER. Take it all.

Mr. CLARKE. We are only asking for representation by population, and if we do not, we shall be judged by our constituents when an opportunity is given to them of expressing an opinion on our conduct. How can the hon. Minister of Customs stand up in this House and justify giving to his own city of Brantford a representative for 18,000 souls, and say that he is doing justice by giving the city of Toronto a representative for 36,000? I do not object to the city of Brantford, or the cities of Ottawa, Kingston or Hamilton being represented as they are in this House; but hon. gentlemen opposite cannot expect to be supported in the city of Toronto if they persist in singling that city out and dealing with it as unjustly as they are doing under this Bill. Would there be any injustice, when they were reducing the population of the county of York by nearly 40,000, if at the same time they reduced the representation of that county by one member, or from three to two? With its present population of 97,000 and three members, its unit of population is about 32,000, and when the county is gerrymandered as proposed, its population will be reduced to 62,000, so that with two representatives its unit of population would be 31,000? But the reason why that county is still being given three representatives for a population of 62,000, is that hon. gentlemen hope to defeat the members for East York and West York (Mr. Maclean and Mr. Wallace); whereas if they gave the county of York two representatives instead of three, both seats would undoubtedly go to the Opposition. The hon. gentlemen are not doing the city of Toronto any favour by giving it five members, for they are leaving the unit of representation practically as it is now—at 36,000. The hon. gentleman is not stating the case fairly by saying that the Government are doing us justice. If they are doing us justice, they are doing the county of York more than justice; and in objecting to this clause of the Bill and asking for additional representation for the city of Toronto under these circumstances, we are only doing our duty as representatives of the people of that city.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) a moment ago made a special appeal to me. He wanted to know what was the reason why the county of Bruce was introduced into this Bill, since its county boundaries had not been interfered with by the Act which we are proposing to amend. The inquiry is a fair one, and my hon. friend is entitled to an answer. We are proposing in this Bill to affirm the principle of county boundaries; but that is not the only principle we are proposing to affirm. We also propose to affirm the principle that when a county is so large that it must be divided, the division shall be made by judicial authority and not by the whim or fancy or selfish interest of interested parties. The Representation Act of 1882, so far as the county of Bruce was concerned, did not violate the principle of county boundaries; but it violated the other principle by dividing the county in an unfair manner. My hon. friend admitted that himself.

Mr. McNEILL. Oh, no.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, I think he said that taking away the township of Saugeen was unfair.

Mr. McNEILL. Will my right hon. friend pardon me? I did not state that. What I endeavoured to express to my right hon. friend was this, that it was fair to argue that the township of Saugeen might have been left in the north riding of Bruce at that time, because by leaving it there it would have better equalized the population at the moment; but I said I thought it was perfectly fair to place that township in the west riding for two reasons: first, because it belonged to the west riding geographically, and, secondly, although at the moment it might cause an inequality of population, yet every one knew that the north riding was increasing in population so rapidly that unless the township of Saugeen were placed in the north riding, at the very next census there must be another interference with boundaries in the county of Bruce, and I thought those two reasons were a sufficient justification for what had been done.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not think there is much correction in the statement I made, because my hon. friend says it might have been fair to argue that the township of Saugeen might have been left in the north riding, and that it was unfair to put the township in the west riding. But my hon. friend says that Providence has corrected that iniquity by increasing the population of the north riding. It may be that Providence has done it; but it would not be quite right or prudent to rely on Providence to correct the iniquities of hon. gentlemen opposite. Although it may be presumption to say that we help Providence in this matter, still it might be as well not to rely on Providence in that respect, but to try to correct by legislation the state of things which my hon. friend says might be held from one point of view to be unfair. I can only re-echo what was said by the Minister of Customs. With regard to my hon. friend himself, there is no intention at all to reach him or anybody else by this Bill. If the county of Bruce is to be represented by a Tory, and the hon. gentleman told us it was sure to be, I confess candidly I would rather have my hon. friend represent it than any other Tory I know of. I do not know that I would say the same of my hon. friend from West York, but although he is the Toryist of the Tories, if there is to be a Tory in this House from that constituency, I do not know but that I would just as soon have him as anybody else. The object we have in view is not to strike at anybody, but to follow out a principle which we think ought to be observed, not only on this but on all future occasions.

Coming to the statement of the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Clarke), that the Government cannot expect any gratitude from that city on account of this Bill, because we are doing justice to Toronto, I might retort by a similar compliment. He told us that we have left Toronto practically as it is. Well, in that case hon. gentlemen opposite did not do justice to Toronto by their gerrymander Act. Yet, that did not prevent the city of Toronto from electing my hon. friend who is a Conservative. Therefore, if we do not do any better than our predecessors, we do not expect Toronto to treat us any more unfairly than it did the late Government, which likewise failed in doing it justice, according to the hon. gentleman. Up to 1883, the city of Toronto was represented by three members. In 1892 it was given four members. According to the position taken by the hon. member for Toronto, the representation given that city by the Act of 1892 was altogether inadequate. At present, we treat it just as it was treated in 1892. I have repeated again and again that we cannot undertake to cure all the evils that were perpetrated by the Act of 1892, but I will not put the case upon that ground. I must say, candidly and fairly, to my hon. friend, that I still adhere to the view that we cannot, under present circumstances, give the same representation, according to population, to urban as to rural constituencies. If we were to do that, we would have in this country of sparse population, counties which would be equal in extent to kingdoms or empires. If we were to give eight or nine members to Toronto, we would have to add together three or four or five counties, already too large for the convenience of any man who has to represent them. We have to take into consideration the physical conditions of the country. If the hon. gentleman will apply his sense of justice to the case, he must agree with me that to Toronto and Montreal, and the other large centres of population, we must give a less representation, according to population, than to the immense tracts of country where the population is scarce. This seems to me a proposition my hon. friend cannot controvert. What do we do by this Bill? We take about 30,000 from West York, and put them in Toronto, and give Toronto an additional member. That is not an injustice. The 30,000 which we take from the county of West York, and which now elects my hon. friend from West York, will elect another member, and those left in York will continue, I suppose, to elect the hon. gentleman. Is there anything unfair or unjust in that? If we were free to give as many members to a province as we would wish, there would be something in my hon. friend's argument, but he knows that we are not. In the present condition, Ontario cannot have more or less than ninety-two members, and we must find places to put them in. Under the circumstances, I think, therefore, we have done what was possible to give satisfaction, though to give even-handed justice in a matter of this kind is absolutely impossible. I do not think we can do much in improving the Bill. Take what my hon. friend said with regard to Brant and Algoma. He says that we give two members to Brant and only one to Algoma. But if we give two to Algoma we can only give one to Brant, and which is the one that ought to have the two. There is only one argument which might militate in favour of giving two to Algoma, and that is, that it has an increasing population, and probably after the next census, Algoma will have to have two members, and some other constituency, perhaps Brant, will have to lose one. Bearing in mind this consideration, you cannot find any injustice in this measure, though you may find some fault.

