My hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) is hanging his contention on the mere shade of a shadow, the use of the words "other lines competing with it." What are the other lines competing with it—with the Canadian Pacific Railway, mark you, not the Intercolonial Railway. What is the other line competing with the Canadian Pacific Railway from St. John east? Why, the Intercolonial Railway itself all the way to Lévis. It amazes me. Does the hon. gentleman imagine that the Intercolonial Railway had no interest in carrying all the traffic which originated upon the territory drained by the Intercolonial Railway to Lévis rather than deliver it at St. John? Was there no interest that they should get within 130 miles of Montreal, or 160 miles, as it might be, rather than 500? And when, on the running of passenger and freight trains to this point, at least so far as passengers were concerned, we could carry every passenger that would offer without adding to the cost of operating the road, will any one pretend that it was not of vital interest to the Intercolonial Railway to carry all the passengers and traffic it could secure which originate in its own territory? Was it not of interest that the Intercolonial Railway or the country should get the benefit of this traffic? I will show that the interpretation is not mine simply, but the interpretation of the hon. gentleman himself. Is he going to tell me that he was a perfect nonentity in his department and did not know what his officers were doing? Is it to be assumed that my hon. friend was a nonentity—I believe he was far from being that—though I do not believe he took very much interest in the Intercolonial Railway or cared very much about it, except in so far as the final results might not be any more unfavourable than possible. I am told that when he travelled over the Intercolonial Railway, which he did twice, on a tour of inspection, he went at the rate of 60 miles an hour, and when some one remonstrated with him, and said: "That is not the way to go over the Intercolonial Railway and see the people and inquire into their difficulties," he replied that he had been strongly advised by Mr. Shaughnessy that that was the proper way to inspect a railway. This, of course, is only what I have been told.

An hon. MEMBER. By a reporter.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. But lest it should appear that my hon. friend was simply a wooden head in this whole connection and did not give directions, you may take the statement of Mr. Schreiber, who has written this addition to the memo. I have been reading from: "I will add that in doing so I was acting under instructions from the Minister of Railways and Canals."

Mr. HAGGART. If the hon. gentleman would read the orders, it would be more convenient than giving the certificate of the deputy.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If my hon. friend will not be so impatient, I am going to do him ample justice. I am not going to conceal any evidence, but to give him all the circulars and documents that bear on the question, so far as I am able to find them.

Mr. FOSTER. What subject is my hon. friend debating now?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is one subject that I could very properly debate and enlarge upon with a great deal of advantage to my hon. friend, and that is the impertinent interruptions which the hon. member is so fond of making.

Mr. FOSTER. As my hon. friend has chosen to denominate the interruption an impertinent one, I call your attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to the fact that we have moved into committee to discuss an agreement made between this Government on behalf of the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, and my hon. friend seems to have been devoting his time, so far, to carrying on an old debate in which the agreement between the Canadian Pacific Railway of many years ago and the Intercolonial Railway was the subject. It seems to me, therefore, that it is not impertinent but very pertinent to ask if the hon. gentleman is speaking to the question before the committee or not.

Mr. HAGGART. Let him go on.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not give my hon. friend credit for putting the question seriously.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to know whether my hon. friend thinks still it was an impertinent interruption.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I rise to a point of order.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not say it in any offensive sense, but because my hon. friend smiled when he put the question, it seemed to me his intention was rather to throw me off, but if not, I will withdraw the imputation.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand by the discussion, that the hon. Minister is giving an illustration of the clauses of the contract between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Government.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend has called for Mr. BLAIR.

circulars. Well, I will give him circulars. I will give him a circular of the 5th January, 1891, No. 373, and a copy of which I think has already been furnished, and if not, can be furnished to my hon. friend. This emanates from the general freight office at Moncton:

To Agents:

The attention of agents is called to the last clause in Circular No. 226.

The notice then goes on to say:

It is desirable, as far as practicable, to get shippers to specify the route by which the goods are to be forwarded. More particularly does this apply on shipments to common points reached by the Canadian Pacific Railway and Grand Trunk Railway, and when no route is given to competing points—

That is to say, when the shipper does not indicate the particular route he wants the goods to go by.

—the traffic must be equally divided between the two companies, as the Intercolonial Railway desires to deal equitably.

No discrimination must be made under any circumstances. I say that is distinctly against the interests of the Intercolonial Railway, because you are dividing a portion of the business which would probably be yours, particularly when the goods were not routed by the Canadian Pacific Railway. To divide those shipments between the two seems to me an extraordinary course and to be putting a prejudicial interpretation upon the contract even worse than the interpretation put upon it by the department.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I still call my hon. friend's (Mr. Blair's) attention to one point, if he will allow me. I am most anxious to understand this matter clearly, and also that the House should understand it. The very terms he has used, as to the care that officials must take, show that they were enjoined to neutrality, not as between the Intercolonial Railway, or the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific Railway, but as between the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk. I do not find a word in what the hon. gentleman has stated contrary to that idea. I shall be very glad to have a copy of the contract, so that I may go over it, which I have not yet had an opportunity to do. I am anxious to understand the matter, but I do not see in what the hon. gentleman has stated anything affecting the officials and the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway otherwise than as preserving neutrality between the two great companies that were using the line.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. But the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) surely will see that the fact of establishing such a neutrality, of enjoining such discrimination, or want of discrimination, which ever you call it, meant to paralyse more than half the mileage of the Intercolonial Railway. It is true, that the name of the Grand Trunk is mentioned, but that is the way that the Canadian Pacific Railway itself would put it. They would say: If you haul goods over your line to Lévis, you necessarily deliver them to the Grand Trunk, which is a rival of ours, and so you are discriminating against us. You ought to deliver an equal share to us at St. John. But, by doing so, your haul over the Intercolonial Railway was 250 miles, instead of 800 miles or more. The Intercolonial Railway did not extend beyond Lévis. But that was no destination, either for passengers or freight, and the only connection it had at the time was the Grand Trunk. So, if we hauled goods over our own line, we necessarily delivered them to another railway, and that railway the Grand Trunk. So, it was practically and necessarily a discrimination against our own railway, when half of the goods that were not routed—and you can imagine that great proportion of them would be routed by the Canadian Pacific Railway—must be carried over the short haul and delivered to the Canadian Pacific Railway at St. John, and not taken the long haul and delivered to the Grand Trunk at Lévis.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the date of that circular?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is dated 5th January, 1891.

Mr. GIBSON. Who signed it?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. George Taylor, general freight agent, and it is issued from the general freight office.

Mr. HAGGART. Who was the Minister then?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not say who was Minister then. I presume it was the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart), or Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who was acting Minister for a time. I now refer to circular 331, addressed to station-masters and ticket agents at stations on the Intercolonial Railway from Cold Brook to Moncton and all stations east of Moncton. Cold Brook is the nearest station to St. John. Clause 2 of this circular says: "You are to be strictly neutral as between the two routes." What are the two routes? The first clause will show you, which is as follows:—"Fares shall be at all times the same via St. John and via Lévis." How could anything be more explicit than that? It means: You are not to interest yourself; you are not to canvass; you are not to try to get business via Lévis, though it is ever so much more profitable to your own road. You are to live up to your agreement, one clause of which bound you to the strictest neutrality between the Grand Trunk on the one side and the Canadian Pacific on the other. We come now to the 1st June, 1892—circular No. 442. Now, my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) stated, the other day, that there was a contention made by the Canadian Pacific Railway, that they were entitled to the strictest neutrality over the Intercolonial Railway line, but that contention was referred to the Department of Justice, and Sir John Thompson expressed an opinion against the Canadian Pacific. My hon. friend will not deny that I am correct in stating his contention. But he is quite mistaken in this, as he was in the other. What did occur is this: After the contract was made between the Canadian Pacific and the Intercolonial, the Cape Breton line was completed, and, I think, perhaps the Oxford branch was completed, but I am not sure about that. At all events, the contention of the Canadian Pacific Railway people was, as shown by their letters, which were legion, that this traffic agreement of neutrality strictly bound the Intercolonial Railway, not only as to the main line, not only as to the lines constructed when the agreement was made, but as to all subsequently acquired lines. They contended that the Intercolonial Railway was bound as to the Cape Breton and Oxford branches, and even including the Prince Edward Island Railway, which is no part, really, of the Intercolonial Railway. That question was referred to the Department of Justice, and upon that question the Department of Justice expressed the opinion that the compact of neutrality was strictly confined to the main line and its connections prior to this time.

Mr. HAGGART. I went further, if the hon. gentleman will excuse me. I was aware the contract did not apply to these lines; but what I was speaking of was an opinion of Sir John Thompson as to the main agreement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) certainly stated, if I understood him—and I think he admitted that I stated it correctly—that Sir John Thompson's opinion was, that the contract of neutrality was not susceptible of the interpretation I put upon it, binding our employees against canvassing for business over the line to Lévis.

Mr. HAGGART. Those are nearly the words I used.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I wish to show the hon. gentleman was in error in that, entirely in error. Sir John Thompson's opinion never covered that question; it only covered the limited question I have put as to whether the contract did apply to the lines of the Intercolonial subsequently acquired or put into operation.

Mr. HAGGART. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me. I knew there was an opinion of that kind in reference to the Oxford and New Glasgow and Cape Breton lines. I am talking now about another opinion, as to what our duties were under the contract in reference to canvassing.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What did the hon. gentleman say the opinion was?

Mr. Haggart. It was, that it did not prevent the employees of the Intercolonial Railway looking after the business for the long haul of our road, that is, to Lévis.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I can only tell my hon. friend that, after the most careful inquiries in the department, no such opinion has been produced. Nor has it been stated to me that there is such an opinion. I feel confident that no such opinion has ever been given. The only opinion given is the one I have stated already. And it seems impossible that the opinion the hon. gentleman speaks of could have been given, because, if it had been given, if the Department of Railways and Canals had Sir John Thompson's opinion that the contract did not restrict the freedom of action of the employees of the Intercolonial Railway, as far as the canvassing for business to Lévis was concerned, upon what pretext could the gentlemen who were administering the Department of Railways and Canals for all these years permit the officers to be subjected to this control? And what, then, is the explanation of these circulars? Down until the date that the contract expired, after the expiry of the notice, the officials and employees of the Intercolonial Railway held themselves compelled, in obedience to the terms of that contract, not to canvass for business, and they had no alternative, as I take it, but to carry it out clearly in its terms. Now, I was going to refer to the circular, No. 442, which issued on the 1st of June, 1892, issued, as I understand it, in consequence of the opinion which was given by Sir John Thompson, who, I presume, was then Minister of Justice. Mark you, this is to the ticket agents, and is headed:

Oxford to Brown's Point, and east of New Glasgow to Sydney and North Sydney, inclusive, and all the Intercolonial Railway outside ticket agents.

As to all the inside ticket agents, this circular did not apply.

Agents at stations on the sections of the line above named, and all the outside ticket agents of this railway must clearly understand that they are expected to use their best endeavours to induce business via Montreal and all western points in Canada and the United States to go by our main line, or leave this route.

Now, to whom was this notice directed? Not to the agents all over the Intercolonial Railway, not to the agents on the line from St. John to Moncton, and from Moncton east to

Mr. Blair.

Halifax, but only to those agents who lie off the main line, on the New Glasgow line, on the Cape Breton line. To the former the ban was removed, they were to have freedom of action, but as to all the other employees on all the rest of the Intercolonial Railway, it is abundantly clear that the injunction that they should stay their action and observe the implicit instructions which they had received from the head office on pain of dismissal, stood as strong and as clear as ever. Now, let me look at some more of the papers in this connection. Here is a copy of a letter which appears to have been written, and which was written, by the Deputy Minister to Mr. Pottinger, the chief engineer. It is dated the 28th of November, but the year is not quite clear. I think it must have been 1890. This is the first letter of the collection which I have here. He says:

Mr. Van Horne repeated the charge to the Minister upon the occasion of his recent visit to Ottawa, that Mr. Busby, I think he said, or perhaps he may have said, some officer acting under his direct orders, had boarded the Canadian Pacific Railway train at Moncton and canvassed passengers holding tickets by the St. John Short Line route, to surrender their tickets and take tickets by the Intercolonial Railway, Chaudière route, and that he had so changed the tickets of a number of passengers. I distinctly stated I did not believe a word of it, and that when making such charges he had better accompany them with the proof. Sir John added: "Prove the charge, and the employee, let him be of high or low degree, shall be dismissed."

Mr. Haggart. Why should he not be dismissed?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It would be all right, I suppose, for the Canadian Pacific Railway if they could get on our train and persuade our passengers to surrender their tickets and take in exchange tickets to go over the Canadian Pacific Railway; that would be all right, but it would be all wrong for our people to do it.

Mr. Van Horne then says: "I have it from an office of high grade at Moncton, and if I divulge his name Mr. Schreiber will probably dismiss him, as, of course, it was not honourable of him to tell me, and no doubt he was faithless to his employers; but I can and will produce the proof independent of him. You will, therefore, see the matter has not ended. I am thoroughly relying on your and Mr. Busby's assurance that nothing of the kind occurred in the stand that I have taken.

The next letter is dated April 1st, 1891, addressed by Mr. Pottinger to Mr. Schreiber:

I send you herewith a copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Shaughnessy by Mr. D. McNicoll, the general passenger agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway, with reference to discrimination by the Intercolonial Railway between the Short Line and via Quebec. * * * Please make a full report to me at once upon this matter. If the statements made by Mr. D. McNicoll are correct, it is very evident there will have to be some change made in connection with our general passenger agent's office. I have repeatedly informed you that the Government will not submit to any discrimination against the Canadian Pacific Railway via St. John.

Yet the hon. gentleman tells me that the pistol was never held to the head of any employee of the Intercolonial Railway. Then, I find, on June 18th, 1892, a letter to Mr. Pottinger from Mr. Schreiber :

I am instructed by the hon. Minister to direct you to grant the Canadian Pacific Railway Company single fare rates for the double journey via St. John on their weekly excursion tickets for the Manitoba and North-west, irrespective of their making a similar through rate via Quebec for these trains.

Passing over our own road again at the instance and demand of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Extract from a letter dated February 8th, 1893, from Mr. Schreiber to Mr. Pottinger :

However unpalatable it may be to us, we must respect the agreement.

Extract from a letter dated February 27th, 1893, from Mr. Pottinger to Mr. J. J. Wallace :

There should be no obstacle put in the way of the Canadian Pacific Railway doing business there, and Mr. McDonald should bear in mind that he has to be neutral as between the Chaudière and St. John routes under the agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

I think my hon. friend was Minister at that time.

Extract from a letter from Mr. J. M. Lyons to D. Pottinger, dated Moncton, 19th April, 1893 :

I understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway representatives make it a canvass to threaten our agents that unless business goes via St. John such agents will suffer when the Canadian Pacific Railway own the Intercolonial Railway. That the practice of making threats is a fact there is no doubt. I have been "held by the throat" (figuratively speaking) by Mr. McNicoll and Mr. McPherson, and threatened, because I would not concede to certain demands. Our agents have been tampered with and made disloyal, and one of the results that Mr. McNicoll threatens me on information, said to be unfavourable towards me, furnished by Intercolonial Railway agents.

Then, this is the official clause :

If we make an effort within the lines of the agreement to secure a share of the traffic that is legitimately Intercolonial Railway, he suggests that his company ignore the agreement, and would have it understood that he lives up to it, while, if we simply allow him to have it all his own way, we are styled "old women."

Extract from a letter of Mr. John M. Lyons to Mr. Pottinger, dated Moncton, October 11th, 1893 :

My people are not doing anything at the time. That is replying to the charge that they were doing something wrong.

They have their instructions on this point, namely, that they must not interfere with passengers ticketed via St. John, and observe the same. We are frequently placed in very uncomfortable positions in following the instructions of the department, that Intercolonial Railway issue of tickets cannot be exchanged at Moncton.

I have an extract of a letter dated at Ottawa, the 27th of October, 1893, from Mr. Schreiber to Mr. Pottinger :

In reply, I desire to say that the traffic agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company must be carefully and fully respected. Outside this agreement, the traffic will be conducted by you as you deem best in the interests of the Government railways,—

They are not to consider what is in the interest of the Government railways, because that was in accordance with the contract, but I think it throws some light upon the interpretation which I have been putting on this contract.

—always bearing in mind that a fight probably means retaliation. If you wade into the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, they will no doubt wade into you. However, it is thought that it would be only a reasonable and friendly act that traffic via St. John for United States points in the west and north-west, or in Manitoba and the Canadian North-west, should be given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the Minister would hardly countenance any other action.

Mr. HAGGART. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend subscribes to that; of course he would. The friendship of the Canadian Pacific Railway is a much more impelling motive than the friendship of the Intercolonial Railway.

Extracts from a letter dated 27th of November, 1893, from Mr. John M. Lyons to Mr. Pottinger :

I also attach a letter of explanation from MacKeen, Intercolonial Railway agent, wherein he emphatically denies this charge made against him, and expresses the opinion that owing to his efforts in behalf of the long haul to Lévis as against the St. John route, an impression has been formed that he worked in the interest of the Chicago route. He shows that out of 18 tickets he issued to Pacific coast points 13 were via St. John and the Canadian Pacific Railway. MacKeen has not pleased the Canadian Pacific Railway because of his active canvass for the Intercolonial long haul as against very strong competition.

If we have to stand this discrimination against the Intercolonial Railway long haul, we should withdraw from agents on commission our issue of tickets via St. John to points in competition with our Lévis route.

It is going to be great up-hill work to compete with the route via St. John, if we must not advise passengers in re Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway connections via our long haul.

It is going to be up-hill work if you are not at liberty to tell a passenger you have a very good line via Lévis. I think, Mr. Chairman, I have pretty nearly enough evidence to satisfy the committee as to the proposition which I started to establish. There is only one other letter which I will read, and it is from Mr. Shaughnessy to Mr. Pottinger, dated October, 1896 :

I have no doubt that freight which shippers definitely consign via Canadian Pacific is being sent that way, but if all unconsigned goods are sent via Intercolonial and Lévis, the neutrality clause is being violated. An agent is certainly not "strictly neutral" who sends all goods via one road, unless they are specifically consigned via the other. To be "strictly neutral" he should divide the unconsigned traffic as evenly as possible between the two roads. Will you please give instructions accordingly. In case, however, that you do not concur in our views as to what the agreement means, I am so confident of the correctness of our interpretation of the agreement that I am quite willing to submit the question to the Railway Department at Ottawa, and, if necessary, to the Department of Justice.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Was it sent to the Department of Justice to see whether the contention was a correct one or not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No; this letter was written to Mr. Pottinger.

Mr. HAGGART. What was the answer sent?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There was no answer to that. I think, while it has taken very much more time than I intended to have devoted to the subject, it has not been time altogether ill-spent, because it has enabled me to establish, I think, the entire correctness of the interpretation I had put upon this contract. More than that, it has established the view which the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) himself and his department, continuously and uninterruptedly, placed upon that contract, so far as it related to the rivalry between the Intercolonial Railway and its Lévis connection on the one hand, and the Canadian Pacific Railway on the other. Let me say a word here, if I am not transgressing the rule, as to some comments made by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) upon this transaction in the course of his remarks the other evening. That hon. gentleman spoke of me as having claimed that I had dealt with the Intercolonial question in a very masterly manner, and that I had also claimed credit for myself for having reduced the expenditure upon the road. The hon. gentleman went on to add that I had no warrant for making any such claim. I would be glad, if the hon. gentleman has occasion to speak during this debate, if he would kindly point to the occasion when I claimed for myself that I had managed the Intercolonial Railway in a masterly manner, or if he would kindly also point to the occasion that I said that the results which had been attained on the Intercolonial Railway had been due to my having made any reduction in the ordinary expenditures, or that I claimed to have practiced any very marked economy. I do not think I made any or either of these claims. I do not say that I might not have made them, but I have not made them up to the present day, so far as my recollection serves me. Even if it were so, my modesty would not permit to have suggested that I had handled the Intercolonial Railway in a masterly manner. I have done nothing down to this moment of the kind. I have simply pointed to results; I have endeavoured to indicate what could be brought about if certain things were done, and as to whether they were masterly or not, my hon. friend is the only one who has thought that that interpretation might properly be put upon them. The hon. gentleman furthermore stated that for every dollar earned upon the Intercolonial Railway I had expended $1.32. The hon. gentleman did not make this appear. I would ask him, having made that specific statement, that he would seize the opportunity, before this debate is over, to show us how and by what means that proposition is capable of being established. I know the success with which the hon. gentleman can manipulate figures. I have heard him manipulating figures for many years. He sat opposite to me in the provincial parliament, for a long while, and his greatest success was in manipulating figures, which never proved anything, and which never led to results. The hon. gentleman's figures in this connection are very much the same, and I think he will experience some little difficulty in pointing out how he reaches the result which he said should be properly arrived at, when he made that statement. If any hon. gentleman cares to look at the Railway Report, under statement No. 6, pages 52 and 54, he will find what the operating charges per train mile on the Intercolonial Railway are. They will be found to be 94 cents per train mile. He will find that, compared with the Canadian Pacific Railway, they are somewhat larger. The Canadian Pacific Railway operating expenses were 84.94 cents, the Grand Trunk 71.09 cents, Canada Atlantic 95.11 cents, Canada Southern 98.07 cents. But if you go to earnings, you will find that the earnings of the Intercolonial have been only 76.97 cents per train mile; Canadian Pacific Railway, 140.45 cents; Grand Trunk, 101.65 cents. It is not true that while the earnings have been increasing the expenses have been growing. That would lead to a different result from that which I am able to establish, and which, I think, I have already established to the satisfaction of Parliament.

Mr. POWELL. Would my hon. friend like an answer now?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I would be very glad to afford the hon. gentleman an opportunity later.

Mr. POWELL. I thought the hon. gentleman was desirous to have it now.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not ask the hon. gentleman to give it now, but I will be glad if he would do it later.

Mr. POWELL. I would ask the hon. gentleman if these figures show the number of cars on the train, because the cost per train mile has nothing whatever to do with the cost per ton.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This is the nearest approximation that you can get to the facts in regard to the cost, and I maintain that it is utterly impossible for any person, I do not care whom, the general manager of the Intercolonial himself, to give information or to give any other calculation than this. It is impossible for you to say what the cost of each car is. It might be done if you took a long time and set a staff of clerks to work to hunt through the whole of the records and accounts in the office to find out how many cars ran, where they ran, and how far each one ran, on a given day, but the return I am reading is the nearest approximation that is practically possible to give, and the hon. gentleman has no access to any information which would approach accuracy nearer.

Mr. POWELL. If the hon. gentleman had put on these large Decapod engines to haul trains and doubled the tonnage of the old trains, the explanation of the hon. gentleman may be entirely accounted for in that way. But it does not show the cost of hauling trains so far as the cost per ton mile is concerned.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The explanation might be accounted for in that way if the facts admitted of it, but the facts do not happen to exist which would enable such an explanation to be given. The large engines spoken of by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) were not upon the road in 1897-98, the figures for which I am now reading. They have only lately been put upon the road, so that the hon. gentleman must get some other fanciful reasons for his theory.

Now, I come to another branch of this discussion which has been the subject of an enormous amount of contention by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. They have shown a clamorous desire for information, and when information is given them they always appear to want just what they have not got, or something which cannot be supplied. No matter how ample the information supplied, they do not appear to be satisfied. A clamour has been raised from the beginning to the end of this Drummond County question, that they ought be furnished with a statement which would enable them to judge the relative proportion of the earnings of that road, and the advantage which has accrued to the Intercolonial Railway by reason of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, as compared with the rest of the Intercolonial Railway. I have said that I could not furnish that information, and I have stated on the authority of the Deputy Minister of my department, that that information cannot be supplied. Notwithstanding that, gentlemen opposite have insisted that I am concealing something, that I can tell just what that relative proportion is, and that there has been a combination on the part of the Minister and his officers, and every one else connected with it, to conceal some facts, which if they were only disclosed, would do what? The hon. gentlemen opposite have not told us, but I suppose they think it would tend to establish that the extension to Montreal has been a failure from a financial point of view, and that our business results would have been better if we had never undertaken this extension. If that is not the inference to be drawn, I am at a loss to conceive what end these gentlemen opposite can hope to serve. My hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) got up the other night, and with an appearance of great sadness—I almost could see the tears drop from his eye—he announced that he was going to be tremendously severe upon the Minister. To judge by him one would think that the result of the animadversions that he was going to cast upon me, would cause me to retire into insignificance. Well, he was severe on me, I suppose, according to the measure of severity he was capable of, and the severe handling I received from him amounted to a statement, that I should be able to tell what the relative earnings of this piece of road is, as compared with the whole Intercolonial, and to give minute figures and details concerning it, because in the case of the Bale des Chaleur Railway, a small piece of road twenty or thirty miles long, I was able to tell what the earnings of that road were and what the cost of operating it was. And the hon. gentleman said that if the Minister could tell that, why could he not tell us all about the extension to Montreal. Well, Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that the two propositions are as wide as the poles asunder. A gentleman who does not know any more about considering a railway problem, than to imagine that I could give the figures and tell every dollar and cent with respect to the extension to Montreal, because I was able to give them on a little road of twenty miles, ought not to attempt to talk about railway matters. We put the Bale des Chaleur, twenty-mile road as it were on one side, and we determined to find out exactly what the traffic on this twenty-mile branch was, how much freight it carried, what the receipts and what the expenses were. This was an independent piece of road, but the hon. gentleman argued that because I could do that, I should be able to tell this House with accuracy what the actual value of the extension to Montreal from a money point of view has been. Why, the proposition only requires to be stated to make its fallacy apparent. How are you going to calculate the enormous value of the Intercolonial Railway being extended to the great city of Montreal? How are you going to judge of the enormous amount of business that has come to the whole Intercolonial Railway line, which never did come before, and which, if we did not carry the line to Montreal, never would have come. These gentlemen opposite who can speak without any sense of responsibility, can declare what these figures are, but if I undertook to furnish the House with a valuation, or to make a contingent estimate, I wonder how long these gentlemen would be before denouncing me for having misled Parliament by pretending to do a thing which is not in my power to do with any approach to accuracy. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) says: You lease a portion of your line to the Dominion Atlantic Railway and do not they pay you year by year an amount which can only be arrived at by knowing just what business is done. Well, the Dominion Atlantic is not a part of our through line; it is not a part of the line which brings any business to us this year more than last; it is not a part of our line that is a feeder of the Intercolonial Railway to any extent, as is the Montreal extension. The Montreal extension opens a gateway whereby traffic enters on the Intercolonial Railway; traffic which never had access to it before. Do I want any better evidence in support of this than the statement made by the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) to the effect, that the condition of things when we had to connect and transfer at Lévis with the Grand Trunk Railway, was, in the interest of the business of the Intercolonial Railway, absolutely intolerable. If that expression of the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) means anything, it meant that there was business which we ought to have got, and which we would have got and could have got, but which we were blocked from getting because our line did not go beyond Lévis. I therefore say, that we have removed the barrier which had been raised against our traffic. We have opened a door which admitted us to the great commercial emporium of Montreal; we have put ourselves in a position by which we can take advantage of every opportunity which is afforded for the increase of our traffic, and, Mr. Chairman, before I sit down I will present figures to this committee which, while they are not minute and in detail, will nevertheless lend additional proof, and will show beyond peradventure, that there is only one possible explanation to account for the enormous increase in the traffic and receipts of the Intercolonial Railway, and that is that we have carried out the policy which the hon. gentleman (Mr.

Mr. BLAIR.

Haggart) admits is the proper policy, but which his indifference or cowardice, or some other reason which I cannot explain, led him to abandon. If he had carried out that policy, as it was his duty to have done, we would before to-day have been realizing advantages which we are only now realizing and enjoying. Well, Sir, what is the case with the Dominion Atlantic? We deal with the Dominion Atlantic upon a mileage basis. Our officers go and see what traffic was hauled over that line, how far it was hauled, and what was received for that haul; and the receipts are divided for that mileage basis, and we get our proportion—a very simple matter, as compared with making anything approaching an actual calculation of the immense volume of business now being done over this extension, and having regard to the other necessary conditions that have to be taken into account.

The hon. gentleman refers to what is being done in the United States as proof of the ease with which such a statement could be furnished. He says, take up the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and what will they show? Why, that upon the 184,000 miles of railway in the United States the returns show the cost earnings per ton mile so much. I say those reports do not always show anything of the kind. There are, no doubt, some companies which make their returns to the Interstate Commission on the basis of the ton mile. There are others—and this is the system which obtains in Canada—which make it up altogether on the basis of the train mile. The one is a totally different system from the other. We could adopt the United States system here, and make up our reports showing the cost per ton per mile of the haul of freights on the Intercolonial; but we have never done that. There is no railway in Canada that does it; and you will see in the report already published tables which show that the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canada Atlantic and other railways, do exactly what the Intercolonial does. The accounts are made up, the staff organized and the returns handed in on the basis of the train mile; and on that basis you can make a comparison between the different companies. We could keep the accounts on the United States basis; but to do so we would require a very much larger staff than we have to-day, and we would not get any further; because, after all is said and done, what is it these hon. gentlemen want? I cannot for the life of me conceive that they want this information to throw any light on this question. I have explained as fairly and as strongly as I could that I cannot give them that information, and that is the reason they cry for it. Do they want it, so that they can judge whether the policy of extending the Intercolonial to Montreal is a wise policy? I do not think they do, because some of the men who clamour the loudest for this information are committed up to the hilt in favour of that policy, others so clamouring have not ventured to declare in Parliament that they are opposed to it ; and the hon. leader of the Opposition may to-day be classified among the latter number. He is the leader of his party ; at least, he has that position officially and nominally, yet, up to the present, he has not given his party any suggestion as to what his position is on this question. I have not yet been able to ascertain it from anything the hon. gentleman has said ; and it is not because he has not spoken lengthily, strongly, vociferously, I might almost add vituperously, on the question. He has not failed in any of these particulars ; but, with them all, he has carefully concealed from Parliament and from his listening and waiting followers the slightest suggestion of what his own mind is. Having studied the question, as he does every question which he comes in reach of, profoundly, he is yet unwilling to disclose to a waiting Parliament and an impatient country, just where he stands on the question of the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal. I am not doing injustice to hon. gentlemen opposite when I say that it is idle for them, when they are already convinced that the true policy, the wisest policy, the thing that ought to be done long ago, is to hasten to get to Montreal, to pretend that they want now to get a close calculation of the past earnings per ton mile carried over that railroad in order to judge whether or not we ought to get to Montreal. That question is settled, is closed absolutely. I do not think there is a gentleman representing Montreal among our friends opposite, who would vote that the Intercolonial should not be extended to Montreal ; and I venture to say further, that there is not a gentleman from the maritime provinces who represents a constituency through which the Intercolonial passes, who would take the responsibility of defeating this extension by his vote, whatever he may say in Parliament. I think it only requires a moment's consideration for any one to see that. I want to deal with this phase of the matter fully and fairly, because the burden of the song which hon. gentlemen opposite have been singing has been that I could give them this information, but would not give it lest it would hurt the proposal, and, therefore, it has been delayed. Now, I want to ask that portion of hon. gentlemen opposite who are fair in their judgment, whether they think that any system of calculation into which I might enter, or any statement which I might lay before Parliament, would fairly indicate the value or volume of the accession to the business of the Intercolonial which is to come by reason of this extension. Are there not members of Parliament—not one, but dozens—who travel over the Intercolonial from the maritime provinces to Montreal, who, until this break between Lévis and Montreal was removed, never travelled over that railway ? It is true, these gentlemen are, perhaps, enjoying the privilege, the fair privilege, of a pass when they come over the Intercolonial ; but they had the same privilege over the Canadian Pacific Railway ; and having that privilege on both roads, I want to know how many gentlemen living in the province of Nova Scotia east of Moncton, came over the Intercolonial during all the years they have been in Parliament before this extension took place ? I would like them to tell me of one who made it a point to do so ; and, if their usage was otherwise, how is it that now it is different ? For the same reason there are hundreds of people who in the course of the year now come over the Intercolonial to Montreal who formerly preferred to come by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Is it not solely and entirely due to the fact that we have extended the Intercolonial into the city of Montreal ? And how are you going to set down in dollars and cents the growth of business, the amount of tonnage of freight, as well as the number of passengers, seeking the Intercolonial, for a large portion of its mileage east of Lévis, on the part of people who never used the Intercolonial Railway before ? I think that you might as well claim that if you were to run a branch line of 15 or 20 miles out from the railway into a gold mine or quarry or something else that yielded you heavy and profitable freight, and that you got thousands of tons of freight by means of that branch, which furnished traffic over the whole road, you might just as well estimate the value of that little piece of branch line on the basis of its business per ton mile and say that is all it is worth, notwithstanding the fact that it furnished paying traffic for the whole of the rest of your main line. If this policy were to be treated and decided upon a basis of a pecuniary test as to the wisdom of its adoption, I would not be afraid to submit it to that test, and refer to the figures which the House has already before it as a fair way of testing the matter.

What were the earnings in 1896-97 ? They were $2,866,000—this was, mark you, before the extension to Montreal. What were the earnings of the present year ? We only have had ten months of the present year, but in those ten months the earnings amount to nearly $3,100,000. Taking the same amount of business that we did, without any percentage of increase, last May and last June over the Intercolonial Railway, and adding it to the present receipts up to date, you get $3,660,000 as the gross earnings of the year. Or, in other words, the gross earnings for the whole year, taking in the two months to come on the same basis as these two months last year, amounts to $3,660,000, as compared with $2,860,000 in 1896. $800,000 mark you, of an increase, and I am going to show the committee a little further what this result means. The mileage in 1896-97 was 1,145 ; in 1898-9 it was 1,313. Taking the receipts for 1896-97, on the mileage we then had, we were earning $2,490 per mile ; and taking the mileage for 1898-9, we are earning $2,740 per mile, or $250 per mile for every mile of the Intercolonial Railway over the earnings in 1896-97. Can it be said that this is due solely to the improvement in business, to the fact that the prosperity we have been enjoying in the upper provinces has reached the provinces by the sea? Are you going to say it is due entirely, or in a large measure, to that? I am going to prove, to the satisfaction of the committee, that such is not the case. It is due to the policy we have adopted; it is due to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman give us the increase of expenditure now due to that increase?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. One proposition at a time. I am probably giving the hon. gentleman as much as he can swallow now, and I would not like to increase the dose unduly lest it might have a serious effect. I think I can furnish proof to a demonstration of my assertion that the increase is not due to the prosperity in the maritime provinces. We all know that times are no better in the maritime provinces to-day than they have been at almost any period during the last ten years. I would be very sorry indeed to make a positive statement that we have been enjoying greater prosperity in the province of New Brunswick, during the last year or two, than at any period during the ten years preceding. What inference do I draw from that? I am going to ask you to examine with me the condition of business on the Intercolonial Railway during the last ten years preceding the year 1897, I am going to show what the business done each year, the highest and the lowest during that period was, and I will tell you what I consider is a fair deduction to draw from the facts. During the ten years from 1887 to 1897, there was a high and a low year. The high year was in 1892, when the gross receipts on the Intercolonial Railway were $3,065,000, and the low year was in 1894, when the gross receipts were $2,940,000. All the other years fluctuated between these two extremes, and the small sum of $125,000 represents the total rise from the low return in 1894 to the high return in 1892, or the drop from the high return in 1892 to the low return in 1894. Those of us who come from New Brunswick—and I think the same remark applies to the other maritime provinces—know that the most prosperous period we have known was when the Wilson tariff was in operation in the United States, and our lumber found access at a low rate of duty into the American markets. That was when the lumber business was prosperous, in my province at least, when the people had money to spend and felt comfortable and easy in their means, and a thrill was felt through every fibre of our commercial being. The lumber business was in that period in the most prosperous condition, but of late years, since the abrogation of the Wilson tariff down to the present moment, it has not been so prosperous, though I am glad to see that there is a considerable improvement in the English market and people are beginning to feel more sanguine. But with the exception of that short period, when the Wilson tariff was in operation, we enjoyed no very large measure of prosperity in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Now, what is the result of the figures I have given? It is that the mileage increase during these years has only been 14 per cent. The mileage increase, since the period I have mentioned, that is down to 1897, has been 168 miles on the Intercolonial Railway. I add this 168 to the previous mileage, and that increase represents a mileage increase of 14 per cent on the Intercolonial Railway. I have shown you that from 1897 down to 1899, there has been an enormous increase of $800,000 in the receipts as compared with an increase of $125,000 from the lowest to the highest figure during the ten years preceding. That means that while we have only increased our mileage, comparatively to the whole of the rest of the line, 14 per cent, we have in this period increased our business over the whole line—I am applying the increased receipts over the whole line—28 per cent. Now, Sir, what figures is it possible to produce that can gainsay the conclusiveness of the deductions I draw from these facts? How are you going to account for this gain in the business of the Intercolonial Railway unless you attribute it to the cause to which I have assigned it and to the policy the Government are now pressing upon the favourable consideration of Parliament? It is plain, I think, to any man who will look and see. It must carry conviction to any man's mind if his mind is open to conviction at all, that any such results as I have disclosed to the committee would have been impossible otherwise than by carrying out the extension to the city of Montreal.

The business of the Intercolonial Railway, during all these ten years, varied only 4 per cent. Just imagine the condition of stagnation which that fact indicates. There was no need of means to stimulate the business of the railway. I never thought that Parliament would be parsimonious if this question were approached in the proper spirit, and if it were made clear to Parliament that there was reasonable and businesslike effort made to turn the Intercolonial Railway to the best account. We need not have been resting for all these years under the conditions we have been living under if my hon. friend had been taking an interest in this matter or had felt a care whether the Intercolonial Railway developed under his administration or not. Four per cent represented the gross variation of the business of the Intercolonial Railway during these years. You cannot point to a live enterprise in any part of Canada which exhibited such discouraging results as are here recorded. And now we see in two years a variation of 28 per cent. And I ask you whether you want me to sit down, whether you want the officers of my department to sit down and figure out fractions here or there or tell what it cost a ton to carry freight over the road, when I am able to present such a conclusion.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) said the increase was $600,000 or $700,000 between the two years.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said $800,000.

Mr. POWELL. If the hon. Minister has the figures, would he kindly give us the comparison between 1897 and 1898?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will get those figures for my hon. friend (Mr. Powell). I chose the year 1897 as the last of the ten years, because it was the last year of the old regime when we were running on the reduced mileage. I have given the House the mileage of the last year as it was during the years my hon. friend was administering the affairs of the road—1,145 miles. I have not taken 1898 because for four months of that time we were running the increased mileage. I have not misled the committee; I have given two years credit for the increase, as you have heard me say. So the statement remains in all its force no matter what the figures may be for the year 1897. My impression is, if the hon. gentleman would accept that for the moment—I will verify the figures—that the receipts were a fraction over $3,000,000. I think the increase for this full year of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway has been between $700,000 and $800,000, as compared with $150,000 or $200,000, or whatever it may be, of the year preceding.

Now, I am glad my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) interrupted me, because it reminds me of a speech he made to Parliament some two years ago, when this subject was first under consideration. He dealt with a statement which I had furnished to Parliament from the reports of my Deputy Minister, and of the general manager of the Intercolonial Railway. And I remember how my hon. friend revelled in his ridicule and denunciation of the statement thus presented. If my memory serves me well, I think that "Hansard" will show that the officers of my department were of opinion that the first full year's operations of the Montreal extension would give earnings up to $3,800,000, and perhaps some fraction over. My hon. friend caught up the statement, he seized upon the details by which the officers of my department reached that conclusion, and he delighted himself, I am sure, whether he delighted Parliament or not, with the thoroughness with which he tore and shattered this statement. Why, he proved by figures, absolutely by figures, that this was a mere "phantom estimate." Those were his very words. He will remember the satisfaction with which he destroyed the value of these figures and the predictions which I had been making. I was not vain enough to assert that I had formed or could form much of an opinion on the matter myself; I told the House that I gave the estimate of the officers of my department. When we said that the earnings of the Intercolonial Railway for the first full year were going to be something over $3,800,000, he jumped upon the proposition and essayed to smash it into a thousand pieces. What conclusion did he arrive at? Instead of there being a prospect of a surplus, he said that the figures which these gentlemen had made and which the Minister of Railways and Canals had endorsed, proved as conclusively as the logic of facts and experience could prove anything, that we were going to have a deficit of between three-quarters of a million and a million on the first year's operation under these conditions. And my hon. friend pictured with sadness and grief, the full strength and depth of which he found it difficult to exhibit to Parliament, the enormous disaster that was going to come upon this country for acting upon the representations I had made to Parliament, and the policy I was asking Parliament to adopt. Now, the figures which to the hon. gentleman's mathematical and rhetorical mind appeared so chimerical, have almost been reached. How far are we from $3,800,000? Why, you are a good deal closer to it than the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was when he told how many bushels of wheat we were going to raise in the North-west, and how much would be realized from the sales of land. I only wish that my hon. friends, in their railway calculations, had always come within a thousand miles of where we stand when we compare our predictions with the results.

Now, my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) ventured a prediction, too. He is not wise to prophesy until he knows; and the same admonition, I think, might be taken to heart by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). I am glad, Sir, he started out as he did, because I will be fairly justified hereafter in claiming that when he furnishes you with figures in the future, you will know just what value to attach to them. If my hon. friend is deprived of the privilege and advantage of reveling in fanciful figures, he is absolutely at a loss; therefore, I am not at all sorry that he has given us an opportunity of forming a sound judgment as to the value and importance to be attached to his calculations when he seriously presents them to Parliament.

Now, Sir, remember that the figures which I gave the other day, show the result of the operations for about nine months. I have a statement here showing, a little later, what the operations of the road are. I received a telegram the day before yesterday from Moncton, and they advised me that they have been able to make up returns for the month of April, showing what the expenditures were up to the 1st of May, what the receipts were, and what the balance is for the ten months. I showed you that, up to the first of the month preceding that, we had, I think I stated, some $13,000 or $14,000 of a balance. Up to the 1st of March the balance was $364. There was an improvement in March to the 1st of April, and it has become still better in April to the 1st of May. Now, the receipts for the ten months ending on the 30th of April have been $3,063,768.34. The working expenses up to that date have been $3,001,198.45, showing a net result of $62,569 on the right side. Now, we have not achieved this result by starving the road. I commenced earlier than was ever commenced before with our ballasting. We have not been skimping the road, we have not been starving it; we intend to keep it up as well as we can. I am not going to say but that I would feel, personally, very much like acting upon the declared policy of the hon. gentleman who preceded me in this office; I am in entire accord with the declaration he made the other day, when he said, that he felt that it was proper on the Intercolonial Railway, no matter if you had a large surplus, not to put that into the treasury, but to spend it for the betterment of the road, to use it to the advantage of the railway. The country does not look for any great return by way of surplus upon the operations of the railway. I think that is a point worthy of consideration. But down to the present moment I have not started in at all to starve the Intercolonial Railway road. Well, where do we stand now, relatively to the position occupied by my hon. friend, when he was in charge of the department? In 1894-95, the hon. gentleman, instead of having $62,500 to his credit, had $94,300 to his debit; in other words, he was in a less favourable position than we are to-day to the extent, in round figures, of $157,000. In 1895-96, he was $148,000 in a less favourable position than we are to-day, because he had $85,500, in round figures, of a deficit on the 1st of May, as against the $62,500 of a surplus which I have shown on the 1st of May. You see the comparison is going on. Now, we have paid all our expenses, we have paid our charges of maintenance, and we show $150,000 of an improvement. Now, where did all that come from? Can anybody be in doubt when I show you that, under ten years former operation, its whole receipts never varied more than $125,000 in that whole period? Why, you can find $170,000 better showing in our operation for ten months. In other words, you have $320,000 better showing, estimating the surplus at $50,000 for the current year, than you had before. How do I make this out. Add to the $50,000 surplus the rental paid for the extension, $210,000, and the maintenance charges for the Grand Trunk, $60,000. Now, where has that come from? I want that question answered. I do not think that any juggling with figures, I do not think that any pretense at a demand for information, is going to furnish an answer to that question. There is just one place, one source, from which we could look for this increase in our receipts, this improvement in our position, and that is the business which has come to the railway by reason of the extension to the city of Montreal.

Now, Sir, I come down to the question of the Grand Trunk contract. At the outset, I know my hon. friend, Mr. Haggart, if he repeats the experiment of the other evening, is going to find a great deal of fault with the legal form, with the phraseology, and with the drafting of this agreement. He is going to indulge in some very severe strictures upon the lawyers who have done the drafting of this paper, and he is going to visit the full weight of his displeasure upon the Justice Department. He is going to characterize the men who have had a hand in connection with the drafting of this paper, as dolts and fools, and he is going to tell us that it is a disgrace to anybody to have had a hand in its preparation. That is what my hon. friend is going to tell us. Well, my hon. friend's experience with such documents is no doubt very considerable; he has perhaps a very astute mind, and he may know better than people who have had much experience in drawing up such papers, how they should be drawn up. But there is one thing, which, I think, will probably operate as a little restraint upon my hon. friend. He started out, thundering a condemnation against this document, and, when he found that the Justice Department had a hand in it, and that it met with the approval of the officers of that department, in whom he has always had, up to the present time, unbounded confidence, because he could not recall what he had said, he had to go ahead, and he became still more severe, after he knew that the Justice Department had really superintended the preparation of the papers. I tried to follow the hon. gentleman as well as I could. Where the hon. gentleman was clear and explicit, I am bound to say, that I think he was entirely wrong; and, where he was not wrong, he was so confused and mixed up, that I could not make anything out of his statement. Perhaps my hon. friend will be a little more cautious from what occurred the other day after he spoke, or what occurred during the progress of the discussion. Two or three lawyers on his side took part in the discussion, and the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) spoke at considerable length. From the way that he danced about among the figures, I judge that he was short of material; he would, no doubt, have been very glad, if he could have found some pretext for attacking either the illegality, or the informality, or the deficiency in this document in some form; but he fought shy of it, and never touched it; he kept a safe distance away. That ought to be a warning to my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals. Then, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) also rose to speak on this question; he was full of it, and he was not at all sensitive about condemning it. He would have been only too glad to have visited this document with his condemnation if he could have done it on the ground that the hon. ex-Minister of Railways condemned it, but he kept entirely clear from that proposition. So, I think, my hon. friend will, perhaps, have to take a little caution from the fact that the legal gentlemen, the men who would naturally know what they are talking about, in discussing that question in this House, were careful not to repeat or endorse or approve the criticisms of my hon. friend. I think my hon. friend had better tarry in the region of railway administration and not get into the legal phase of the question. Now, I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw the remark that no first-class lawyer would ever be responsible for any document of this kind, the allegation that this does not convey any rights except from St. Lambert to Ste. Rosalie, and that the drafting of this agreement is a disgrace to any department. I dare say my hon. friend feels, now, in a more friendly mood towards the gentlemen who are responsible for this agreement, and I would ask him, out of consideration for them, to withdraw his severe observations.

The committee will find, if they refer to the resolution, that there are a good many errors in the resolution as printed. They are typographical errors and will be corrected later. I fancy that the proof-reading has not been quite perfect, but the resolution, as it is found in the later motion, I think, will not contain these errors I have referred to. I will call attention, if it is necessary, to them later on in committee, but I think they will be then found all right. I directed that these corrections should be made, and I expect they will be found to have been made. Now, Sir, this resolution asks Parliament to confirm a lease which the Government has entered into, subject to the approval of Parliament, with the Grand Trunk Railway Company for a term of 99 years, with a condition of renewal, of its line from the Chaudière end, which need not be dwelt upon, of the line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, in which part of the company's property we get a one-half interest and title. We have in that portion of the line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert as much ownership as the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself. If the Grand Trunk Railway owns any of it we own as much. The lease continues and gives us the right to have the full user, for all the business and all the trade of the Intercolonial Railway, of the Victoria Bridge, and it continues and gives us station rights, terminal facilities as they are owned to-day by the Grand Trunk Railway in and around the city of Montreal. It is the proper policy, they all say, to take the Intercolonial Railway into the city of Montreal. But you have not chosen the right place; you ought to have taken some other means; you ought to have taken some other route; you ought to have done, in some events, in some particular, directly contrary, or, at all events, different from the way you have done. The hon. ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), last night sounded the line of opposition which he is going to take.

Mr. TALBOT. He sounded Gabriel's trumpet.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, he sounded the trumpet and indicated that he does not like this arrangement we are making to get into Montreal. He has not so much fault to find with the Drummond County part of the scheme. I am glad to learn that, as I intimated when my hon. friend made the statement, that the position of my hon. friend has changed from what it was in times past. If any hon. gentleman in this committee will recall the discussion which took place in 1897, upon this proposition, I will venture to say that they will recall this impression left in their minds by the Opposition, that while they, the Opposition, condemned the Grand Trunk arrangement and did not think very favourably of it, the depth of infamy was sounded in respect to the Drummond County proposition. I cannot be mistaken about that. These hon. gentlemen said, what the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals said the other night, only they said it in the reverse way. He said the most infamous transaction that any Government in Canada had ever been guilty of was this transaction for acquiring the Drummond County Railway. He had scarcely had that statement well launched when he proceeded to say that a greater and more infamous transaction was consummated when the Grand Trunk contract was entered into. My hon. friend is putting the proposition simply the reverse way of the way it was put two years ago. So that, if my recollection serves me, these gentlemen have had further light. I think the light results from this fact, that when they came to discuss the Drummond County contract they found that the more the contract was discussed the better it appeared, the more commendable it was in every respect and the better was the feeling throughout this entire country as respects its terms. If we had taken up the Grand Trunk agreement first and discussed that, the same consequences would have followed, because, I venture to say, that if this question of the Grand Trunk is discussed thoroughly in this House there will not be any real, honest, sincere opposition to it, and there will not be a corporal's guard, in the country, surrounding these hon. gentlemen. The more this proposition is discussed, the more clearly it is presented to the people, the more light they get upon it, the more acceptable it will be, and I am going to shed a little light upon it. I have never discussed it very fully—

Some hon MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have never discussed it very fully. I was foolish enough; I was so inexperienced and so unsophisticated when I first presented this proposition to Parliament, that I really thought that when I had a proposition that was a good proposition to put before the House it would be accepted as such by the Opposition side of the House. I frankly admit that my eyes have been opened. I have only been here a couple of years, but I have reached rather the opposite conclusion, and it is that the better a transaction is the more these hon. gentlemen will oppose it. I have been driven reluctantly and painfully to that conclusion. I say that if this Grand Trunk proposition had been put before Parliament and discussed first, the hon. ex-Minister of Finance would have been putting the proposition in the very reverse way from that in which he has put it, and I will predict now that he will not get very much more comfort out of his discussion of the Grand Trunk agreement than he got out of the discussion of the Drummond County Railway agreement. I say with all confidence, that the more this arrangement is considered, the more thoroughly it is understood—and it is difficult to get these railway propositions fully before the public mind and the public understanding—the more it is known and understood, the more strongly it will appeal to the approval and commendation of the country. I venture to say that after a few years have passed, and the country has ceased to be agitated by the political issues raised in connection with this matter, there will be a consensus of opinion all over Canada, that this has been the best railroad arrangement that has ever been made by a Government of the Dominion.

It may be assumed then that it is good policy to bring the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. How are we going to get there? I think it can be shown that the way we are proposing to get to Montreal is the most economical, the shortest, and in every way the best that can be suggested. Let any other proposal that may be made be examined critically—I am willing that this proposition shall be examined critically in its minutest details—and I say that if this proposition of ours is compared with any other, I believe that Parliament will conclude, and this country will conclude, that our arrangement is the best, the cheapest, the wisest, the most effective and satisfactory mode of reaching Montreal that it was possible for this or any Government to adopt. Now, let us remember this. In going from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal we are going over a piece of railway which is as well built, as substantial in every respect, and as permanent in all particulars, as any piece of railway on this continent. Anybody who knows the road knows that to be a fact. In getting a half ownership in that piece of railway, you are acquiring an interest in a railway that goes through one of the richest, one of the most productive, one of the most populous, one of the most promising sections of country in Canada. Are you not? In getting that piece of railway, you are not only getting—as the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) said last night—the right to use the tracks and run our trains over it, but you are getting the right and the title to all the business which it is possible for you to pick up on that section of the road.

Mr. FOSTER. On through trains?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not on through trains, but on any trains we choose to run over this line. On that piece of road, whenever and wherever it pleases us, having regard, of course, to railway usage, we are just as free as the Grand Trunk Railway itself. We are as well equipped as the Grand Trunk Railway to provide for local traffic, and every dollar we get goes into our own exchequer and not a cent of it into the pockets of the Grand Trunk Railway. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is speaking of something which he does not know, which he has not studied. He is doing what he too often does—and in that particular he is like many of his friends on his side of the House—he is condemning a proposal the particulars of which he has not informed himself upon, for he undertook last night in unmeasured terms to condemn this arrangement, and yet he did not know until the present moment that we own the half of that road as fully as the Grand Trunk Railway owns it, and that all the earnings we can get go into our own exchequer. I would advise the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to be a little cautious before he expresses himself too hastily on this question. There is nothing to be gained by a gentleman in Opposition—simply because he is in Opposition—condemning in the most helter-skelter fashion each and every proposal made by the Government. I would remind him that he is apt to have these statements which he has made in this haphazard careless manner, confronting him in the future to his disadvantage. It is just as well for him to acquaint himself somewhat fully with the question he is debating, and then pass his judgment on it. I venture to say, that when that gentleman and those associated with him, condemn in unmeasured terms the mode by which we propose to reach Montreal, he is not cognizant of the conditions which exist if he undertakes to reach that city by any other means. He has not studied the situation, he does not know where he would land himself, if he committed any party with which he may be allied, to decide to reach Montreal by some other means than that which we are now proposing.

Now, Sir, I will go into this subject at some little detail, step by step, because if I can help it, I do not propose to leave these gentlemen opposite a single leg to stand on in their condemnation of this arrangement. I came down to Parliament with it because I felt in my own mind, after applying the best judgment I could to the question, that it was a proposal that should commend itself favourably to members on both sides of the House, and in saying that I do not pretend to suggest that there are not some minor particulars which I would have liked to have changed, but as to which, when you are making a contract to which the other party has to give its consent, you have got to consider the general end to be achieved, and you have to consider the contract as a whole. This pettyfogging criticism of minor details may be necessary from a political standpoint, but when you are dealing in a business way with this problem, they are not things which you can afford to give much weight to. Now, Sir, I say that we have got as good a piece of road, and we are going across as splendid, and as safe and secure a bridge structure as is to be found on the continent of America. None better, and double-tracked withal. There is no question about delay, you have two tracks, and you can speed on your way over this secure structure which cost a very large amount of money. I presume it is a matter of common knowledge what that bridge cost. It cost a great deal more when built by the Grand Trunk Railway, perhaps, than if built to-day. It cost some $10,000,000 altogether, and as I understand, it probably could be built for $6,000,000 to-day, but there is that great structure which is a source of pride to the country, and we are in a position under this contract to utilize to the full extent the railway opportunities which that bridge affords.

Well, now, when we are in Montreal what do we get? We are getting the use of terminals and facilities which are of inestimable value; the real value of which it is difficult for any man who has any credit to sustain, to estimate in dollars and cents. Somebody may say: Oh, you are getting the use of all these terminals, but in your little business you cannot use them all. We cannot use them all at once, it is true, but we can use them all at times, and I will venture to say, that taking into consideration, the terminals and connections which the Grand Trunk Railway is throwing open under this contract, to our free and uninterrupted use, any portion of them we may need, and any portion we may rightly be supposed to need and require to use in the course of a year's business.

It is all very well for gentlemen who do not know anything about railway arrangements—and that was the way the examination was conducted before this committee by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) and other gentlemen—to talk as if all you wanted was rails enough laid down to carry your cars and engines—as if no other requirements were needed, and as if, instead of these acres and miles of terminals, simply a corner for the use of the Intercolonial Railway would give you a cheaper and more beneficial arrangement. Let me say, with all respect to these gentlemen, that such a proposition would not commend itself to anybody who knew anything of the running of a railway. What do these terminals and connections mean? They mean that they enable you to reach all points, to load or unload your cars, or where you want to make connection with another line, and receive or deliver freight. If you only had a few sections of these terminals assigned to you, and you were compelled to limit yourself to these, where would you be, when you wanted to get freight for the Intercolonial from some other portion of the terminals? You would actually have to employ teams and pay cartage to get the freight carted to the railway. In the same way, in the delivery of freight, if you wanted to get to a certain point—here a lumber yard, here a cattle yard, here wharfs, here immigration sheds—you would be able to carry the different classes of business to wherever they might be located, at different points of the terminals. If, instead of having the use of all the terminals, we were crowded, as hon. gentlemen opposite would have us be, into a corner, we should be absolutely paralysed. It is simply absurd to hear these gentlemen criticise this railway proposition in the way they do. I do not complain very much, and I do not censure them: they are doing it out of the fulness of their want of knowledge. If they knew more, they would not have these things to say. It must be very amusing to the railway magnates connected with our various railway systems to read the criticisms these hon. gentlemen are making on this proposal. We have acres and miles of the best terminals and yards to be found, not simply in Canada. There is nothing like them in Canada, and I do not know anything like them outside of Canada. They are the accumulation of years. They have cost hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of dollars. The Grand Trunk Company will tell you frankly and truthfully that $20,000,000 would not equip them as they are equipped to-day; and is anybody going to say, that it is not of value to the Intercolonial, whose object is to get in the quickest and least expensive manner to the point where it is to receive and deliver its freight, to be so placed that it can get there, especially as it does not cost any more than it would have cost us, had we allowed ourselves to be crowded into a corner? By this arrangement, we are enjoying all the facilities which the means and the experience of the Grand Trunk have provided for itself during the many years that it has been in operation. Further than that, we are getting right into the centre of Montreal. We are centrally located; we are where we can pick up business; I say, without any hesitation, that, if we could not get into Montreal so that we would be right alongside of and in connection with either the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific Railway, my feeling would be against making the attempt to reach the city at all. I am trying at the present moment to make arrangements to have a Pullman or Wagner car put on the Canada Atlantic train coming to Ottawa, so that, if a gentleman wants to travel from Ottawa to Halifax, or from Halifax to Ottawa, all he has to do is to get aboard his car and go right through, without having to make any transfer. What sort of position would we be in, if a passenger leaving the Grand Trunk in Montreal had to take a cab to get to the Intercolonial? We have got to the centre of the city, and that is where we want to get, near the hotels and near the business. People who come by the Grand Trunk, or the Canada Atlantic, are alongside of our train, and those who reach the city by the Canadian Pacific Railway are not very far from our train. It is only a step from the Canadian Pacific Railway depot to the station at the foot of the hill, where they can board the Intercolonial. I say that is worth money. I do not think I am a wild and extravagant man in my ordinary ideas; but I say it is not business, it is not intelligent, it is not enterprising, to talk about a five, or fifteen, or twenty dollar bill in connection with an arrangement which involves such important results, and which, when done right, is done for all time, and which, if done wrong, had better never have been done at all. What is the complaint, then? Why, you are paying too much money; you are giving $140,000 a year. Well, Mr. Chairman, are we? This question is entitled to be considered from two points of view. Upon any ordinary and reasonable way of making a calculation of the money we propose to pay the Grand Trunk, are we giving them too much? Is there some other means of working out this problem and getting what we need at less cost? There are the two points of view. Let us see what is the fairer judgment to pass on the question, looked at from the first point of view. We say to the Grand Trunk: We will give you $140,000. We do not divide the amount up and appropriate $37,500 to the Ste. Rosalie-St. Lambert line, $40,000 to the bridge, and $62,500 to the terminals. We put all these together, and we dealt with the whole thing as one general proposition, although, of course, we reached our conclusion by looking at the details. They made their propositions, and we made our offers, having the details in our mind. Remember, we had no compulsory powers. We could not compel the Grand Trunk to accept our proposition. We had to come to an agreement with them or the agreement was not going to take place. They had the option of saying on what terms they would allow us to enjoy these privileges, and we had the option of saying whether their terms were such as we considered in the interest of the country, and, in view of the policy we thought ought to be carried out, we would be justified in acceding to. That is the point of view. While I say this with regard to the division of the rentals over the three sections, I do it because it is not a material question, and I do not care whether, when you are judging as to the reasonableness or fairness of a rental of $140,000, you apportion more or less to any one particular part of these divisions. I say that for this reason. I find that there is a disposition among the Opposition to say: Oh, you are getting the bridge very reasonable, it is worth more than that, but you are paying too much for the railway section. Well, as a matter of fact, the railway company wanted $50,000 annual rental for the bridge, and in the negotiations they stood very firm for a long time upon that. In other words, they wanted $150,000 for what they finally agreed to give us at $140,000. We said to them: We cannot give you $150,000, but will give you $140,000, and $10,000 was taken off. I do not know that the $10,000, in the minds of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, are taken off the bridge or off the terminal rental, or the Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert end. I do not care which end it is taken off, that does not alter the case. The question is: Are you giving too much on the whole or are you not? I say we are not. I say we have made a good arrangement. I say that when you examine the figures I have given you, I think even my hon. friends opposite will be disposed—whether they will acknowledge it or not—to admit that the arrangement was a good one.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am really afraid, Mr. Chairman, that I am unduly trespassing upon the indulgence of the committee in taking so much time to discuss this question, but I may be permitted to plead in extenuation that I do not think I have ever risen in this House, since I have been a member of it, unless I felt under compulsion, in fact, to do so; and now that I am on my feet, I propose, if the House will permit me, to treat the question thoroughly and to present, as clearly as I am able, what is my own judgment upon the question. I think

I will not be presuming too much if I say that, as the responsibility of working out this whole question more directly devolved upon myself, I am supposed to be better informed upon it than any of my colleagues, and it is only reasonable that I should take the time I consider necessary to present the case to the best of my ability.

I was proceeding to point out to the committee what I thought would be a fair view to take of the whole question, looking at it in detail, as respects the different sections. I would ask you to keep, however, always present in your mind, the suggestion I made a while ago, that this question must be dealt with as a whole, and yet I have not concealed from the House, either on this or any previous occasion, the amounts of rental I applied in my own mind to each section, by which I reached the result that we can afford to give $140,000 per year rental, and that the contract was not an unreasonable one to make.

Now, subject to this reservation, I am willing to examine, and will for a few moments examine, the question as to whether we are paying an unreasonable rental, when we are applying, if you like, $37,500 a year to that portion of the road which extends from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert. The mileage of that section is thirty-two miles. When you arrive at St. Lambert, there are considerable approaches before you reach the bridge, but the section from St. Lambert is the section to which, if we apply any part of the rental at all, we would apply the $37,500. You will see that, taking the rental of the whole, $140,000, that would amount, capitalized at 3 per cent—which is, I suppose, the lowest amount of interest any person would think we could fairly estimate upon—$4,500,000 as the cash value of the property, the privileges, the rights, which we are in the whole acquiring. Well, the Grand Trunk Railway people said to me, in the course of the negotiations, that they thought it would not be unfair that we should, if we required half its rights and title in the railway from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, allow the company interest upon one-half its cost, and that cost was $1,500,000. It is just possible that that amount may be somewhat in excess of what the Grand Trunk Railway Company could have built that section for to-day. That is just possible. But you had to get the Grand Trunk Railway Company's consent before you could make a bargain; and they strongly contended that it would be a fair valuation to put upon that property to estimate it at what it cost them, and divide that sum by two. Then as to the question of the interest upon that, they said that 5 per cent was a proper rate to allow; and in the discussion it came out that the Grand Trunk at that moment were paying 5 per cent upon the money which they had borrowed to construct this line. Unless you had some means to compel them to do that which they did not feel it fair to be called upon to do, which they would not voluntarily consent to do, you could not expect them to allow us to fix the rental at a less rate than 5 per cent, the rate they were paying. It is not fair either to say that the Grand Trunk, with the improved conditions and lowered rate of money in the market, could borrow at 4 per cent, and, therefore, this should be estimated on the basis of 4 per cent. That is a matter which, I think, would not be arguable, and for the reason I have already suggested—that they must be a consenting party to the transaction. Let us take it, then, on that basis. Is $750,000 for half the road an unreasonable sum to allow? Is 5 per cent interest an unreasonable rate? I would say that neither the principal sum nor the rate of interest is unreasonable. I will tell you why I think so. When you estimate as closely as you can the cost of building another line of railway equally as favourably situated between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, you find that it would cost you a great deal more than the $750,000 which they ask you to allow as half. It will cost you a good deal more than that—and I will show in a moment that it will cost you a great deal more—you are not making an excessive or unreasonable allowance to the Grand Trunk. And the rate of interest is not much to be considered when you consider that the terms of the bargain will enable us to realize the profits of operating that line. Those profits would soon extinguish the extra 2 per cent representing the difference between the 5 per cent which the Grand Trunk are paying and the 3 per cent at which the Government can borrow money. Let us look at the question of the cost of a new section, a question which, in all respects but one, that is, the matter of land damages, can be closely ascertained. I will show, at a later stage, how much the officers and engineers of my department tell me it would cost to duplicate that line—not to make as good a line, because we would not make as good a line for the money they have estimated, but to make a line we would be able to use. Assuming that we have not made an unreasonable allowance in $37,500, and bearing in mind that if it be unreasonable, you have only to take off $10,000 on the ground I have suggested and you get $27,500—we find ourselves at St. Lambert. Is there any objection made to the arrangement with the Grand Trunk for the use of the bridge? I have not heard any. I can go further and say we have all heard one of the gentlemen opposite, the arithmetical rhetorician of the party, stating that the arrangement with respect to the bridge is not an unfair arrangement. As to the terminals, I think they speak for themselves. I have pointed out how valuable these are. I may add that before I received from the Grand Trunk the statement as to the amount they would consider fair rental for the use of these privileges, I had the officers of my department go into the matter very fully and carefully. And the figures which the chief engineer gave me, and which I had in hand when I received those of the Grand Trunk, was over $61,000, and within a few hundred dollars of what the Grand Trunk had, in their statement when they made up the sum to cover the use of these privileges. So, I take it, if we are to use the line to St. Lambert, if we are to cross this bridge and to use these terminals, the amount is not excessive. Now, I suppose that some hon. gentlemen opposite will repeat what they have already said. I take it that the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), who, I would judge, has his eye upon the Department of Railways and Canals in the future, and who, I regret, is not here to-night, has given the House the benefit of his railroad experience in the estimate of the cost of the construction of the line and the building of a new line. I only regret, seeing the merely nominal figures at which he avows he can find responsible men to build these lines, to construct these bridges, that he has kept his great light so long hid under a bushel. He was the adviser and friend of the late Government for many years; but they never profited by his vast experience and wonderful capabilities. Where has my hon. friend from Glengarry been all these years, with his knowledge of how to touch the button and bring about the construction of all these great works at merely nominal figures? He is much to blame and has been greatly remiss in his duty to his party, not to speak of his larger duties to his country, when, having this vast knowledge and experience, he permitted his friends to indulge in such atrocious expenditures of public money in the prosecution of their railway enterprises and never raised his voice in protest.

Let me just for one moment refer to something which I came across yesterday in an editorial article of the "Mail and Empire," and which may be appropriately mentioned here. The editor of this paper has expressed his views in regard to this arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway. We know, without my stating it, what that opinion would be. But they have been giving expression to an idea here which seems to me to be scarcely worthy of the source from which it sprung as the organ of a great party. They say:

The rejection of the deal by the Senate has resulted in a revision of the terms, and now, instead of paying five per cent on half the cost of construction, we are to contribute four per cent upon a proportion of the cost calculated upon the user.

But we are still to pay $140,000 a year as rental for ninety-nine years.

This sum is equivalent, on the annuity principle, to $4,500,000 with interest.—

Calculating the interest at 3 per cent, which I presume, is the rate they have taken, it would produce about that amount.

—that is to say,—

—it goes on to remark—

Mr. BLAIR.

—if we were to borrow $4,500,000 and pay $140,000 a year back, the capital and the interest would be covered by the end of the ninety-nine years.

That is a somewhat startling proposition to me. If it is true, the editor of the "Mail and Empire" has made a discovery which ought to land him in a position of opulence greater than even Croesus could boast of. If you can borrow four and a half millions, and by paying 3 per cent, extinguish the principal in 99 years, that is a feat of financial legerdemain in which, I think, they should not continue to hold the exclusive property. But let us take the figures at $4,500,000, and where are we in this calculation? Is there anybody in this House who has applied his mind to it, or who has availed himself of reliable information, who is able to show that you could start from Ste. Rosalie, build a line to St. Lambert, and construct a bridge across the St. Lawrence River, and get into an equally favourable situation to the one we are in Montreal to-day, with an expenditure of $4,500,000 only? I would like to see the individual who would pledge his credit, if he had any credit to pledge, to the establishment of any such proposition. I would like to see my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance do it, although he may be very familiar with the intricacies of governmental finance, but whom I would scarcely like to trust in making a calculation of the probable cost of railway construction on the basis of his statement in the House the other day. I venture to say that $4,500,000 will not begin to give us the valuable and extensive terminals we have in Montreal alone, or give us the location which we have in Montreal. I venture to say that $4,500,000 by no process of calculation and under the construction of no contractor or engineer, let him be even the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), would be sufficient to put the Intercolonial Railway into any part of the city of Montreal, or place us where the people of this country would be content that the Intercolonial Railway, their Government railway system, should be located. More than that, I do not believe that it could be done for four times that amount, from the information which I have been able to gather; at all events, I will say it cannot be done for anything like the sum represented by $140,000 rental, capitalized at 3 per cent.

Now, if you are not disposed to take advantage of the opportunity which there lies at your hand, if you are not prepared to turn to account, as you can as fully and as adequately as if you owned every fraction of the railway, so far as the purposes of the Intercolonial Railway system are concerned, if you are not content to take advantage of the opportunity, I was almost going to say, which God and nature had put into our hands, but which I will say the Grand Trunk Railway have agreed to let us use upon those terms, if you are not willing to take advantage of those terms and of those facilities, but are going to start out in the construction of another road on your own account, let us see where this construction is going to land you. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) would build another line. I judge so. Well, is he going to build to St. Lambert? Has he any idea what it would cost? I can give him an idea of what it will cost, founded, not upon my own unaided judgment, but upon the careful estimates and calculations of my officials in the department, made not to-day, not yesterday, but before I was prepared to recommend to my colleagues the adoption of this scheme. Well, what are these calculations? These calculations are that it would cost, for the laying down of the line of 32 miles, $485,440, independently of the two great bridges, one across the Yamaska and one across the Richelieu, and outside of the probable large amount of land damages which you would be called upon, and would be called upon, to pay. Now, $485,000 would be the cost, according to the judgment of the officials of the department, if we were to undertake to build a railway through an ordinary country; but mind you, this is not an ordinary country, as I will show you before I have proceeded much further. Well, it is going to cost $400,000 to build a bridge across the Richelieu River, and it is going to cost $300,000 to build a bridge over the Yamaska. There you have got $1,185,440 as the estimated cost of building the 32 miles of railway from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert. And, mark you, you have in this calculation only allowed land damages, at from $100 to $150 per acre. Now, when you come to consider the expropriation of the right of way through that country from St. Lambert to Ste. Rosalie, who is going to say what the amount of those damages will be? There are, to begin with, no less than 11 or 12 considerable towns and villages, some of them of considerable magnitude, towns which have grown up since the Grand Trunk Railway was built. The Grand Trunk Railway Company did not have to pay land damages when they built their line upon the same basis we would have to pay them if we were to build a road which will serve all these towns and villages. Just imagine getting the right of way through 11 towns and villages, one of them, at least, of the importance of St. Hyacinthe, and hon. gentlemen in the committee know the importance of the other places. Is it reasonable, would any Government be safe, would I not be worthy of the severest condemnation, if, as Minister of Railways, I advised my colleagues that we could expropriate the right of way from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert on the basis of even $150 per acre? Why, Sir, it would be idle for me to make any such proposition. You cannot tell, when you go into the question of land damages, just where you are going to land. It would be the part of prudence of any Government to pay a little more than they think would be even a reasonable value of this railway, than incur obligations the magnitude of which no man could foresee. We are not without experience, and the late Government was not without experience of this question of land damages when they found it necessary to expropriate property. In the case of the St. Charles branch alone we see just how those land damages roll up—the enormous sum of $1,000,000 for the land alone that was required for that road of 14 miles. And they did not go through 11 or 12 towns and villages, they did not go through a country of the same value as the country from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert. There is no gentleman familiar with both countries that will not bear me out in that statement. So I say that it was the part of prudence for this Government to avail themselves of the opportunity which was open, when they knew there was a limit to the liabilities that they were assuming, and when they knew they could get all they required at a reasonable sum, unhampered with any unforeseen liabilities.

Well, Sir, we have then, $1,185,000, besides an unknown sum to be added to this for the land damages which we would have to pay for the new road to St. Lambert. How much are you going to add for land damages? Well, if you only added one-half of what it took to pay the land damages for less than half the distance on the St. Charles branch, if you only added half a million you would have to pay $1,685,000. Then what would you have? A railway which, to all intents and purposes, would be in direct competition, and would have opposed to it all the business interests, all the energy, and all the enterprise of the Grand Trunk Railway. How much traffic would you be able, under those circumstances, to pick up along your own little line, which you are conducting for yourselves, independently of the Grand Trunk Railway and in competition with the Grand Trunk Railway? Moreover, you have to bear this in mind, a most important consideration which you must never allow to drop out of view when you are considering the value of this proposition in all its bearings. You have got to pay the whole cost of maintenance, for the establishment of all the stations, for the salaries of all the officials, ticket agents, station agents, baggagemen, porters, trackmen, sectionmen, telegraphers, despatchers, the whole staff of labourers from one end to the other; you have to maintain all these on your own independent line, without any assistance and without any contribution from any quarter. But you are getting all the railway facilities you require to the fullest and the amplest extent, as I have enumerated them, and you are paying by your rental a proportion of the cost of these charges which are borne in part by the Grand Trunk Railway Company under the existing system. You have, therefore, a very potential series of facts to the credit of the transaction, when you come to look at them closely and see their relative weight and importance. Well, Sir, you have then $2,500,000 out of $4,500,000 that I have already disposed of.

Mr. FOSTER. How much is there for land damages?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I estimated $500,000 for land damages.

Mr. FOSTER. What does that make?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That makes $1,685,000.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. $1,685,000 out of $4,500,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Be accurate.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I only hope that my hon. friend will act upon that suggestion when he comes to deal with the matter. It is $1,685,000 out of $4,500,000; we will call it $1,500,000.

Mr. HAGGART. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert we only pay to the Grand Trunk Railway our proportionate user?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, that is all we pay according to the amount of business we do on a wheelage basis for maintenance, repairs and all the other charges connected with the employees and staff as I have already stated them. Then we have $1,500,000; we will throw off $185,000 and call it $1,500,000. We will then have $3,000,000 of the $4,500,000 left. What have we to do with that? Does the hon. gentleman propose to cross the St. Lawrence by a new bridge? If he is going to construct a new bridge, then he can make an estimate of what it will cost him. My engineer's estimate is $6,000,000 for building another bridge across the St. Lawrence. You would wipe out your $3,000,000 and get $3,000,000 on the wrong side of the account. Let us suppose that hon. gentlemen, who have given any attention to this subject, have come to the conclusion that they will not build another bridge, but that they will use the Grand Trunk Railway bridge. Let us see where we will arrive at upon that basis. In the first place it will be admitted that we cannot take the Grand Trunk Railway Company by the throat and compel them to give us the use of their bridge. Possibly, and I will argue it on that basis, an application might be made to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council for the right to use that bridge. The Railway Committee might feel itself justified in making an order in accordance with that application, but when this matter would come before the Railway

Mr. BLAIR.

Committee what facts would be taken into consideration? First, that this bridge cost $10,000,000. That fact would be presented by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and they would argue that, having built that bridge, although they may have built it some years ago, at a time when the construction of bridges was more expensive than it is to-day, yet, having taken the risk and having assumed the responsibility of constructing this great structure, are they to be robbed of a fair enjoyment of those advantages without having a suitable allowance made to them?

Mr. POWELL. I think if the hon. Minister will read the Act authorizing the Grand Trunk to build that bridge he will see that there is an expressed provision that other railways may use the bridge whenever they have occasion to use it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not antagonizing that proposition; I am assuming that an application can be successfully made, but I think it is a fair matter for us to consider, when we are dealing with an alternative proposition, as to what we can count upon in judging of this proposition and as to how it is likely to work out. If that argument were presented to the Railway Committee the Railway Committee would be obliged to recognize the force of it. The Governor in Council, acting on the broad lines that the Government is expected to act upon, recognizing what is fair and just and not merely governing its action by what would be particularly in the interest of the Government, would be bound to acknowledge that that argument has the element of strength, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company would be entitled to a liberal allowance, and that it would not be justified in fixing an amount of compensation which would be based on the present cost and in disregard of the actual cost to the company. You can see at once if that argument is put on the basis of $10,000,000 it would not take you very long to swallow up more than your $40,000, more than your $50,000, more than $60,000, and you will possibly find yourself somewhere in the neighbourhood of $75,000 or $100,000 fixed upon you as a rental for the bridge. I will tell you why that would not be an unreasonable expectation. There is another way in which the bridge might possibly be turned to account by the Government which would build a second road from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert in accordance with the theory which, I assume, some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are disposed to put forward. There is another way of using the bridge. We might apply to the Railway Committee, or approach the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and ask that they should allow us, not to pay a fixed rental for the use of this bridge, but that they should assess us a fair and reasonable sum for each engine, each freight or passenger car, each passenger, each ton of freight, or upon some basis such as that, which is not an unknown or an unusual system of compensating for the use of a bridge owned by one company and used by another. I had this question gone into before we made our arrangements with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. My engineers were asked to estimate the cost if we were to apply to the Railway Committee, or to approach the Grand Trunk Railway Company and ask to acquire the use of this bridge, not on the basis of fixed rental, but by paying a fair and reasonable sum for every car, locomotive, passenger and ton of freight on the same basis as is adopted in reference to other bridges, and particularly in reference to the Niagara bridge by the railway companies that are using it in payment to the company which owns it. My engineers made a report upon this subject and they showed, making an estimate on the number of trains we would be likely to use and the number of passengers crossing there on the basis of our probable business for the first one or two years, that on the same terms and on the same basis as the companies pay for the use of the Niagara bridge, it would cost us $77,000 a year instead of $40,000 a year. These figures were presented before the committee which sat a year ago, and hon. gentlemen have had ample opportunity of subjecting them to a critical examination. Where would you be after you got to St. Lambert with this road, which you are going to construct? If you are going to cross the bridge and to pay on the business you are doing, irrespective of the business you would do in the future, you would pay $37,000 a year more for the use of that bridge than we are paying under this agreement, and that this is not an unreasonable argument is proved by the fact that the engineers pointed out, that the Niagara is a short bridge and that this bridge is a very long bridge. I do not know exactly what the length of the Niagara bridge is.