Mr. McNEILL. I have to thank my right hon. friend for his courteous reply to the question I asked him. And I have to say to him that I am a little surprised at some of the remarks he has made, and especially one of them. My right hon. friend says that Providence stepped in on behalf of the north riding of Bruce and raised its population to the point at which it ought to be in order to equalize population. He admits that that has been done by Providence, but he says it does not do to leave the matter altogether in the hands of Providence. Now, Providence has done the work, and my right hon. friend seems to think he can do something better than Providence.

The PRIME MINISTER. Help thyself and Heaven will help thee.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend does not know the intention of Providence may be, but he admits that Providence has redressed the grievance. If it has, where is the grievance to-day? That is exactly the answer I made to the hon. member for Brant. He said that there had been an impropriety done, but that that grievance had been redressed. I denied that there had been an impropriety. I say that the course of events was exactly what we said it would be, and it proved that what we did was right and fair at the time. My hon. friend replied by reading the resolution of Mr. Gillies, asking that the township of Saugeen should be placed in the north riding. What answer was that to the contention I put forth? We all know perfectly well that at that time the Reform party contended that the township of Saugeen should be left in the north riding, but by repeating that contention, how did my hon. friend refute my argument? My argument is, that at the present moment there is no argument assignable for interfering with the county of Bruce. My right hon. friend, in the very courteous answer he made me, admitted as much, because he said that Providence had redressed the grievance. I do think, if he will forgive me for saying so, that he has not met the difficulty at all. The position is just as I put it and as the right hon. gentleman admits it to be—that this Bill is introduced to remedy a grievance in the county of Bruce, which grievance Providence has already redressed. I confess that that is beyond my comprehension, and would be glad if my hon. friend would explain. He said he had a mandate from the people to pass this measure, that his friends in the country had declared that they would enact a law of this kind. Does he say that he has a mandate to pass a measure of this kind eighteen months before the census?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Certainly. If the hon. gentleman asks me, I will tell him that every Liberal representative and every person who voted for the party understood that at the first opportunity after they got into power the Government would introduce this Bill. It is one of the planks of the platform.

Mr. McNEILL. No doubt, they understood that it would be introduced at the first opportunity, but by that they understood the first proper opportunity. But the hon. gentleman can hardly force an argument of that kind upon the committee unless he is prepared to show that he explained to the people what he meant by introducing the Bill at the first opportunity. No one had the right to suppose, and I do not think any one did suppose, he was going to violate every precedent set up in this country for thirty years, unless he expressly explained that that was his intention. The hon. gentleman says that the people are in favour of this Bill. Does the hon. gentlemen say that the people are in favour of a Bill which had never been laid before them? The hon. gentleman will remember that Mr. Gladstone got a majority of the people of the United Kingdom some time ago on the question of Home Rule, but, when he brought down his nefarious measure of Home Rule, and afterwards went back to the people, the people having learned what his measure was, defeated him by the most overwhelming majority known to any person now alive in the United Kingdom. Now, I have merely to repeat what I have already said: I asked my right hon. friend to tell me on what ground he was interfering with the county of Bruce, and his answer was, that something was done in the county of Bruce in 1882, which he thinks should not have been done, as the population was not equalized. The population has been equalized now, and so his excuse for interfering with the county of Bruce is, that an inequality existed in 1882 which does not exist now—a strange excuse!

Mr. BEATTIE. We have heard a good deal about Bruce, Brantford and Toronto, but we have not yet heard anything about the city of London, which I have the honour to represent, and which has more reason to be dissatisfied with this Bill than any constituency in the province of Ontario, and perhaps than any constituency in the Dominion of Canada. Before confederation, the city of London had the same boundary as it has to-day. What is proposed by the present Bill? A piece is to be taken out of East Middlesex, and another piece of South Middlesex, by which the population will be increased to about 40,000, and still we are to be allowed only one member. That I consider most unjust. I have a memorandum here of the population of three other ridings: Leeds and Grenville, 13,200; Frontenac, 13,300, and West Durham, 13,500. These, all taken together, would hardly make more than the city of London, included in the present Bill. Why not amalgamate two of those counties, and give London one more member? I do not intend to speak at any length. I do not think that anything I can say would make the Government change their minds at this time of day. But I take it as a great compliment that the Government think I am capable of representing the large constituency I shall have under this Bill, larger, probably, than that represented by any other member of this House.

Mr. McCLEARY. The Minister of Customs gave me a very unsatisfactory answer to a question I asked him, and I am going to appeal to the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Minister of Customs sends me off on a missionary tour to convert three hundred Grits, consoling me with the remark that he was compelled to convert that many Tories that had been gerrymandered into his riding some twenty years gone by. I have made two trips of that kind in the county of Welland, and I am not asking for any more. It was quite satisfactory to me to be able to take an adverse majority of between two hundred and three hundred and turn it over into a Conservative majority of somewhere in the neighbourhood of 200. But I do not care to get 300 or 400 Grits in addition. The question I asked of the Minister of Customs was this: On what principle of justice—because he says this is a Bill based upon justice—does this Bill interfere with the old county of Welland, which since confederation had included within its electoral bounds the townships of Bertie, Crowland, Humberstone, Stamford, Thorold and Willoughby, and the villages of Chippewa, Clifton, Fort Erie, Thorold and Welland?

Why, they could bring into it two municipalities with over 6,000 people that never voted in it, that were never connected with it for electoral purposes in any way. On what principle of justice can that be accounted for if it was not, as I said before, to give an unfair advantage to the Liberal party? Now, it will not do to say, as the Minister of Customs has said, that they told the people they were going to restore the county boundaries, and they are doing it now to redeem their pledges. Goodness knows that they told the people a whole lot of things that they were going to do, and they have not done them. As a matter of fact they never told the people that they would use their strength to gerrymander the province in their own interest, I don't believe they ever said they would do that. They may have said that they would do away with what they called the old Franchise Bill, and everybody understood that if they came into power they would do so. Now, I want to know on what principle of justice the county of Welland should have a population of 6,000 people added to it, which has already, if a census were taken to-day, 28,000 or 30,000.

Mr. BERGERON. This Bill has been introduced by the Prime Minister, and as neither the Minister of Customs nor the Postmaster General will give an answer to my hon. friend from Welland, perhaps, the right hon. gentleman will do so. I imagine also that the man who could best answer the question is the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson).

The PRIME MINISTER. The answer is in the Bill. The county of Welland is made an electoral district as constituted for municipal purposes.

Mr. GIBSON. As the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) says that perhaps I would be in a better position to answer the member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) than the Minister of Customs, I may be allowed to say a word upon this matter. Of all the silly questions the member for Welland has asked across the floor of this House, I never heard anything like this in my life. I have this to say to the hon. member for Welland. Since confederation, the township of Pelham has been in the county of Welland, and is in the county of Welland to-day. His friends saw fit some years ago to create the county of Monck, and Pelham was made a part and parcel of it. His friends in 1892 saw fit to wipe out Monck, and they gave the township of Pelham to me. I am not whining because I am going to lose 300 Grit votes, but my hon. friend is whining because he is going to receive 300 Grit votes. Now, the condition of things is this, and the member for Welland ought to be manly enough and decent enough to inform the House that the township of Pelham, for legislative purposes, is in the county of

Mr. McCLEARY.

Monck; the township of Pelham, for judicial and municipal purposes, is now and always has been in the county of Welland; and the township of Pelham, for Dominion purposes, is in the county of Lincoln. Now, is there such another case in the whole Dominion of Canada that one township for different purposes is in three counties? When that township was put into the county of Lincoln, I felt in going over to meet these people that they were being imposed upon, in being put into the county of Lincoln. That township belongs to the county of Welland, and no man in this House knows that better than the hon. gentleman from Welland. But he wants to throw a straw across the floor of the House by saying that he wants to know why. I want to ask the hon. gentleman if he will stand up in this House and say that the township of Pelham, for judicial and municipal purposes, is not in the county of Welland, and that an exception is being made in this case to all the others. I fancy the member for Beauharnois will probably give me credit for having something to do with this matter. I want to say to the committee that I never saw that Bill until I borrowed it from the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell). So far as I am personally concerned, the loss is on my side, because I am going to lose 300 Liberal supporters. But remember what led up to all this. In 1882 the county of Lincoln, which I now have the honour to represent, was represented in this House by Mr. J. C. Rykert. Mr. Rykert found that the county was slipping from under his feet, and he asked that the townships of Caistor and Grimsby, which have always belonged to the county of Lincoln, should be put into Wentworth, and that was done, so that he might have an easy and larger majority, because both of these townships were Liberal. I am sorry the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) is not here, because, perhaps, he could give some explanation why the township of Pelham and Gainsboro' were put into Lincoln; and, perhaps, the member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) could tell something about those changes that have been made. They were made in the interest of these two gentlemen, because in dividing up the county of Monck, which was represented in this House by a gentleman who now occupies the position of collector of customs at Niagara Falls, the Tory townships were taken care of by the member for Haldimand and the member for Norfolk, and the two Liberal townships were put into my riding. Why? To keep a certain gentleman out of this House, as I understood the matter. But the effect was to keep the member for Haldimand and the member for Norfolk solid in the ridings they represented. I am satisfied to lose the 300 majority that the township of Pelham gives me, and give back the county of Lincoln as it existed and does exist to-day for judicial and municipal purposes. I am willing to take my chances, and if there are any gentlemen in this House who have a right to squeal over the loss of 300 votes, I am one of them. But before the townships of Pelham and Gainsborough had been added to the county of Lincoln I had an adverse Conservative majority of 487 to commence my parliamentary career with. I came back to this House after the by-election, with a majority of 200 above my majority in the first election. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to take my chances. I want to say that to no member in this House or out of it did I ever suggest directly or indirectly either to take the township of Pelham out of Lincoln or to put any other township into Lincoln. I was satisfied that the Government, knowing the feelings of the Liberal party throughout Canada, would restore the county boundaries according to the promises made by the Liberal party in convention assembled in this city in 1893.

Mr. McCLEARY. When I point out a few facts to the committee, my hon. friend from Lincoln will not appear such a manly man as he tries to make himself out to be. He speaks as if he is willing to lose his 300 Liberal votes with a heroism that is worthy of his race. He says that he is ready to face the county deprived of these 300 Liberal votes. If he wanted to be manly and fair why does he not say that by this Bill there is being added to him within 11 votes of the majority he got from the township of Pelham at the last election?

Mr. GIBSON. Give me the numbers, please.

Mr. McCLEARY. The township of Caistor and the two Grimsbys will give you a majority that is within eleven of that which you got in Pelham.

Mr. GIBSON. Not by 150.

Mr. McCLEARY. That shows how manly the hon. gentleman is. The hon. gentleman said that I should have been decent enough to have said certain things that I did not say regarding Welland. I am not going to say a word in reference to the propriety of my conduct in this House. I try to conduct myself in a manner that is becoming to a representative of the people in this Parliament. When I am looking for a lesson in decency and propriety, I shall not go to the hon. member for Lincoln for it. What I stated was this: That the electoral riding of Welland consisted of the townships I mentioned under the Confederation Act, and I said that the townships of Pelham and Wainfleet were never connected with it for electoral purposes since confederation. I never said that they were not there for municipal purposes.

Mr. GIBSON. You never said they were?

Mr. McCLEARY. Everybody who knows anything about the history of the country, knows that.

Mr. GIBSON. No, everybody does not.