Mr. GIBSON. Eight hundred feet.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Eight hundred feet; less than a sixth of a mile, and here is a bridge twelve times the length.

Mr. GIBSON. Thirteen times the length.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Thirteen times the length. If you apply to this bridge the same rate, or half of the rate, or a quarter of the rate, that is applied to the Niagara bridge, you would get a larger annual charge imposed on the traffic and business of the Intercolonial Railway than is now imposed on it under the arrangement we have made. But you have under this arrangement of ours, the additional guarantee and assurance that no matter what volume your business may attain, your rental is fixed and you have no additional amount charged against you for its use. I think, Mr. Chairman, that whatever way you may look at it, you do not make much progress in establishing a case against the Government's proposition, by starting out upon an independent line or an independent bridge. And, when my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) gets across the St. Lawrence River, what happens? If you are liberal and generous and willing to spend the $6,000,000 to build the bridge, and you get over into Montreal, where are you when you arrive at the north shore of the St. Lawrence? My hon. friend (Mr. Foster), if he had charge of the enterprise, would no doubt turn back with all possible despatch. He would not linger a minute on the opposite shore. He would reconsider the proposition and start out on a new tack. Within no reasonable limits of cost are you going to get from the shore of the St. Lawrence River into the centre of the city of Montreal? I assume that my hon. friend is now in sympathy with me in my proposition, and that we may now accompany one another back from the northern side of the St. Lawrence to the starting point at Ste. Rosalie.

There is possibly another proposal likely to be made by hon. gentlemen opposite, for we have had hints of it, and I am not sure that my ambitious friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) has not the idea in his head, for he gave some suggestion of it the other night. He is going to build another line, not parallel to the Grand Trunk Railway, but he is going to build from Ste. Rosalie to Caughnawaga, and he is going to cross the St. Lawrence at Lachine, where he says it can be done cheaply. Let me follow out his proposition, and see where it will bring us. You will remember that by his plan you avoid the extra cost of building an enormously expensive bridge across the St. Lawrence from St. Lambert, but you must remember also that you have got to build a trifling addition of no less than seventeen miles to your railway.

Mr. GIBSON. And seventeen back to Montreal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not speaking of going back yet. And I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan), when he accompanies me will ever get back. Is not the building of seventeen miles a considerable item? For the sake of $5,000, or $10,000, or $20,000 a year rental, yes, I might say $25,000 a year rental, is the Government going to put itself to the expense of building seventeen additional miles of railway which this route would necessitate? I do not think they are. At all events, it is a matter which one ought seriously to consider, and we should not jump at a conclusion with reference to it with that rapidity which some of our friends on the other side of the House have shown in proposing this alternative proposition. Well, we have got to Caughnawaga, and my engineers say :

Instead of having to travel 38 miles to get from Ste. Rosalie by the present proposed route into the Bonaventure station, we would have to travel 55 miles, going up to Caughnawaga and crossing the river coming back again on the other side into the city of Montreal.

It is going to cost $17,000 a mile to build these miles of railroad, and then you get somewhere near the outskirts of the city of Montreal on the way down. You will not have very heavy land damages for a portion of the line after you cross the river, because you can come down upon the canal property that belongs to the Government, but you will have to pay land damages, which I do not estimate would be much, between Ste. Rosalie and Caughnawaga. You have to pay $17,000 a mile for the railway ; you have $1,500,000 for a bridge across the St. Lawrence at that point ; you have to pay $300,000, according to the estimate of my engineers, for two miles as you are entering the outskirts of the city of Montreal, to get down to where the Government has ample land upon which to locate a passenger station and build its shops and tracks and yards. Any gentleman who knows Montreal will recognize that this would take us to the cattle-yard, so-called, in that city. You get there after spending $300,000 for two miles, $1,500,000 for a bridge, and $17,000 a mile upon the fifty-three miles which it would be necessary to build, and then you have to face the grave problem of getting into the business centre of the city. Is any one in this Parliament willing that the main passenger station of the Intercolonial Railway should be located at the Montreal cattle-yards ? The proposition is absurd. The cattle-yards are about a mile from the heart of the city—it takes you fifteen minutes in the cars to get down there from the Windsor Hotel. It is said to be a mile from the cattle-yards to the Bonaventure station ; it is probably more, and certainly not less. Would it do to have the chief passenger station of the Government railway alongside the cattle-yards of the Grand Trunk Railway ? Nobody would tolerate that for an instant. Is there any gentleman here representing the city of Montreal who will say that such a thing would be in the interests of the city, in the interests of the Government, in the interests of the Intercolonial Railway, or in the interests of the country at large ? I do not think any one of them would say so. Then, if you want to get your station elsewhere, to somewhere near the hotels and the business centre of the city, you have to expropriate your way through a mile of built-up, valuable city property, and to encounter all the difficulties that attend the extension of a line of railway under such conditions. Is that a problem which can be faced with a jaunty feeling ? Would any man responsible for the government of the country like to say, that, within the margin of $140,000 a year, capitalized at 3 per cent, you could make all these arrangements—build these 55 miles of railway, build this bridge, get down to the cattle-yards, and then fight your way another mile to the centre of the city—that you could do all this within the limit of $4,500,000, or any sum approaching it ? I have not ventured to name a sum, and my engineers are not prepared to say what it would cost to get through that mile.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You get down to the shipping, as well.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, but I am only speaking of getting a passenger depot where it would be likely to meet the public convenience, and where, with the disadvantage you are labouring under of having a separate station from other roads, you would get facilities for the travelling public. I have not named any sum ; I cannot name any precise sum. Let some gentleman who has more courage than I have, put the cost into figures. I would not like to say, that you could do it for four or five times what it is costing on the principle contained in the existing proposition. And, Mr. Chairman, remember that if you are content to stay at the cattle-yards, which is an impossible proposition, or, if you are bold enough to go this mile further and locate yourself in the centre of the business of Montreal, then, where are your connections ? You are not connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway, or with the Grand Trunk Railway, or with the Canada Atlantic. You are absolutely nowhere, from a railway point of view. In my judgment, it would be infinitely better that you had stayed out of Montreal altogether than to seek admission into that city on either of the alternative plans which have been hinted at by the other side of the House. The hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), I may say in this connection, has said, with all the gravity and all the impressiveness which he can sometimes assume, that this proposition has not any business side, that there never has been a business argument advanced in its favour, and that there cannot be. I make my hon. friend a present of these arguments, and I venture to suggest that it will be difficult for my hon. friend to gainsay their business force or business value, let him deal with them as he may. I ask him, whether or not it is a business proposition you have before you. I ask whether the objections I have endeavoured to present to the alternative proposition, are business objections, founded in good sense, in reason, in experience, and in the absolute necessity of things under the conditions which exist. Now, Sir, let me recapitulate. Fifty-five miles of railway, at $17,000 per mile, will cost $935,000 ; or, taking off the two special miles, there will be 53 miles, which will cost $900,000. The 2 miles within the city limits will cost $300,000. The bridge at Caughnawaga will cost $1,500,000. One mile expropriated through the centre of the city I will ask leave of the committee to put at $2,000,000 or $2,500,000. Perhaps that may be considered absurdly small. I am told it cost the Canadian Pacific Railway, to expropriate its way into the city, $10,000,000. Perhaps half of that amount would not be an unreasonable or excessive estimate to make in respect to this; but let us give away one-half the amount, and call it $2,500,000, and you have $5,235,000 as the cost of this alternative route, with not a station building, a workshop or a building of any kind erected in the city, and not a track made, except the track that brings you in—no terminal connections, none of those vital things which are necessary, if you are going to do a railway business. Moreover, to add to all these other drawbacks, you have 17 miles of additional road to cover to reach your terminal than by the Government plan. There is a little bit of evidence which I will venture to suggest to the committee—indeed, there are two pieces of evidence—to show that, after all, we cannot have gone so very far afield in the terms on which we made this arrangement. If you look at the contract which was entered into between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk, you will find parallel conditions just as favourable for the Canadian Pacific Railway as exist for us; yet you will find that for the 38 miles between Toronto and Hamilton, the Grand Trunk Railway Company leased to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the user for $40,000 a year, or more than $1,000 per mile. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were under no compulsion to make that arrangement, and I presume they would not have made it unless it was in their interest to do so. Is anybody justified in denouncing that as an absurd and unreasonable transaction? I take it, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were not under any political pressure; they had not any deal on; they had no job to perpetrate, such as we are charged with; and yet they paid $40,000 a year rental for the use of those 38 miles. And that is not all. They had no costly bridge to use. They pay their proportion of the maintenance, just precisely as we do, on a wheelage basis. And that is not all. They do not pick up one dollar of freight in the whole 38 miles. If a passenger travels on their train, with a ticket of the Grand Trunk, or any other railway, which would entitle him to pass over the route, the Canadian Pacific have a right simply to retain a trifling percentage, I think 10 per cent for collecting, and the balance goes to the Grand Trunk Railway. Compare those two transactions together, and can anybody say, that our transaction is less favourable than that which the Canadian Pacific Company made with the Grand Trunk Company? But this is not all. I have some knowledge of negotiations which have been pending for nearly two years between the Canada Atlantic Company and the Grand Trunk Company. The Canada Atlantic have desired for a long time to get into Montreal under a more favourable arrangement than they have at present, and they have been endeavouring to induce the Grand Trunk to make an arrangement with them for a fixed rental for a term of years, similar to our contract; and what is the condition of the proposed arrangement? The lowest sum the Grand Trunk Company have been willing to accept for the use of the 38 miles from Coteau to Montreal and the terminals is $150,000 a year; and they have no bridge to cross, and no 2 miles of enormously expensive structure, which cost three times more than all the rest of the road put together. Yet they are asking and insisting upon $150,000. It is true that the Canada Atlantic is not agreeing to that, but think that the sum is large and therefore have not come to an understanding, and there is nothing in it unless they agree that such a contract can be entered into. Would we compare that with ours? Is ours less favourable? Is anybody justified in condemning this and saying the Government has not safeguarded the public interest in making the contract we have done?

I am bringing my observations now, you will say, happily, to a close. I think I have established that we have made a good bargain, that we have taken the cheapest and most economical means of obtaining an entrance into the city of Montreal. I think we have shown that we have obtained a splendid road, that we have secured all the facilities, all the track, all the bridging, we require, all the terminals we can ever require, and are in as good a position for the purposes of prosecuting the business of the Intercolonial Railway as if we owned the entire property from end to end.

My hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister says: Oh, this matter is a very grave question, for you are proposing to make an arrangement that is going to bind this country for ninety-nine years, and possibly longer. Well, if the Government which may be then in power—and by the most sanguine stretch of the imagination, I cannot imagine that my right hon. friend will be able to preside over the destinies of the country for that lengthy period—whatever Government will then exist, will have it in its power to break the contract or continue it. If I were to venture a prophesy, I would say that that contract will be renewed, because there can be no conditions so favourable to the breaking of it, that the Government would think it was in the public interest to rescind the contract. But the ex-Minister of Finance cries, you are assuming an obligation which is to last ninety-nine years. Well, if we spent $4,500,000, the obligation would not be any shorter or the burden any less than under this arrangement, yet the hon.

gentleman would spend, apparently $4,500,000 in some other direction where his friends think it could be better spent. But if you lay out money, you incur a debt which time does not extinguish. You incur a debt which has to be paid. And this expenditure is no more a weight on the shoulders of the people in the form in which we expend the money than it would be in any other form in which hon. gentlemen opposite think it could be expended, or than if we were to borrow the money and buy out all these privileges from the Grand Trunk Railway for $4,500,000. You have to do it one way or the other, and I think this is equal to the best.

There are some features of this contract which have been much dwelt upon. They are what I call unimportant matters, and which I think I am justified in describing as the minor features in the contract. They are not important, not essential, not vital at all. The question as to whether we should have paid 5 per centum upon the cost of betterments is not a vital question, as it appears to me. When we made the rate of 5 per cent, we did so because that is the rate the Grand Trunk Railway are paying, and we could not pay them the cash, because then we would be expending our money upon property subject to encumbrance, and that is a principle we could not approve and which, if we were to act upon it, we would be condemned for admitting by the other side. But with regard to this question, it is a small matter, because the expenditure will not be large under any circumstances. We hold the key of the situation in our own hands, and I think it would not be amiss for hon. gentlemen, when discussing this question and exaggerating its importance, if they would simply carry in their minds this one clause—they do not know it, probably they have not examined it—but if they would carry in their minds this clause, they would see that no betterments are to constitute a charge against the Government unless the Government sanction the expenditure by a memorandum signed by the Minister declaring that the Government will pay its share. We hold, therefore, the control in our own hands; and when I hear these gentlemen talking about the betterments, as though the Grand Trunk Railway was going to spend untold millions out of which they would pay four or five or six dollars to our one—or something in that neighbourhood—when they say that the Grand Trunk Railway are going to spend an enormous amount of money for the purpose of getting out of us a small proportion of it, there is just as much ground for that sort of exaggerated talk as there was for the denouncing by these hon. gentlemen of the Yukon contract, because the district to be granted was a land of gold. But that gold will not be found in the lifetime of the generation now living, and you will not find this enormous expense on betterments incurred in the lifetime of this generation. That is one of the tunes our hon. friends opposite are playing to tickle the ears of the groundlings, and not because they have any conviction that it is an item of magnitude or importance.

So with regard to the two or three other minor details. I rather prefer to discuss this question as broadly as possible, without going into minute details. But these details, if challenged, I can defend to the fullest extent, and defend them on business grounds. I can show that they are reasonable, and I say, even if I could not, they are not worthy of the serious consideration of this Parliament or country, because we are dealing with a question of large policy, with the question as to whether or not we should locate our Government road in the great city of Montreal. And when we found ourselves able to arrive at satisfactory terms, when the Grand Trunk Railway and we were able to come together upon a large basis of settlement, it would have been idle for us to have stopped the negotiations and withdraw from the proposal because on these minor matters the Grand Trunk Railway would not give way. Wherever there is any feature in them which hon. gentlemen might think could be improved upon, I am justified in saying that they were a subject of discussion and constant negotiation with the Grand Trunk Railway. Taking the general proposition, as a whole, having regard to all the important interests involved, I felt that we were justified in agreeing to this contract in the main and in the details, just as we have presented it to this House.

I think there is another point of view from which it would be proper for the members of this Parliament, if they have not already done so, to consider this question of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway. Remember that this is a railway which belongs to the people, to the Government of Canada. I think that the prestige, the character, the reputation, of the people and the Government are involved in the proper maintenance and operation of its great system of railways. When people come to this country from abroad, do you not think they are liable to take from our public works, from our Government railway system, their ideas as to what kind of Government we have, as to what kind of people we have, as to whether we have any large ideas or views at all commensurate with the extent and greatness of this country? I think that it is a question of importance to the people of Canada, that we should get into the city of Montreal with our great Intercolonial Railway; that we should get there in the best possible shape; that we should get there with all the advantages it is possible for us to command; that we should get there over a railway of which we need not be ashamed ; that we should reach a portion of the city where the traffic would expect to find us, and that we should be housed suitably as the terminus of a Government railway. And if I never have my name identified with any railway proposition of the Government except this of the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal, I shall feel that I have reason to be proud, not alone of the fact that we have reached Montreal, not alone of the improvement we have been able to make with respect to the maintenance and operation of the Intercolonial Railway, but over and above all else, proud of the terms upon which that improvement has been brought about.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) began his remarks with a discussion of the old controversial question that was before the House several days ago with reference to the traffic arrangement between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway. The hon. gentleman was going to bring the subject home to me. He suggests that if the timber-headed predecessor of the hon. gentleman who presides over the affairs of the Department of Railways and Canals had paid any attention to the orders that were issued by his subordinates when he was in office he would not have made the remarks he made the other day with reference to this arrangement. The House will remember that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals detailed what he would have us believe was one of the most infamous agreements ever entered into between a Government and a railway, by which the employees of the Intercolonial Railway were forbidden to look for freight along their own lines. I happened to controvert that by reading the agreement to the House the other evening. Notwithstanding that, the hon. gentleman returns to the subject and tries to nail me by orders which were issued by my department and of which he says I ought to have had cognizance. I paid very particular attention to the orders which the hon. gentleman read. It is a matter of indifference whether they were issued when I was in control of the department or before, because I was supposed to have knowledge of the orders issued by my subordinates. It makes little difference whether they were issued under my administration or under that of Sir John Macdonald or Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who preceded me—I assumed the whole responsibility. Still, to bring it particularly home to me, the hon. gentleman read some orders issued in 1890, 1891 and 1892, before I was in office at all. The only order that he read that was issued when I was head of the department was one issued in 1893 which had no reference to the subject whatever. Now, what was the effect of these orders? These orders were strict injunctions to the agents and subordinate officers of the Intercolonial Railway to carry out the written agreement which had been entered into between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway. I took the trouble to read that agreement the other day in this House. If there is anything objectionable in that agreement, I cannot see it. If it bears the interpretation the hon. gentleman puts upon it, then, I do not understand it. Let me read, again, the parts having reference to the instructions to local ticket agents and freight agents :

The Minister of Railways and Canals shall use every endeavour to cause the station agents or local ticket and freight agents at stations on the line of the Intercolonial Railway east of St. John, excepting St. John, except as hereinafter provided, to be strictly neutral as between the Canadian Pacific Railway via St. John, N.B., and other lines competing with it, and to way-bill freight and sell tickets by such of these routes as may be indicated by shippers or passengers.

This is the clause "hereinafter provided"

Either party shall be free to employ such canvassing agents as it may see fit, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company shall be free to establish such agencies at points on the Intercolonial Railway east of St. John as its interests may require ;—

Does the hon. gentleman object to that? Has not the Canadian Pacific Railway a right to appoint agents independent to this agreement in any place where they may require them?

—provided, however, that should it establish agencies for the sale of tickets and canvassing for freight at points on the Intercolonial Railway east of St. John where other lines of railway competing with the Canadian Pacific Railway, via Point Lévis or Chaudière Junction, have not established similar agencies, the preceding clause as to neutrality shall not apply to such points ;—

In any case where there was not a Grand Trunk agent and a Canadian Pacific agent, where the two companies were not competing for freight, the Intercolonial Railway had a right to establish an agent as against the Canadian Pacific and to compete with it over its long line.

—but if the Government or any railway company competing with the Canadian Pacific Railway via Point Lévis or Chaudière Junction, shall likewise establish such agencies at the same points the conditions as to neutrality shall be observed by the station agents, local ticket and freight agents of the Intercolonial Railway at such stations.

I hope the hon. gentleman will be able to continue an agreement such as that with the Canadian Pacific Railway. He will never be able to make better terms if he intends that company to go to St. John and Halifax. It was the late right hon. Sir John Macdonald who entered into this agreement, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) will never be able to make better terms with the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other railway than Sir John Macdonald made with the Grand Trunk in 1879 and with the Canadian Pacific in 1890. The hon. Minister dwelt at great length on this question. He stated that the effect of this agreement was to prevent the Intercolonial Railway agents from one part of the country to the other to competing for freights over their own line of railway. His intention was, I suppose, to convey the impression that they were not allowed to compete for freight to be taken by the long haul to Lévis instead of by the short haul by St. John. The agreement says distinctly what the arrangement was, and there was no such condition as the hon. gentleman says there was. I had several controversies with the Canadian Pacific Railway on that subject. They were always complaining. They applied twice for leave to enter an action against the Crown for damages they claimed to have sustained under the agreement. I told them they had sustained no damages under the agreement. I had the opinion of Sir John Thompson on the subject. He says that the opinion in the department was, that it only applied to the New Glasgow and Oxford road and the Cape Breton road; he says, that the agreement did not apply to these particular portions of the road. I say, that the agreement did not in any way bind the agents on the Intercolonial Railway system to take traffic, trade and passengers from their long line of road; and there were no instructions sent to any officer on the Intercolonial Railway, or to any agency, which prevented it. It was well known that there was a strong esprit de corps among the officials of the road; they were proud of the Intercolonial Railway, and did all they could for the purpose of diverting trade along the long line of road. They succeeded in doing so, and were not interfered with, no agent was dismissed, and there were none of the terrible consequences the hon. gentleman pointed out.

As I stated before, the agreement entered into in 1890 is a perfectly justifiable one, and compares favourably with the agreement at present entered into with the Grand Trunk Railway by the same gentlemen.

The hon. gentleman twitted us upon asking for papers. We wanted information as to the earnings of the road from Point Lévis to Montreal. He has been running it a while, and the Government promised, through Sir Oliver Mowat in the Senate, that, if they passed this annual subsidy to the road, they would run it for perhaps a year or two, and would then be able to show by the earnings of the road that it might be a profitable undertaking, and would perhaps justify them in making some other agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway. The hon. gentleman says it is impossible to do anything of that kind. Every railroad man in the country knows the absurdity of the statement that has been put into the hon. gentleman's mouth; every one knows that every leased line of road by the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway, no matter how short or how long it is, has a separate account kept of its operations. The hon. gentleman knows, I suppose, that there was a separate account kept of the main line in order to make out the immense benefits which would accrue to the Intercolonial Railway by the increased traffic in consequence of having a terminus in Montreal, and the hon. gentleman goes on to state that the increased traffic on the Intercolonial Railway amounts to about $800,000 a year. He took a great deal of pains to show that the variation in the receipts of the Intercolonial Railway for the last ten years only amounted to about $125,000. I asked the hon. gentleman to show us what the expenditure was, but he very carefully avoided that question. He states that the receipts from the Intercolonial Railway this year on account of the terminals being in Montreal, amount to $800,000. That sum cannot be in consequence of local freights from one section of the road to the other, because the local freights for the last ten years show a variation in the neighbourhood of only $125,000. The hon. gentleman has told us exactly what the local freights from one end of the road to the other amount to. The presumption is, that he had the evidence, but he did not dare to produce it. Let us look, judging him by his own figures, at these increased receipts of $800,000, and what do we find? The deficit on the Intercolonial Railway is nearly $200,000 more than it was the year before. What, then, is the presumption to be drawn from the argument of the Minister of Railways and Canals? That, in order to get the $800,000 worth of extra freight and passengers and the extra receipts from freight and passengers at the city of Montreal, he had to expend $1,000,000. There is no other inference to be drawn. The hon. Minister knew it perfectly well, when he was using the argument; he knew that the deficit on the Intercolonial Railway is over $200,000 this year. The receipts and expenditures nearly balanced for the few years previously. Take $50,000 off for the deficit, and that would leave $150,000. Add $150,000 to $800,000, and, in order to get the $800,000 of extra receipts for freight, passengers and other business, he had to pay $950,000.

The hon. gentleman, however, goes on to treat the question on a broader scale. He says, that the necessity arose, and, if I had had the energy, the business principles which ought to have characterized a Minister of Railways and Canals, I should at once have made a connection between Point Lévis and Montreal. It was left to the hon. gentleman, who has the energy, and ability, and the push to accomplish it. I had considered it for a number of years, and had come to the conclusion that it was better not to make the connection. I hoped for better things from the Grand Trunk Railway, from the better management, and from a closer connection at Point Lévis. The result justified my anticipation, because, if the present management of the Grand Trunk Railway had been in power then, there would have been no necessity to consider another arrangement. But, no matter how great an expenditure may be required for the purpose of accomplishing the object, the hon. gentleman is ready to make any expenditure of the people's money that he thinks proper, for the purpose of accomplishing it. The hon. gentleman criticised my statement, and I noticed how very careful he was. He does not represent these minor details as worth mentioning. He does not gloat upon the better arrangement he made in 1898, over the one in 1897. He does not tell you, that he has not to pay for one-half the betterments on the Grand Trunk Railway at 5 per cent per annum; nor did he tell us, that he had got connection with the bridge on that line of railway, which was to be so beneficial to the Intercolonial Railway, and which connected the Grand Trunk Railway system with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Before the committee on which I had the honour of sitting, he pointed out the difference between the two agreements; he pointed out that, not only have we connection now with the Grand Trunk Railway, but with the Canadian Pacific Railway. We have secured it after a good deal of haggling and a good deal of trouble, from the Grand Trunk Railway, but he did not mention it to-day.

I have stated that I looked over the agreement, and, fortunately, I have taken the precaution of submitting the agreement again and again to different lawyers throughout the country. I did not think that I could possibly be mistaken as to the meaning of plain English words in a plain agreement, and I stated that the Minister has not a conveyance of what he said he had a conveyance, that that agreement does not cover it. The hon. gentleman said, that I owed an apology to the House, that perhaps I was having a rap at his department because his department was responsible for the agreement. But, when he told me, that the Justice Department had drawn out the agreement, he thought that was sufficient to set every doubt at rest. Now, I will take the trouble again to read the agreement, and I maintain that my opinion is correct, notwithstanding what may be said by the Minister of Railways and Canals or the Minister of Justice. The Justice Department may have drawn out the agreement in the terms that were directed to be used for the purpose of conveying what the Minister of Railways and Canals told them was to be conveyed. Here is the agreement:

Now this indenture witnesseth that the expression "Montreal Joint Section," wherever used in this indenture shall mean the company's line and connections at Ste. Rosalie, and the whole line and branches and appurtenances hereby demised from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert and the Victoria Bridge, together with the terminals at Bonaventure station in the city of Montreal, and at Point St. Charles, St. Henri and between Point St. Charles and the Bonaventure station, and also with the Canadian Pacific Railway via Jacques Cartier Junction,—

That is as plain as it can be.

—and the expression "Chaudière Joint Section" shall mean the Chaudière Bridge and connections, except when the meaning shall conflict with the context or otherwise plainly expressed terms of the clause in which the same is used.

This is the demise:

That the said company in consideration of the rents, covenants, conditions and agreements hereinafter contained and reserved hath given, granted, demised and leased, and by these presents doth give, grant, demise and lease unto Her Majesty, her successors and assigns all an undivided one-half share interest, right and title to all the company's line of railway, road-bed and property from and including Ste. Rosalie station in the county of Bagot, in the province of Quebec, to the Victoria Bridge,—

That is as plain as possible.

—and also the undivided one-half right, share, title or interest in the company's line of railway from a point on the western side of the Chaudière Bridge at the proposed junction of the Drummond County Railway with the company's line,—

There can be no mistake as to these two covenants:

—and including the Chaudière Bridge, and to and including the switch at the easterly side of the Chaudière Curve station, being the same rights and privileges agreed to be leased to the Drummond County Railway by the company, with the full and unlimited right and privileges such as the company itself enjoys of running the engines, vehicles, rolling stock and trains of the said Intercolonial Railway, either separately or combined, and as frequently and at such times as its business and traffic may require, and in both directions, over any and every portion of the said company's railway between and including the said points aforesaid, and the use of the Victoria Bridge across the River St. Lawrence as it at present exists, or as it may at any time during the subsistence of this lease be improved, re-constructed, enlarged or extended, and over the company's line and lines of railway over the said Victoria Bridge and into the Bonaventure station, in the city of Montreal, and the other terminal points, junctions and connections of the company hereinbefore more particularly described, together with the full and unlimited right and privilege of having the business and traffic of the Intercolonial Railway—

This is not described before in the demise. The Ste. Rosalie section is described in the Montreal joint section, and there is also the Chaudière joint section. The Government have to pay for their share of the user of these two particular parts of the road.

—done in and about the stations and premises of the said company, upon any portions of the company's line hereinbefore described, and of the terminals and connections hereinbefore mentioned, and all intermediate stations and premises of the company in and about and upon all stations, tracks and sidings, branches or extensions belonging to or leased by the company or connected with the tracks of the company, together with the full and unlimited right in Her Majesty of constructing stations, tracks, branches and sidings, and connecting said tracks, branches and sidings with the main branch and leased lines of the company at any point or points between and including Ste. Rosalie and Montreal, on the terms and conditions hereinafter contained, for the term of ninety-nine years.

I may be mistaken entirely; I ventured the opinion the other day in the House, and I have had the opinion of many lawyers since who support the view that this agreement does not convey that part of the road that the hon. Minister stated that after a good deal of haggling he had got from the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Enough upon that point. I will now deal with the portion of the road between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert. The hon. Minister says that he has made a perfect arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. He proceeds to analyse it and presents a defence upon statements made by his department prepared to justify the Minister in making his statement to the House. What does he pay for the use of the road from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, and it is only a 5 per cent use that he is going to get. The hon. gentleman pays $37,500 a year, or if capitalized, it amounts to nearly $1,400,000. No, it is not 5 per cent, because he gets more than that use of it. He has the right to run through trains and to collect freights, and the Minister said, in reply to the hon. Minister of Finance, that he had the right to collect freight on all trains. He has no right to do any local business at all, unless on through trains from St. Lambert to Ste. Rosalie over the line of the Intercolonial Railway.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You had better read the contract.

Mr. HAGGART. I read the contract very carefully, and I know what I am speaking about. The hon. gentleman cannot stop a train between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert to collect freights. The train must be a through train from St. Lambert to Ste. Rosalie, and connecting with the Intercolonial Railway. The hon. gentleman owns half of the road; he gets half of the money the Grand Trunk Railway Company receives from leased lines, but he does not get a percentage of the excessive user which the Grand Trunk has over and above his user. I was anxious the other day to get from the hon. Minister the percentage of user that the Intercolonial make of these stations and that road as compared with the Grand Trunk. I did not get a statement, but the statement of the hon. Minister to-day was that it was in the neighbourhood of 5 per cent. The hon. gentleman said that he was unable to get information from Moncton as to the exact percentage of user. I will take his statement: For half of what the Grand Trunk Railway Company receive from leased lines and for 5 per cent of the user, the Intercolonial Railway has to pay $1,400,000 for that 32 miles from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert. In the statement furnished by his department it was said that this road could be built for $450,000 a mile and that the bridges across the Richelieu and the other river would cost $600,000 or $700,000. Take the hon. gentleman's own figures, and although they included the amount required to build the bridges, yet the hon. gentleman adds $500,000. The estimate furnished by his department was $1,185,440, including the two bridges. In order to show what a magnificent bargain the hon. gentleman has made, you will see, Mr. Chairman, the nature of the estimate that was furnished the hon. Minister by his department. He pays for one-half the revenue which is got from the leased lines and 5 per cent, which is the user of the Intercolonial Railway of that portion of the road, nearly $260,000 more than the estimate, that his own department furnished him, at which the Government could have built the whole line. What is the estimate of the hon. gentleman?—$1,600,000, and hon. gentlemen will have noticed how he blundered in his figures. He got $1,100,000 and added $500,000 and that made $1,600,000. But he got it up to $2,500,000 and had to correct himself afterwards and make it $1,600,000. The estimate of his department is $1,185,440. Take as a fair beginning that he has to pay one-half of this amount $1,300,000 and double that, and that will give $2,600,000. Just fancy, that for these 32 miles of road the Minister allows the Grand Trunk Railway in the neighbourhood of $90,000 a mile under this arrangement of his. He told us that the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) forgot the additional 17 miles of railway which would have to be built to arrive at Caughnawaga, but, if I remember aright, the distance from Montreal to Sherbrooke via the Canadian Pacific Railway is only eight miles longer than by the Grand Trunk Railway, and how the Minister got 17 additional miles from the end of the bridge to Caughnawaga I do not know. I suppose he went straight up and when he got across the bridge he went straight down again. Any one who knows the locality knows that the distance could not possibly be 17 miles. The Minister (Mr. Blair) told us that a fair estimate for the Grand Trunk Railway bridge was $6,000,000, but it has been stated again and again that the Canadian Pacific Railway built their bridge across the St. Lawrence for less than $1,500,000, and that to-day, with the more modern appliances and cheaper rates, they could build it for $1,200,000, and yet, the Minister (Mr. Blair) arranges with the Grand Trunk Railway for a 5 per cent user of that bridge at the rate of $3,000,000. The hon. gentleman criticises the figures in the "Mail" with reference to the terminable annuity that would be realized for 99 years at $140,000 a year. I do not know the percentage upon which the "Mail" calculated, but I know that the accountant of the Finance Department made up the terminable annuity for 99 years at $64,000 a year at over $2,100,000. We could pay the amount in full at the end of 99 years and be clear, whereas, under this bargain with the Grand Trunk Railway, we have a lease for 99 years, and we pay this amount each year, but we do not get the property at the end of 99 years, and we continue to pay the annual charge for ever if we like. The Minister presumes that our party will be in power then, and that, no doubt, the Minister of Railways of that day will make as good an arrangement as he did. I say that the statement of the "Mail" newspaper in regard to the terminable annuity for 99 years at $140,000 a year is absolutely correct, and that it will realize $4,500,000. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to figure out that with his officers, he will find that my statement is correct. The Minister may deceive his followers in this House, but he cannot deceive the country, for every railway man knows that the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge across the St. Lawrence, including approaches, engineering, and everything, cost $1,500,000, and that that bridge can be built to-day for $1,200,000. The hon. Minister pictured the enormous amount of money that would be required for the purpose of getting the line into Montreal. I can tell him that from Lachine into Montreal, the Government owns the best railway track it is possible to get, and the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway have been anxious to have it. He could run his line along either bank of the Lachine Canal, and when he gets to Montreal he will find numbers of railways connecting with large manufacturing places along his own property, which is leased during pleasure to these parties, and he can make all the connections there with the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, that he wants to. I defy any contradiction of the statement I made the other day, that you can build a double line of railway for what the Minister proposes to give the Grand Trunk Railway; you can expend $60,000 a mile upon it if you like, and you can get into Montreal over your own road, and own your own terminals for a great deal less than the Minister (Mr. Blair) is paying to the Grand Trunk Railway and the Drummond County Railway. Take the $1,100,000 which is the hon. gentleman's estimate; add that to the $2,600,000; take $140,000 per annum for 99 years and capitalize it upon the last borrowing rate, and it realizes over $5,000,000. Take from that the $2,600,000, and you have $2,400,000 to make your terminals and connections in Montreal. But the Minister tells us that the value of the privileges which he is receiving from the Grand Trunk Railway is incalculable. The House must remember that besides that $5,000,000 we are giving to the Grand Trunk Railway, we pay for all the water used by our engines and for all the repairs, and we pay a percentage of all the expenditure at the station for terminal facilities and everything else according to the user. That amounts, as nearly as I can make out from the information we have, to about $70,000 a year; perhaps more. Take $5,000,000 for the 5 per cent user of the Grand Trunk property, and take twenty times $5,000,000, and we have what the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) has calculated to be the value of the Grand Trunk Railway from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, upon the basis of user that the Intercolonial Railway makes of it. Why did not the Minister furnish the House with information as to what the other railways which, at present, use these terminals pay to the Grand Trunk Railway? There are three railways so using them, and it is easy for him to give information as to what the actual amount is that each of these railways pay according to the whole user of the Montreal terminals. If we had that information we would be able to arrive at some estimate of what we ought to pay. But instead of that, the Minister gives us an estimate from his engineer as to the probable amount of passengers and freight that would pass over the bridge at Montreal, and drawing a comparison between that and some Niagara Bridge, he figures out the enormous expenditure of $70,000 a year. The hon. gentleman may impose upon some fools in the country, but he cannot impose upon any one who knows about railways and railway construction. The Minister could have gone to the Grand Trunk authorities and got the user of the bridge and the terminals upon the same terms as any other railway is at present using them. The Grand Trunk Railway would be glad to accept such an offer. And what is the justification which the Minister gives for this enormous expenditure? He says it is a grand scheme, and he tells us the details of it must not be entered into, because the grandeur of the scheme is sufficient justification for what he has done. The people of the country, I hope, will think differently from that. Both of these transactions bear the mark of stupidity, at least. The hon. gentleman justifies them by some comparisons and some remarks on the Yukon Railway. I should have thought the hon. gentleman would have been ashamed to have mentioned that. He has got a report from one of the officers of his department, which shows the stupidity of the arrangement which he tried to foist on this country some time ago; and there is not a man from British Columbia to the maritime provinces, but thanks God that we had a Senate to prevent him perpetrating that infamous scheme. I am not making any charge of infamy against the arrangement between the Government and the Grand Trunk Company. It may be of some advantage politically to the Government in the future. I do not suppose that one cent passed between the Grand Trunk and the Government, whatever my suspicions may be with regard to the Drummond County deal. But it bears a greater mark than rascality on its face. It bears the mark of stupidity. An officer of this country may commit a rascally crime, and may do better in the future; but for a man who acts stupidity there is no hope in the future.

You may hope something for a rascal, but for a stupid man there is no hope. As I shall have another opportunity to deal with this matter, I will not take up any more of the time of the committee to-night, but will just close by thanking you for the patience with which you have listened to me.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken, I wish to accept the invitation of the hon. Minister of Railways—

Mr. FOSTER. But the Minister, after he invited his guest, left the board.

Mr. POWELL—in respect to a statement which I made the other evening as to the cost of every dollar of additional earnings upon the Intercolonial Railway. The hon. gentleman has, as he has announced to the House, been acquainted with myself for a number of years, and I have been acquainted with him for as long a time; and there is no gentleman of my acquaintance who is so able to draw upon the realm of nothingness and fabricate so conclusively his facts. I thought that through long exercise, his stock of raw material had been somewhat exhausted; but I find to-night that such is not the case, and that the genius of the artificer is as yet unimpaired. He stated that I had wilfully made an incorrect statement with regard to the cost of the additional revenue, which I placed at $1.32 for every dollar of additional revenue. If he knows as much about railway matters as he presumes to know, as a gentleman at the head of the Department of Railways should know, he knows that no man, not even the merest tyro in railway matters, would pretend for one moment to base an elaborate argument upon the earnings per train mile of a railway. Why, Sir, that depends entirely upon the size of the train. Nothing can be deduced from that. It is well known to this House that the hon. gentleman a few years ago introduced upon the Intercolonial Railway system several large engines, two so large that the bridges of the Grand Trunk were unable to support them; and, after coming to Montreal, they had to be taken by the short line of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the city of Moncton, and put into the yards there. The object of the hon. gentleman was a legitimate object, and I have no fault to find with him so far as that is concerned. We know that the railroads in the republic to the south of us during the last few years have found that they could greatly reduce the cost of transportation by increasing the size of the engines, the number of cars, and the weight of the train loads; but while that is true, I must say that the hon. gentleman, having at his command his own report, the facts from which he could tell whether my statement was true or not, it was his duty to appeal to them. Now, Sir, I hurl back at the hon. Minister of Railways the charge which he hurled against myself, and I tell him that a more manifest example of unfairness was never exhibited in this House. How did I arrive at this estimate that each dollar of additional earnings cost $1.32? It may be that the hon. gentleman's returns given to Parliament in his report are entirely unreliable; but my estimate was based upon those returns. I find that the total earnings of the Intercolonial Railway in 1897 were $2,866,028.02, and in 1898, $3,117,669.85, a net increase of $251,641.83. Now, compare the expenses. The total expenses in 1897 were $2,925,968.68, while in 1898 they were $3,257,648.51, an increase of $331,679.84. Now, what does that mean? That the Minister of Railways earned $251,641 additional, and that to earn that additional sum he expended $331,679. What does that mean? That every dollar of additional earnings cost this country $1.32. Now, I leave to this House, I leave to the hon. gentleman's associates in the Government, I leave to his followers behind him, this statement as a fair sample of the statistics he has given us. While I am on my feet, I will touch upon another matter in connection with which the hon. gentleman referred to myself. I mentioned the increase of traffic that legitimately belonged to the old section of the Intercolonial Railway, that is, the Intercolonial Railway exclusive of the Montreal extension; and I make this charge against him now, and I do it deliberately, and I challenge him to controvert my position—not because his own mouth is closed by his statement that he is unable to give us the earnings of the Montreal extension or the expenses of its management; I charge home against him that in making the Montreal extension he has used up hundreds of thousands of dollars of a legitimate surplus on the old portion of the road; that instead of devoting that surplus to giving increased wages to the poor trackmen and others employed on the railway, and putting a balance into the treasury, he has wasted it in connection with this scheme, which is thoroughly indefensible from a commercial point of view.

The hon. gentleman says to-night, that the increase of earnings was due entirely to this section of the road. I ask him how, under the circumstances, that could be the case. Has the taking over of this line generated one additional ton of freight that must be moved east to west, or west to east? It has not. It simply gives to the Intercolonial Railway a chance of capturing a certain amount of freight that heretofore belonged to the Grand Trunk Railway or Canadian Pacific Railway, and, inasmuch as this very freight had to pass to and from some point on the Intercolonial Railway to and from Montreal or points west, it had, in the very nature of the case, to pass over some portion at least of the Intercolonial Railway. But the increased receipts of the Intercolonial Railway, my hon. friend says, were not due to the increased trade in this country. I will put it to you, Mr. Chairman, whether there is any better barometer known to the commercial world than the amount of freight transported by the railways. Increased commerce, increased trade, demand, as a necessary sequence, increased transportation facilities. When there is a larger amount of trade or commerce in a country, a larger amount of transportation is required; and the rise or fall of tonnage carried by the railways indicates very exactly indeed the rise or fall of commercial enterprise. I cannot understand it. Here was the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) upon the floor of this House, scarcely a few weeks ago—and I may be pardoned for referring to a previous debate—assuring the House that all over Canada there was an unexampled boom, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and gentlemen opposite cheered him, as he spoke of the unexampled and unparalleled impetus that trade had received.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Will the hon. gentleman permit me to say, that at the same time I stated that in the maritime provinces we had not shared this increased trade so fully. I admitted that there were evidences that in the maritime provinces matters were taking a more hopeful shape, but I distinctly stated, with some regret of course, that, while the condition of the country was more prosperous, we had not shared in that increased prosperity as fully in the maritime provinces as elsewhere; and, to that extent, I hope the hon. gentleman will qualify his remarks.

Mr. POWELL. I do not think they need any qualification; but I would ask him whether, when he said, that the maritime provinces had not shared to the same extent as the others, he did not glory in the extent to which they shared. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) says there was no marked increase of local traffic on the Intercolonial Railway. I state deliberately, that the hon. gentleman knows better. He knows there was a very marked increase. Does he not know that almost a year ago he, through his agent, Mr. Harris, entered into a contract for the transportation of coal over the Intercolonial Railway from the Springhill and other Nova Scotia mines to the city of St. John, and that, in consequence the whole system of barge transportation, from Parrsborough, in the constituency represented by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), was dispensed with, and the Intercolonial cars have since carried immense quantities of coal for St. John? Does he not know that, in consequence of arrangements for through trade which he made, Mr. Reid established a steamship line to Sydney in the Island of Cape Breton, from Newfoundland, and that, in consequence, of that arrangement, 40 to 50 car-loads, on an average, per week have passed over the Intercolonial Railway during the past year? Does he not also know that this arrangement has diverted to the Intercolonial a very large passenger traffic, which previously came to Halifax or went directly to the United States? Does he not know also that, in connection with the railway in Cape Breton, there has been during the past year an unexampled impetus given to the lumber trade, and that one gentleman, a member of this House, freighted and routed 65 cars additional entirely over that line? Besides that, does he not know that there have been 135 car-loads carried over the Intercolonial Railway by the Dominion Coal Company for their works on the island of Cape Breton?

Mr. HAGGART. Is that per day or per week?

Mr. POWELL. I am giving the total. In addition, does he not know that the Steel and Iron Works at Ferrona, in the county of Pictou, have, instead of being supplied with coal by the mines in their immediate vicinity, undertaken to get coal from Cape Breton, which is superior, or better adapted to their purposes, and that, on an average, for a long time during the past year, there have been two or three car-loads of coal per day passing over that line in connection with the Iron and Steel Works? Furthermore, as a matter of fact, there are in his department statistics to show that the train employees on the Cape Breton road have been getting almost double pay during the last year on account of extra work they had to perform in this way, in connection with an entirely local traffic.

One increase the hon. gentleman denied the other evening, and then admitted it afterwards. That is the increase of rates. I am assured that there is an increased rate on coal. As an example of what prevails over the Intercolonial Railway system in the maritime provinces, let me say, that on a haul of 45 miles the rates were increased from 25 per cent to 30 per cent, making an increase of between 30 per cent and 50 per cent in the rates on coal alone. The hon. gentleman denied, the other evening, that, after Mr. Harris was appointed, he increased the local rates. He said that I was wrong. Well, he resorted to a mere subterfuge, and before he got through his speech he admitted—and there are gentlemen in this House who know that the admission is correct—that Mr. Harris did increase the rates. Whether he increased them directly by increasing the charge per car-load, or indirectly by having the cars weighed and measured, where previously they had not been, does not matter; the fact remains that the rates were increased 25 per cent to 50 per cent.

In the case of cord wood in the county I have the honour to represent, whereas previous to Mr. Harris taking charge, quite a lucrative business had been carried on in supplying the city of Moncton with firewood, after Mr. Harris was appointed, without any notice at all of the change of tariff, a gentleman engaged in this particular trade brought several car-loads to Moncton, and, when he went to pay his freight, after he had effected a sale, he found that, in order to pay the freight, he had to use the total proceeds of his sale and add a few dollars to boot. That will give an illustration of the increase of local freights. Not only that, but there was a public agitation against this increase by the hon. gentleman's own supporters down there. One gentleman, a strong supporter of the Government, who was appointed to quite a lucrative office under this Government, told me that he had written the Minister of Railways, that, if he did not change the traffic and put the rates back to what they were, he would scarcely be able to get a single vote along the whole line of the Intercolonial Railway; and that statement is an approximation to the truth.

There is another matter to which the hon. gentleman referred, and with which I think he connected my name. He spoke of the Richelieu River and the cost of the bridge across that river. I do not know how broad is the Richelieu where the bridge was built, but I do know that the statement that $500,000 was a fair estimate of the cost of erecting a bridge over that river—a shallow river, with a hard, rock bottom—is simply absurd.

Mr. FOSTER. The estimate is $400,000.

Mr. POWELL. Well, I will give some facts about bridges. Any gentleman who goes over the Intercolonial Railway to the Island of Cape Breton will cross what is called the Grand Narrows Bridge. This bridge is 1,720 feet long. I do not know the exact length of the bridge over the Richelieu, but I do not think it is anything like as long as that. The piers of the Grand Narrows Bridge are built in from 50 to 75 feet of water, the deepest water is 76 feet. You can see the enormous expense involved in erecting a bridge in such deep water. There is a four and a half knot current and the piers have to be very strong to resist the ice. That bridge cost a little over $500,000—I think $520,000 was the exact price. There are seven spans including a draw, and gentlemen who are familiar with the building of bridges know that a draw adds considerably to the cost. Why, if hon. gentleman will take up any work on railway construction he will learn something about bridges. Take the Kinzua viaduct on the Erie Railway. It is 2,600 feet long and 310 feet up in the air, and the cost of it was $300,000, exclusive of the cost of the low abutments supporting the pillars. And then the hon. gentleman talks about erecting a bridge over a little river like the Richelieu, with the best bottom in the world, and spending $400,000 or $500,000 upon it. I did not rise to make any lengthened remarks, but simply to call attention to these matters in which the hon. gentleman reflected upon myself.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). I merely wish to offer a very few remarks on this very important question. In all the years that I have sat in this House I have never known an Opposition to be placed in such an exceedingly awkward position as that in which hon. gentlemen opposite are placed to-day. For many years they handled the affairs of the Intercolonial Railway. Year by year that road ran into arrears, annually rolling up a deficit—

Mr. POWELL. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. If my hon. friend will allow me—annually rolling up a deficit, with the exception of three or four years when there were very small amounts on the right side of the ledger. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite claim that they are the men who are possessed of the ability and statesmanship to manage the affairs of this country. For eighteen years they handled the affairs of the Intercolonial Railway, and, though they knew that deficit after deficit was the result of its operation, they never made an effort to take it out of the financial rut into which it had fallen and to put it on such a basis that at least it would earn running expenses. From the time of the completion of the Intercolonial Railway down to last year, the entire receipts were $57,101,249, while the total sum paid out for operating expenses was $63,450,405, a net loss in operating expenses of $6,349,156. That was the condition when the present Government took office. About $55,000,000 of the people's money has been sunk in the road. This represents an interest charged of about $2,000,000 a year. Taking the 30 years for which it has been run, this would mean a loss to the country of some $60,000,000, to which we have to add the deficit upon operating expenses which I have just quoted. Notwithstanding the claim of hon. gentlemen opposite to the monopoly of the statesmanship and shrewdness in the management of public affairs in this country, they made no move to lift the Intercolonial Railway out of the unfortunate position to which it had fallen. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has frequently charged the present occupants of the Treasury benches with incapacity, declaring that they are not possessed of the ability or the knowledge or the shrewdness to handle the affairs of this country. He was Minister of Railways and Canals for five years. During that time, undoubtedly, he operated the road so as to show a small surplus over working expenses. In his first year there was a deficit of $97,131.33. The next year, 1881, he had the magnificent surplus of $542; in 1882 he showed a surplus of $9,605; in 1883 one of $10,547, and in 1884 his surplus was $9,068. But how did he bring about these surpluses? He accomplished it by charging everything he could think of, everything he could dare charge to capital account. In place of making the necessary repairs to rolling stock, the engines and cars that could not be safely used were shunted upon the siding and left to rot, and new engines and cars were bought and charged to capital account. Instead of charging snow fences to working expenses, as was shown in this House, he actually charged them to capital account. By keeping the accounts in this fashion for five years, he managed to show a small surplus. But during the five years of his administration he enormously increased the capital account. In five years he increased that capital account $6,244,325. And what had we to represent this expenditure? We had two additional branches. One was the St. Charles branch, which was a political sink hole into which the money of this country was thrown and wasted. Another was the Oxford and New Glasgow branch which virtually duplicated the existing Intercolonial Railway. We remember the glowing terms in which the present leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) when he was Minister of Railways and Canals, presented his scheme for the construction of his line. He declared that it would be the means of placing the Intercolonial Railway in such a position that it would largely increase its earning power, that the grades upon the new branch, in place of being so enormously heavy, as on the old line, would have almost no grade and would be 45 miles shorter than the old one. But when it was built, owing to the fact that he found it necessary to carry it through his constituency from pillar to post to suit those that urged upon him to give them railway conveniences, and through a section belonging to the county of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and through a section belonging to the county of the then Postmaster General, Mr. McLellan, the result was that when the road was finished it was only four and a half miles shorter, and the engineer under examination swore that the grades were heavier in place of being lower. I am now pointing out what the hon. gentleman did for the Intercolonial Railway during the time they were in office. These were the moves that they made, and still they are prepared to declare before an intelligent community, to declare before the reading public of this Dominion, that the men who now occupy the Treasury benches are incompetents, are incapable of handling the affairs of this country, and that with them rests all the statesmanship and all the wisdom; although during 18 years they allowed the Intercolonial Railway to dribble along, rolling up a deficit each year, and adding enormously to the capital account for operating purposes, and at the end of that time they left it just in the same hole in which they found it 18 years before. They never had the statesmanship, the ability, the shrewdness to make an effort to bring it to Montreal, the chief city of this Dominion, we may say the Liverpool of Canada, and the only place where we could hope to get some freight for that road.

Now, Sir, the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) tells us that the present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) should give us exactly the sum earned over the Drummond County Railway, and the additions, and over the Grand Trunk Railway, during the period that he has operated that portion of the line. He insists that if the Minister were disposed to do it, he could easily give that information. Well, who is responsible for having consolidated the accounts of the Intercolonial Railway? The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals was the man that put all the lines together. And what did he put them together for? Because the branches they had built showed such an enormous deficit every year, the Cape Breton branch, the St. Charles branch, and the Oxford and New Glasgow branch showed such a deficit in working expenses that, in order to cover up those things they had been guilty of themselves, they consolidated the whole book-keeping system so that these accounts could not be kept separate. When we were on the other side of the House we demanded of the then Minister of Railways and Canals a statement showing the earnings of the Cape Breton branch and of the other branches, and he always replied that the accounts had been consolidated, and that it was impossible to give the earnings of one branch separate from another. Now, he turns round and demands of the present Minister of Railways and Canals an answer to the very question that he declared himself could not be answered when he was Minister of Railways and Canals. Then he says that after due consideration he came to the conclusion not to make a connection at Montreal. Well, it shows an enormous amount of statesmanship on the part of a man that was Minister of Railways and Canals, and of the Government of which he was a member, that after 18 years of experience of that road, always showing a balance on the wrong side of the ledger, they in their wisdom came to the decision that they could not think of making a connection at Montreal.

Now, Sir, I listened, and I think hon. gentlemen opposite listened, with a great deal of interest to the statement made by the Minister of Railways and Canals this afternoon. I must say that during the many years that I have sat in this House I have never heard a clearer, a more concise and a more convincing statement of facts connected with any scheme than that which was laid before the House this afternoon. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not been able to answer it. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals made a faint attempt at reply, and it was the lamest that I ever heard him make. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) sat silent up to this moment; although he is a critic, and an able one on finance, he has never dared to rise in his place and challenge the statements that have been presented to this House. The leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has also sat in his place, and although he is a critic with any amount of assurance, and is prepared to challenge anything and do it with a good deal of force, he has sat in the House during the afternoon, he has listened to the statement presented by the Minister of Railways and Canals, and although he has declared that these men are incompetents, that they are not possessed of the ability required to handle the affairs of this country, he has not dared to get up and challenge the extended statement that the Minister of Railways and Canals has presented with regard to this scheme. Now, Sir, I claim that if there is any one act that this Government can claim credit for before the people of this country, it is the honest effort that they have made, through the Minister of Railways and Canals to lift the Intercolonial Railway out of the position in which it has been for 18 or 20 years, yes, 30 years, and place it upon a basis that, at least, it will pay running expenses. They deserve the thanks of every ratepayer in this country for making that effort. I believe the bargain that they have made is a good one, it is a prudent one, it is one that in the end will prove to the people of this country that there are statesmen at the head of the affairs of this Dominion, men who know what they are doing, men who are actuated with a sincere desire to do the best that they can in the interest of the people. They have shown more ability in connection with this very matter than has been shown by hon. gentlemen opposite if you were to roll all their heads together. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot show a single thing that would compare with it in magnitude and statesmanship. This scheme bears upon its face evidence that a man is now grappling with the affairs of the Intercolonial Railway who is possessed of more ability, more genius and more shrewdness than any man that has ever presided over that department before. I believe that is true, and I believe the people will come to that conclusion when they read the speech that he made this afternoon in connection with the bargain that this House is asked to sanction with the Grand Trunk Railway. I think it is one of the grandest schemes that I have seen for some years, when you come to conclude, as you undoubtedly will have to admit, that the accommodation the Intercolonial Railway has obtained in Montreal is very extensive. The Grand Trunk Railway has undoubtedly the best terminal advantages of any line in the city of Montreal, and it has been building them up for some 35 years. We get the use of all these advantages, as the Minister of Railways and Canals said this afternoon, and we only pay a sum for keeping them up proportionate to the extent to which we use them. If the Grand Trunk Railway makes double the amount of use that the Intercolonial does then we will only have to pay one-third of the expense. I was amazed to hear the hon. ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) say this evening, that it would cost this country about $70,000 to pay for keeping the line in proper order in the city of Montreal. I do not believe it will cost anything like that sum. I believe that the hon. Minister of Railways has made an exceedingly shrewd bargain in stipulating that he shall pay the expense of keeping the tracks, the station buildings and the general accommodations in order proportionate to the amount of work that the Intercolonial Railway does. If the Grand Trunk does double the amount of business that the Intercolonial Railway does the Grand Trunk pays double the amount of the expense in keeping these things in order. Then, again, we are getting magnificent accommodations in station grounds and station buildings, and these accommodations are open to the use of the Intercolonial Railway, as well as to that of the Grand Trunk Railway. I do not know what arrangement has been made in regard to taxes. I do not know what the agreement contains in regard to that matter, or whether we will have to pay any taxes to the city of Montreal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No.

Mr. McMULLEN. Moreover, the Grand Trunk Railway will have to pay taxes, to a good large amount, and we will not have to pay any taxes at all for the advantages that we enjoy. Then, there is another advantage; the agents of the Intercolonial Railway will be able to go to any place, west, on the Grand Trunk line, and covenant for freight over the Grand Trunk. The Grand Trunk is bound to carry that freight at rates as low as it will carry it for any other person that wants freight carried to Portland or to Boston, and, if at any time, any dispute arises in regard to the rates, if the Minister in charge of the Intercolonial Railway claims that the Grand Trunk is asking too much, that question is to be settled by arbitration. We have virtually got the Intercolonial not only into Montreal, but we have it extended to Sarnia, to Detroit and to Chicago, if you like. Intercolonial agents may take freight at any place along the line of the Grand Trunk Railway, and can covenant for its delivery at Halifax or at St. John, and the Grand Trunk Railway Company is bound to carry it at the same rates as they will carry it for any other person or company. That is all included in the $140,000 a year, so that I consider the bargain that has been made is an exceedingly good one. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have attempted to point out a difference between the bargain of 1897 and that of 1898. The hon. leader of the Opposition got up in this House a few evenings ago and declared that the later bargain is $1,000,000 better than the former one; while the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) would not risk his reputation by going that far. In two of the last speeches he made he said that it was about $500,000 better than the former bargain. Here are two hon. gentlemen sitting side by side, one the leader of the Opposition and the other the ex-Finance Minister, who, after having thought this matter over, are in doubt as to whether it is really $1,000,000 or whether it is only $500,000 better.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair) $400,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. Or $400,000. That shows what a divergence of opinion exists between the leading lights amongst hon. gentlemen opposite as to the relative advantages of this present bargain and the bargain of 1897.

Mr. CLANCY. What do you say about it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will tell my hon. friend, and I will be very frank with him. If I were the owner of the Drummond County Railway, and I had an offer to sell, I frankly confess that I would rather have $1,600,000 in cash than take a lease from the country agreeing to pay $64,000 for ninety-nine years.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I would not.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) says he would not. You have to take this into consideration; you have not a security that you are going to place on the London market that is a bond of this Dominion with coupons attached for interest payable annually. You have no desirable investment that you can divide up. It has to be handled by one man. Suppose you wanted to dispose of that lease at $64,000 for ninety-nine years, the man who buys it would have to take into consideration the cost of the collection of the money. The probabilities are that it would be payable at the Receiver General's Office in Ottawa. Suppose the purchaser lives in London. He has to take into account the exchange, the time that the money is being transmitted, the cost of transmission every year of this $64,000, and he would have to take into consideration the risk that he might have to run because hon. gentlemen opposite might get into power, and, if they did, the credit of the country might so run down that he would find his security not as saleable as it may be at the present time. Notwithstanding the statement that the hon. ex-Minister of Finance has made, I will venture to predict that although it may suit his convenience now to say that he would take the lease, with a payment of $64,000 for ninety-nine years, that if you placed on one counter $1,600,000 in cash, and a bond of that kind—I will stake my seat in this House that he would take the $1,600,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Just try it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Because there would be considerable difficulty in handling a bond of that kind. There may be some men in England who could handle it. They might possibly form themselves together and handle it in that way, but it is not a desirable investment. In England it would not be considered a desirable investment; it is not an investment you could place on the market in England, nor would you get money at the rate of interest at which this Dominion can borrow. I believe it was the view of the owners of the Drummond County Railway, when the scheme was presented to their minds, that it was better for them to take $1,600,000 than to run the risk of handling that bond, placing it on the London market and maybe making $200,000 or $300,000 more. I believe they came to that conclusion, and I believe that they were wise in their day and generation. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat said that the Intercolonial were only capturing freight that properly belonged to the Grand Trunk Railway. We rejoice that the Grand Trunk Railway is prosperous, and we are glad to see every railway in the country prosperous, but even supposing we do, and supposing that the Grand Trunk should suffer a little owing to the fact that the Intercolonial Railway is getting this volume of the business of the country, the country will reap the benefit if the Grand Trunk does not reap the benefit. I believe that in the course of a year or two, when the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has had an opportunity to mature and put into successful operation the scheme that he has now propounded to the House, it will show that there is wisdom and prudence in the course that he adopted that the country is going to get out of the everlasting deficits in the operation of that railway, and that eventually it will pay a handsome revenue in addition to the working expenses, and the country will get something in return for the amount of money that has been sunk in that road. I believe that will be the result, and I believe the country will be grateful to the Minister (Mr. Blair) for the efforts which he has made to change the unfortunate condition of things which has existed on the Intercolonial Railway for thirty years. The statement made by the Minister, that the receipts on that road have increased $860,000 during the last year, is a most gratifying announcement, and I hope that gentlemen opposite will blush before they again rise in this House and talk about the incapacity of this Government. I hope that these gentlemen on the other side, will realize that when their hats are on, all the brains in this country are not covered. The men in this Government have shown that they have ability to properly conduct our national affairs. I congratulate the Minister of Railways on the magnificent showing he has made, and I repeat, that he deserves the thanks of this House and of the country. He has made a change in the history of the Intercolonial Railway that will inure to his credit for many, many long years. The people of Canada will recognize that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) is possessed of ability, common sense and statesmanship, and that he has rendered valuable and lasting services to his country.

Mr. WM. GIBSON (Lincoln). It is not my desire at this late hour to take up the time of the committee, particularly as the matter has been dealt with in such an able manner by the Minister of Railways that it has left very little for members on either side of the House to say. I cannot, however, help noticing the marked contrast between the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) and the ex-Minister (Mr. Haggart). We all remember that when the Liberal party was in Opposition and when they made charges across the floor of this House of extravagance against the then Minister (Mr. Haggart)—sometimes the work exceeding his estimates by hundreds of thousands of dollars—his answer simply was: "I know nothing about it; I left that in the hands of my engineers and officers." Contrast that conduct with the manner in which the present Minister (Mr. Blair) has dealt with this subject. Contrast his able statement to-night with the reply of the ex-Minister (Mr. Haggart). Consider the statements that were brought down by the Minister (Mr. Blair), statements and estimates carefully prepared by the officers of the department, and contrast that with the declaration of the ex-Minister (Mr. Haggart) on his responsibility as a member of Parliament, that he could duplicate the Victoria Bridge to-day for $1,500,000. In view of such a statement, I leave the country to judge of the ability of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) to ever have occupied the position of Minister of Railways and Canals. Sir, the original Grand Trunk Railway Bridge, built by perhaps one of the greatest engineers the world has ever produced, Mr. Robert Stevenson, cost $6,750,000. True, the new bridge of to-day could be built for the same amount, or perhaps for $5,000,000. But look at the bridge of forty-five years ago, with only one single track, with no accommodation for foot passengers, simply a tunnel of iron, but with material enough to build the bridge of to-day, which is capable of carrying 11,000 pounds weight to the running foot of each line of the track; contrast that bridge of to-day with the bridge of forty years ago, when the greatest load that it was considered possible to put on a single line of railway was 2,240 pounds to the running foot. That Victoria Bridge to-day is capable of sustaining a running load of 11,500 pounds to the running foot on each of its tracks, or in other words, it has ten times the carrying capacity of the old bridge. I leave it to the House and to the country to judge, whether the bargain made by the

Mr. McMULLEN.

Minister (Mr. Blair) was good or bad, when we remember that that bargain allows all the trains of the Intercolonial Railway to pass over and through that bridge for the sum of $40,000 or $50,000 a year. I happen to know something of some of the bridges in this country, and I will give you one instance in the case of the old Suspension Bridge in the county of Welland, represented by my hon. friend (Mr. McCleary), who will know whether I am speaking by the book or not. That bridge is only 800 feet long between the towers. The original bridge cost half a million dollars. The Grand Trunk Railway Company entered into a 999 years lease with the Suspension Bridge Company for a rental of $50,000 a year, or ten per cent of the total cost of the original bridge for 999 years. The traffic of the lower bridge was in the hands of the Bridge Company. All the tolls that were collected became the property of the Bridge Company. They kept officers for collecting the toll by day and by night, and everything under the upper tracks of the bridge solely and wholly belonged to the Suspension Bridge Company. Now, in addition to that, the Grand Trunk Railway Company had to maintain the upper deck and the upper floors of the bridge; maintain its track and own and maintain its approaches; so that all the expenses in connection with that 800 feet bridge, were maintained in toto by the Grand Trunk Railway. Since this growing time of business, the traffic on the Grand Trunk Railway like the business of every corporation and individual in this country had to have greater facilities, and the Suspension Bridge Company knowing that there was no possibility of increasing the carrying power of the old Suspension Bridge, or of giving greater railway facilities for the traffic of the Grand Trunk Railway, decided, and decided wisely to do away with the old Suspension Bridge, and to erect a steel arch bridge in its place. The Grand Trunk Railway Company as a business corporation did not haggle, as my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House do, about a matter of $4,000 or $5,000, but the moment the Suspension Bridge Company declared their willingness and ability to replace the old Suspension Bridge with a steel arch bridge, the Grand Trunk Railway Company at once acquiesced in the proposal and made new terms. I may say, in passing, that the arch there is the wonder of the world to-day, and it was erected without for one moment stopping the traffic of the Grand Trunk Railway, or any of the other railways that use that bridge. I venture to remark, that for no five minutes of the 24 hours of the day is there not a railway train or a shunting engine on the top of that bridge. When we went to the Grand Trunk Railway Company with our proposition to build a new bridge, we were at once met with the old lease, but they did not haggle about the 999 year lease which was to hold the Bridge Company for all time to come, no matter what improvement they might make in the matter of giving greater facilities to the Grand Trunk Railway. No. Sir, they at once entered into an arrangement to increase the annual rental with the Bridge Company by $12,500, so that to-day, for 800 feet of a bridge, the Grand Trunk Railway Company are paying us $62,500 a year rental. The Grand Trunk Railway Company has still to maintain the approaches at the Canadian end as well as at the American end of the bridge; and I want to say, for the benefit of my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), who was so anxious about the Alien Labour Act, that I had Canadians working on the American end of the bridge during the months of April and May. I took my tools of trade over there and I was not interfered with.

Mr. CLARKE. Why do you not try to influence the Government to prevent aliens coming in to take the places of the men now on strike on the Grand Trunk Railway?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Chairman, I am in a position to state, by the authority of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, that that company are not importing, and do not intend to import any foreign labour.

Mr. CLARKE. I drew the attention of the hon. First Minister several weeks ago to the fact that Italians were being brought to the city of Toronto, and I asked him if he intended to have the Alien Labour Law enforced then.

The PRIME MINISTER. Not by the Grand Trunk.

Mr. GIBSON. I just wish, in passing, to say to my hon. friend who has been pointing out how commonly Canadians are being deported from the United States, that, as the Prime Minister stated yesterday, in only one city in the United States is that law being enforced, that is, in the city of Buffalo by a man named DeBarry. I have had, perhaps, as much experience of the Alien Labour Law as any man in this country, and I may say to the hon. member for West Toronto, that I built the American end, as well as the Canadian end of the Grand Trunk tunnel with Canadian workmen and Canadian material, and I never had a man stopped.

Mr. BEATTIE. The United States law was not then in force.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. member for London (Mr. Beattie) knows all about that, as he does about everything else. I want to inform him that, if the Alien Labour Law had been enforced, I was then liable for a fine, not of $500 per day, as now, but a fine of $1,000 per day. That is the difference between the law of 1892 and the law of 1898.

Mr. CLARKE. The hon. gentleman will permit me for a moment. He has made the statement that in only one city of the United States is the Alien Labour Law enforced. I wish to draw his attention to the fact that on the 30th of March last a despatch from Washington was published, which stated:

Drury J. Tallant, of Great Falls, Montana, has been appointed an immigration inspector for service at Coutts, Canada. This appointment is made in accordance with the recommendation of the collector of customs at Great Falls, who states that an additional inspector is urgently needed to prevent the importation into this country of alien contract labourers.

Mr. GIBSON. I was just pointing out that, notwithstanding the increased rental given by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, they have still to maintain their approaches, and I wish, in passing, to say to the hon. member for West Toronto, who, with his colleague from East Toronto, has the Alien Labour Law on the brain—

Mr. CLARKE. I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman until he had pointedly mentioned my name in connection with this discussion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. GIBSON. Now, I want to say, that this Government, in paying a rental of $50,000, or $75,000, or $100,000 a year for the use of the Victoria Bridge between Point St. Charles and St. Lambert, would not be paying one cent more than the Grand Trunk Company would be entitled to receive; for $100,000 a year would only be 1 per cent on $10,000,000. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have been lamenting that the Government were paying from 4 per cent to 5 per cent on the valuation put on the Grand Trunk Company's property. These hon. gentlemen forget that it is not the Dominion Government that is raising the money at 2½ per cent to bring these enterprises to completion, but that it is the Grand Trunk Company who are providing the money. The Victoria Bridge is 13·2 times longer than the Suspension Bridge between the towers and, according to the old rate of rental of the Suspension Bridge per running foot, the Grand Trunk Company would be entitled to receive from the Government $660,000 per year; or, under the new rental of $62,500 a year for the Suspension Bridge, the rental for a bridge 13·2 greater in length would amount to $825,000 a year. But, putting that comparison aside, and bringing the estimate down to a basis of value, when you consider that the Suspension Bridge cost less than $800,000, and that the Victoria Bridge, the old and the new, cost in the neighbourhood of $10,000,000, I think, that the Government have done well for the people of this country in getting the use of the new Victoria Bridge at a rental of one-half of 1 per cent per annum. Then, we have had some experience of how railway companies charge passengers on the other side of the line for passing over bridges. I am sure my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) will remember that, when we crossed over the bridge at St. Louis, we found that the bridge company had an agent come on board the train and collect from the through passengers 75 cents per head; from the local passengers, 50 cents per head, and from those living in the city of St. Louis, 25 cents per head. Going further down the Mississippi and crossing the bridge at Memphis, we found that every passenger had to pay 75 cents. If the same rule were followed with regard to the trains on the Intercolonial Railway passing over the Victoria Bridge, I believe I am safe in saying, that, with the increased traffic which we may expect, these tolls would amount to a great deal more than $50,000 a year. Then, the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) said he had made a survey of the road. He said that he had had a varied experience in building railroads in Nova Scotia and other provinces of the Dominion. That statement I have no reason to doubt; but I do say—and I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not here, because I asked him the question, when he was giving the House his experience, and his knowledge of railway building—that, so far as his inspection went, the line between St. Lambert and Ste. Rosalie was nothing but sand, and could be worked with road scrapers. That work, he said, could be let for 12 cents a yard to the main contractor and be sub-let again for 10 cents a yard. I knew that when the hon. gentleman made that statement, he was not making it from his own knowledge, because, starting at the very commencement of the line, at St. Lambert itself, instead of sandy loam, he will find rock cutting worth $1 to $1.50 a yard to take out. He will find, also, on passing along the line, that there is a swamp of over two miles in extent, and when he goes to St. Hyacinthe, right outside of the town, the first bridge he leaves, he will find a culvert there that cost $10,000 to build. He said, in the estimates he gave, that $25,000 would build all the small culverts and structures between St. Lambert and Ste. Rosalie. I can tell him of one small culvert that was put in at St. Hyacinthe which cost $8,000, and another bridge that was put in at St. Lambert, which cost $10,000, making $18,000 for the two, which would leave him the magnificent sum of $7,000, with which to put in stone culverts over 38 miles of railway. If he described the condition of things on the Grand Trunk Railway between St. Lambert and Ste. Rosalie, as he saw them, I am obliged to come to the conclusion that he must have ridden on the last car of the train and mistook the gravel that bedded the ties for the loam and sandy soil he saw in that portion of the line. He said he could get reputable men, and could furnish them in ten days, who would build this line at the prices he stated. Well, I was speaking to-day to a gentleman whose experience cannot be gainsaid, Mr. Mann, of

Mr. GIBSON.

Mann & Mackenzie, and when I told him that the hon. member for Glengarry had made that assertion, he said it was absurd, because he was paying to-day to sub-contractors 17 cents per cubic yard for earthwork on a section of the line he is building in the North-west at present.

The hon. gentleman laid great stress on the Richelieu Bridge, and gave even the number of piers and yards in that bridge. The masonry he estimated at $20 a yard and the superstructure at $45 a running foot. His whole estimate for the Richelieu Bridge was $76,630—$49,630 for the masonry, and $27,000 for the superstructure. Well, $27,000 would not build the centre span of the swing bridge on the Richelieu River, and, as a responsible member of this House, I am prepared to stake my reputation on the statements I have made, and I am more disposed to accept, with the knowledge I have had of public works, the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) and of a reputable officer of his department, than the statement which the hon. gentleman made across the floor for the sole purpose of criticising the bad bargain, as he called it, which the Government have made with the Grand Trunk Railway. If we are going to accept the Minister's and his officer's statement, the hon. gentleman is only out $323,000 on the Richelieu Bridge.

Then, when you come down to the bridge at St. Hyacinthe, he modestly put that at $29,500. You, Mr. Chairman, heard to-night the statement made by a responsible Minister of the Crown and the estimate given by the responsible officer of his department, which showed that it would cost $300,000 to put that bridge alone in its place, and yet we find that this gentleman, the member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) is prepared to duplicate that bridge for $29,500. I am sorry to say that in this case he is as much astray as in the case of the Richelieu Bridge. He is only $270,500 short on this bridge.

Then, there is another item which he laid great stress upon, and that is the ballasting of the road bed, that is, taking gravel from the gravel pit and placing it on the side of the road, to be used as ballast according as required. I can tell the hon. gentleman and his friends that no reputable engineer in this country would undertake to place the cost of ballasting any railway under 50 cents per cubic yard. And so along the line with every thing else the hon. gentleman said. The statements he made, the estimates he read, the manner and tone he saw fit to adopt, showed that he himself did not understand the figures he was reading, and led me to no other conclusion than that the statements were prepared for him and he did not know what he was talking about.

The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) said last night, and the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) said this afternoon that the giving of $37,500 per mile by the Government to the Grand Trunk Railway for the line from St. Lambert to Ste. Rosalie was a most disgraceful act. Now, I would like to put the hon. gentleman to a test, because they are old admirers of the Canadian Pacific Railway. No man will stand up in his place on either side of the House and say that the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway did not know their business, and that neither did the management of the Grand Trunk Railway; and let me point out to you that on the line between Toronto and Hamilton Junction—if I may be allowed to make the comparison—a mile west of Hamilton where it diverges on to the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway, a distance of 38 miles, the Grand Trunk Railway has a lease signed, sealed and delivered and to be in operation for fifty years at $40,000 per year or a rental of $1.025 per mile per annum of our money. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that that is a bad bargain? Does he pretend to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway did not know what it is doing, and allowed the Grand Trunk Railway to fleece it to the extent of $1.025 per mile? But I want to point out that while the Canadian Pacific Railway pays $1.025 per mile to the Grand Trunk Railway for the use of its tracks between Toronto and Hamilton Junction, or the point of junction with the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway, they have not the right to stop a train after they leave Parkdale until they reach Hamilton.

They can neither stop to take up or lay down a passenger on that line. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) wants to delude the House into believing that the same condition applies to the bargain made by the Dominion Government with the Canadian Pacific Railway. In addition to that $40,000 a year of rental for the use of this 38 miles of track, the Grand Trunk receives a rental for the terminus, the Union Station, which is held jointly by the two companies, and they pay the wages of the men jointly. And the Canadian Pacific Railway does not own or get a single mile of track from the Grand Trunk, except that portion of it leading into and out of the Union Station. It has to provide its own roundhouses, its own water tanks, and, as my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said, it must pay its own taxes in the city of Toronto. What is the difference in that bargain and the bargain we are dealing with which the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) says is of so monstrous a character? The Grand Trunk gets the money, and the Canadian Pacific Railway has to pay, in addition to the rental of $40,000 a year, half the maintenance of operation according to the number of miles that the trains are run, and there is no other way of making railway calculations except on the train mileage on which everything is based. When they reach the city of Hamilton they have to pay an additional sum. I think they have to pay from $10,000 to $20,000 a year for the use of the tracks of the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway and the use of its station yards in that city. They have no accommodation from the Grand Trunk. We were told this afternoon that the Intercolonial Railway receives no privileges from the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Now, if you will pardon me, I will read the 4th paragraph of the agreement:

Fourth.—That Her Majesty shall have the right for all purposes of business and traffic of the Intercolonial Railway, under the reasonable rules and regulations of the company, to the full and unlimited use and the full and unlimited access thereto, as the same is or may be enjoyed by the company itself, of, to and from all engine-houses, car-houses and sheds, fuel sheds, water tanks, station-houses, depots freight and ticket offices, warehouses, freight sheds, baggage rooms, dining-rooms, and all furniture and fittings appertaining thereto; all weighing scales and baggage and freight trucks; all tracks, sidings, branches or extensions either belonging to or leased by the company at Montreal, including the terminals and other connections of the company at Point St. Charles and intermediate points between Point St. Charles and Bonaventure station, and of the connections with other railways as hereinbefore specified, as the same now exists or as they may hereafter be built, rebuilt or improved upon terms as herein specified.