Mr. McCLEARY. If they do not they ought to know it. The hon. gentleman has not been fair enough to state that Pelham and Wainfleet to-day are not in Welland for the local legislature, but they are in Monck. That is a constituency that was made up at the time of confederation, and these two municipalities went into Monck. I have nothing to say regarding the gerrymander of 1892, although the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) owes his seat in this House to-day to the addition of 300 Liberal votes in Pelham. I do not think he complained much about it at the time they were put in. One sure thing is that if they had not been there in 1896 he would not have been sitting here as a member of Parliament.

Mr. GIBSON. What is that?

Mr. McCLEARY. I said that but for the gerrymander of 1892—

Mr. COWAN. That is a good name for it; you have let the cat out of the bag.

Mr. McCLEARY—in 1896 the hon. gentleman could not have been elected. The old riding of Lincoln polled a majority against the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson). I have not got an answer, and the hon. member for Lincoln has not said on what principle of justice the old county of Welland has been interfered with in this Bill. Probably the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) knows something about it. He had a great deal to say when he moved the second reading of the Bill, but, apparently, he has been shorn of his powers of speech, but, possibly, he may be able to enlighten us as to why the old county of Welland should be enlarged to the extent that it is going to be by this Bill, unfairly and unjustly.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). Mr. Chairman, I do not see the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) in his seat. He seems to be about the only defender of this gerrymander. The right hon. First Minister has given a very uncertain defence of this Bill, while the promoter of the Bill, the Postmaster General, is ostentatiously computing figures of the Post Office Department, or reading a novel, or attending to anything except the business that is engaging the attention of the committee. He does not appear to be able to give us any information about the Bill of which he is the father, and in regard to which he promised to furnish us with all kinds of information. The hon. Minister of Customs, who was defending the Bill, did not know anything about it, but he was rehearsing his old speeches of 1882, 1883 and 1884. He even got tired of that, and now we do not see his pleasant and smiling face in the House. I was going to refer to a few figures, and as an hon. gentleman said to me—but I dare not repeat it in Parliament, because the language would be unparliamentary, and the hon. member who stated it to me would be very properly ruled out of Parliament if I should repeat in the mildest terms the language he used in regard to the hon. Minister of Customs. What did that hon. gentleman say? He said that Bruce had 600 of a clear Liberal majority at the time this gerrymander took place. I have the records of the last previous election, that of 1878, when there were two constituencies in Bruce. Mr. Gillies, Liberal, in North Bruce, got 1,205, and Mr. Sproat, Conservative, 1,549. In South Bruce, Mr. Blake, Liberal, got 2,598 votes, and Mr. Shaw, Conservative, 3,673. Add those figures together and it gives a total of 4,303 Liberal votes and 4,222 Conservative votes, making a Liberal majority of eighty-one. Yet the hon. Minister of Customs gets up in this House and roars like a bull and says, look at this 600 of a Liberal majority. The figures here are eighty-one, and he cannot increase them by one vote. That is a sample of the statements that have been made by the hon. Minister of Customs. About Bruce he would explain, and explain again and again, and he said that poor Gillies was robbed of his constituency. What are the facts about Bruce, anyway? By the census of 1881 there were 39,000 people in South Bruce and 25,000, in round numbers, in North Bruce. The Government recognized that in their Redistribution Bill of 1882, and they made a redistribution which, by the latest census, appears to me to be as close and accurate an adjustment, so as to recognize the principle of representation by population, as could be expected in any county. What are figures? South Bruce, 21,355; West Bruce, 22,377; North Bruce, 20,821—not one of the three a thousand away from the unit of population. That is a remarkably fair division of the county, and yet we are treated to denunciations by the yard, because the Government in the past made that division which the judges cannot in equity change to-day. No wonder the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) demands why the Government should propose to interfere with his constituency. The Minister of Customs referred to the majority I had in the elections of 1896, but every one knows the peculiar circumstances of that, and that it is never likely to be repeated again. I shall be always well satisfied with a majority of a few hundreds in West York, even if you, Mr. Chairman, (Mr. Campbell) should be my opponent. The Minister of Customs talked of my having a 4,000 majority, and, with his invariable inaccuracy, he was quoting figures for the county of York for a portion of the constituency that will be added to the city of Toronto, if this Bill becomes law. He was blundering all through, and I challenge the accuracy of his figures, and can prove he was wrong, if necessary. What are the facts? West York, before 1878, had been a Grit hive for twenty-four years, and whenever there was a square contest between the two party candidates, the Liberals carried the county. It was known to be a Liberal stronghold, but the people got their eyes opened, and greater intelligence was disseminated among them, I have no doubt, and so they came to think that they should not be Liberals any longer. But West York has never been recognized as a Tory constituency, although it was becoming Tory very rapidly, and so the Government proposes now to take almost all the Conservative votes out of it, and make it a Liberal constituency in reality, if they got their way here. The Minister of Customs spoke about my having 4,000 majority. But what were the circumstances? There were two candidates against me, but neither of these got the confidence of any considerable portion of the electorate, and that condition is not likely to arise again, every one knows that it cannot be cited as a fair example for the future, and nobody knows it better than the Minister of Customs. The Government have no excuse for introducing this Bill, which they themselves admit is not perfect, and which violates every great principle, amongst others, the principle of representation by population, which is the true basis of representation. Take each succeeding Redistribution Act, and you will find that the principle of representation by population has been more closely adhered to. We are moving in that direction, although it is true we may not be going fast enough, but still we are continually aiming at the goal. The true principle is that 20,000 people in one locality should have the same rights as 20,000 in another locality. The old system of representation in Great Britain, which gave rise to so many scandals, was based on the principle that 3,000 people in one locality should have a member, and 50,000 in another should have but one member. In England every succeeding measure of redistribution is in the direction of representation by population, but the Bill introduced by this Government is putting the hands on the dial of the clock backwards. It is the old system of recognizing no principle, because sticking to county boundaries is no principle. The provincial government can change county boundaries at their own sweet will, and yet we are asked to fall down and worship this fetish of county boundaries. What is there sacred about county boundaries? The principle of representation by population is the true principle, and the only one that can be justified before the people. I deny that the Government is giving fair-play to the city of Toronto. The ex-mayor (Mr. Clarke) told us to-night that Toronto now has a population of 235,000, but the Government, in this Bill, propose to go back to a condition of affairs that existed nine years ago. If they were just, their legislation should be up to date. The judges are compelled to ignore existing conditions, as the Government have ignored existing conditions, and they have to shut their eyes to all the progress of Canada in nine years. I protest, as I have protested before, and as the sober sense of this country will continue to protest, against this, the most absurd piece of legislation that was ever proposed to be enacted by any Parliament in this country.

The Minister of Customs, when he was asked the reason for this legislation, said: "It is because we have a mandate from the people, and we have to obey that mandate." Among all the members on that side, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Customs are the two who, in season and out of season, preached against the Gerrymander Bill of 1882. I never heard the First Minister make a speech condemning that measure except in the most casual way; but it was the whole stock-in-trade of these two gentlemen for fifteen or sixteen years. The mandate they got in the last election was to stay at home, both of them. These gentlemen got no mandate in that direction, and they will find it out. These gentlemen came into power, not on their own merits, or by an approval of their own policy, but as I contend on account of the mistakes of the Conservative Government of that day. Now, in these counties, as to which the Minister of Customs has made the strongest statements about the iniquities of the Redistribution Bill, the sound principle of representation by population, which permeates all the measures of the Conservative party, has been recognized. Do this Government attempt to adopt any such principle in this Bill? No; the Postmaster General told us that they would scatter the principle of representation by population to the four winds, and he argued that the Conservative party had not recognized that principle either. I contradict that statement. The Bill of 1882, the wrongs of which the hon. gentleman said he particularly desired to redress, was a marvellous exhibition of justice in that direction. Hon. members opposite have been challenged to point out a single case in which a Grit was defeated by that Bill. The Minister to-night said that John Gillies, in North Bruce, was one; but there was a righteous distribution in that county. In South Bruce, by the census of 1891, there were 21,350; in West Bruce, 22,377, and in North Bruce, 20,871.

Mr. McNEILL. The Bill of 1892 established North Bruce with a population of 22,000 and West Bruce with a population of 20,000 odd.

Mr. WALLACE. I am speaking of the redistribution of 1892. There is no justice whatever for any change or submission to the judges in that direction. We do not oppose this or that clause but the whole Bill. It was stated to-night that no lawyer in this House had said it was not constitutional. Well, I listened with interest and attention to the argument last night of the hon. member for Halifax and the whole tenor of that argument was that the Bill is unconstitutional. I have therefore his authority which is a very sound one, because he is recognized as a sound constitutional lawyer in this House. We say this Bill is not required and that it is unconstitutional. We say it violates every principle of fair-play, that it violates a principle upon which representation should take place and that is according to population. What will be the result if unfortunately this Bill should become law. It will set an example to one political party that is apt to be followed either by the opposite political party or the same political party. If by their system of gerrymander hon. gentlemen opposite find they have gained a party advantage, what is to prevent them, should they be fortunate enough to be returned at the next general election, from redistributing the seats again three years later in order to make their return more secure. This Bill is only a flea bite compared to what they would do then, or to quote the words of that distinguished statesman, the Minister of Public Works, "See what we do next year." We are only touching the edges now, but after the next decennial census we will take the whole 91 constituencies and make every one of them, if such a thing could be done, or the majority at any rate Liberal constituencies. We protested against the Bill by our vote last night, and will continue to protest.

Mr. BENNETT. Early in the evening I appealed to the hon. Postmaster General and the hon. Minister of Customs—the right hon. Prime Minister was not here—to consider the claim of Simcoe to four representatives. I pointed out that it would be an utter impossibility on the part of the judge to so arrange the three constituencies that each one would have a population of 24,000. The hon. Minister of Customs asked me if I could make a suggestion as to where a seat might be dropped in the province so as to allow four to Simcoe. The right hon. First Minister a little while ago advanced the proposition that cities should not have as large a representation according to population as rural districts. I beg then to call his attention to the fact that the city of Kingston has about 19,000 of a population, according to the census and adjoining the county of Frontenac, between 14,000 and 15,000. Here is a case where two constituencies might be united so as to make a fairly reasonably sized constituency. Kingston and Frontenac together would then make a constituency of about 33,000 of a population. The three ridings of East Simcoe have a population respectively of 23,000, 27,000 and 34,000, and having pointed out a fair case of a joining together of two other constituencies and the allotment of four members to Simcoe I would ask consideration to the fairness of that scheme.

Mr. LEIGHTON McCARTHY (North Simcoe). I would like to add whatever weight I can to the claim which my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has advanced. I realize the force of what the right hon. First Minister has said, that the number of constituencies in Ontario being fixed at 92 makes it difficult for us to give increased representation to any one in particular. But Simcoe is certainly a very large county, and upon the unit of 21,000 or 22,000 would be entitled to four seats, and I would ask that the Government regard this request for an additional representative for that constituency as a serious one so far as I am concerned. Perhaps the representations of the two other members for North Simcoe, who have referred to me, cannot be treated so seriously. The redistribution of seats is based upon the census which caused the redistribution of 1891 or 1892, and in that case and on that occasion neither of these hon. gentlemen protested or asked for an increase. The hon. member for East Simcoe did ask that his constituency should be reduced in size by requesting that the township of Muskoka should be struck off. Nevertheless every hon. member has a right to change his mind, and if the hon. gentleman thinks now that the late Government did not treat Simcoe as it should, he is justified in asking for proper treatment by this Government, and I would ask the Government to seriously consider that question.

While I am on my feet, I would like to correct a statement that was made with reference to the part which the late member for North Simcoe took in framing the Redistribution Act of 1882, and in so doing I hope I will not be considered as laying myself open to the charge of speaking of necropolitan politics. But the right hon. leader of the Opposition said "hear, hear," to the statement of the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) and of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), that the late member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was the framer of what he called that iniquitous measure and which I likewise described in similar terms. On page 3786 of vol. 2 of the "Hansard" of 1892, I find that in reply to the charge that he had had a great deal to do with that Bill, he said:

But I deny and repudiate the charge that I had anything to do with framing the Bill of 1882, except in suggesting the propriety of splitting the riding of North Simcoe, which I then represented, into the present ridings of North and East Simcoe.