I think my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) will bear me out in this, that when the Grand Trunk acquired the property known as the old Northern Railway Company, it was the opinion of the public, at all events it was the opinion of railway men, that the terminal facilities acquired in the city of Toronto were worth the sum paid for the road. And I want to say further that the terminals and facilities that the Intercolonial Railway have secured in the city of Montreal are worth the cost of the line from Montreal to Toronto. If the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite were carried out, they would sink $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 in buying terminal facilities equal to those now enjoyed by the Intercolonial Railway from the Grand Trunk, if they sought to get them by purchase or expropriation of property in the city of Montreal. As was so well pointed out by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) you have free access to Bonaventure Station, access to every siding, every warehouse, every shop of the Grand Trunk. I would like any of the hon. gentlemen opposite the next time they are in the city of Montreal to observe carefully the facilities that the Intercolonial Railway enjoys. I think they will come to the conclusion that the bargain is all on the other side of the dish. I do not think there is any man in this House who has a proper appreciation of the real value of these terminal properties. Look at the advantage, for instance, in coming alongside the wharf to receive coal at the upper end of this line, coal brought up from Nova Scotia by water, as it is now received by the Grand Trunk, instead of hauling its coal as the Intercolonial Railway has had to do to Chau-dière Junction. My hon. friend from Gleggarry (Mr. McLennan) the other night admitted that its present terminus was no place to leave the Intercolonial Railway. And I am sure my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope), and the hon. gentleman sitting in front of him (Mr. Ives), will agree that the policy of the Government in bringing the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal must meet with the approval of every man who loves Canada. I was proud to hear the statement of the Minister of Railways and Canals this afternoon that he was negotiating for a car to be put on that would go through without breaking bulk until you arrive at the city of Halifax. How nice it would be for my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Charles Herbert Tupper) when he wants to go down to the sea to step on board his car at the Canada Atlantic Railway Station here and be carried through to Halifax.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). He goes the other way to reach the sea now.

Mr. GIBSON. Well, no doubt we shall have it from Vancouver to Halifax without breaking bulk. Before I sit down I might point out that in addition to the Canadian Pacific Railway paying the Grand Trunk $1,000 a mile, the Wabash, running as it does from Port Erie on the Grand Trunk Air Line through to Glencoe, where it meets the Grand Trunk double track to Windsor, pays the same money for the privilege.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It pays $1,000 a mile.

Mr. GIBSON. I am assured by my hon. friend from Kent that they pay $1,000 a mile. But instead of the Intercolonial Railway paying $1,025 a mile, as the Canadian Pacific Railway pays the Grand Trunk, it only pays $756.41 per mile, or a saving of $268.59, or $10,000 a year less than the Grand Trunk receives from the Canadian Pacific Railway for the same service. Then the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) wanted to convince the House, and he was supported by the statement of the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), that the Intercolonial Railway could not sell a ticket, could not collect a fare, except on the through trains. What advantage would there be for the Intercolonial Railway or for the Grand Trunk either to sell local tickets upon its through trains? But I want to say to the ex-Minister of Finance, that I give him sufficient credit for believing that if he had looked at this agreement closer than he did, he would never have made the statement.

Mr. FOSTER. What statement?

Mr. GIBSON. The statement that the Intercolonial Railway could not collect any fares between St. Lambert and Ste. Rosalie.

Mr. FOSTER. I made no such statement.

Mr. GIBSON.

Mr. GIBSON. You made the statement last night.

Mr. FOSTER. No, nor at any other time.

Mr. GIBSON. And he repeated the statement this afternoon.

Mr. FOSTER. I will tell my hon. friend what I did say. I stated in reply to the Minister of Railways and Canals that he could only collect on through trains, and the Minister of Railways and Canals knows that is true.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No, that is not true.

Mr. FOSTER. It is true.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I beg your pardon.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Railways and Canals has no authority under that agreement to-day to collect any fares on any other than through trains, and there is a section which defines what a through train is. The section that defines what a through train is says that through trains are those which run all the way from St. Lambert to Ste. Rosalie.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. All the way to Ste. Rosalie.

Mr. FOSTER. And my hon. friend knows it. He cannot put on what you would call a suburban train which reaches short of Ste. Rosalie. That is what my statement was.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We call a through train a train running to Ste. Rosalie, the 32 miles.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I said, that you could only collect these local tickets and local fares on through trains, which is true.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not understand the hon. gentleman's phraseology. It is evident that he does not know much about railroad phraseology, and the meaning of through trains. I would understand, and any railway man would understand, that a through train meant a train running from Montreal through to Halifax or some other point on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. FOSTER. The interpretation given in the document my hon. friend holds will enlighten either him or me as to what is meant by a through train in that connection, there are so many English words that express it.

Mr. GIBSON. If my hon. friend will just keep his soul in patience I will try and explain it to him. Now, my hon. friend knows very well that a through train is not in the habit of stopping at way stations, he will surely grant me that. Then what in the name of common sense is the use of bickering about the sale of tickets on a through train where the train does not stop? Now, if the hon. gentleman will listen to me for one minute, I think he will find that there is a provision made for the Intercolonial Railway Company not only selling tickets but collecting fares upon its trains. Let me mention here that the Wabash Railway, in addition to its paying $1,000 a mile to the Grand Trunk Railway, is bound to accept passes granted by the Grand Trunk Railway Company; and I am informed by a friend of mine who was travelling the other day on the Intercolonial Railway, that the Intercolonial Railway did not honour passes given by the Grand Trunk Railway Company upon its cars. Let the hon. gentleman look at section 17 of the agreement:

That all moneys collected in the vehicles and trains of the Intercolonial Railway at any and all points between and including Ste. Rosalie and Montreal shall belong to and be deemed to have been earned by Her Majesty, and the company shall not be entitled to receive any portion thereof; and that all moneys collected and received by the station masters and any and all other persons who may from time to time be authorized or instructed by the proper officials of the Intercolonial Railway to collect and receive money between and including Ste. Rosalie and Montreal for Intercolonial Railway business and traffic, including among other things car rental, storage in freight in cars and storage of goods in the company's warehouses and freight sheds, or collected and received for any other business in any way connected with the Intercolonial Railway, belongs to Her Majesty and shall be deposited in bank to the credit of the Receiver General of Canada, or remitted to the cashier of the Intercolonial Railway, or otherwise deposited of as the Minister may from time to time direct.

Now then section 18 says:

That local tickets issued by either of the parties hereto for passage between and including Ste. Rosalie and Montreal, or any intermediate station, shall be accepted on all trains of either party hereto between said points, and the party who issued the tickets shall, on presentation of the ticket so used and collected, pay to the party who carried the passenger the full amount received for the said ticket.

Is not the hon. gentleman satisfied now that the Intercolonial Railway can issue intermediate tickets to intermediate stations? If a passenger wishing to go by the Intercolonial Railway goes down to the station and buys a ticket by the Intercolonial Railway and he finds that he is an hour late, he jumps on the Grand Trunk Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway takes that ticket and charges the Intercolonial Railway at the end of the month, just as the railways do under the English system in the clearing-house in London.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, how far have you got?

Mr. GIBSON. There is nobody else, I will not say so stupid as the hon. gentleman, because the hon. gentleman is not a stupid man, but he is too astute not to see the connection between the words "between" and "intermediate." He says you must go on a through train, that local tickets can only be issued upon a through train that does not stop.

Mr. FOSTER. No, no; I did not put in the words "that does not stop."

Mr. GIBSON. But my hon. friend knows that a through train does not stop. When he goes down to Montreal he, of all men, prefers to take a through train, although it may stop at one or two stations between here and Montreal, in preference to a train that stops at every station, and he will not dispute it. To-morrow, if he wanted to go down to Montreal on the Canada Atlantic Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they asked him for a ticket at such and such a station, what would happen? If the conductor presented himself for a ticket, would he say: Mr. Foster, you are on the wrong train, it does not stop at the first station, we will have to either put you off or carry you on? The hon. gentleman will understand, then, the meaning of a through train, a through train does not stop at every station. Now, I have tried to infuse into the hon. gentleman's mind an idea of the difference between a through train and a train that is doing a local business. My hon. friend knows, and every hon. gentleman on the other side knows, that the Government to-day, through the able Minister of Railways and Canals, has made the best bargain for the Dominion of Canada in railway matters that the Dominion of Canada has ever made since confederation; and I venture to say that when the whole matter is publicly discussed among business men as it has been in the past, and when the statement of my hon. friend, that I am proud of occupying the position that he does, goes to the country to-morrow, from one end of the Dominion to the other, no one will regard the threat thrown out by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) equivalent to saying that he hoped the Senate would throw it out again; I say that no Senate, and no body of men, in face of the evidence and of all the facts brought before them, have a right to say that this is a bad bargain. It is a good bargain, it has been done in a businesslike way, and not in the slipshod way that has characterized the bargains made by hon. gentlemen opposite for eighteen years. No, Sir, the business of this country to-day is done by business men, on business principles; it is not done upon the percentage basis either, as to whether the money is to be paid now or at the next general election. I, for one, with some practical knowledge of railway matters, am proud of the Government of which I am a humble supporter, and as long as I have the honour of representing the county that sends me here, I shall raise my voice and give my vote to sustain this Government, which I think is doing so much for the Dominion of Canada.

Resolutions reported, on division.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House adjourns, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) if he can tell us when he is going to bring down the first supplementary Estimates or the second supplementary Estimates.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The supplementary Estimates for the current year ought to be brought down at a very early day. They are nearly complete, and I hope to bring them down at an early day, I should say, the first of the week.

Mr. FOSTER. Are they going to be large?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask the right hon. First Minister what he proposes to ask this side of the House to do to-morrow.

The PRIME MINISTER. The same thing as to-day. We will go on with the Drummond County Railway Resolution.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 2nd June, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 136)—from the Senate—for the relief of Annie Inkson Dowding.—(Mr. Clarke.)

THIRD REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough) presented the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts :

Your committee recommend that the evidence taken and the exhibits filed before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts during the last session of the House of Commons, in connection with the payment of $300 to Col. Domville for J. Milton Barnes, be referred to this committee for the purpose of further examination and report.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough) moved :

That the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be now adopted.

Mr. GIBSON.

Mr. JAMES DOMVILLE (King's, N.B.) Mr. Speaker, I think before that motion is put, it might not be out of place to say a few words on it. I called the attention of the Public Accounts Committee, this morning, to the fact that a gentleman who undertook to bring me before that committee last year had taken a wise course. He waited until I was away, until I had left. I had gone to British Columbia, which was patent to everybody. I refer to the hon. member for York, N.B. There is a very long investigation on it, and my hon. friend who undertook this Crown prosecution, for, I presume, it must be called a Crown prosecution or a prosecution general, as it is called in some parts of the world, in that kindly feeling that always has been exhibited on all occasions started out in the House, as I find in "Hansard" of the 19th of April, by saying that he had seen a copy of the charges, and "I think they are charges which no militia officer should be under." Then he goes on to say that he considers it really in the light of the Good Samaritan that my course should be cleared up and that I should stand before the House and the country in a favourable position. Remarkably kind, but he would have been kinder still if he had taken the trouble to have made some proper inquiries before he placed broadcast before the country charges against another member of this House which cannot be cut away so easily as they are made. We know that a lie travels fast and the truth lags by the way. If you take the seeds of a flower and throw them in the air, you know how impossible it is to afterwards pick up the petals grown from those seeds. So it is with a lie, it is hard to gather it in again by the truth. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) tried for his own personal advantage, and to elevate his personal standing, to cast aspersions on me, but I can assure him that my standing in Parliament and before the country will compare most favourably with his own, and that I have been more fortunate than he was in my public appearances in the country I represent. Was not this done as an attempt to destroy my reputation? I say it was. If the hon. gentleman wanted to be fair, why did he not make these statements when I was here and not wait until I had left the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was very anxious last year to insist that every member sitting in this House should have his character cleared, but we have been here ten weeks this session, and while he has attacked every one else he dared not say a word against me. I must be careful to confine my remarks in this House to parliamentary language, Mr. Speaker, and I know I can say outside what I cannot say in it, and so I will let his conduct pass by saying that his conduct was not manly. Why did he not bring the charges forward this session? Last year he had them published in the "Sun" newspaper. I do not know whether he is the owner or editor of the "Sun," but we have not to look far back to find his name appearing as the editor or manager. I saw a copy of that paper when I was out in Vancouver, and the heading was "The Great Domville Scandal," "Misappropriation of Public Funds." Was it fair to do that when my back was turned, and then to let it rest for the ten weeks of this session? He was ready to attack every one in this House this session; he was ready to talk at length about the saving of $14, which he effected on potatoes if they were bought at 40 cents a bushel when they cost 50 cents; but he was not ready to repeat his charges against me. His attack was directed against me as the representative of King's; that fair county that I am proud to represent after fighting my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) for so many years, and after having had the honour of driving him out of it. He has always said he was a King's county boy, although I differ from him in that, for I do not think he is.

An hon. MEMBER. What county is he from?

Mr. DOMVILLE. I do not know what his county is, but he now represents York in this House. I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to occupy the time of the House, but I wish to state that my character is quite as unassailable as is the character of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). I stand in this House to-day enjoying the confidence of my people. I might have cast stories around this House, and some of them might not be very pleasant for some gentlemen, but since I have been in this House I have refrained from going into personal matters, and I hope I shall continue that so long as I am here. Why should the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) cast reflections on the people of King's, whose representative he was once, and why should he unjustly assail its member in this House. It ill-becomes him to sit here in silence for ten weeks without making good his charges. I hold him responsible before this House, I hold him responsible before Canada, to make his charges good if he can. The hon. gentleman had a right to find out what he was doing before he made a public statement in this House, and if he does not make it good then he must stand before this House and before the country convicted of an attempt to injure a member of the House of Commons without having any evidence in his possession. There is no use of him trying to hide himself behind Major Markum. He stated, as recorded in "Hansard," that Major Markum gave him these reports. How did he get them from Major Markum? What has Major Markum got to do with this House? Did he ask Major Markum for those charges or did Major Markum volunteer to give them? Sir, it was a premeditated attempt to injure me before the country, at a time when I was not here to defend myself, and when I had left for British Columbia on my way to Dawson City. I challenge the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to prosecute the attack, or if he finds out there is nothing in it, I shall ask from him that which I expect to get, a candid apology for his bringing this matter before the House without knowing what he was doing.

Motion agreed to, and report adopted.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 137) to further amend the Act respecting the protection of navigable waters. He said: Last session a Bill was passed by the House prohibiting the dumping into navigable waters of any refuse from steamers or otherwise, in waters less than 12 fathoms in depth; and the question arose whether that would extend to the harbours under the control of the harbour masters who are authorized to allow vessels coming in ballast to dump the ballast in certain specified places. The Department of Justice thought a proviso should be inserted making it clear that the Act of last session does not extend to such cases.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BOUNTIES ON IRON AND STEEL.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved: That the House do, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the bounties on steel ingots, puddled iron bars and pig iron made in Canada, authorized by chapter 6 of the Acts of 1897, shall, on the termination of the period therein mentioned, be gradually reduced during a limited term until they are extinguished, and that the bounties to be paid for the additional term shall be as follows:—

(a) From the 23rd of April, 1902, to the 30th of June, 1903, both inclusive, the bounties shall be 90 per centum of the amount fixed by the said Act.

(b) From the 1st of July, 1903, to the 30th of June, 1904, both inclusive, the bounties shall be 75 per centum of the amount fixed by the said Act.

(c) From the 1st of July, 1904, to the 30th of June, 1905, both inclusive, the bounties shall be 55 per centum of the amount fixed by the said Act.

(d) From the 1st of July, 1905, to the 30th of June, 1906, both inclusive, the bounties shall be 35 per centum of the amount fixed by the said Act.

(e) From the 1st of July, 1906, to the 30th of June, 1907, both inclusive, the bounties shall be 20 per centum of the amount fixed by the said Act.

Provided, however, that if any steel ingots be made from puddled iron bars manufactured in Canada, no bounty shall be paid on such steel ingots.

The said bounties shall cease and determine on the 30th of June, 1907.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picton). The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) will remember that a promise was made to bring down papers in connection with the appointment of Mr. Russell, steamboat inspector in the Yukon. Those papers were to be brought down on Tuesday. On that day, or the day before, one of the hon. gentleman's officers told me that, if the return was to embrace a certain period, its preparation would take some time. On Wednesday, I asked the hon. Minister of Marine, across the floor, if he would expedite the first part of the return, as I was very anxious to get it, leaving the balance for a supplementary return, as his officer had told me that the first part was ready. I would be greatly inconvenienced, if the hon. Minister would give me the main portion of the return, and the rest may take its course. While on my feet, I would like to remind the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) of a similar case, that is, the return relating to the Crown Timber Office of New Westminster. I asked him, if he would expedite that portion of the return containing the correspondence leading up to the Order in Council authorizing the commission of inquiry and the appointment, leaving out the evidence, which would be the bulky part, and which does not concern the object I had in view.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I do not remember my hon. friend's calling my attention to it. Does he desire that I should bring down a partial return?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, the papers other than the evidence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The inspector, Mr. Russell, sent me, the other day, a memorandum, which I sent to my deputy, asking him to prepare a partial return which I could lay on the Table. I saw him in the afternoon, and he said that he was engaged with the clerks in copying it, and that he expected to have it ready yesterday afternoon. He has not sent it yet, but he is engaged on it, and I will bring it down as soon as possible.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), when I may expect a return which I asked for about three weeks ago, with reference to a lease or transfer of property in connection with the railway at Grand Narrows.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I stated to the hon. gentleman, if my memory serves me, in answer to his inquiry, that there was some information which we required to get from Moncton. It has been sent for, and I will furnish it the very moment it arrives.

Mr. FIELDING.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. With the consent of the House, I would like to move that the papers brought down today, the supplementary return in regard to the Manitoba prosecutions, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

L. C. R.—EXTENSION TO MONTREAL.

On the Order,

Second reading of Bill (No. 133) an Act to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway.—(Mr. Blair.)

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Would it make any difference, if we proceeded first with the Grand Trunk Resolutions, so far as getting the Bill to its second reading? When we get into committee on that measure, in which there are fifty or sixty items, a good many explanations, I think, will be required; and, if we could finish that while we are warm on the subject, it would be better than to make the diversion; and then both Bills could come before us at the same stage. Before they are finally disposed of, my hon. friend must know that there will be a little more speaking. I would ask, if that is convenient to the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It is a matter of indifference to me which Bill is taken first. I am in a position to introduce the Grand Trunk Bill now.

Mr. FOSTER. It is printed, is it?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have one copy. I do not think the Bill has been distributed, but I think it will be distributed this afternoon. In the meantime, I move the second reading of the Drummond County Railway Bill.

Mr. C. E. KAULBACH (Lunenburg). This Bill for the acquisition of the Drummond County Railway offers a subject for much comment and criticism. This Bill now under discussion, as submitted by the hon. Minister of Railways for the deliberation of this House, in the preamble commences as follows:—

Whereas it is expedient to provide for the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway, to the end that it may be made part of the Intercolonial Railway, &c., &c.

Now, I cannot see where the "expediency," or the advisability to purchase or acquire this road as the property of Canada, to be operated and to form a part of the Intercolonial Railway system into Montreal, comes in, when the annual report from the Railway Department for last year shows quite a deficit, notwithstanding the promise from the hon. Minister to the contrary, that the Intercolonial, with the Drummond County attached, extending into Montreal, would show a net profit per year of some $300,000, or thereabouts. Now, what are the facts? How do we find the accounts? What are the real results? To make it clear to the minds of all, as to how the account stood at the end of last year, and to make it still more comprehensive as to how it compares with previous years, I here give a tabulated statement for each of the last six fiscal years, or from 1893 to 1898, inclusive:

1895	3,815
1896	$55,940

By this you will observe that for the three years the Liberal-Conservatives were in power there was a net profit each year, whilst for the last three years the Liberals, or present Government, were in power, we had deficits, notwithstanding the hon. Minister of Railway's estimate that with the extension of the Intercolonial into Montreal, that is, with the Drummond County Railway tacked on, we would have a surplus of somewhere about $350,000 at the end of 1898. Instead of a forecast of this sort having been accomplished, results have shown, as per table, that we have suffered last year a serious loss, to the amount of $209,978 between receipts and expenditure, to come out of the taxpayers of the people of this country.

This is a serious state of affairs and such as should elicit the most searching inquiry as to the capabilities of this Drummond County road in past years, before being asked to pass judgment and become a purchaser. Such inquiry has been called for, but the satisfaction has not been forthcoming, which, to my mind, appears singular, and naturally leads to the one conclusion, that as this large deficit last year was the result of the extension, that is the Drummond County Railway attached to the Intercolonial Railway, it is very manifest the hon. Minister of Railways, by his refusal of so reasonable a request, is afraid to have the real facts of the case known, lest the resolution would be rejected by his usually subservient followers, who would consider the medicine too difficult to swallow.

Now, if this Drummond County Railway, which we are asked to purchase, has not proved a success, not even paid running expenses, but, on the contrary, has shown decided loss when operated as a private undertaking, when rigid economy doubtless had been exercised, what encouragement may we expect? What hopes can be extended to Parliament by way of benefits, if we accept the resolution as submitted? It is very certain that if a private corporation could do nothing with it, where economy had been exercised, we cannot have it succeed, under the Government's management, with so many private interests to serve, and the result must necessarily be a signal failure.

We are informed by the ex-Minister of Railways that when the late Government was in power this railway was offered by the company for $550,000, but as the Government at that time had information that it had been offered to private parties for $400,000, the ex-Minister of Railways considered there was no urgent necessity at that time for accepting their offer. If this is true, and I certainly have no reason to doubt it, I ask, is it not unreasonable at this time for this Parliament to accept this railway at the increased rate of $1,600,000?

This, it will be remembered, is the same railway hon. gentlemen opposite were wanting Parliament to purchase last year for $2,100,000, but which fortunately was rejected by the members of the other Chamber, for which, on their part, coupled with their rejection of that iniquitous Yukon railway, or tramway, Bill, they (the Government) had threatened the Senate to deprive them of their independence or usefulness as a body.

This same company that then offered this road for $2,100,000 last year, has now dropped their figures to $1,600,000, or four times the price they were originally willing to accept. It is evident to my mind that some political trickster is making money out of this deal, but the great difficulty is to trace it.

Should not some statement, some papers, with data, be exhibited to Parliament with regard to this road, as to the past record, whereby the receipts and expenditures, the earnings of this road, could serve as a guide, before asking Parliament to vote? I say the course the Government is pursuing is unjust and unwise in the interests of Canada.

The refusal on the part of the hon. Minister of Railways, in charge of this Bill, to communicate to Parliament any information respecting the earning capabilities of this railway is being fully commented upon by the unsubsidized press and the people of Canada.

The Montreal "Gazette" says of it as follows:—

The refusal of the Government to lay before Parliament a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Drummond County extension of the Intercolonial is in keeping with its whole conduct in the remarkable transaction that seems destined to turn out so favourably for Mr. J. N. Greenshields and his associates, and so unfavourably for the country. It is alleged for the Government that the arrangement under which the Drummond County line is being operated as part of the Intercolonial, by increasing the traffic, has justified the purchase of the property. There are no figures to establish this before Parliament, or the country. There are some that contradict the claim.

This same paper then quotes the figures the same as I have already given, as published by the Railway Department, which shows that the earning power of the Intercolonial Railway had not been improved by the extension to Montreal.

It concluded as follows:—

The purchase cannot be justified on business grounds. If it could the Government, to strengthen its case, would gladly give all the information possible bearing on the business of the section. Both what is known of the operation of the Intercolonial, since the Drummond County road was attached to it, and what the Government refuses to disclose, will operate to convince the unprejudiced onlooker that the scheme to which it is sought to commit Parliament is not in the interest of the country, and will only tend to make the Intercolonial a permanently heavier burden on the taxpayers.

The "Montreal Star" dealt with the Minister of Railways in this fashion:

As a general rule, when the Hon. Mr. Blair, Minister of Railways and Canals, professes ignorance of railway matters, there is no disposition on the part of the public to question his sincerity, because the hon. gentleman has given such convincing proofs from time to time of his capacity for not knowing anything about these matters. We mean no reflection upon the Minister's intelligence, because nobody who knows Mr. Blair believes him to be lacking in intelligence. His ignorance of matters connected with his own department has rather the appearance of premeditated ignorance. He may, perhaps, take as his motto: "Where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise." When he introduced the Canadian Yukon Railway Bill, he showed so little knowledge of the scheme as to create the impression that he was ashamed of and wanted to repudiate the paternity of the measure. But his statement that he is unable to lay any information before Parliament regarding the earnings of the Drummond County Railway since it was leased by the Government reveals a degree of ignorance that really amounts to an achievement. Mr. Blair asks Parliament for $1,600,000 to buy a railway already under his control, and he does not know whether it is earning its axle-grease! The Government railway accounts are kept in such a way that the Government does not know which parts of the system are paying and which are not. Mr. Blair has never had any curiosity as to whether the Drummond County Railway was earning its rental or not.

We can see the wisdom of the late Government in declining to think of the purchase of this road with a record of reputed losses each year instead of gain, giving deficits instead of surpluses, and the more reasonable does it appear to my mind when we consider the number of competing lines and tap railways from Montreal to the Atlantic Ocean. I was surprised when running my eye over the map to find so many. I will enumerate them seriatim from south to north. There is the New York Central, Vermont Central, Boston and Maine, Grand Trunk, Canadian Pacific, Quebec Central, Drummond County, South Shore, North Shore or Canadian Pacific Railway, projected Great Northern, and last but not least we have the great River St. Lawrence, the principal and main great highway during the summer season, on its navigable waters for the transport of the products of western Canada from Montreal east to all parts of the world.

I merely have referred to the projected Great Northern Railway, but which I believe will be one of the great competing roads of Canada when connected with the Parry Sound Railway for the carriage of grain, cattle, &c., from the great grain-growing centres of the west to the Atlantic Ocean.

Viewing the situation, as I have given it, from a commercial standpoint, and considering all these competing lines, some of them natural highways to the sea from Montreal, is it not well for us to call a halt, and carefully consider the position we are about placing ourselves in, it not being an expenditure or investment from which we might expect a surplus, or even the interest of our money, but on the contrary, and for all time an annual deficit which must come out of the pockets of the people of Canada, and not for one year, but every year the road is kept running. If this railway is approved of by Parliament, that is the extension into Montreal, I feel it is only the beginning of an immense outlay each year. There is the right of way over the Grand Trunk Railway, the use of Victoria bridge into Montreal, the proposed extension of the bridge—the right to use terminals, and the other concessions to the Grand Trunk, all which will place us in a worse position than anything we can at present estimate or think of.

I am anxious to have all the transport of goods, whether the product of Canada for foreign markets, or the imports of goods into Canada, all moving as far as is possible in Canadian channels, and as a part of a means to that end to utilize the Intercolonial and extend it by a bridge over the St. Lawrence and thence by rail with the great water stretches of Canada to open wide a door to the vast regions of the west, rich in agriculture and mineral deposit—and wrest the trade which largely hitherto had been diverted through channels across the border and over American territory to seaport towns in the United States for shipment to all parts of the world.

We have fine harbours all along our Atlantic coast, and as a terminal point for the Intercolonial Railway, Halifax excels, as it is easy of approach from the sea, well lighted, with excellent water and without tortuous tides or currents to divert the course of ships. I am very unwilling to pay tribute to seaports of a foreign country when we have such excellent ports of our own in Canada.

I do not want to be understood that I am opposed to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway, far from it, but I am opposed to the purchase of this Drummond County Railway as it will be an extravagant road to keep up, and we are paying too much for it—besides considering the many competing roads, it will be a losing investment for us every year it is operated.

I may be asked as to what is my proposal. Well, I don't hesitate to give it. It is this. The Government I understand is pledged to build a bridge across the St. Lawrence near Quebec to connect with the Intercolonial near Lévis. I therefore propose that we acquire the Canadian Pacific Railway, on the north shore, or the projected Great Northern, and that with the Parry Sound Railway leading to Georgian Bay, and with the great water stretches we can tap all the products of the great North-west and be independent of our neighbours to the south of the River St. Lawrence between Lévis and Montreal, and, best of all, free from interference from the competing lines as referred to.

By this project we will have at all events a part of the trade of Montreal, and fully as much as were we to acquire by purchase this Drummond County line. We will have the trade of Ottawa as a commercial centre—as the road will take the Ottawa valley—part of the trade in summer of Quebec city and confines, and certainly the whole of the city and province of Quebec in the winter season, save that part of the province of Quebec known as the Eastern Townships.

Unfortunately for the Intercolonial Railway, and for the interests of Nova Scotia, we have not the influence of the hon. Minister of Railways with us for Nova Scotia, he being from New Brunswick and unquestionably favouring St. John, as is shown by what he has done for that city as a terminal point for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and his reference to that city as being nearer for shipment of goods from Montreal than Halifax by some 250 miles, but neglecting to state at the same time that if Halifax is further from Montreal than St. John, she is at the same time that many miles nearer the place of shipment across the Atlantic, with a safer and a better harbour and more easy of access than that of St. John.

I cannot see why, under all the circumstances and for the reasons I have advanced, there should be this undue haste on the part of the Government to press this purchase of the Drummond County Railway, unless necessitated by a fear that were the people of Canada to see the results of a full year's operation, the country would rise in revolt against such an extravagant and unfair transaction, and pronounce in no uncertain terms against them.

Before concluding my remarks I might say that it will be remembered there are two main channels or arteries for the transport of shipments from the west into Montreal—the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. Surely the Government do not for one moment imagine that either of these great corporations, after bringing grain or other commodities from the west, are willing to transfer their freight to the Intercolonial. It is reasonable they want the long hauls themselves to the ports of shipment by the sea. Therefore, it is plainly seen that with a bridge across the St. Lawrence at Quebec extending the Intercolonial Railway to Parry Sound by the Ottawa valley we are, or would be, independent of our neighbours on the south side of the St. Lawrence, and could control the entire trade of the north side of the St. Lawrence in our own hands and in the winter season entirely, so far as shipments are concerned from Quebec to the sea.

I propose, therefore, the extension of the Intercolonial Railway by a bridge across the St. Lawrence and not acquire the Drummond County Railway. Consequently I oppose this Bill and will record my vote accordingly.

Mr. R. POPE (Compton). I have listened with considerable interest to the debate that has taken place in connection with this question, and I must say that I am under the impression that more or less politics have been mixed up with the purchase and extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal. I have listened also to the legal talent of this House on both sides, and have paid great attention to the subtlety of their arguments, and I must confess that there seems to be an effort on the part of those legal gentlemen to see which could split the smallest hair in connection with this subject. It is well known that I cannot sympathize altogether with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House with regard to this question; but the simple fact that I entertain a difference of opinion or judgment upon a matter of this character, will not, I am sure, carry with it any feeling of animosity by myself towards those who differ from me, and with whom I usually act in this House, and I am sure on their part they have no right to have any feeling towards me personally on that account. I feel that in debating the question of whether we should pay $10,000, or $12,000 or $15,000 a mile for the Drummond County Railway, there is a tendency to ignore the importance of the great commercial principle of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal. I do not believe that we can afford to ignore the commercial principle in dwelling upon the question as to whether we should pay $10,000 or $12,000 a mile for this railway. I cannot afford to lose sight of the fact that the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal means a great deal more than the present mileage of the Intercolonial Railway but I will endeavour to deal with that question later on. I regret very much that the Department of Railways has not been able to furnish the evidence or figures that I asked for several weeks ago, and if they had been brought down I would be able to discuss more intelligently this question than I shall be able to do in my few remarks this afternoon.

Now, Sir, we had long discussion yesterday in this House, and we have done so previously, in connection with the old Canadian Pacific Railway agreement by which the Canadian Pacific Railway entered the lower provinces. I must say that I do not sympathize very much with a discussion of those old contracts, and I am not sure whether, in the light of to-day, under the present circumstances, if another contract was to be made, it should not be made precisely in the same way as the contract was made at that time. That does not cut much figure, in my opinion, in the consideration of this question. But I am bound to say that bringing the terminus of our first transcontinental railway through Canada into the lower provinces, whether you call it an agreement, or whether you call it a lease, or whether you call it a bonus, or whether you call it anything else, I think it was a wise arrangement, and one which has since proved, I am sure, a boon to the city of St. John, and our winter ports, showing conclusively that that contract had a value to that section of Canada. I go further than that in believing that there is a very great work to be done yet in transcontinental communication in this country. I believe that the day is not far distant, I believe that the day is not more than five years distant, when we will have another transcontinental line across Canada, a line running through a strip of territory far more fertile than the district which is now traversed by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Take a look from the west of the head of Lake Winnipegosis, and you find a territory lying between that point via Edmonton at least 200 miles wide and 1,000 or 1,500 miles in length, of as fine a country as there is on the face of God's earth, and a far more fertile section than that which is served to-day by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir, it is not in the interests of that community, it is not in the interests of the settlement of that section of the country, that they should have to construct new lines of railway at right angles in order to reach the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I believe that five years from the time that I am speaking, we shall have the pleasure of travelling over that distant country upon a transcontinental railway. We know that the increased grain tonnage of the products of the soil in the future is bound to be north of the international boundary line. The United States, to a very large extent, have settled up their own territory, and their valuable lands are now nearly all occupied with an increasing population. The export trade of the United States of those grains will rather diminish than increase. We have seen desperate efforts put forth on this continent to reach the back territories in order to catch the trade that was bound to follow their settlement, and we are going to see the same effort put forward to reach the northern portions of the continent of America in Canada, by all the great lines of railway that are seeking freight of that character. At present we are to some extent working under difficulties in this country in the development of our shipping ports, owing to our climate and other conditions; and when we consider that we have strong competitors on the Atlantic coast in New York, Boston, Portland and other large centres in the United States, with their railways extending over that great district, seeing the fertility of the soil, seeing the immense area of that fertile region, it is only natural that these railways and seaports should endeavour to tap that section of country in order to get the advantage of the development that is bound to follow. So I say it is well that the Government of the day should make every effort to see that, at least, we retain our share of the advantage that will follow the development of that great section of Canada for the transportation and export business of this country. I believe firmly that we should see at an early day another transcontinental railway, which may be called the Northern, or the Canadian Northern, or whatever other name you choose to call it, passing through that district of country and down to the central portions of Canada, connected with the Grand Trunk Railway, or the Parry Sound Railway, or whatever road they may choose to tap, to find a terminus at Montreal. Some gentlemen have intimated that it might go as far north as the Lake St. John region, but I do not think that is practicable or possible; because the freight that they would have to take back west with them must be manufactured products, and they will desire to run through the manufacturing centres of Canada. So, preparatory to the construction of that road, I say it is well that the Government should endeavour to bring the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, and to make such freight arrangements as will prepare the way for this through transcontinental line, in order that not only the Canadian Pacific Railway may find its way to Halifax and St. John, but that we shall also have a terminus at Montreal, under the same arrangements, or under some well balanced arrangement, of this new transcontinental line which, in the near future, will be an accomplished fact.

Now, I have been somewhat astonished to find that the Intercolonial Railway, during the last two years, has not been placed more directly under a business management than it has been. I think from the speeches that were delivered by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, both inside of this House and outside of it, that, when we were asked to purchase the Drummond County road, we had, at least, a right to expect close business management applied to that railway. I believe that, if we had had that business management, we would have had greater success in the operation of that railway than we have had under the management of any Government in this country, because I do not believe that you can manage successfully any railway with political machinery, and whether it be under a Conservative Government or under a Liberal Government, the result of the operation of the Intercolonial Railway has been very unsatisfactory. As nearly as I can calculate, I find that, by operating that road during the last twenty-one years we have lost, taking simply the difference between expenditures and receipts and saying nothing of the tremendous amount of money that has been put into the road-bed—we have lost, with interest accumulated for twenty-one years, something like $6,500,000. I asked the question a few days ago why Mr. Harris's services had been dispensed with. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals informed me that it was because he had created a certain amount of friction. That hon. gentleman must have fancied that Mr. Harris was to continue as the agent of the political organization to which he belonged. I have done business with Mr. Harris for many years, and I must say that these relations have always been satisfactory, and that there has been no friction. But I can well understand that, when he went to a section of the country where every person in connection with that road had received certain favours under the guise of politics, it would be a very difficult task for Mr. Harris, or any other gentleman to move in the direction of bettering the conditions in the operation of that road. I fully understood when he undertook that task, that it was a very difficult one, and I should, at least, have said that it would have taken more than six months for that gentleman to have brought about a proper feeling between himself and the people of the maritime provinces. I firmly believe, Sir, that if that gentleman had been retained, if he had had an opportunity of working out his own problem in connection with the administration of the Intercolonial Railway, we would have had a return that we now will not have so long as it is run by political machinery, no matter what party may be in power. I believe that it is not necessary that $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 or $10,000,000 should be thrown away in the operation of that road. Take the total receipts of the operation of that road during these twenty-one years and you find that about $5,000,000 of money without the interest being added, have been spent on that road in ordinary expenditures for working expenses, more than has been received. I think it is generally admitted that a railway is supposed to be operated for from 70 to 80 per cent of its receipts, but we find an opposite condition of affairs in the operation of the Intercolonial Railway. So far as any investigation goes that I have been able to make, which has been limited, but still I have endeavoured to acquire information that I thought would be reliable, I am bound to say that, in the operation of that road to-day, there are five men working where three men could do the work; not only to-day, but during the entire operation of that railway this has been the result. But because it has been badly operated, is no reason why, in the future, if proper connections are made and business principles applied to the management of the road, it should not pay at least its expenses and leave some profit to the gentlemen who undertake the reorganization and reconstruction of that railway. They say that there is nothing talks so pointedly as money. I have gone into this question very carefully, and, believing in the possibilities of the earning of that road, I would be willing to say this much, that I would be pleased to offer the Government of the day an arrangement which, financially, I am sure, would be satisfactory, for a term of thirty years. I would be pleased to take this extension to the city of Montreal with all the fearful financial responsibilities that my hon. friend who just preceded me mentioned. I would say that with that road extended to Montreal I would have a good snap from a financial point of view. If it were brought out of the woods, back to Lévis, and if it were extended to the city of Montreal, to the heart and centre of business, I would be prepared to say to the Government that, for the first ten years I would give $200,000, that for the next ten years I would give $300,000, and that for the next ten years I would give $400,000; I would pay the $140,000 to the Grand Trunk Railway, and maintain that road in its present condition; I having the readjustment of the freight rates, I may explain, that in the reconstruction of the freight rates for those provinces I do not think it is necessary to materially change the rates in the provinces, although I have no figures in regard to this. I may say that there are figures that I asked for and which I have not got. The difference between that proposition and the one under which we have been working during the last twenty-one years means simply this: During the last twenty-one years we have lost somewhere about $6,500,000 in the operation of that road. Upon these figures, calculating interest, we would gain about $14,000,000; to run on to the next ten years under a $6,000,000 loss it would make a difference between the operation of that road under the old system and the proposition I have just made to this House, which, Sir, I am prepared to stand by and produce sufficient financial evidence of the fact, of $24,000,000. I believe I have sufficiently presented the reasons why I am warranted in making the proposition that I have just made. Permit me to say here that, in my judgment, it is the best evidence of the value of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal, and I shall be only too pleased if the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals will send his card around to me and give me an opportunity to execute a contract and make permanent arrangements for the acquisition of that railway at the earliest possible date. The hon. gentleman knows, as well as I am speaking here, that I am not talking through my hat. There is no part of the proposition that I have just made that I am not prepared to fulfil, and satisfactorily fulfil, under any reasonable conditions that the Government may impose in connection with this road. I know it is important, and I believe that the difference between a political and a business management is what I have said, that there is a reasonable profit over and above the figures I have just offered to the Government for the acquisition of the Intercolonial Railway. Under these circumstances, I believe that the responsibility that the Government assume for the future in operating that road must certainly be their responsibility. The hon. gentleman might think that he cannot afford to accept the proposition so made in regard to that road without offering it to tender. If he is of that impression he has an opportunity now of knowing that if it is put up for tender, there will be reasonable bids made for the acquisition, under favourable terms, to the people of the lower provinces, of that road. I have no doubt about it. I have no doubt that there would be more than one or two or three tenders for the acquisition of that road for a term of years if the Government thought fit to do so, and under conditions which, I am sure, would not prove onerous to the people of the lower provinces, on conditions that I believe would work out the development of our maritime ports far better than though it were under Government control. The city of St. John owes much to the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because the Canadian Pacific Railway is managed upon business principles, and, if the Intercolonial Railway is ever to prove that benefit to the seaports of the lower provinces that we all wish, it will be when it is operated on the best possible business management that can be applied. I well understand that there is a feeling in the lower provinces that this road was built as a sort of substitution for the canal system in western Canada, and that the people of the lower provinces have a special right in the way of freight rates. I believe that these special conditions could be maintained to a legitimate extent, even under a business management of that road, by which the produce of the great west would be brought to our Canadian seaports. There is no reason why the people of the lower provinces should not share in any reasonable cost that is necessary to bring about the development of their own trade. Frightened, as some people may be, at the thought of the Intercolonial Railway passing under a business management, yet, I believe that a fair contract might be entered into with business men who might propose to acquire that road, and the road placed beyond the possibility of further increasing the debt of the country, while, at the same time, developing to the fullest extent the sections through which it passes. Such a contract, when properly drawn up and explained to the people, would do away with all fear that they would be deprived of any of the special benefits they believe they are entitled to, as citizens of the provinces down by the sea.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As the House is very well aware, this question, both on the resolutions with regard to the Drummond County Railway and with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway arrangement—which I am very glad the Minister of Railways consented should precede the introduction of any Bill—has been very exhaustively debated, and I do not rise for the purpose of continuing the debate. I wish, however, to say, that, as the second reading involves the principle of the Bill, this would be a proper time to take the vote; but I have had some communication with the right hon. leader of the House on the subject, and we have arrived at the conclusion that, as a large number of members who would like to vote, are absent, we could take the second reading of the Bill on division, and vote on the third reading.

Mr. HAGGART. Before the second reading of the Bill, I would like to draw the attention of the Minister (Mr. Blair) to clause 4, which says:

There may be paid for the said railway and undertaking and other property as aforesaid, out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, the sum of $1,600,000, less any sum paid the company as authorized by chapter 4 of the statutes of 1897, to be granted to the said company as a subsidy for 42½ miles of its railway from Moose Park to the Chaudière River.

I suppose the Bill follows very closely the resolutions, but there is no provision for the reduction of the $1,600,000 by the $103,000 which the Government has expended in the betterment of the road, and which I understood was to be deducted.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That would not be necessary. My hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) will understand that is a matter of contract between the Drummond County Railway and the Government, and, as a matter of contract, of course the Drummond County Railway Company would be liable for it. We do not require to incorporate in this Bill any provision in respect to that in order to enable us to retain any amount of money that may be due in respect to that $100,000.

Mr. HAGGART. The Bill authorizes the entering into an entirely new contract, and does away with the leases that are at present in existence.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It does not do away with the leases. The matter, of course, is in that form that it authorizes the Government to make a purchase on this basis. I explained to the committee that there is no necessity for putting any such clause in the Bill.

Motion for second reading agreed to on division.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS moved that the House do resolve itself in committee on Bill (No. 133) to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself in committee.

On section 1,

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the Minister, whether any arrangement has yet been come to as to the purchase of the rolling stock, and if so, what amount has been paid, or is to be paid?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No arrangement of that nature has been come to at all with the Drummond County. We have purchased a snow-plough and one or other parts of their plant which we could with advantage buy, and we are going to ask for an appropriation in our supplementary Estimates for the payment of this purchase. Beyond that, we have no arrangement. Up to the present moment, we have no arrangement with them to make any larger purchase.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the Minister think that the railway company will forego that clause in the agreement which bound the Government to purchase their rolling stock? Of course, they are out of business now, and the rolling stock is no good to them, except it might be used for a curiosity. They will certainly hold to that part of their contract. Does my hon. friend mean to say, that the road has been, as I understand it, operated for thirteen or fourteen months, and that there has been no arrangement yet come to with reference to the rolling stock, and no negotiations looking to that end?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Certainly not.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) a list of the rolling stock that is now left by that company upon the road.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not aware that there has been any inventory made. If there has, it is not in the possession of the department or has not been brought to my knowledge. There were a number of small articles, like tools, of which a very extended inventory was made; but, beyond that, there has been none that I am aware of, and we have not been called upon by the Drummond County to buy their stock. I think it is not understood that we are under any obligations to do so. I think they regard it as a matter in our discretion, and entirely optional with us. That is the view I myself have taken of it, and nothing has occurred to shake my confidence in the correctness of that view.

Mr. FOSTER. I find that the 8th clause of the resolutions which were passed by the House on the 11th June, 1897, and which contained the agreement, is as follows:—

Her Majesty will purchase the rolling stock and railway supplies of the company at a valuation to be agreed upon between the company and the Minister.

That was a part of the agreement. I judge, then, from what the hon. gentleman says, that the company does not think it has the power or does not propose to press that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They have not communicated with me as to their view on that point, and I have not been pressed to declare my mind upon it. That is the situation.

Mr. FOSTER. And I think we had an estimate of the Minister, when we adopted the resolutions, of the value of that rolling-stock, amounting to $45,000 or $50,000. The hon. gentleman has not used any of that rolling-stock in the operation of the road?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. None whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that my hon. friend will find that that agreement having been passed by this House, the company will ask us to stand by it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have no doubt they will if they get much more encouragement to do so. They have not pressed it upon my mind down to the present moment; that is all I can say.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope my hon. friend does not think that a member of the Opposition, in discharging his duty by calling the attention of the Minister of Railways to a clause of a contract which he has made, is giving any encouragement or incitement to the company to make claims on the Government.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I do not think anything has occurred which would justify me in regarding it in that sense; but we know that people get encouragement even when statements are not made with that view. People follow these debates, particularly if they are interested in them, and views are sometimes put forward which suggest a course of action which might not otherwise be taken.

Mr. FOSTER. We cannot help that. We have this measure fathered by the Government, brought down by them in the most open manner, and fully discussed, and it is quite too late in the day to say, because a member of the Opposition calls the attention of the Government to a provision of the agreement, that he is giving information which otherwise might not be information to a company as lynx-eyed as the Drummond County Company, or at least one member of it Mr. Greenshields, to wit. What I did want to know was whether that old rolling-stock had been paid for, and if so at what valuation. The clause is imperative; it says, "Her Majesty shall."

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If later the conclusion arrived at is that we are under compulsion to take the rolling-stock at a proper valuation, we would have to ask Parliament for authority to pay the money before any step would be taken which would be irrevocable on our part.

Mr. FOSTER. But there is just one caution which a man in the Opposition always has to put forward in these perilous times, because the Government seem to have adopted the habit of making their contracts and binding the country to pay before they ask the House anything about it. I notice by the newspapers that the Government are to-day building a very expensive telegraph line to Dawson City. I do not recollect that they took any appropriation or got any power from this House to build that telegraph line. I look upon it only as a rumour, of course, because I have no right to think that the Government would undertake such a work without being authorized by the House.

On section 3,

Mr. FOSTER. It is only by implication that one can come to a conclusion as to where that $6,000 has gone to, and I would like to have it cleared up before we go any further. The hon. gentleman will remember that the resolutions passed in 1897 provided for giving the company $70,000 a year. Of that $64,000 a year was to buy the road, which was to come into the possession of the Government at the end of ninety-nine years, and $6,000 a year was to go as a rental which the company had to pay to the Grand Trunk Company for the Chaudière section. At the present time, the Minister is only taking power to pay the Drummond County Company an even sum of money. This thing has had its gradations. In the first place, the company were to be paid on a valuation of $1,600,000, but the $1,600,000 was not to be paid, except in the form of $64,000 a year for ninety-nine years. Then the hon. gentleman proposed that that should be made optional, so that the Government might pay the $1,600,000 or do the other thing; but I am happy to find, when the Bill comes down at the final stage, that even the option has been foregone, and the Minister binds himself to pay absolutely the $1,600,000 in lieu of the $64,000 a year, for the Drummond County property. But, as I understand, the company were under obligation to pay $6,000 a year to the Grand Trunk Company for the Chaudière section. What has become of that? Is this one of the betterments which has been got from the Grand Trunk? If so, we would like to know it, because we want to give the hon. gentleman all the credit we can, in order that we may by-and-by call it to the mind of such ardent admirers as the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who, in 1897, as now, believed that the Minister of Railways had made the very best bargain that any man had ever made for the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I said nothing of it in 1897.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, my hon. friend has experienced a change of heart since 1897?

Mr. McMULLEN. Not at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, because if he said nothing in 1897, and he is not given to be economical of adulations of the Ministers—he must have experienced a change of heart since then. Are there prospects in view? Is the hon. gentleman's—what we used to think—somewhat hard nature softening under the influence of time and other things? But last night was the most perfect, the most absolutely generous, the most self-denying tribute I ever heard a member give to a Minister whom he supported in this House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am willing to take all the credit the hon. gentleman is supposed to bestow.

Mr. FOSTER. But I want to know what has become of the $6,000, and then I will give him credit.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The arrangement we finally made with the Grand Trunk Railway permitting of our getting all the privileges which belonged to the Chaudière, as well as the Montreal connection. Any increase of the rental—

Mr. FOSTER. It is a decrease.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Under the other arrangement, if a lease had been made with the Drummond County road, in place of a purchase, the Grand Trunk Railway would have enjoyed that advantage; but when we succeeded having an arrangement with the Drummond County road for the purchase out and out, the Grand Trunk Railway were placed in a position in which they could insist on that, but which we finally prevailed on them not to press.

Mr. FOSTER. Was that $6,000 given up by the Grand Trunk Railway to the Drummond County road or to the Minister?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Given to us.

On section 4,

Mr. FOSTER. Have the subsidies all been paid?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. Minister by him the report of the road as finished, which authorized its taking over. I suppose he got a report from his engineer.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, but I have not got it just at hand. I will bring it down before the third reading. There were many reports, and the company had a good deal of trouble satisfying our engineers.

Mr. FOSTER. Was the engineer so hard to be satisfied, the same gentleman you sent down, on a six hours' trip, to examine the road, and upon whose report was founded your first entry into the bargain?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If my hon. friend will not tie me down too closely to a question of hours, I will answer his inquiry. One of the gentlemen sent down was the engineer who made the trip, which was characterized as rather expeditious—Mr. McLeod.

The committee rose and reported progress.

THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With the consent of the House, I would like to ask permission to read a telegram to the Montreal "Star," from London, on an important question, which will, I think, be of interest to the House:

London, 2nd June, 1899.

The "Times" and other New York and Washington telegrams continue to abuse Canada for daring to reject the agreement between Lord Salisbury and Mr. Choate regarding the Alaskan boundary, after the rising of the Joint High Commission in February. What the British public would much like to know is, whether Canada was fully consulted in the negotiations of this agreement. If not, Canada will receive much sympathy here. As the "Outlook" says to-day: "The British public feel that the day has gone by when any self-governing British colony can be dragged into a settlement in which it has no say. Canada is no serf, is not even a child; she is a junior partner, and has a junior partner's rights, the last word being always with the senior partner."

I am not quite sure of that.

Mr. Smalley and his friends would ignore this if they could, but it remains a central fact in the administration of "the British Empire." A full official Canadian statement is greatly needed to meet the allegations with which the Washington telegrams are prejudicing opinion against Canada.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am happy to say, and indeed I will surprise nobody in this House by stating, that the British authorities, the Foreign Office, through the Colonial Office, has kept us fully informed of the negotiations between the Foreign Office and the American Ambassador at the Court of St. James. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to be in a position to place before the House and the Canadian public the whole of the negotiations and the views we have expressed upon the questions referred to us. But as my hon. friend knows, I am not in a position to state anything at this moment. I noticed particularly the ending words of the quotation from the "Star," which has just been read by my hon. friend, that a full official statement coming from the Canadian side on this question would be much appreciated in England. I can fully reciprocate that sentiment, and wish we were in a position to make such a statement, and I believe if we were, a good deal of the anxiety which prevails in some quarters would be relieved and a good deal of the clouds which apparently surround this question and the sentiment more or less unfriendly which has been elicited in some quarters would also be removed. But so long as the negotiations continue, it is quite certain I will not be in a position to give out anything to the public.

I may say, however, that as the question of the Yukon boundary has been removed by the conference itself from the questions with which it had to deal and referred to the respective Governments, British and American, and as, therefore, so far as the commission is concerned, that matter is no longer pending before the commission, I am not without hope, before the session is over, that the last protocol on the conference may be laid on the Table.

Of course I need not remind the House that as to all the other questions which are pending before the conference at this moment, it would not be possible to give any publicity to what took place. But this one particular question is no longer among the subjects to be treated by the conference. The negotiations on this question are closed, that is, so far as the conference is concerned. I may say, for my part, I see no objection—on the contrary, I see a good deal to be said in favour, of having the true position placed before the public as it was when we adjourned the conference.

I. C. R.—EXTENSION TO MONTREAL.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair) moved that the resolution to confirm an agreement between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada and Her Majesty for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway into the city of Montreal, be read the second time and concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 138) to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER. When shall this Bill be read the second time?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Bill is not distributed.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to make one remark. I thought it would, perhaps, suit the convenience of hon. members and be in accord with the understanding between hon. gentlemen opposite and the Prime Minister if the House were to resolve itself into committee on this Bill at once—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is the Bill distributed?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was going to speak of that. I have a message from the Printing Bureau, that inside of 15 minutes the Bill will be here for distribution.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think we shall have to await the distribution of the Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Very well; it can be taken up after that. I suppose there is no objection to the second reading on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. Reference to the Committee of the Whole can be made later on in the afternoon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes. Of course, this is subject to the same statement that we have already made in regard to the second reading of the Drummond County Bill. We are departing a little from the usual course, which is to have the division on the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. SPEAKER. When shall the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill? At the present sitting of the House?

SUPPLY—INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. FOSTER. Before we go into Supply, I want to give my hon. friends opposite fair notice that they have not been as diligent as they should have been in bringing down returns that have been ordered by the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) has brought down a great many of late.

Mr. FOSTER. I have been very lenient. Others have been pressing the derelictions of the Government so strongly that, out of pity,

Mr. BLAIR.

I have held back thus far. But I find that this does not bring my returns. Therefore, I am going to make a short statement of what is due. Up to the present date, I have asked for and have been accorded by the House, demands for 23 returns. Of these 23, only two, and these very unimportant ones, have been brought down. That leaves 21 still due, and nearly all of them important returns, without which it is impossible for me, personally, to take up the estimates of the various departments of Government and discuss them in relation to the information that I want. I do not know that it is necessary for me to take up the time of the House now in going over all these returns I have asked for. It is the business of the Ministers and their officers, of course, to keep themselves informed regarding the returns asked for and to supply those returns. It is as well for me to state the number and to state that they are due and that payment is expected, and that at an early date, as it would be to take up an hour in going over the various returns I want.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think we have pretty well succeeded in satisfying my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper).

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Oh, no.

The PRIME MINISTER. I despair, then, of doing so. I thought we were deserving of some credit. Well, we will try to satisfy my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) and see if he is less exacting.

Mr. FOSTER. No, I am going to have my pound of flesh.

SUPPLY—INVESTIGATION INTO THE CONDUCT OF JUDGES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). I wish to draw the attention of the House to a very important subject which concerns the judiciary of this country and the mode of charges that may be made against one occupying that important position. I have given to the Solicitor General a copy of the resolution which I propose to ask the House to consider to-day. In the consideration of it, it will be necessary for me to refer at some length to the papers that have been brought down in answer to an Address of the House of Commons, dated 18th April, 1898, for copies of all petitions, correspondence, &c., relating to the inquiry into the conduct of Judge Spinks, judge of the county of Yale, by Mr. Justice McColl, of the Supreme Court of British Columbia. I approach this subject with all the greater confidence because I have not the pleasure of knowing this judge and have had no communication with him at any time. The subject of the return was a subject of general interest, and, as I have filled the position of Minister of Justice of this country, I profess to know something of the procedure that has been heretofore adopted in connection with such a delicate question as misconduct on the part of the judiciary. Following the practice that has prevailed in Great Britain, in all the provinces of which Canada is composed, and, since 1867, in the Dominion, the greatest possible care has been taken to prevent any improper attack or any general or vague attack upon the judiciary. The position of the Superior Court judges, of course, is of such a character, that that position can only be attacked by an Address from both Houses of Parliament after the most solemn procedure known to Parliament has been followed—and in regard to that I shall have a word or two to say later on. Coming to the position of the judges of the County Court, all the reasons for care and caution in permitting their character to be attacked or called in question existed, but the Dominion Parliament has seen fit to adopt a certain procedure which does not obtain in the case of judges of the Supreme or Superior Courts. Under this procedure, for cause, His Excellency the Governor General may be advised to issue a commission of inquiry, and after the constitution of that commission, the judge is called upon to answer such charges as should be investigated and considered.

Now, in these cases regard has heretofore very properly been had to the solemn and careful steps that are taken in the case of an impeachment of a Superior Court judge: that is to say, the Government is bound, before even calling on a judge to answer charges that have been presented to the proper department against his conduct, to see that these charges are themselves so specific and so exact that they are not only ready for issue to be taken upon them, but that they are of such a character that, if established in the form in which they are presented, they would constitute a case for the removal of the judge from his position. That is following, as I say, the procedure in a case of impeachment where a great many preliminary forms having regard to the exalted position and the many important considerations attaching to it, tabling the articles practically, having them carefully considered, having them sent to the party affected, before any other stage in the procedure is taken. So, following on after these specific charges have been formulated and carried up to the standard which I have mentioned, the very proper procedure and practice has been to communicate those to the judge, and even in that case should the charge be serious enough and come under the rules that I have mentioned, still it does not follow that a commission should issue: in that case it is still necessary to ascertain from the judge what explanation he may have to give. I have a case in mind where the charges were made and the request for an investigation and inquiry were endorsed by the bar society of a province, and after those charges had been communicated to the judge the answer of the judge was deemed to be of such a character that it was not considered proper or fit in the interests of justice to pursue the inquiry further, and a commission was refused. So I say the procedure, even after the charges have been properly formulated and submitted, is to give the judge an opportunity to make to the Minister of Justice such explanation as he may have to offer in connection with the case. Then if that explanation is not satisfactory, if it is not such an explanation as is satisfactory, having regard to the position which is attacked, and to the practice of Parliament, and to the practice of the executive, the Governor General is advised to issue his commission. The next point is that the greatest possible expedition should be used. It should not be tolerated or permitted under any circumstances that a judge should be in a position to exercise his great powers and his important duties for any length of time, if the charges are such as, after proof, would necessitate his removal from the bench. So that in taking that step it is necessary, and it is the rule, that the greatest possible expedition should be shown. Then it has not been the practice for the Government to appear as the prosecutor of charges against the judge. It is not the duty of a Government to appear in the proceedings as the prosecutor, and to proceed in fastening these charges, made upon the responsibility of a relator, on the shoulders of a judge. Now, I will support the position which I have outlined in regard to the delicacy of these inquiries, because they are extraordinary cases, there are no other officers in the service of this country who hold anything like this position, or are entitled to anything like this kind of protection that I have mentioned. There are no people in England, for instance, paid by the Crown who hold such a position in that country. They form a special class in this regard, and for reasons which are obvious, at any rate, to the members of the profession in this House. In regard to this practice, and in regard to the care and caution observed in calling into question the character of any of the judiciary, I would refer to Todd, Government in England, second edition, page 870, Vol. 2, concerning an inquiry into the character of Lord Abinger:

The Attorney General (Sir S. Pollock) did not deny the proper vocation of the House of Commons for such inquiries in general, but considered the present complaint to be wholly unsubstantiated. It is in fact an admitted principle that no Government should support a motion for an inquiry into the conduct of a judge, unless they have first made an investigation, and are prepared to say that they think it a fit case to be followed up by an Address for his dismissal.

That refers, as the debate shows, to a case where the Attorney General in Parliament assume responsibility in regard to articles that have been tabled. He should not for a moment pass an opinion on those articles nor their contents, no matter how grave, until he has by inquiry satisfied himself, before the next stage is reached, that they should be followed up. And again, referring to that same debate, the text says :

Lord John Russell objected that Lord Abinger had spoken both as a politician and as a lawyer, when he should have spoken only as a judge. Nevertheless, he regarded the independence of the judges to be so sacred that nothing but the most imperious necessity—

I would call attention to this because this is a standard debate referred to by Todd, as happily there are very few cases for an illustration of this kind in England, and I may say, speaking relatively, there are even fewer cases to be found in Canada.

Nevertheless, he regarded the independence of the judges so sacred that nothing but the most imperious necessity should induce the House to adopt a course that might tend to weaken their standing or endanger their authority.

Then Sir James Graham is quoted by Todd as having declared :

That except in Baron Smith's case, wherein the House retracted its steps, there had been no instance of the House of Commons instituting an inquiry with a view to discover evidence, but that it had been the invariable practice for distinct charges and specific allegations to be made, with a proffer of evidence in support of the same, before the House was called upon to commence proceedings of this description.

And Mr. Duncombe's motion was voted down, as Todd says, by a large majority. Then, one further remark only in summing up what Todd says in this connection. After having referred to the opinion of leading men at the bar, and leading men in the Parliament in England, he says :

Bearing in mind the general responsibility of Ministers of the Crown for the due administration of justice throughout the Kingdom, and the obligation which they owe to the dispensers of justice to preserve them from injurious attack or calumnious accusations, it is necessary that, before consenting to any motion for a parliamentary inquiry into the conduct of a judge—or even for the reception of a petition complaining of the conduct of a judge, and not asking for his removal in accordance with the statute—or not alleging reasonable grounds for such a proceeding—Ministers should themselves have investigated the matter of complaint, and be prepared either to oppose or facilitate the interference of Parliament on the particular occasion.

It does not require any lengthy argument to show that the analogy is perfect and ought to be observed in the case of a judge of the county court. The reasons, outside of the expeditious manner of proceeding that apply in the case of a judge of the county court in some provinces having extraordinary and very wide jurisdiction indeed, apply to cases of other judges, the simple difference being that one is a procedure in Parliament, while the other is a procedure outside of Parliament, and the only time in which a case of the removal of a county court judge need come before Parliament is on some such motion as this when the motion comes up for consideration, having regard to the responsibility of the Crown or to that of the advisers of the Crown. Now, in this case I shall refer to the important features, and which exclude, of course, the evidence; the evidence is not material, so far as the view I am presenting to the House is concerned. The evidence was evidence that came at the last stage. What I am calling in question is the conduct of His Excellency's advisers in leading up to the stage where the evidence was taken, because, I say, the practice adopted in the case of Judge Spinks was a practice that was most injudicious to follow, a practice that does not obtain in connection with the Supreme Court judges, and a practice that should not have obtained, and has not obtained, in the cases of county court judges. To come immediately to this return, which is doubtless full and complete, we find that the machinery under the statute was started by letters from individuals who wrote as politicians. The first letter is avowedly a letter from a political supporter of the Administration; stress is laid upon that in the letter, and these letters cover the vaguest kinds of charges. The first letter is a letter from Grand Forks, dated June 1st, 1897, marked "personal," and addressed to the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat, Minister of Justice, Ottawa, Ont. :

(Personal.)

Grand Forks, June 1, 1897.

The Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat,
Minister of Justice, Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I have arrived up here as Deputy Supreme Chief Ranger for the Independent Order of Foresters from Victoria, where, as you know, my home is. There is a matter that as a Liberal and a friend, I deem it my duty to acquaint you of, viz., the conduct of W. W. Spinks, Judge of Yale district. I am at a loss to use words to convey my impressions regarding his unseemly conduct, but it is simply appalling. If ever an investigation was necessary to inquire into the conduct of any man, it is necessary in this case, for the good name of your department and for the glaring atrocities and the extreme favouritism shown by this official, it is a highly necessary step in the interest of justice and good government to have a commission appointed to investigate at once.

Believe me, Honourable Sir,
Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) JAMES H. FALCONER.

Address :
24 Rithet St., Victoria, B.C.

It is clear that my position is sound as to what are the preliminary facts that would justify the hon. Minister of Justice in paying attention to charges against a county court judge. There is not a line, or syllable, in that letter that would have warranted any action being taken beyond the acknowledgment of the receipt of that letter. The next letter is dated the 3rd of June, 1897 :

Greenwood, B.C., June 3, 1897.

The Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat,
Minister of Justice, Ottawa.

Sir,—Re the administration of justice by the County Court Judge of Yale, I have heard many complaints.

In my opinion, no judge should be allowed to be the owner or part-owner of a mineral claim, and I think it would be a good thing if a commission were appointed to inquire into the state of affairs in this district.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) JAMES KERR, J.P.

There is no charge of any kind whatsoever, nor is there a pretended charge in that letter; there is merely a statement made by this justice of the peace that he heard many complaints respecting the administration of justice by that county court judge of Yale. Complaints, I fancy, are just as numerous as there are judges of any court, on the part of the unfortunate or the unlucky suitors before the judge. He generally complains of the judgment when it is against him, but the expression of the opinion that no judge should be allowed to be interested in a mining claim is far from the statement even that this judge was interested in a mining claim, and even if this statement were made there would be very little to form a ground for inquiry. Now, the longest letter, and perhaps the strongest letter, the others meaning nothing, is a letter from Mr. Peter T. McCallum, justice of the peace, which is dated the 3rd of June, 1897. Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to these letters, for these are the only foundation for the inquiry that was put on foot, long-continued and kept hanging over the head of a judge of one of the courts of this country while he was discharging his judicial functions :

Grand Forks, B.C., June 3, 1897.

The Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat,
Minister of Justice, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I have been requested by several residents of this district to report to you direct certain alleged abuses in connection with the administration of justice by His Honour Judge Spinks, County Court Judge of Yale district in this province.

I ask the attention of the House, for a moment, to say that not one of these gentlemen ventures to state a charge on his own authority or ventures to specify or formulate a charge within the rules, that I have referred to, governing cases of charges and inquiries into the conduct and character of judges :

It is a well-known fact that Judge Spinks, for the past two or three years, has not conducted himself as a gentleman, holding the high office he does, should. Complaints have been made for that period, and are being made, in reference to favouritism and partiality exhibited by Judge Spinks from the bench, both in civil and criminal cases, where certain rings and cliques are interested.

I think no member of the bar, nor the Solicitor General, will argue that that paragraph contains anything that should be brought to the notice of a judge, if such a communication were sent respecting every judge of the county court or any other judge, because the thing is drawn with great care to avoid the statement of anything more than that complaints of a general character are being made. This letter shows that although it bears the signature of Peter T. McCallum, he was not in the very best position to be the critic of a gentleman holding the position of the judge of the county court.

It is a well-recognized fact, Sir, that Judge Spinks, during the period above mentioned, has rarely, if ever, appeared at the different places appointed throughout the district for the holding of county courts on time, but is always from two to three days late, allowing suitors, witnesses and persons in custody on trial for criminal offences to wait his pleasure, thereby causing them great loss of time travelling to and from the place of trial, and entailing great unnecessary expense.

Mr. MORRISON. Does the hon. gentleman characterize that as not being a serious charge against a judge who is sworn to do his duty ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As I will have some remarks to make concerning the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Morrison) interference in this case, I would prefer he would not interfere with my speech until I have finished.

Mr. MORRISON. I have a perfect right to do so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No ; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) is ignorant of the rules of the House.

Mr. MORRISON. I have the right subject to the Speaker's ruling.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) is absolutely ignorant of the rules of the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) has not the right to interrupt, except with the consent of the gentleman who has the floor.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) who did interrupt has indicated clearly that he has not done me the courtesy of listening to my introductory observations. They may be well founded or they be entirely erroneous ; but if he followed me at all, he would have understood quickly that the position I am taking is, that the Department of Justice should never have treated that paragraph with sufficient seriousness, to do more than acknowledge its receipt, for it does not come within any of the rules I have mentioned as laid down by the books and practice in such cases. I may be wrong, but it is so obvious that I am surprised the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) should ask a question about it. i was about to observe when I was interrupted, that this paragraph fails to state one single day on which the judge was late, or even the year when he came late to court. It fails to give any fact which might not be susceptible of reasonable explanation, in a part of the country where travelling is at times difficult, and in a province where it is historically true that the greatest difficulty has existed in keeping any fixed appointment for the trial of cases. But, avoiding all particulars, this man makes a general charge that the judge :

Had rarely, if ever, appeared at the different places appointed throughout the district for the holding of county courts on time, but is always from two to three days late.

Suppose that is all true, is there any one in this House who would suggest that a judge should be removed simply on a general fact established that he was late. The statement suggests that there must have been a reason for that, and no action should have been taken until the judge had an opportunity of giving the reason; although I argue, that if any regard is paid to the practice heretofore so properly obtaining, no inquiry would have been made on so vague a charge.

It has repeatedly happened that prisoners awaiting trial have been held over two or three days over the time appointed for their trial and then acquitted.

Not the name of a case given about which the Attorney General could have been communicated with. This was in connection with the business conducted by the Attorney General of the province, and the very fact that no case was named by the man—whose character was bad as the commissioner's report will show—where the matter was susceptible of inquiry through a letter to the Attorney General of the province, even the absence of any complaint by the Attorney General should have prevented the department paying any regard to this whatever. The only possible course they would be justified in would be to have written to the Attorney General of British Columbia to know whether in connection with the administration of criminal justice, the county court judge of this district had misbehaved. Here is the first case mentioned :

A marked case of this was the Queen vs. Davis, tried here at the second last sittings of the county court, and this, sir, is not the exception, it is a rule with Judge Spinks.

Here we have the statement that he was late in one case, and the general statement that this is the rule. He says :

It is also charged against Judge Spinks—

Charged against Judge Spinks by persons unknown, for no names are mentioned :

—that he violates his oath of office in allowing influence to be used upon him and acquitting guilty men. Two marked cases of this nature have occurred in this district within the past twelve months.

I again stop to say that there is not a line in that which comes within the regulation in connection with these cases—and the rule is a sound one—that would have justified the department paying any attention to such a general observation, especially in view of the fact that there is a responsible Attorney General who could at once give an explanation, and deny or corroborate the statement if the department here was at all exercised about it. The very fact that no Attorney General ever made a complaint, was an indication that there was no good ground for making this charge.

It is also an admitted fact—

It is not stated by whom.

—that Judge Spinks was one of the members of a clique in Grand Forks, who are owners of the town site, and members of this clique have been known to boast that no action could succeed against them while Judge Spinks sat on the bench.

The idlest piece of gossip imaginable, retailed by this justice of the peace, and, to the disgrace of the Department of Justice, given consideration by it.

From my own knowledge, sir, I may say that on one occasion, I say, as one of the Board of License Commissioners for the district when an application came before us by one of the members of the ring above mentioned came before the board for a retail license,—

You will observe the illiteracy and bad English of this correspondent who is discussing a delicate question of law on the administration of the license laws, as between this board which boasts of him as a member, and the judge of the county court.

—the applicant was clearly not entitled to a license,—

That is in the opinion of the justice of the peace.

—and the board refused the application; an appeal was taken to Judge Spinks, and as the applicant—

The appellant, I suppose, or the applicant for the license—

—belonged to this particular ring, of which Judge Spinks is an admitted member, he granted a license in the face of the licensing board's refusal.

I would not stop to argue for a moment that there was a particle of that statement that constituted anything else than insolvency.

In conclusion, sir, let me say that the above are only a few of the minor charges brought against Judge Spinks. There is general dissatisfaction among the people throughout the whole district, and complaints have appeared through the press on many occasions without avail, till at last an innocent and long-suffering people have come to accept it as a condition of things which is remedyless and must be borne without complaint. Let me say, sir, that if ever a public office in British Columbia required to be aired, if there was ever a case which required a Royal Commission to issue to examine into these abuses, which are so flagrant and so numerous that it would be impossible for me to enumerate them in detail.

The rest of the sentence is not concluded.

Again, let me say that I will urge upon you the great necessity of issuing a commission immediately to inquire into these abuses, as your Honour, with your long experience in the administration of justice must well know, that abuses like these are dangerous to the well-being of society and are ruinous to the best interests of the public at large.

* * * * *

And here what was, no doubt, the most interesting part of this effusion is left out. Asterisks follow in a letter which must be considered as the basis for the proceedings that were taken, and the concluding paragraph is left out. I could supply the omission, I think, for there seems to be no purpose for this whole return, other than to squeeze Mr. Justice Spinks out, and put in a nominee of the two gentlemen whose names are mentioned, and who appear as showing the greatest possible desire to employ a lawyer in the province of British Columbia in connection with this matter, and get rid of Mr. Justice Spinks. Whether this procedure was properly initiated or not—and I think it was not, feeling that there was no ground whatever for any action to be taken—it is a great pity that these gentlemen were not able to bring sufficient influence to bear on the powers that existed at the time the commission was issued, so that the inquiry would have been carried on promptly, and this man cleared promptly, as he was finally, of the charges which were made against him, and which were circulated through the press in the very community where he was sitting as one of the judges of the county court.

Mr. MAXWELL. What were the names of those two gentlemen?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will come to the names later on. I think the House will be surprised to learn that, instead of any of these letters being sent to the county court judge for him to give such answer as might occur to him, supposing my first point to have been badly taken, and that the charges were sufficiently serious and specific to cause attention to be drawn to them on the part of the judge, the House will be surprised to learn that these charges were never submitted to Mr. Justice Spinks, and that a commission had issued for months before the commissioner himself could get the charges into which the Government had directed the inquiry. I think the House will be surprised to learn that the first communication sent to Judge Spinks was a telegram, the contents of which were most extraordinary. This is the telegram, sent on the 24th of June, the first document which issued from the Department of Justice after the receipt of these three letters:

His Honour Judge Spinks,
Yale, B.C.

Serious charges preferred against you, in effect that you have been guilty of favouritism and partiality, and have allowed yourself to be unduly influenced in the administration of justice. That you are usually late in keeping judicial appointments, thereby causing delay and expense to suitors and prolonging the custody of persons committed upon criminal charges. The Minister considers these charges so grave as to call for an immediate commission of inquiry. Do you desire to make any reply before commission issues?

(Sgd.) E. L. NEWCOMBE.

A more brutal message was never sent to a judge in Canada, or in any province of Canada. Before any commission issued, there was a necessary and proper etiquette that should have been observed. The idea that over the wires of this country there should go from the Minister of Justice, no matter whether he was Sir Oliver Mowat or any other gentleman who had attained a high and distinguished position in the profession to which he belonged, such a message, especially in the absence of the usual and ordinary etiquette of submitting the charges to the judge through the mail and asking his explanation before coming to the conclusion that these charges were of such a character that they should be inquired into. But, with these vague and general statements, and these gossipy letters, couched in the language which I have read, that telegram was sent. To that, of course, there could only be one answer. It was not for the judge, attacked in that manner and spirit, to stand on form or to wait a moment. That telegram reached him at Vernon on the 26th of June, and was answered by him as follows:

Vernon, B.C., June 26, 1897.

To E. L. Newcombe,
Deputy Minister of Justice,
Ottawa.

Telegram just received. The more full and speedy inquiry the better. Would suggest inquiry be made at place where complaint made.

(Sgd.) WARD SPINKS.

That was a reasonable position for Judge Spinks to take. He put aside and ignored the question which I have raised. He was attacked by the Minister of Justice with a club, saying that most serious complaints had been made against him. His answer was, that the sooner the inquiry was made, the better; and you will observe that he asks for a speedy inquiry particularly. He was not suspended; he was not asked to abstain from his judicial duties; and, therefore, for the public interest, as well as for his own, he demanded that there should be no delay. Now, we will see what happened. That was on the 26th of June. He follows that with a letter, in which he acknowledges the receipt of the telegram of the same date, and asks, in addition, that a stenographer be employed to report the whole proceedings. The department conducts this matter for a time with great celerity. The first telegram, which was of such an extraordinary character, had failed in its purpose, if its purpose was to frighten the judge off the bench. Nevertheless, the communications are quickly carried on for a time, to drop, as you will see, and to remain without action for a very long time later on. On the 29th of June, a telegram is sent to Mr. Justice McColl, of New Westminster, B.C., as follows:—

Department of Justice,
Ottawa, June 29, 1897.

The Hon. Mr. Justice McColl,
New Westminster, B.C.

Commission to be issued to investigate charges against Judge Spinks under chap. 138, sec. 2. Will you act as commissioner? Wire answer.

(Sgd.) E. L. NEWCOMBE.

Publish it all over the place, that the Minister of Justice had told Mr. Justice Spinks that serious and terrible charges had been preferred against him; telegraph it to New Westminster, and ask him if he will act as commissioner. All this is in June; and yet for months this judge was permitted to go on the bench and perform his ordinary duties. He was not granted the request which he made so promptly for a speedy and full investigation, with a stenographer to take down everything that was said for and against him. Judge McColl, on the 30th of June, telegraphs back to the Department of Justice that he will act as commissioner. Then, a rush is made to His Excellency; a report to Council is drawn up by the Minister of Justice on the 2nd of July, asking for the appointment of Judge McColl as a commissioner "to inquire into and report upon the complaints that have been made respecting the administration of justice by W. W. Spinks." The dates are all important. The 2nd July that report is made; and, though the Order in Council is not under my hand in this return, no doubt it was very pretty quickly issued, because we have the following letter of the 5th July from the Department of Justice to Judge Spinks, acknowledging the receipt of his communication of the 26th June, which I have already read. Then, on the 6th July, Mr. Wilson, who was counsel for the judge in this matter, writes a letter to Mr. Newcombe, this portion of which I think is important:

Mr. Spinks further consulted with me as to the propriety of holding court pending the inquiry, and I advised him that although there might be some temporary unpleasantness in continuing to discharge his duties, after charges of this character had been made and before their final determination, it was better to submit to the unpleasantness, as delay in holding the court might seriously interfere with the administration of justice and put the public to very great inconvenience.

Those things are brought to the attention of the Department of Justice, not merely by a telegram of the 5th June to the judge, but formally by Judge Spinks's counsel, Mr. Wilson, in a letter of July 6th, concerning as they did, not merely the judge, but the public interest, and there is a further letter, later on, where this thing is again pressed on the department without avail. The telegraphic period had ceased, the judge would not budge from his position, but stood his ground, and then the department adopted the system of letters, and the letter of Mr. Wilson is acknowledged in this manner:

I may inform you that Mr. Justice McColl is to act as commissioner, and I shall forward the commission and instructions to him within a few days. I have no doubt you will be able to make arrangements with him for a sitting at a convenient time and place. It is not intended—

I call attention to this particularly, because the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Bostock) had not appeared on the scene at that particular time. No doubt, they were behind, and in concert with the other parties, but they had not shown their hands in this matter.

Mr. MORRISON. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken; and, if his other statements are not better founded, he is taking up time uselessly.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has forgotten that he was called to order a little while ago, and was instructed that he was not at liberty to interrupt. I am sorry he is excited, but he will have an opportunity to speak at great length.

Mr. MORRISON. Of which I shall take advantage.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He will have the opportunity of explaining his part of the transaction, for part he certainly had, as the correspondence will undoubtedly show, and I may read that part of it a little later on. But, doubtless, he and the hon. member for Yale had not made their appearance on the scene at this period. Three parties had appeared, who had induced Sir Oliver Mowat to send that extraordinary telegram, and they disappeared as quickly as they appeared, for Judge McColl had the greatest possible difficulty in finding them, as would appear from his report. He found one, I think, and had to get him by a subpoena. And, if I recollect rightly, two of them never appeared on the scene again, but, instead of those two appearing, the hon. member for Westminster and the hon. member for Yale did appear, and they succeeded in inducing the Government to change its position, which was a very proper one under the circumstances, and involved this country in a considerable bill of expense. And they employed a gentleman who is practising, I believe, in New Westminster. This is what was stated, however, at this period, before they appeared on the scene:

It is not intended in this case to instruct counsel on behalf of the Crown, but there will be, of course, no objection to counsel appearing for the judge and for the persons preferring the charges.

That was not an unreasonable or unusual course, and the Department of Justice, on the 13th July, were prepared to treat Judge Spinks with some fairness and some of the consideration shown to other judges in similar matters.

I am to add that I do not consider that Judge Spinks should allow the fact that these charges are pending and are to be investigated, to interfere with his holding courts and otherwise performing his ordinary duties.

So that you have this extraordinary condition of things presented, that on that flimsy material Sir Oliver Mowat was induced to direct a telegram to be sent to the judge, stating that these charges were serious, and you have the judge then saying: Investigate them, and do so quickly. Under the circumstances, he said, is it fit that I should be permitted to discharge the duties of a judge? If serious charges have been preferred, charges so serious that I am not entitled to the ordinary courtesy of seeing them before any machinery is set in motion for a trial, and if all the facts exist, and you have possession of them, is it fitting that I should continue discharging my duty? And on the 13th July, having looked into this matter, having found out that the judge was standing to his guns, and that these charges were going to vanish into thin air, the department would not take the responsibility of saying that, in the meanwhile, it would be more fitting that he should abstain from exercising his judicial functions. It is quite clear that the charges were not sufficiently serious, in the language of this letter, to prevent his holding court and otherwise performing his ordinary duties. For months he was permitted, with these charges hanging over his head and a commission pending, to go on performing his ordinary duties. Then comes the document I was looking for, the Order in Council of the 2nd July, authorizing this commission on the report I have read. Then, there was no need either for haste; there was no vacancy likely to be created in that position, and it was not until the 27th August that we find the acknowledgment of the letter of the 25th August from the Department of the Secretary of State, inclosing a draft of the commission of Judge McColl to inquire into and report upon certain complaints against Judge Spinks, of British Columbia, and stating that the matter would receive attention.

That is an important feature of the transaction. You have what I believe were not serious charges, not charges in the form they ought to be, when affecting the position of a judge; you have the Order in Council passed on the 2nd July, and no action on the part of the Department until the 25th August. Then His Excellency was induced to sign the commission, and strange enough, according to the return—and I will call the attention of the Solicitor General to this fact—the draft commission was sent to the Secretary of State for the affixing of the Great Seal and His Excellency's signature, and the commission itself, under the seal, with His Excellency's signature, is dated the 21st August.

As a matter of fact, it is quite clear that it was not sent at that time, and was in the shape of a draft on the 27th of August. Now, some explanation might be given for that delay. But let us see what further delay occurred. On the 21st of September, nothing had happened except the issue of this commission, and we find this letter from the judge who was appointed a commissioner:

I am to-day in receipt of a commission appointing me a commissioner.

Then, the second paragraph of that letter is as follows:

I have had no communication with your department since the telegram received in June last, inquiring whether I would act as commissioner, and in the absence of any instructions and of a copy of the complaints upon which the commission was issued, I am uncertain how to act.

So that, the celerity shown at the start, with these telegrams fired at the judge so charged, the department became so indifferent to the public interest and to the fact that these charges had been made, and that that commission had been issued in July, that here is their commissioner telling them on the 21st of September, that while he has got the commission, he has no complaints, and has no instructions, and he does not know what to do. Now, following this return comes a letter of September 22nd from the judge's counsel, who writes:

In the matter of the proposed inquiry into Judge Spinks's administration of justice in his district, there have been paragraphs in the newspapers that a commission has been or would be issued, and as a result the fact is quite public.

After your letter to me of the 13th July, I waited on Mr. Justice McColl, who informed me that he expected to be appointed to conduct the inquiry, and after the commission arrived he would make the necessary arrangements. Since then I have several times inquired, only to learn that the commission had not been received by Mr. Justice McColl, and apparently he was without instructions.

I am writing you now on this subject because I am in receipt of a letter from Judge Spinks, pointing out that one of those active in promoting the charges, of which, by the way, we yet know nothing definitely, is engaged in circulating rumours highly prejudicial to the judge, and which, under existing circumstances, and with this promised commission of inquiry hanging over him, he cannot notice.

The judge's position is becoming almost intolerable in consequence of the delay in disposing of this matter, and I may perhaps be permitted to remind you that in that letter you stated that you would forward the commission and instructions in a few days.

Is it quite fair to leave a judicial officer in this position? Surely to invite attention to it should be sufficient without more, to ensure the inquiry being held without any further delay.

There is the manner in which that occupant of the bench was treated. And what justification can there be for it in regard to a man holding such a position? To fire these telegrams over the wires was bad enough, but it was worse to have it given forth in the newspapers, spread about in the mouths of the people of the community, that he was a judge whose conduct was to be investigated, and although he had employed counsel, and had put this counsel in communication with the department, they are for several months appealing to the department in vain to expedite an inquiry and to relieve him of the unpleasant position in which he was placed. But he was pleading to deaf ears. You cannot suggest, Mr. Speaker, after a perusal of this return, that it simply took the ordinary red tape routine, and that some official or officials were not guilty of extraordinary delay in this matter. We will see where politicians do come in, and we will not. I think, make a very extravagant inference if we find reasons for communications of that kind, and that all regard to the judge's position, put aside altogether regard for himself personally, all regard of that kind was thrown to the winds, and consideration given to matters that ought never to have been considered. That is the second appeal on the part of the judge affected, and this is what happens. Then, on the 28th of September is an acknowledgment of Mr. Newcombe's letter:

In Mr. Newcombe's absence, I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 22nd instant, relative to the proposed inquiry into Judge Spinks' administration of justice in his district. In reply, I beg leave to inform you that the commission issued was forwarded to Mr. Justice McColl on the 10th instant. The judge has acknowledged receipt of the commission under date of the 21st instant.

We find the next document dated the 12th of October, where the Department of Justice at long last is sending the documents:

I have now the honour to forward you copies of the letters which show the complaints made against the judge.

Some hon. gentlemen, having regard to what I said at the outset, may think that these complaints were in proper form, that they were sufficiently specific in a matter of this kind. But it will appear that the commissioner in this case was not of that opinion. Nevertheless, those other complaints were not forwarded. Those documents that were sent to the Department of Justice in June, form the only justification for that extraordinary and heartless telegram already quoted. In July, the judge says: I am not only ready to meet the charges, but I wish you to hasten the trial. But these charges do not reach the commissioner until they send a letter on the 12th of October, after an appeal had been twice made to the department to expedite the inquiry. Then, there is a formal communication of November 13th, from R. G. Sidley, justice of the peace, one of the correspondents in this matter. He speaks of having notice that the judge was going to sit. On the 13th of November, 1897, there is a letter from Mr. Newcombe to Mr. Sidley, giving him the information he wanted. On the 10th of December, the next date, we have a telegram from the commission, and from this return it is clear he never received a single communication that had been sent by the judge pressing for expedition. None of these letters from Mr. Wilson, counsel for Judge Spinks, had ever reached the commission, according to the information brought down to the House; not even that courtesy was shown; and, therefore, Judge McColl does not fix a day for the trial until he telegraphs, as it is shown here, on the 10th of December to the Department of Justice:

Re Spinks.—Commission opens at Burnham 15th instant. Am informed for complainants that they have not retained counsel, and expect department will.

Now comes in the hon. member for Yale. The department alone, the department acting on its own initiative, according to the traditional practice, did not intend to employ counsel. They so stated. But the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo appeared on the scene. And so we see: "Bostock also writes me it is desirable." If it were parliamentary I would say, and, using the expression in the parliamentary sense, I will say, this was a most impertinent interference on the part of the hon. member for Yale. I do not mean to say it was insolent; I mean that he had no connection with the case properly considered, and I say he should not have been permitted, either by Judge McColl, now Chief Justice of the province, or the department to act in the matter unless he took the position of counsel or had some official status. The fact that he was member for Yale did not give him the right to be heard or to communicate with the commissioner appointed, any more than he has the right to interfere in a criminal matter before Judge McColl when he does not appear as counsel, either for the Crown or for the prisoner. He did not pretend to be acting, and he was not acting in any other capacity than as member of Parliament, as representative of the district; and his office boy had as much right to communicate with Judge McColl in this matter as the hon. gentleman had. But the judge listened to him. The judge was in an extraordinary position. He could not get instructions until he demanded them from the department, he could not get complaints and know what the charges were until he insisted on receiving them. And so, I suppose, in desperation, he was induced to act upon the representations of the hon. member for Yale. It appears from the despatches that "Mr. Bostock thought it was desirable" that there should be counsel for these gentlemen. But he thought that it was desirable that the tax-payers of Canada should pay this counsel, such counsel as he and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) might agree upon. The hon. gentleman thought it desirable that this assistance should be given so long as he had not to pay for it, so long as it was a charge upon the public exchequer. And so he advised Judge McColl that it was advisable, and, not having regard to the decision communicated in the letter of the Minister of Justice, we find that he had sufficient political influence to cause the retaining of the friend of the hon. member for New Westminster.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 68) respecting the London Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Calvert.)

Bill (No. 119) respecting the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Frost.)

Bill (No. 61) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved :

That Bill (No. 90) respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company—(Mr. Macpherson)—be now read the third time.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (East Assiniboia) moved in amendment :

That Bill (No. 90) be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of amending it by striking out section 3 and substituting the following as section 3 :—

“Section 5 of the said Act is hereby amended by striking out the words ‘1st day of August,’ in the seventh and eighth lines thereof, and substituting for the same ‘1st day of December.’”

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. gentleman to explain the change that is made in this Bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, the Bill that is before the House is to this effect, that an additional year's delay is asked. The company propose to expend $20,000 on construction during the year as a guarantee to the people interested in this road that they will go on with the work as soon as they can make the necessary preparations. I may inform the House that this road has been before the people for the past eleven or twelve years. This road runs over the original survey of the Canadian Pacific Railway, heading for Yellow Head Pass. The people, on the strength of the promise of the construction of this railway, settled all along the line and they have been looking forward, year after year, to the construction of the road. Unfortunately, the company that had control of the charter had continual difficulties and came to us, year after year, asking an extension of time, until now, the people feel that it is their right to appeal to this House for protection in regard to this juggling in connection with railway charters. It is the road they want. The difficulties that the late company have had do not meet the necessities of their case. The fact that there has been continued litigation does not help the settlers in getting their grain to market. This whole country through which the railway passes is well settled, and the settlements have made good progress. They have a large amount of stuff to be got out each year, and they feel that it is only reasonable that they should appeal to this House in support of their contention that this road should be built forthwith. Last year the Canadian Pacific Railway bought out the road from the old company, and they now make this proposal to expend $20,000 during the present season, but they ask an additional year for the construction of the twenty miles which the charter calls for. You will observe that this amendment which we have moved meets the views of the Canadian Pacific Railway to a certain extent. Instead of giving a year, we are prepared, if the House sustains the amendment, to allow them up to the 1st of December ; whereas the Bill that passed the House last year entailed upon the company that they should build ten miles last autumn, and then fifteen miles before the 1st of August next. We ask the House to sustain us in the demand, that the company keeps its engagement to this extent, that they should build twenty miles by the 1st of December, and thus be in a position to remove a portion of the crop of the present year. I might say a great deal about the nature of the country through which this road passes. This line leaves the Canadian Pacific Railway east of Brandon, and runs in a north-westerly direction. It is now constructed as far as Hamiota, thence proceeding in the direction of Birtle, and leaving the boundary of Manitoba it strikes my constituency on the east side, and runs the whole length of it in the direction of Battleford towards the Yellow Head Pass. You will remember that on the north banks of the Qu'Appelle we have a great number of colonies. We have an Icelandic colony ; we have a large settlement of Canadians from Huron, between the two Cutarm Creeks who have been in that country since 1882 or 1883. Then we have the Hungarian colony, the Bohemian colony, the Swedish colony, the German colony, and the Temperance colony from Ontario.

Mr. LARIVIERE. What about the French?

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is a French colony further west. All along the line the land is well settled and there is a large area under cultivation. I am sorry I had not an opportunity of calling to my aid the large petitions that were sent to the Minister of Railways in connection with the ability of the people to produce, but I have here a record of the produce of simply nineteen settlers on this line. These nineteen settlers, last year, produced 106,236 bushels wheat, and they had this spring, ready for cultivation, 9,931 acres. Further west, when we come to the country immediately north of Indian Head in the direction of Pheasant Plains, there the ability to produce grain is very much increased, and the improvement in the country is very much more apparent. These people have all to cross the Qu'Appelle valley, where I reside myself. Its banks are four hundred feet high and the valley two miles wide, so that on the average these people are hauling their grain from 30 to 40 miles, and crossing this valley with it. It can easily be shown that this has been a very great hardship, and the people of that district deserve very great credit that they have continued all these years without railroad facilities. I am quite sure that I could prove to the House, that in many cases it has been done at a loss, and it is only within the last three years when prices have been better for grain, that it could be made pay. I have known my teams hauling grain for 30 miles across the Qu'Appelle to Moosomin, and when they reached home the second day, if I deducted the usual prices for transportation, they would not have in hand any profit whatever. I remember on one occasion when I wished to get two ponies and a man to drive me, they asked me $14 to drive 30 miles and back, and a team with a load of grain going over the same distance would not bring back that amount. However, better prices have prevailed for the last three years and the people have reaped the benefit. Still, these people feel that they deserve the consideration of this House. They have patiently and persistently gone forward with their improvements for the past fourteen or fifteen years, and they are getting tired of this continual waiting for railway facilities. It is no comfort to them to know that railway companies have had endless litigation; what they want is the railroad, and they believe that they will provide sufficient traffic to make it pay from the first day of the equipment. The 50 miles of this road which have been built always paid expenses and paid a fair dividend, and we believe if it were continued it would be a paying road from the very commencement. From one end of the route to the other the people are opposed to delay, and our instructions as representing the people is to protest against the delay. The Northern Pacific and the other companies would be quite willing to go into that country and provide the people with a railroad, so that we feel the offer which the Canadian Pacific Railway made the other day in the committee, was simply a bagatelle—a matter of $20,000 would scarcely buy a candy stick for each settler and keep him in good humour until the year is through. The Canadian Pacific Railway are quite able to fulfil the engagements they entered into with Parliament last year and build the 20 miles, and thus meet the wishes of the people, and give them the encouragement which their patience and perseverance deserve. I would also mention the fact that many of the people have left the district in consequence. A large number of settlers, specially from the temperance colonies, have moved away, and though they have gone elsewhere in the territories, yet they have left their property and it is a loss to them personally, because land when not cultivated goes back to weeds, and is, as a rule, of less value than if it were unbroken prairie. We hope, then, that in consideration of the patience, perseverance, energy and enterprise of the people, that this House will see the necessity of asking the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to keep the engagement it entered into with Parliament last session. For the present, we meet them by granting an extension of time from the 1st of August to the 1st of December, on condition that they build the 20 miles, as was agreed upon at the last session of Parliament. I might call your attention to the fact that, in the western part of the riding, there is a large wheat country, comprising the districts of Balcarres, Abernethy, Lorlie, Pheasant Forks, Saltoun, Kenlis, Lebret, Chickney, Bayward, Parklands, Loon Creek and Fort Qu'Appelle. The people of these districts declare in their petition that they are from 18 to 40 miles distant from the present Canadian Pacific Railway; that numbers of settlers have located in these districts on the strength of projected railways; that a large number of settlers have in past years abandoned their homesteads for lack of transportation facilities in the more distant settlements; that the distance from the railway curtails the operations of the settlers and prevents the settlement of other lands; that, notwithstanding this disadvantage, the country above referred has been steadily growing and prospering, thus proving the enormous natural advantages it enjoys; and that, in the settlements named and adjoining, there is an abundance of good farming land awaiting settlement. Therefore, these people insist upon their request being granted, that no further delay be given to the company, but that they be required to proceed forthwith to make good their engagement with the Government last year. I call your attention also to a resolution passed by a municipality in Manitoba affected by this railway. At a meeting held in Beulah Hall, Beulah, on Friday, March 31st, 1899, the following resolution was passed, after some discussion, on motion of W. A. Doyle, seconded by C. T. Gurney:—

That this meeting of the residents of the municipality of Minnota hereby desires our representative in the Parliament of Canada, W. J. Roche, M.D., to oppose the application of the Great Northwest Central Railway Co. for an extension of time till 1900, for the construction of twenty miles of their railway westward from Hamiota. And that as this settlement has been promised railway service by the Dominion Government for the past nineteen years, and our earlier settlers became residents in consequence of such promise, we feel that we have a right to call upon the entire Parliament of Canada to protect our interest against any further juggling on the part of the said railway company.

I think it should be evident to the House that this is not a question of factious opposition to any railway company; it is not that the people are opposed to one line and prefer another line; but it is simply this, that, now that they have been so long in the country, and have developed their lands, and have produced so abundantly and with such success, they feel that, as citizens, they have a right to the consideration of the House. I move, therefore, that this amendment be made to the Bill now before the House.

Mr. J. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). Having moved the third reading of this Bill, I may say, that I fully sympathize with the people represented by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, in their desire to have railway facilities and to have this road built at the earliest possible moment. I understand that many parts of that district have been settled for a long time, and that the people were encouraged to believe that the railway would be built. They naturally desire, therefore, after waiting so long, that it should be proceeded with without any further delay. I believe the great majority of the members of the committee also fully sympathize with the desire of the people of that district to have their desires fulfilled. Everything my hon. friend has said, with regard to the past history of this road, is correct, and perhaps a good deal more could be said. Unfortunately, the charter was held by people who were not able to continue the work; but, as was pointed out in the committee, the franchise had passed into new hands. I understand that it was purchased by Mr. Angus, Mr. Shaughnessy and Mr. Clark, with their own private means, but, no doubt, in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as, I think, was stated before the committee. But it was also pointed out that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company could not spend one dollar in carrying out this work, until this company had the legislation which is being asked for in this Bill. For that reason, they ask for a short extension of time, in order that they may complete their arrangements and raise the capital necessary to proceed with the work. A proposition was made, that the gentlemen who now own the charter, to give an earnest of their good faith, should expend $20,000 in construction on or before the 31st of December of this year. I believe that the great majority of the committee, along with myself, felt that the character of the men and the company they were representing was a sufficient guarantee that this work would be carried out, and that they would expend $20,000 this year in construction. The Bill provided for an extension of only one year, and we had every reason to feel that, if this legislation were granted, the road would be completed before the end of this year. It was probably felt that, to put a greater obligation upon these men until they had an opportunity of transferring the undertaking to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and making their financial arrangements, would be a hardship to them. For that reason I cannot support the amendment. I hope the Bill will be allowed to pass as it is, and that there will be no further juggling, as my hon. friend says, in this matter, and no disappointment to the settlers in that district. I feel fully convinced, as, I think, most of the members of this House do, that the work will be carried out in good faith. These men can hardly be held responsible for the failure in the past.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). I did not know that this Bill would be reached to-night and, therefore, am not prepared to enter into any lengthy discussion, but as a goodly portion of the road runs through my constituency, I know how very anxious the people there are to receive the railway construction they have been promised, and have failed to receive, for the last fifteen or sixteen years. When Mr. Howland, the solicitor of the old company, appeared before the railway committee two sessions ago, his chief argument was that the question was up for final adjudication before the Privy Council in Great Britain that year to decide the ownership, and that when that was decided there would be no further litigation, and that company would have no further excuse for not going on with the construction of the road, which they were as anxious to construct as the people were to see it in operation. That judgment was given in the interests of his clients, but, still, it seems that litigation has not ceased. I believe that last session, when this Bill was up before the House, an extension of time was asked for by the present owners of the road, Mr. Angus, Mr. Shaughnessy, and several other Canadian Pacific Railway magnates, who had purchased it, although the Bill was presented in the old form under the old management. I think that a compromise was made last session, binding them only to construct ten miles instead of twenty by the end of December, 1898. They sent out some surveyors and made a show of doing some work, but the surveyors were soon recalled, and the people had felt sure they were going to get the railway and felt very jubilant over the prospect. As time went on, however, the same old story was repeated, and now we have an application made again for a further extension.

As regards this new arrangement entered into by the company, by which they agree to spend $20,000 per annum, that would be a perfectly valueless expenditure, as far as the people are concerned, because $20,000 would not construct three miles of the railway, and will be expended, probably, in surveys. So far, therefore, as regards assisting the people out of their difficulties, who are in want of railway construction, that expenditure would be of no value at all. The people held a mass meeting and passed resolutions, the municipal councils memorialized the Government, and last session even, the Manitoba legislature sent an Address praying the Governor General in Council not to grant a further extension of time, unless at least twenty miles of the railway were constructed during that season, and this same agitation is being repeated this year, except that the Manitoba legislature has not memorialized the Government. It is time this Parliament should see that the people's interests are protected a little better than they have been in the past. Hon. gentlemen have no idea of the difficulties these people have to labour under. Many of them settled in that country on the old original survey of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That line was deflected to the south, and these people have been living between the Manitoba and North-western on the north and the Canadian Pacific Railway on the south, many of them having to haul their grain thirty or forty miles, which certainly detracts from the value of that commodity. They have been living there, year after year, in the anticipation of early railway construction, and it is time this Parliament should compel those in possession of the charter, either to fulfil its conditions or forfeit it. Mr. Shaughnessy and Mr. Angus and the other magnates of the Canadian Pacific Railway who now control the charter, surely can raise sufficient money for the construction of twenty miles of road. Prairie roads can be constructed at a cost of about $8,000 per mile, so that, the cost of constructing these twenty miles would be only $160,000, and surely the Canadian Pacific Railway people are good for that amount. It is simply nonsense to state that an expenditure of $20,000 during the coming year is any evidence of good faith.

I need not add anything to what has been so well said by the mover of this amendment, which has my hearty support. It is my opinion that if this Bill passes, we shall have the same process again repeated in the coming session. Judge Clark, the solicitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway, would not promise that he would not come back next session and ask for a further extension. It is time that the people's interests were protected by compelling the company to construct the line or give way to others who are willing to construct it.

Mr. ROCHE.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I presume it would be proper that some member of the committee should state to the House the reasons which led the committee to arrive at the conclusion it did. It will not, I assume, be taken for granted that this matter was not very thoroughly discussed by the committee, and that there were not good reasons for leading them to the conclusion they formed. I do not think there was a member of that committee present who did not sympathize with the case presented by my hon. friend. We all could readily recall the transactions which took place a year ago and the strong feeling then existing that the time had come when these continued appeals should not be permitted to go on, and that the people in that section were entitled, at the earliest possible moment as a matter of simple justice, to have the railway constructed. But still we all—or at least a majority—felt strongly that it was impossible to shut our eyes to the fact that we were not going to further this undertaking by either withholding assent to the Bill or imposing any more stringent conditions than those embodied in the Bill as it stands. It was admitted, I think, by the friends of this railway, perhaps by my hon. friend himself, that owing to the existing conditions, it will be impossible, in less than three months after the Bill became law, for the company to make the necessary financial arrangements to go on with the work of construction. Presuming that the Bill will receive assent by the 1st of July, July, August and September would pass, and the company would find itself, on the 1st of October, so near the winter season, the cold season, at all events, that it would be quite impossible, with the utmost desire to prosecute the work, to carry it on to any extent before the winter finally closed in, and, at all events, it would be impossible to lay down the road and have it in operation so as to enable it to carry out the expectations of the people. The question for the committee then, is whether anything would be likely to be gained by refusing this company—which undoubtedly intended to go on with the work, which was committing itself, positively, to the undertaking—this Bill or annexing to it impossible conditions, which would practically have the same effect as refusing the Bill altogether. Now, as I have said, sympathizing to the fullest degree as I did, and as I am satisfied the committee did, with the desire of my hon. friend, we felt that there was no other course opened to us than to pass the Bill practically as submitted, but adding the condition—I made the proposal myself—that a substantial sum should be spent indicating the bona fides of the company and giving the people what, I think, is a sufficient guarantee that before the 1st of August next—which is the date under the existing charter at which the twenty or twenty-five miles had to be completed—such work to be carried to completion to that extent. I think we could count, with a moderate degree of certainty—as certain as anything human can be—that this will be accomplished and if it is accomplished, the people of that locality will get, at the earliest possible moment, all that they could hope for. I did not hear that there was any corporation which was now seeking authority from Parliament to go on with this road that would be prepared instantly to take it up and would have this twenty or twenty-five miles built to carry out the season's crops. I think there was no statement to that effect. No doubt, there might be found companies that would be willing to take it up as soon as possible and carry it on rapidly. But we had no evidence before us that greater rapidity of construction would be secured by throwing out the charter than by granting it with the condition annexed.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). It seems to me that by granting the motion my hon. friend (Mr. Douglas) has moved, we should be very seriously jeopardizing this Bill altogether. This Bill was discussed in a very full committee when the parties were represented and when every possible consideration could be given to it, and when, as has been stated, every one sympathized to a great extent with the arguments put forward by the members from Manitoba and the North-west. And, considering all these things, this was the view taken of the matter in hand: That the persons who, it was assumed—and I believe rightly—had taken hold of this undertaking were not responsible for the past delay, and that there is a pledge that the work shall be proceeded with with all possible despatch from this time forward. Besides, by amending section 5 and removing from that section all the restrictions that were placed in the Act in regard to negotiations of their bonds, it is in effect admitted that they are in a position now to go on and complete the undertaking. Now, conceding that they were handicapped by the clause under section 5, which, by this Bill, is removed, and which is not now objected to, it seems that we ought to grant what is asked for in this Bill. What is really the difference between the Bill as it stands and the clause as it has been proposed to be amended by the hon. member (Mr. Douglas)? He is willing to extend the time from 1st August to 1st December, 1899. No work, I suppose, can be advantageously done after the middle of October. So it amounts to saying that they shall have an extension from the 1st of August to the middle of October. On the part of the promoters it is asked to extend the time for a year. It seems to me it is better to grant the extension than that they should come to the next Parliament and say: We took up the matter and we found that we could not accomplish the work of building in the time, and so we ask for an extension. Will any hon. members say that if they show good faith in the undertaking, when they come to the next session of Parliament, that extension would not be granted? If it would be granted under those circumstances, I submit it should be granted now. And we should not pass the amendment, much as we desire to favour it, as it is moved by an hon. gentleman who knows so much about the subject.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Feeling interested in this Bill for reasons I stated yesterday in the Railway Committee, I would advise the hon. gentleman from the North-west in the interest of his own Bill, to withdraw his amendment and not kill the goose that proposes to lay golden eggs for him. I do not know that the hon. gentleman will get the railway by putting obstructions in the way of the company that proposes to build it in the manner set forth in the Bill. I am not aware that any proposition comes from any other source which is likely to cause the railway to be built through that section of the country any sooner than it will be built by the Canadian Pacific Railway people. I feel strongly in this matter; I have friends who are interested in the construction of this road. I would urge that this amendment be withdrawn and this legislation allowed to pass, hoping that the company, since these financial difficulties are settled, will go on in good faith with the construction of the road.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I venture to think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. members representing the different constituencies in the North-west and Manitoba are in a better position to speak on this question than the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). This thing has been going on for a great many years. I have been in this House for three years. The first session I was here I went into the Railway Committee and found an application there for the extension of this charter for a year. The company told us then that they were going on with the road, and would start work at once. Last year they came to the House with another proposition for an extension, practically an extension for two years. The members for the west thought that was rather too long and took strong ground against it; and the upshot of that was that at the end of the session an agreement was arrived at by which twenty miles was to be built last and this year. I understand that in place of the parties building the twenty miles they were to build, they have sold their interest in this road to the Canadian Pacific Railway. And now we find the Canadian Pacific Railway people coming here asking for an extension. Now, as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) said, we are not certain, if we allow this to go through, that they will not be back next year for another extension of time. Now, the settlers in that country should not be left out of consideration. This charter was granted thirteen years ago, and many settlers went in on the strength of the charter granted and the subsidy promised for the building of the road. They have been there all these years anxiously waiting for the extension of this road. Year after year these parties come and ask for an extension of time, and to-night we hear the same old story. If there is one cause more than another that has retarded the settlement and development of the North-west Territories it is this constant extending of charters. This case of the Great North-west Central is not the only one. Charters have been granted time and time again, and the people have gone in and settled on the proposed line in good faith, having been invited to go in by the press and by the immigration agents. Many of them are 100 miles from railway communication waiting for these arrangements to be carried out, and the line to be built. Extensions of charters are granted from time to time until the people get tired of waiting, and many of them leave the country. This proposed line runs through a portion of my constituency called Saskatoon and Battleford. The people there are anxiously awaiting the construction of this road. They would like some action to be taken to force the parties to go on with the work. Another case of this kind was that of the Manitoba and North-western. That company got a charter to build from Portage la Prairie, from the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to Prince Albert. They were to construct 50 miles each and every year until the road was completed. On the strength of that agreement they received from the Government of this country 6,400 acres of land per mile. That land was handed over to them, some of the choicest land in the Saskatchewan Valley. Now, we find they have built to the the boundary of Manitoba, where the road is paying in the meantime, and they stop there. And they have come to this House year after year for I do not know how many years asking to have the charter extended, and it has been extended. Once they asked to have the length of road they were to build each year reduced from fifty miles a year to twenty miles. That was done, still they are not building a mile of the road. But, just the same, they hold their land, some of the choicest land, close to the settlement of Prince Albert. Some 500 settlers have gone in and have been there fourteen or fifteen years on the strength of the charter granted, and in the hope of the road being extended, and the road has not been extended to them up to the present time.

Now, I do not think that the mover of this resolution is asking too much. He has only asked to have the agreement entered into last year by the promoters carried out. I think it is nothing but fair that the Canadian Pacific Railway, who got this charter, should at the same time accept these conditions. They had no right to assume that they could come back to this House and get an extension of time for another year, or for two years. When they bought out this charter and bought out the piece of road already built, they did so knowing that these conditions were attached, and that they would have to construct the road. Now I myself have been appealed to in relation to this matter, resolutions have been sent to me that were passed by some settlers, I think, in the constituency of Marquette at a place called Beulah. The people up there feel strongly on this question, and they wish their representative, as well as the members representing other constituencies in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, to take some action and to oppose the principle of the extension of charters from time to time :

At a meeting held in Beulah Hall, Beulah, on Friday, March 31st, 1899, Mr. D. Gerrand in the chair :

After some discussion, a motion was brought before the meeting by Mr. W. A. Doyle, seconded by Mr. C. T. Gurney, and carried :

"That this meeting of the residents of the municipality of Miniota hereby desire our representative in the Parliament of Canada, W. J. Roche, M.D., to oppose the application of the Great North-west Central Railway Company for an extension of time, till 1900, for the construction of 20 miles of their railway westward from Hamiota.

"And that, as this settlement has been promised railway service by the Dominion Government for the past nineteen years, and our earlier settlers became residents in consequence of such promises.—

Thus bearing out what I have stated to the House that these people went in and settled there on the strength of the promises made in this charter.

—we feel that we have a right to call upon the entire Parliament of Canada to protect our interest against any further juggling on the part of the said railway company.

"And that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Minister of Railways, and the members of the said Parliament representing Manitoba and North-west constituencies."

I suppose that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) and the said members of Parliament have received a copy of those resolutions.

There is a strong appeal from people who are living on the proposed line. They feel strongly on this question, and think that this House should not extend the charter. I do not think that the fact of the Canadian Pacific Railway telling us that they are going to spend $20,000 this year, should be taken into consideration. Why, Sir, $20,000 would not build much more than two miles of road, if it could do that. I think the Canadian Pacific Railway could readily build the 20 miles of road, as suggested by the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia, before the 1st of October ; therefore, I would strongly oppose this extension being granted. As this railroad runs through my constituency, and as there is a great deal of fertile land there that we expect is going to be filled up with settlers, we cannot expect to get these settlers into that part of the country as long as these extensions are granted from time to time. Now, we know as a matter of fact that any person who proposes to settle in that portion of the country, when he finds out that this road was promised 12 years ago, and that the company gets an extension every year, why, he will never think of settling there. Therefore, in this way a great injury is done to the constituency which I represent. I have no doubt at all that if this road was built through that portion of my constituency I could get several thousand good settlers to come in and locate on those lands, because they are some of the choicest lands in the whole North-west Territories, there is no question about that. We have land in the neighbourhood of Battleford, first-class land, on which we can place 20,000 families. But as long as there is no prospect of extending the railway, we are never going to get these settlers into the country.

SUPPLY—INVESTIGATION INTO THE CONDUCT OF JUDGES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). When the House rose at six o'clock, I had reached, in this extraordinary history of what might fairly be called an attack upon one of the judges of this country by the Department of Justice, the phase of it where two gentlemen apparently instrumental in bringing about all this irregular procedure, make their appearance, and make their appearance in, I think, a most reprehensible manner. I was dealing with the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock) who, it appears, had ventured to approach the judge, who had ventured to interfere between the complainants whose cause he dared not avow, whose cause he had never advocated over his own signature, either in Parliament or out of it, for whom he was willing to undertake, not the responsibility of one farthing financially, but whom he was willing to represent at the cost of the public exchequer by this indirect and irregular exercise of his political influence. Behind the doors of this judicial tribunal it appears that he not only had relations with the judge, but correspondence with him, and I am not surprised that his letters do not appear, they would be interesting reading in this return. Yet, we have from the judge himself the statement that the member for Yale and Cariboo ventured to write to him upon a matter where the character of a judge was involved, and where it was attacked on the statement of three men, none of whose names is that of the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo. So while he dared not take any responsibility in this matter, or vouch for a single statement these men have made, either to the department or in Parliament, he began to attempt manipulations of this character. The judge says :

Am informed from complainants that they have not retained counsel.

It will be quite clear who informed him. The complainants, from the day that they sent this communication to the Minister of Justice to the last day of the investigation, disappear from the scene, and when these men who had made the charges ran away from them, it appears that the member for Yale and Cariboo and the member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) bob up, not openly, not in man fashion, not in open court, not before the judge, not before the accused, but by private correspondence, Mr. Speaker, private letters to the judge. There is an exercise of some extraordinary influence which apparently was successful, because the great thing that the members for Yale and Cariboo and New Westminster were concerned about was the retainer of a gentleman of easy political virtue, a Mr. Henderson, of New Westminster, who was elected to serve a certain class of the constituency and who, after reaching the legislature, by their voice and their support—

Mr. MORRISON. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Some inexperienced gentleman, I think, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison), says order. I do not know what is the trouble with him, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, may I tell the hon. gentleman what my objection is ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No ; it is not at all material. Some gentleman, devoid of political virtue, who was elected in that constituency, where the hon. member for New Westminster resides, to serve a certain class of gentlemen who had political opinions of the character with which he at the moment sympathized, no sooner reached Parliament than he turned right-about and went across the floor of the House. This gentleman had to be assisted by the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock), and, consequently, he appears on the scene in this way, and this is the way in which he got in. It was the declared and open policy of the Department of Justice that they would not, on these flimsy charges, assume the responsibility of retaining counsel to prosecute a judge of the county court. They stated so in an official communication which I read to-day. But, if the Department of Justice had shown extreme impetuosity, flying at this judge with a telegram in June, and when the judge would not be terrified into resigning, but boldly stood his ground and asked for an immediate inquiry, only after the intervention of his counsel was he or his counsel able to obtain action in December, and a final investigation in the next year. In the meanwhile, sub rosa, the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo, and the hon. member for New Westminster were doing their very best to enable this Mr. Henderson, to whom

I have referred, to pull $400 out of the public exchequer of this country, to waste, in the most scandalous manner, $400. That is what they succeeded in doing, though neither of them dared appear in the proceedings or to face Judge Spinks as his accusers. Neither of them ventured to put in an appearance, in man fashion, yet, when Judge Spinks was trying to face his accusers, or their counsel, who were behind the charges, these gentlemen were exercising their influence to have retained at the public expense, Mr. Henderson, to prosecute these charges. What were these charges? I have read the letters; not one of the letters contained material, as the record shows, sufficient to initiate an investigation upon, and even these charges, flabby and flimsy and empty as they were, the Department of Justice, to its credit, was so ashamed of that it would not even send them to the judge till months after they reached the department, and the judge had importuned the department to go on and issue a commission. Months had elapsed and these letters and complaints had not been sent to the judge. Then, as I say, in come these two worthy gentlemen, the representatives I have named, to advocate the great cause and claims of Mr. Alexander Henderson. This is the telegram of Mr. McColl:

Am informed for complainants that they have not retained counsel, and expect department will. Mr. Bostock also writes me this desirable.

Who asked the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo to approach the judge in that irregular and unjustifiable manner? Who asked him to interfere, and, if the complainants asked him to interfere, did he act as the representative of Yale-Cariboo and does he think that a political representative has any more right to interfere in a matter like this than he has now to go and suggest to Chief Justice McColl, or any other judge on the bench in British Columbia, some course of procedure that he thinks would be wise in the case of a political election either federal or local? If he had any right to interfere in this case, he has a right to interfere in the trial of an election case, in the trial of a case between A and B, in the trial of a case between the Queen and any one else. This was the most serious character of a trial that any one could very well imagine. Nevertheless, he has not stated on this record who asked him to interfere and, for obvious reasons, the correspondence he had with the judge does not appear in this return and is not a matter of public record. Nevertheless, he and the hon. member for New Westminster had to be placated; something must come of this investigation. Whoever attempted to remove Judge Spinks, or terrify him, so that he would leave the bench, had failed. Nothing was to come of the commission, and the gentleman who desired his place could not have his wish gratified; but they could retain Mr. Alexander Henderson, they could pay $400 into Alexander Henderson's pocket from the treasury of this country, though the charges at that time had vanished into thin air, though the charges were never followed up, though the country had to be scoured by balliffs and court officers to find the men who made the charges, and though they were finally dragged up on subpoena issued by the judge, Mr. Speaker, the only man who had appeared with his head in the noose, and that one of the original complainants, the judge deals with, as we will see later on. We had a telegram dated the 10th of December, 1897, which is as follows:—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

Hon. David Mills, Ottawa.

Re Spinks: I recommend Alexander Henderson, department agent here, be retained herein.

(Sgd.) AULAY MORRISON.

This was sent, although Sir Oliver Mowat had decided that no one should be retained at the public charge and the public cost to press these charges made against Judge Spinks. Although nothing had come of this thing, something had to come of it, and the result was that cash came from it to the pockets of Mr. Henderson. That was about the result and the wishes of the hon. members for Yale and Cariboo and New Westminster were gratified. So you have the interference of these two gentlemen in this matter according to this record, unparalleled in cases of this importance. Consequently, here is a telegram that came. It was a matter that could not wait for ordinary correspondence, the retainer of Mr. Henderson. Judge Spinks was appealing always, formally and strongly, by his counsel, for an immediate investigation, pointing out to the Government the injury to the public interest to have these charges hanging over his head and having the news spread broadcast over his district that a commission of inquiry was going to sit in his case, asking that speedy steps be taken to have this case dealt with, to have the witnesses and charges brought before him face to face. Weeks would elapse, a letter would be sent to Judge Spinks's counsel, but when the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo, or the hon. member for New Westminster stepped in, in hot haste, to have Mr. Henderson employed, under no circumstances were they, knowing nothing about the charges, not daring to come forward and father one single line of them, telegrams became the order of the day. The telegram of the 10th of December called for an answer, and on the 13th of December a telegram was sent to Mr. Justice McColl:

Judge Spink's commission opens Vernon 15th instant. Please attend and prosecute charges for department. Obtain copies from Judge McColl, commissioner.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to a remarkable feature of this business. Remember the authorities I referred to to-day to show that no inquiry of this kind ought to be set on foot in the case of a judge of the Superior Court, or a judge of the county court, unless the charges were in such form and of such a character that, if they were proven or admitted, they were sufficient to remove the judge from the bench. This commission issued July 2nd, and listen, Mr. Speaker, to this sentence of the instructions sent to the counsel employed after the importunities of the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) :

See that no charges are prosecuted unless sufficient particulars are furnished.

The judge had been able to extract, in October, from the Government such charges as they had in July, when they issued the commission; but, on the 13th of September, this caution is thrown out to Mr. Henderson:

See that no charges are prosecuted unless sufficient particulars are furnished, and have matter disposed of as expeditiously as possible.

Expedition was needed, then, to get rid of Mr. Henderson. The department, finding Mr. Spinks would not retire, when that extraordinary telegram was hurled against him by the Justice Department, telling him of the awful charges, then the department idled and dilly-dallied until finally a counsel is on their hands. The wishes of two supporters of the Administration had been gratified. Mr. Henderson is employed, but there must be a limit even to recklessness of that character, and, therefore, expedition is needed, or the bill of Mr. Alexander Henderson will be a serious matter to be responsible for. Now we come to the letter of the chief justice of the 13th December, 1897, in which he explains how it was that he came to ask for this counsel, and again appears the name of the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock), who had nothing whatever to do with this case, no right to interfere in any shape or form, who did not appear in any open manner, and with reference to whom up to this time it was impossible that Judge Spinks could know who was pulling the wires for these witnesses who never dared to show their faces in court, when the judge was present to confront them. Mr. Justice McColl says :

I have the honour to explain with reference to my telegram to you of the 10th instant, and your reply of this date, that I was under the impression until just before I sent the telegram that counsel would be instructed to appear for some of the complainants; but I then learned that it was assumed by them, as it had been by Mr. Bostock, M.P., that the department would instruct counsel to appear.

It is quite clear that the responsibility for this extraordinary inquiry rests, for the moment, largely on the shoulders of a gentleman who did not intend to come to light, but who worked behind the backs of these three gentlemen who vanished into thin air by the time the inquiry came on. Consequently, neither the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Bostock) nor these extraordinary justices of the peace and other gentlemen appeared to make good these charges. The hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock) has succeeded in his work; he had got a counsel employed at the public expense to press these charges, and he disappears from the record. The counsel remained, and the disgrace came to all who were concerned, directly or indirectly, in promoting this investigation. Then, we have the report, and, Mr. Speaker, you will not be surprised since I have shown, as the record points out, that there never was a case that should have been put on foot against any judge. And, Sir, after this case was put on foot, the Department of Justice seemed ashamed of it, and they let the matter lag and drag until the scandal of not pressing the inquiry was forced upon them by the judge who was charged. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, you will not be surprised at the report of the judge who was called upon to conduct the inquiry. Judge McColl reports on January, 1898, more than half a year after this commission had been issued and inquiry instituted, the charges hanging over the head of the judge, who was permitted, by the express sanction of the Department of Justice, to exercise his ordinary functions. Judge McColl reports as follows:—

The complaints being couched in general terms,—

I ask you to mark, Mr. Speaker, that none of these particulars were furnished, as required, even by the instructions to Mr. Alexander Henderson.

—and apparently confined to one locality, it was deemed proper to hold, in the first instance, upon notice to the complainants, a sitting at Vernon, the assize town of the district, from which the complaints proceeded, before determining the scope of the investigation. To advertise the proceedings generally would be, in case the charges were not substantiated, to needlessly impair the usefulness of Mr. Spinks.

The judge appreciated the point urged by Mr. Spinks upon the Department of Justice, as to the danger of his usefulness being impaired by the notoriety which this commission had acquired, and the fact that nothing was being done in regard to it.

And such advertisement, and the holding of sittings throughout the district, would, owing to their vast extent, be very expensive.

The judge goes on to say :

None of the complainants acknowledged the receipt of the request for particulars of the charges made by them, nor did any of them appear to give evidence.

He does not mention that the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Bostock) was conspicuous by his absence, and that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) failed to take the slightest part of the responsibility, or that they did not identify themselves with these extraordinary complaints; but the judge goes on to say, that they did get one man, viz., Mr. Peter McCallum :

Except Mr. Peter McCallum, who attended under a subpoena.

Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Henderson, with the assistance and co-operation of the members for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock) and for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison), issued that subpoena? Oh, no. They put in no appearance, but the subpoena was issued on behalf of Mr. Spinks. So, it was left for Mr. Spinks to drag before the commission the only man he could get hold of in connection with these charges, and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Bostock) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) were discreetly out of sight, although we find now, late in the day, that—for the gratification of some extraordinary whim or caprice—they have been the cause of a useless expenditure by this country of several hundred dollars. Then, says the judge:

It having come to the knowledge of the undersigned that no counsel had been instructed by the complainants to appear for them,—

This was told to him in piteous terms by the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo. The judge goes on to explain his communication, which I have read, asking that counsel be appointed to prosecute the inquiry. So the commissioner and these parties behind him obtained the assistance of a prosecuting counsel, and in consequence:

—Mr. Henderson attended the proceedings; and it was also decided to hold a sitting at Midway, at which all parties interested might attend, instead of at Vernon, and they were so notified accordingly. Of the three complainants, Mr. McCallum and Mr. James Falconer admitted having no personal knowledge of the matters complained of, and Mr. Kerr, who resides at or near Midway, had, it appeared, left home a few days before the sitting there on a visit to Vernon.

So it appears that the complainants, on whose letters the Minister of Justice used the telegraphic system of this country, and then permitted it to be known in the country that he was using the telegraphic service and that very serious charges had been made and would be investigated against the judge, failed to appear.

The only person who attended in support of any charge against Mr. Spinks was Mr. Richard Graves Clark Sidley,—

Not one word of the original complainants; not one of the men who had introduced the charge, and obtained the issue of the commission—

—Mr. Richard Graves Clark Sidley, the particulars of whose complaints appear in the records of the proceedings.

He goes on to say:

It is only necessary to remark that with one exception these charges were admittedly founded on hearsay or imperfect knowledge, and were not substantiated or indeed pressed by Mr. Sidley himself.

There is an exception, Mr. Speaker, and it is this:

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

The exception is with reference to certain charges made against Mr. Sidley, adjudicated upon by Mr. Spinks, as to which the undersigned thinks it sufficient to observe that as no reason was suggested why Mr. Spinks would be likely to act unjustly towards Mr. Sidley, while the procedure by summons instead of by warrant would seem to indicate the absence of any personal ill-feeling on the part of Mr. Spinks towards Mr. Sidley, and, as the latter admits that the evidence was such as would have justified his committal for trial, it does not appear in what way Mr. Spinks was guilty of any improper conduct in this regard; and that the confusion as to the dates of the proceedings, while not unnaturally difficult to be explained after the lapse of time, does not seem to be material in the admitted circumstances of the case.

That is the one serious question that remained to be discussed by the judge. It was never before the Department of Justice before the commission issued and this inquiry was instituted. It was something they fell back upon; but it was not sufficient to obtain the slightest endorsement from the commissioner. The Chief Justice goes on:

In view of the time when the matters complained of occurred, and the course adopted by the complainants who requested the issue of the commission, and, from the evidence given, it would appear that the complaints were instigated by some person or persons who preferred not to appear upon the proceedings.

I wonder if the judge is referring to the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo, or to the hon. member for New Westminster. He does not say directly by whom the proceedings were instigated. But he knew of these gentlemen; he knew of the interest they took in the proceedings at a certain stage; he knew they were connected with it; and so, without saying directly to whom he refers, I could understand the judge's annoyance. I could understand his contempt for gentlemen who had been so conspicuous in securing the retainer for Mr. Alexander Henderson to prosecute the charges, and who by that very interference, and the position they occupied as members of Parliament would, he supposed, have taken the pains to ascertain who were the parties who made the complaints and the principles on which the complaints were founded. I could understand his annoyance, if not some other feeling for these gentlemen. But this is his language:

That it would appear that the complaints were instigated by some person or persons who preferred not to appear on the proceedings. In this connection a written statement made by Mr. McCallum at the sitting at Midway was produced by Mr. Henderson at the New Westminster sitting, and offered in evidence by Mr. Wilson for Mr. Spinks.

This was the sort of evidence preferred by a counsel who was retained by the department, with particular instructions not to press charges unless he obtained the particulars on which to press them; and here is the judge saying that after all these other men have failed to appear, and after he had riddled the statement made as a sort of ulterior suggestion by Mr. Sidley, then the counsel whom these two gentlemen, members of Parliament, had brought into this case by the side door, produced a written statement made by Mr. McCallum, which was offered in evidence by Mr. Wilson for Mr. Spinks :

It was not admitted in evidence, not being strictly admissible. Its admission, however, would have been unfair to the person mentioned unless an opportunity were given him to deny or explain the statements made ; and the undersigned did not think it expedient to protract the investigation in the circumstances by holding another sitting merely for this purpose.

There is the condition of things : that a man comes and puts a statement, as it were, on the end of a stick, and pokes it in through the door, and the Government counsel hands this thing in, and the counsel for the judge, desiring that no technical resistance should be offered to any kind of evidence offered, asks to have the entire evidence brought before him, so that he can deal with it then and there. The judge has to interfere and do what the counsel of the Crown should have done—kicked this thing out in this contemptuous manner, and not permit the judge to give it the slightest attention when brought before him in that irregular and extraordinary manner. Consequently, this is the end of the story, so far as the commissioner is concerned. But there is a conclusion, so far as the taxpayers of this country are concerned. Every purpose, no matter on whose part, to ruin or injure this judge, had failed, and failed in the most extraordinary and complete manner. But this sort of thing cannot go on without some one paying for it. The complainants were not willing to pay a farthing : the members for Yale and Cariboo and New Westminster were not willing to risk a dollar or to show their noses in the tribunal as having any responsibility, pecuniary or otherwise. But you cannot push this sort of charges against the judges of the land without not only incurring merited condemnation for violating the very proper safeguards that have been provided for the judiciary of the country, but without taxing the people or charging it up to the people who have no direct knowledge of the matter whatever, and who never sanctioned the proceedings, directly or indirectly. And so, to gratify the spleen, the spite and the cowardly vindictiveness of the people who promoted and pressed the charges, the country has to pay, and the bill is not inconsiderable. It is larger than it would have been, had the members from Yale and Cariboo and New Westminster not interfered. Had they not interfered, it would have been one hundred pounds less, but that, of course, is a bagatelle to these gentlemen, especially when it is not they who have to pay. We find the present Minister of Justice compelled to report to His Excellency, on the 2nd January, 1898, that the commission had failed. After having been so urgent, after having used the telegraph wires, when the attack was first made on Judge Spinks in July, no action was taken with the inquiry until December, and then, in January, 1898, a report is made to Council, and that report is approved, and the minute shows what it was. The Minister observed that the commissioners report that, although ample opportunity was afforded, none of the charges were substantiated by the evidence, and the Minister recommended, therefore, that Judge Spinks be informed to that effect and that no further action be taken in the matter. Not even an apology, not even an expression of regret that a gentleman occupying a distinguished position had been harassed, and annoyed, and put to expense because of these three irresponsibles, and because of these two gentlemen who ought to be responsible, the two members of Parliament. Mr. Spinks is simply told that the commission has failed. Here we come to one of the reasons why the parliament of England and this country, and the parliaments of the old provinces, have always been so careful with regard to promoting or permitting to be proceeded with investigations or trials of judges, and that is the fact that, even though the charges failed, even though, as in this case, the complainants behaved in the most disgraceful, cowardly and shabby manner, even though the judge was exonerated in every particular, there is no provision by which the Government can pay his cost ; there is no authority for the payment to him of one farthing by the Treasury benches, or for indemnifying him to the extent of a dollar. There is no precedent, no matter how high a judge may be, even a judge of the highest court in England, that will authorize the treasury to pay him one farthing, when his character has been vindicated, although that character was attacked in the most formal manner possible. That is one of the reasons why the British and our parliaments have been so reluctant to press charges against the judges. The others, of course, are reasons of public interest, to prevent the passions of unsuccessful litigants being gratified by exercising their ingenuity, as they well could, if we allowed a door to be opened, for this sort of thing, to attack the judges time and time again. It is not in the interests of the judges, but in the interests of the public, in the interests of commerce, that all these precautions are observed and those steps insisted upon. Yet, in this case, none of these precautions were observed, none of these steps were followed, but there was a simple, reckless, pell-mell attack upon that judge at the start, then the most callous indifference on the part of the department that had gone so ferociously to work at the outset : then, the manipulations by members of Parliament in the interest of a member of the profession, and then the disgraceful farce and fiasco at the end, the collapse of the whole thing, after the judge had suffered for six months and been six months complaining that he was placed in such an unfortunate position by this crass delay, and then left poor in pocket—he, one of the officers of justice, not very well paid in any part of Canada, and, under all the circumstances, underpaid in the province of British Columbia—left poorer in pocket, because he had to fee his counsel, and pay his own expenses. He could not dip his hands into the public treasury and obtain money, for his counsel and witness fees and his own personal disbursements. There is the confession in the report of the Minister of Justice, and there is the statement that Judge Spinks will be informed of the result of the inquiry.

Then we come to that part which ought to be interesting to the taxpayers of the country, and the people who were directly or indirectly connected with this matter ought to be made to feel a sense of their responsibility. This is the report made on the 2nd of February :

The undersigned has the honour to recommend that authority be granted for the payment from the appropriation for miscellaneous justice—

A very proper term for the fund out of which to pay charges of this character.

—the undermentioned sums for fees and expenses incurred in connection with the recent commission of inquiry into the charges against Judge Spinks :

To Mr. Justice McColl, commissioner—

Expenses	$155 50
Fee, 13 days.....	130 00
Total.....	$285 50

To Oscar C. Bass, clerk and stenographer—

Expenses	$132 10
Total	$232 10

That is not all. The Government seem to have hesitated ; they did not, apparently, feel like informing His Excellency, on the 2nd February, what the fiasco had cost. They seemed to think it was advisable just to mention those expenses, and that Order in Council was obtained, but, on the 3rd February, they were induced to advise His Excellency as follows :—

The undersigned have the honour to recommend that authority be granted for the payment of a sum of $434.30 to Mr. Alexander Henderson, barrister, of New Westminster, for his fees and disbursements in prosecuting—

I ask you to mark the term.

—the charges against Judge Spinks in the recent commission, and that the amounts be charged against miscellaneous justice.

That amount was paid, and, consequently, there was this extraordinary expenditure in the case of a commission that absolutely failed to do anything else than expose the recklessness of the Government and the absence, to say the least, of any pretense to etiquette in dealing with the judge, and it simply showed that the Government, in this way, were able to gratify the desires of two gentlemen who supported them in this House.

Then, Mr. Sidley is not even censured. Mr. Sidley, who appears in the role, the description of which I have just read in the language of the commissioner, is in communication with the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock). Apparently, there was no way to make him pay the cost of bringing the attack which he failed to substantiate. There was no responsibility placed upon him. Notwithstanding the disgraceful ending of this disgraceful chapter, we find the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo is still bringing this gentleman's name to the attention of the Department of Justice, and asking for copies of public documents, and so on. Here is a letter which comes down in the return, addressed by Mr. R. G. Sidley to Mr. Hewitt Bostock, M.P. :

Sidley, B.C., Feb. 25, 1898.

Sir,—Owing to the contradictory rumours and reports current respecting the decision of the Minister of Justice re the Spinks commission, I would feel greatly obliged if you could send me a copy of that decision. Trusting I am not putting you to too much trouble.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) R. G. SIDLEY.

I have no doubt that his wishes were complied with, without that compliance being accompanied with any well-merited censure. There was a treasury report approved by the Governor in Council for the payment of the money to Mr. Henderson ; and the Minister of Justice writes on the 12th March :

Dear Mr. Bostock,—The report of the commission was that nothing was proven against Mr. Justice Spinks,—

A most unfair statement on the part of the Minister of Justice. We know that in this country we do not recognize the Scotch verdict, "not proven." Instead of saying that Judge Spinks had been cleared in every possible way and that his accusers did not venture to go into court to substantiate their charges, this is the way the Minister of Justice, to use a common expression, attempts to let down Mr. Sidley. That is not the language of his own report to the Governor General, in which greater care had to be taken. But it is the language of the letter of the 12th of March, that "nothing was proven."

—and, as you desire, I will see that communication of this fact is made to Mr. Sidley.

Great care was taken to keep in touch with Mr. Sidley, and further proof is given of the connection and the power behind the scenes that was working in this, I consider, most disgraceful manner. And so, accordingly, the department has to draw up a formal letter—not of censure—to Mr. Sidley.

It is dated the 14th March, and reads as follows:—

Your letter of the 25th February to Mr. H. Bostock, M.P., has been handed to the Minister of Justice, and I am directed to inform you that the report of the commission in the case of Judge Spinks was that nothing was proven against the said judge.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) E. L. NEWCOMBE,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

I say that is not a fair communication from the Department of Justice, that it does not do justice to Mr. Spinks, and does not show, as Judge McColl's report shows, that the result was much stronger in Mr. Spinks' favour than the Scotch verdict of "not proven." Now, before I put in your hands the resolution I desire to move, I will refer to one other observation in connection with this class of cases. This is from the same debate as I referred to in the afternoon, but I will bring home to those who did not hear the other authorities, that I am not putting the matter too high when I say in regard to the judges of the land, the judges of the superior courts and the judges of the county courts, there is, and very properly, a special course required when charges are made against them. And, Sir, Sir James Graham, to whom I referred before, said:

I feel strongly that it is due to the cause of justice itself to defend the judges of the land, unless we shall be satisfied that their conduct has been corrupt and their motives dishonest.

I call particular attention to that, which is the burden of my speech, the idea running through it from start to finish. But, in contrast to that very proper, healthy and sound principle which has obtained heretofore, you have this Government forced or induced against the principles in which they started out in this inquiry, so far as that feature is concerned, to prosecute these charges. It was impossible for any man in the department or any Minister to say he had satisfied himself that the charges were right, and therefore he would take the responsibility of prosecuting them. But, departing from that healthy principle, as I say, they were influenced to violate it in the most extraordinary manner and to appear as the prosecutors of these charges into which they had made no preliminary investigation whatever; in regard to which they had not even shown the usual courteous treatment of asking by correspondence what the judge had to say before intimating to him bluntly and by telegram, as they did, that the charges were so serious that they thought a commission should issue. Sir James Graham proceeds:

It is only fair to a judge, considering his eminent station, the great power with which he is entrusted, and the grave responsibility under which he acts, that the House should not adopt such a motion as this,—

—this was to inquire into the conduct of Lord Abinger—

—unless, in our deliberate judgment, we are satisfied that there has been manifested, on the part of the judge who is the object of it, a badness of heart and corrupt intention, which have contributed to the perversion of his judgment.

That is the rule which has never been departed from in England, and I challenge hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to show that it has ever been departed from in this country. This is the only case they can point to, and it is a disgrace to the Government that such a case should exist. Unless we take the extraordinary view of the hon. member for New Westminster, that one paragraph of the letter did contain a serious charge, you cannot find that such a charge was made. Nor can it be shown that the Government attempted to act within the rule and make a preliminary investigation. What course could they have taken? They might have sent to the judge a statement of the charges with a courteous request for such explanation as he could give. The result shows how necessary this was. But I would not base my argument upon the result. Even if the charges had been much stronger and if the case against the judge had been stronger, my position would have been the same, because I am attacking the procedure before the investigation took place. This case which struck the hon. member for New Westminster as serious, could have been disposed of without spending a dollar. If communication had been held with the Attorney General of the province, the officer charged with the prosecution of criminals, and his attention called to the fact that it had been stated that in criminal trials one of the judges charged with the duty of presiding over these trials was acting in such a manner as to cause grave injustice to prisoners and confusion in the business, is it not to be supposed that the Attorney General would have been able to shape largely the course of the Government in a matter like this. Supposing they did not wish, for any reasons to follow the ordinary course and ask the judge, they should have asked the gentleman who is responsible for seeing that justice is done in criminal cases. That is an important feature in this matter not to be lost sight of, that, not the Attorney General of Canada, but the Attorney General of British Columbia was the officer who had the supervision of the course of criminal justice in the county courts, including this, and the suggestions that these men made, reflect as much on the Attorney General of British Columbia as they do on Judge Spinks. If such things were happening and persons were being tried as this man said, though he gave no names of prisoners, though the prisoners had themselves never complained, it is clear the Attorney General was derelict in his duties. And yet no notice was sent to him, either before or after the commission issued, in case he should desire to vindicate himself, or the Crown officer who was charged by him in that particular district. So it was clear that had these ordinary and proper steps been taken the judge himself would have been saved the annoyance, worry and cost, and the community would have been saved the scandal, and the people of this country would have been saved the expense. Under these circumstances, I move :

That all the words after the word "That" be left out and the following added instead thereof :— "it appears by a return to an Address of the House of Commons, dated 18th April, 1898 :

"That on June 1st, 1897, a personal letter was written to the hon. the Minister of Justice from 'a Liberal and a friend,' stating that an investigation was necessary in the case of W. W. Spinks, judge of the County Court of Yale district, 'for the glaring atrocities and extreme favouritism' by the judge. That one James Kerr, J.P., of Green Wood, B.C., wrote to the hon. the Minister of Justice under date June 3rd, 1897, that respecting this judge he had 'heard many complaints.'"

That on the said date one Peter T. McCallum, J.P., wrote the said Minister that Judge Spinks "has not conducted himself as a gentleman holding the high office he does should : complaints have been made for that period, and are being made in reference to favouritism and partiality exhibited by Judge Spinks from the bench both in civil and criminal cases, where certain rings and cliques are interested—that the judge was late in appearing at places appointed for holding court ;" and Mr. McCallum wrote : "It is also charged against Judge Spinks that he violated his oath of office in allowing influence to be used upon him and acquitting guilty men," and again : "It is also an admitted fact that Judge Spinks is one of the members of the clique in Grand Forks who are owners of the town site, and members of the clique have been known to boast that no action could succeed against them while Judge Spinks sat on the bench."

And "from my own knowledge, Sir, I may say, that on one occasion, I say as one of the Board of License Commissioners for the district, when an application came before us by one of the members of the ring above mentioned, came before the board for a retail liquor license, the applicant was clearly not entitled to a license, and the board refused the application, an appeal was taken to Judge Spinks, and as the applicant belonged to this particular ring, of which Judge Spinks is an admitted member, he granted the license in the face of the license board's refusal."

That after information of the above character, on the 24th June, 1897, the hon. the Minister of Justice caused the following telegram to be sent to Judge Spinks :—"Serious charges preferred against you, in effect that you have been guilty of favouritism and partiality, and have allowed yourself to be unduly influenced in the administration of justice. That you were usually late in keeping judicial appointments, thereby causing delay and expense to suitors and prolonging the custody of persons committed upon criminal charges. The Minister considers these charges so grave as to call for an immediate commission of inquiry. Do you desire to make any reply before commission issues?"

That Judge Spinks replied to the above telegram by the following telegraphic message :—

That on 21st August, 1897, the Hon. Angus Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

McColl, then one of the puisne judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, was appointed a commissioner to inquire into and report upon the complaints aforesaid. That on the 4th day of September, 1897, the said commission of inquiry was received by the said Judge McColl, but without instructions of any kind. That on the 22nd September, 1897, Judge Spinks caused representations to be made to the Department of Justice complaining of the publication of the commission in the papers without action being taken, and it was asked : "is it quite fair to leave a judicial officer in this position?"

That not until the 12th October, 1897, was the communication of Mr. Justice McColl of 21st September replied to, when the Department of Justice forwarded copies of the letters of complaints aforesaid

That on the 10th December, 1897, Mr. Justice McColl sent the following telegraphic message to the Department of Justice :—

"Re Spinks : Commission opens at Vernon 15th instant. Am informed for complainants that they have not retained counsel and expect department will. Mr. Bostock also writes me this desirable. I think it most unfortunate in interest of justice if complainants not represented by counsel and suggest for your consideration Mr. Henderson's appointment."

That on the same day Mr. Auley Morrison telegraphed endorsing Mr. Henderson's retainer in the case.

That on the 13th December, 1897, Mr. Henderson was instructed by the Justice Department "to attend and prosecute charges for Department," and further "to see that no charges are prosecuted unless sufficient particulars are furnished."

That the commissioner reported on the 8th day of January, 1898, among other things : "The complaints being couched in general terms."

"None of the complainants acknowledged the receipt of the request for particulars of the charges made by them, nor did any of them appear to give evidence except Mr. Peter McCallum, who attended under a subpoena issued on behalf of Mr. Spinks."

"Of the three complainants, Mr. McCallum and Mr. Jas. Falconer admitted having no personal knowledge of the matters complained of, and Mr. Kerr, who resides at or near Midway, had, it appeared, left home a few days before the sitting there on a visit to Vernon."

"The only person who attended in support of any charge against Mr. Spinks was Mr. Richard Graves Sidley, the particulars of whose complaints appear in the record of the proceedings."

"It is only necessary to remark that with one exception these charges were admittedly founded on hearsay or imperfect knowledge and were not substantiated or, indeed, pressed by Mr. Sidley himself."

"The exception is with reference to certain charges made against Mr. Sidley, adjudicated upon by Mr. Spinks, as to which the undersigned thinks it sufficient to observe that, as no reason was suggested why Mr. Spinks would be likely to act unjustly towards Mr. Sidley, while the procedure by summons instead of warrant would seem to indicate the absence of any personal ill-feeling on the part of Mr. Spinks towards Mr. Sidley, and, as the latter admits that the evidence was such as would have justified his committal for trial, it does not appear in what way Mr. Spinks was guilty of any improper conduct in this regard and that the confusion as to the dates of the proceedings, while not unnaturally difficult to be explained after the lapse of time, does not seem to be material in the admitted circumstances of the case."

That on the 24th January, 1898, the Honourable the Minister of Justice reported to His Excellency that the Commissioner reports that although ample opportunity has been afforded none of the charges have been substantiated by evidence.

That the following expenses have been paid out of the public funds in connection with the foregoing:—

Resolved, That no charges against a Judge of the County Court, except such as those upon allegation of misconduct that would be sufficient, if proved, to justify his removal from the Bench, should be entertained by the Government.

That before providing for a Commission of Inquiry into charges of misconduct on the part of a Judge of the County Court, it is the duty of the Government to secure full and complete particulars of the same, and to submit them to the judge for his consideration and reply.

And this House is further of opinion that the action taken by the Government in the premises was ill-considered and injurious to the position, usefulness and dignity of the judiciary—and involved a scandalous waste of public funds."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Mr. Speaker, I have at the outset to acknowledge the courtesy of my hon. and learned friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who was good enough, some days ago, to communicate to me a copy of his resolution. He also was good enough to say that he would take the first opportunity of bringing this resolution before the House. I am sorry that I cannot congratulate him on the speech that he has just delivered. He has certainly not been parsimonious in the use of his adjectives and he has not hesitated to characterize the conduct of all those who have had any connection with this matter, in language which, if I may be permitted to say so, was much more forcible than polite. He spoke of the spleen, the spite, and the cowardly malice of the complainants; he characterized the telegram sent by the Deputy Minister of Justice under the responsibility of the then Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat) as a brutal production. He then went on to speak of the underhand work done by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) and the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock), and finally he did not hesitate, by innuendo and insinuation, to attack even the Chief Justice of British Columbia. What does all this mean? With some of the things that my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) said there is no desire on this side of the House to find any fault. When he talks to us of the necessity of surrounding our judges, in the administration of justice, with those safeguards which will ensure them against attacks either of political partisans or of persons who bear them malice, I am sure that no one disagrees with him. When he speaks of the necessity of removing judges from the controlling influence of political partisans, I am sure that he also awakened a responsive chord. Perhaps, I may add to what he has said that, while judges should be free from the attacks of political partisans, there is another principle which is no less sacred, and it is that judges should also keep themselves free, as far as possible, from the influence of politicians. I think there is no axiom more accepted than that which says that a judge, when he goes upon the bench, should cut himself clear from all connection with either of the political parties, and that there is nothing more detrimental to the proper administration of justice than that judges, after going on the bench, should enter into bargains with politicians and say that at a given time they will come down from the bench and enter into the political arena. I will take occasion to deal with that matter later on before the end of this session. Let us now deal with the matter in hand. I say that while it is important that judges should be protected against improper attacks which may have the effect of causing them personal inconvenience, and also to diminish their capacity to render service to the litigants, we must bear this in mind that where judges, as in the present case, are far removed from these controlling influences which operate in large centres, where public opinion is active, where there are newspapers and where they are not under the control and observation of the bar—where they are far removed from these controlling influences, it is important that the Department of Justice should exercise even greater care and closer supervision than over the administration of justice in these centres. In this case the judge was living in British Columbia. It is important for the administration of justice that the source of justice should be pure; it is no less important that those who are obliged to drink at the waters of justice should feel that they flow from a pure source. It is no less important that the judges should be pure and free from all corrupting influences than that those who go before them should feel that they are pure and free from these corrupting influences. As a result of this inquiry Judge Spinks had been benefited, because there can be no doubt, that previous to this investigation, rumours had circulated all through the district in which he administered justice, that influences were at work which would have destroyed his capacity for usefulness and the influence that he ought to exercise in the vicinity among those who are litigants before him. Let me proceed to demonstrate what I have said. Here I ought to say that, as a result of this investigation, Judge Spinks comes out of this ordeal free from any suggestion of wrongdoing, and I am delighted to be able to bear him this testimony, at the present time. On the 3rd of June, Mr. Kerr, justice of the peace, writes to the department in the terms communicated to the House by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). On the same day that Mr. Kerr writes from Greenwood, B.C., from Grand Forks, from another quarter of the same district, another gentleman connected with the administration of justice, a justice of the peace, Mr. McCallum, writes in the terms that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), communicated to the House. Then my hon. friend was good enough to refer to Mr. Faulkner, who happened to be Deputy Supreme Chief Ranger of the Ancient Order of Foresters, from Victoria, who was on an official visit to this locality. Then, again, you have Mr. Sidley, another magistrate, called upon to administer justice in this district. You have these three magistrates communicating with the Department of Justice and making charges against this county court judge. I do not intend to weary the House by going into the details. My hon. friend has communicated some of the letters almost in their entirety, but he was not very fair when he dealt with my hon. friend from Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock), and when he suppressed the portion of a letter written by Judge McColl.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is included in my resolution.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The portions that could not be of any use to my hon. friend were suppressed by him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must clearly overlook the fact that my resolution contains a portion of the letter which I did not read in my argument. If so this is an admission that there is no suppression.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, Sir, there is a suppression. When the hon. gentleman made his argument he deliberately read the first sentences from Judge McColl's letter and suppressed all that part of it which followed immediately afterwards. We have these three letters coming from these three gentlemen, these three magistrates who, in a minor role, it is true, form part of the administration of justice in that locality. They communicated these charges to the Department of Justice. These charges were corroborated by Mr. Faulkner, a gentleman who occupied an important position, a gentleman against whose character I have never heard anything said. The hon. gentleman has not hesitated to assail these three gentlemen, to talk about spleen and spite and cowardly malice, but I have not heard him apply these words to this particular person. What has he done, so far as Mr. Faulkner is concerned? All that he has done is to read a line in a letter where Mr. Faulkner says that he is a Liberal and a friend of the Government. I am not aware that the fact of a man being a Liberal and a friend of the Government precludes him from writing a complaint against an officer under the control of the Government, because a judge is under the control of the Government; I am not aware that because a man is a Liberal and a friend of the Government he is precluded from writing a complaint against an improper interference in the administration of justice. Up to the present time I have been under the belief, that it is because a man is a Liberal that he wishes to have the administration of justice free and pure from the controlling influences of party politicians.

Then a telegram is sent to this gentleman, and this telegram was characterized by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) as a brutal telegram. It was a telegram sent by Mr. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, of course with the sanction and under the control of the department. There is no desire whatever to separate the department from Mr. Newcombe in this matter; on the contrary, the full responsibility for all that is done is assumed, in so far as the Department of Justice is concerned. But what occurred? After these charges were made, on the 24th of June, this telegram was sent:

Serious charges preferred against you, in effect that you have been guilty of favouritism and partiality, and have allowed yourself to be unduly influenced in the administration of justice. That you are usually late in keeping judicial appointments, thereby causing delay and expense to suitors and prolonging the custody of persons committed upon criminal charges. The Minister considers these charges so grave as to call for an immediate commission of inquiry. Do you desire to make any reply before commission issues?

Immediately these papers reached the office, this telegram was sent to the judge. Now, was it true that the judge was charged, in effect, with having been guilty of favouritism and partiality? Can any one who has listened to the letter read by my hon. friend, coming from McCallum, doubt the truth of that? Was it true that he was charged with having allowed himself to be unduly influenced in the administration of justice? Can there be any doubt that such charge was made? Was it true that he was charged with being unusually late in keeping judicial appointments? No doubt about it. The department does not say to this gentleman: These things are true. They simply say: You are charged with these things, and they ask him, if he has any reply to make to these charges before a commission issues. Now, what did Mr. Spinks do?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the Solicitor General going to pass that over without referring to the point which I particularly made, viz., that, before asking Mr. Spinks what he had to say, the expression of opinion of the Minister of Justice was, that a commission should issue?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Of course, the charges as made and answered, ought to be investigated, undoubtedly. The Minister of Justice said: I am of opinion, on the prima facie evidence before me, that a commission should issue, but I want you to say, if you have anything to answer to that. If the Minister of Justice did not want to be guided to some extent by the answer of the judge, why communicate this message to him at all? Now, I shall not attempt to lecture, not an older man than myself, but an older parliamentarian than I am, upon the expressions he should use in this House, but I think the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was rather severe in his remarks. After all, a telegram sent by Mr. Newcombe, on the responsibility of Sir Oliver Mowat, who has had some experience in the administration of justice, who had been a judge himself, who occupied the position of Attorney General of Ontario for many years—a telegram written by Sir Oliver Mowat, it seems to me, ought not be characterized as a brutal telegram. I think it was deserving of a more parliamentary expression than my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) used. I would draw the attention of the House and the country to this fact, that Sir Oliver Mowat, with the record and reputation that he has in this country, having this evidence before him, came to the conclusion that there ought be an inquiry. Against Sir Oliver Mowat's opinion we have the opinion of my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper); and, if these two opinions remained alone, it would be for this House and the country to choose between them—I think the choice would soon be made. More than that, you have the two letters upon which the opinion was given, and I say these letters justify to the fullest the telegram that was sent on that date, and every expression that was used in that telegram. But what occurred after the telegram was sent to this gentleman, and he is asked to say what answer he could give to the charges contained in the letter. The answer is very prompt, and I say here at once, it does credit to the manliness of Judge Spinks, who wrote it. He does not say: I want to rebut this evidence communicated to you by letters; but he says: Bring on the investigation. Here is the telegram:

Telegram just received. The more full and speedy inquiry the better. Would suggest inquiry be made at place where complaint made.

Now, in justice not only to the complainant, but in justice to the judge himself, what did the Government do under these circumstances? In justice to the judge, until these charges were withdrawn, a commission ought to have been issued, so as to give him an opportunity to do what he did, namely, to prove that there was no foundation for the charges in question. What was the Government to do, in view of that telegram? I repeat, that the only course left open to the Government was to grant the request of the judge, for a full and complete inquiry, so that the public at large would be satisfied that, in the administration of justice, he had comported himself as an honest judge. That telegram was followed by a letter, on June 26th) 1897, in which the judge says:

I received your telegram informing me that a commission is about to issue to inquire into certain charges laid against me, to-day. I must ask that a stenographer be employed and a verbatim report made of the whole proceedings. It is necessary that I should mention this as I know of none in this district, and one will have to be sent from the coast.