I think it ill-became these hon. gentlemen to suggest that the late member for Simcoe was guilty of being the framer of that Bill in view of the fact that in his lifetime he repudiated the charge, and no man dared on that occasion to question the truthfulness of his statement. The two hon. members for the Simcoes are my seniors. The hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt), a personal friend of mine, has been in this House a long time and has done me the honour to say that he has watched my career. I take this opportunity of telling him and the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) that if either of them will propose an amendment to the present Bill asking that four representatives be given in the county of Simcoe, I will be pleased to support it.

Mr. SPROULE. Move it yourself.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not see that it is incumbent on the junior member of the county to move such a resolution. I state what I think is true and what I think is right. As it is in accordance with the belief of these two members, and as they are the seniors, and as they have first mooted the question, it would be more becoming of them to move the resolution. I desire, if I may be permitted, to say a word on behalf of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs), who has been called away by telegram owing to illness in his family. I stated that I thought there were grave doubts whether Cardwell should be wiped out. Bothwell stands in the same position, and so I say the same of Bothwell. To-night when the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) referred to my hon. friend from Cardwell having his seat wiped out by this Bill, I heard an hon. member say, "It served him right." Now, if it served the hon. member for Cardwell right, equally it served the hon. member for Bothwell right. These things should be looked at from a purely non-partisan standpoint. If a community of interests has been created since confederation in Cardwell and in Bothwell, sufficient to entitle them to continue their existence as a county, for representation in this House, though not a county for judicial purposes, I would ask the Government to pause at this point before finally deciding to wipe out these constituencies.

Mr. BENNETT. I cannot allow the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) to impute to me the motive that I was not considering this matter seriously. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. He is mistaken also in saying that I referred to him in the course of the debate. I did not.

Mr. McCARTHY. I referred to the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt.)

Mr. BENNETT. I can assure the hon. gentleman I was quite serious, and so far as indulging in the formality of making a motion, it amounts to this—in the case of Toronto, the suggestion was made that the change should be made and the Government acted upon it. And in the present case, I make the suggestion that the Bill should be amended so as to give four seats to Simcoe.

Mr. JOHN McMILLAN (South Huron). I have not hitherto said anything on this Bill. If there is a county in Ontario that had cause to complain of the gerrymander of 1882, that county was Huron; for it was gerrymandered in the most shameful manner. The redistribution was made entirely for the purpose of gaining party advantages. It was not made here in Ottawa by the Government of the day. A copy of the Bill was sent to Huron, and one meeting was held, but no arrangement was come to. I heard one of the strongest partisans in Huron admit that he was one of the parties who had gerrymandered the county, that he had lived in it all his life and he had put his knowledge to the best advantage for the Conservative party, so that they might secure at least two seats and leave the Reformers only one. They gerrymandered South Huron so as to make it a Liberal hive. They took Usborne out of South Huron and put it into North Perth. Mr. Trow's majority in South Perth was 77. They took North-east Hope, with a Liberal majority of 193, out of South Perth and put it into Middlesex, leaving Mr. Trow with a Conservative majority of 115. But the respectable Conservatives of South Perth were so indignant that at the next election they returned Mr. Trow with a large majority. That was not all. The township of Stephen was taken out of Huron and put into North Middlesex. Then the town of Exeter was taken out of Huron and put into Middlesex. The county of Middlesex, with a population of 58,000 was given four members, whereas Huron with a population of 66,000 was given only three. Three municipalities with a population of 8,608 were taken away from Huron. If justice had been done to the county of Huron at that time, if an extra member was to be given, it should have been given to Huron instead of to Middlesex, because Huron had a population of 8,400 more than Middlesex. Even after the redistribution was made, they took that part of the village of Lucknow that belonged to the county of Huron, with a Reform majority of thirty-nine, and put it into South Bruce, which was then a Reform constituency. So far as population is concerned, the county of Huron before the gerrymander of 1882, was as follows: North riding, population, 21,862; centre riding, population, 22,781; south riding, population, 21,512. That was just as equal a distribution then as it was possible to make of Huron. In 1882 they put into the north riding 23,512. That was not equalizing the population. In East Huron they put 21,001, and in South Huron 21,991. Now, Sir, one of the reasons why they gerrymandered Centre Huron was that we had one of the ablest statesmen of Canada at that time representing that riding. The gerrymander took place and there was no riding of Centre Huron left. It had had a Reform majority of 231 in the previous election, but it was gerrymandered out of existence. So it is manifest that the Government of that day were striking, as far as possible, at political opponents, to put them out of the political arena, as far as they could. But the county of Huron, although it was gerrymandered, returned two Conservatives for one election. The indignation of the respectable Conservatives was such that in North Huron which the Government thought they had made perfectly safe, they returned a Reform member for one election. In West Huron it was the same, the respectable Conservatives felt indignant that such gerrymandering should take place, because only a few of the heeled had taken occasion to gerrymander the county.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the Government have no mandate from the people to press this Bill through Parliament. There was a large organization in Ontario in the last election known as the Patrons. There were among them Conservatives and Reformers, and they unanimously called for a redistribution of the ridings. This is the first opportunity the Government has had to press forward this Bill. If the predictions of hon. gentlemen opposite are correct, and as soon as an appeal is made to the people, the people will turn the Government out of place and power; there will be no other opportunity. Then, hon. gentlemen would turn round and tell the Government that they had not fulfilled their promises to the people by doing away with the gerrymander of the ridings. I hold that the Government was pledged in 1893, in the city of Ottawa, in the platform then laid down. The Patrons also asked for a redistribution, and in this instance the Government are only fulfilling their pledges to the people. I may mention that, before I came down to the present session, a good many Conservatives in the county of Huron asked me if there was to be a Redistribution Bill introduced this session. Many respectable Conservatives expressed a strong wish that such a measure should be introduced, and said it was the duty of the Government to do so, in order to fulfil the promises that they had made.

Now, it has been said that the county of Huron is the county of gerrymanders, and that the Mowat Government made the most shameful gerrymander there that ever was made in the province of Ontario. Let me say that the redistribution made by the Mowat Government in the county of Huron was one of the most equal arrangements that it was possible to make. The only thing they did was to cut the township of Hullett in two, and the township of Goderich in two, and to-day Huron is one of the most compact ridings possible. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) said the other night that if the municipality had not been divided, Mr. Garrow would have been defeated in West Huron, because he had only one of a majority outside the township of Hullett, in the west end, which gave him 40 of a majority. But the hon. gentleman did not mention the township of Goderich, as part of which was taken from the south riding and put in the west riding, and which gave 75 Conservative majority that Mr. Garrow had to face. I hold that the division made by the Mowat Government was one of the most just that could possibly be made. So far as population was concerned, there was 26,248 in the east riding, 26,478 in the south, and 25,234 in the west. Now take the number of electors. There were 5,559 in the south, 6,190 in the east, and 6,290 in the west. So, whether you take it by population or by the number of voters, it was not possible to make a more equal distribution. I hold that even if the municipalities had not been divided, the Conservatives, according to the vote that had been cast, never would have had an extra member in the county of Huron.

The gerrymander that took place in 1882 was one of the most disgraceful that was ever made, and that of 1892 was along the same lines, and only carried out to a fuller extent the gerrymander of 1882. Let me read the opinion of the late lamented member for Simcoe, Mr. Dalton McCarthy :

It could not be defended upon the ground of the equalization of population, nor on the ground of preserving county boundaries, and it could not be defended on the ground of justice. The redistribution did not secure equality of population, it ignored community of interests, it disregarded geographical compactness, and rendered stability impossible, and it afforded an opportunity to arrange the districts for party ends.

That was what was done, both in 1882 and 1892. I am glad there is not a single member of the Opposition to-day who has stood up and defended the gerrymander of 1882. I have not heard one say that it was a just measure. All they say is, that there is no necessity for the present redistribution, and that the country is not suffering. In the south riding of Huron I shall not be placed in as strong a position as I am to-day, so this Redistribution Bill will be of no advantage to me. I was put in one of the Grit hives, and justice is only now being done to that riding by this Bill. We will have now 66,000 population, and we only had some 58,000 at the last election ; so that we will have just about the unit of population in the county of Huron. It cannot be said that the bench of judges will make a redistribution for party purposes. Our hon. friends opposite were always supposed to be loyal to the judges, but I have heard a hint by some of them that they think the judges will not do justice. For my part, I have perfect confidence in the judges of the Superior Courts of the Dominion of Canada, that they will not lend themselves to a gerrymander in any shape or form for party purposes.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I did not intend to take any part in the discussion this evening, preferring rather to listen to the views of others ; but since my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) has desired me to express some views more particularly, I suppose, with regard to his own observations, I will, out of respect to that hon. gentleman, meet his wishes. I am glad to find hon. gentlemen opposite giving evidence of a belief that some principle other than mere party interest should govern the redistribution of representation. Just now they are paying a great deal of homage to the principle of representation by population. The hon. member for West York to-night declared that regard for equality of population was the keystone of the system of representation, and that every change that had taken place in the way of redistribution, under the control of the Conservative party, had been dominated by respect for the principle. Now, I have said that, not since confederation was population regarded by any Government that had to do with redistributing the constituencies, as a dominating principle. Whatever were the principles, certainly the equalization of population was not the controlling one. I am not quarrelling with that doctrine, because I do not recognize it ; it is not recognized in this Bill, and it has not been recognized since Canada has had representative institutions. It has never been recognized in Great Britain that the equalization of population was to prevail over all other considerations. It is not the principle in England to-day ; it never has been the principle where institutions fashioned after those of England existed. I will read, in support of that proposition, an extract from Professor Hearn's "Government of England," page 501 :

The electoral franchise has never been in England regarded as a purely personal right, and has never been exercised upon exclusively personal qualifications. Our electors have always voted, not because they were men, or even because they were Englishmen ; but because they were freeholders of a particular county, or because they were citizens or burgesses of a particular city or town. Their right is circumscribed by locality. We do not elect our representative as the Athenians elected their Archons, as the French elected their Emperor, and as the Americans elect their President. We do not take the vote of every elector, irrespective of all other electors, for all the members of the House of Commons. According to the method which has at all times been in use with us, each locality undertakes the duty of furnishing to the representative branch of the legislature a specified number of members. Thus our system of representation is the representation not of interests or of opinions, or of population, but of population organized. Hitherto that organization has had chiefly, although not exclusively, a territorial form. In other words, our representative system has been mainly the representation of districts. It regards men not merely as men, but as neighbours. In one sense it is obviously true that a district cannot have other rights than those of the people who inhabit it. But the rights of a district are those of its organized population. Its inhabitants, by virtue of their residence, have, as compared with the inhabitants of other places, separate habits, and interests, and associations, peculiar views of public affairs, and peculiar sympathies and mode of thought. These distinctive habits and feelings produce a distinctive character. The individuality, the independent life, of each political body is established; and it acquires and desires to express its special shade of feeling and of thought.

Subsequently you find that he proceeds to refer to the subject of population, giving it a subsidiary position in regard to those considerations that should prevail when arranging boundaries. That doctrine has always been respected in Canada, and was respected on the occasion that the hon. member for West York refers to when the rearrangement of the ridings was made in 1882. These hon. gentlemen who, to-day, are worshipping equalization, have had a very late conversion to that doctrine. In 1872 the Conservative Government, then in power, introduced and passed a measure redistributing the ridings. Without going into the details at any length, I would say that in the province of Ontario the population of one riding was 2,941, and that by an ascending scale the population of other constituencies increased until it reached 23,719 in the riding with the highest population. So much for uniformity and the equalization principle in the redistribution of 1872. I take now the redistribution of 1882, to which the hon. member for York refers. The unit of population after the census of 1881 was 20,904, and if you allow a margin of 3,000, counting anything within that as within the unit, and if we say that anything between 19,000 and 22,000 is within the unit, let us see how this sacred principle, that the hon. gentlemen refers to, was respected. The census of 1881 was followed by the Redistribution Bill of 1882, which affected fifty-nine constituencies.