Of course, that request was complied with, and, when the commission did issue, a stenographer was appointed at the judge's request, because it was only fair he should have a verbatim report of the evidence that was adduced against him before this commission. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) says there was delay. And what was the delay? Between the time this telegram was sent and the appointment of a commission, there was a delay of a month or two, and, after that delay, his appointment was communicated to Judge McColl. He was then on the point of starting on circuit, and he said at the time the commission was received, that he would be absent for several weeks. He did start, and he was absent for several weeks, and that was the prime cause of the delay after the commission was issued. I do not wish to permit this matter to be mixed up with the skilful advocate who has put the case before the House; I do not want the House to allow the kernel of this question to be hid in a mass of words. The whole question comes down to this. Three persons connected with the administration of justice, justices of the peace in British Columbia—not justices of the peace appointed by this Government, but appointed by the Government of British Columbia—complained to the department of the manner of administering justice by Judge Spinks. The gist of that complaint was communicated to the judge, and he asked for an inquiry. The inquiry was granted, and that is all there is about it up to that point. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) proceeds to lay the foundation of a charge against my hon. friends from Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock) and from New Westminster (Mr. Morrison). He says they appeared suddenly on the scene, and he proceeds to describe what he calls their underhand work. He says: The fine Italian hand from my hon. friend from Yale and Cariboo appeared in a telegram of the 10th December sent by Mr. Justice McColl. I am quite sure my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) never intended to attribute to the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock) any such charge as the language he used would indicate. I am sure my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) never meant to say, that the hon. member (Mr. Bostock) acted in an underhand way, or that he is the sort of man who would be afraid to stand by any accusation he thought well founded. I am quite certain, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a man in this House, whatever his opinions may be in politics, who would for one moment think that the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Bostock) would make a statement that he did not think to be true and founded upon fact.

I am certain that, having made the statement, he would back it up against any and all comers. Now, how does my hon. friend for Yale and Cariboo appear in this matter? This court was in the limits of his electoral district. If his constituents complain of the improper administration of justice or of improper conduct on the part of Mr. Justice Spinks, and desire their complaint to be heard by the Department of Justice at Ottawa, to whom should they go to give expression to their complaints and to have access to the Department of Justice at Ottawa if not to their representative, whom they have sent here for the purpose of expressing their grievances and making known their wants? They went to the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo, and what does he do? This is where the attack is made on Judge McColl by insinuation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not insinuate anything against Judge McColl. I questioned the propriety of his hearing the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo, or any one else who had not a locus stand, and I argued that contention. I insinuated nothing, but said everything I wished to say.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman questioned the locus standi of the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In a judicial investigation.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In a judicial investigation. I think he must have gone further and insinuated impropriety in the conduct of the judge in hearing him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I insinuated nothing. I questioned the conduct of the commissioner. I said he should not have heard the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, and I withdraw the word insinuate. I say that he charged the judge with having been improperly influenced by the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo; but where is this improper influence? The hon. member for Yale and Cariboo had the audacity to suggest to the judge that he entertained the idea that in a matter of this sort, where the purpose was to ascertain whether a judge had been derelict in his duty, the complainants would be represented by counsel, which counsel he expected would be paid by the department. There may be some doubt as to whether it was proper for the complainants to be represented by counsel paid by the department. There can be no doubt about their right to be represented by counsel at their own expense. What my hon. friend from Yale and Cariboo did was to suggest that they might be paid by the department. What is there improper in the fact that my hon. friend volunteered a suggestion to the judge that counsel should be retained? What does the judge himself think about it? And here I deal with that portion of the judge's letter which my hon. friend did not read. On the 13th of December, 1897, the day he sent the telegram, the judge wrote this letter to Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister of Justice:

I have the honour to explain, with reference to my telegram to you of the 10th instant, and your reply of this date, that I was under the impression, until just before I sent the telegram, that counsel would be instructed to appear for some of the complainants; but I then learned that it was assumed by them, as it had been by Mr. Bostock, M.P., that the department would instruct counsel to appear.

I was aware that in some instances, as for example the British Columbia Penitentiary inquiry, that counsel were instructed to appear for the department, and, feeling that dissatisfaction would be felt, and probably expressed strongly in the locality from which the complaints were made, and probably in other quarters as well, if no counsel should appear on instructions from the department, and also that the investigation could hardly proceed satisfactorily if no counsel were to appear for the complainants, because of the inevitable offering in such case of evidence not admissible, with the result that to persons unacquainted with the rules of evidence the investigation would appear not to be thorough, and so that the interests of justice might be prejudiced instead of furthered in such circumstances by the proceedings under the commission, I thought it my duty to suggest for your consideration the instruction of Mr. Henderson to appear.

The judge tells you that it is because he thinks it necessary in the interest of justice, that he asks that Mr. Henderson be instructed to appear; and it is because of this request made by the judge, with which the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo had the connection, and for which he had the responsibility, as mentioned in this letter, that my hon. friend is charged with underhand interference in this matter, and that an attempt is made to create the impression, both in this House and out of it, and especially in the mind of the judge, that probably the secret inspirer of this whole attack on the judge was my hon. friend from Yale and Cariboo. That was clearly the intention, and that must have been the only object the hon. gentleman had in view when he made this attack upon my hon. friend. The whole foundation for the attack made on my hon. friend from Yale and Cariboo was that he suggested the name of Mr. Henderson, and the propriety of employing him as counsel in this matter. On that same point, the judge reported to the department :

It having come to the knowledge of the undersigned that no counsel had been instructed by the complainants to appear for them, that it was commonly supposed that counsel would be instructed by the Department of Justice, and that it might be inconvenient to them to attend at Vernon ; and believing it essential as regards the administration of justice, the commission having issued, not merely that every reasonable opportunity and facility should be afforded to all parties desiring to give evidence to do so to the best advantage, but also that the proceedings should be conducted in such a manner as that no impression to the contrary on the part of the public might arise, the undersigned deemed it to be his duty, in the circumstances, to suggest to the Deputy Minister of Justice the question of the expediency of instructing counsel to appear upon the inquiry, in consequence of which Mr. Henderson attended the proceedings.

So the judge from the outset assumes the entire responsibility for the appointment of Mr. Henderson and for having suggested his name to the Department of Justice. Now, in what respect does the name of my hon. friend from New Westminster come into this matter ? He comes in because he had the audacity, when the question of the counsel to be appointed came up, to suggest that if counsel were to be appointed, the person to be appointed should be the man who was employed as agent for the Department of Justice in that locality. That is the whole extent to which my hon. friend from New Westminster appeared in this matter, and that is the sole fact on which the hon. gentleman based the whole of his attack upon my hon. friend. Now, it seems to me that it is not necessary to take up the time of the House at any further length on this matter. The charges were made by men against whose character my hon. friend could not find anything better to say than that they were actuated by spleen and contemptible malice. They were made by men who were themselves part and parcel of the administration of justice in the district ; upon these charges the judge demanded an inquiry. Convinced as we were that the fountain of justice should be pure, the investigation was ordered ; and I say that the money spent on that investigation was well spent, in the interest of the administration of justice, and in the interest of the judge himself.

It is well spent, because now the idle rumours circulated in that locality have been set at rest and we are satisfied now that he does his duty. Perhaps he does it a little better now than he did before, though I know nothing about that, and every right minded man must be satisfied he is a fair, honest, pure-minded judge, and to have established that fact in that locality, where it is important everybody should be satisfied with the administration of justice, is to have established something for the proving of what the money was well spent. And to-morrow we would be prepared to spend the same money again in order to accomplish the same result.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). I have always understood that it is a principle of British law and fair-play that when a man is found innocent, the charge against him must for ever after be dropped ; but to-night it seems to me the hon. Solicitor General set at naught that axiom of British justice, and again resurrected these rumours, as he termed them, with reference to Judge Spinks. At the outset of his remarks, he undertook to lecture my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) on what he termed his impropriety in casting innuendoes at one of the judges in the person of Mr. Justice McColl ; and in the next breath he declared that to-day political trafficking was going on with one of the judges of this Dominion in order to induce him to come down from his high place and enter the political ranks, which, by inference, we must presume to be the ranks of hon. gentlemen on this side. Why, to my mind, that was a gross insult to the judiciary. The hon. gentleman further said that he intends to bring this up at a later day in the House. It would be much more manly on his part and much more fair on his part to the judiciary of this country, that he should at once name the judge he has in his mind ; but I will be bound to say that before the session closes, he will be mute and inglorious with reference to the judge to whom he alleges overtures have been made to induce him to leave his position. However, the slander has gone forth, and every judge bears the brand of the suspicion cast by the hon. gentleman who has not dared to particularize the one to whom he alludes. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he refers to one of the judges in the province of Ontario, because if so all sense of propriety will be shocked in that province, where the judges are from time to time called on to administer the law in election trials, and I am glad to say that, after some revelations we had the other day, there is some work of that kind to be done. Will he state frankly whether it is a judge of the Superior Court of Ontario to whom he alludes, because if so I can only say that all public confidence will be shaken in any of the judges who may preside at any of the trials soon to take place in that province, since the word has gone forth from the Solicitor General that one of those judges, whom he has not had the manliness to name, may be persuaded to leave his position, and presumably cast in his political lot with hon. gentlemen on this side. The hon. gentleman should surely refrain from charging my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) with cowardice. That charge should at least not come from one who has cast this insinuation against one of the superior judges, without venturing to mention the name.

What has been the whole defence of the Solicitor General. From first to last it has been this, that if you bring under the notice of this Government the slightest scintilla or flavour of a charge against a judge, it then becomes the bounden duty of the Department of Justice to inquire into his conduct. Why, surely the hon. Solicitor General was in the House last session, and must have heard certain charges made here against one of the judges. During that session, there was a debate over the payment of certain moneys to certain parties in connection with an election in the riding of North Ontario, and the hon. member for North Victoria charged Judge Dartnell, of the county of Ontario, in the following words:—

We have a summing up of the ballots by a favoured judge, Mr. Dartnell, a gentleman who, I say, and I say it advisedly—for I know whereof I speak—in a certain sense, was at the mercy of the Liberal party, or conceived himself to be at the mercy of the Liberal party.

Here the Solicitor General sat and the hon. gentlemen associated with him, and heard that the judge who had presided in the recount had unfairly and improperly and indecently acted, and yet this Government never saw fit to make any inquiry at all into his conduct. But on the mere rumour of a justice of the peace—and God help the justices of the peace in British Columbia if they are not any better than are those in the province of Ontario as a rule—the hon. gentleman proceeds to hold an investigation. The whole question sums itself up into this—not so much whether the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock) or the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) acted rightly in this matter, as whether or not the Minister of Justice was not altogether to blame; and, speaking for myself, I think that the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was rather harsh on both of these hon. gentlemen. First and foremost, they had precedent for everything they did. The hon. member for Yale and Cariboo was quite justified in interviewing the judge before the trial, because the principle was laid down last session that it was a proper thing to go before a judge before whom the trial took place and interview him in advance of the trial, since in that same debate the hon. member for North Victoria stated that Mr. Osler had called on Mr. Justice Robertson on Sunday, and did so influence him that when an application for a recount was made the next morning it required considerable time and argument to remove from the mind of the judge the prejudice which had been cast into it by Mr. Osler. There should, therefore, be no complaint against the hon. member for Yale, who is a layman, for having interviewed the judge.

Mr. BENNETT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He is a barrister.

Mr. BENNETT. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I did not know he was a barrister. But here was a precedent laid down in that case, that Mr. B. B. Osler acted properly in interviewing Judge Robertson in advance with regard to this recount in the county of Ontario, because no inquiry was held in that case, and it was considered quite proper to go and see the judges in advance and fortify him with arguments before the other side approached him. Then, these hon. gentlemen were justified also in this respect, that they came from the province of British Columbia, where there was a certain grasping and greed for everything in sight; and when they asked that one of their professional brethren should be liberally paid at the expense of the Dominion, they were only asking what they thought the surroundings justified them in demanding, namely, a little share of the public plunder.

As to the idea of dispossessing the judge altogether of his position, one can easily understand how any hon. gentleman, who has had a seat in this House a couple of sessions, should have had it in his mind that it was perfectly right, where you had a political opponent occupying a position and a friend who required it, to unhorse the political opponent by all means and obtain the position for his friend. I say, therefore, that those hon. gentlemen had precedents for everything they did in order to dispossess the judge of his position and give to a party friend a lucrative retaining fee.

But there is another phase of the question, which the hon. Solicitor General overlooked and which the hon. member for Pictou did not recall, and that is this fact. These hon. gentlemen were both here when the hon. Minister of Justice telegraphed to Judge Spinks, because the House did not rise until the 29th June. Now, these reports were not reports of a day or week, but, according to the statements that are in this return, I will be bound to say—and neither hon. gentleman will contradict me—that long before they came to this House in the session of 1897 they had heard some of the complaints against Judge Spinks, whether these complaints were true or not.

Now, there was a manly course for either of these hon. gentlemen to pursue. I have no doubt they had both been in consultation with the Minister of Justice, as they were here until the 29th June, when the session closed, and this telegram was sent on the 23rd June. Instead of bringing the matter up in this House they permit it to be taken up in the irregular manner we see. It should be borne in mind that this House did not rise until the 29th June, and these hon. gentlemen must have been there. In his defence the Solicitor General drags in the name of

Mr. Newcombe—it may be to impress upon his followers the idea that Mr. Newcombe, the deputy, was the man to blame. However, he says the Department of Justice recognize their responsibility in the matter. The complaint against the department is in this resolution :

That the action taken by the Government in the premises is without precedent and injurious to the position, usefulness and dignity of the judiciary, and involves a scandalous waste of public funds.

Let us take the facts of the case. These gentlemen interested themselves in the matter. First, the hon. member for Yale interviewed the commissioner personally to suggest the propriety of having prosecuting counsel, and the hon. member for New Westminster suggested the name of such a counsel. Both of these gentlemen were here in the city of Ottawa on the 29th of June, and yet this telegram is sent to the accused on the 23rd of June. The Solicitor General says he has no fault to find with the telegram. I have always understood that a telegram was rather a public way of imparting any information. Besides, in view of the fact that the investigation never went on until the month of December, nearly six months afterwards, what was the justification for this indecent haste to have it flashed over the wires that this judge had been charged "with favouritism, with partiality, both in civil and criminal cases were certain rings and cliques were interested? Surely the Solicitor General will not stand up and say, in view of the fact that the whole investigation was trifling or related to matters so unimportant that nearly six months elapsed before they were inquired into, that there was a necessity to have the charge made on that particular day. I rather incline to the opinion that the hon. member for Yale and the hon. member for New Westminster, being in Ottawa when the telegram was sent, must have pressed their very strongest upon the Minister of Justice that Mr. Justice Spinks must not have his case inquired into in the usual way, must not be given a fair and ordinary and decent—yes, that is the word—a decent notice, but in their haste and importunity they insist on this telegram being sent. What was the result? A most manly reply on the part of the judge. He asked to be brought face to face with his accusers. I am not going over one word of what has been said by the hon. member for Pictou, but I endorse every word of what he has said as to the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Yale. They had taken upon themselves the responsibility of this inquiry. I will not say that they had instigated it, as I am not aware whether they did or not. But I say that it is without the bounds of possibility to believe that they had never heard this complaint until later when they made the suggestion as to the retaining of counsel.

I believe that both these hon. gentlemen were aware, being at Ottawa at the time the telegram was sent that it was about to be sent. Well, what follows? The flimsy nature of the whole case is apparent on the face of the record, as cited here this afternoon. Neither of these hon. gentlemen took part in it or backed it up. The magistrates or justices of the peace who had made the charges did not even appear. And one of the most notable facts is that there would not have been a witness at all had there not been one subpoenaed by the accused. The whole case on the face of it shows that there must have been a most importunate pleading on the part of some hungry supporter for a position and an anxious desire on the part of these gentlemen to see that a party friend was fed; and there must have been a great longing on the part of parties interested in the removal of Mr. Justice Spinks. A thousand dollars was spent, and the judge has had his character amply vindicated, though the Solicitor General revives the story of rumours. Though the man has been tried, though he has been persecuted—I will not say prosecuted—though the funds of the department have been placed at the disposal of the parties who prosecuted, still the rumour must be revived of wrong-doing on the part of this judge. It is a wonderful thing to me how hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes jump at rumours. They have heard rumours and more than rumours in the case of the Yukon. But they have held no investigation. They heard more than rumours in the case of Judge Dartnell, for an hon. member charged on the floor of this House that the judge had acted unfairly and indefensibly in the matter of the return of a member of this House. And yet there is no investigation. We find that justice—and I speak more particularly of my own county of Simcoe—justice and law have become nothing short of matters of politics. Why, the county attorney, the sheriffs and the authorities concerned in the administration of justice do exactly as they did the other day in the county of Elgin, where there was a serious charge in the case of the West Elgin provincial election; and when a man named Bole was charged with being one of a party of conspirators in the matter of stuffing the ballot-boxes, and so on, to the surprise of everybody who hoped to see something like decency in the administration of justice here, the county attorney, who is paid to see to the administration of the law, appeared to defend the accused. And what did we see in the county of Ontario? With all the hideous disclosures made in the trial which resulted in unseating Mr. John Dryden the other day, when there should be a prosecution, a proper prosecution of a gang of scoundrels there, the Department of the Attorney General of Ontario are laughing in their sleeve at the whole matter. And there was a case in which I was concerned as counsel, a case that arose simply out of politics in the county of Simcoe. A magistrate there was bold enough and brave enough to stand to his guns in the matter of bearing a case, notwithstanding that a gang of magistrates were brought from 15 to 20 miles away to endeavour to pack the court and force him out of giving his decision. What was done in that case by the Premier of Ontario? When the committal and the enforcement of a fine was to be brought about, the Premier and Attorney General of the province writes to the magistrate who had made the conviction that he had better be very careful what he was doing, because a complaint had been made to him. And when the magistrate went down to the city of Toronto and demanded an audience with the Attorney General, Mr. Hardy, and to demand a full and thorough inquiry into the case, what was the result? Why, the inquiry was refused. When we demanded that an inquiry should be made in the case of the magistrates who had been brought there 17 or 20 miles around to pack the bench, the result was that no inquiry could be had and no inquiry has been had up to this date in that case. But thank goodness! there are courts of appeal in the province of Ontario, and when these people appealed from the decision given by the convicting magistrate, there was a decision by Chief Justice Armour, and I cannot do better than quote his remarks in the full Court of Queen's Bench, upholding the decision of the magistrate against the decision of the county attorney, backed as it was by the Attorney General of the province, Mr. Hardy. Mr. Justice Armour gave the decision of the court in these words: in the case of Regina vs. McRae:

It is not to be tolerated that the accused should bring with him, when he comes up for trial, partisan justices who insist upon his acquittal. Look at the consequences. Suppose a man were charged with murder, and brought before a magistrate, he might, no matter what the evidence, be discharged upon the preliminary hearing, by packing the bench with friendly justices. All the justices in each county are equal in authority, but, as it would be contrary to the public interest as well as indecent that there should be a contest between different justices, we must lay down the rule that when a party charged comes or is brought before a magistrate in obedience to a summons or warrant, no other magistrate should interfere in the investigation of or adjudication upon the charge, except at his request.

And if we had not in the province of Ontario courts of review, justice and right would have been set at defiance, and everything would have been made subordinate to party ends. The Solicitor General has made no defence of this case, to my mind. He has not shown that there was a bona fide case made out against this judge before the investigation was started; he has not shown that it was the duty of the Crown to retain counsel and prosecute this case. Why, the Solicitor General must have amused himself, as well as the House when he instituted a parallel between this and the case of an inquiry into a penitentiary official. The cases are altogether on a different footing, there is no analogy between them. The whole case has proceeded from this: Some person wished the position that Judge Spinks had; who that was, I suppose the locality well knows. A Liberal solicitor wished to have a fee, under the principle laid down, I suppose, in the alleged election frauds in Manitoba, and when he saw the relatives of the Minister getting a part of the public funds, he thought he should have a portion too. But the fact must remain before the public that the Department of Justice went out of their way in order to prosecute this case against Mr. Justice Spinks, and that the department have utterly failed and must utterly fail to justify the action they took in this case against this judge. It ill-becomes the Solicitor General here to-night to attempt to brag over the member for Pictou in reference to innuendoes made against this judge. The case has been fairly and honourably treated by my hon. friend. In referring to the judges, I have this to say, that, the other day, in the course of a certain debate, I referred to the fact that it was impolitic to introduce judges into the party arena at all, and because I mentioned a case in the province of Ontario without referring to the name of the judge, the Premier saw fit to resent what I had said.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order, the hon. gentleman must not wander from the subject of debate.

Mr. BENNETT. However, I will only say that I entirely coincide with what the Solicitor General has said that the judiciary should be above suspicion, that the judiciary should not be made cheap in this country: and if we are going to make the judiciary cheap in this country, no better way can be taken than has been taken in the present case of bringing alleged charges in here on the floor of the House. Both the hon. members for Yale and Cariboo and New Westminster had an opportunity of doing so before the 29th of June, 1897, when the House rose, when the matter could have been vindicated fairly and above board, rather than that the procedure followed in this case.

Mr. AULAY MORRISON (New Westminster). If any evidence were wanted of the crass ignorance of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat in respect to a matter with which he should be very familiar, it is only necessary to recall the remark with which he concluded his speech. Now, let me state very briefly my own connection with this matter. In doing so, I wish to deny categorically the statements and insinuations made both by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). I may tell the hon. member for East Simcoe that he could have ascertained, if he had taken the trouble to ask me, that I knew absolutely nothing about the telegram at the time it was sent, or before, nor anything about the subject matter of that telegram. If my recollection serves me right, the information concerning the charges against Judge Spinks came to me from the Pacific coast. Not knowing that this matter would come up in this shape at the present time, I have not provided myself with the details; but I am certain that it was incidentally that I ascertained that my friend Judge Spinks was being charged by somebody with doing something which he should not have done in his position as a judge. I went down to the Department of Justice and interviewed Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister, and found out from him that these letters had been received by the department, and that he had sent a telegram, which telegram I read, and which letters I read. Up to that time I had no knowledge of the contents of those letters, had no knowledge that a telegram had been sent, or what its contents were. I think that is about the date that the House prorogued, or a few days before, because I intended sending a wire to Judge Spinks to meet me at Sicamous, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, near his place, in order that I might have a conversation with him. I felt very much perturbed at hearing that these letters had been written about him, because he was a very particular friend of mine. Judge Spinks is not a judge of the county in which I live; he is farther removed from where I practise my profession than the county of East Simcoe is from the city of Ottawa. He is away up in the Kootenay district, and I live down at the mouth of the Fraser River. He lived entirely beyond my county, so that anything which Judge Spinks might do in his own jurisdiction was no concern of mine, otherwise than his being a friend of mine, and I would be interested in knowing what action had been taken for or against him. Mr. Justice McColl, Chief Justice of the province, was appointed a commissioner to investigate the charges against Judge Spinks. Again, if my memory serves me right, the suggestion of having counsel brought in in the way in which Mr. Henderson was brought in originated with Mr. Justice McColl. At any rate, I found out that it was decided to have counsel brought in, and from my own experience of commissions emanating from the Department of Justice, I knew that the representatives of the Minister of Justice in the province of British Columbia invariably appeared before those investigations. I had in my mind the investigation into the case of Mr. Fitzsimmons, deputy warden of the penitentiary at New Westminster, at which I appeared as counsel for Mr. Fitzsimmons. During the long course of that investigation, Mr. Charles Wilson, Q.C., of Vancouver, the then representative of the Minister of Justice, appeared in that investigation assisting the sitting judge, Mr. Justice Drake. Doing his duty, as he always does, he felt it incumbent upon him to see that all the evidence was produced, as well for as against Mr. Fitzsimmons, as was done, I believe, in this present instance.

Knowing that a counsel was about to be appointed to watch this case, and thinking that, probably, the department might select the agent of the department in Victoria, when there would be no necessity for overlooking the agent of the department on the mainland, I suggested that Mr. Henderson be chosen, and he was selected. Mr. Henderson is a gentleman of high standing at the bar in British Columbia, and I do not think, for one moment, that the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) would undertake to assail him or to impute improper motives to him. He has had the bad taste to make the most unprofessional statements and to impute the most improper motives in regard to Mr. Henderson's connection with this case. I resent the imputation of wrongful motives to myself in having sent that telegram, as well as the tone of voice in which the hon. member for Pictou read that telegram, in which I said: "I recommend Alexander Henderson, Q.C., New Westminster, as counsel in this case." The way in which he wound up that telegram reminded me of the famous Sergeant Buz-fuz: "Chops and tomato sauce! Gracious Heavens, is the virtue of an unprotected widow to be trifled away by artifices of this sort?" This was what he based his tremendous fabric upon. I say, it is unworthy of any gentleman who has a position on the floor of this House, or at the bar, or any place where decent conduct is expected, to make the insinuations and cowardly innuendoes that the hon. gentleman has made. He has made statements and insinuations on the floor of this House which, if they had been made 100 yards from here, there would be a by-election in Pictou in a short time. The hon. gentleman, standing on the floor of this House, and putting on record in this House remarks and insinuations such as he has made, has done something that is absolutely unworthy of him, and I trust that the hon. gentleman will not pursue the tactics which he has adopted on this occasion. I do not know how long before this he has been accustomed to follow this line of attack, which, I say, is unworthy of an hon. member of this House. I am amazed that, on such flimsy foundation, he should for a moment consider that it was worth his while to take up the time of the House in the way that he has done. He has talked about this tremendous expense of $400 which was paid as a fee of Mr. Alexander Henderson, Q.C., of New Westminster. I did not follow the hon. gentleman all through his rambling remarks, but I amused myself by making a little calculation as to expenditures while he was talking about the expenditure of this $400. I find that hon. gentleman has been spending money at the rate of $400 an hour since he began to speak this afternoon, making a simple calculation as to what it costs to keep this House running during the seven hours that it usually sits.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has cost about 10 cents up to the present time.

Mr. MORRISON. The hon. gentleman has put that in the most insulting way. This afternoon, when I sought to put a relevant question, he would not even answer the question, but hid himself under the cowardly excuse of saying that I should say: Please, sir, may I ask you a question? There is not a gentleman in this House who invades the rules of debate more than the hon. member for Pictou. The hon. gentleman talks about the expenditure of money, in the way in which this $400 was spent, yet he has actually expended, or has caused to be spent, the sum of $2,000 since he began speaking this afternoon. After the very concise and excellent statement of the case by the hon. Solicitor General, it would be really superfluous for me to take up the time of the House in saying anything further upon this matter; but I would like to say, that the hon. member for Pictou, in presenting that resolution, has presented it upon absolutely no substantial ground whatever. There is not one allegation that the hon. member made in respect to myself, and I venture to say, in regard to the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Bostock), which is founded on fact. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has also made statements which are entirely at variance with the facts, and I would like to say to him, that his insinuations and his suppositions, in regard to my participation in this matter, are entirely erroneous.

Mr. BENNETT. If he will recall what I said, he will remember that I said, that I believed both himself and the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo yielded to the impurity of their friends.

Mr. MORRISON. I have not.

Mr. BENNETT. That is what I said their connection with it was. I acquitted the hon. gentleman of any other connection with it.

Mr. MORRISON. I trust the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) will go further, and acquit me of that, because I have had no communication with the friends of either of the people who wrote these letters. I knew nothing about it, except in the way I have said in opening my statement. I would not condescend to offer this explanation to the hon. gentlemen opposite and to take up the time of the House in making these few remarks, if the hon. member for Pictou had not thought that he had something that was sufficiently important to justify him in taking up four hours' time and in moving this resolution asking the House to vote want of confidence in the Government. This is what justifies me in adopting this circumlocutionary method of giving a denial to the statements made by the hon. member for Pictou and the hon. member for East Simcoe. I am satisfied, as far as the participation of the Department of Justice is concerned, to take the estimate of Sir Oliver Mowat, the late Minister of Justice, in regard to the proper procedure in this matter. I do not wish to make any invidious comparisons, but, when it comes down to making a comparison as between the hon. gentleman who occupied the position at one time of Minister of Justice, and who comes here and endeavours to convince the House that the course taken by Sir Oliver Mowat was wrong, and makes a comparison between himself and between Sir Oliver Mowat in a case of that kind, it reminds me very much of comparing a singed cat to a Bengal tiger. I say, that the hon. member for Pictou, in standing up here and treating us to such a harangue for such a time, assailing the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat, is receding to a depth to which I did not think it was possible for a member of Parliament to reach. I trust that the hon. member for Cariboo will deem it necessary to make a few remarks in regard to the references which have been made to himself. As far as I am concerned, I had no communication with the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo. I did not see him about this matter. I did not know that he had anything to do with it. It may surprise the the House to know that, as far as I am concerned, the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo, Mr. Henderson, Chief Justice McColl, Judge Spinks, are all of them on the most amicable terms with me that they could possibly be. Judge Spinks, as I said before, is a particular friend of mine, and there is no man in this House regrets more than I that Judge Spinks's name should be dragged forward in this unnecessary way, and being put on "Hansard" and in the press of the country. I am sure that Judge Spinks would be the last man to give credit to the hon. member for Pictou for what he has done to-day. There is no doubt in the world that the object of the hon. member for Pictou is to make political cudos for himself in British Columbia. I have lost all respect for the hon. gentleman's judgment in adopting the course which he has taken, for, if there is one thing more than another which tends to discredit the hon. gentleman, particularly where Judge Spinks is known, and where the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo is known, it is what he has done here to-night. All I can say is, that, if he is going to keep this thing up, as far as we are concerned, politically speaking: God speed him.

Mr. H. BOSTOCK (Yale and Cariboo). A rather strong reference has been made to me in the course of this discussion, and motives have been imputed to me which are not justified by the facts. Judging from what the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has said, I assume that he would be actuated by the motives in a case of this kind, which he has endeavoured to impute to me. I would not be so actuated. I may state for his benefit, that so far as I know, no gentleman was looking for the position that Mr. Spinks occupied then, and occupies now. No friends of mine or friends of the Liberal party were pushing to get Mr. Spinks's position. My part in the matter came in at the time that I wrote a letter, on receiving a letter from Mr. Sidley. Mr. Sidley wrote to me wanting to know whether those who asked for the investigation were to have counsel, and Mr. Justice McColl being in the province of British Columbia. It was easier and quicker to get an answer from him, and I wrote him, presuming that he would have received instructions if such a thing was going to be done. I wrote the letter which has been read. But, so far as my taking a part in this matter or wishing to do Mr. Spinks any harm is concerned, I entirely repudiate any such intent. I may state that I consider the administration of justice in my constituency as a most important matter, and one that has to be watched more carefully there than possibly in any other province in the Dominion, because at the present time we have a large population coming from all parts of the world, and they are apt to criticise more closely any action of the judges than possibly people would in the older and more settled portions of the Dominion. I do think a great deal of good has resulted from this investigation, because the rumours which were abroad have been set at rest, and the people feel that Mr. Spinks is properly carrying out the duties of the position he occupies—a position of great importance in that part of the country—and they now feel that he is actuated by proper motives. I took no part in the matter of getting Mr. Henderson or any other person appointed to that commission. I simply wrote this letter to Judge McColl; I never spoke to him on the matter; and I think if any hon. member of this House had been written to for information by a constituent, as Mr. Sidley is a constituent of mine, that member would have taken the course that I did. My only other course would have been to have written to the Department of Justice itself. I never had any idea of interviewing Mr. Justice McColl for the purpose, in any shape or form, of influencing him in anything he might have to do with the case; I never did anything other than write the letter which has been referred to. I shall not further take up the time of the House. I think the House will be satisfied with this personal explanation, and as to the conduct of the Department of Justice, the hon. the Solicitor General has fully stated the situation to the House, and I think the House will agree in the considerations he has advanced.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). I am not a lawyer, Mr. Speaker, and it may be presumption on my part to have anything to say on this legal question, but in my own county I have had some experience in respect to charges against judges, and I have a great deal of sympathy with Judge Spinks under the circumstances. While a layman who has nothing to do with the administration of justice may be excused for offering complaints against a judge, I cannot understand how it comes that three justices of the peace, charged with the administration of justice in British Columbia, could be so mistaken in their complaints against this judge, as is proven by the action of the Justice Department, and by the judge who investigated these charges. It has been shown clearly that Judge Spinks was in no way to blame, and that there was nothing in these complaints.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
And never was anything.

Mr. INGRAM. And never was anything. I am glad to hear both the gentlemen from British Columbia disclaiming any collusion with these complainants, and asserting that they simply had done their duty as representatives of the people, but I am sorry to say that the same policy is not carried out with respect to other departments of the Government. My experience is, that when members have made their complaints to the departments about the conduct of public affairs in their constituency, and when the officers have been instructed to investigate these complaints, even after that, some of the departments consult Liberal members and defeated Liberal candidates as to the course the department should pursue. That is a wrong policy, because if the responsible Ministers send responsible officers to deal with these complaints, no irresponsible person, be he member or defeated candidate, should be consulted to influence the result. Now, the Solicitor General made a few statements to-night, with some of which I entirely agree, and they are not the only statements of that hon. gentlemen with which I agree, because I have found him very fair in a good many things. He has stated that the waters of justice should flow from a pure spring for those who drink them. I agree with that. He also stated that he did not think a Liberal and a friend of the Government was precluded from making a complaint as to the manner in which justice was being administered. I quite agree with that. No Liberal should be precluded from making a complaint, but I go further, and I ask the Solicitor General if he will agree with me in this proposition: If a Conservative makes a complaint as to the way in which justice is being administered, will the department take the same steps as they would in the case of a Liberal, and investigate the complaint made by the Conservative? Now, if that proposition of mine be assented to, I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will pardon the remarks I am about to make, and I will endeavour to make them free from any partisan feeling, and in what I believe to be in the interests of the administration of justice in Canada. As we have listened all afternoon to the way in which justice has been administered in British Columbia, I take it that the Department of Justice are always glad to find out the way in which the provincial governments of this Dominion administer justice to the people of the various provinces, and I want to quote a sample or two from my own county in the province of Ontario. We have a police magistrate temporarily appointed in the city of St. Thomas, whose duty it is to deal out even-handed justice irrespective of party. This gentleman is supposed to be one of those who are pure, and who is to administer justice from this pure fountain, and how has he done it? Several men have been charged with stuffing ballots and stealing ballots, also personating voters and deputy returning officers in West Elgin. Unlike the hon. gentleman who is charged with making certain statements in this House this afternoon which he would not dare to make outside of this House, I make the statement that one Duncan Bole, of the town of Sault Ste. Marie, came to the west riding of Elgin, and deliberately stole ballots that should have been given credit to the Conservative candidate in West Elgin. I can prove that to be true in any court of law in this country, and I will make the statement outside of this House over my own signature, and will get dozens of others to do the same.

Mr. MORRISON. Why don't you do it?

Mr. INGRAM. I will explain. In order to prosecute this gentleman for the crime which he has committed, he was arrested and brought to where he had committed the crime. He was brought before a justice of the peace, whose duty it was to administer the law; and who was brought there to try this man charged with one of the most heinous crimes that a man can commit—stealing the franchise of a man who had honestly marked his ballot for the candidate of his choice? We find that the County Crown attorney of that county went there to defend the thief, and for doing so I understand was paid by the province. What I wish to know is this: if the Department of Justice finds money to investigate charges such as we have heard of in British Columbia, will they find money to investigate the charge that I have stated? The Attorney General of the province, whose duty it is to see that the law of this Dominion is properly carried out, especially the criminal law, was asked to produce the ballots so that the case could be proceeded with, and he declined to produce them. The County Crown attorney, who should represent the Crown, went there for the express purpose of raising a technicality to defeat the ends of justice. Next, we had this St. Thomas police magistrate, who is temporarily appointed on the recommendation of a gentleman who is now the representative of West Elgin in the local legislature, and who, if appointed permanently, will owe his appointment to that gentleman. I ask, is it human nature for a gentleman of that kind to deal out even-handed justice from this pure fountain, and injure the man to whom he owes his appointment? I say it should be the duty of the Department of Justice, in a case of that kind to procure somebody who would deal out even-handed justice. This man not only presides as police magistrate, but he goes round and endeavours to secure sureties that the participants will appear at a certain day, and he lets them go with $200 in their own name and $200 in two sureties; and when the case comes up again, these men do not appear, and that is how they get out of it.

Amendment negatived; motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose my hon. friend does not intend to go on?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have an item in the Fisheries which we had better pass.

Mr. FOSTER. I understood that the item was left for the very purpose of discussing it.

Inspection of Dominion steamers and fog alarms $1,300

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if he has got the report which his officer told me on Tuesday was ready up to a certain point?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I asked my officer to-day, and he says the hon. gentleman misunderstood him altogether if he said the report was ready. He is having it copied as rapidly as possible.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If at that time it was ready up to a certain point, that much could be brought down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My officer brought me the material so far as it was copied to-day, and it was not in a shape to be brought down; but he is getting it ready. He has four or five clerks engaged in copying it.

Mr. GILLIES. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he is now prepared to let me have the papers in the two cases I brought before him some time ago—one, that of the lighthouse-keeper at Point Jerome, Richmond County, the papers of which he promised to let me have by yesterday week. I want to know if he is prepared to hand them to me now?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not got them. The papers with reference to the dismissal of the fishery officer were brought down last year to the Senate. I have had them copied and I may perhaps be able to give them to the hon. gentleman to-night. There is nothing in them except exactly what I told the hon. gentleman, that he was reported by the Commissioner of Fisheries as an inefficient officer.

Mr. GILLIES. There is no such report in them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This item was to stand until the report came down. That was the agreement.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not understand that it was to stand until the report came down. It is being prepared. I cannot make the officials copy the documents faster.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Surely, with the understanding we had before the House, the hon. gentleman does not want to press this item of $1,300 until the report is brought down?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not understand that there was a specific agreement of that kind, but I understood that we should leave one item stand, with liberty to discuss all items generally.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That was item 208. We had passed 207 before reaching 208, with the exception of that item, and it was understood that the report should be prepared and brought down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then pass 208, and I will let the other stand.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all; I have a great deal to say on that.

Oyster culture $7,000

Mr. INGRAM. The understanding was, the other night, that item 208 would all pass except one item, and that on that one item we could discuss any of the others. I asked him then if he would charge his memory with regard to the legal expenses paid here. I find an item of $70 paid to John Farleyson Thomas, page K-80. What was this for?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am unable to recollect. It is for legal expenses over 18 months ago.

Mr. INGRAM. I cannot understand where the $70 would come from.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is quite open to move for the vouchers in the Public Accounts Committee; he can hardly expect me to charge my memory with all these items.

Mr. INGRAM. I am not a member of that committee.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman can get some one who is a member to move for it.

Mr. INGRAM. Last evening I called the hon. gentleman's attention to it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not recollect his doing so, and do not think he did, or it would be in "Hansard."

Mr. INGRAM. I am not impatient at all, but am willing to wait for the information.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In considering the subject, the other evening, the hon. Minister made a few observations on a very important question, and I am surprised to find that, according to the report in his department, there has been a large amount of correspondence on that question which is not in the report, nor has it been brought down in any shape before Parliament. For instance, the hon. gentleman has reached an arrangement with some of the provinces in connection with the jurisdiction of the fisheries of the federal and local Governments, and the correspondence that took place ought to be furnished to Parliament.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think there was any correspondence of any moment at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I gathered, the other night, that was the hon. gentleman's impression, and that there had simply been pourparlers between him and members of the governments in the provinces, but I find that his Deputy Minister at page 35 of the report, states that the decision of the Privy Council was not perfectly understood, and that while the power to make fishery regulations was vested in the Dominion, there were other rights of great importance which could not longer be exercised by the Federal Government. The issuing of licenses are defined to be in the jurisdiction of the provinces and the collection of revenues, except in the case of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. I do not understand that exception.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The decision was that at the time of confederation the several provinces that became united were the owners of certain property, among which was the right of fishing, and that right was not transferred to the Dominion. That, however, does not apply to Manitoba or the North-west Territories, because these portions of the Dominion became part of the confederation later.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman said there was not much correspondence, but in the report his deputy says that a large amount of correspondence took place between the department and the provincial authorities on the announcement of the decision, and that there were many points concerning which there was still great uncertainty. We ought to have that correspondence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is purely departmental correspondence relating to administration. For instance, the province of Ontario appointed an officer to carry out the work, and he had correspondence with Mr. Prince, regarding the manner in which we administer that branch of the department, and we gave him copies of the books and showed him how we had worked out the administration of the fisheries, but the correspondence had nothing to do with the legal points involved. They were discussed between Mr. Hardy and his legal advisers, Mr. Marchand and his legal advisers and myself and my legal advisers here.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Of course, that is satisfactory, if the hon. gentleman is clear that this is only relating to such matters, and not to the so-called modus vivendi. The deputy seems to leave that impression.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There has been some correspondence between myself and the province of Quebec with reference to the sea-coast fisheries; also, as I told the hon. gentleman, with the Premiers of the maritime provinces with reference to a possible agreement upon a case to be submitted. This is since the report came out.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think any correspondence on such an important question as that might come down, unless—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think it should not come down at the present stage.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to that at any rate. There is another matter to which I wish to refer. It is stated that "a thorough revision of the existing laws is in hand." Will the hon. gentleman tell me what that means?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It simply means that the existing law will have to be amended in some few particulars. For instance, the Privy Council determine that the main section of our Act, section 2, so far as it permits us to give leases, is ultra vires. I have to get the Bill drafted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who is drafting it? Is it being done outside the department?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No. I intend to submit a draft to the Justice Department. It will be prepared in my own department. I would suggest that we might reserve one item of

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

$1,300 until he gets the report, and the rest of the item might pass.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have not discussed the points arising out of this.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I thought the hon. gentleman had discussed them pretty well. However, I do not want to shorten the discussion.

Mr. BENNETT. The other evening, I referred to the case of Noble Brothers, a case which attracted, and still attracts, a great deal of attention. Among the fishermen in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, there are some who, like other fishermen, sometimes make the mistake of fishing illegally. The result is, that these men, comparatively poor men, have been visited with the terrors of the law. Not only have heavy fines been imposed, but they have suffered the loss of nets, and sometimes of their boats—for that is the punishment decreed under the very salutary law carried out by the Dominion. But these fishermen of the Georgian Bay, adjoining the riding of East Simcoe, complain that, as against them, the law has been rigidly enforced, but in the case of Noble Brothers, a large and wealthy firm, who measure their wealth, not by hundreds, but by thousands, though they have been prosecuted in the courts by the inspector and convicted, a different course is followed. Their large fleet of boats was seized, but, being placed under a bond, they have been released. And though this occurred some four years ago, Noble Brothers have gone free, and no retribution has been visited upon them. The Minister and the House will understand that when poor men stand and see their accumulations of years go up in smoke because they have been fishing illegally—when, perhaps, they have hunger at the door, and they see this wealthy firm, with their great political influence in Algoma, go free—it is not to be wondered at that they think that justice is not fairly administered. I referred to this matter the other night, but the House closed at the time, and the Minister did not make a statement in reference to the present situation of the case. I would now ask the Minister, if he will state the amount of the bond and whether or not all the fleet of boats have been restored to the Noble Brothers, and whether any part of the fines have been paid; and if not, is it the intention of the department to permit Noble Brothers to go scot free, or is it intended to exact the fines inflicted and carry out the punishment decided by the inspector?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) has referred to a case which happened many years ago, before I became the head of the department. Any action taken was taken by my predecessor, and not by me. No action has been taken by me, except that I informed Mr. Osler, the counsel for Noble Brothers, that, if he chose to reopen the case, I would listen to his argument and give him such a decision as I thought was fair. He said he would prefer to wait until the decision of the Privy Council was given as to the relative jurisdiction of the Dominion and the province, and he would then take such action as he thought best. Since then nothing has been done by him, and nothing has been done by me.

Mr. BENNETT. I am surprised, at that statement, in view of the fact that Noble Brothers can hardly be looked to to take the initiative. Fancy a plaintiff who has a verdict in his favour, moving to set aside his verdict.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). That is a very frequent occurrence.

Mr. BENNETT. Yes, he sometimes moves to have it increased. But that is not suggested in this case. If the facts are as I believe them to be, the hon. member for Pictou, who was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in the opinion of many fishermen on the shore of Georgian Bay, did not deal by any means harshly with Noble Brothers. I believe I am right, when I say, that the Minister has lying in his department a bond for the forthcoming of these tugs and sailing vessels, and also a record, or minute of the heavy fines imposed by Mr. Elliott, the fishery inspector. And no better proof could be had of the fact that Mr. Elliott was right, than the fact that he is still retained in the department.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. BENNETT. I am very sorry that he has been removed. Why was it?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sorry, also. His services were dispensed with, along with the others, after the decision of the Privy Council.

Mr. BENNETT. He proved himself a most fearless and impartial officer in the administration of the law. But the Minister can inquire of the officer of his department who is present to-night, and ascertain if there is standing against the Noble Brothers large fines. And, if the Noble Brothers are to be permitted to go unwhipt of justice, when the man who has a forty or fifty-dollar fishing boat and a hundred dollars' worth of nets, if caught illegally fishing, must not only lose his property, but pay a heavy fine, I can only say, that the fishermen will not have much faith in the administration of law or justice in the country. Now, I ask the Minister, what was the amount of fines that were recorded?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know. The matter is a very old one, and began long before I came into the department.

Mr. BENNETT. Now, I would like to know, because I have been asked by at least twenty fishermen in my own riding what the Government intend to do about the Noble case. The Minister admits the case is not without his review, because he had communications with Mr. Osler upon the subject.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I assume from what Mr. Osler tells me that they will bring a case against this Government for enormous damages.

Mr. BENNETT. I do not think the Government will grant them a fiat to bring on the action. In the next place, I think they will be only too happy to cry quits. I am only asking for information so that I may be enabled to tell the men who are engaged in fishing, what disposition has been made of the Noble case. It is a matter that excited a great deal of attention, and occupied columns of newspaper comment. The matter was even introduced on the floor of the House by some hon. gentlemen then on the left who now sit on the right of the Speaker. Strong complaint was made against the conduct of the then acting Minister, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). I think the Minister should certainly give the House the information whether the fines have been paid, and whether it is the intention of the Government to enforce the fines.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I tell the hon. gentleman that the case is hoary with age. There is any amount of manuscript over there that any one may consult if he pleases. The case was disposed of by the Minister who preceded me, and the counsel for the Messrs. Noble intimated to me that they would await the decision of the Privy Council, and then take such action in the courts as they thought the interest of their clients required. I assume they will do so, and when they come into court, if they have any claim against the Government, it will be decided in the proper way. I do not intend to pay them any damages. I do not think the hon. gentleman as a lawyer would advise me to take any action to recover those old fines.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On the question of the Noble Brothers, I am surprised to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries take such a position. He cannot dismiss it by saying that it is hoary with age. The decision of the Privy Council at no time could possibly affect the action of the department in the matter of enforcing the regulations. Nothing in that decision throws a doubt upon the validity of the fishery regulations, on the contrary the right to enforce them is upheld. The case of the Noble Brothers was a most harsh case. It is harsh enough to burn up the nets and boats of poor fishermen, as the Minister's officers are doing now, and the papers do not think it worth while to take up their case; but if a powerful firm like the Noble Brothers come forward and openly violate the regulations, with tugs going into the waters at their own sweet will, contrary to the regulations of the close season, if you seize their tugs a great outcry is made. Instead of the Minister being, as I suppose I would be, at that time blamed for not summarily dealing with these people, because I took the tugs and kept them, I became the subject of abuse, both in the House and in the press of the country, the Toronto "Globe" leading off in the fight, whereas my officers were only doing their duty. But I had personal knowledge of the manner in which the Noble Brothers were acting. While one of them was in my office trying to palliate the facts of the case, a telegram was put into my hands from my officers in the waters concerned, saying that another tug of the Nobles had just been caught taking fish in the close season. Well, the excitement that these people stirred up through their powerful position was something extraordinary, and instead of getting the support of the public, the department got very little popular support. Knowing as I did that the poorer classes of fishermen suffered from the loss of their boats and nets far more than the Noble Brothers, I did endeavour to hold the Nobles down to the same rule and the same treatment. Boards of Trade all over Ontario sent in strong representations on behalf of the Noble Brothers, who bought enormous supplies from the merchants, and pressure was brought from all quarters, representations were made so determinedly and so positively that finally, after consulting with my colleagues, we agreed to hold these tugs and not dispose of them by sale in the ordinary course. We appointed Mr. Samuel Wilmot, Superintendent of Fish Culture, to hear what these people had to say. They employed eminent counsel, the firm of McCarthy & Osler, and they went before Mr. Wilmot and treated the commissioner as if it were a regular tribunal, and raised all sorts of technical objections, with which no doubt Mr. Wilmot was exceedingly embarrassed. Though Mr. Wilmot reported the case, and though a large amount of evidence was taken, it was still standing in the department when I left. Then, the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan), my colleague, assumed office, and, of course, we are both responsible for all that occurred then. I think, speaking subject to correction, a judge was afterwards substituted in place of Mr. Wilmot, and a rehearing was granted. Meanwhile the tugs were given back to the Noble Bros., they giving a bond to the Crown conditioned on the result of this investigation. If it should turn out that these tugs had been violating the law, then security was taken so that they would not get scot free. There was no vindictiveness in the matter; it was an endeavour on my part simply to say that there was no difference between the rich and the poor, that the fishermen should understand that we were not merely burning up and destroying their property and mulcting them in penalties because they were poor but that these were regulations which must be observed. It was not long before we left office in June, 1896, that this arrangement for an investigation before Judge Johnston—I think it was Judge Johnston—at any rate, a judge was made, and it was required that the matter should be pressed to the end in order to give them an opportunity of establishing their innocence, of establishing the simple fact as to whether their tugs were, or were not, fishing at the time they were seized. Another thing that entered into the consideration of this matter was that it was not their first infraction. They were reported as old offenders, as frequent offenders, and it was a question as to whether they were to have a license or not. Under the regulations, in the case of these poor fishermen, to whom I have alluded, when they frequently violated the regulations, when they violated them more than once, they were not given a renewal of their licenses. There was an implied condition of good behaviour during the time they held their licenses, because these licenses were necessarily limited to a chosen few who should behave, who would treat the regulations fairly and do no injury to the fisheries. This was in 1896, and all these matters to which I have referred did not occupy a long time. But there has been a long delay and the Minister cannot lie back now and say that because this matter was not disposed of when he came to office the matter has grown hoary with age, that he does not know how the matter stands, and that there is a suggestion that they are going to sue. What are they going to sue about? One of these investigations was adverse to them, or, I think, that it was adverse to them. My recollection is that the Minister himself has told us that the finding was against them. Then came in this specious plea of Mr. Osler, who, of course, only wants delay, who says that a suit would be brought. Then comes this specious plea that the Privy Council is going to decide the matter in reference to these regulations. There is the decision of the Privy Council, and that decision in no way affects the matter, as the hon. Minister knows. Nothing in that decision will prevent the recovery of the bond. The Minister is bound to take some action in regard to that bond.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Oh, cut it short; we will be here all night.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Minister will not cut it short. The Minister has left this matter too long.

Mr. MCGREGOR. He would not ruin them like you would.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not know why the hon. gentleman says that I would ruin them. I did not ruin them. I certainly would have preferred to have ruined them rather than to ruin the poor creatures we had to ruin in enforcing the regulations, because when they lost their boats and their nets they lost their all. It is for the Minister to perform his duties and to be cursed in the same quarters that I was cursed by the parties who have been punished. The Minister must deal with this case so that he can decide who was right and who was wrong. He must either decide to sue on that bond or give the bond up. I would like to ask the Minister if all this time Noble Bros. have been given their license to fish?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think so.

Mr. BENNETT. The Minister is misinformed on that point; yes, they have been fishing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was answering the question of the hon. member for Pictou, as to whether they had been given a license to fish. I say I do not think so.

Mr. McGREGOR. They buy their fish.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think I am right in saying that they have not been given a license. Here is a case which occurred five or six years ago, and without any notice being given to me, in any way, it suddenly springs up in the midst of the estimates, and I am asked to say what my policy is. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will move for the papers and bring the matter before the House, the decision and the action which has been taken can be reviewed. To ask me in the middle of the estimates, for this year, to go into the details of a case which took place many years ago, before I came into the department, without notice, and to expect me to carry all these details in my head, is asking too much of me.

Mr. BENNETT. I think the hon. Minister can hardly complain that he has not had notice. Surely the case is of such importance that, when I brought it to his notice the other night, it is strange if he has not seen fit to ask his department for the facts. As to not having brought it up last year, I certainly did not bring it up for the reason that I knew the question was pending in the department. I know Mr. Charles Noble, and the Minister, I think, knows him.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I do not know him.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Charles Noble was here last year for about a week, and he certainly must have seen the Minister.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He may have seen me; I do not know the man.

Mr. BENNETT. I know his whole business here was in connection with that case. A friend of his informed me that Mr. Noble stayed here several days in connection with this matter, and that Mr. Noble was very hopeful of a favourable result, that there was going to be no exaction of the penalty or the bond. The hon. Minister can hardly complain of lack of notice when the matter was introduced the other evening. I referred to the importance of the matter, and surely the officers of his department could assure him, and he must have known of his own knowledge that the matter would be brought up from the fact that an hon. gentleman behind him, is saying that it was a case of hardship. The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) has several times said that it was a case of hardship.

Mr. McGREGOR. I know all about it.

Mr. BENNETT. And he says that he knew all about it. I have no doubt he knew all about it; I knew Mr. Noble was here session after session.

Mr. McGREGOR. I do not know Mr. Noble; I never met him in my life.

Mr. BENNETT. Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McGregor) was not so fortunate as many other gentlemen on his side of the House, because Mr. Noble met a good many of them. The case is of importance, inasmuch as the Nobles not only had the assistance of strong Liberals, but they had the support of very pronounced Conservative friends of the then Administration, owing to business and other relations that existed between them. What answer can I make when I go back to my riding and am asked, as I am perpetually asked, as to this partial administration of the law? Take the case of the Tiny shore, where there are a large number of French Canadians who had all their capital, amounting to $300 or $400, invested in a fishing outfit. These men were in poor circumstances, and if they left their nets down a few days after the open season, because they were not able to lift them by reason of inclement weather, they saw all their belongings go up in smoke before their eyes. How am I to explain this rigid enforcement of the law against these poor men, when this wealthy firm of Noble Bros., who have not only a large financial standing, but were the most active Liberal politicians on the whole shore, have not the law enforced against them. The Nobles did not confine their operations to their own riding of Algoma, but they were an important factor in North Simcoe and in Parry Sound. In the elections of 1896, the Noble Bros. left Algoma, where the elections would not take place until after the general elections, and they used their powerful influence in Parry Sound in favour of the Liberal candidate; and their influence was powerful, because they had a large number of men in their employ and had a still larger number depending on them by reason of their supplying fishing outfits. I have heard the Noble Bros. estimated to be worth $200,000, they were the kings in the fishing business there, and after the repeated breaking of the law by these men, and after their being brought to book, the Minister now says this case is hoary with age and that is the end of it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I declined to say anything about the case, because I was not in possession of the facts. I will not commit myself to saying anything about it, and I do not think any hon. gentleman should ask me about a matter which took place six years ago, and which is suddenly sprung up in Supply.

Mr. BENNETT. To my own knowledge Mr. Charles Noble was here last year, and I was informed by a friend of his that he was here to see whether the penalty was to be enacted. The Minister does not deny Mr. Noble was here.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Noble may have been here and he may have seen me, but I do not know.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, it is highly probable he did see the Minister. I am sure the hon. gentleman from Algoma (Mr. Dymont) has repeatedly seen the Minister on this case, because it is a matter of the greatest importance to the Liberal candidate in Algoma whether or not he has the influence of this important firm whose ramifications in the fishing business extend for miles and miles along that shore. Now, I hold that the Minister should state what his position is on this question.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not in a position to state, because I have not seen the papers.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, at the next session of the House?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. How is it possible for me to go through that volume of evidence before the next session of the House. I would certainly have to lay the whole thing before the Department of Justice.

Mr. JOHN COSTIGAN (Victoria, N.B.) I rise to say a few words because I would not like the impression to go abroad that while poor fishermen have been punished for breaking the law, the Noble Bros., who are a fishing firm of some wealth, went scot free. I do not dispute a word that has been said by my predecessor in office, and who administered that department with so much ability, and under whose administration the first proceedings were instituted against this firm. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will not blame me if I say that on some points we might differ. I might take a more lenient view than he would, in one case, and perhaps in another instance he might take a more lenient view than I. I acted for that gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), as Minister of Marine and Fisheries, while he was away at the Paris Arbitration for about six months, and that case then came under my notice. During the time I acted for that hon. gentleman, I felt the responsibility that no matter what my own views might be, I was bound to have proper regard for his decisions as the Minister of the department, and not to reverse his decision. The Noble case attracted a great deal of attention, and proceedings were taken against them. Afterwards I became the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the case still continued. I will not attempt from memory to go through the history of the case, as my object in speaking is simply, as I have said, to prevent the impression going abroad that the Nobles, being men of wealth and influence, got off scot free, while poor men had their nets burned and destroyed. I am thoroughly satisfied in my own mind that the Noble Bros. suffered most severely. I believe that, without regard to any penalty, they suffered in their business to such an extent as would be satisfactory punishment for the breaches of the regulations they committed. I believe that honestly. Their whole plant, which was considerable, was seized, and I do not question the propriety of that seizure for a breach of the regulations. It was seized by officers who showed a great disposition to pay more attention to the Nobles in that district than to most any other fishermen—one officer in particular. The boats were seized and tied up to the wharfs, without any one to look after them, exposed to the heat of the summer, and the property became much deteriorated. In addition to that, a number of smaller boats with oars and plant were not sold by public auction, but sold at private sale by some of the officers, and when the bond was executed, and the time came to render an account we were unable to show this plant. My predecessor (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is right in saying that the next proceeding was to hand the matter over to a judge—Judge Johnstone, I think, but it was longer before the change of Government than he has stated.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I was Minister of Justice at the time, because I remember that you consulted with me.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes. The case was referred to the judge in the locality, who would be in a position to get the evidence, and perhaps make as fair a report as could be got on the subject. He made reports from time to time, and I know that it must have been nearly a year before the change of Government when this judge was appointed. I do not know what his final judgment was, because speaking from my recollection it was not given in my time. I do not rise to say that these men had not committed breaches of the regulations or that they were not liable to penalties; but I do rise to say that it is not fair to give out the impression that they were so favoured that they got off scot-free and did not suffer severely in their business. The representations made to me were not made by men on one side of politics only; but some of the most respectable men supporting our Government came forward and complained most bitterly of the extraordinarily severe treatment these men were receiving. I rise to make this statement in justice to these men.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The point I want to make is this. We could discuss the treatment of the Nobles, and the point of all the views regarding their treatment is that the matter should be brought to a termination. The Minister of Marine has no more important duty to perform than to bring it to a conclusion, but I understand him to say that he cannot charge his mind with these things. Why, every session you will find, according to "Hansard," that this matter has been inquired into, and the Minister has undertaken to give answer upon it. It was brought up the other night just as the committee was rising, as a most important subject. My old colleague, who held the same responsibility as I did in connection with this case, might have one view, I might have another, different members of the committee might have different views on the subject; but the point I have endeavoured to press on the Minister of Marine is that he has not been given that attention to this important subject which he should. In fairness to me, that matter should be concluded. I was the one who had to bear the brunt of it, rightly or wrongly. I was charged with having been cruel and vindictive to the Nobles. That charge was made in the "Globe," and repeated in all the smaller papers on the same side. The Prime Minister, when leader of the Opposition, attacked the Government on the same ground, that we had been unduly cruel towards these people. He said:

If I understand, the complaint made by the Nobles was that they were the victims of a conspiracy, that their record had been falsified by the officers of the department.

Mr. MCGREGOR. So they were.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman from Essex says, so they were. And these are the statements that have gone against the officers, because the hon. Minister of Marine is not in a position to defend his officers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was six years ago.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman came into office in 1893, and this matter was standing to be dealt with, and it is a reflection upon himself to say that the matter has faded from his mind, and that he knows nothing of it. It ought to have been dealt with finally. I am not insisting that he should sue on the bond; I am not insisting that he should show leniency to these people, or that he should accept the idea of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan); but I am insisting that he should perform the duty of his office and bring these matters to some conclusion, and not allow them to grow hoary. The Prime Minister, when leader of the Opposition, pressed in the strongest manner this case as one in which these people had been the victims of a conspiracy, and in which the officers had falsified the record in order to do them an injustice. He said:

They cannot enter upon their defence successfully, especially when they feel so strongly that they are blamed unjustly and are the victims of a conspiracy. It must strike the sense of justice of my hon. friends that they cannot successfully vindicate their character unless they are placed in possession of everything which pertains to this case, and of all the charges laid against them.

This was the special favour to be shown to these people, if you please. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan) testifies that there was no such system of treatment for the rich as against another system for the poor; and here was the Prime Minister using his eloquence to ask for special favours to these men who had a bad record in the department as regards the regulations. I say nothing as to their character; but in that debate it came out that they had been put upon the black list, and had been fined for violating the regulations. The Prime Minister never raised his voice on behalf of poor fishermen who had been in the same position; but here he was pressing the Government to bring down all the papers and documents in the Noble case. And a motion of that character was pressed, and was of course resisted by the hon. member for Victoria as well as by myself. On that occasion the hon. member for Victoria summed up the matter thus:

I do not doubt at all the very deep sympathy of the hon. gentleman for these men. No doubt he feels that they have been very badly treated and that the Government deserve very severe censure. That may be true, but I am not yet in a position to discuss the question, pending an investigation by a legal tribunal. The delay is not the fault of the Government, or the Minister or the department. The delay has been caused by the gentlemen with whom the last speaker has expressed such great sympathy, the Nobles themselves. After their vessels had been condemned, my predecessor listened to the appeal made by them, in which they assured him that if a rehearing were granted, they could bring forward such evidence as would reverse the former decision, and induce him to restore the property. He consented to a rehearing, fixing the time and place. When the time for the rehearing was about to arrive, I was in charge of the department, and the legal advisers of the Nobles, Messrs. McCarthy & Osler, notified the department that they would advise their clients to appeal for a change in the arrangements for the rehearing. They took exception to the place, called Massey, as inconvenient to reach, and they also raised an objection that the rehearing was to be before a very prominent officer of the department. All these things were taken into consideration, and in order to give them every possible chance to make out their case, we agreed to a rehearing which they proposed should take place at Collingwood, perhaps before the county court judge. Where the rehearing will take place is under consideration by the Government, but I hope my hon. friend will not conclude that there has been unnecessary delay.

We were at that time being charged by the Opposition, the gentlemen now occupying the Treasury benches, with delaying this matter; and now, the hon. gentleman who has been responsible for the delay since 1896, laughs, and thinks us most unreasonable when we ask him if he has reached any decision in the matter.

In this case, Mr. Landerkin moved for copies of all the papers, and made a long speech, much longer than the speech I have made to-night. Then, the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan) followed with a concise statement of the facts, which I have read. Then, the hon. leader of the Opposition, now the First Minister, took the matter up after Recess, after these other gentlemen had discussed it all afternoon, and I replied in a few remarks. Mr. McDonald, of Algoma, followed, and after him Mr. Sproule made a few remarks. Then the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) could not restrain himself, and, notwithstanding the fact that the House was weary, he spoke at great length. Sir James Grant, who is, unfortunately, not now with us, also addressed the House on this subject, and after him came the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), after whose remarks all interest seemed to drop out of the subject. This shows how the tables are turned. This case, which was cited by hon. gentlemen opposite as an example of the incapacity of the Government in 1895, stands forth to-day as a monument of the incapacity of this Government in 1899. Here we have a Minister of Marine and Fisheries who does not hesitate to say, that he does not know enough about this subject, which he and his friends discussed at such length in 1895, to be able to tell us to-day whether all these charges which were made by them against the late Government, were substantiated; and, although he knows that the Government of that time did take a well-defined position, he is to-day in the pitiable position of not being able to advise his colleagues to take any stand whatever on the case to-day. I do not suppose the hon. Minister, under the circumstances, will complain of our taking a few moments to refresh his recollection. We have given him some idea of how the Nobles must be laughing in their sleeve that they have been able to have their own way, because the Minister looks on this as so unimportant that he will not investigate it. Before I sit down—

Mr. McMULLEN. Do not sit down.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I promise my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that there are several subjects on which I intend to speak. For instance, fish culture would be an interesting thing to discuss. I wish, however, to bring up a sad case in connection with the administration of this department, and to show the rather cruel and summary action of the present Minister. Captain William Babb was, in my day, the officer in charge of the life-saving station at Goderich, Ont. Those acquainted with his work know that it gave satisfaction. Not only was his record satisfactory, but I believe he had saved life, and for his heroism had been the recipient of a medal.

Mr. BENNETT. A Cobden medal?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, not a Cobden medal. If he had received a Cobden medal, and had gone back on the principles for which he received it, I am sure he would have returned it. At any rate, he served this country from 1855 down to 1899. In May of this year, he received the following summary communication from the Deputy Minister.

Ottawa, 16th May, 1899.

Sir,—I have to inform you that Captain John Cragie has been appointed coxswain of the life-saving service at Goderich, and I have to request you to hand over to him the life-boat and all Government property in your possession.

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

F. GOURDEAU,

Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Capt. William Babb, Goderich, Ont.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What age did the hon. gentleman say he was?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think he was in his prime of life, but I do not know.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is a pretty safe answer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to know the age of his successor?

Mr. FOSTER. About the same age as Palmer, down in King's County.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) might mention the case of Palmer to-night. I have read the only notice that Captain Babb received of dismissal. Captain Babb writes the following letter, which Sir Charles Tupper, to whom it was addressed, has handed to me. It is as follows:—

Goderich, Ont., May 26th, 1899.
The Right Hon. Sir Charles Tupper,
Ottawa.

Hon. Sir,—I inclose in this the copies of the documents relating to my appointment to and dismissal from the position of captain of the life-saving station at Goderich. As you will see, I received my appointment October, 1885, since then I have done my duty so well that there has been no complaint against either myself or crew. Instead of such being the case, the Government that appointed me had such confidence in my judgment and ability that they have requested me to visit different life-saving stations to give instructions to the crews and report, which I have done.

I refer you to the chief engineer of the Marine Department, also to the marine adviser, who I am satisfied will speak favourably of me.

My reason for writing you in this matter is that I have been dismissed without cause, unless being a Conservative is one, and I would feel very grateful to you if you or one of your supporters would make the necessary inquiries of the Government regarding the same.

I am, sir,
Your obedient servant,
CAPTAIN WM. BABB,
Late of the Royal Navy.

I think that the hon. Minister should be able to say why an officer like Captain Babb was dismissed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I should have been glad if the hon. gentleman had given me notice that he intended to bring the matter up. I would have brought the papers. I am not able to speak definitely as to the case. The reason I asked the hon. gentleman as to Captain Babb is that my impression is that he was reported by the inspector to be too old a man for the position. I think he was reported as over 80.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He writes a very good hand. I have never seen him, but I remember his appointment, and I remember receiving his reports, he had a good record.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My impression is that he was removed that a more active man might be appointed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) would make a note of it, so that we may learn the facts later on.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, before we leave—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite that we pass this item and go home.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have not got half through discussing this item.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. All right.

Mr. BENNETT. Before we leave the Noble case, I would ask the hon. Minister if he will state at the next meeting what his intentions are in regard to it?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Most assuredly I would not give such a promise. It would take me at least three weeks to master the evidence. I shall certainly refer to the Department of Justice before coming to any conclusion on a matter of that kind.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I stated at first when we got through with the other part of the business, that I did not think it was fair to the House to enter upon a discussion of Estimates at that hour of the night. Unfortunately for me, I was not present when these Estimates were going through the other night. I would like very much to discuss two of the items, one being relating to oyster culture and the other to the fish breeding establishments under the new order of things. I would suggest that my hon. friend should allow the general discussion to proceed on item 207, and in that case I think item 208 might be passed. It is impossible at one o'clock in the morning to enter on anything like a fair discussion of items involving important questions.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have been 19 sessions a member of this House, and there never was one-tenth of the time taken up in discussing the estimates of the department of Marine and Fisheries that there has been this year. This is the fifth sitting of the House which has been taken up in discussing mere formal matters which are passed every year without discussion at all. There has not been a subject brought up for discussion which should have taken more than a few minutes time. I was informed by the Prime Minister that this item would be allowed to pass, and that he so understood from the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, what is the use of our remaining here after one o'clock at night when we can make a proposition and carry it out? We will pass 208 and we will keep 207 standing, with liberty to make a general discussion on that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I recognize the power of the Opposition, and I never oppose any reasonable proposition. I do not propose to kill myself sitting here all night, until I see the time has arrived when hon. gentlemen are simply obstructing. When that time comes, I must be prepared to sit here day and night, week and month, summer and winter, as my hon. friends talk about doing. But I trust that time will not come.

The committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 1.05 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 5th June, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 139) respecting the Nova Scotia Steel Company (Limited).—(Mr. Fraser, Guysborough.)

Bill (No. 140) respecting the Canadian Railway Fire Insurance Company, and to change its name to the Dominion Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

PROTOCOL RE ALASKAN BOUNDARY.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, on a recent occasion I expressed the hope that probably during the present session, the Government would be able to lay before the House the protocol of the Anglo-American Commission which was adopted by it at one of its last sittings, and which treated of the question of the Alaskan boundary. Late on Saturday evening permission was obtained from the Imperial authorities—I see also that a blue-book has been issued by the Imperial authorities on the same subject—and I beg, therefore, to lay on the Table of the House the last protocol, 63, of the commission, which is in the following terms:—

PROTOCOL No. LXIII.

Washington, February 18, 1899.

The Joint High Commission assembled pursuant to adjournment at the conference rooms, at ten o'clock a.m., all the members being present except Lord Herschell and Hon. John W. Foster, who were detained by illness, and Sir Richard J. Cartwright.

The protocol of the last meeting was read and approved.

The question of the boundary between Alaska and Canada was again taken up for discussion.

The British commissioners represented that the commission having been unable to agree on that question, it should be referred to arbitration. They, therefore, made the following proposition as a basis to be proceeded upon in framing a treaty:—

Article I.—An Arbitral Tribunal shall be immediately appointed to determine the boundary line between the territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada within the limits defined in Article III.

Article II.—The Tribunal shall consist of three jurists of repute, one on the part of Great Britain, nominated by the members for the time being of the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, one on the part of the United States, nominated by the President, and of a third jurist to be selected by the two persons so nominated, in the event of their failure to agree within three months of the exchange of ratifications of the present treaty to be selected by * * *

Nobody was then suggested.

In the case of death, absence or incapacity to serve of either of the two arbitrators nominated as aforesaid, or in the event of either of such arbitrators omitting or declining or ceasing to act as such, another jurist of repute shall be forthwith substituted in his place. If such vacancy shall occur in the case of the arbitrator nominated by Great Britain, the substitute shall be appointed by the members for the time being of the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council. If such vacancy shall occur in the case of the arbitrator nominated by the United States, he shall be appointed by the President. In case of the death, absence or incapacity to serve of the third arbitrator selected as aforesaid, or in the event of such arbitrator omitting or declining or ceasing to act as such, another jurist of repute shall be forthwith substituted in his place who shall be selected by the two other arbitrators, or in the event of their failure to agree within one month of such vacancy occurring by * * *

Nobody was then suggested.

Article III.—The Tribunal shall determine and delineate on suitable maps the boundary line between the territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada from the southernmost point of Prince of Wales' Island to Mount St. Elias, in accordance with the treaty between Russia and Great Britain of February 23, 1825.

Article IV.—In deciding the matters submitted, the arbitrators shall ascertain all facts which they deem necessary to a decision of the controversy, and shall be governed by the following rules, which are agreed upon by the high contracting parties as rules to be taken as applicable to the case, and by such principles of international law not inconsistent therewith as the arbitrators shall determine to be applicable to the case.

Rules.

(a) Adverse holding or prescription during a period of fifty years shall make a good title. The arbitrators may deem exclusive political control of a district, as well as actual settlement thereof, sufficient to constitute adverse holding or to make title by prescription.

(b) The arbitrators may recognize and give effect to rights and claims resting on any other ground whatever valid according to international law, and on any principles of international law which the arbitrators may deem to be applicable to the case, and which are not in contravention of the foregoing rule.

(c) In determining the boundary line, if territory of one party shall be found by the Tribunal to have been at the date of this treaty in the occupation of the subjects or citizens of the other party, such effect shall be given to such occupation as reason, justice, the principles of international law, and the equities of the case shall, in the opinion of the Tribunal, require.

I need not read the other articles of the proposed treaty, because they are purely formal, and such as are to be found in every arbitration of the kind. I shall read simply what constituted our main proposal with regard to the arbitration. The protocol goes on to say:

The commissioners of the United States announced that they accepted the proposals made as the basis of adjustment, but desired an amendment in relation to the Arbitral Tribunal and a modification of rule "c" to make it conform to the present local conditions in Alaska.

They then presented the Project of Articles as modified, which was as follows:—

Article I.—An Arbitral Tribunal shall be immediately appointed to determine the boundary line between the territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada, within the limits defined in the following Article III.

Article II.—The Tribunal shall consist of six impartial jurists of repute, three on the part of Great Britain, nominated by the members for the time being of the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, and three on the part of the United States, nominated by the President.

In the case of the death, absence or incapacity to serve of either of the arbitrators nominated as aforesaid, or in the event of either of such arbitrators omitting or declining or ceasing to act as such, another impartial jurist of repute shall be forthwith nominated in his place by the same authority which appointed his predecessor.

Article III.—The Tribunal shall determine, and, if practicable, delineate on suitable maps the boundary line between the territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada from the southernmost point of Prince of Wales' Island to Mount St. Elias, in accordance with the treaty between Russia and Great Britain dated February 28-16, 1825, and the treaty of cession from Russia to the United States dated March 30th, 1867, or as the same shall be established by said Tribunal under the rules hereinafter provided.

Article IV.—Before deciding the matters submitted, the arbitrators shall ascertain all geographical, historical and other facts which they deem necessary to a decision of the controversy, and shall be governed upon by the high contracting parties as rules to be taken as applicable to the case, and by such principles of international law not inconsistent therewith as the arbitrators shall determine to be applicable to the case.

Rules.

(a) Adverse holding or prescription during a period of fifty years shall make a good title. The arbitrators may deem exclusive political control of a district, as well as actual settlement thereof, sufficient to constitute adverse holding or to make title by prescription.

(b) The arbitrators may recognize and give effect to rights and claims resting on any other ground whatever, valid according to international law, and on any principles of international law which the arbitrators may deem to be applicable to the case, and which are not in contravention of the foregoing rule.

(c) In considering the "coast" referred to in said treaties mentioned in Article II, it is understood that the coast of the continent is intended. In determining the boundary line, if territory of one party shall be found by the Tribunal to have been at the date of this treaty in the occupation of the subjects or citizens of the other party, such effect shall be given to such occupation as reason, justice, the principles of international law and the equities of the case shall, in the opinion of the Tribunal, require; and all towns and settlements on tide-water, settled under the authority of the United States and under the jurisdiction of the United States at the date of this treaty, shall remain within the territory and jurisdiction of the United States.

With regard to the rest of the proposals of the United States commissioners, I need not go into them just now, because they are purely formal; but I want to call the attention of the House at once to the difference existing between the proposition made by the British commissioners and the proposition made by the American commissioners. The first difference of opinion was with regard to the composition of the tribunal. The tribunal proposed by the British commissioners was a tribunal of three jurists of repute—one to be selected by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for Great Britain, the other to be selected by the President of the United States, and the third to be selected by the two, or, in the event of a disagreement to be selected by a friendly power, the friendly power, however, not being named. With regard to the possible question which might arise on account of occupation, the British commissioners proposed to follow identically the rules laid down by the Venezuela Treaty. The rules laid down by the Venezuelan Treaty were in substance the following two: That adverse possession of 50 years, or the equivalent of possession, should constitute a title—

Mr. FOSTER. National.

The PRIME MINISTER. A national title; that is to say, if territory were to be found occupied by the United States which under the terms of the treaty would rightly belong to Great Britain, possession of 50 years would constitute a title; possession of less than 50 years would simply constitute an equitable title, which was to be referred altogether to the arbitrators, to determine what in their opinion law, justice and equity might require.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask my hon. friend just here, as it is a very interesting point, would the adverse possession by Russia, as well as by the United States, in this case, count on behalf of the United States contention?

The PRIME MINISTER. I would suppose that under such circumstances the arbitrators would decide in the affirmative; but I am not here to lay down exactly what would be the interpretation. We simply thought, under the circumstances, without going minutely into the law or ethics of the case, that all the law and ethics of the case would be amply met and amply provided for by adopting the very rules which had been adopted by the two powers, Great Britain and the United States, in the case of the Venezuela difficulty. The American proposals differed from this. On the first point, as to the constitution of the tribunal, while we proposed, as I said before, a tribunal of three—one arbitrator to represent Great Britain, another to represent the United States, and an umpire—the American proposal was that the tribunal should be composed of six eminent jurists—three to be appointed by the American authorities and three to be appointed by the British authorities. With regard to the rules proposed by us according to the precedent of the Venezuela case, the Americans adopted the same rules—Rule A, rule B and rule C—but with this important rider, that all towns and settlements on tide-water, settled on the authority of the United States and under the jurisdiction of the United States at the date of this treaty, should remain within the territory and jurisdiction of the United States, no matter whether within British territory or not. To this proposition the British commissioners made a rejoinder in the following terms of the protocol:—

A recess of the Joint High Commission was then taken until three o'clock p.m. Under re-assembling, the British commissioners stated that they were absolutely unable to accept the modifications to their proposition suggested by the American commissioners, and gave the reason of their dissent as follows:—

The British commissioners having considered the amendments suggested to their proposal of yesterday for a reference to arbitration of the Alaska-Canadian boundary line by the United States commissioners, regret that they are unable to agree to same for the following reasons:—

1. Because the suggested amendment to Article II does not provide a Tribunal which would necessarily and in the possible event of differences of opinion, finally dispose of the question.

On the 11th of February the British commissioners submitted that in their opinion "such provision can only be made, in the term of the protocol (in default of agreement as to the boundary) by an agreement, for some steps to be taken, which will, if taken, necessarily result in a delimitation of the whole boundary."

They adhere most strongly to this opinion, and cannot depart from it.

2. Because the suggestion in subsection "c" of Article IV that "all towns or settlements on tide-water, settled under the authority of the United States and under the jurisdiction of the United States at the date of this treaty shall remain within the territory and jurisdiction of the United States," is a marked and important departure from the rules of the Venezuela boundary reference, which provided that all equities arising from possession or other facts alleged by either of the parties to the reference, should be left for the consideration and determination of the arbitration, and be given by them such weight as reason, justice, and the principles of international law and the equities of the case should require. The words added by the United States commissioners claim that an effect should be given to their occupation of land in British territory, which justice, reason, and the equities of the case do not require.

The British commissioners further object to the declaration added to the first part of rule "c" as follows:—

"In considering the 'coast' referred to in said treaties mentioned in Article III, it is understood that the coast of the continent is intended."

While it was probably only intended by this clause that the line should be drawn upon the continent, the language used is open to misconstruction.

Holding these views, the British commissioners are of the opinion that no useful end will be served by further pressing at the present time the negotiations, and must refer the matter to their Government.

In the exchange of views in respect to the constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal which followed this communication, inquiry was made by the United States commissioners whether the British commissioners had considered the question of selecting an umpire from the American continents.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

To this it was replied that they had considered it, and thought it most objectionable, in view of the policy long maintained and recently reasserted by the Government of the United States towards the other countries on the said continents. The selection of an umpire by any such nation would not in their opinion offer the guarantee of impartiality which is the first qualification requisite for the discharge of the duties entrusted to him.

In view of the reference of the subject to their Government, as announced by the British commissioners, the commissioners of the United States regarded it unnecessary to make any further observations upon the subject of the Alaskan boundary.

They then proposed that the Joint High Commission should proceed to a determination of the remaining subjects of difference named in the original protocol. They regarded it as unwise to further defer the adjustments so nearly concluded after full consideration. Several subjects were so far advanced as to assure the probability of a settlement. If, then, all differences except one could now be adjusted, would it not be a most commendable advance in neighbourly friendship? Could not our respective Governments be trusted to settle the principal remaining difference by direct negotiations?

The United States commissioners further regretted the suspension for any long time of the negotiations, in view of the progress already made in solving the differences.

They therefore urged that the Joint High Commission should advance to a conclusion their negotiations upon the remaining subjects as early as possible.

The British commissioners replied that all such questions should be deferred until the boundary question had been disposed of, either by agreement or a reference to arbitration. The manner in which they would be prepared to adjust some of the other important matters under consideration must depend, in their view, upon whether it is possible to arrive at a settlement of all the questions which might at any time occasion acute controversy and even conflict.

The Joint High Commission thereupon adjourned until Monday, February 20th, at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that, in the case of a communication of this kind, a motion for leave to introduce or an order is not necessary. It may be introduced by command of His Excellency, which is according to the English practice, and then, in order that a discussion or observations may not be prevented by the rules of the House, the Prime Minister will move that the communication be laid on the Table.

The PRIME MINISTER. I move that this communication be now laid on the Table, and be printed, and the rule 94 suspended.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like, Mr. Speaker, in the first place, to ask my right hon. friend, if he is not able to carry us further. This leaves us where the commission adjourned until the 2nd day of August, but it would be interesting, after all the discussion that has taken place and the statements given to the press by the United States—statements, in fact, I may say, semi-official—to know whether my right hon. friend is in a position to take the House into his confidence as to whether an agreement for an arbitration had been arrived at, or, at all events, for a modus vivendi pending arbitration, or as to whether an arrangement for an arbitration had been arrived at between the United States and Great Britain, but was prevented by the fact that the Canadian Government were not prepared to agree to the modus vivendi, as proposed. I do not know whether my right hon. friend is free to make any further communications; but, if so, should be glad to have them made now.

The PRIME MINISTER. There was no proposal whatever, I am at liberty to say, for a modus vivendi, pending the negotiations. What was proposed was the terms of an arbitration for a permanent settlement of this boundary, and these are under negotiation at this moment. I am not in a position—and regret it very much—as the negotiations are still pending, to give to the House communication of what is taking place. There have been communications in the American press, imputing one thing and another to Canada, but, so long as the negotiations are pending, I have no authority from the Imperial Government to make any communication to the House. With regard to a modus vivendi, I may say, there has been no proposal to have one, but a proposition was made to have a provisional boundary established on the Lynn Canal. For the last two years, we have had a provisional boundary accepted by the two countries, on the summit of White Pass and the summit of Chilkoot Pass, and a proposal was made to us a few days ago to have a provisional boundary put up on the Dalton Trail. We have sent a proposition in accordance with that, and I believe I will be in a position very soon to lay it before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, that the protocols—which they really are—as they exist between the two parties, were pretty fairly understood before, and this brings me to the conclusion that the position I took was the correct one, namely, that the statement of the difficulty, or the impasse, at which the commissioners had arrived with regard to the boundary question, and the remission of that for diplomatic treatment between the United States and Great Britain, virtually amounted to a suspension of the proceedings, and that the British commissioners ought not to have adjourned the proceedings of the commission, which practically were arrested until that question was disposed of. As the case was stated by the communication made to the public, under the authority of my right hon. friend and the Hon. Mr. Fairbanks, the leader of the American commission, it appeared that, although this difficulty had been reached in dealing with the question of the boundary, they had adjourned, after having remitted that question to their respective Governments, to the 2nd day of August, and without stating that the meeting on the 2nd day of August would only take place in case this subject, in the meantime, were referred to arbitration and the question practically settled by an international arbitration agreeable to both countries. I think, therefore, that the position, taken by the Government on that occasion, as now explained by these protocols and the statement with which we are now favoured, brings us very much to the same conclusion that the action taken—and, I think, taken very properly—by Her Majesty's commissioners on this question, was that, until the Alaskan boundary question was absolutely removed by settlement or by arbitration, no further proceedings should take place. I merely mention that in passing, because it, to my mind, presents the position taken by Her Majesty's commissioners on that occasion in a stronger and a better light than viewed in the light of the information we had when the commission broke up.

I may say, that I called the attention of my right hon. friend some time ago to what I regarded as a question that might assume a good deal of importance, and that was the adoption of the Venezuela precedent as the one to be followed in the case of the Alaskan boundary. How the United States of America could, for a single moment, raise any question or controversy upon a proposal, such as the British commissioners made, that the Venezuela precedent should be taken and adopted in the case of the Alaskan boundary, I am utterly at a loss to imagine. Because, as we all know, the Foreign Secretary and Prime Minister of Great Britain, Lord Salisbury, receded very much from the position he originally took in regard to the question, and a compromise was arrived at by which Great Britain agreed not to press her claim to any territory which was not shown to have been in adverse possession for over fifty years. This was a great concession. What I feared was that the adoption of that precedent in the case of Alaska might raise a very important question. It is true that it is only about twenty-seven years. I think, since the United States of America came into possession of Alaska, making their purchase from Russia and acquiring the rights of Russia as they were under the Treaty of 1825. But the Treaty of 1825 between Russia and Great Britain carries us away back for over seventy years. And we remember that my right hon. friend, and also, and more especially the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), notwithstanding a very strong caution from this side of the House made a declaration on the floor of Parliament that adverse possession had been had along that coast from time immemorial—that is the term used, I think, by the Minister of the Interior, meaning that it had been in possession of Russia, and afterwards of the United States as the purchaser of Russia's claims. I want to draw my right hon. friend's attention before it becomes too late—and until the matter is finally closed it is not too late—to the fact that, so far as Venezuelan boundary was concerned, it was a matter of comparative indifference to Great Britain whether this settlement or that settlement along the line in controversy should belong to one country or the other; but as it is a matter of immense importance to Canada that adverse possession should not establish a title to anything that was not included as belonging to Russia under the Treaty of 1825. That treaty between Russia and Great Britain established an actual line of demarkation as well as could be established on paper. It provided that the boundary should be a certain line of longitude until you come to Mount St. Elias, and from Mount St. Elias down to Prince of Wales' Island, a line ten marine leagues from the coast line was to be followed. The question, what is the coast line is the matter in controversy between Great Britain and the United States—whether it should follow the general coast line, or whether it should include the upper waters of the indentations or inlets. The contention of Great Britain always has been that the coast line should follow along the general contour of the sea-coast, not following the inlets to their upper waters. The point to which I wish to call special attention is whether Russia might not set up a claim that she has been in possession of that territory, and that, under a reference in which the Venezuela precedent was followed, the international experts would be precluded from declaring this to be territory belonging to Canada. So it might become a matter of the most vital importance to establish how far back the United States or the Russian claim of possession adverse to Great Britain could go so far as affects this line from Mount St. Elias to Prince of Wales Island. I do not intend to raise any controversy or discussion further than to draw my right hon. friend's attention to this point, as it might be an important point to consider before matters are concluded, and to express the confident hope that, under the arrangements that appear to have been pretty well arrived at by the Peace conference, this matter will undoubtedly be settled at no distant day by a reference to such an international board of arbitration as a question over which two such great nations as Great Britain and the United States cannot afford, in the 19th century, to have very long controversy.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If my hon. friend and the House will permit me, I desire to make only one or two observations upon the line of argument he has advanced. We came to the conclusion, after giving the matter our best thought, that the only rules which could be adopted in the position of things which existed in that distant part of the country, were the rules so recently adopted for the settlement of the Venezuelan difficulty. With regard to the occupation by Russia, I do not know how far it is a matter at the moment affecting the case.

Supposing it to be true that Russia had, at the head of the Lynn Canal, for instance, such possession or occupation as would constitute a title under the terms of the Venezuelan treaty, still, the fact remains that under our construction of the treaty, the line crosses the Lynn Canal at a point which would leave those settlements clearly within Canadian territory. If it be determined by the arbitrators that that is the real line under the Treaty of 1825, then, Russia, by recognizing that line as the boundary gave up her claim to the territory on which those settlements were, notwithstanding that she had those settlements and was, in that sense, in possession.

I will not follow the argument further. I hope, with my hon. friend, in fact, I feel sure with him, that we shall have the question referred, and I hope before long, to arbitration. The experts and lawyers will find abundant work in the settlement of the questions involved, and I do not know that any discussion in Parliament to-day can throw more light on the subject.

Mr. WALLACE. The Prime Minister has stated that the British blue-books contain the information he has imparted to us in these protocols. I would like to ask if the British blue-books contain information about the other subjects that were under consideration by the commissioners?

The PRIME MINISTER. No, they contain no information on the other subjects. This subject of the boundary was referred by the commissioners to their respective Governments, the Government of Great Britain and the Government of the United States. Therefore, the question is no longer within the jurisdiction of the commission, and that is the reason why it has been given to the public now. The other matters are still under consideration and within the jurisdiction of the commission.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERY OVERSEER LENOIR.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to lay upon the Table of the House certain papers relating to the dismissal of Fishery Overseer Lenoir.

Motion agreed to.

SHERIFF OF YUKON TERRITORY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked:

Referring to a return to an Address of the House of Commons, 15th May, 1899, relating to the appointment of a sheriff for Yukon territory—

- (a) Was a bond given by the sheriff ?
 (b) Was an oath taken by the sheriff referred to ?
 (c) Was the clerk of the court while Mr. Wade was out of the Yukon district and before Mr. Girouard was appointed ?
 (d) Did Mr. Snell act as clerk of the court for any period, and if so, what period ?
 (e) If Mr. Snell so acted, under what authority did he act ?
 (f) If he acted, was a commission issued to him ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to question No. 1 I would say (a) That Mr. Constantine, the inspector of Mounted Police, was the first sheriff appointed to the Yukon Territory. He received no salary for his services until after his retirement as sheriff, and no bond seems to have been exacted of him. He resigned his office. Next, Mr. Harper was sheriff. He was in the territory. He was written to, and informed that he would be required to give a bond, but up to the present time no bond has been received ; (b) Cannot say, but, no doubt, as the sheriff is an officer of the court, the judge would administer the oath of office before he entered upon his duties ; (c) H. A. Bliss acted as clerk of the court. Have no doubt he was appointed by the court to discharge these duties during Mr. Wade's absence, and before the appointment of Mr. Girouard ; (d) We have no information in the department in respect to Mr. Snell. If he so acted, he was doubtless appointed by the court, and would act under its authority ; (e) Answered above ; (f) The department of Justice has no information upon the subject. The distance is so great, the country has hitherto been so difficult of access, that if an officer resigns it might be unknown for months afterwards, and under these circumstances it is fitting that the judge should appoint an officer to discharge these duties, as in the Yukon district the judge constitutes the court, and the clerk is an officer of his court.

COMMISSION TO MAJOR WALSH.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

By virtue of what Act and section thereof, if any, and if no statute by virtue of what authority or warrant was the commission under the Great Seal issued to Major Walsh as chief executive officer for the Yukon district ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Revised Statutes of Canada, section 1, chapter 19, as amended by 56 Vict., chapter 14.

POST OFFICE, VICTORIA, B.C.

Mr. PRIOR (by Mr. Hughes) asked :

1. Is the ownership of the old post office site and building in Victoria, B.C., vested in the Dominion Government or in the Provincial Government ?

2. Under what title is it held ?
 3. Has the Government offered this property for sale either by public or private tender ?
 4. If so, what offers, if any, were received for same, in whose names, and for what amounts ?
 5. Has the Government rented out the building, or any portion of it, for business purposes ?
 6. If so, to whom, and at what annual rentals ?
 7. Does the Government pay any municipal taxes on same ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Ownership vested in the Dominion Government. 2. By a provincial Act dated 1st of July, 1876. 3. Yes, by public advertisement. 4. Two tenders were received, viz. : Thomas Bros. & Co., $12,500 ; A. Williams & Co., $20,000. 5. Yes, a portion of the building is rented out. 6. Hardress Clarke, $75 per month ; Humber & Campbell, $55 per month ; Lewis Blank, $70 per month ; Danes & Ruckhabor, $55 per month. 7. No.

RELATIVES OF J. S. WILLISON.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. Is J. W. Willison, Crown timber agent in Yukon, a cousin of J. S. Willison, Esq., editor of the Toronto "Globe" newspaper ?
 2. Is William Wright, an employee in the recording office at Dawson, a nephew of the said J. S. Willison ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Neither the pedigree of the editor of the "Globe" nor of the officers mentioned, is on record in the department, and the Government have no information upon the subject. I am quite unable to answer the hon. gentleman's question.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTES OF CANADA.

Mr. HENDERSON (by Mr. Hughes) asked :

1. Is it the intention of the Government to provide for a consolidation of the Statutes of Canada this year ?
 2. If not, when may such consolidation be expected ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not in a position to give any information on this subject to my hon. friend to-day. The matter is under consideration.

REBUILDING OF THE SOURIS BREAK-WATER.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Has the Government had under consideration a certain claim for damages arising from a contract awarded to Messrs. Thomas Mellish and George Wightman for rebuilding the Souris breakwater, in Prince Edward Island, about the year 1895 ?
 2. Is the Government aware that the contractors in this case were prevented from beginning work as early in the season as desirable owing to delay on the part of the Department of Public Works in attending to the signing of the contract and delays on the part of the Government engineer in charge ?

3. Is the Government aware that such delay retarded the prosecution of the work, and left it only partially completed when the stormy season and winter set in, with the result that the greater part of the work constructed was carried away?

4. If the Government has had this claim under consideration, is it intended to repay those contractors for their loss?

5. If the Government resists payment, on what grounds does it base such resistance?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes. 2. No, the contractors signified their acceptance of their contract on the 15th of July, 1893, the contract was sent down on the 25th, and was signed on the 3rd of August following, so that only about 15 days elapsed between the acceptance and signing of the contract. 3. No, the following memorandum made in June, 1897, by the then chief engineer of the department, gives what has been so far considered by the department as the correct statement of the facts: Messrs. Wightman & Mellish signed their contract on or about the 3rd of August, 1893. On the 23rd of August 150 feet of breakwater was carried away. Mr. Hogan was immediately asked to prepare a plan showing what new work would be required to fill the breach made by the sea. On the 31st of August, Mr. Hogan was authorized to obtain an offer from Wightman & Mellish to repair the breach. On the 1st of September, the contractors offered to do the necessary repairs for $3,200. On the 2nd, authority was given to accept the contractors' offer. On the 4th they were notified. The work was finished on the 24th of October, and on the 6th of November an account in favour of the contractors for $3,200 was rendered. While they were thus repairing the breach they commenced work on their contract, which consisted in the construction of a new timber block. Whether they neglected to properly load their crib or not, it is on record that on the 8th of September what was done of this contract was carried away by storm. They, however, continued the work and completed it on the 22nd of June, and the final estimate was rendered on the 10th of July. (Signed), Louis Coste. 4. The department has in its possession a receipt signed by the contractors on the 30th July, 1894, accepting the sum of $5,600 then paid to them in full compensation and final settlement of all claim which they may have or have had in connection with their contract. A copy of the receipt is attached:

Department of Public Works, Canada.

Received from Her Majesty Queen Victoria, represented by the hon. the Minister of Public Works of Canada, the sum of five thousand and six hundred dollars and no cents of lawful money of Canada, being the balance due us on our contract price for the construction of an additional block to the breakwater at Souris, P.E.I., the said sum being accepted by us in full compensation and final settlement of all claims which we may have or have had in connection with the said contract.

Mr. MARTIN.

In consideration whereof, we do hereby acquit and release Her said Majesty, represented as aforesaid, her heirs and successors, from all past and future claims and demands whatsoever for the same in connection therewith.

Signed at Montague, this 30th day of July, A.D. 1894.

POSTMASTER OF EAST TORONTO.

Mr. MACLEAN (by Mr. Sproule) asked:

Has any person or persons been recommended to the Postmaster General for the vacant position of postmaster of East Toronto? If so, what are the names?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Yes, the widow of the late postmaster was recommended for the position.

POSTMASTER OF STE. EULALIE.

Mr. GAUVREAU (by Mr. Flint) asked:

1. Was an inquiry held by the Post Office Department in the matter of Mr. Legris, postmaster of Ste. Eulalie, county of Nicolet?

2. If so, by whom and when?

3. Was a report made, and what are the conclusions thereof?

4. Subsequently to the inquiry were not affidavits by the postmaster, or by other parties, forwarded to the department?

5. If so, by whom?

6. Is it the intention of the hon. Minister to discharge Mr. Legris should the report not be favourable to him?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Yes. 2. By the post office inspector of the Quebec division, acting through Mr. J. H. Larue of his office. 3. An inquiry was held on the 6th April, 1898. The inspector's report was made under date the 3rd of May, 1898, and it showed that the postmaster's assistant (his wife), who, having lost a post card which had arrived at the Ste. Eulalie post office, and concerning the arrival of which she had notified the addressee, substituted another card for it, on which she wrote the substance, as she remembered it, of the communication on the original card. This, it appears, was done without the knowledge of the postmaster, and, as the assistant alleges, under the influence of great alarm at the discovery that she had mislaid a card which she remembered was marked 'pressé.' Charges were also made against the postmaster of having sometimes misdelivered letters, read post cards and opened packets of newspaper matter. 4. Yes. 5. By Alphonse Gaudet, of St. Celestin, and Joseph Ernest Houde, of Three Rivers, their tenor being in the direction of exculpating the assistant from a charge brought against her of having given information (alleged to have been derived from a post card) respecting the business relations of the two parties.

Both testified that no such relations existed between them as were assumed in the charge and that no such post card as mentioned therein had ever been sent by Mr. Houde to Mr. Gaudet. Whatever action is taken will be such as the facts appear to warrant.

PURCHASE OF IRON DOORS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. HODGINS (by Mr. Hughes) asked :

1. Were a number of iron doors purchased for the public buildings during the past year ?
2. If so, how many ?
3. By whom were they supplied ?
4. Were tenders called for by advertisement or by letter ?
5. If by letter, how many parties were notified ?
6. To whom was the order given ?
7. Why were not tenders publicly invited ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). On behalf of the Minister of Public Works, Mr. Tarte, I beg to answer the hon. gentleman's questions as follows:—1. Yes. 2. Four sets. 3. The Edward Cavanagh Co., Montreal. 4. By letter. 5. One. 6. The Edward Cavanagh Co. 7. Because it would have been a useless expenditure of money.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL.

Mr. WILLIAM J. POUPORE (Pontiac). Mr. Speaker, on the 31st of May last the privilege was accorded to me by the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to introduce a discussion of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal question. On that occasion, as you will remember, Sir, there was a very animated debate, in which hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House took part. At the close of that debate, I was very much pleased with the concluding portion of the reply of the right hon. First Minister to the proposition which was made by me on behalf of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company. The concluding words of the right hon. Prime Minister were these; speaking of other enterprises, the Prime Minister said :

At the present time, unfortunately, the bondholders of the Chignecto Ship Railway are in a very unfortunate position, because they have been induced to invest their money by the moral sanction and authority of the Canadian Government. That is unfortunate in many ways, and my hon. friend will, I am sure, agree with me that it is the duty of this Government to take every means to see that no scheme is put upon the English market with its sanction unless it has before it a fairly reasonable assurance of the commercial success of the scheme.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here are the words to which I want to draw your particular attention. The Prime Minister proceeds :

When that is the position of this project, the Government will be prepared to look into it.

Certainly the scheme is one that has merit in it. Assuredly it is one that is not to be dismissed contemptuously. On the contrary, my hon. friend has made a case, and a case which the Government is bound to take into consideration ; but he will agree with me, I am sure, that he cannot fairly expect the Government at this time to take up the scheme, although he can expect the Government will give to it its very best consideration.

Mr. Speaker, since that debate took place and since that pronouncement of the right hon. First Minister, a good deal of agitation has taken place, not only in Canada, but in Great Britain, over this great canal project. Meetings have been held generally throughout the Ottawa valley. And, when I say the Ottawa valley, I mean the whole district lying between the city of Montreal and the mouth of the French River. I claim that the Ottawa valley extends from Montreal City clear through to the Georgian Bay, because that whole section of country is tributary to the city of Montreal, and forms practically part of the Ottawa valley. In addition to that, we have a valley running from Mattawa to the head of Temiscamingue Lake, which is a portion of the Ottawa valley, and this country is tributary to Montreal and to the seaports of Canada also. As I have remarked, meetings were held at various towns along the Ottawa River, from Hawkesbury to Mattawa. We find a general consensus of opinion that the Government of the day should lend to this project any assistance necessary to start it towards construction and to carry it to completion. We not only find that this is the opinion of the people of the Ottawa valley, but we find that the same opinion prevails in Europe ; we find, in fact, that it prevails in the United States of America. On the occasion of a visit of American gentlemen here last January—the Ticket Agents' Association—we found, at a dinner given in the Russell House, these gentlemen saying that, if the engineering difficulties were not insurmountable, and if a sufficient depth of water could be found at the water level, American capital could be found to push this work to completion.

If that be the view entertained by some very progressive American gentlemen, is it surprising that we should expect that the Government of Canada should give to this project all the assistance in its power, in order that it may be carried to completion ? In addition to the other meetings to which I have referred, we find that the different boards of trade in the Ottawa Valley have endorsed the scheme, and have passed resolutions asking the Government of Canada to assist it. We find that the county councils throughout the whole Ottawa Valley have unanimously adopted resolutions asking the Government to assist this scheme, so as to enable those who are willing to invest their money, to proceed with the work. In addition, we find that the public opinion of the country is so much in favour of the project that the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), at a banquet given in the Monument Nationale, Montreal, expressed himself entirely in favour of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal. Let me give a reference to the remarks of the Minister of Public Works on that occasion :

Mr. Tarte is grappling hard with the question of transportation. In his speech in Montreal on Tuesday night he stated that negotiations were going on between the Government and the Grand Trunk for a route between Collingwood and Toronto so as to bring the upper lakes in direct communication over the Grand Trunk Railway with the Intercolonial Railway and maritime seaboard.

The Minister of Public Works says that he would recommend the further deepening of the Toronto and Collingwood harbours if the Grand Trunk instead of carrying its trade to Portland would take it to Montreal and deliver to the ocean steamers in the summer.

Mr. Tarte's idea is to make Montreal the Buffalo of Canada. With elevators in Montreal in which to store the grain, the same as at Buffalo, he says, there is no reason why this should not be done. In winter the Erie Canal is closed, and the trade goes by the railways to the seaboard. The Intercolonial Railway ought to be able to handle a large part of the traffic from Montreal which now finds its way by American routes.

As a result of proper harbour improvements, Mr. Tarte gives Kingston as an illustration. He sent a dredge there and had the harbour deepened. Now two additional elevators were built at Kingston, and 15,000,000 bushels of grain were handled there. The department gave improved facilities to the Parry Sound at Coteau, and about 15,000,000 bushels of grain are now handled at that point.

Mr. Tarte is surprised at the statement which came from Toronto that the Government was side-tracking that city by recognizing the Parry Sound road. He did not believe in this. Trade would flow in its natural channel, and there was enough for both routes. "If I had my way," said Mr. Tarte, "I would build the Georgian Bay Canal and I would make traffic arrangements with the Parry Sound in connection with the Intercolonial, and I would like to see the Collingwood and Toronto route straightened out. With the improvement of our water and rail communication and the proper equipment of the harbour at Montreal, there is no limitation to the possibilities of development in the Canadian carrying trade."

Now, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that any thoughtful Canadian will at once see that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte)—who, I regret to see, is not in his seat at this moment—has grasped the correct idea as to the solution of the transportation question in Canada. He sees Canada's needs in this direction, and has seen them for some time, and I judge of him by his actions: he has done everything in his power to improve the facilities of the different ports of Canada. He is now ridiculed by some, because he speaks of expending more money. Spending more money to do what? Spending more money to improve the harbour accommodation in Montreal. Is he to be condemned for that? I say, that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), in taking the ground he has, in expressing himself as he has, and in doing as he has done since he became Minister of Public Works, has stamped himself, in my estimation, as a statesman of the first water. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) realizes that, in order to bring our traffic through Canadian seaports, we must spend money to improve the facilities of these seaports. I can quite understand that it may be somewhat distasteful to some of my friends, that I should thus express myself, but I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that with me this is a non-political question. It must be kept non-political, for, if we were to bring it into the ordinary, every-day party fights in this country, we could never hope to succeed with this project. In my estimation, Sir, this question is away and above any political partisanship; it is away and above any little sectarian cry that may be raised; it is a national question; it is an Imperial question, and I am one of those who is willing to give credit where credit is due, when I see any Minister so conducting himself and managing his department as to assist in solving this very great problem of cheap transportation. I again want to quote from my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). In his speech on the Address, he thus expressed himself :

"But I ask this House and the country if the time has not come when the port of Montreal should be made a genuine national harbour? The port of Montreal is the distributing point between the east and the west. Is it not a crying shame that out of about 50,000,000 tons of trade on the great lakes, on that magnificent reservoir of great lakes, we get scarcely anything, although our St. Lawrence route is the shortest? Are we not bound to make it the best? It is the shortest, and it is possible to make it the best. I say that not only is it possible, but it has already been done. Since taking this office I have felt a deep interest in the transportation question. It is not a Montreal question; it is not a St. John or Halifax question; it is not a Toronto question—it is a national question par excellence."

He discussed in detail the several proposals for bringing the trade of the lakes and the North-west to Montreal. "A great deal," continued Mr. Tarte, "has been said about the Georgian Bay Canal. I am not prepared to give my opinion to-day as to the best mode of carrying on that work, but I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion that project is worthy of all consideration."

This is the comment of the Ottawa "Citizen" upon these observations :

While the "Citizen" has had occasion to animadvert upon certain expenditures authorized by the Minister of Public Works, it congratulates him upon his recognition of the merits of the projected Georgian Bay Canal. It is a work which will develop an important portion of the province of Ontario, and greatly facilitate and cheapen the cost of transportation from the lakes to the seaboard, and we can assure the Government that in fostering this enterprise it will merit and receive the approval of the people of Canada.

Again, let me quote from the Ottawa "Citizen," under the heading "A General Rally Needed":

"Canada will be the highway of the world," according to Sir William Van Horne, when certain conditions are complied with. And there is probably no better authority on such subjects than Sir William. But the condition must be complied with, and promptly. What those conditions are have been fully described, but they have been very clearly summarized by Mr. Tarte in the statement which appeared in these columns last night. The great need at present is adequate harbour accommodation, and this must be provided with all possible expedition. The country will not object to any expenditure, even though the figure be large, for this purpose. Every dollar so expended will yield a hundred-fold within a year or two. With the ports on the St. Lawrence, and sea-coast, placed on a satisfactory footing, there need be no doubt as to the result. Nor need there be any doubt as to the route by which the traffic from the North-west will pass, and the Minister of Public Works does not speak on that phase of the question with any ambiguity. The traffic from the west will, in his opinion, naturally flow to Montreal, but he appears also to see clearly that it will be by way of the Ottawa. "As to the Parry Sound Railway, the case is a very clear one indeed." Quite so. Quietly, and without any great effort, that road has demonstrated the fact that it supplies a great want.

Now, you will see that the hon. Minister of Public Works, who has shown himself on different occasions to be a man of action and a man willing to keep pace with the times, is aware, as I am, and as are other men who have taken the trouble to look into this question, that the American people at the present moment are putting forth tremendous efforts to improve their waterways. At a dinner given recently in New York, at which there were present some 1,700 guests, all men of high financial standing, Mayor Van Wyck, who presided, pointed out that Canada was now being exercised and agitated over the construction of the shortest and most direct route to the seaboard from the great lakes, by way of the Ottawa River; and he sounded a note of warning to his hearers that the American people must be up and doing, that they could not afford to remain dormant or sluggish, that the moment the Ottawa River channel was opened up from the great lakes to Montreal, a great part of the traffic which now goes by Buffalo and the Erie Canal would be deflected and brought down the Ottawa River route. This was not the only occasion on which that opinion has been expressed by Americans. The following is an article from the New York "Sun":—

THE PROPOSED SHIP CANAL IN CANADA.

The idea of connecting Montreal with the upper great lakes by means of a canal is again urgently advocated by Mr. McLeod Stewart, a son of the Canadian politician by whom the scheme was first brought forward some fifty years ago. It is worth while to note what may be said for the project, if only to emphasize the duty of prosecuting with energy the work of widening and deepening our own Erie Canal.

The proposed canal would run from the mouth of the French River at the northern end of Georgian Bay, the north-eastern angle of Lake Huron, to Montreal, on the St. Lawrence, by a line as nearly straight as any stretch of inland navigation can be expected to follow. Its advocates maintain not only that it would shorten the distance between Chicago and Liverpool materially, and do away with the delay and expense incident to transshipments, but also that—owing to the configuration of the country traversed—it could be constructed at a relatively small cost. Of these assertions the former at all events seems to be borne out by the facts. The distance between Georgian Bay and Montreal is 430 miles; the length of the whole route from Chicago to Liverpool by way of the projected canal would be 3,780 miles, while by way of Buffalo, the Erie Canal and Hudson River to New York, and thence to Liverpool, the distance is 4,495 miles, or via the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals 4,148 miles.

Now, as regards the cost of construction. It appears from the report of the surveyors made half a century ago that of the 430 miles between Georgian Bay and Montreal only about 58 would need to be canalized. The rest of the waterway is provided by nature in the form of a chain of lakes and rivers. The French River itself is a series of small connected lakes, after which, as you proceed eastward, comes Lake Nipissing, 40 miles in length; next are encountered Trout Lake, Turtle Lake, Talon Lake, Aiguilles Lake and Chant Lake. The confluence of the Mattawan and Ottawa rivers is then reached, and the latter waterway is followed to its junction with the St. Lawrence. It was doubtless owing to the fact that so little portage was required on this route that Champlain was led to adopt it in 1615 on his way to the great inland seas of the continent; for the same reason it formed for many years the principal channel for carrying on the business of the Hudson's Bay Company.

The cost originally computed by Government engineers was $25,000,000, but this was for a canal only 10 feet deep and from 100 to 60 feet wide. It remains to be seen how much this figure would have to be increased for a canal possessing depth and width enough to admit vessels of the modern type proceeding directly from Liverpool to Chicago.

This is a mistaken idea, Mr. Speaker. There is no intention of opening up a waterway that will admit vessels which will proceed all the way from Liverpool to Chicago. This to my mind would be absurd. Sea-going vessels are not adapted to river or canal navigation. But I will quote the concluding portion of this article to show that American gentlemen are on the qui vive in regard to this question. The article continues:

As the present tendency of deep-sea cargo ships is toward enormous dimensions, beyond the possibility of accommodation in canal locks, of which there would be many on the proposed route, it may be deemed wise to contemplate a single transshipment at Montreal, and to construct a canal of moderate size, from 15 to 16 feet in depth, suitable for lake steamers.

The objection to the projected waterway is the number of locks that would be required. Even though the level of the summit lakes should be lowered, as we are told it might be, the highest point of the canal would be 624 feet above Montreal, and 83 feet above Georgian Bay. There are no mechanical obstacles, however, that might not be surmounted, provided the canal be designed for vessels drawing not more than 16 feet. There is reason to believe that the scheme is being earnestly commended to the Canadian Government.

While I am on that head, I would like to quote another of the American papers to show this House that this question is receiving general attention everywhere. Here is an article which appeared in the Utica "Globe" of the 1st of April, 1899 :

CANADA'S SHORT WATERWAY.

American Commerce Face to Face with a Killing Rival.

The recent announcement of plans for the construction of great elevators and other terminal appliances for the grain trade at Montreal by American capitalists is highly interesting and significant, says the New York "Tribune." Taken alone it would mean a menace to the grain trade of New York and the other Atlantic ports of the United States. For the distance from Montreal to Liverpool is 250 miles less than that from New York. But, taken in connection with Canada's great canal scheme, it is immeasurably more significant.

We have already told of the improvements that have been made to the Welland and St. Lawrence canals, and their vast superiority over the canals of New York state, but the Dominion is not satisfied with them. It has entered upon the construction of a short-cut waterway from the St. Lawrence to the upper lakes without entering Lakes Ontario and Erie at all.

I wish that what is stated here was true. It says that the Government has entered upon this work. It has not started yet, I regret to say, but I hope it soon will start.

It now has a canal from Montreal to Ottawa. It will extend it along the line of the Ottawa River to Lake Nipissing, and thence along French River to Georgian Bay and Lake Huron. It has indeed actually begun this vast enterprise, and expects to have it done and the whole waterway open to traffic within three years. At first this canal will not be more than twice the depth of the Erie Canal. Even that will permit large lake barges and steamers to pass through it directly from Duluth, Port Arthur and elsewhere on the lakes to tide-water or to the great terminal which Americans are to build at Montreal. But it is intended in time to deepen it so as to give passage to ocean steamers. Then the latter will be able to take on cargoes on Lake Superior and go straight across to Liverpool without breaking bulk.

That is not correct.

This directness of route will in itself give Canada a great advantage over the United States. But the route is also much shorter than any of ours. It is 375 miles shorter than the St. Lawrence River route, and 450 miles—

That is another mistake. It is 900 miles shorter.

—shorter than by way of the Erie Canal. The distance from Chicago to Liverpool by way of the Ottawa Canal will be 700 miles shorter than by way of the Erie Canal.

There is a contradiction there.

Moreover, while the Erie route includes 360 miles of artificial waterway, the St. Lawrence route 71 miles, the Ottawa route will have only 30 miles, all the rest being natural waterway. It is calculated that the Ottawa route will be in point of time four days shorter than the Erie and a day and a half shorter than the St. Lawrence.

Such is the rivalry which Canada, backed by all the resources of the British Empire, is about to offer to the grain and other trade of the northern United States. It is idle to suppose that the merchandise which comes through the Sault Ste. Marie and the Strait of Mackinaw will come to New York on its way to Europe, with costly and tedious transshipments at Buffalo and New York, when it can go by way of Ottawa and Montreal without a single transshipment and in four days less time, or rather with the transshipments on the Erie route a week less. When it is possible, as it will be in three years, to send a cargo from any point on Lake Superior or Lake Michigan clear to Liverpool by way of Ottawa as quickly as it can be sent to New York by way of the Erie Canal, all the European trade of the upper lakes, both Canadian and United States, will go by way of the Canadian canal. That is the interesting prospect which confronts American commerce.

There is an article written by one of the leading papers of the United States, which expresses the American idea about this project, and is not that sufficient of itself to awaken the people of Canada to the great necessity of pushing through at once this short waterway to the ocean. If there be one thing more than another that ought to induce our Government to give assistance to this waterway, that very thing expressed in the articles which I have quoted from the American press is the one which ought to prompt the Government to take action.

What is the position of Canada as regards the transportation question? Is it not a fact that last year, with all our facilities, with all our railways, with our enlarged canal system, with all put together, the total export from Montreal to Europe amounted to less than 38,000,000 bushels of grain? Is it not also a statistical fact that from the port of Buffalo 267,000,000 bushels of grain were sent on to the seaports of the United States. Now, we find that of that 267,000,000 bushels of grain shipped from Buffalo to the seaports of the United States, a large proportion came from Canadian territory. We find that the grain produced in Canada is not shipped from Canadian ports. On the contrary, it is allowed to go to American seaports, to build up those ports to the detriment of our Canadian seaports. This is why I felt it my duty to pay the compliment which I did to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), when I said that he properly gauged the situation, when he declared on several occasions that the way to bring traffic by the shortest route to Europe is to improve our harbour facilities at Montreal and Quebec. In that he struck the keynote, because without those facilities we cannot accommodate the traffic that must eventually come to those ports; but if we open up the Ottawa River Canal, if we deepen the river to fourteen feet, with our St. Lawrence waterway, we are going to attract, I firmly believe—and that is said by men who are competent authority—from the Sault Ste. Marie Canal a large proportion of that traffic that now goes direct to Buffalo from the Duluth and Lake Superior district. It cannot be otherwise. Trade will follow the shortest and cheapest route—and we have the shortest and cheapest route—the only trouble being that it is not navigable at present. It will require the expenditure of a good deal of money to make it navigable, but what will that expenditure amount to as compared with the advantages that will accrue to Canada.

If we are going to make Montreal and Quebec the first seaports of this continent, if we are going to divert to those ports the traffic that now flows to Buffalo and keeps running day and night, the whole year round, the fifty-two elevators in that city and every railway that can come there, and during the navigable season, to the fullest extent, the capacity of the Erie Canal, and which traffic is still too great to be accommodated with promptitude at that port at all times, we must open up this short waterway. Is it unreasonable for us to think that if we open up this short waterway, which is a thousand miles closer to Liverpool than any other route, we will divert traffic by that route? And in doing so, what will be the effect at Ottawa, Quebec and Montreal and other stopping places along the route? Will it not be to increase the population during the construction itself, and is it not reasonable to suppose that a certain proportion of that population must become fixed? Why, the construction and opening of this waterway will not only increase the population, but it will develop to-day resources we are now stumbling against and that are now developing themselves, you may say. Go out twenty miles from where I stand, and you will find that we have discovered gold; you will find that a company is organized and have sunk a shaft, and is now extending its shaft down to a level of 130 feet. In the immediate vicinity of that there are other discoveries, and there is nothing to lead any one to doubt that we have untold wealth in our Ottawa valley. I need not repeat, but you will remember that last year I pointed out that on the Calumet Island, in my county, we have a deposit of galena, remarkable for its vastness, and a deposit of cobalt, lead and nickel right on that small island. Go a little further east, and at Portage du Fort we have a deposit of marble, than which there is no better to be found anywhere. In fact, I do not know of any place where you can find it so good—an immense deposit that cannot to-day be handled for the want of easy means of transportation. These are some of the things that this canal will develop, and by the development of those resources, we must add to the population of Canada. It is a very elementary statement to make that what we want in Canada is an increase of our population, and anything that will conduce to the increase of our population is a thing which Canada ought to do. We have vast areas of land, arable land fit for settlement, for agricultural purposes, vast areas of land fit for mining purposes. Take the New Ontario idea. We have immense districts there opening up every day, producing valuable minerals.

Now, the opening of this canal must of necessity serve that vast region. Outside of any other consideration, the mineral products of that country alone would warrant the Government in taking up this project and guaranteeing the bonds which it is necessary should be guaranteed before any company will undertake the construction of the canal. But, apart from the minerals, let us consider the other resources of the country. Let us take up the pulp question, upon which I said a few words in my address of last year. We find to-day that the pulp industry of Canada stands second to none in the country, so far as our woods and forests are concerned. You have not far to travel from this Chamber to see the amount of money that is invested and is being invested every day in the different portions of the Ottawa district—and I speak of the Ottawa district alone—in the erection of mills and the equipping of manufacturing establishments to produce pulp. This simply means the development of one of our great resources of a kind of wood that heretofore has been looked upon as valueless. In days gone by the province of Quebec, as well as the northern part of Ontario had as its principal, almost its only source of wealth, its pine timber. When the pine timber was removed, it was supposed that almost no other resource remained. But we find that the pulp industry is using everything that years ago was supposed to be valueless, and we find that these woods, hitherto so little regarded have become one of the greatest resources of the Ottawa valley. Then in addition to the mines and the forests there is another source of wealth, concerning which but little has been said—I speak of the production of power by electricity. In this connection I would like to call to your attention certain portions of a very valuable paper which was read at this year's meeting of the Royal Society of Canada by the President, Mr. T. C. Keefer. The subject of this address is: "Canadian water-power, and electrical products in relation to the undeveloped resources of the Dominion." In my speech of last year, I said it was estimated that some two million horse-power could be produced between the city of Montreal and the mouth of the French River. Many people thought that I was shooting over the mark. I think I can show that I was quite within the mark. I made a calculation upon the basis of the price of electrical power delivered in Montreal. I found that it sold in Montreal at $25 per horse-power per year. Now, I simply figured it out this way: If we have two million of horse-power of electricity in the Ottawa River and only get $2 per horsepower per year, we shall have a revenue of $4,000,000 from electricity alone. In this relation I will read a portion of this paper which was read by the President of the Royal Society of Canada, a society for which every gentleman in this House and every gentleman in Canada entertains the very highest respect because it is composed of the highest men in our country intellectually and scientifically :

The substitution of electricity for steam as the motive power for railways on many roads is regarded as inevitable sooner or later. It has already taken place as regards suburban railways, notably in the case of the Charlevoix road and Hull and Aylmer Railway, where water-power is doing the work which has heretofore been done by coal. The chief obstacles to an early change on the larger roads are the hundreds of millions invested in locomotives, and the very large outlay required to equip existing steam roads with the electric system. The principal inducement would be the passenger service, owing to the increased speed possible, it being confidently stated that, with electricity, a speed considerably over 100 miles per hour could be attained. Moreover, there would be entire abolition of the poisonous smoke which drops upon the Pullman in preference to any coach ahead of it.

While the conversion of trunk lines would be attended with a cost which is for the present prohibitory, this objection does not apply to new lines which may be worked independently or in connection with electric ones. When the time arrives for such railways, water-power will have a field of usefulness of which we can at present form little conception. Water-wheels and wires would displace the coal-docks, the coal-laden vessels, the huge coal-yards, and the trains, for distributing their contents over hundreds of miles of lines.

An interior line, connecting Lake St. John, on the Saguenay, with Lake Témiscamingue, on the Ottawa (which could ultimately be extended via Missanabi, Nepigon and Lac Seul to the Saskatchewan) would be a colonization road, removed from the frontier, and one which could be worked, possibly altogether, by water-power, and open a virgin tract in which electro-chemical and electro-metallurgical industries might arise, as well as those connected with the products of the forests and the mine.

That is his reference to the uses in which electricity can be put. Now, he deals with the transportation question, the one I am so feebly trying to make myself understood about :

The more extended use of our water-power in the immediate future for manufacturing and mining purposes, especially for the electro-chemical and metallurgical productions, naturally leads to the consideration of the character of the output, especially with regard to markets, and transportation problems generally.

Transportation next to production is the most important commercial question to a country of vast distances, and low-priced products affording great tonnage, such as we produce, and for which we have expended hundreds of millions in canals annually, harbours, lighthouses and steamers, a sum disproportioned to our realized wealth, as it certainly is to our population. But, "noblesse oblige," we possess a vast estate, and are compelled to develop it and await results.

Mr. POUPORE.

The question of transportation determines, to a great extent, the existence, or otherwise, of the possible industry, and enhances or diminishes the value of every article of export just in proportion to its efficiency and economy. On the other hand, where transportation is necessarily expensive, cheap production may maintain an industry, and here is where our abundant water-power may come in.

The geographical position of Canada in relation to the commercial centre of gravity of the North American continent is at least noteworthy. This centre is very near Lake Erie. From the western end of this lake the water route to the Atlantic, at the Straits of Belle Isle, follows the general direction of a great circle, which cuts the commercial heart of Europe, the shortest route, or "air line," which cuts Liverpool. Our two peninsulas, the Sarnia-Detroit, and that at Sault Ste. Marie, which are the railway gates of the lake region, afford the most direct as well as the only land routes to the Atlantic for all the north-western states, and are traversed by the trunk lines of railway. From Lake Erie, water communication on the largest scale extends through Lake Huron to the extremities of Lakes Michigan and Superior. One-third of the population of the United States are dependent upon the great lakes largely as to exports and imports, and wholly as to rates, which are fixed by the water for the rail routes.

One-half of the population of the United States is found within a radius of 400 miles from Cleveland, a Lake Erie port claimed to be second only to the Clyde as a ship-building one, and also the largest iron ore market in the world.

The paper and pulp industry, as well as some of the electro-chemicals and metallurgical ones (to the present list of which many additions may be made), are distinguished by the large tonnage produced, the output of several pulp mills exceeding 100 tons per day. For this the St. Lawrence is the natural route for exportation, and to it this heavy tonnage is of the greatest importance as a means of attracting tramps as well as liners during the open season. Increase of sea tonnage into the St. Lawrence is essential to her inland commerce ; by it only can sufficient west-bound freights be secured to attract a proper share of the commerce of the lakes, after all has been done to give to the latter a quick despatch at Montreal or Quebec. There is probably no place in the world where inland transportation is carried on with greater expedition and economy than in the valley of the St. Lawrence. This is due to the character of the inland navigation, unequalled elsewhere, and to the influence which this exerts upon the railways competing with it ; and also, because the valley of the St. Lawrence is not only the greatest highway for agricultural products, but of mineral ones, as well as of the products of the forest and the fisheries.

More than half of the iron ore produced in the United States is mined around Lake Superior. Into this lake an increasing number of railways are pouring the produce of the vast wheat fields between it and the Rocky Mountains, and thus placing this grain within a thousand miles of Montreal, which is the nearest seaport by hundreds of miles, and the only one which can be reached by vessels capable of navigating the lakes.

Without tiring the House in reading the whole of this paper, we find that over one-half of the iron used in the United States is taken from the Lake Superior region. Not only so, but I have an article from an English paper on the same subject, showing that England, if we had this short waterway, would transport ore from Lake Superior to England, they would use the ores of Lake Superior in the English furnaces. This is a matter of very great importance, as I am sure it will be admitted by every one who has given any thought to the question. Here is an article which appeared in the "Canadian Trade Review":

The exportation of Lake Superior iron ore to England may appear to be a rosy dream of the dim future, but with an all-water route, English capital in control of a good ore property, best machinery at loading and unloading points, and ocean-going vessels specially constructed for such trade, it will be accomplished within a very short period. It is a well-known fact that the native ores of England are about exhausted, and that what remains is of a lean variety, also that while there may still be a large deposit of ore in the Bilboa district, in Spain, which ores are largely used in England, still they are much inferior in quality and much harder to work than the richer and more easily reduced ores of the Lake Superior region. Based on the price paid in England for Spanish ore to-day, English manufacturers could afford to pay from $4.50 to $4.75 per ton for the best ores of the Mesabi Tange. With the conditions before named, this price should be sufficient to enable ore to be mined in the Lake Superior region and sent to England at a fair profit.

Now, in this quotation Mr. Keefer says that more than half the iron ore produced in the United States is mined around Lake Superior. We find in this other article that England will have to look for her ore to Lake Superior. If Lake Superior be the producing point and we can handle that ore by a shorter and a cheaper route than any other known to exist, is it not fair to conclude that by opening up this waterway we would thereby open up a route by which the iron products of the Lake Superior district would furnish the world? The quantity of iron that can be produced around Lake Superior is inestimable, and the quality is looked upon as being superior to anything they have got in England. All that is required to bring this ore into the markets of the world is the opening up of this natural waterway. When I say "natural," I speak advisedly, because it is a waterway already, and we have only to improve it a little at different points to make it one of the most magnificent waterways on this continent. Providence gave us the waterway, and Providence demands that we should do something to improve it in order to make it one of the highways of this continent.

Mr. Speaker, in opening up that river we would be carrying out one of the greatest enterprises that have ever been undertaken in Canada, I bar none, I do not even except the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway was necessary, of course; it was one of the greatest achievements of the Dominion Government, and to the men who carried it to completion the world will ever be indebted. The names of those men who carried through that great work will go down to history embalmed in the hearts of Canadians. But we have a scheme here which is not second even to the Canadian Pacific Railway. And why is it not second? Because it is a waterway, and at every step of its progress along the Ottawa River it is going to originate industries, and develop untold resources that nobody knows how to estimate at this moment. We shall never be able to estimate fully the advantages we possess in our Ottawa valley. When I speak in this strain, people who have never looked into the question, simply say: Well, Poupore is a great admirer of the Georgian Bay Canal. Now, Sir, I can give a reason for the faith that is in me; I can tell why I am a great admirer of the Georgian Bay Canal; I can tell why this Government or any Government in Canada will not be doing its duty by the people unless it takes up this project and assists the men who are willing to put their money into the development of that waterway. When I say that this would be one of the vastest schemes, I think I must borrow the expression of my hon. friend the Postmaster General, and say that I think it will be a "vaster scheme than has been." If this scheme be taken up it will be a vaster scheme than ever has been. No such scheme, I think, has ever been undertaken in the history of this country, indeed I might almost except, though I do not like to, even the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway fulfilled one great function for Canada, it cemented the union of the scattered provinces of the Dominion, and fulfilled the objects that the fathers of confederations had in view when they entered into that compact. That was all right. But now we want something more. We want something more than a railway running over the surface of the ground to fulfil the objects of the compact entered into by the various provinces forming this great Dominion; we want other things to develop the resources that lie dormant to-day. We need to be astir, because the people of the United States are not asleep. They are now very anxious at our progress. At the dinner to which I referred sometime ago, Mayor Van Wyck, of New York, pointed out that unless they were up and doing, and at once enlarged the Erie Canal to meet the requirements of trade, Canada would open up this short waterway and take away that trade which now goes to Buffalo and builds up American ports. Is that not a significant statement to be made by a public man at a public dinner in New York city? Take up the Buffalo papers, some of which I have before me, and they show how much danger our friends to the south of us see in allowing the Canadian people to go on and open up this canal. They feel that Canada, no doubt, will do its duty. We find when we go down to Washington and ask the American people to do what is fair by us—for all we want is simply to get something that is fair, something that will protect the interests of Canada—we find when we want to enter into negotiations with them that they are very independent. Now, the way to treat people who are so very independent, is to be independent ourselves. We have got within our reach the means of making Canada, not so populous a country, perhaps, but we have the means of making Canada wholly independent of the people of the United States, unless they are willing to treat us as one brother would treat another. We have within our reach the means of being absolutely independent; we can find markets elsewhere if the people of the United States refuse to deal with us, but, in order to find markets, we must improve our waterways, build up and increase our population and develop our resources. This is what we must do as a nation. Speaking of the resources of the Ottawa valley, to which I have alluded, I want to point out something as showing what we are possessed of, in addition to what is already known to ourselves, that outsiders are coming in and investing their money in the mineral development of our country. Here is an article, the truthfulness of which I can vouch for, because I know the gentleman referred to myself:

ARE READY TO INVEST.

British Capitalists are not Backward About Spending their Money in Canadian Mines.

Canadian nickel mining is to be further developed by British capital. Mr. J. E. S. Trelawney, son of Sir William Trelawney, Bart., of Cornwall, England, is at present in Ottawa, representing English capitalists who purpose investing to a considerable extent in nickel claims in the Sudbury region. The deal will probably be closed shortly, and operations commenced as soon as the necessary machinery can be put in place. Mr. Trelawney is the guest of Mr. J. Carling Kelly, the well-known mining agent, at his residence on Somerset Street.

Wednesday a "Citizen" reporter learned from Mr. Trelawney much that is of gratifying interest concerning Canadian mineral wealth, and the light in which it is viewed in foreign markets, such as London, Paris and Hamburg. The Canadian nickel mines produce two-thirds of the world's supply,—

Is that not astonishing? Fancy having in Canada two-thirds of the whole nickel supply of the world!

—and, as the demand is increasing, Canadian mines will be even more heavily drawn on in the future. Thus English and French capital will open up and develop regions hitherto unfouled in the Dominion. The gold and copper deposits of the country are also favourably mentioned, although as yet the British Columbia fields are the only ones known in foreign markets besides the Klondike. The English promoters favour hydraulic mining, but on account of the inaccessibility of the Yukon and the climatic conditions that retard the country, the Britishers do not take with favour to it. On the other hand, the great reduction in the cost of smelting—from $22 to $7 per ton—in the British Columbia district, will induce free investments of British capital in the mines of that province. It is strange that Ontario's wealth of gold should not be better known on the London and other European markets, but as yet the attention is on British Columbia and that province only. Mr. Kelly believes, though, that the wealth of newer Ontario, Hastings County, the Ottawa district, &c., will all quickly find English capital to develop it, as soon as it is brought to the attention of foreign investors.

This is the condition of affairs in spite of the difficulty we have in transporting our ores and in spite of the extra cost that we are obliged to pay to take these ores to the smelters of Europe. Of this I know something, because I am concerned myself in a mine that is shipping ore to Belgium. The value of that ore at the mouth of the mine is about $50 per ton, but the total net profit we can make out of it is $10 to $15 per ton. The rest goes to transportation charges and the cost of smelting. You will see that the question of transportation, then, is one of the most vital importance. Whilst speaking of this matter, I want to refer to an article which I have read in the "Cosmopolitan" Magazine on the question of transportation. Here is an article written by Mr. F. W. Fitzpatrick, an American gentleman who is very well posted on the question. Speaking of the great volume of trade that goes through the lakes, he says:

Our annual freight bill is enormous. It amounts to more than $800,000,000 a year—a tax upon our commerce equal to $60 a year for every family, or, assuming the Government's calculations to be correct, and that the average income of each labourer is $500 a year, this means that the equivalent of every one month's labour of each head of a family must be set aside to pay for his share of the freight bill. Anything that lessens this tax upon the people will soon find favour with them.

We go on and find that this gentleman, who has produced a very well written article, says about the navigation of the lakes and the great traffic that is done upon them:

In spite of my promise not to produce any arguments for the "deep waterways to the sea," the temptation to say something for it is strong. It is a most fascinating theme, grand in its possibilities, and fairly bristling with figures. But that is another story. To-day Buffalo is practically the eastern terminus of lake traffic. A few small, most Canadian, vessels, go down the Welland Canal, around Niagara, and the other north shore canals and the St. Lawrence River to Montreal and the seaboard, but that traffic is not worth mentioning.

He calls them small vessels; they do not amount to anything, and that is the trade that comes to Canada.

A considerable quantity of cereals, coal and lumber, is transferred to steam or mule canal barges at Buffalo, for transportation down the Erie Canal to the Hudson River and New York, but the great bulk of lake freight for the east is transferred at Buffalo to the railroads.

That is the American view of our waterways; they look upon them as being of no very great use. They do not amount to much in their estimation. That is why, when they find that we are waking up, they think they had better be stirring themselves or we will likely take some of their trade away. Under all these circumstances, I think the time has come for Canada to be active in this transportation question. We find that Mr. McLeod Stewart—a gentleman whose name is becoming a household word, not only in Canada but in England, in connection with the Georgian Bay Canal—during his recent visit to England, made such arrangements as will enable the company to carry on the construction of this canal upon the condition, of course, and always upon the condition, that the Government of Canada shall sanction it by guaranteeing the interest upon its bonds. Last session, as I have already pointed out, the right hon. First Minister said that when this project shall have reached the position that the success of the undertaking will be assured, the Government of Canada would feel disposed to give it its very best consideration. Mr. Speaker, I think we have reached that period. I think we can establish, before this debate is ended, that this is not only a feasible question, that it is not only a practical question, but that it is a project in which a number of capitalists of Europe are willing to risk their money, provided the Government of Canada will give it that sanction, which, I think the Government should give it. The Government is not asked in any way to advance or contribute one dollar, and if the case ever arises in which the Government is called upon to pay anything on account of interest, its claim will be a first lien, and a first charge upon all these works. And besides that, from the receipts from the operations of that canal, after its construction, the working expenses will be taken out and paid, and whatever is left over and above that will go to the reduction of the moneys the Government may have to pay on account of interest until the whole thing is wiped out. By this proposition, which I shall give to the House before I conclude, the Government is not asked to advance one single dollar until the project is completed; the Government is not asked to become responsible for one single cent until the work is completed, and if that be the position, and if other men are willing to put their money into it, it does seem to me that the Government is asked for very little when it is asked simply to guarantee the interest on the bonds.

Mr. DAVIN. How much interest?

Mr. POUPORE. The proposition that was made last year was, 2 per cent on $17,000,000. The proposition which I am about to make now is a little different from that, but, I think, not so different as to make it objectionable to the Government. Let me say, that, in connection with the organization of the company, Mr. McLeod Stewart succeeded in England in having a syndicate formed of reputable men of very high commercial standing, who are not only ready to undertake the construction of the canal, but who have the right, by their letters of association as a syndicate, to develop mines, to acquire franchises, and to do anything that comes within the scope of mercantile transactions. A majority of the board of directors of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company will be composed of the gentlemen who formed the syndicate. A condition which they impose is, that a majority of European stockholders shall be on the board of directors of that canal company, and this, of course, is readily agreed to by Mr. Stewart. Under the franchise which Mr. Stewart and his company hold from the Government of Canada, the obligation rests upon the promoters to organize the company in Canada; the head office is to be in Ottawa, and that is why the company was not formed in England. The syndicate was formed in England on about the same lines as the syndicate which was formed to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway. All these details, of course, and all the evidence, will be furnished to the Government before they are asked to proceed; but I may mention that two millions or three millions—at all events, between two and three millions—dollars have been subscribed by the canal company, and 10 per cent of $2,000,000 have been paid into a chartered bank, which sum has been transmitted to Canada. This fulfils one of the requirements of the franchise, which states distinctly that no company can proceed to do anything in the line of constructing this canal, until $2,000,000 of stock has been subscribed and 10 per cent of that paid into a chartered bank of Canada. Now, this requirement has been fulfilled, and, when all the facts in connection with this project which have occurred since the last session of Parliament, are made known to the Prime Minister of Canada and his Government, I predict in advance that the Prime Minister will take that view which he so nicely outlined last year, in the closing remarks of his speech in this debate. Let me read an article which appeared in the "Sun".

The PRIME MINISTER. What "Sun," may I ask?

Mr. POUPORE. The London "Sun." It says:

It would seem that Canada is at last to control her own waterway between the waters of the great lakes and the ports of shipping upon the Atlantic Ocean. An improved version of the plans of 1860 will be laid before the Imperial Government with a view of obtaining a partial subsidy towards the work of construction. A canal, similar to the proposed new Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay navigation scheme, is of paramount importance to the Imperial interests of the Dominion, since in the event of any rupture in the relations between this country and America, Canada possesses no strategic or commercial canal which would not come within the jurisdiction of the United States. The reasons which induced the Chancellor of the Exchequer to refuse Mr. Cecil Rhodes's proposals cannot be applied to the Canadian canal, since its presence must improve the prosperity of Canada in a way which is at once apparent, and beyond even the "wasp stings of Little Englanders."

This, Sir, is a feature of the project which ought not be dismissed without a great deal of serious thought. We are speaking of a canal that may cost Canada, we will say, for the present, $8,000,000 or $10,000,000. Now, from the information which I have upon the subject. I am convinced that, for commercial purposes alone, the Government of Canada would be warranted in giving that amount of expenditure as a bonus. As a public man, I say from my seat in this House, that, if the Government of Canada gave a bonus of $10,000,000 for the purpose of opening up that waterway, then, from a commercial point of view alone, I, as a business man, feel that it would be a wise thing for the Government to do. And why, from a commercial standpoint, would it be a wise thing for the Government to do? First, it would increase the population of Canada; second, it would extend the seaports of our country and bring through Canada the traffic that belongs to us; third, it would develop the resources of our country, which will remain undeveloped unless something is done in this direction. And, in developing these resources, what will follow? Look at the mining industries of other countries, and what do you find? Go to Butte City, Montana. That city has been built up because the people of that city went into the mining industry, and the product of ore was so great that a company was formed to build a smelter. The moment that smelter was built, the number of people employed in and about the smelter and the mines formed the city of Butte, and, as the result of that one smelter in a mining district in the United States, you have to-day the large and growing city of Butte. Open up the Ottawa valley, and, with the mineral resources we possess there, you will find that we must build smelters. We will have to build a smelter at Ottawa; we will have to build a smelter at the mouth of the French River, and we will have to furnish the means necessary to get the ores to these smelters. All this will expand the country, increase the population, and develop our resources that to-day lie dormant. That is why I say, that, if the Government of Canada to-day gave $10,000,000 as a bonus to this canal, it would be warranted in doing so, from a commercial stand-point alone.

But let us regard the scheme from a strategic point of view; let us look at it as a matter of defence. Have we any assurance, have we any guarantee from Divine Providence, that we are free from any possible chance of being involved in a conflict? Is it possible to imagine that we are to go through this world unmolested in the years to come—unmolested by our neighbours to the south of us. That is rather improbable. I hope the day will never come when the relations between the two countries will be so strained as to make it necessary that the one country shall have to stand up in conflict against the other. I hope that day shall never come; but, if it come, is it not well that we should be ready? Is it not well that we should have some means of defence, or is it better that we should be, as we are to-day, with an exposed frontier of some 2,000 miles along the St. Lawrence River, a river that is common to both countries? The Americans have just as much right to come down the St. Lawrence River as we have; they can use our canals, on fulfilling certain conditions, and, in case of trouble, they would have just as free access to that river as we have. Where would our protection be then?

Why, they would gobble us up in one day, exposed as we are now. But if we went on and opened up the Ottawa River as a waterway to the great lakes, consider the position we should then occupy. Who could then come near the internal districts of our country? We certainly could resist any attack that could be made upon us. The enemy could not reach the interior of the country, through which this canal would pass, without finding some way of getting there, and the chances are that we would set a trap for them before they would reach it. So that, apart from the commercial view of the case, we cannot dismiss from our minds the great importance of this strategical view. Go away back to the time when General Sir John Michel was in command of the Canadian troops, thirty-five years ago, and you will find that he predicted that this great waterway must be opened up as an Imperial work, important to the Empire as a whole, and not simply to Canada.

Mr. DAVIN. So did Lieut. Synge.

Mr. POUPORE. Yes. These men many years ago saw the necessity of opening up this canal, not for commercial purposes alone, but as a safeguard for the British Empire.

Now, it does seem to me opportune at this particular time, when no other great work is before the Government of Canada, that this great project should be taken up with promptness. It is true, we are completing the enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals; but it is also true that that work will be completed about the end of the present year. The Government of Canada will then be free from the burden of any great public work, and now is the time that this work should be sanctioned and assisted by the Government. It is true, it has been said to me, "Why did not your own friends, Mr. Poupore, take up this project when they were in power?" That is a very proper question to put, I confess; but there is an answer to that question which I think ought to be sufficient for any man. I do not want to see this question brought into the arena of politics. It is of too great magnitude to be made a political question. We want men of good-will everywhere to join in this great scheme, because we must have unity of action from all quarters in order to succeed. When the Spanish-American war broke out a year ago, the people of the United States, in mustering their forces, did not stop to inquire to what political party any man belonged. There was no question of party at all. All the people of the great republic stood up as one man for the defence of their country; and Canadians should stand up as one man, not only for the defence of their country, but for the development of their country, teeming as it is with untold resources, which are lying dormant, and for the protection of their country where it requires protection. I say, then, that this is not a political, but a national question—ay, a question of Imperial importance; and I believe the Imperial authorities would gladly lend a hand to the completion of this project if properly approached and asked to do so. But, to answer the question put to me by an hon. friend on the other side of the House, "Mr. Poupore, why did not your friends take up this question when they were in power?" let me say that last year an answer was given by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart). He said he thought the proper way to build this canal was to have it done by the Government in small instalments from year to year; but he said the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) was a tight-fisted man, and that he had held the purse-strings too tightly. Of course, I do not think that was a very strong reason. The reason I assigned, in answer to the gentleman who asked me the question, was this. I said that the political party to which I belonged, which had constructed the Canadian Pacific Railway, which had inaugurated the enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals, which had carried the Intercolonial Railway to completion, had certainly left behind it an evidence of progress—had left its foot-prints on the sands of time. I repeat what I said last year, that the obligations which the Dominion of Canada undertook at confederation were onerous and numerous. The large amount of money that had to be paid for the North-west Territories, the immense sums that had been contributed to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the expenses connected with the Intercolonial Railway, with the enlargement of the Welland Canal, with the St. Lawrence canals, and with the Ottawa River canals—all these had to be undertaken by the Government of that time. Now, it is quite easy to be understood that while these great works were in progress the Government of the day was not prone to undertake any new obligations of the magnitude of this project. But is it unreasonable for us to ask the Government of the day, having just about completed the work they undertook when they entered office, and being almost entirely relieved of great public works, to take an active interest in this project? Would it not redound to the credit of the hon. the First Minister and his Government for all time to come? Would it not make him one of the greatest men Canada had produced if he took up this project and carried it to completion? It would redound to the credit of any Government, be it Liberal or Conservative. Any Government that takes up this work and assists it to completion, will have the undivided support of the whole of this part of Canada, regardless of any political issue that may arise in the meantime. Mr. Speaker, I want distinctly to state that I am not a very strong partisan when you talk Georgian Bay Canal to me. I am a Georgian Bay Canal man first, last and always. I am prepared to support any Government or any party or any man who will help us to build the Georgian Bay Canal. That is my politics exactly; that is Georgian Bay Canal politics; and you will find, Mr. Speaker, that I am not alone in this country in holding these views. If we can get the Georgian Bay Canal, we shall feel indebted to those who help us to get it. If we cannot get the Georgian Bay Canal, we shall hold a reckoning with those who refuse to help us to get it. This is not said with a desire to threaten anybody. It is simply expressing the sentiment of the people of this part of Canada. When I speak of this part of Canada, I speak of a part of Canada that cannot be ignored in any way. When I speak of this part of Canada, I speak of both sides of the Ottawa River from Montreal to the mouth of the French River. That means between twenty-three and twenty-five counties; and I say that no Government, no party, no political scheme, can do without that phalanx of the people of Canada. If the people who are interested, as I am, in the Georgian Bay Canal, unite as they should, in making this part of Canada what it ought to be, they will simply stand together and say, we must have the Georgian Bay Canal, and we belong to no party that will not help us to get it. I would like to say a word as to the effect which this project will have upon this city, of which I am a resident.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the hon. gentleman takes that up, may I ask him what is the present proposal?

Mr. POUPORE. I thank the hon. leader of the Opposition for reminding me of this omission on my part. By the arrangement entered into with the syndicate to which I have referred, the syndicate feel that the Government of Canada should be asked to guarantee bonds to the extent of $20,000,000 at 2½ per cent instead of $17,000,000 at 2 per cent, as stated last year. The particulars of that will be more fully dealt with by gentlemen who are to follow me.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What term are the bonds to run ?

Mr. POUPORE. Twenty years. Now, let me read something that has been written by a gentleman very prominent in electrical matters, and which I think is worth submitting to the House. W. H. Hunter, in the "Engineer's Magazine," writes the following article, headed "What Would Happen":

The meeting in the city hall to-night is one which every well-wisher of Ottawa, every enterprising citizen of the capital, should attend. It should be such a gathering as will strengthen the hands of the promoter of the Georgian Bay Canal by proving that it is a project in which Ottawa is vitally interested; such a meeting, in short, as will convince the Government that, in guaranteeing the bonds of the canal, it will be forwarding an enterprise fraught with magnificent possibilities, not only to the Ottawa district, but to the Dominion as a whole.

What the completion of the Georgian Bay Canal would mean for this city may be inferred from what the ship canal has done for Manchester. It is pointed out by Mr. W. H. Hunter, in the "Engineering Magazine" for January, that building operations in Manchester are progressing at a rate which has had no parallel in the long history of the town. The streets are so thronged with traffic that the problem of dealing with them in such a manner as to avoid positive congestion is forcing itself upon the inhabitants. Returns of the railway companies running into Manchester show an annual increase so marked that company after company has initiated and carried out, or is in the course of carrying out, additions and improvements of a most extensive character, having for their object the increase of their conveying and storing capacity. In a word, threatened decay has been turned into vigorous growth, and adversity into prosperity. No competent person would, for a moment, hesitate, if asked, for the reason for this unparalleled progress. It is, as the writer points out, one of the results of the Manchester Ship Canal.

I believe that this canal will do more for the city of Ottawa than any one imagines. Last year the press of Ottawa asked some of the leading men of this city what would be the best means of encouraging and expanding its business. Answers were given by a number of leading men, one of which I propose to read, given by Mr. William Scott, managing director of the McKay Milling Company. He said:

Mr. William Scott, managing director of the McKay Milling Company, stated that, in his opinion, the one thing which more than any other would attain the permanent prosperity of Ottawa, was the carrying into effect of the Georgian Bay Canal scheme. The project was one which merited the support of the business community of Ottawa. It would bring the products of the North-west to Ottawa, building up the towns along the line and developing their shipping and commercial interests. Mr. Scott said it was difficult to comprehend the magnitude of the grain trade. In a few years the crop in Manitoba would yield 100,000,000 bushels. During the past year 218,000,000 bushels of wheat from the Western States and Manitoba passed through Buffalo, and over fifty grain elevators were located there. The opening up of the Georgian Bay Canal would mean that a great proportion of this immense traffic would come to Ottawa, and elevators would be established here. The enormous trade of supplying the vessels engaged in transportation would come to Ottawa.

Speaking of the question of local manufactures, Mr. Scott said, that, if any assistance was to be given, it should go to encourage those already established here. In addition to the immense lumber industry, there were two furniture factories, machine shops, car shops and the largest flour mill in the province. There was nothing in the wood line but what could be manufactured in Ottawa, and the manufacturing interests should be encouraged to the fullest extent.

There is the opinion of one of the leading men of Ottawa, and an opinion which, I think, is shared by every business man in the city. I would like to read an extract from a newspaper published in my own county, and which, by the way, is a Liberal newspaper, to show that even those who live in rural districts are fully alive to the importance and the magnitude of this great scheme. This editorial was written by the editor of the Pontiac "Advance," in my county:

Georgian Bay Canal stock took a big jump, when the Hon. Mr. Tarte, addressing the great Liberal meeting at the Monument Nationale, in Montreal, the other day, intimated, in language so distinct as to admit of no equivocation, that, in furtherance of his intention to make Montreal the Buffalo of Canada, he was in favour of the construction of the Georgian Bay Canal, among other schemes, as subsidiary to this great object.

This manifesto, made as a Minister of the Crown, and in the hearing of his colleagues, and with the tacit consent of his chief, at last elevates this great undertaking to the realm of practical politics.

That the schemes outlined by Mr. Tarte have received the ear-mark of the Government is evidenced by the feverish eagerness with which the press of western Ontario is now seeking by every argument to boom those most intimately associated with its own interests, and, if other proof of the fact be needed, the complete concurrence with which it ignores, by the faintest mention, our canal project should suffice.

No wonder the self-assertive people of western Ontario look upon the success of their schemes as assured, if they gauge the temper of the whole people of the Ottawa valley by the indifference displayed by the struggling pioneers who dot the vast expanse of timber limits wcleped Pontiac.

The people of the Ottawa valley may as well, realizing that the simultaneous carrying out of the enterprises outlined by Mr. Tarte, even with Government assistance, is beyond the limits of present possibility, and that "united we stand, divided we fall" in any attempt to enforce the recognition of the claims with which nature has so prodigally endowed us. There is no sentiment in politics, as we find them now; combative self-interest will risk a burn to get the chestnuts, while those who pulingly wait in expectation of Providence providing vicarious assistance, will get left.

Pontiac should know that another factor has been introduced into the politics of this district, and be prepared to use every effort to make our claims upon the Government effective. The time is near when an opportunity will be afforded to give an unwonted emphasis to them.

This is written by a Liberal newspaper writer of Pontiac county.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been convinced for quite a little while that I have been tiring the House; I am discovering now that I am getting tired myself. But, before taking my seat, I would like to refer to a paper that was read at the meeting of the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers, in Montreal, by Mr. Wicksteed, a civil engineer, who has had a great deal of practical experience in canal building. He deals very largely with this canal question. The report of it I have here states "in conclusion, Mr. Wicksteed gave these most striking figures, which are corroborated by Mr. Marcus Smith, to show the advantages possessed by the Ottawa route, as compared with the St. Lawrence." Now, I would like to be well understood, that, when I speak of the Ottawa route, as compared with the St. Lawrence route, I do not speak with a desire to intimate that there is any feeling of rivalry. No rivalry can possibly exist between these two schemes. We require the St. Lawrence, as well as the Ottawa River. The Trent Canal, likewise, can never be a rival of the Ottawa Valley Canal. The Trent Canal will fulfil the purpose for which it is intended, and that is, to supply all the intervening country between the Georgian Bay and Lake Ontario with the means of water communication, taking whatever freight arises in Lake Huron. The Trent Canal is not of the proper proportions to tap the traffic that comes from Lake Superior by way of Sault Ste. Marie. The Ottawa River Canal is intended to go to the mouth of the French River, then along the protected shore of Lake Huron, inside the Manitoulin Island to Sault Ste. Marie, to tap the traffic, a good deal of which now finds its way to Buffalo. It will not be a competing line with the St. Lawrence; it will never be a rival of the Trent Canal scheme, so ably advocated by my hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Hughes). The figures given by Mr. Wicksteed show that by the St. Lawrence route you have 1,145 miles of lake navigation, 132 of river and 71 miles of canal, making a total of 1,348. By the Ottawa we have 575 miles of lake navigation, 372 of river navigation and 33 miles of canal. The total length of the Ottawa route is 980 miles, or 368 miles shorter than the route by the St. Lawrence. Mr. Wicksteed says:

Thus the comparison by distance is enormously in favour of the Ottawa route, but when the estimates of time required by each route are contrasted, the wonderful advantages of the Ottawa route are seen at a glance. Taking the average lake craft, it requires 202.50 hours to go from Chicago to Montreal by the St. Lawrence, while by the Ottawa valley canal it will only call for 127.61, a saving of 74.89 hours each trip.

Now, I do not think there can be any discussion or controversy as to the difference in point of distance. I do not think there will be any attempt to challenge comparison in point of safety. By the Ottawa valley route, we have the advantage in point of safety of the absence of a great deal of lake navigation. On the route to Buffalo, you are exposed to tempests of Lake Huron and Lake Erie; the St. Lawrence route has the same feature. The consequence is, that marine insurance on that route is very much higher than it can possibly be by the route that we shall have. Thus we shall have the advantage of safety, the advantage of distance and the advantage of cheapness. When I speak of cheapness, I mean in respect of time saved. Beyond all these, there is the fact that it will develop our own country.

Mr. Speaker, I am about to conclude; but, before taking my seat, I wish to recall to the mind of the Prime Minister his words, which I quoted at the beginning of my remarks, his good words of last session, on the termination of the debate on this subject.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Before my hon. friend (Mr. Poupore) closes his remarks, I am sure the House will be glad to know what will be the character of the work which the company that asks for this subsidy, would give us. I understood, from what he stated in answer to a remark made by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), that the proposition of last year with regard to the subsidy is abandoned. A subsidy would not be asked of a guarantee of 2 per cent on seventeen and a half millions, but of 2½ per cent on 20 millions. I have followed my hon. friend pretty closely, but I do not think he has given us anything as to the character of the proposed canal. What would be the depth of it? What would be the difficulties to be met, in the way of shallows to be deepened, falls to be overcome, and cuttings made? We would be interested in knowing some details on these features of the scheme.

Mr. POUPORE. I thank the right hon. Prime Minister for calling attention to that. But I think a few words of mine must have escaped his attention, when I said, that the facts on these points will be given by succeeding speakers. However, I will give them, so far as I know them. The character of the work will be similar to the enlarged St. Lawrence Canals—14 feet. The shallows will be dredged out. The most recent reports we have show that, at the normal high-water mark, we shall have navigation in the different stretches of the Ottawa for a depth of 16 feet, except that it will be necessary to remove shallows at the confluences of other rivers, or places where sediment is deposited.

The PRIME MINISTER. What is the date of that report?