Mr. WALLACE. It affected forty-six constituencies.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think my figures are correct, and I make it fifty-nine. In forty-one cases the population was altogether beyond the unit, either too high or too low. In only eighteen of the constituencies, as the result of the redistribution of 1882, was the population between 19,000 and 22,000, allowing the hon. gentleman a margin of 3,000. They seemed to manifest not the slightest regard for the equalization of population. In 1892, when another redistribution took place, instead of having the population of each riding equal, or nearly equal, there were only twenty-two constituencies whose population in any way conformed to the unit of population, while in regard to seventy of them, the unit of population was altogether disregarded. So grossly was the question of the equalization of population disregarded under the Act of 1882, that in one of the constituencies that had been changed there was left a population of only 12,000, while in another constituency there was a population of 29,000. What becomes of this new-born respect for the equalization of population, when we turn to the exact facts? We have the hon. gentleman's unsupported statements, but the record is against them. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), last night, with frankness, gave expression to his action in connection with the attachment or annexation of Saugeen to West Bruce in 1882. He confessed that he had advised the attachment of Saugeen to West Bruce, and to quote his words, said:

I wish to say further that in making that commendation I was partly swayed by considerations of a political and party nature. As long as these matters are left in the hands of the two parties, each party will be swayed less or more by political considerations; and if two possible divisions, fairly good divisions, can be made, the party in power will always select the division which suits its own party interest best, and if in doing that it does not do anything that is unjust, it is entitled to do it as long as the matter is left in the hands of the parties.

Mr. McNEILL. Just read the next sentence, please.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL.—

I do not think it should be left in the hands of the parties at all.

I am glad the hon. gentleman approves of that part of our Bill, and I thought he would see the whole of the Bill in a fairer light. As an illustration of the principle that cities have not always the full measure of representation that rural populations have, I may say that, even to-day in England, where the unit of population, according to the last census, is 59,000, there are seven constituencies with a population under 18,000, and there are seven constituencies with a population of over 100,000, each having one representative. So that there is in England a precedent for inequality, but there is a precedent in our own country, and a precedent furnished by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for West York says that whenever they touched a constituency they brought about the equalization of population. Under the Redistribution Act of 1882 they did not rearrange all the constituencies in Quebec, but if they had the power to do so and if they did not do so, they are responsible for the condition in which they left the constituencies, whether they touched them or not. In dealing with Montreal they left East Montreal, with a population of 67,000, represented by one member, and the constituency of Centre Montreal with a population of 25,000. That condition of affairs continued down to 1896, when the population of East Montreal was nearly 100,000, and yet it was represented by only one member in this House until the present Parliament. Yet the hon. gentleman tells us that his party has regard for the principle of representation by population. There can be but one opinion in the country about this Bill, and that is that it proposes to make restitution to the people, and proposes to restore county boundaries according to the pledge of the Liberal party. At the Liberal Convention in 1893, we passed a resolution pledging the Liberal party on the first available occasion to wipe out that portion of the gerrymander Bill, and that occasion has now arrived. We are redeeming our pledge, not perhaps to the full, but if gentlemen opposite are solicitous to have the whole province of Ontario redistributed now, we will make their suggestions and they will receive the fullest considerations.

Mr. BERGERON. Are you opposed to the present amendment?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am supporting the Bill and I am supporting the amendment, and I hope to convert my hon. friends to do likewise. Since my hon. friend seems anxious, I will not detain him any longer to-night, but, if necessary, I will take part in the discussion on some future occasion. In reply to the observations of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), that the Conservatives rearranged the ridings in 1882 with sacred regard to population, and the convenience of the people, I would ask him, does he seriously mean that? Does he honestly believe that North Ontario was cut out to suit the convenience of the people? North Ontario began at the Island of Scugog, several miles down in the south riding; the township of Scugog, separated by several miles from the North riding, to which it was electorally attached, and North Ontario, extending from four miles in width to about ten miles in width and nearly 150 miles in length—

Mr. CLANCY. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) wishes to be fair, does he not know that the municipal county of Ontario is precisely the shape he described it now?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) does not understand what took place. Permit me to inform him that the redistribution of 1882 added to North Ontario a number of municipalities that are not part of the municipal county of Ontario. How can the hon. gentleman say that North Ontario was composed with regard for geographical shape.

Mr. CLANCY. As nearly as possible.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Then they must have had a very difficult task of it. In this Bill we strike at the abolition of the eight hives that were created by the Act of 1882, and which ever since have robbed the constituencies of a portion of the electorate that should belong to them, and which have thrown together bodies of electors who had no common interest. There were these forty-odd changes in 1882 to create these hives, and if it involves as many changes to undo that, it is not our fault, but the fault of the previous Government. We have a few counties that are not strong enough in population to admit of more than one representative, and among them is the county of Welland. To accomplish this we have had to propose changes that are adverse to our opponents and also to our friends. We have many friends on this side of the House who are just as seriously prejudiced by this measure as are gentlemen opposite, but we are proceeding upon the principle of justice. My hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) should welcome this measure, because he has expressed himself as having much appreciation for a leading feature in it. No proposal made to Parliament since the Dominion existed offers better safeguards against the abuse hereafter, than the proposition that the rearrangement of constituencies shall no longer be left in the political arena of Parliament, but shall be transferred to an independent tribunal of judges of the Superior Court. That feature alone ought to commend this measure, and I expected that it should have overcome all the other objections of my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and secured his hearty approval.

Mr. McNEILL. I came back to the House for the purpose of asking a question from my right hon. friend. May I ask the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) whether the judges are to be appointed by the Government, or whether they are to be selected by the judges themselves. If the judges are to be appointed by the Government, would my right hon. friend kindly tell us, as he intimated he would, what are the names of the judges to be appointed?

The PRIME MINISTER. The judges are to be appointed by the Government. We have made no selection yet, and I am not prepared at this moment to give the names we intend to ask.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman promised to give the names some time ago.

The PRIME MINISTER. I say I am not prepared to do so this evening. I beg to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved adjournment of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. What business will the hon. gentleman take up to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. To-morrow we will take up the same Bill which we have had under consideration to-day; and, as the discussion has been very exhaustive, we hope to finish at an early hour, and then take up Supply.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.25 a. m. (Friday).