Mr. POUPORE. That is the most recent report of Mr. Marcus Smith. The date of this report is December 30th, 1898. As to the character of the work, I may say that the canal will be 14 feet. The rivers will be dredged out 16 feet, and there will be the necessary docks. I may mention an important feature of this work which will explain why the syndicate ask for a guarantee on twenty millions instead of seventeen millions. They feel that the navigation should be made uniform between Ottawa and Montreal, and that elevators should be erected at different points, for instance, at Hawkesbury, at Pembroke, at the mouth of the Mattawa River, at the mouth of the French River, and another at Arnprior. Those features of the case will be laid before the Government in writing and in proper form. I just allude to them en passant. Now the works will be of the most substantial character, like those that are now being made on the St. Lawrence. The obstacles that may be met with in the different rapids along the river will be overcome by a series of stone locks. The deepening of the river will be proceeded with in the usual way, by dredging and by subaqueous excavations, either of rock or of earth. The estimated cost of the work is $25,000,000, and that is to include the enlargement of the canal from Ottawa to Montreal. There are somewhat over 100 miles of navigation between Ottawa and Montreal of only 9 feet, that would be enlarged to 14 feet, and provided with all the docks and wharfs and accommodation necessary at Montreal, and with elevators at the different places that I have mentioned. The syndicate propose that this should be done in order to make the system complete, and, therefore, they ask for a 2½ per cent guarantee on $20,000,000 instead of $17,000,000. One of the reasons why they ask a guarantee at 2½ per cent instead of 2 per cent, is that a guarantee of 2½ per cent makes the bonds gilt-edged, while with a guarantee of only 2 per cent, the bonds will hardly bring more than 80.

Mr. Speaker, I must now apologize to you and to the House for having spoken at such length. I suppose the correct apology to make is always the true one. The only apology that I have to offer you is the importance of this subject. I feel that this is one of the greatest and most important subjects that can possibly occupy the attention of the Parliament of Canada. It is to be very far reaching in its effects upon this country; it is going to render to Canada the greatest possible amount of business freedom and expansion. I look upon it as one of the greatest schemes that have ever been taken up in the history of Canada since the day we entered into the compact of confederation. I now thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask my hon. friends in the House to pardon me for having trespassed so long upon their patience.

Mr. POUPORE.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa). Towards the close of last session it was my privilege to join my efforts with those of the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Poupore) in bringing to the attention of the Government and of the House the vast importance of this truly national question, the construction of the Georgian Bay water route. I desire again to join him to-day in returning thanks to the Prime Minister for the opportunity which we are afforded of again addressing you on this subject. I sincerely and heartily congratulate the hon. member for Pontiac on the able, eloquent and very exhaustive speech and presentment of the question which he has made to us this afternoon. I cannot help expressing a regret that I have to follow him. He has spoken so well, so eloquently, and so authoritatively on this subject that he has made it a very difficult task indeed for me to say anything that will interest the House. I regret also that I have had little time to put into shape the large amount of data which I have at hand concerning the Georgian Bay Canal, and consequently my remarks, I fear, will be somewhat disjointed, and will not be presented with that connexity of thought and argument which the subject deserves. However, I shall endeavour to do my best, and in treating this question I shall endeavour to avoid as much as possible viewing it from the same aspects from which it has been viewed by my hon. friend.

When the subject was brought up last year the right hon. the Prime Minister had no hesitation whatever in saying that if the Georgian Bay water route was constructed it would indeed be a very potent factor in assuring for Canada a very large portion of the trade of Ontario, and of the western sections of the continent. The hon. gentleman would, I believe, and I was emboldened to think so from his remarks at that time, have given an assurance of the guarantee which my hon. friend and myself asked him to give, if he had been thoroughly satisfied in his own mind of the possibility, the practicability, and the commercial value of this great enterprise. Now, Sir, our justification in taking up the time of the House again this session on this subject, is to be found in the large amount of very convincing evidence which has been brought to light since the close of last session concerning the possibility, the practicability and the commercial value of this enterprise. Valuable as that evidence was last session, voluminous as were the data which we then had, I may say without hesitation that a great deal more of convincing evidence has come to light since. I shall, with your permission, endeavour as briefly and in as sober language as possible to satisfy the Prime Minister and the hon. members of this House that this project is not only possible and practicable, but that it is of undoubted commercial value, of such commercial value as will not only justify but command, I believe, the Government of the day in giving to it the assistance which is now asked by the promoters. Before doing so I wish briefly to refer to the material advantages which this river route will offer. My learned friend has pretty well covered the ground, but there are, perhaps, one or two aspects of the matter he has not referred to which may be of interest to the House. He has referred to the strategic or military aspect of the matter. I confess that to my mind that is, perhaps, the least important feature of the undertaking. When we look to very recent events, when we see the immense progress, the tremendous strides which have been made and are being made at this very moment towards settling all international questions and differences by means of arbitration, it seems to me that the strategic or military feature of this enterprise has not, perhaps, to-day the importance it had a few years ago. However, the matter is of some consequence, and, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Poupore), it would ensure, in case of difficulty, an easy means of transporting ammunition and troops into the interior of the country. It would afford a means of bringing in our defences and putting them in the field and avoiding the danger that would be met if these ammunitions and forces were taken up by means of the St. Lawrence River and the St. Lawrence Canals. The strategic and military importance of the scheme is, perhaps, of greater importance to the British public, and in reading various articles, which have appeared in their press, one cannot fail to see that the British mind has been very strongly impressed with that aspect of the matter. In reference to the agricultural benefits and advantages which this enterprise would bring forth, it seems to me that it is beyond calculation, even beyond any possible suggestion, what they may be. All we require to remember is that the Ottawa River route will give access to millions and millions of acres of as fertile land as there is to be found anywhere in the Dominion of Canada. When we look at the recent developments which have taken place in the districts of Algoma, Temiscamingue and Nipissing, when we see the great settlements which have sprung up there within a very few years, one cannot help seeing in his own mind the immense agricultural development which the improvement of our waterways would bring forth. We all know that the colonization of the country follows immediately in the wake of the waterways and railways. Look at our history; Canada was settled first along the St. Lawrence, then along the Ottawa, and along their tributaries. Our waterways have been the first and most active force in the colonization of Canada.

Bill (No. 100) respecting the Guarantee and Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank, and to change its name to the Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank.—(Mr. Bertram.)

ONTARIO AND RAINY RIVER RAILWAY

Bill (No. 121) respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company (Mr. Dymont) considered in committee and reported.

Mr. BERTRAM moved that the Bill be now read the third time.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to have the Bill left over until the next sitting of the House, as I have something to say upon it, and I do not wish to take up the time of the House now. If the Bill is left over, we shall have an opportunity of looking at it, for I have not seen it since it came from the committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suppose we shall have to accede to the hon. gentleman's request, unless he is satisfied with the explanation that the Bill was amended to meet the wishes of the town of Port Arthur, if that is the point.

Mr. SPROULE. No, that is not the point. Bill allowed to stand.

EDMONTON AND SASKATCHEWAN RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 93) respecting the Edmonton and Saskatchewan Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver).

(In the Committee.)

On section 5,

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the word "September" be struck out and the word "October" inserted in lieu thereof. This motion is made at the request of the promoters of the Bill. The people live in the old country, and they think October would be more satisfactory than September, and there is no objection on the part of the department.

Amendment agreed to, and section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 7,

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). I have given notice of an amendment to this section, which I will take the liberty of explaining to the committee. The question was discussed in the Railway Committee, and a conclusion was arrived at; but there was at that time a lack of information which I am now able to supply, and which I think it my duty to place before the committee in proposing my amendment. The question is as to requiring this railway company to build into a certain village, and the principle involved is one of great importance throughout the whole of the North-west Territories. It is, perhaps, not known to the members of the House who live in eastern Canada that in the western country, where everything is in process of development, it is the almost universal custom of railway companies, when they are constructing their lines, instead of building those lines to accommodate the business of the country already established, to so construct them as to take advantage of the business necessities then existing, in order to levy upon the people of that country what they, the people, consider to be unjust tribute. The pioneers go into the country and establish a business centre. They build mills or stores or other business places, and when a railroad comes to that vicinity, either the railway company demands a bonus for giving those people the benefits to which they are entitled by reason of their exertions as pioneers, or else establishes a station at some other point for the purpose of building up a rival town and destroying the investment of those pioneers in that original town site. That is what is being done throughout the North-west repeatedly, and I would like to inform the House that there is nothing done in the North-west which has a greater effect in retarding its development than that same course of action. While we admit that railways are necessary to the development of the country and do develop it, it must be easily seen that unless there is a certain development preceding the railway, its construction is going to hang back. A railway is not built in advance of settlement, but is built to settlement. Then, if those who invest their time and money—who, in many cases, invest twenty or twenty-five years of their lives—in establishing business in certain places, know, as a matter of fact, that when the time comes when they might reasonably expect a return on their investment of time, money and labour, instead of getting that return, they are either held up for an unjust bonus or an attempt is made to build up a rival centre, and thus destroy their investment, the result is that the advantages of the pioneers are detracted from, and the people do not go ahead of the railways as they otherwise would. Instead of having the country filled up in advance of the railways by enterprising people, this system of allowing railways to levy tribute upon the enterprise of other men, tends to discourage pioneering and thereby development. Everything must have a beginning, and the end turns on the beginning. If you do not allow the beginning under auspicious circumstances, you do not have a satisfactory ending, and you, gentlemen, who complain about the slow growth of the North-west, should understand that one of the reasons for its slow growth is that the pioneers have been given to understand, by the system adopted with regard to railways in that country, that they are to be systematically deprived of the fruits of their labour.

It is the pioneers who sow the settlements which finally grow to be groups of population and wealth, and if the seed is not sown properly and well, if there are difficulties put in the way of sowing that seed, you will not have a crop. You complain that you have not a crop (and you have not such as you should have) and one reason is because the seed has been very badly sown in that way. The western country, however, has awakened to the injustice that is being done, and the representatives of that country are anxious to see that injustice remedied. It is the business of this House to remedy that injustice. It is our business to see that when we grant a privilege to a railway company, the rights of the people are protected. If the House decides that these rights are not to be protected, the responsibility is upon it. From the railways we expect nothing any more than we do from any other business enterprise. These companies are out for all they can make, no matter whether they make it in accord with public policy or otherwise.

Mr. COCHRANE. Do not the men who build the villages look out for themselves also?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, they do. They are the men who send representatives to Parliament, they are the men who pay the taxes of the country, they are the men whose work is developing the country, they are the men who are making the country valuable, and who are entitled to receive a legitimate benefit from their labour. It is not the speculators who come in after the seed has been sown, after the difficulties have been encountered, after the country has been developed, who should reap the crop they did not sow.

I, for one, at any rate, as representing a section of the people of the North-west, stand here to advocate the interests of those people and to ask for justice at the hands of this House. In the case of the application for this railway charter, I ask that the interests of the people of the village of Fort Saskatchewan be protected by requiring that company, if it constructs its line, to construct it into that village, so as to protect the interests of the men established there in business.

I might say further that besides the ordinary public, this Government has a particular interest in this town site. It was, in the first place, established as a police post. There was a large police reserve established there, so that anything that is done to the advantage of that town site at Fort Saskatchewan will be an advantage directly to the interests of the Dominion Government, because it will, to that extent, increase the value of the property held by the Government. Anything done to the detriment of that village will be done to the detriment of the Dominion treasury. It is only fair, therefore, that members should understand that they have a direct interest in this matter as guardians of the public treasury, as well as the guardians of legislation.

The country is well settled from the nearest present railway point to Fort Saskatchewan, and also for thirty or forty miles beyond, but there is no immediate prospect of the construction of a railway except to Fort Saskatchewan. That is the main point of this railway proposition. It is not so set forth in the Bill, but I say, knowing the condition of the country, that that is the main point. It is desirable and it is probable that the railway will be built through the twenty miles of well-settled country to Fort Saskatchewan, establishing that as the practical terminus of railway construction, for the time being; and it is because that is the important point in the proposition that I ask the consideration of the House to the resolution I am about to propose. If this were a line that was being built for a long distance, say a through line across the continent or something of that kind, it would not be reasonable to expect the company to deviate this or that way a few miles to accommodate this or that centre; but, as a matter of fact, this road is, if anything, a colonization road, a road to take advantage of existing conditions and improve those conditions. Therefore, there is every reason why the existing conditions, which are being taken advantage of by the company, should be improved by the construction of a road through that country.

As to the point raised in the Railway Committee, that we were not able to show to the committee what the area of the village of Fort Saskatchewan is, and therefore could not say whether it was practicable to take a railway in there or not, I have secured the information by telegram that the area of the village extends about one mile back from the bank of the river. I am entirely familiar with the conditions there, having lived in that country and thereabouts for the past twenty-three years; and if my word as a member of Parliament and acquainted with the circumstances of the case, is worth anything, I beg to assure the committee that there are absolutely no engineering difficulties in the way of reaching the village of Fort Saskatchewan, any more than can exist in crossing a perfectly level and possibly somewhat sandy piece of country. It is not in the valley of the river, it is on the bank of the valley, and it is an ordinary level country which presents no obstacles to prevent a railway getting in or out.

All I ask at the hands of the committee is that the interests of the pioneers shall be protected by requiring that this colonization road, relying for its business on the work of the people in that particular locality, should not be given a charter unless we provide that the interests of these people are protected in that charter, and by so doing we will not in the slightest degree prejudice the legitimate and proper interests of the road. I therefore move:

That the seventh line of section 7 of the printed Bill, at the head of page 2, be amended by striking out the words "or as near as practicable" and the words "or settlement" where they appear in that line, making it read "a point in the village of Fort Saskatchewan."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The reason why the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Oliver's) views did not prevail in the committee were, first, the committee were not sure that it was practicable at the various villages named for the road to be built inside the corporation. I do not know whether the villages are incorporated or not, but even if they are incorporated it might not be practicable to build within their limits. A village might be situated in a hollow or at the top of a hill, making it quite impossible for the railway to be built to it. In the second place, the Minister of Railways and Canals has a Bill before the House to prevent the recurrence of such events as have taken place in the past in railways establishing their stations outside of a town or demanding from the people some concessions for placing their station inside the town. For these reasons, the Bill was amended, as hon. gentlemen will remember, on motion of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) to read: "in or as near as practicable to." And it was thought that that would be sufficient to protect the interests of the people in this district. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) is quite right in saying that in the west, and as we know the same has occurred in the east, that localities have been much injured by the railway not being taken nearer to the centre of settlement than it has been. But by adopting such a proposal as is here made, the committee might stop the building of the railway altogether. If charters were generally granted with such terms as this, it might add to the cost of the road by millions of dollars, and thus the building of railways for the benefit of settlers in new parts of the country would be delayed or prevented. It is believed that the Bill introduced by the Minister of Railways and Canals will safeguard the interests of the public in this respect.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think that what the hon. member asks is unreasonable in view of the fact that he has pledged his word that there is no engineering difficulties in the locality. But I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the village of Saskatchewan is incorporated?

Mr. OLIVER. It is.

Mr. SPROULE. Then it seems to me that makes it all right. Otherwise the amendment would be of little use, as according to the Bill the railway may be built either to the village of Saskatchewan or to the settlement. This latter seems a very indefinite term and would allow the railway company much greater latitude in locating their railway than they should have. As there is a village there, as the pioneers have gone in and made improvements, and, no doubt, it is for the pioneers that the railway is being sought for, they ought to have some benefit of the railway when built. It is well known to those who have visited the North-west country that railway companies pay very little attention to the interests of the people living along the route where the railway is to run. If they cannot get every consideration from a town, whether in the way of right of way or a large grant of land they give the town the go-by. I do not think they should have the privilege of doing that in this case, especially as there are no engineering difficulties to be overcome.

Mr. CASEY. I have to differ from my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver). As a general rule, I am quite in sympathy with the principle that railways should not have the power to hold up a town along their route and compel them to pay in order to get connection with the railway. But this is a question of building a railway through a country that is almost unsettled.

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all. It is well settled.

Mr. CASEY. My information is that the greater part of it is not well settled. It may be fairly settled along the Saskatchewan, but that is all. This Fort Saskatchewan is down in a valley.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CASEY. At all events it is in such a position that it is not convenient for a railway to get to it without great expense, such expense as might prevent the building of the railway altogether. It does not do to push a general principle too far. Here is a railway that will lead to large new settlements in the country and create a great deal of traffic. In every case it is reasonable to suppose a village has been placed so as to suit the first settlers, but it does not follow that its location is suitable for a railway station. It is hardly reasonable to seriously deflect a line of railway to benefit 200 people in one particular spot. My hon. friend from Alberta is, doubtless, seeking to benefit some of his constituents, but he must look to the fact that there are constituents to come. He has to look to the settlers who come in along the line as well as to the pioneers who are already there. I do not think it would be fair to say that the railway should go within this or that settlement at present existing; and I do not think it fair to tie a railway up in that way. It was thought necessary, in the public interest, when the Crow's Nest Pass Railway was chartered, to compel them to go into Lethbridge and Macleod. I supported that proposition at the time on the general principle that my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has been speaking on. I am not sure that we did wisely to compel a railway to go to those places. When I went to the spot and saw that it had added many miles to the length of the road, and caused the construction of large bridges and the creation of very considerable grades, and all for the convenience of small places, I am not sure that we should not have done better to allow the road to take the best and shortest route from Medicine Hat through the mountains with the view to becoming a through route. I do not think there are any such important centres of settlement in that district, and I am compelled to join with the majority of the Railway Committee in opposing what the hon. gentleman proposes.

Mr. OLIVER. I may be permitted to correct a statement made by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. I really do not know where he derives his information. I have lived in that country, and almost in the immediate vicinity, for 23 years; and as a member of this House, I humbly submit that whether another member is willing to accept my statement or not, he must admit that my statement is evidence. Whether he considers it true or not, he is hardly at liberty to state what is directly opposite to what I have stated when the facts are not within his own personal knowledge. Now, I beg to assure the House that the village of Fort Saskatchewan is not in the valley of the river; it is on the upland, and the upland is level. There are absolutely no physical obstacles to the building of a railroad into the limits of the corporation. The whole line of this projected railroad is within present existing settlements. The road is not in an unsettled country. There is along the present line of this railroad a population running anywhere from 10,000 to 15,000, or possibly 20,000.

Mr. CASEY. Probably the mistake arises from the different conception the hon. gentleman has of what a settled country is from my notion of a settled country. He says there is a population of 10,000 or 15,000 along a length of 200 miles of railroad. I would not call that a settled country; of course there is a difference of opinion as to the meaning of the term "settled country." There are no doubt settlements scattered along the line of that railway, but there is no doubt, on the other hand, that the railway is meant to produce and will produce a much greater and closer settlement in the large districts that have not now any settlers at all along that railway.

Mr. OLIVER. There are no large districts along that line where there are no settlers.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). I do not think it makes any difference whether there are 15,000 or 20,000 people living along that proposed line. The important point for the committee to consider is whether we should protect the settlements and villages as they exist at the present time. Now it would almost seem to me superfluous and a reflection upon the good sense of this committee, that anything further should need to be said in favour of the proposition of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver). At the close of the 19th century it seems to me that it would be an outrageous thing for an hon. gentleman of the House of Commons of the great Dominion of Canada to lay down the proposition that these villages and towns shall not be protected; more especially when we recall to mind the experience the towns and villages of this western country have had during the past ten or fifteen years. These railway companies have systematically held up these towns, insisting on the pound of flesh in the matter of bonuses from these corporations, and if they did not get their pound of flesh, if they did not get everything they wanted, they simply purchased towns and established new towns there. Therefore, we have witnessed the spectacle not only on one occasion, but on several occasions of towns being side-tracked. I might mention such cases as Pilot Mound in my own constituency, Manitou in my own constituency, Morden in my own constituency, and Deloraine beyond my own constituency, and I think Nelson was entirely wiped out. These were important towns where pioneers had gone in and laboured and established towns, and when the railway came along they absolutely refused to go to these towns with their line, and these people were compelled, in these instances, and many others that I need not mention, to move the entire town over to the Canadian Pacific Railway, or to the railway station. So that we have witnessed the spectacle from time to time of the mountain moving to Mahomet. Now it seems to me that it is a fair and a reasonable proposition that this House should say that we do not propose to allow that thing to continue. Why, we actually had the spectacle of the Canadian Pacific Railway threatening to side-track the city of Winnipeg after it had a population of 20,000 or 25,000. I remember myself reading a telegram from Sir George Stephen, now Lord Mount-Stephen, in which he accused the people of Winnipeg of being shysters and speculators and said that he would make the grass grow in the streets of Winnipeg by side-tracking that metropolis. Now, it is within the power of this Parliament to put a stop for ever to that sort of thing by this Bill. Why not put it right in the bond at the present time? It is all very well to say that the Minister of Railways and Canals is going to introduce a Bill, or that he has introduced a Bill. Quite possible, but will he press that Bill to a conclusion this session? We do not know that he will. The time to protect the rights of these people is the present time. When you are making a bargain put it in the bond. We have an opportunity at the present time of putting it in the bond. I say it is almost a reflection upon the Parliament of Canada that anybody should have to rise and urge that that clause be put in the bond. I have no doubt that the committee will unanimously agree to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Alberta. Why, we had two rebellions in the North-west which cost an enormous sum of money, to say nothing of the human blood that was spilt, because the rights of the pioneers were not respected when the Government came to deal with their claims.

Mr. COCHRANE. You had better not go back so far as that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The hon. gentleman has a habit of interjecting remarks which he thinks are very clever. While he gives the impression that he is very fair and desires to protect the public, still we always find the hon. gentleman voting wrong. But I hope on this occasion he will stand up and vote right.

Mr. COCHRANE. Read the files of your own paper, and see what you have said.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let the hon. gentleman be calm, he will have his innings. We have the assurance of the hon. member for Alberta that there is no hardship in this case. He knows the country, and has given the committee his absolute assurance that this road can be built to this village without any loss to the company. I think the committee ought to accept that assurance, and I hope it will see its way clear to accept the hon. gentleman's amendment on the present occasion.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The amendment, as read by the hon. member for Alberta, contains another clause, that I do not see there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Yes, there was something there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My hon. friend is mistaken. This is the original amendment.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. A portion of it has been left out.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Bill, as it now reads, says: "in" or "at," or "as near as practicable." The amendment strikes out everything but "in".

Mr. COCHRANE. Mr. Chairman, I was very much surprised at the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) criticising my action in this House. I want to draw his attention to the fact that I have always endeavoured to vote conscientiously and for what I believed to be the best interests of the country. These gentlemen from the North-west must remember, when they get railways built, that we cannot tie the railways down to conditions that we do not impose in any other part of the country. The hon. member for Lisgar says, that I am always voting wrong. He had better read the editorials in his own paper, and then consider how he has been voting. He is on one horn of the dilemma or the other: he is either trying to mislead the electors through his paper, or he is voting wrong in this House, because he does not vote on the lines that his paper advocates. I think the hon. gentleman had better set his own house in order before he attempts to lecture members of the House of Commons.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the hon. gentleman give me an instance?

Mr. COCHRANE. It would take the whole night to draw attention to all the instances. I do not want to fool away the time of this committee by drawing attention to all the instances in which there is a difference between the hon. gentleman's votes and the utterances of his paper. As I understand it, this committee is desirous of doing justice to the best of their judgment. We decided that it was best to leave the Bill as it was. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) distinctly told us that he was going to bring in a Bill that would provide that no town should be bled in the manner that the hon. member for Lisgar has indicated to-night. I do not think it would be wise in this committee to bring in a resolution to oblige a railway to run into some little town that we do not know anything about. Then, to tell us that the people in these little towns are pioneers! I do not think these men that go and build up a little village, to which they expect railways to come and enhance their property, are pioneers. I wonder if the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) has any town lots.

Mr. OLIVER. For the information of the hon. gentleman, I may say, that I have not.

Mr. COCHRANE. Perhaps you have a friend who has.

Mr. LaRIVIERE.

Mr. OLIVER. The voters of Fort Saskatchewan are the only friends I have there.

Mr. COCHRANE. The pioneers in my section of the country were the men who went in and opened up the country, and not the men who built up little paltry villages. They were the men who went in and carved out homes for themselves, made settlements and raised produce, not the men that squatted down in little villages and took the life-blood out of the farmers around them. I think we had better do even-handed justice to all the communities, and not make a special case of that little village.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) has made out a very good case, and that the reasons of the chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals for refusing to accept it were not very good. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) told us that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) is going to introduce a Bill, and that this Bill will have a provision to carry out the views that are being expressed in that amendment. This Bill is before the Bill that the hon. member says is coming in.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not say that; I said the hon. Minister had introduced a Bill, and that Bill will have that addition, but that it will be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. WALLACE. We are as big as the Governor in Council. We have the Governor in Council in this Chamber, and a good many more than the Governor in Council, except the Governor, and we have all the facts placed before us here to-night. These facts cannot be disputed. They were attempted to be disputed by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), who, apparently, knew nothing whatever about that which he was talking, and he has disappeared, ashamed of the arguments he was trying to use. We cannot easily put into the Bill what the hon. member for Alberta proposes, and which proposition is a very reasonable one. As was stated by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), these great roads are in the habit of dictating to communities and acting in an arbitrary and unfair manner. If a community settles in a place, that is prima facie evidence that this is the place for settlement. There are advantages at that point, or the people would not go there for settlement and form a community for a village or town. This, I am told, is an incorporated village or a town; it is a place that has attained some importance. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) says that there are no engineering difficulties whatever, though the railway urged that as an excuse for building the station a mile, or two miles, away and destroying all the industry that has been created at this place. Experience shows that the village or town must cluster around the station, and, if the station is removed from the place, it becomes absolutely worthless. When these pioneers go into that country, and when they, in their wisdom and in their discretion, select these places, the railway is built to take the business and carry the traffic of that community, and they should not be permitted to say: We will build our station two miles away; we will build it on our own lands, and build up a rival town, and make money out of selling town lots. That the railway company should be prevented from doing. The hon. chairman of the Committee of Railways and Canals tells us that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has introduced a Bill with that object in view. This Bill is ahead of his; we do not know whether this Parliament will agree to his Bill, or what will come of it. We know that this Bill is before us now, and there are good reasons given by the promoters of the amendment why it should be adopted.

Mr. SPEAKER. The time for the consideration for private Bills having lapsed, the House will go on with the Orders of the Day.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to call the attention of the Government to one or two pressing matters in connection with returns. One is, perhaps, not immediately under the control of the Government, but I would ask their good offices in the matter. Some days ago, a report from Mr. Ogilvie, in connection with the Yukon question, was ordered to be printed. Some matters that were sent to be printed, after that Order, have been attended to, but, having made inquiry, I find that the report of Mr. Ogilvie has not been attended to. I would ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who is leading the House, if he would be good enough to expedite that, so far as the Government can.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I have taken a note of it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I asked the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), a few days ago, to hasten, at any rate, the preliminary compliance, with an order of the House granted in connection with the appointment of Mr. Russell, as inspector of steamboats, and the Minister mentioned that the report was long. I then asked that there should be a first return and a supplementary one in addition, so that possibly the papers that were ready would suit the purposes which I immediately had in view. On the 15th of May I made the same request to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in regard to a return in relation to the commission of the New Westminster Crown and Timber Office. A commission was issued to investigate into circumstances connected with the crown and timber office at New Westminster. I intimated to the Minister that I would be content with the return without the evidence, which could come down as a supplementary return, and, therefore, the first part should be expedited. I was anxious to call the attention of the Minister (Mr. Sifton) to a personal matter, in a sense, relating to the examination of Mr. Bower as a Dominion land surveyor. I sent the Minister a letter from Mr. Bower in which this gentleman asked a speedy decision in his case. I was in hopes I would be able to telegraph to this gentleman to-day the decision of the Minister.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). What is it about?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This gentleman was a candidate at an examination held in Victoria for Dominion land surveyors. The successful candidates received their certificates, and Mr. Bower, who is said to be a very efficient man, would have been in that position were it not that he was compelled by a process of the court to leave the examination and come up country as a witness in a case. He was allowed to be examined later, but he fears his papers will not be passed on until some time in August, and this precludes him from undertaking work which he has engaged to do in the railway belt. As there seems to be no doubt about his qualifications it resolves itself into a mere matter of form.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I will take a note of this.

WINDING UP ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. THOS. FORTIN (Laval) moved second reading of Bill (No. 31) to amend the Winding-up Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The House resolved itself into committee on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. FORTIN. The provisions of this Bill have been already explained to the House, and I shall say only a few words to remind the committee of the object and purpose of the Bill. The first two clauses provide for the appointment of one or more inspectors in case of a joint stock company, to which the Winding-up Act applies, becomes insolvent. It is well known the Winding-up Act applies to large commercial corporations and joint stock companies, and as the Act now stands, it provides for the appointment of one or more liquidators, but there is no provision by which the courts are empowered to appoint inspectors. The necessity of appointing inspectors in such a case is so well recognized, that even in the absence of legislation, the judges take upon themselves to appoint inspectors. This is wholly irregular, but it shows the necessity for this provision in the law. According to our common law in the province of Quebec, in all cases of insolvency the moment there is an abandonment of property, whatever may be the value of the estate, there is always a curator and inspectors appointed. If that be deemed useful in ordinary cases, it seems to me to be all the more necessary in the cases to which the Winding-up Act applies, for it has to do with large concerns, and the conduct of liquidation requires a great deal of work and supervision. Under the Winding-up Act, the liquidator may be allowed to continue the business, but he is deprived of the assistance of the former board of directors, because the moment the winding up order is issued, the directors cease to hold office. The first section of the Bill is to amend section 20 of the Winding-up Act, by adding to it the following subsection:—

2. The court may also appoint one or more inspectors whose duty it shall be to assist and advise the liquidator, and supervise generally the liquidation of the company.

It will be noticed that this section is optional. The court will not be bound to appoint the inspector or inspectors in all cases, and in practice, it will only be upon the request of the most important creditors that such an appointment may be made.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the hon. gentleman used the language of the old Insolvent Act in connection with the appointment of an inspector?

Mr. FORTIN. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It occurred to me that the words "assist," "advise" and "supervise" might have been used in the old Insolvency Act.

Mr. FORTIN. There cannot be much difference. These words might be omitted, for it is well understood that the appointment of an inspector is to assist the liquidator, and to supervise generally the affairs of the liquidation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The words "assist" and "advise" are well understood, but the use of the word "supervise" might lead to a question as to the particular duties of those two officials. Is it the intention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fortin) that the liquidator should complete the matter without the supervision of the inspector? The "assistance" and "advice" is one thing, but the supervision of this liquidator is an entirely different thing. It may put the inspector, not in the position of an adviser or assistant of the liquidator, but it may make him a higher officer or an officer without whom the liquidator might not act.

Mr. FORTIN.

Mr. FORTIN. It was not the intention to give any superior power such as would seem to be conveyed by the expression "supervise," and I would be most willing to amend the clause if it is likely to be susceptible of any construction that would create a difficulty of that kind. I will move that this clause be amended by striking out the words "and supervise generally," and insert in lieu thereof the word "in."

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have no doubt my hon. friend has fully considered the advantage which this amendment will give, but I cannot quite understand what particular advantage will result from it. The position of the liquidator, as I understand, under this Act, differs to a considerable extent from the general assignee under the old Insolvent Act. Under the statute at present the liquidator acts only with the approval of the court, and he has no powers or very inconsiderable powers, except with the sanction of the court. He has authority, however, with the sanction of the court, to employ servants or clerks to assist him, and to appoint a solicitor or law agent. If my hon. friend can suggest what useful purpose an inspector would serve outside of the services which would be performed by the servants or assistants, or by a solicitor or law agent, I would be very glad if my hon. friend would give us a little information on that point.

Mr. FORTIN. I can only speak from my own experience. In my experience, in every case in which a company has been put into liquidation, the necessity of inspectors has been so well recognized that they have been appointed in each case. The last case I can cite is that of the Pratte Company, which was put into liquidation last winter. When the case was presented to the court for the appointment of a liquidator, some creditor asked also for the appointment of an inspector. I appeared before the court in that case as representing some of the creditors, and I objected to the appointment of an inspector on the ground that the law did not provide for such an appointment. After full discussion, the judge took the point "en délibéré," and two or three days afterwards he came on the bench and declared that after having consulted all his colleagues—and there are ten judges in the city of Montreal—he had come to the conclusion to appoint in each of those cases an inspector. The hon. gentleman asks what is the necessity for such an appointment; the liquidator can do nothing except by the authorization of the court, and what is the use of appointing an inspector? Now, a legal adviser or solicitor knows very little, say, about pianos. A manufacturer of pianos may have a lot of material in process of manufacture, or he may have a large stock of pianos or other instruments in stock. How are these to be sold? By auction, in lump or in detail? Will the manufactures be kept going in order to finish the pianos in process of manufacture? All these are questions which the inspectors are called upon to decide, and it is only in details of this kind that their advice is sought. So much is this the case that though the appointment is not legal it is made actually. For instance, the judges in the district of Montreal will not grant a provision authorizing the liquidator to sell $5 worth of the assets of any company unless they are presented with a written advice signed by the inspectors. The judges do not know any more about the particular business of joint stock companies than do the solicitors. In order to make sure that the liquidator will not abuse his authority or power, the judges exact a petition, signed with the written advice of the inspector. It is difficult to enumerate all the acts of assistance which the inspectors are called upon to perform; but if the hon. gentleman has had any experience of the working of this Winding-up Act, I am sure he will agree with me when I say that if inspectors are required in any case of insolvency, they are surely required in the case to which this Act applies. If inspectors are required in any case of insolvency it is surely in a case where this Act applies, because it applies, as is well known, to large business concerns, and where the estates are considerable. There may be points of conflict between the shareholders and the ordinary creditors which are very delicate and sometimes very difficult to settle. The shareholders may have paid only a portion of their shares, they may be called on to pay the balance of their shares, there may be a conflict between the creditors and the shareholders, and in all those questions surely the assistance of inspectors will be most valuable to the liquidator.

Mr. BRITTON. It seems to me there is going to be a difficulty in this section in carrying out just what the hon. gentleman intends. By this section, what status is given to the inspector? What power has he got? Supposing he does advise, and the liquidator does not choose to take his advice, what then?

Mr. FORTIN. All conflicts of that kind are settled by the courts.

Mr. BRITTON. Is the power given inspectors, when two or more are appointed, to override the decision of the liquidators? In the Ontario Winding-up Act, which is similar in many respects to the Act now in question, there is power in the shareholders, not in the court, to appoint one or more inspectors, but the words of that section are these:

The creditors of the company may at any meeting appoint one or more inspectors to superintend and direct the proceedings of the liquidators in the management and winding-up of the estate, and in case of one inspector being appointed, all the powers of the liquidator shall be exercised, subject to the advice and direction of the inspector.

In that case, it is clear that if there were two inspectors, and they decided one way, the liquidator would be bound to act in accord with their decision. But if there should be only one inspector, and the inspector and liquidator should differ, I suppose the court would have to determine between them. There is the difficulty. I said, when the matter was up before, that it seemed to me wise to have inspectors appointed, but taking the Act as it is presented to the committee, this section, it seems to me, will lead to a great deal of difficulty, if it is passed, simply giving power to appoint one or more inspectors, without defining better than the section does the duty of these inspectors or the power they may have.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Might I suggest to the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Fortin) that in the practice which I have had under this Act, the difficulties he has referred to have been usually dealt with in this way. If a company carrying on business goes into liquidation, the liquidator is usually a person who is familiar with that kind of business, and able to carry it on, if necessary. If, however, he is not such a person, if as is very often the case now, the liquidator is an incorporated company, then the course pursued, and which has seemed to work successfully, is this. The liquidator applies to the court for permission to appoint a manager of the business, as a going concern, and that manager, being familiar with that particular kind of business, carries it on under the direction of the liquidator, who again is under the direction of the court. My hon. friend says that in his province the advice of the inspector, such as here provided for, would be acted on by the court without further evidence.

Mr. FORTIN. Generally.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not think that would be the case in our province. I think our judges would still require evidence by affidavit of the facts before coming to any conclusion. If the clause, however, is carefully drafted and made entirely permissive, so that it shall be perfectly clear that it is not necessary to appoint an inspector, I would have no great objection, because the hon. gentleman is better able to judge than I am of the necessity which arises for it in his own province.

I would like, however, to point this out, that he should make it perfectly clear as to whether or not it is necessary to appoint an inspector when you make a winding-up order. He is, no doubt, aware that there has been difficulty, at least in our province, under section 20. That section reads this way:

The court in making up a winding-up order, may appoint a liquidator.

I think at one time it read "shall" appoint a liquidator. Now, is it intended that this inspector shall be appointed by the winding-up order at the same time as the liquidator is appointed, or that the court shall have jurisdiction at any time to appoint an inspector. I think it might be desirable for my hon. friend to consider whether or not he has made that point plain.

Mr. FORTIN. The practice in our courts is this. When a petition is presented for a winding-up order, the judge generally appoints a temporary liquidator. Then a meeting of the creditors is held, and at that meeting a winding-up order is made final and a liquidator appointed. I am aware of the difficulties pointed out by my hon. friend. The question has arisen, to my knowledge, whether a liquidator should not be appointed when the petition is made for a winding-up order, or whether he should not be appointed at a meeting subsequent to the granting of the winding-up order. But I understand the practice is now general, and there is no more difficulty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That clause was amended, I think, in 1888.

Mr. FORTIN. I do not know of the amendment, but I know that now there is no such difficulty. When the petition is presented, an interim liquidator is appointed, then a meeting of the creditors is called, and at that meeting a liquidator is appointed by the court.

The second subsection which I wish to add to section 20, is made in a permissive way. My hon. friend will see, by the words used, that the appointment is not compulsory. "The court may also appoint one or more inspectors."

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the hon. gentleman will allow me, the proposed subsection uses exactly the same language as the main section. It uses the word "may." It is true, but that is exactly the word used in the main section, and I would prefer, if my hon. friend has no objection, that it should be made perfectly clear that the two things are not exactly on the same basis.

It is necessary to appoint a liquidator, but it may not be necessary to appoint an inspector, and my hon. friend does not think it is, in all cases. I think, then, that if some words were introduced in that section to make that perfectly clear, it would be more acceptable from my standpoint.

Mr. FORTIN. No word is clearer than the word "may," as expressing a thing that is permissible. It is true that section 20 uses the same word.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But my hon. friend (Mr. Fortin) is aware that the word "may," when used with respect to a court, is sometimes used in a mandatory sense. I think an illustration of this use is to be found in section 20.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Mr. FORTIN. Perhaps it might do to put in the words "when found advisable," making it read "the court may also, when found advisable, appoint one or more inspectors," and so on. I would move that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think that would answer.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 3,

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Fortin) to explain this clause.

Mr. FORTIN. It is possible that the clause might require to be amended. The object is this. Under section 31 of the Winding-up Act, the liquidator is authorized, with the approval of the court, to exercise a series of powers. Now, one of these powers, under subsection "f," is to Draw, accept, make and endorse any bill of exchange of or promissory note in the name and behalf of the company.

Then, he is authorized to Raise upon the security of the assets of the company from time to time any requisite sum or sums of money; and the drawing, accepting, making or endorsing of every such bill of exchange or promissory note, as aforesaid, on behalf of the company shall have the same effect, with respect to the liability of such company, as if such bill or note had been drawn, accepted, made or endorsed by or on behalf of such company in the course of the carrying on of its business.

Now, a difficulty arises, so far as the province of Quebec is concerned. Though the liquidator is authorized to raise on the assets of a company any reasonable sum or sums of money, still, the main portion of his duty is to sell and dispose of the assets of the company. Now, in Quebec no valid contract or pledge of security can be given upon movable assets, without their things being actually placed in the possession of the creditor or in the possession of a third person agreed upon by the parties. So, if the liquidator is to borrow money on the security of movable assets of the company, he must divest himself of such assets, and that paralyzes the liquidation. Precisely such a difficulty arose in the case already stated, the case of the Pratte Piano Company. They had a large stock of pianos on hand, and the liquidator had been empowered to continue the affairs of the company in order to dispose of the material in process of manufacture. For this purpose he wanted some money. He was authorized by the judge to borrow money upon the security of the assets of the company, and he went to the bank for that purpose. The bank said: You are authorized by the judge to borrow money, but you are not directed by the judge how to make the contract. In order to make the contract valid under our common law, you must deliver to us the possession of the pianos. If he had done so, he could not have liquidated, and in that case the liquidator was prevented from borrowing the necessary funds to carry on the business of the company. The object of the amendment is to meet such a case, though it may go too far with regard to negotiable instruments. There seems to me no difficulty, however, in the province of Quebec where the chattel mortgage is totally unknown. When the Bill was first presented to the House, some objection was taken to this clause by hon. members from other provinces, and it then came to my mind for the first time that there might be something in the objection, because of the existence of the chattel mortgage, which is recognized by all the provinces except Quebec. It might, therefore, be necessary to declare that, as the lien offered by the liquidator would be subject to any pre-existing liens conferred on other creditors, either by way of chattel mortgage or otherwise. I would, therefore, be ready to add a few words to the subsection, in order to meet the difficulty that might arise in other provinces. In the first place, I am quite willing to amend the clause by striking out the words "by discounting any negotiable instrument." This will exactly meet the difficulty arising from the way of raising security upon the assets of the company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
How will that read ?

Mr. FORTIN (reading).

And no delivery of the whole nor of any part of the assets of the company shall be necessary to give a lien to any person making a loan to the liquidator in virtue of the provisions of this section.

Perhaps some words might be added here, such as "the whole without prejudice to all previous liens existing upon the securities or assets of the company." I am quite willing to accept suggestions from the learned members of the profession. Perhaps the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), or the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), might suggest a few words that would cover that point. As regards the province of Quebec, the law would meet our case perfectly, because we have no chattel mortgages there. But in order to avoid a conflict between a lien created by a liquidator and some previous liens existing upon the assets, we might add a few words.

Mr. BRITTON. I oppose altogether the amendment for the province of Ontario ; it would be introducing an entirely new state of things so far as the Ontario law is concerned, and will lead to endless confusion and litigation. It will not work at all in the province of Ontario. The liquidator at present has the power of an individual to carry on business, to make such contracts as an individual could make if the property was his own and he was dealing with it. Now, in order that an individual may give a lien upon the property there must be an actual delivery of it, with actual and continued possession, or it must be in writing and the writing, whether it is a bill of sale or a chattel mortgage, must be registered. Then anybody who is dealing with the person who owns the property knows just what is being done in reference to it. If this law passes, it will place the liquidator of an insolvent concern or of a company that is being wound up, as to the property he is dealing with, in an entirely different position from any individual under similar circumstances would be, and there is no reason for that. I do not know how it may be as to other provinces. I am speaking simply as to the province of Ontario where, if a person who loans money sets a lien upon the particular goods of the liquidator without delivery, or writing of any kind, would be something entirely novel, and as I said would lead to a great deal of trouble. Then comes this question of the liquidator borrowing money from several persons. Then of course will arise the question of priority as to these liens. Why should the man who lends money in the first place to the liquidator be in any better position than the man who lends the money in the second place is to the liquidator, so long as the man who lends the money secondly is not in any way aware of the lien that has been created ? When this question was before the committee before, the argument that were adduced were much stronger than I can possibly make them, and they seemed to me conclusive that no such legislation ought to be passed by this House applicable to Ontario, which changes altogether the ordinary law of contract in reference to personal property.

Mr. FORTIN. I think the hon. gentleman entirely misconstrues the effect of this amendment. There is no question in this amendment of making special provisions that will put the liquidator in a different position to any other person with respect to a contract of this kind.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Perhaps the difficulty of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) would be removed by substituting these words :

Shall be necessary to give a lien to any person taking security upon the assets of the company.

No delivery shall be necessary.

Mr. BRITTON. I think that is the whole question. Taking security then would mean taking security according to the laws of the province where the thing was done. I do not see any objection to such an amendment Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

SALE OF RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS.

Mr. BEATTIE moved that Bill (No. 32) to amend the Act respecting the sale of railway passenger tickets be read the second time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into committee on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. BEATTIE. This Bill is brought up at the instance of the Steam Ferry Boat Company running between Windsor and Detroit. They hold a charter from this Government, and have, I believe, some $400,000 invested in first-class steam ferry boats. Under their charter from the Government they are obliged to sell ten tickets for 25 cents; but they are still more liberal than that, and they sell tickets at the rate of 1½ cents a piece provided $1 worth are purchased at a time. But speculators or scalpers purchase these tickets, in quantities, and through newsboys and other agents, sell tickets for 5 cents to occasional passengers who do not cross the river very often, and who do not carry tickets with them. By that means the company is deprived of its regular profits on the tickets. They lose a great deal of legitimate business by that interference with their trade, and the Bill asks that unauthorized agents shall be deprived from selling the company's tickets, the same as railways are protected.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. GEORGE R. MAXWELL (Burrard) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 49) to amend the Chinese Immigration Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, in asking the House to pass the second reading of this Bill, I crave the indulgence of the House while I seek, in as few words as possible, to present our grievances, as British Columbians, so far as this subject is concerned. I frankly confess that this question has no charm for me, but, if we are to do honestly our part as representatives of the people who send us here to voice their sentiments, then we must be prepared to tackle things disagreeable as well as things agreeable. Our bed is not always one of roses. Our path is sometimes rough and thorny. Duty is stern and unbending. We have, therefore, to take the bitter along with the sweet, and we have to look at all questions in the light, in the higher light of how these questions affect the well being or ill being of the men and women who are linked with us for weal or woe in all things pertaining to the material progress of our fair Dominion. For a proper grasp and appreciation of our difficulties in the golden west—two lions bar the way. I wish to be frank—for frankness is best and will help rather than mitigate against our case. First, this is largely a question affecting one section of our broad Dominion. It is largely a local grievance, and removed so far away from most of the representatives of this House, that it is hard for some hon. gentlemen to understand the full meaning of what we contend for. Still, this drawback is not so great as it used to be. Thanks to the persistent efforts of many representatives who have preceded me in this House, this question has been brought home to you both through their speeches, and through the press in such a telling way, that I am emboldened to say, Sir, the question is getting to be understood, and that we are supported by all who are anxious to give a fair show to the labouring classes of our country. Thanks also to the marvellous discoveries of our great mineral wealth, we have been brought closer to other parts of the Dominion. Our province is no longer a terra incognita. Many of you, realizing our immense possibilities, have come to see us, and have got now a fair view of our material conditions. You have seen the thing of which we complain yourselves, and I sincerely hope you will join with us in trying to settle this question for all time in harmony with the wishes of the people. Further, our evil is becoming your evil. Toronto and Montreal are beginning to feel as we have felt for many years. The Chinese are sweeping across the continent, and already are making the labouring classes of our industrial centres sensible of what will be when they become more numerous. And I am glad for our sakes, for to this fact we have both an amount of sympathy and support that never would have been ours had the Chinese confined themselves to British Columbia. Many of you, however, know nothing personally of our grievances—and we want your practical help. Sir, no representative can absolve himself from responsibility in this matter. No one should say that because it does not affect his province, he has no interest in it. We are here to legislate for the whole and not for a part, and what injures the part injures the whole. In other words, in spite of our provincial divisions, we are the representatives of the whole people, and as such I ask you to join with us in obtaining that redress which we have long and earnestly sought, and which we sincerely believe is absolutely necessary for the well-being of our people.

Second, this proposal runs counter to teachings we all respect. I am sensible of that. But, Sir, this House, by the imposition of a $50 tax, has already departed from theory, and few, if any, advocate its abolition. Two things move me in this matter, so far as the Chinese are concerned. I honestly believe that it would be better for themselves to stay in China, and so far as the churches are concerned, they could and can more easily change them in China than here. Then, as one considers his duty in this matter, he finds something like this staring him in the face. Present legislation bears heavily against the labouring man. That man is bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh. He supports our religious, educational, municipal, provincial and political institutions. Without him churches would dwindle, schools would grow less numerous, and our political organizations would lose their best friends. In other words, the labouring man is the backbone of all things which are our pride. If then my choice is whether I shall legislate for his interests, or for the interests of the Chinese, and that is our choice, then I have not the slightest hesitation, Sir, in saying that our first duty is towards those who are of our own household. I can conceive of no law, and no teachings that should compel us to be oblivious of the interests of our brethren, and any condition or circumstance or law that drives them to the wall in favour of a lower civilization cannot, in my opinion, be just. The legislation of this House protects the manufacturer or the capitalists; there is no doubt about that. Let us be consistent by doing something to protect the interests of the labourer.

To give the House as complete a view of this question as possible, a short statement of previous efforts in this direction seems necessary. I would like to pay a tribute to those earnest workers in the past, who believed that while they were pleading for the settlement of this vexed question, that they were in reality labouring for the emancipation of their province. Some of these are dead and gone, but about their sincerity and purity of motive there can be no doubt. We have entered in to their labours, and if we are nearer the goal of success, I am willing to own that it is largely owing to the increasing efforts of these men. I pass by the earlier efforts of the early agitators. For practical purposes, the later developments are quite suited to our purposes. In 1883, Mr. Shakespeare moved :

That in the opinion of this House it is expedient to enact a law similar in principle to the law now in force in Australia, and entitled the Influx of Chinese Restriction Act, 1881.

The motion was negatived on a division. The result was not altogether unsatisfactory. Several able speeches were delivered in support, and several others which, while halting between two opinions, yet gave evidence that the speakers were on the fair way to become converted. The leader of the Government, now, unhappily, gone, and whose presence in this Chamber will ever be missed by those who knew him and loved him, said :

It is a very serious question, one whose importance cannot be over-estimated, one that cannot be slurred over, but must be treated. It is of great consequence to British Columbia, and is of subsequent importance to the eastern provinces.

This question, Sir, let me remind hon. members of both sides of the House, is of greater consequence to-day than it was then, and is of greater importance to eastern provinces to-day than it has ever been, and to the members of the present Government to whom we look with considerable confidence that they will not disappoint us, I would say, that our demand cannot be overestimated, it cannot be slurred over, but must be treated, and the sooner the better. In 1884, the same gentleman, the representative of the then most important constituency in British Columbia, moved :

That in the opinion of this House it is expedient to enact a law prohibiting the incoming of Chinese to that portion of Canada known as British Columbia.

As the result, the Government promised to issue a commission to look into the whole subject, and, in the words of Sir John A. Macdonald :

To consider its trade relations, its social relations, and all those moral considerations which make Chinese immigration inadvisable.

According to promise, the commission was issued, and, as the result of their labours on the coast, we have, on the whole, a volume of considerable value. In 1885, the Hon. Mr. Chapleau, who was one of the commissioners, moved :

That it is expedient to impose an entry fee or duty of $50 on every person of Chinese origin entering Canada, and that no vessel carrying Chinese immigrants to any port in Canada shall carry more than one such immigrant for every fifty tons of its tonnage.

That is the law in existence. The hon. gentleman was frank enough to tell this House that the Bill was regarded as a milk-and-water measure, and the opinion then expressed is almost universal now. Even the representatives then were not satisfied. One said :

It is getting in the thin end of the wedge.

Victoria, the capital of the province, became excited, and the late chief justice seconded a motion, which was unanimously carried, calling upon the then representatives of British Columbia in this House to urge upon the Government the necessity of immediately adopting the strongest restrictive measures as to Chinese immigration. Mr. Gordon, one of the best representatives ever sent from British Columbia, said that Personally, he would like to see the tax $500, but was prepared to give this measure a fair trial.

And so, with the best expectations that the cure had been found which would lessen our evils, the Bill became law. Since then we have had time and opportunity to consider the merits and demerits of that legislation. I can assure you, Sir, that there was every desire to give it fair-play, but, when all is said that can be said in its favour, we have sorrowfully to confess that it comes far from what was expected and what was wanted. It has been weighed and found wanting. The Government of that day said the law now in existence was for the regulation, and not for the prohibiting of Chinese immigration. Neither the one nor the other has been accomplished; all that has been done, and is being done, is simply to put so many thousand dollars per year into the treasury, but we are practically left defenceless. The tax is inadequate, for the Chinese bosses can pay the tax and bring in all they want, being sure of making a good thing out of their investment. Little, if any, decrease has taken place; so that, practically, we stand where we were before. The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries said in 1886:

If the present Act is not effective, then its object ceases altogether and it should be repealed.

No Government can with safety repeal the present law, imperfect as it is. Though it does not provide us with a remedy, I do not object to those gentlemen paying something to the support of a country that treats them so handsomely. There can be no backward movement, nor can we allow things to remain as they are. What we should do, if the present law is not effective, is to make it effective by raising the tax to such a point as will compel these bosses to give up their nefarious trade, and thus ensure our country from being overrun by a class which, take them all in all, are most undesirable immigrants. Sir, from 1886 till the present, the agitation has been going on. The discontent has been growing deeper and stronger, not only in British Columbia, but throughout Canada, and we feel that the time has come for more vigorous measures. Sir John A. Macdonald, the leader of the Government in 1883, said:

At any moment when the Legislature of Canada chooses, it can shut down the gate and say: "No more immigration shall come here from China," and then no more immigrants will come, and those in the country at the time will rapidly disappear.

We believe that this House should now shut down the gate. Sir, I think it is apparent that there must be good reasons for this agitation. One old teacher, when importuned to oppose a certain agitation, practically said: No: if it is false, it will pass away like smoke; but, if it is right, it will stand. Many of us are familiar with agitations that made a noise, a great noise, at the beginning, and then fizzled out, like a sky-rocket. This question has been agitating the people of British Columbia for nearly thirty years, and it is stronger than ever. Time has neither changed nor mollified opinions. The very unchangeableness of the people is, to me, a sign that they must have right on their side. Our reasons have often been laid before this honourable House, but in asking the Government to take this step, it would not be fair, if we did not back up our request with substantial arguments. What reasons I give are those which commend themselves to my mind. There may be other reasons which may be more cogent with others; but, however we may differ as to the reasons for this request, there is no difference among us about the request itself.

We object to Chinese immigration because those who come to our land are mostly slaves. I have already referred to the Chinese bosses, and these I blame for a great deal of the trouble which we have had with the Chinamen. They are our modern Shylocks, who fatten and grow rich on the misfortunes of their poor countrymen. They have their agents in China. These agents select the victims. Being unable to pay either ship money or the tax, the poor Chinamen contract to become the slaves of these bosses until that money is paid. When they arrive here, they are consigned, like so many sheep, to their respective owners, who use them and abuse them, according as it suits their financial profit. While, on the part of the slave, it is his interest to free himself as quickly as possible from his galling bondage, it is the interest of his master to keep him, by hook or by crook, as long as possible in his service. The testimony of competent witnesses is most complete and convincing. Hon. John Robson, a late Premier of British Columbia, says:

My opinion is that the greater portion of Chinese brought here are brought by private companies.

The Rev. Philip Dwyer says:

They are mostly young single men, being imported as slaves on speculation.

David W. Gordon, head of a firm of wharf-owners, and a contractor, says:

So far as I can gather, from the most reliable Chinese and other sources, the class of immigrants, or more properly speaking serfs or slaves who come here from China are gathered by agents of Chinese companies from amongst the criminal and poverty-stricken population. When they arrive here they follow any pursuit their owners can turn them to with advantage.

Gilbert M. Sproat, who received a prize of $1,000 for an essay on India and China, and who has thoroughly studied this question, says:

Many of them enmeshed in labour contracts with their own performances guaranteed by cruel penalties to their relatives at home are less free here than they were in China.

Thomas H. King, ten years in China, says:

Most of them who are brought here come to supply the coolie broker or contractor, who hires them out. They dare not break their contract.

G. C. Hastings, a chief justice of the Supreme Court of California, says:

Chinese labour is a servile caste. The Chinaman is in a state of peonage. They are not free men.

S. H. Phillips, Attorney General of the Sandwich Islands, on oath, says :

The Chinese who come to the Sandwich Islands are under contracts which are indefinite and assignable. They are bought and sold out body and soul to the person who employs them for a term of years, generally five.

Consul Bailey, of Hong Kong, says :

The emigration from China to all parts of the world is an organized business, in which men with large capital engage, in which men are bought and sold at so much per head precisely as a piece of merchandise is handled at the market value. The coolie of China is bought by the rich trader to serve his purchaser at a low rate of wages for a series of years in a foreign country under a contract for the full performance of which in many cases he gives a mortgage on his wife and family.

Sir, that evidence is surely conclusive. It reveals what one might call a horrible state of affairs. Slavery in any form is repugnant. "Man's ownership of man is so palpably unjust that it requires no prophet to discover the injustice." Canada, you know, when slavery was looked at differently than it is now, was the first among the nations to proclaim that freedom was the inalienable right of every man, and that no man in her wide domain should ever grow rich by enslaving others. As things go, slavery flourishes—the slave toils, and the slave-masters grow rich. In the name of Liberty, I plead that this horrid traffic should cease. In the name of a right which some for gold are willing to barter and to destroy, I plead that better far would it be for these Celestial slaves, were they never to see our shores, than to come as they do, and the only effective solution is the raising the tax to such a point as will make it impossible for these inhuman wretches to traffic with profit in human flesh.

Secondly, we oppose Chinese immigration because these slaves are dangerous competitors with our labouring classes. If I was asked, Sir, one reason why this movement has maintained its vitality for so long, I should unhesitatingly answer that it is because the presence of the Chinese in our land is an injustice to our working classes. The working classes know that, feel it, and because they know and feel it, they have been perfectly within their right in keeping alive this agitation, and they are perfectly within their right in asking you to come to their help. I know, Sir, that this point is disputed, and it will be necessary on that account to investigate the facts of the case. Mr. N. Shakespeare, when a member of this House, and a very worthy member he was, too, stated :

It has been found impracticable in all departments of labour and industry involving manual labour for a white man to compete with a Chinaman, especially in those light situations which have hitherto been filled with women and young people.

Mr. Barnard, who was another member of this honourable House, said—and he knew what he was talking about :

I have seen the practical working of this Chinese problem, and I have found that they are competitors with white labour.

The mover of the Bill now in force declared that the antagonism between the white and Chinese labourer was due to this very cause, and the object of the Bill was to give the white labourer fair-play. Again, he said :

I say that the mass of Chinese immigrants are of a class who necessarily will compete with the labouring men, with the ordinary working men of the country, and I say that it is little wonder that objections should be raised to the large immigration of this class.

These testimonies are taken from "Hansard," and were I to turn to the report of the Chinese commission many more might be adduced. Now, you might ask, Sir, why does Chinese labour interfere disastrously with white labour? Well, Sir, that is not difficult to answer. The Chinaman is a cheap worker. He is not the product of nineteenth-century civilization. He has not been taught to feast his eyes and his soul on pictures and music; to have a nice home and have it stocked, say, with a carpet, comfortable chairs and an organ. He is a creature of few wants. In fact, he has one want and one only, and that is he wants money. All the rest he can dispense with without a tear. Hence, as one competent authority puts it—I think it was Sir Adolphe Chapleau :

A Chinaman will live on wages that will not support a white man and his family, being well provided himself on a handful of rice and other trifling necessities. He becomes rich, according to his own standard, on wages that would beggar a white man's family. Now, take the white labourer's view of the case. While my work is very arduous, I go out with a light heart and perform it cheerfully, because it enables me to support my wife and my children. I am in a position to bring up my daughters to be good wives, and faithful mothers, and to offer my sons better opportunities in life than I had myself. I cheerfully contribute to support those churches, charitable institutions and other objects that enter into our daily life, but after I have maintained my family and performed these duties, not much is left of my wages when the week is ended. How is it with the Chinaman? The Chinaman can do as much work underground as I can. He has no wife and family. He performs none of these duties. Forty or fifty of his kind can live in a house no larger than mine. He craves no variety of food. He has inherited no taste for comfort or for social enjoyment. Conditions that satisfy him, and make him contented, would make my life not worth living.

As the Hon. Mr. Chapleau says, this is the feeling of the workingmen, and I am not prepared to say that it is not excusable or even justifiable. Now, important results may be noted. First, the Chinese crowd out the white labourer. This is disputed, but I believe the evidence is conclusive. Mr. Shakespeare says :

I know of instances myself where white men were engaged in certain callings previous to such a large influx of Chinese, who were doing well, and making comfortable livings; but afterwards through their competitors—they were obliged to abandon their callings, and leave the country.

Mr. Homer, another representative, in 1885, testified to the same fact. But such testimonies are practically unnecessary. The facts testify enough. In the coal mines there are about 600 Chinamen; they are doing the work which white labour could well do. When you consider the immense hold which they have got of the laundry business; you cannot but realize that they have driven the white labourer out. In market gardening few whites have been able to compete against them, and when you consider that there are thousands of them employed in our canneries, you cannot but see that white labour has been crushed out.

Secondly, labour is degraded. The eloquent leader of the present Opposition, in 1883, said:

I believe that the tendency of such an immigration must necessarily be to cheapen and degrade labour, and to lower labour all through the country is entirely a wrong and erroneous principle to prevail in the councils of the nation.

A sentiment I heartily applaud; and I further add, in the language of a friend of our cause, Mr. Fairbank:

I believe no greater calamity can befall any class of the community, or any community itself, than anything which tends to degrade labour.

Now, Sir, should such things be? Is it fair or is it just to the labourer that he should be treated in this manner? Legislation in this House, and both the late and the present governments have said our manufacturers must be protected. While a free trader, as things exist across the line, I think there is reason for so doing. Protect labour and the white labourer. Realize his importance in our life, that in very truth Canada's greatness depends and will ever depend, not so much in her mines as in her men. Consider his struggles—struggles for which he is often ill-prepared. Consider how much more necessary the white labour is to this land than is the other, and I ask that to-day you will not turn a deaf ear to an appeal for justice which has been long and earnestly made.

One objection that was urged—and, Sir, I must confess that at times there was some force in the objection, and that was—that owing to the scarcity of white labour, Chinese were absolutely necessary. I don't know that those who urged this were perfectly sincere, or whether they used it simply as a blind to get that cheap, ignorant, passive worker introduced, so as to make them a sort of base currency for fixing the value of white labour, whatever was the motive, the appearances of things were decidedly in favour. In 1883 we were told you must keep Chinese labour until white labour is ready to supplant it. Sir John A. Macdonald in a remarkable speech, which has an important bearing on our Bill to-day, said:

As soon as that takes place, then I will go just as strongly as the then leader of this question in this honourable House.

Then a railway was about to be built and we were assured that white labour could not be had. To-day another railway was built and white labour has been had in abundance. That excuse has no force to-day. No one can honestly urge that argument to-day. We believe, and we think that we have good grounds for believing, that white labour is ready to supplant Chinese labour, if white labour is to have justice meted out. I grant that we may not have that labour just at hand, and the reason why it is not at hand, is just where the shoe pinches. We want more people—not Orientals—children of the Anglo-Saxon race, and all others of other nations who will join with us in developing our wonderful resources, and in supporting our educational, religious and political institutions. Why is it that the richest province, perhaps, in Canada, or for that in the world, cannot command all the white labour it requires? Why is it that white labour give us the go-by? It is not, Sir, as you know, because we have no inducements to offer. It is not because our climate is wintry, it is not because of the poverty of the soil or the forest, or the mine, or our seas and rivers. Why do we then lack the services of those whose services ever enrich any land? I believe that Mr. Barnard stated the truth, and the whole truth, when he said:

I believe that white labour is to be had in abundance, only for the presence of the Chinese, but white men do not care to come so long as they are present in such large numbers.

Proclaim then to-day by the adoption of this Bill, that henceforth the white labourer will have the same rights and privileges, will be put upon the same industrial level here, as he has in all civilized countries of the world, and that the value of a Chinaman will not be his value, then we shall have such an influx of white labour as will be mutually beneficial to all; then churches will flourish, schools will grow larger and more numerous, money will become more plentiful, population will increase by leaps and bounds, businesses will increase, and merchants will prosper, while a thousand and one avenues will be opened up for the preferment of our growing youth.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there can be but one opinion in this House to-day, and that is, we have a grievance. Long ago, the eloquent ex-Finance Minister said:

I do wish that something might be done to settle this question permanently, and to alleviate what I believe is a grievance to the people of British Columbia, and which in its present form, is weighing somewhat heavily upon the peace and prosperity of that country.

And immediately after, the present leader of the Opposition, said :

Since this debate has commenced I have been strongly impressed that the people of British Columbia are labouring under a grievance.

Both hon. gentlemen know British Columbia a great deal better to-day than they did then, and I am sure their better knowledge will only make more manifest what they learned through debate. An attempt was made to settle this question permanently. I believe the framers of the Bill now in force meant to settle this grievance for all time. Their intentions were good, and while it has proved more or less ineffective, the legislation was a step in the right direction. Here then you have a question that is continually thrusting itself upward, and continually projecting itself into the political arena. Here to-day you have a people worthy in every way of your kind consideration, asking you almost unitedly to permanently settle this question. Agitations of this kind are injurious both to a province and country. The longer it is kept up—and it will keep up—class is set against class, labour against capital, and feelings are engendered which do irreparable harm all round. Frankly, I confess other problems of deeper importance should be engrossing our attention, but so long as the grievance lasts, just so long will the spirit of discontent prevent us attaining our higher and nobler destiny. What then are you going to do? Is the present Government going to do something for labour, and thus for the labourer, or is it by refusal or inaction going to declare—that it values the Chinaman more than it does those whom it ought to honour? A choice has to be made, and conscious of all that is at stake, I plead that the choice may be the one that appeals to all the better instincts of our race and country: The question may be asked—what do you want? My answer to that, Sir, is we want the tax raised from $50 to $500. Bear in mind we say nothing against those who are here. Granting all that advocates of cheap labour claim, we say in addition we have enough of Chinese to do all the cheap labour, and we don't want now any more. As matters stand, we may at any moment be deluged; we want that possibility changed into an impossibility, by the raising of the tax. Further, in asking for this we are not asking for something that is new and unprecedented. We are not the only country that has had to deal with this problem, and this hon. House is not the only House that has had legislation pressed upon them of this kind. In truth we are but following in the footsteps of others. The United States had to deal in a very summary way with these people. A short time ago the Government of Hawaii had to protect their people from their inroad. It is more pertinent perhaps to note what has transpired under the shadow of the British Crown. Queensland has had its Chinese trouble, and a law was passed in 1884 directed against Asiatic and African aliens. New South Wales has been tinkering away with this subject like ourselves until the legislators of that important colony were constrained by the voice of the people to raise the tax to $500. From all the information which can be obtained, there is a consensus of opinion that that tax has settled the question for ever. New Zealand, face to face with the same dangers, has had to follow suit. What, therefore, other colonies have done, and what other legislators have done should be precedent enough for us. Possibly if we had been the first to take this step, I might have faltered in proposing or in pleading for its enforcement; but seeing others have had to cure this grievance by a similar proposal, their action should be a lesson to us to go and do likewise. This proposal may be Draconian—for that I do not care—sufficient for me the experience of others—that you cannot settle this grievance any other way. I believe there is one member of the Cabinet, the hon. Minister of Justice, to whom this proposal will be welcome, at least, it will have his support; for I find in 1887 that he used the following words:—

If the hon. gentleman thinks there are too many Chinese in the country, let him double the capitation tax. I do not object to such a tax as will serve to exclude the Chinese, but I say let the tax be upon the Chinaman, and let the Chinaman's wife come in free—the wife cuts a small figure in this question, but we hope that he will withstand the wiles of my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue.

Sometimes during debate on this matter, the question has been asked what will Britain say or do should we pass legislation like this? Very often that question was raised as a warning that Britain would not recognize it, in fact would throw it out. The true statesmen of this country knew differently. Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1884, said:

I presume that England would not interfere with any legislation of ours.

The Hon. Mr. Chapleau, in 1885, said:

I may state here that, as soon as the Government of the Dominion had decided to take this matter into consideration, we received from the Imperial authorities a communication stating that, notwithstanding the commercial treaty between Great Britain and China, the Imperial authorities left the Canadian Government free to dispose of the question as they deemed expedient.

We have the same freedom to-day. The legislature of New South Wales has been allowed, and the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain plainly told Earl Li Hung Chang, the particular friend of the chivalrous Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), that in these matters the colonies were entirely self-governing. No difficulty prevents us that way, in fact, all is smooth sailing. But it may be further asked. How will legislation like this affect our trade relations with China? We have a magnificent fleet of vessels plying between Vancouver and China. Will not this imposition affect their trade? I do not think so. I think we can claim that we have treated the Chinaman fairly well. The only real enemies he has in British Columbia are small boys and dogs? Explain it how you will, but a dog barks at a Chinaman every time he sees him. In the United States they were treated at times with great inhumanity, and this proposal is not so bad as the Geary Act. Yet what do we find? American statesmen are in high favour at Pekin, one of them being selected to arrange the treaty of peace between China and Japan, while American business men, bankers and contractors are, if anything, more in favour than those of other countries. Further, there are steamers, American steamers, plying between American ports and China, and they are doing well. In short, American legislation has not interfered with their commercial enterprise. I should be sorry, Sir, to do anything, or advise anything to hurt the Empress Line of steamers. They are a credit to all concerned. There is but one blot—and that is, the large number of Chinamen employed. In all sincerity I say, these ought to give place to the sons of the countries which have given so much for their maintenance. I say I would regret to do anything to injure their prosperity, but we may naturally expect that as with the United States, so with Canada; China will grin and bear it. The sweet reasonableness, and the sunny ways of our gifted Premier, will, if necessary, make all things straight and plain.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to present our case as briefly and clearly as possible. We have heard it often, and it is difficult to galvanize an old subject into life. Let me say that the press is largely with us. Almost every paper in British Columbia supports this request to-day. When I come east there is a marvellous unanimity also. The Montreal "Gazette" says:

An increase in the capitation tax would do no harm. John Chinaman is too much with us, not only in Montreal, but in all the cities and larger towns of Quebec and Ontario. He displaces Christian labour, and is in no sense a welcome or desirable addition to our population.

The Toronto "World" says, in an article headed "Exclude the Chinese":

The Chinese are a people that Canada can afford to exclude. They are producers in no sense of the word—

I can hardly go that far.

They do not take to farming. They are not needed as scavengers. One Doukhobor is worth a dozen Chinese. In addition to their worthlessness as producers, the Chinese are decidedly a low caste people. They are filthy in their habits and a menace to the public health.

That is absolutely true.

The Chinese will not assimilate with the people of any civilized country. Assimilation is impossible because the Caucasian is of a different breed, and he will have nothing to do with the Oriental. In British Columbia, where they know the Chinese best, the antipathy towards them is strongest. The per capita tax of $50 is wholly ineffective in keeping the Chinese out of Canada. During the year ending June 30, 1898, no less than 2263 Chinese immigrants paid the tax and entered Canada through British Columbia ports. The average for the past three years has been over 2100 per annum. It is time this wholesale importation should be stopped. By imposing a tax of $50 per head the Government declares that its policy is hostile to further immigration of these undesirable people. As the $50 tax has proved ineffectual it should be raised to such an amount as will prevent their getting into the country. Other British colonies have found it necessary to exclude the Chinese. In New South Wales and New Zealand a per capita tax of $500 is imposed, and ships carrying Chinese immigrants to those colonies are allowed to land not more than one Chinese to each 300 tons and 200 tons ship's burthen respectively.

Mr. MAXWELL.

The Toronto "World," the Bible of this side of the House, some time ago, gave us a leading article. I hope it was "inspired," and I wish I could give it all, for it is one of the best contributions to this subject that I have read. Let me give you two brief extracts:

The ultimate object of all legislation is the building up of a nation, founded on a superior standard of manhood. To that end we tax ourselves to secure a desirable class of immigrants, and it is equally essential and equally sound in policy that we exclude all classes likely to lower the standard of living or lower the tone of citizenship.

The article concludes as follows:—

If the leading politicians of eastern Canada could see the Chinese problem as it confronts the people of the west, the need of an effective restriction on such immigration would be at once recognized.

Our legislature is with us also, and I think this House and the Government also should take into consideration the views of the legislature of British Columbia. During the last session, this resolution was adopted, on the motion of Mr. Deane, seconded by Mr. Helgesen:

Whereas it is the declared policy of the Parliament of Canada to restrict the immigration of persons of the Chinese race into Canada, as shown by the enactment which imposes a tax of $50 on each Chinese entering the country:

And whereas this per capita tax is so low as to be wholly ineffective in carrying out the desires and wishes of the Dominion Parliament in this regard, as is plainly shown by the steady increase in the influx of Chinese persons into this country:

And whereas it is desirable that effective measures be taken as speedily as possible to prevent any further immigration of Chinese into the Dominion of Canada:

Therefore be it resolved, That a respectful Address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor, requesting him to acquaint the Dominion Government and Parliament with the opinion and desire of this legislature, that the per capita tax on Chinese immigrants should be at once increased to at least $500, and that His Honour may be pleased, in bringing this matter to the attention of the Dominion authorities to cite the following:—

1. During the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1898, as shown by the Customs returns, no less a number than 2,263 Chinese immigrants paid the tax and entered Canada through the ports of this province alone, the average for the past three years being over 2,100 per annum.

2. This enormous influx, together with the present Chinese population of the province, estimated at about 14,000, and the natural increase by births in the province, has already driven workingmen of British race and blood out of many of the fields of labour, and threatens before long, if not stopped, to leave very little occupation remaining for the white labourer.

3. The history of the sister colonies of Great Britain, as well as of other countries, has fully demonstrated that wherever Chinese immigration has taken place, and where the influx has been unrestricted, the white worker has been in the first place degraded by the competition to which they were subjected, and ultimately wholly or largely driven out.

4. That the Imperial authorities are in sympathy with the efforts of the British colonies to protect British workers from the destructive incursions of Asiatic coolies is shown by their non-interference in restrictive legislation passed and enforced by those colonies.

5. Effective restriction is now being enforced in various of the colonies. In New South Wales and in New Zealand a per capita tax of £100, or £500, is imposed, and ships carrying Chinese immigrants to those colonies are allowed to land not more than one Chinese to each 300 tons and 200 tons ship's burthen, respectively. In New South Wales, no Chinese is allowed to become naturalized.

6. So effective has this legislation proved that the Chinese population of those colonies is gradually dwindling, while the number of immigrants has decreased from the thousands that were annually imported before these restrictive measures were enforced to almost an imperceptible number. These colonies will soon be rid of Chinese altogether. The latest returns show that the departures are beginning largely to exceed the arrivals.

7. It is well known to be the habitual custom of Chinese labourers to send their surplus earnings to China, and when that is not the case these earnings are usually extorted from them by "Companies" (as they are called) which, in the first place, have sent the coolie out here in a position of complete bondage to them. Thus there is going on a constant drain to the riches of the country, the depletion of its natural wealth, and the consequent impoverishment of the people.

That is practically the opinion of the people of British Columbia. I may say still further that the labour unions of British Columbia, as well as of the east, are also in favour of this measure. It has become one of the articles of the creed of the Trades and Labour Congress that a tax of $500 shall be put upon each Chinese immigrant. I may say still further that the people themselves that is those who have no axes to grind, are deeply stirred upon this matter, and earnestly desire that the Government should come to their aid and relieve them of this incubus. Now, I want to say in conclusion that when the telegram which came from the Premier was read at one of the largest meetings, I believe, ever held in the city of Vancouver, saying that our wishes would be his wishes, a cheer went up, one of the most enthusiastic I ever heard, because then the people seemed to realize that our political Moses had been found at last. I hope that the Government will be true to that position. In the good old Book we read of a woman who came again and again to a judge appealing for justice. Again and again, she was denied, but we are told for our encouragement that by persisting she succeeded. Now, we, the people of British Columbia, have this grievance, there is no doubt about that. They have done everything they possibly could in order to have their grievance ventilated, and to obtain the sympathy of the Government. We have been refused again and again. Now we are making this one more effort, and I do hope that the Government, at this late stage of the agitation, will feel it to be their duty to respond to our wishes, and that they will at least give us some more restrictive power than we have at the present time. Let our labouring classes be encouraged to continue their good work in the various fields of labour, so that British Columbia, so rich, so fair and so fertile, may become the home alone of the good old Anglo-Saxon stock, and of all other races who will join with that stock in making British Columbia one of the greatest and wealthiest provinces of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. ELLIS. I wish to raise a point of order. I beg to submit that this is really a tax; the hon. gentleman himself speaks of it as a tax, and that is his idea. Well, if it be a tax, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully suggest that it ought to be recommended to this House by His Excellency the Governor General, and it ought to originate in Committee of the Whole.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman should have taken that point earlier in the debate.

Mr. ELLIS. I had not heard the argument.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Only one side of this question has been put, and the hon. gentleman should be the last to wish the debate to be closed without hearing the other side. I do not think the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Ellis) has stated the point of order fully. In the first place, this is not a tax on any of Her Majesty's subjects, there are no duties in the sense of ordinary tariff duties involved at all. These are duties imposed upon foreigners coming into the country.

Mr. ELLIS. It is a tax raised in Canada.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is not in any sense like ordinary fiscal duties nor does it come within the letter of the rule, at any rate, as being a duty upon subjects of the Queen or upon Canadians.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I submit that the hon. gentleman does not meet the case submitted by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis). The only point he makes is that it cannot be a tax because it is not imposed upon the subjects of Her Majesty. Under our system, taxes are imposed not only upon subjects of Her Majesty, but persons who are not subjects of Her Majesty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The word tax is not used with regard to that rule.

The PRIME MINISTER. That does not matter, the effect is the same, it levies money upon persons coming into the country, which money goes into the treasury of Canada. If that is not a tax, I do not know what is. Under our system, if a man imports a cargo of tea, whether he be a foreigner or a subject, before he gets his tea into the country he has to pay a tax on the same. I think the objection of the hon. member for St. John is well taken, and I will suggest that the Speaker reserve his decision so that the debate may go on on the merits of the case, and we can have the decision later on.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I may mention that in 1885 a motion was brought before the House to levy a tax of $50 upon Chinese coming into the country, and that proceeding was initiated by resolution of the House, as may be found in the Journals of the House of Commons of the 2nd of July, 1885. I was under the impression that that precedent should be followed; but if the House does not wish to press the question, it can remain in abeyance.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Bill was then in the hands of a member of the Government, and, as a matter of fact, it went through in the usual way and received the assent of the Crown.

The PRIME MINISTER. That course was adopted to meet the objection now raised by my hon. friend. But I would suggest that Mr. Speaker reserve his decision on this point until a later stage, and let the discussion go on.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the Prime Minister desire to go on with the debate to-night? I would not like to move the adjournment of the debate, but I would like an opportunity of speaking on the Bill.

Mr. WOOD. As the point has been decided as well taken, how can the debate continue?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Decision has been reserved until this Bill comes up again on Monday next.

Mr. BRITTON moved that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picton).

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I suppose the right hon. gentleman will say what business he proposes to take up to-morrow.

The PRIME MINISTER. We will take up the Drummond County Railway Bill.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 6th June, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 141) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Penberthy Injector Company.—(Mr. McGregor.)

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) to the printed report of Mr. Ogilvie, which has been distributed. The report refers to the evidence, which he transmits with the report, and I would like to ask the hon. Minister if it is not intended to bring down the evidence as part of the report. I thought it was all in the printers' hands, but it seems not.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). When I brought down the report and laid it on the Table of the House, I stated that the evidence was very voluminous, and would be copied as rapidly as possible and brought down. The entire clerical staff in the department are working on the evidence, and as soon as it is finished it will be brought down.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is the hon. Minister able to give us a reasonable idea as to when the evidence will be brought down?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I should think it ought to be ready within five or six days.

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to the last statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior, some important business to be brought on this side of the House, actually waits for that evidence. It is almost absolutely necessary that the evidence should be had before we can go on. I would like the hon. gentleman to understand that if there is delay in an important piece of business before the House, it will depend entirely on the delay in bringing down that evidence. I do not think it need be printed, but should be brought down as soon as possible.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It will be brought down as rapidly as it can be prepared.

Mr. FOSTER. There is plenty of money in the treasury, and with the means the Government have at hand it ought to be possible to have that evidence ready in a couple of days.

The PRIME MINISTER. We have the facilities and plenty of good will, but have a great many demands from hon. gentlemen opposite. The claim of the hon. gentleman, however, is reasonable, and we will attend to it.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. INGRAM moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 142) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: One of the objects of this Bill is to amend the present Election Act which, in my judgment, is not quite sufficient to meet all the difficulties that arise. Judging by the way elections are conducted nowadays, it was a very good Act up to within the last few years, but owing to the advanced and not too creditable methods now adopted at elections, I propose to amend some sections which I think are not complete. In the first place, I find that in some sections of the country, especially Ontario, one of the new methods used is to import foreign or non-resident deputy returning officers, who are experts in their particular line of business, and do not hesitate to stuff ballot-boxes or mutilate ballots, and my object in amending the particular section in question is to have deputy returning officers appointed who are residents in the municipalities where they are appointed. In Ontario, we brag of our educational system, and I see no reason why, if we have such a magnificent system, we should be compelled to import characters such as I have described.

Next, a deposit of $200 is required before a candidate can be nominated, and against this requisite there is a strong feeling in some sections of Ontario. In our provincial law no deposit is required, and I see no reason why it should be required in the Dominion elections.

I propose to amend section 30, which provides that the returning officer shall appoint his deputies at least within two days before the election. I have had some experience in asking a returning officer to give the names of the gentlemen who are to act as his deputies, and he has declined to furnish those names. Now, as both political parties pay for the services of the returning officer, I do not see any good reason why he should refuse to give the names of his deputies and the polls at which each deputy is appointed to act. I propose, therefore, to amend that section by providing that, on the request of a candidate or his agent, a returning officer shall, within a certain time before the opening of the polls, furnish the names of the deputy returning officers and the polls to which they are appointed.

Then, I also wish to have resident poll clerks. As it is now, non-resident poll clerks may be imported, who understand their business, and are up to very fine work, and who for that reason are imported.

An hon. MEMBER. Skilled artisans.

Mr. INGRAM. Yes. Then, I propose to increase the penalty for carrying ballots out of the polling booths. It is an ordinary practice now to take the proper ballot out, and substitute another one in its place, and by that means make sure of securing the vote of the person paid to vote. Then, in section 65, when a voter spoils his ballot paper by inadvertence, I propose that the deputy returning officer shall be compelled to furnish him with a new ballot. At present he has discretion either to furnish it to him or refuse to do so. One case in particular came under my observation, in which an elector voted for the candidate he was opposed to. He discovered his mistake after marking his ballot, and then came and reported to the deputy returning officer that he had spoiled his ballot and wished to have another. The deputy asked to see the ballot, and, when he found it was marked for the candidate he approved, he said: This ballot is good enough; and he slipped it into the box. But the elector thought he had spoiled his ballot by voting for the wrong man, and I may add, that the deputy returning officer, who did see the ballot, was one of those imported officers.

The next section, 56, deals with the counting of the ballots, and hon. gentlemen will remember that the other day, in the county of Waterloo, two deputy returning officers refused to let the agents or the candidates see the faces of the ballots or how they were marked. In West Elgin and Waterloo and one or two other counties in Ontario, the deputy returning officers simply refused to allow the agents to see the faces of the ballots cast for the election.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Was that a Dominion election?

Mr. INGRAM. No, an Ontario election.

Mr. HUGHES. The same crowd.

Mr. INGRAM. In counting the ballots, section 56 of the Dominion Act does not compel the deputy to expose the faces of the ballots to the agents of either party, and I propose that he shall be compelled to expose them to the view of both of the candidates and their agents.

Then, section 58 provides for the return of the ballot-boxes, and, in my experience, a certain deputy returning officer brought the ballot-box to within a block or two of the returning officer, kept it all night, and delivered it to him the next morning at ten o'clock; and the agent, who differed with him in politics, was of the opinion that the box had been tampered with and certain ballots mutilated. I propose to provide that all boxes used within twelve miles of the office of the returning officer, shall be returned within five hours of the closing of the polls.

Now, section 59 as to furnishing statements to agents on request. I propose to remove the words "on being requested to do so," and simply make it lawful for the deputy returning officer to furnish it without being asked. As to section 65, in case of a return of an election made to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery by the returning officer in violation of sections 64 and 65, a difficulty arises which I propose to remedy. I am informed that in Leeds and Grenville, my hon. friend (Mr. Frost) was declared elected and the returning officer forwarded to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery his return, and when an attempt was made to have a recount, it was found there was no power under the law to compel the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to return the ballot-boxes to the returning officer so that the recount might be held. There are only two particular cases in which the Act applies, but a recount is not one of them. I have inserted a section here which I think will cover the case. It provides that if a returning officer violates the provisions of section 64 or section 65, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, on the demand of the returning officer authorized by a signed order of the judge who has the right to try such cases, shall return the ballots and allow the recount to be proceeded with in the ordinary way. Then, I propose, under several sections, to make the penalty more severe in the matter of stealing ballots, stuffing ballot-boxes, personation or assisting personation, and all the tricks so well known now to the gentlemen who have become experts in the manipulation of elections.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

EXCLUSION OF JAPANESE LABOURERS—DISALLOWANCE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA LEGISLATION.

Mr. McINNES. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to call the attention of the Government to a report that certain legislation recently passed by

Mr. INGRAM.

British Columbia has been disallowed. I would like to have a statement from the leader of the Government whether that is correct, and if it is, what legislation has been disallowed?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). After correspondence with the Government of British Columbia with regard to certain legislation passed by the legislature of that province in the session of 1898 concerning the exclusion of Japanese labour, we came to the conclusion that these Acts should be disallowed, and we so recommended His Excellency. The correspondence on this matter will be brought down at an early day.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE—ARRANGEMENTS FOR MEETINGS OF COMMITTEES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In relation to the meeting of the Public Accounts Committee, it was arranged to take place to-day, but the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) not being in town I agreed, so far as I was concerned, that two cases could stand over. But the committee did not meet, and I notice now that, according to the Votes and Proceedings, it is called for 11 o'clock to-morrow. I would like to say that the Solicitor General has communicated with me about the other matter. He is personally anxious that the committee should meet at 10.30 instead of 11 o'clock, to make up for lost time, I suppose, and also to expedite, so far as we can, some of the business before the committee this week. I desire to mention this matter, as the chairman of the committee is here.

Mr. FRASER. The reason why the committee was not called to-day was the absence of the Solicitor General and also the absence of Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière, who wishes to be present. There is no objection to the meeting being held at 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning, and, if it has not already been called, I will instruct the Clerk to call it for that hour.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me that there has been a rather arbitrary use of power. The committee decided that it would meet at a certain hour, and merely because one member who wished to attend it with reference to a certain case could not be there, the chairman takes on himself to put off the meeting altogether. I do not think the chairman of the committee has power to do that; if he has power, I do not think that power should be used. Why should not the committee have come together this morning at the hour when it was agreed upon? And then, if there was no business the committee could have adjourned. If Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière was not able to be there, the case in which he was interested might have stood over, because the committee would always be inclined to hold a case over, the principal party in which is not present. It seems to me, that this is an abuse of power. I am not saying this as censure on the present chairman, but this assumption of power is hardly right for the chairman of the committee to make. The committee must have the power to decide when it shall meet, and when it decides to meet, that decision should not be overridden by the chairman.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). While we are on this subject, I think it might be well to draw the attention of the Government and the House to the unsatisfactory manner in which the business of the committees has been conducted this session. We sometimes have several committees, such as the Railway Committee, the Public Accounts Committee, the Committee on Agriculture, all meeting at the same time. There are many members who are on two or more of these committees, and who, though they would gladly take an interest in the business of all, are prevented from doing so by the fact that they are only human and cannot be in two places at the same time. I think there should be a definite understanding come to at any rate for next session in regard to this matter, so that a division of time shall be made among the committees and members given an opportunity to attend to their duties on the several committees. We might have the Railway Committee on Tuesday, the Public Accounts on Wednesday, and the Banking and Commerce on Thursday. Then, on the spare days, any committee might meet that had an unusual quantity of work to do. An arrangement like that would be preferable to the present condition of things.

Mr. FOSTER. I think this matter of the changing of the time of the committees is important, and I would like to have the opinion of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) upon it. I want it understood that I am not raising it in any spirit of censure, but because I would like to have the practice understood.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). With regard to the observation made a moment ago by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) concerning the non-calling of the Public Accounts Committee, that, as I understood, was done after conference with my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and the Solicitor General—

Mr. FOSTER. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. The chairman is here to speak for himself. I think there is some force in the observation of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), still there seems to be another side to the question. With regard to the suggestion made by my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), I question very much if it could be carried into effect. These committees have not all the same amount of business to transact. The Railway Committee is overloaded with business, and if it were to meet only once or twice a week, it could not discharge the duties it is supposed to discharge. From the very nature of the case, from the mass of important legislation referred to that committee, it has to meet three times, or sometimes four times a week; and so long as that condition of affairs exists, I do not think that the public interest would be served by restrictions which would prevent the committee from having all the time it requires. There is, I say, the inconvenience brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), but the remedy does not seem to be so obvious. I do not think it is possible to lay down any rule; the only arrangement I can suggest would be some understanding between the chairmen of the different committees, so that the meetings of the different committees should be timed to meet the convenience of all. To lay down a hard and fast rule would work more injuriously, I think, than otherwise.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not quite satisfied with the rather easy way in which my hon. friend slid out of the first part of this question. I think the rule is explicit:

Committees should be regularly adjourned from day to day, though in the case of select committees, particularly, the chairman is frequently allowed to arrange a day and hour of sitting, but this can be done only with the consent of all the members of the committee.

I think that is a rule which is absolute; I do not think that it should be within the arbitrary power of the chairman without consultation with the members of the committee.

The PRIME MINISTER. But my hon. friend is aware that this rule is never observed. The rule says that committees should be adjourned from day to day, but it is impossible to observe this rule. If you had four or five committees adjourned at the same time for the following day, they could not all meet.

Mr. FOSTER. My right hon. friend surely does not attend these committees. At the close of the meeting of the Public Accounts Committee we consult informally as to when we shall meet, and a day or an hour is set.

The PRIME MINISTER. But the rule says from day to day, and that rule is not observed.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not say from day to day. It says:

Committees should be regularly adjourned from day to day, though in the case of select committees, particularly, the chairman is frequently allowed to arrange a day and hour of sitting, but this can be done only with the consent of all the members of the committee.

When a committee is sitting, we adjourn to another day which is known to the rest of the committee. It is sometimes a matter of much inconvenience. I came up this morning on purpose to attend that committee. I went to the committee room and found that no committee was sitting, and was told the chairman had put it off until another day. It is really a point of some importance.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think the hon. gentleman will find that what he is quoting is a transcript of the English rule. Now, I make a suggestion for the consideration of the House. I have often thought that we make a mistake in having such an enormous number of members on our special committees. That is necessary, probably, in the case of the Railway Committee, for considerations which are obvious to every hon. gentleman. But my experience—and I just give the House the benefit of it, so that next session, if my views were to meet with acceptance, they might be considered—is that the business of this House would be enormously facilitated if several of the important committees were reduced to a very much smaller number. A much smaller number, as the hon. gentleman knows, could transact the business equally well, and the difficulty which he speaks of and which the hon. member for North Wellington speaks of, would be much less liable to arise.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to correct a misapprehension of the Prime Minister as to the arrangement between the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) and myself, more on his account than on mine, because I used his name. Neither he nor I attempted to interfere with the meeting of the committee to-day; it was merely that certain matters that we were informed upon should not come up owing to his absence. But so far from attempting to interfere with the meeting of the committee to-day, he suggested to me by letter that matters were to come up in which he was not at all concerned.

Mr. CASEY. The remarks of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), I think, have been very much to the point. The fact is that the private business before this House has increased to such an extent that the committees having charge of that business must inevitably clash with each other, and must inevitably, some two or more of them, be sitting at the same time. In the British House of Commons private business long ago reached such a volume that a much more rational system, to my mind, had to be introduced, the system of committing each particular private Bill to a committee of five members only, four chosen by lot amongst the laymen of the House, and a chairman chosen from amongst the legal members of the House. These five members are sworn to be disinterested parties, to try the case fairly, as if they were a jury, and are bound by the rules of the House to attend every meeting of that committee. In this way a dozen private Bills might be progressing at the same time, and would be much more carefully inquired into and much more thoroughly sifted by weighing and studying the evidence, than they could possibly be before a committee of the size of the Railway Committee, or of the other committees of this House. I have long felt that matters were coming to that stage in this House that some such plan would have to be adopted. I am glad the matter has come up, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce has given the weight of his great influence to that point of view.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the right hon. First Minister misapprehends the wording of the book that the member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) read from. When it states that the committee are to adjourn from day to day, I apprehend that it means from one day to some other day, that it does not mean until the next day in every case, but to some other day to be selected. Then, with reference to the point made by my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), that the committees overlap each other, meeting on the same day, I think many of the members are members of two or three committees that meet on the same date, and it is impossible, therefore, for them to attend to the duties of all the committees. I think that can be easily remedied by the committees meeting some weeks, if not some months, earlier than they have been called together. At the beginning of the session, and at the beginning of the two previous sessions, we were here weeks in the meeting of Parliament before a single committee was called together. When were the committees of this session called together? Were we not nearly two months in session?

The PRIME MINISTER. When the debate on the Address was closed.

Mr. WALLACE. The Standing Orders Committee were doing their work and reporting to this House, and why could not the Public Accounts Committee have been appointed and begun its work? Instructions were given to the Public Accounts Committee that they should meet at the earliest possible moment this session, and conclude work that was under way and not finished during the last session of Parliament. But week after week elapsed, nearly months elapsed, before that committee was called together. Now, I think it should be an instruction to this House that next session the committee should be called together during the first week so as to get to work. The Public Accounts Committee and the Committee on Railways and Canals should get to work at once, because a large portion of the railway legislation, if not the whole of it, is in long before the session opens, and the members of the Railway Committee could be considering these matters in the early days of the session, and thereby prevent that blockade to which attention has been called.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. According to my observation, I think the difficulty and inconvenience that have been complained of by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) arise from the action taken and advised by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster). A few members at the close of the meeting say: Let the meeting stand adjourned until to-morrow or some other day without giving the chairman, or those most interested, an opportunity of consulting the wishes of the members of that committee and of other committees. I find that usually when a committee adjourns to the call of the chair, we have an opportunity of consulting the chairmen of the various committees, and the Ministers and the members mostly interested in legislation before the committees, and in that way we generally manage to suit the convenience of the great majority of the members. I have found on all occasions where it was said by somebody that we will adjourn until to-morrow, or until the following day, as the case may be, that it is generally found to meet the convenience of the members. I fully believe that it will be time enough to find fault when the committees are not called often enough or when the time of meetings is found not to suit the convenience of the members. In regard to the suggestion of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), there is a good deal to be said on both sides. I no doubt agree with him that, probably, the business would be better done if we had a smaller committee; on the other hand, I think, while it might probably obviate some inconvenience to members, yet, if there is a contentious matter before the committee, composed as it is now, it is settled once for all, and we seldom have it up in the House again. However, while I believe it is desirable that the House should try and keep down, to some extent, the numbers on the various committees, I think the suggestion of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is quite feasible, and that, except in a few cases, there should be no difficulty in meeting the convenience of the members of the different committees. If they would meet together and arrange, except in some special cases, that certain committees would meet on certain days of the week and other committees on other days of the week, a solution of the difficulty might be arrived at. Of course, one or two days in the week would not be sufficient for the Railway Committee to dispose of the legislation that is before the House, but there are several other committees that have not a great amount of business to do, and if they could meet earlier in the session, it would leave an opportunity for the more important committees to do their work. If an understanding could be arrived at as to when these committees should meet, I am sure it would conduce greatly to the convenience of the House and promote the business before these committees.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) complained about the amount of work to be done, and that to get it done they had to call two or three committees on the same day. What is the cause of that? To my mind, it is because we are not alive to a realization of the rules which govern the introduction of Bills into this House. I drew attention to this matter once or twice last session when it was brought up, and I believe it was understood that we should observe the rules as closely as possible. It is provided that:

Petitions for private Bills shall only be received by the House within the first three weeks of the session.

Yet to-day we have petitions for private Bills being laid on the Table, although we have been nearly twelve weeks in session. We have had them presented over and over again during the last six or eight weeks, and I have called the attention of the House to this matter before.

Private Bills may only be presented to the House within the first four weeks of the session. Nearly twelve weeks have elapsed since the beginning of the session, and we are still introducing private Bills; hon. members go on introducing private Bills; by some means they get through the Standing Orders Committee, and certain rules are suspended so as to allow of their introduction. I think, in the interest of private legislation, we should observe the rules of the House much more closely than this. It would reduce our work, give proper notice to the country of what is being done, and make it better all around. There is another thing which I think could be done, which would help us in regard to the meetings of these committees. Why do not our committees have meetings on Mondays? It is said that we cannot have a committee meeting on Monday because the members have gone home. It is the duty of the members to stay here and attend to legislation. If it were the custom to have committees meet on Monday it would be the custom to find members here attending to the work. The sooner that we come to understand that Monday is the same as any other day in the week, that any meeting may be called, and that any committee may be expected to work on that day, the sooner we will have members remaining here over Sunday attending to their business. Members from the maritime provinces and the far west are obliged to remain here, but most of the members from Ontario and Quebec, make it a practice to go home every Friday evening. We have a thin House every Friday evening, a very thin House, and on Monday, and until Tuesday we do not enter upon the work of the week. Every member would be here if it were known that the work of the House would go on regularly on Monday. In regard to the adjournment of committees there are two ways in which committees are adjourned. One is for the committee to adjourn to be called at the request of the chairman. The committee is then at the call of the chairman. The other is after consultation in the committee to adjourn to a certain day, and if a committee is adjourned to a certain day it is obligatory upon the committee to meet on that day. When an adjournment is made to a certain day, as in the present case, it should not be allowed that one or two members can consult together and postpone the meeting from that day. That is entirely irregular, and I was going to say it was illegal. It is illegal so far as the rules go, because, if an adjournment is made to a certain day, the committee should meet on that day just as in the case of this House; if it is adjourned to meet on a certain day it must meet on that day. It is not right that the chairman or any individual member of the committee to postpone the meeting of a committee until another day.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, it is obvious to the whole House that this discussion is irregular. As it is one connected with the regulations and the domestic economy, as it were, of the House, it seemed to be the unanimous feeling of the House that we should go on thus far, but I do not want it to be considered as a precedent.

THE YUKON MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker. I will try not to make a precedent by discussing this question. I have a letter, which I received this morning, and as it is a matter of interest to the House, and perhaps to the country, I wish to read it for the benefit of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mullock), who, I see, is in his place:

Gananoque, Ont., 5th June, 1899.

George Taylor, Esq., Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—Early last month I sent three separate registered parcels to my son Kenneth at Dawson through the post office, but they have all been stopped at Victoria and returned to me. I am very anxious to have these parcels delivered to Kenneth, and do not understand why they have been returned, as I complied in every way with the post office regulations. I shall be greatly obliged if you will inquire at your early convenience as to whether the post office authorities intend accepting parcels at any time soon for transmission to points in the Yukon district.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) W. F. LATIMER.

Mr. SPROULE.

This was in May; the parcels were delivered to the post office there and the amount of registration and postage was paid. They went to Victoria, arriving there probably early in May. They were returned here a day or two ago to the post office. I do not know what rule or authority warrants the Victoria postmaster in returning them. If it were against the law to send these parcels, we would expect that the post office at the point where they were mailed would refuse to have taken them.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Parcels cannot get through to the Yukon until navigation is opened from Lake Bennett to Dawson. I do not know that it is open yet. If it is open and it is possible to go through they will go.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. Postmaster General kindly give us the authority under which he arrests mail matter? I presume he must have some authority. What is the authority?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not know that it can be called arresting. It is a physical impossibility to carry it.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not quite satisfactory.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think we ought to have a discussion at this stage.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We will take an opportunity of discussing this matter later.

Mr. FOSTER. Meanwhile I do not know whether I have the right to send parcels or not.

Mr. TAYLOR. My correspondent wants to know whether he can send parcels or not.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) was not in the House when I stated, in answer to the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall), that when navigation was opened the parcel post would be part of the regular mail service, but during the winter, when it is performed by dog train, it is not.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is it open now?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have no information as to its being open. There is a period during the fall and spring when it cannot be open.

Mr. WALLACE. The regulations, or want of regulations, of the Postmaster General, are absurd. Here is a parcel sent in the month of May and returned from Victoria. Would it not be the better to detain it for a week or so there, until navigation opened than to send it back? Why did not the Postmaster General notify the public that parcels would be sent when navigation opened, and that it was expected that navigation would open at a certain date?

Mr. McDUGALL. Did the Postmaster General give any instructions with reference to the return of these parcels. The postmasters throughout the country seem to be absolutely ignorant of any rule in regard to the matter.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I stated on a previous occasion that for the winter service, instructions were given that mail matter other than letters could not go to the Yukon. My inquiry in the department since has confirmed that. I am informed that general publicity was given through the press about it.

Mr. WALLACE. We never knew it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am not responsible for the hon. gentleman not knowing it, but I am assured by the department that full publicity was given through the press. Up to the present it has not been possible to make a parcel post arrangement, but we have now a contract let, for the first time, of a satisfactory character for the mail service by water. I do not expect that contract will begin much before the 15th of June, when the route is expected to be open.

Mr. McDUGALL. Are we to understand that the postmasters throughout the country are supposed to take newspaper reports as official?

Mr. WALLACE. The explanation of the Postmaster General leaves the matter in a still worse position. Surely he has means of communicating with his postmasters, and if he made a regulation of that kind, he ought to have it printed and sent to the various postmasters.

I. C. R. EXTENSION TO MONTREAL— AGREEMENT WITH THE G. T. R.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee on Bill (No. 138) to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway System to the city of Montreal.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself in committee on the resolution.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to mention a matter which I made reference to the other day, as to the purchase of the rolling stock of the Drummond County Railway. If I understand it, the agreement that was first brought down with the Drummond County Railway Company provided that the Minister should buy the rolling-stock at a valuation to be agreed upon between the Minister and the company. That was presented to the House, but it was not ratified. What then becomes of that agreement? Has it since been ratified by the House?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That agreement has never been ratified—at least, it was ratified by the House last session.

Mr. FOSTER. I mean by Parliament.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It has never been ratified by Parliament, and we are not asking Parliament now to ratify it.

Mr. FOSTER. In that respect that agreement is worth no more than waste paper so far as it is concerned, and of course I think the Minister is perfectly right in saying there is no obligation on him to purchase the rolling-stock. If afterwards he makes an agreement to purchase the rolling-stock, and Parliament gives him power, it can be done.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is my view.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to recall what I said before. I was under the impression at the time that it having passed this House, it passed Parliament. But it did not pass Parliament, and so has no binding force.

On paragraph 4 of agreement,

Mr. FOSTER. In reference to this, I wish to ask a question. An argument in favour of giving large sums of money by way of rental is made by the statement that we own one-half of these two sections in which we have an undivided half interest. Suppose that, at the end of ninety-nine years, this agreement is not continued, what becomes of our undivided half interest in these two sections?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It absolutely terminates.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, what I want to bring to the attention of the committee is this. We may, if we like, play upon the words that we own one-half of the branch between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, and that we own one-half of the other section; but we do not own it in the sense in which a man has an indefeasible right to a property, in whole or in part. We simply own it so far as we have the right of user; so that, if at the end of ninety-nine years the agreement is not entered into for another period, the fact that we do or do not own a half interest is not material either way, because from that moment our interest in the property ceases.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It would not be right to say, that we do not own half the property in a certain way. We have what lawyers would correctly describe as a "base fee". We have for ninety-nine years as large an interest as the Grand Trunk Railway Company have in the property, and it is entirely optional with us at the end of that time whether we shall continue our interest, in perpetuity, or not. If circumstances arise which lead us to decide that it is not in our interest to continue our title or ownership, it is within our power to terminate it; but, in the meantime, we have as large an ownership for all purposes as the Grand Trunk Company.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend answer another question on which I have some doubt? Will he tell the committee what advantage in any respect is gained by the Government in stipulating for an undivided half interest? Would he not have exactly the same advantage under a simple rental clause, conveying the right of user?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It has always appeared to me to be a consideration of value. The chances are, that in the near future there will be other railways which will find it to their pecuniary and business interest to have the use of this double-track line, perhaps from Richmond, perhaps from Ste. Rosalie, perhaps from other points between St. Lambert and Richmond; and, if they do desire to acquire, and are willing to make satisfactory arrangements to acquire, such running interest, then, under this arrangement, we shall be entitled to participate in all the advantages which would accrue to the owners from the use of the railway by those other companies. If we had only the privilege of running over the road ourselves, on the basis of user, then other companies might be allowed by the Grand Trunk Company also to acquire a similar interest, and the Grand Trunk might thereby be realizing some very substantial return from these other companies, independently of us. But they cannot do that now. If they get $1,000, or $500, or $200 a mile from any other company for the use of any portion of this line, we participate to an equal extent with them in the results.

Mr. FOSTER. But my hon. friend participates in these results, not by virtue of his having, an undivided half interest, but by virtue of a section which says, out and out, that, inasmuch as we have paid you a rental for the privilege of user, we stipulate that, if other companies come in and pay a rental to you, we shall participate to the extent of one-half interest. That is our compensation for the rental fee which you have made us pay before you allow us to use the line at all. So that, even if you did not have the words, "an undivided half interest," in the agreement, and paid them simply a rental, stipulating what you would get for that rental—one-half interest in what might be received from other roads using the line—you would have it just as absolutely as you do by providing for an undivided half interest.

Mr. BLAIR.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We would have just what the contract gave us. But we do not ask, nor could we reasonably expect, that the Grand Trunk would include such interest as the hon. gentleman refers to, unless we had a half interest in that line. They based the value they charged us upon a half interest, and it was so embodied in the Bill; but, in order that there might be no possibility of question, I was able to secure the insertion of the succeeding clause, which plainly recognizes that the interpretation I have put upon the clause is correct. It provides against any possible contingency that might hereafter arise of difference between the company and ourselves.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will see that, properly speaking, he is not the owner of one-half at all. His own admission supports that, because he says that if at the end of ninety-nine years, we do not choose to go on with the arrangement, we have no right or title in it at all. We are simply giving a rental for a certain period that we have stipulated for, and for that rental we shall have not only the right of user, but our share in whatever income is derived from these terminals and these sections by other roads running over them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways, under what clause of this agreement are we entitled to participate in moneys which the Grand Trunk may receive from the running of trains of other railways over that portion of the line.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is the 30th section, page 11.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Perhaps the hon. gentleman could tell us now, whether or not he understands the agreement to cover this: If any other railway exchanges running rights with the Grand Trunk over this portion, and gives as compensation to the Grand Trunk the right to run over a portion of its lines, do we participate in any such arrangement, and if so, under what clause of the agreement?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I should think there would be no question but that whatever benefits are capable of being ascertained and valued in a pecuniary way, arising from the conveying by the Grand Trunk to any other company of the use of this portion, we are entitled to participate in, under that clause:

Thirtieth.—That all rents, revenues, benefits and receipts now accruing from any other company to the company by reason of the user of the line between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, or the exercise of any running power, privilege or rights therein, or which may hereafter accrue from any such grant or user shall enure to the joint benefit of Her Majesty and the company, share and share alike, and said benefits and receipts shall be accounted for by the parties hereto when the accounting shall take place from time to time between them. As to the other portions of the company's line herein demised the company hereby reserves to itself all revenues from any source whatever arising from the use thereof.

I can see no reason why there would be any difficulty in working this out. In framing this clause, I had in my mind the possibility to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and I think those words were well chosen.

Mr. HAGGART. Take the case of an arrangement between two railway companies, in which each has an undivided share or leasehold in this portion, and the one exercises a user ten times the extent of the other, shall they be obliged to account to one another for that user?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the Intercolonial Railway were using it ten times more than the Grand Trunk, the Intercolonial Railway would only have to account to the Grand Trunk upon its proportion of the user in respect of maintenance and repairs, and in one of the clauses, in respect of betterments on any portion of the line.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Have any other roads running power into the Bonaventure station at Montreal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. None others at present. We would have no control of the use by any other road of that station. We are paying a fixed rental, and do not acquire one-half of the property in the station, but only the full use of it for our own business. Of course, the stations are enormously valued.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Does the Delaware and Hudson not go into the Bonaventure station at Montreal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). I see here that the land valuation for right of way on the alternate route suggested is put down at $100 and $150 per acre, and then $500,000 more. What does that mean? Is that for the right of way in both cases?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not catch what the hon. gentleman wants.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). In the Minister's speech, he said, that an estimate was made of the valuation of the land at $100 and $150 per acre.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think my speech will explain itself pretty well.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Then, it would cost $500,000 more.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am sorry the hon. gentleman was not here, but he surely would not ask me to go over my speech again.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). I am only asking the hon. gentleman, if he said this, and he must know what he said. It is an important point that should not be forgotten.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am sorry the hon. gentleman was not here at the time.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). If the hon. gentleman will not answer, I shall have to deal with it. It is a very important matter, which the people of the country want to know something about. I find that the valuation of the lands—that is, at an average width of 66 feet, making 8 acres per mile, the same as the Drummond County Railway—would amount to over $1,800 per acre.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will state, as tersely as I can, what I did say. I said, that the estimate made by my officers as to the cost of construction of the new line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, included a sum from $100 to $150 per acre to cover land damages. Further, that that sum was taken to represent what would simply be the country portion of the district, and it is based upon a valuation going through a farming country, and did not include valuation of lands taken for a railway which passed through the towns, cities and villages along that line. I said, further, that the estimate was—of course, it was purely an estimate—that, instead of it only costing us $100 and $150 per acre, it would more likely cost half a million dollars to expropriate through that whole territory from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, and the difference in amount resulted from the fact that you were not running your railway and taking the property of ordinary farm land, but property in towns and villages and settled districts for a very considerable portion of the line.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). There was some criticism on what I said here the other day, and now I am going to see whose estimate was right—the hon. Minister's and the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Gibson's) or mine. Now, we will deal with this land. First, I must say, there are no villages and towns, as represented. I have been over the line, and you have stations there not worth \$200. St. Hyacinthe may be a town of ordinary size, but it is some little distance from the railway, and there is no other town or village near the railway; so that the right of way would not cost any more than ordinary farm lands. Now, we find that this \$150 an acre would amount to \$57,600—that is, if we paid \$150 an acre. That is allowing 89 feet, which is a chain and a half, about the width generally adopted by first class railways. Take the Drummond County Railway, and you will find that the width is a little over 66 feet, making $8\frac{1}{2}$ acres per mile. If you were buying the right of way for the Drummond County Railway at the rate estimated by the Minister of Railways and Canals for the Grand Trunk Railway portion, it would cost more than you are paying for the purchase of that road.

The province of Ontario is as good an agricultural province as there is in Canada, and I want to put this on record for the benefit of the farmers, who know the value of land as well as any other class of people in the country. The report of the Bureau of Industries of the province of Ontario, which is prepared by friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, shows that the average price of land in Ontario is $24.06 per acre, and there is not one county in the province where the land is valued higher than $46. The people who know of these values, know that it is quite an unreasonable valuation that has been placed on the right of way by the hon. Minister. I venture to say you can buy a farm of 100 acres for what he would be paying according to his estimate for two acres. Now, the hon. gentleman has put as high a price on his grading as he possibly could and the prices upon the bridges are most unreasonable. I sent a good engineer to examine the Yamaska bridge, and I have received his report since coming into the House to-day. Here is a bridge with two piers and two abutments and a length of 381 feet that the hon. gentleman says is going to cost $300,000. The hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara criticised me when I estimated the masonry at $20 a yard. But I find that the official reports of the Government published in the blue-books, show that the masonry for the swing bridge at Sault Ste. Marie cost only $12 a yard. The valuation that I now put upon the Yamaska bridge considering the additional length and superstructure cannot exceed $50,000. At every point the estimates of the hon. Minister are extravagant. I have known Mr. Schreiber for many years, and I have never known him to be so liberal as he appears to be in making these estimates. It is something like the case of the school teacher, who, when being hired by the trustees, was asked whether he believed the world to be round or square, and he replied that he believed that it was square, but he would teach that it was round or square as they pleased. It appears that Mr. Schreiber was not asked to make a square estimate, and that he is in the hands of the hon. Minister and has to obey orders. I am sorry that he should be in a position to be subjected to that kind of thing. I am looking into the Richelieu bridge, but am not able to give an estimate on it at this moment. We propose to build a straight line to strike the St. Lawrence at a place where we would put a bridge across, and by doing so we should not increase the length of the line. We could build a bridge as cheap as the Canadian Pacific

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry).

Railway bridge, and I believe that putting a bridge at such a point would not lengthen the distance at all. As I showed the other day, the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge cost less than a million dollars. I got my information from a statement made at a meeting of the Canadian Engineering Society. The chief engineer of the Canada Atlantic Railway was reading a paper on the Coteau bridge, which, he said, cost $1,264,000. Mr. Peters, the chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, made a statement as to the cost of that company's bridge across the St. Lawrence at Lachine, that cost being a little less than a million dollars from bank to bank, according to the plans. The hon. Minister estimates the cost of the bridge at Montreal at $10,000,000. I never heard of such a value being put on that bridge before. The hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara made the statement the other day that the cost was $6,750,000, and that a bridge could be built there now for $5,000,000. When we have such statements as these, why should we have the Minister of Railways and Canals coming into this House and estimating the cost of a bridge across the St. Lawrence at $10,000,000? The only way to account for it is that the estimate must be high to account for all the money that the hon. Minister proposes to pay for this deal. He pays 5 per cent on all this money, when he could borrow money at 3 per cent and the Government build a line of their own at much less cost. We find that the Minister is very favourable to large corporations. He gave the Canadian Pacific Railway two million dollars more than they were willing to take from the late Government for the building of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. If the money of the people is to be squandered in this way, it is high time that the people should know it. I showed the other day that, as to terminals, the Government have land of their own at Point St. Charles upon which they could make their own improvements and which is convenient to the business part of the city. It is estimated by hon. gentlemen opposite that the Grand Trunk terminals, of which we are to have the use, cost twenty millions of dollars. It is a very fortunate thing for the country that we were not called upon to pay 5 per cent on half this money for the last 43 years. You can see, Mr. Chairman, that it would have been better to build the line and establish our own terminals.

The hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara said that I was wrong when I said that on the section of road between St. Lambert and Ste. Rosalie there was sandy soil. I say it is a sandy soil. He said there was a swamp there. I say there is no swamp there. He said there were rock cuts that would cost a dollar to a dollar and a half a yard. I say there is not a rock on the whole section, unless it was put there. There are only two small cuts, one of 6 feet and one of 3 feet. There is not a rock in the whole place. I repeat that this is a beautiful country for railway building. He says that he spoke to Mr. Mann, the contractor, and he told Mr. Mann that I had put it at 12 cents a yard. I did not put it at 12 cents a yard. I said I believed that if tenders had been asked for, they could have got a tender as low as 12 cents a yard; but I put it at 18 cents a yard. The statement of the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara was misleading. Again, he says that it is the greatest folly to speak of doing the ballasting for 30 cents a yard and that it has never been done for less than 50 cents per yard. I want to show the committee that the member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Gibson) does not understand this kind of work. I want to tell him that if I required a man to assist me in preparing estimates I would want some one better qualified than the member for Lincoln and Niagara. Here is a record of contracts from 1867 to a recent date and I find that McGreevy and Heney, supposed to be men who know their business, put in a tender on the Canadian Pacific Railway, at a place where wages were low, for 22 cents a yard for ballasting. Then, I find another gentleman named C. Scripture, tendered for 27 cents a yard. This is on contract No 37 of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Then, there are Curran and Monette, who tendered at 30 cents a yard; Starrs and Hanly, 25 cents a yard, and $200 for track-laying; Murphy and Upper, the latter of whom I knew very well some years ago, tendered for the ballasting at 29 cents a yard. I do not ask the committee to take my word for these prices, I am furnishing proof for it all. We have next Charlebois and Shanley, who, all will admit, know their business, and in tendering on the Canadian Pacific Railway, in a place where wages were high, their offer was 28 cents a yard. Then, I find Wardrope and Ross—Mr. John Ross is the gentleman who had charge of the Northern Pacific—their price was 20 cents a yard. There are prices at 28 cents, 25 cents, and so on. The book which I hold in my hand, and from which I take this information, can be seen in the Department of Public Works.

Now, Sir, I think that the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Gibson) should take pains to inform himself of the value of work of this kind, because he never did any such work, before he raises a question as to the value of it. He says this work could not be done at less than 50 cents a yard. Now, I have given you the names of gentlemen who know more about doing this kind of work than he does. I have done it myself for 22 cents a yard, and made money at it. I have no desire to occupy the time of this committee. I know that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) is determined to put this deal through. I am sorry to say that we are in the minority, and cannot very well prevent it. I have here a contract on a line of road running from Ste. Rosalie towards Sorel, and the average quantity of excavation amounted to 8,500 yards a mile. The price paid on that road a few years ago was 15 cents a yard for excavation, and the price paid for the masonry was $13 a yard, so you can see that the price of 18 cents at which I put this work, considering the country it is going through, is sufficient to do the excavation. You can also see that the price I put upon the masonry is sufficient to do all the stonework connected with the road. You will see that the bridges are a few feet longer than I thought they were. Going over them quickly and without measuring them, I thought they were 100 feet span, but I find they are 127 feet span. If there is any difference, it would be but little, and I provide for a margin in the price of the masonry, and in the $30,000 that I allowed for contingencies. The hon. gentleman is paying $1,400 to $1,800 an acre for land in the province of Quebec. Let the people of this country, the farmers of this country, know these facts, and when they do know them, I think they will resent such extravagance.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we ought to have some explanation by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair). My hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. McLennan) is a practical builder. The other evening the Minister made a statement to this House and to this country, in which his great endeavour was to persuade us that there was no better method of getting into the city of Montreal, and getting a chance at traffic in the city of Montreal, than the plan adopted by the Government. In order to do that, he adopted the method, amongst others, of calculating what the cost would be to get into Montreal by an independent line. My hon. friend was not content to depend simply upon his own judgment, but this is what he says:

I can give him an idea of what it will cost, founded, not upon my own unaided judgment, but upon the careful estimates and calculations of my officials in the department, made not today, not yesterday, but before I was prepared to recommend to my colleagues the adoption of this scheme. Well, what are these calculations? These calculations are that it would cost, for the laying down of the line of 32 miles, $485,440, independently of the two great bridges, one across the Yamaska and one across the Richelieu, and outside of the probable large amount of land damages which you might be called upon, and would be called upon, to pay. Now, $485,000 would be the cost, according to the judgment of the officials of the department, if we were to undertake to build a railway through an ordinary country; but mind you, this is not an ordinary country, as I will show you before I have proceeded much further. Well, it is going to cost $460,000 to build a bridge across the Richelieu River, and it is going to cost $300,000 to build a bridge over the Yamaska.

It was by such statements as these, of the immense sums it would take to get in from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert by a new line, that my hon. friend has influenced the House, and attempted to influence the country, to approve of this bargain. Now, here is a gentleman, a practical man, a member of this House, relying not only upon his own knowledge, but upon the report of an engineer which he has in his hand, and his statement is that a bridge across the Yamaska would be only 331 feet long, and that it can be built for between $40,000 and $50,000. Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways cannot allow this statement to rest as it does. He must give to this House and to the country the authority upon which he led this House, or attempted to lead it, to certain conclusions by declaring that that bridge across the Yamaska River would cost $300,000 to build. I would like to hear his explanation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I suppose the hon. gentleman does not imagine—if he does he would be in error—that I would be justified in putting forward to this House any statement based on any knowledge, or judgment of my own as to what it would probably cost to build these bridges. I inquired of the officers of my department, one of whom is acknowledged to be an experienced engineer. I had him present to me his estimate, ascertained, I presume, upon data, which would be satisfactory to his mind, as to what would be his opinion of the probable cost of the construction of the bridges, the construction of the railway and the amount of land damages for that piece of road. I presented that to the committee just as I had received it from him, just as it was accepted by me and as it was presented to my mind, at the time this matter was being negotiated. I presented it to the committee on the strength of his information, and I have no further explanation to offer to the House than that fact. We have a statement of an hon. gentleman, who has built bridges and who has knowledge upon this subject, characterizing the estimate of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) as being entirely erroneous from his own personal experience. As to an explanation, I do not know what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) would have or what he could have me to say more than I have said. I have exhausted my knowledge and information upon the subject and put it in the possession of the committee. It is not to be expected, I presume, that every engineer will agree. Engineers do not always agree in cases when they are approaching a subject with the desire to make the figures as small as possible. I have furnished the committee with all the information of which I am in possession and I have placed it at the disposal of hon. gentlemen.

Mr. FOSTER. What I think the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals ought to do is to give the House the estimate of his engineer over his own signature. I have not until, within two days' time, read the evidence given at that committee which sat last year and which had these gentlemen before them, but I am perfectly ready to say here, in this House, that I never yet have read of an undertaking anywhere approaching the size and having the values of this undertaking, in which, from first to last, there was such an utter absence of scientific and accurate data as to the manner, both of the valuation of the Drummond County Railway and of the Grand Trunk Railway, in this scheme which is before the House. You can take the evidence of Mr. Schreiber and take that of any other gentleman who was before the committee, and I will leave it to hon. gentlemen who were upon that committee, if, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, they could give anything approaching a definite statement. After Mr. Schreiber had given statement after statement, he was asked if he had made these upon any scientific data, upon figures and measurements, and he admitted that he had not. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals is making a proposition to the House which is a matter of importance. The bridge is 331 feet long over the Yamaska River; it is not a very difficult river to bridge, and my hon. friend ought to give us measurements. Maybe the hon. member for Glengarry is incorrect. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals cannot afford to be wrong; the hon. member for Glengarry can afford to make a guess at the measurements. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals cannot afford to make a guess. When he comes down and asks us to expend the people's money on a scheme and buttresses that scheme by saying that if you adopted this other plan you would have to expend $300,000, $400,000 for the bridges, and a further amount of $485,000 for the railway, he cannot afford to be incorrect, and he must give the data to this House. No one would object to the idea that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals advances that he must take information from qualified men. Every man who administers an office in the Government, not being a specialist, must take his information from specialists, but the House should know the exact and definite authority upon which these statements are made. Here is a vast difference of opinion, a difference of opinion ranging between $50,000 and $300,000. The hon. member for Glengarry says that it would cost $50,000 to build that bridge, while the hon. Minister says that the alternative route would cost an equivalent of $7,000,000, that you must pay these immense sums if you adopt the alternative course. When he says that it would cost $300,000 to build this bridge across the Yamaska he ought to give the engineer's estimate, the measurements, the width of the river, the width of the span, and information of that kind.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think, as I said to the committee very clearly, when this matter was under discussion before, that the conclusion the Government arrived at was that the proposition, as a whole, of getting into the city of Montreal and into the centre of that city, where we would have that connection with other railway systems that it is desirable we should have, for $140,000, as far as the Grand Trunk is concerned, was an arrangement which had everything to justify it, and that it was a good arrangement, taken as a whole. Then I pointed out to the committee that if you were to examine the details, if you were to take the several sections or divisions under which the contract or arrangement has been made up, if you were to take that portion, for instance, of the line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert and separate it from the other part of the arrangement, you would even then find that it was a beneficial arrangement. I did not ask my engineer to get down to the minutest details and go and measure the road exactly; I did not ask him, for it was not necessary, that he should get down to the minutest particulars as to the cost of the line, because we did not intend to build another line. The arrangement, on the whole, was beneficial; it commended itself to the Government, and we thought that it should be justified in Parliament. But even if my hon. friend proposes to lay down another line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, he would find that it would cost more than the amount we are proposing to allow the Grand Trunk Railway Company for it upon the basis of the arrangement we have made. If you take the cost of the line, which was estimated at $485,000, if you take the cost of the bridges that we would have to build, one at a cost of $400,000, and the other at a cost of $300,000, and if you allow what would be a fair and reasonable amount for land damages, in the more settled portions through which the road would pass, you would have a total sum which would double the amount which we estimate the value of our portion of the Grand Trunk. Taking the money involved in the construction of a new line, paying the amounts which the engineers estimated it would cost, it would be double the sum we are paying under our calculation for our half of the Grand Trunk line. It would not matter how close it was measured. The hon. gentleman tells us that there never was a railway project entered into in which close measurements were not made. He tells me what we know is not in accordance with the facts; he tells me what we know was never the experience of the late Administration. There was no careful calculation made, as the records show, when they bought 125 miles of the Grand Trunk Railway from Rivière du Loup to Lévis; there was no calculation made at all. They just took that road as it was, and it required nearly half a million dollars to be expended on the road bed alone to make it suitable for traffic. They paid $12,000 a mile for it, and where is the evidence of any careful consideration in that? Where was the evidence furnished to Parliament of engineers who had gone over the road, and made estimates of the cost of embankments? The hon. gentleman need not refer to "Hansard" as to what occurred at that time; he will be aware that there was no such evidence furnished to Parliament. There never was a railway proposition submitted to Parliament by the late Government, that was subjected by the Opposition to any such minute and Pecksniffian criticism as this proposition has been subjected to, day in and day out, week in and week out, year in and year out. I do not care what instance you take in which the late Government have acquired, or constructed railways in connection with the Intercolonial Railway; in not a single instance was there any such minute information furnished as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) claims ought be furnished by the Government now. I am not saying, that because it was not done by the late Government in any of these numerous cases, it ought not be done by us, but I do say, that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) states that no proposition ought be submitted to Parliament unless it is fortified by minute and careful engineering reports such as he has referred to; it was never done in times past, and, therefore, it is an unreasonable and illogical demand which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) puts forward now. I do not pretend to say that I had, nor have I, anything more than a general report which I received from the Chief Engineer, as to what in his judgment would be the estimated cost of constructing a new line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert. He put these figures before me, and I used them in the House.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Blair) will not get me off the track by drawing that herring across it. I did not state that in every case preceding this, close calculations had been given, but, what I did state was, that I never knew an instance of a bargain involving as much as this, in which evidence was taken from engineers and others, where there was so little definiteness and where everything seemed to be on so indefinite a plan. That is the chief refuge and sure shelter of my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) in this whole matter. He will not bind himself with close calculations. If he did he would not have a leg to stand on. He revolves around in the upper regions; he floats around immense possibilities and the like of that; but in this case the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) forgot himself so far as to come down to this mundane sphere, and he pressed the argument upon this House, and he convinced his own followers to such a degree that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) pronounced a famous eulogium upon the Minister of Railways and Canals, on account of the completeness of statements given, and the absolute conviction that the speech of the Minister made on his mind. But the Minister (Mr. Blair) disdains to present his facts, and as a responsible Minister of the Crown he came before this House and he said: that with reference to this one bridge it would cost $300,000, and that it cost $400,000 to put one bridge over the Richelieu, and he massed his figures, and turned round triumphantly to his side of the House and to the country, and said: Now, do you not see we are entirely justified in this matter; see how much it would cost us if we were to take an alternate route to try to get to the city of Montreal. Does the Minister (Mr. Blair) know what the length of the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge at Caughnawaga is? I do not know, and I must rely on the Minister for that information.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not got that.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know, but I think you will find it is somewhere between 3,000 and 4,000 feet; say, 3,600 feet. That bridge was built by the Canadian Pacific Railway at Caughnawaga for less than $1,000,000, and yet my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) told us the other night that for a bridge over the Yamaska River which we now find will be about 330 feet—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My information is that the Caughnawaga bridge cost $1,500,000. I do not know where you got it that it cost less than $1,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) stated to-day in the House, that his authority for that was an engineer's report.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He may be right, but my information is that it cost $1,500,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I took what my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan) stated on the authority of an engineer. But suppose it cost $1,500,000, it does not seem reasonable that a small bridge, with shorter spans and over banks which are but a slight distance comparatively from each other, would cost what the Minister stated.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Do you know what the lengths of the Miramichi, south-west and north-west bridge's lengths are?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My information is that they cost $3,000,000 between the two of them, and something over.

Mr. BERGERON. That is in New Brunswick.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. The bridges cost high there.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You cannot judge of the cost of a bridge entirely by its length. When the statement was made to me that the Yamaska bridge would cost $300,000, and that the Richelieu bridge actually cost over $400,000, I could not dispute it. It was stated by responsible officers. I do know that bridges cost very often a great deal more in some places in proportion to the length, than they do in others. It depends very much upon the character of the stream. I asked one of the engineers why these bridges could cost as much as represented, and I was told that probably the water was very deep and the bottom would be such that it would be difficult of construction.

Mr. BERGERON. The water in the Yamaska?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes. I did not go into that very minutely. I got enough general information on it, to satisfy me that the general cost of the construction of a line between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert would be more than we are paying really to the Grand Trunk Railway, for the use of one-half of their portion of the line.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Blair) has not been able to fortify his position very much by citing possible difficulties in building over such a river as the Yamaska. I do not know whether the Yamaska is a navigable stream or not.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not think it is.

The PRIME MINISTER. Partly.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose a great deal would depend upon the tonnage of the craft.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is not navigable there.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a nice boating stream, but I do not think it is at all a difficult stream to build over.

The PRIME MINISTER. On the contrary, I would imagine that it was a very difficult stream to build over.

Mr. FOSTER. That shows where our difficulty is. Neither the Minister of Railways, nor the right hon. gentleman, nor myself, are technical men, and when an argument is addressed to the House in this way and an appeal is made to engineering authority, we have the right to ask that at least the estimate of the engineer should be laid on the Table. The fact is that my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) has no estimate.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I had an estimate simply stating that the construction of the line of railway would cost so much, and I think I have details as to how that was made up. Then the estimated cost of the two bridges is added to the cost. That is all I had.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Minister (Mr. Blair) had the measurements and the estimated cost in detail, that would be satisfactory to the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was not proposing to build a line.

Mr. FOSTER. No, but the Minister was proposing to build up an absolutely convincing argument why his policy would be the best, and to do that he throws definite figures fortified by engineering authority at the House and the country, and when we ask him for the authority he will not give it to us. My hon. friend (Mr. Blair) threw some tremendous figures at the House some years ago, as to what would be the increase in passengers and freight by opening up this Drummond County and Grand Trunk Railway extension. He gave them on the authority of the engineers, and they were read to this House, but they escaped from this House, and they escaped the embalming process of the "Hansard" in some extraordinary fashion. But I noticed when the committee was sitting, and when Mr. Schreiber was being examined, and when the question was put to him as to whether he had made that estimate upon written data or statistics he had before him, he acknowledged in his sworn evidence that he had no written data before him, and that he had not made the estimates in that way. It was just a sort of rough and ready guess.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He was not very far astray in his totals, at any rate.

Mr. FOSTER. Of the traffic?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. He was very far astray, and it is just such a rough and ready guess that my hon. friend brings down here and moulds into the form of a definite statement. The hon. gentleman is not doing justice to the House in not giving us the engineer's estimate of the cost of that bridge.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Here we are at the eleventh hour, after every opportunity has been given to my hon. friend and other members on that side of the House to have all the details of information on this subject; and when we are in Committee of the Whole on the Bill, my hon. friend wants more information on one specific subject, that is, the cost of the bridge across the Yamaska River. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways made the statement the other day that, not in his own opinion, but in the opinion of his chief engineer, the man who by law is to advise him in this matter, that bridge would cost $300,000. To-day, we have the opinion, not of an engineer, but of a practical contractor, that the estimate of the chief engineer of the department is altogether exaggerated, and that in his opinion it would not cost over $50,000. We have thus opinion against opinion, one opinion, I admit, just as good as the other. For my own part, I would think the opinion of the chief engineer was just as good as the opinion advanced against it; and I think we require his opinion to be combatted by something more than the mere ipse dixit of the hon. gentleman. In the building of bridges, it is not so much the width of the river which is to be taken into consideration. There are other elements which will go to make up the cost of a bridge. My hon. friend has referred to the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge at Lachine. I have never heard that that bridge cost less than $1,000,000, though I have always understood that it cost less than $2,000,000. But when we compare that bridge with the Victoria bridge, we cannot fail to be struck by the wide difference in the cost of the two. What is the reason of the difference? They pass over the same stream, the St. Lawrence, at a distance of not more than nine miles apart; yet, if built to-day, the one would cost at least $6,000,000, and the other less than $2,000,000. The reason is very obvious. At Lachine the water is shallow, I am sure not over three feet deep, and the bridge is carried from island to island and built on the solid rock, whereas the Victoria bridge had to be sunk in deep water. Now, what is the condition of the Yamaska River? It is not a wide stream; but I would imagine, though I am not an engineer, that the foundations of that bridge would be very costly, because the banks of the river are clay and are very high. That may be the reason why the chief engineer of the department estimated the cost at a high figure. I do not know; but as we have the opinion of one engineer against that of another, there is no excuse at this late date for my hon. friend's demand. This matter has been already investigated. It was referred last year to a special committee of this House, and that committee reported upon it. Therefore, to ask at the last moment for a detailed estimate of the cost of this bridge is not reasonable. Moreover, there is this other reason, which is supreme, that, as the Minister of Railways has said, we have to take this matter as a whole. It is as a whole that the scheme is projected; and, even if there had been a mistake in the cost of the Yamaska bridge, that should not be a reason why the whole scheme should be rejected.

Mr. HAGGART. The right hon. gentleman forgets the drift of the argument. My hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), in making his argument the other day, stated what he considered to be the cost of this particular portion of road. He was attacked by the hon. Minister, who, in support of his statement, adduced the evidence of his Deputy Minister. Now, all evidence of that kind ought to be produced in the House, so that we may have an opportunity to analyse it. But what does the evidence amount to? The hon. Minister says the road would cost for the thirty-two miles $400,000, the bridge across the Yamaska River would cost $300,000, and the bridge across the Richelieu River, $400,000; and add to that $150 per acre for right of way.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said that was included in the $435,000—from $100 to $150 per acre.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, that is included in the total amount of $1,184,000; and the hon. gentleman says this is a justification for the lease of the road from Ste. Rosalie to the end of the bridge. He says that if we had to build the bridge, it would cost a far greater sum than we have to pay for half of it, which showed the advantage of our bargain. Why, it shows, according to the estimate of his own engineer, as I stated the other day, that you could build the whole line, including the bridge and the equipment of the railway, for less money than the hon. gentleman is giving for half the user of the road.

Mr. POWELL. And save $300,000 to boot.

Mr. HAGGART. And save $300,000 to boot. The road, according to the estimate of his own engineer, bridge and all, could be built at a cost of $1,184,000; and yet he is giving for that portion of the road $37,500 a year, which, capitalized, is greater by $300,000 than the whole line would cost, according to his own engineer's estimate. He says that is sufficient justification for the bargain; for he says this does not include the land damages. The line passes through a number of villages, and, taking the St. Charles branch as a precedent, you ought to add as a moderate estimate, $500,000 on that account, or about $1,500 or $1,600 per acre. On a right of way ninety-nine feet wide, which is the utmost width expropriated, you will find that an addition of $500,000 would be equivalent to about $1,800 an acre.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It cost nearly a million for two miles of the St. Charles branch.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman cannot get away from the St. Charles branch. The Minister has estimates in his office for every mile that was expropriated and every dollar expended for land damages in building railways from one end of the country to the other, and he knows that

Mr. HAGGART.

$600 or $700 per mile is a large estimate for land damages to be paid by any railway through any ordinary section of country. The reason that land damages on this portion of the Intercolonial Railway were so large was, because a lot of wharfs and a lot of revenues in the way of booming timber were expropriated to Point Lévis, so that, really, the whole expenditure was not in a rural section at all, but an expenditure for a certain portion of the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway. We had that charged against us as one of the most corrupt and iniquitous pieces of management in the building of a railway ever perpetrated in any part of the known globe. I have heard the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) get up, again and again, and attack the then Minister of Railways for the extravagant sum expended for that purpose. Yet here we now have that advanced as a justification for this expenditure in the case of a road built through a purely rural section of the country. As I have said, the hon. member for Glengarry is perfectly right. What will engineers, from one end of the country to the other, think, what will any one who has passed over the Richelieu River and knows the stone bottom of that river, knows how shallow it is, except the portion excavated for navigation, of this proposal to spend $400,000 for a bridge over that river, or $300,000 for the Yamaska bridge? The hon. gentleman has an estimate; he has the exact amount spent on the building of the bridge at the Strait of Canso, and he knows himself that his estimate as regards these bridges is entirely absurd. What was the cost of the bridge across the Strait of Canso? $500,000 was the cost, if I remember rightly, and some of the piers were 60 to 70 feet deep.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). On what authority does the hon. gentleman give that statement?

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) gave me the figures the other day. He made a comparison between it and the crossing of the bridge at Miramichi. Why, some of the piers were sunk down 90 to 120 feet below the sea level. The cost of that bridge was nearly entirely in the putting down of the piers, and at the time there were none of the mechanism or improved plans we have for building piers at present. Bridging the Richelieu is a comparatively easy job, and I have no doubt that my hon. friend from Glengarry was perfectly correct in his estimate that an excessive estimate for bridging it would be $60,000, and $90,000 for the Yamaska bridge, or a total of $150,000; and yet the hon. gentleman estimates these at $300,000 and $400,000.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). I would like to draw attention to something I have here. I have no desire to mislead the House or make any statement that will not bear the test of examination. I have sent an enquirer there, and this is a sketch I have obtained from him since this debate started. There are two piers and two abutments, and it is easy to see what these would cost, even if they are deeper than I said the other day. I valued the masonry at $20 per cubic yard, which is a very large price, because the masonry at the "Soo" Canal swing bridge cost only $12 per yard. Then, it is 81 feet longer than I estimated, going through without taking any measurements, and the superstructure I valued at $45 a running foot. Before making that valuation, I telephoned the Dominion Bridge Company, at Montreal, for their prices, and then made my calculation of the cost of the superstructure, feeling I was correct in taking their prices. How any man can put a valuation of $300,000 on a bridge like this, I cannot understand. We would not propose to be guided by the cost of the Richelieu bridge, because that was built in the early days, as the Victoria bridge was, and no doubt required a little more expenditure than would be necessary to-day. On the route that I believe should be adopted I find that some distance from the site of the present bridge there is an easier crossing and a much cheaper bridge can be built, and I have made an estimate of what it would cost. The hon. member for Niagara and Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) says, that it is a draw-bridge. But I counted the number of piers and abutments, and they are certainly no more than I gave the House the other day, and there cannot be much difference in the masonry portion. It may be a little longer than I expected, but there is only that number of spans, and, if you put the superstructure at double the price, how the hon. gentleman or any of his officials can arrive at $400,000 as the cost of that bridge, I cannot see.

The PRIME MINISTER. What is your estimate of the Richelieu bridge?

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Somewhere about $80,000 or $90,000, with the addition, I suppose, to the length of the spans, which I understand, are longer, and the bridge a little longer, and there is a draw; but it cannot possibly amount to much more than the first estimate I made on the superstructure in any case. It would be a very small amount more. How the hon. gentleman can value these two bridges at $700,000, I cannot understand, and I am sure that no independent engineer, who would go there unprejudiced, would estimate the cost of those bridges at near one-third of that amount. I stated, the other day, the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge, and the hon. Minister said, that his impression was, that it cost more than I said it did. Now, we find that the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge cost, from bank to bank—what is known as the Lachine bridge—as per plans and specifications of Mr. Petersen, chief engineer, who was the engineer of that bridge, and who went into all details in connection with it, that are not interesting to the committee, $943,387; and from grade to grade, as per contract and plans—you see, there are long approaches there—$998,412.22. Now, the Coteau bridge cost $1,264,000. I will pass this book over to the hon. gentleman, if he would like to see it, and it is here marked in red, so that he will have no trouble seeing for himself. (Passed the book over to the Prime Minister.)

Before sitting down, let me say, with regard to the Richelieu bridge, that I have sent an enquirer to examine it, but have received no report yet, and, if I have made a mistake, I will be glad to acknowledge it; but, so far as the other bridge is concerned, it cannot be possible that it will cost anything more than $50,000 or $60,000, even with the little addition in the superstructure.

Mr. BERGERON. The right hon. First Minister, a few moments, said there were two opinions before the committee, and one was worth as much as the other. That is to say, the opinion of the chief engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals, who gave the information to the Minister of Railways and Canals, that the cost of the bridge would be $300,000, and the information given by my hon. friend from Glengarry. I am sure that the right hon. gentleman would not give the House an erroneous impression, but, I hold, with all due respect—and I am sure that I am saying this in a way that is not intended to be offensive—we have not had the opinion of Mr. Schreiber. We have had the opinion of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not pretend to be able to form an opinion.

Mr. BERGERON. I repeat it—and I am saying it with all due deference—it is the Minister of Railways and Canals who has told us: My chief engineer has said so and so. Well, my hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) has been asking very often for information, and if he had been granted that information we would have avoided discussion. If we had the written opinion of Mr. Schreiber upon it then we could get the opinion of other engineers and have the matter discussed, the House would be in a better position to form an opinion. As it stands now, we have purely and simply the opinion of the Minister of Railways and Canals. We cannot hold Mr. Schreiber responsible before the country for the opinion which he has not signed. It seems to me that there is a plain way to find out if this opinion is correct or not. The Grand Trunk has built a bridge over the Yamaska River where the hon. gentleman spoke of building one if that scheme was carried out. How much did that bridge of the Grand Trunk cost? The right hon. Prime Minister knows that the river is not navigable at that point.

The PRIME MINISTER. I did not say it was.

Mr. BERGERON. And it is not very large. And my right hon. friend knows another thing, that that bridge can be built in one span without piers.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I desire to set the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) right. I not only stated what I had been told by my engineer, but I said I had his figures and I had them before me, the gross figures which the engineer himself had given me. In the first place, he showed how he made up the sum total, allowing $100 to $150 an acre for land damages going through the country district, and the Yamaska bridge $300,000, and the Richelieu, $400,000. My engineer gave me these figures and I had them in my possession at the time and read from them.

Mr. BERGERON. That confirms everything I have said. We have what the hon. Minister says in comparison with what we have heard from the hon. member for Glengarry. We have not got Mr. Schreiber's figures with his signature to them so that they could be brought before a board of engineers and discussed.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Are you going to determine this question in that way?

Mr. BERGERON. I think it would be the best way to determine to what extent these reports may be trusted. I do not blame any man for not being a competent engineer or skilful in these questions, but, at least, we ought to get from the Minister, who is responsible to Parliament, something which we can depend upon; and I will call a report made by Mr. Schreiber and signed by him, something which, if we should not rely upon it, at least we could discuss it with other engineers. But, as we are to-day, we cannot do so.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) has the very thing he has asked for. He has had the figures given by the Minister, figures signed by Mr. Schreiber, that the bridge over the Yamaska would cost $300,000.

Mr. BERGERON. That is what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) said. My right hon. friend is very credulous and I will not reproach him for that. Moreover, he is not well informed on these matters. He said that the bridge at Lachine was built on islands, whereas there is not one island from one shore to the other. If he can make a mistake in a statement—

The PRIME MINISTER. That is not the point to which my hon. friend is referring. If he will pardon me, he is juggling with the points in a way, I think, not consistent with his dignity as a member of this House. He wants to have figures under Mr. Schreiber's signature. He has them under Mr. Schreiber's signature when he has it given by the Minister as not his own figures, but figures given by Mr. Schreiber, and as against these he has the figures given by the hon. member for Glengarry.

Mr. BERGERON. I have never seen these figures of Mr. Schreiber's. I have heard a speech from the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair), and I have seen a report of that speech in the "Hansard," stating these things, but I have not seen the figures as we see them in the report of an engineer where details are given, the figures put down and the signature of the engineer at the bottom. I was saying a moment ago that my right hon. friend made a mistake in speaking of the Lachine bridge. He probably meant to refer to the Coteau bridge, which is built on islands. The Lachine bridge cost less than a million dollars, and it has a length of almost 4,000 feet. I should not be surprised if Mr. Schreiber would not sign these figures estimating the cost of the bridge with one span of 331 feet at $300,000. The right hon. gentleman, when he spoke of the low cost of the Lachine bridge, said that it was because it was built upon islands. I wish to repeat that it was built from one shore to the other without anything else but the iron girders and the piers upon which it rests. Now, the hon. gentleman tried to make a point of the difference between the Victoria bridge and the Lachine bridge. He said that the Victoria bridge had cost a great deal more because it was built 30 years ago, and bridges could be built for less now than they could then. He gave another reason, that the Victoria bridge was built in deep water and the other in shallow water. He made a mistake. There is a great deal of shallow water where the Victoria bridge is built. In fact, there is only one place where vessels drawing seven feet of water can pass under it. The rest is built in shallow water just as much as the bridge at Lachine. This brings us down to the fact that bridges to-day can be built for a great deal less than when the Victoria bridge was constructed. Now, it seems to me that the Government is very much interested in giving satisfaction not merely to this committee, but to the country, regarding the transaction they are seeking to pass through Parliament. Why not, then, ask the cost of the bridge which the Grand Trunk have built over the Yamaska? Another point concerning which I wish to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals, but as he is not in his place now, I will ask the right hon. leader of the Government.

The Minister of Railways and Canals a few moments ago answered the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) that the Delaware and Hudson did not come into the Bonaventure station at Montreal. I want to be sure of that. I ask the Minister again if it is not true that the Delaware and Hudson comes into the Bonaventure station, also that the Vermont Central has its terminus at the Bonaventure station. Surely those railways must lease from the Grand Trunk Railway in order to have their terminals in the city of Montreal. The object of the member for Glengarry in asking that question was to find out how much it cost the Delaware and Hudson to use the Bonaventure station in Montreal, in the same way that the Intercolonial Railway is going to use it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The information I have received on the subject is to the effect that these railways do not come in under any such conditions. They are coming into Montreal exactly the same as the Canada Atlantic Railway is coming in. The Grand Trunk Railway picks up the Canada Atlantic Railway trains at Coteau; the Grand Trunk Railway picks up the Vermont Central at some point this side of the boundary, I think; and it picks up the Delaware and Hudson in the same way. It takes these trains and brings them into the Bonaventure station, and gets its proportion of all the earnings from those points, and I suppose a mileage proportion of the whole from Boston, or Ottawa, or whatever point it may be. That is the arrangement. They would have no independent running rights. They are picked up by the Grand Trunk Railway engines and trains, which are manned by Grand Trunk Railway men. That is what the Grand Trunk Railway people tell me.

Mr. POWELL. I may say that Mr. Wainwright, under oath, made a similar statement before the committee. I suppose the point of the hon. Minister is that there is no rental.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No rental. These are the terms on which all these railways are coming in.

Mr. BERGERON. Has the hon. gentleman learned from these companies what value they would put upon an entrance into Montreal if they were to come in on the same terms as the hon. gentlemen intends to bring in the Intercolonial Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I tell my hon. friend that we do not believe we could get any better evidence of what the value of such an arrangement would be than is afforded by the arrangement between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, travelling over much the same kind of country on a railway involving very much the same character of work and probably the same amount of cost. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company felt that they were making a good business arrangement in paying $40,000 as user over thirty-eight miles, under a fifty-years' lease of the piece of road between Hamilton and Toronto, not giving them any terminal privileges or terminal rights, simply the mileage of these thirty-eight miles to the junction outside the city. I felt that we could not have any better evidence of what would be a fair rate, than this arrangement entered into between these two companies.

Mr. BERGERON. In carrying passengers upon the Intercolonial from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, which company will get the benefit?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the passenger is carried on the Intercolonial train, the Intercolonial train gets the full benefit; if the passenger is carried on the Grand Trunk Railway train the Grand Trunk Railway will get the benefit.

Mr. SPROULE. It is just because of the trouble we have had in getting information that the Bill is not passed even at this late hour, information which was necessary to enable us to judge whether this was a good or a bad bargain. We never could get information, practically we have no information yet. When we analyse the small items of information that we have obtained, we find that they are entirely erroneous. The Minister tells us that we have made a good bargain, and he bases his statement on estimates made by comparison, saying that if we were to build a new road from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert it would cost us so much. But when he comes down to particulars he says: My engineers tell me it would cost $300,000 to build a bridge over the Yamaska. We sent on a competent engineer to examine the locality, and the report he gives us is that the bridge could be built for $40,000 or $50,000. Then, the Minister says it would cost about $400,000 to build a bridge over the Richelieu; but an examination of the proposed bridge in detail, made by a competent engineer, reveals the fact that it would cost $80,000 or $90,000. Therefore, when we come to analyse the few details he has given us, we find them very extravagant, and if we are to judge of the rest of his bargain by these items, we must come to the conclusion that it is a very bad bargain. We are also told that if we were building a new line it would cost us $1,400 an acre to pay for the right of way. Now, go into Ontario, perhaps the best farming province in the Dominion, and tell the farmers there that you have paid what is equivalent to a value of $1,400 an acre for the right of way, and they would say: The thing is absurd, we never get any such prices, we did not get one-tenth of that money when the right of way was taken from us. Yet their land is more valuable for agricultural purposes than the land which would be expropriated here. Then, the Minister says that he has no close and careful valuation as to the cost of the road before purchasing. Well, does he give that as a justification for his bargain? No man in this House would be more ready to condemn such a statement if it was made by his opponents. He would require a close and careful valuation of the cost of these roads in order to enable him to judge whether the bargain was a good one or not. Now, we have no such information in regard to this bargain, we have no estimate made by a competent engineer, which I submit we should have, not only an estimate of a lump sum, but an estimate in detail. If we had such estimates, we could submit them to other competent men who might carefully examine them and ascertain upon what grounds his estimates were made in order that we may judge whether the bargain is a fair and reasonable one.

Now, the hon. Minister said we had all this information brought out before the special committee, and I think the right hon. First Minister agreed with him. It was never reported to this House, if I remember anything about that special committee. If I understood the purport of that special committee, it was for the purpose of ascertaining what had become of the money given by the country to build that railway, whether it was properly or improperly expended. It was not exactly in regard to the cost of the railway, or what it would have cost to build another railway like that. The report of that committee was never submitted in full to this House; I am in the judgment of the House, when I say, that, in the light of what we know now, the less said about the inquiry and report of that committee by hon. gentlemen, the better. If we are to take the report of that committee as a justification for what we are doing today, I say it will come far from satisfying the curiosity of the country, when they come to inquire into what are the revelations of that committee, or what the revelations which might have been made, if they were not made to this House, in connection with the inquiry into that railway. The less said about it by hon. gentlemen, the better, if they are mentioning it as a justification for the contract they are entering into. I say, that, in connection with this whole scheme, we have not the reasonable information that members of the committee ought to have to enable them to judge whether this bargain is a good one or a bad one. There has been a paucity of information given to this committee; there has practically been no information at all, although we have asked for information in regard to what was the earning of the road for the short time that we had it, what the mileage earnings were, what it would cost to build another road in case we did not take this one. We have been unable to get information to enable the committee to say whether this is a good or a bad bargain. When the few items of information that have been given to us, as to the cost of building a bridge over the

Mr. SPROULE.

Yamaska and Richelieu rivers, are submitted to competent engineers who are capable of judging and going into a proper inquiry, we find a wide difference between the estimates given as to the cost of this work. In one case—the construction of a bridge across the Yamaska—we are informed that it can be built for $40,000 or $50,000, while the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals says: My engineer says, that it will cost $300,000. In the other case, for building a bridge over the Richelieu River, a competent engineer, who has analysed the matter and inquired into it, says that it can be built for $80,000 or $90,000, while the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals says, upon the estimate of his engineer, that it will cost about $400,000. When we take this difference between these estimates, between the estimates of the departmental engineer and men who have examined into this matter specifically, who are competent and intelligent engineers, we are justified in demanding that more information shall be submitted to this committee before we allow such a contract to pass and receive the sanction of this House. If we do not demand this information, we are not performing the duty that we owe to the country. We are making what is, in my judgment, an improvident bargain, and one which this House should not sanction, without all the data which, I assert, it has a right to have.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals suggested, some time ago, that, in dealing with this matter, he did not think it necessary to get down to very minute details. It was only necessary for him to give us general information. I certainly think he has not got down very far into details, when he tells us that these two bridges would cost $300,000 and $400,000 respectively, while the hon. member for Glengarry, who is a practical man, and who has practical means to determine the cost of these bridges, says, that one would cost $40,000 and the other between $80,000 and $100,000. The statement which the hon. member for Glengarry makes in this respect is borne out, when we compare the length of one of these bridges with the length of the Lachine bridge. The Lachine bridge is 3,652 feet long, according to the report of the engineer, while the bridge over the Yamaska River is 331 feet long, or about one-eleventh of the other. If you admit that the engineering difficulties are quite as great over the Yamaska, although we can hardly suppose they are as great over a river of that sort as over the St. Lawrence; but, if you give to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals and to his deputy the benefit of the doubt in that respect, you would not have the cost of this bridge exceeding $80,000 or $85,000. The bridge at Lachine over the St. Lawrence cost about $960,000; one-eleventh of that is between $80,000 and $90,000, I think. Well, when the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals founds an argument to this House—because it is in that view only that this matter is coming up—upon the fact that this bridge would cost $300,000, I think the committee have a right to demand from the hon. gentleman some further data, some better estimate than any he has afforded to us so far, because we have practical estimates made by the hon. member for Glengarry, who is a practical man, and we have also a fair basis of comparison between this bridge and the bridge at Lachine. I think, therefore, it is only fair that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals should support the statement which he has made to the House and to the committee by some details, so that we can judge as to whether the estimate is reasonable. Another statement upon which the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals joined issue with the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), was as to whether or not it could be properly said that this country has any ownership in this road. I venture to think that the statement made by the hon. member for York was correct. We have no such thing as ownership in this road at all. If, instead of getting a half interest in this road, this agreement had provided for an entire interest, it would still be only a leasehold interest; it would not be an ownership at all. It would be a leasehold for ninety-nine years, with the right of renewal. Therefore, it is wholly out of place to talk about an ownership in the road. We have only a half interest for ninety-nine years. In so far as the user is concerned, we do not make anything like a half user; we make something like a one-twentieth user. We are not in the same position as the Grand Trunk in reference to the road, as to selling our interest. We have simply a leasehold interest. We have a half interest for ninety-nine years at a fixed rate of rental, and we have nothing more than that.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals must have the engineer's report in reference to this proposed alternative line. I find that, at page 4230 of the "Hansard," he said:

Well, we have got to Caughnawaga, and my engineers say:

"Instead of having to travel 38 miles to get from Ste. Rosalie by the present proposed route into the Bonaventure station, we would have to travel 55 miles, going up to Caughnawaga and coming back again on the other side."

That, evidently, is an excerpt from the engineer's report in reference to this alternative proposition. I think my hon. friend ought to bring that down.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have a map or plan that my engineer prepared showing what would be the alternative route, if an alternative route were taken up, where it would have to go, and the cost per mile.

Mr. FOSTER. A map would not have a translation of these words in italics.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What is that?

Mr. FOSTER. What I have just read. This is evidently from the engineer's report.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Anything you have quoted from the engineer's report will be found in the engineer's report. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to say where it is quoted?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, this is what you say:

Well, we have got to Caughnawaga, and my engineers say:

"Instead of having to travel 38 miles to get from Ste. Rosalie by the present proposed route into the Bonaventure station, we would have to travel 55 miles, going up to Caughnawaga and coming back again on the other side."

It must be in a report.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The plan shows that.

Mr. FOSTER. What plan?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The plan the engineer put in my hand.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) see that if he makes a quotation—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not make any quotation, except that I stated to the House what the engineer of the department presented to me.

Mr. FOSTER. I will read it again: It is not what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) himself says, but in the "Hansard" it is printed as a quotation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Well, I do not think it has any right to appear as a quotation, for I was not quoting the language of the engineer. I was stating the fact that his plan shows it was 55 miles instead of 38 miles.

Mr. FOSTER. It is printed in the "Hansard," as if it were an extract. Well, let me ask the Minister this question. Did he go into this bargain, prepare himself to pay that amount, come down to the House and justify his bargain by an elaborate statement as to what the alternate route would cost without having had the report of an engineer upon that alternate route?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not have any report of the engineer, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) would put it. I had obtained from the engineer a statement as to what would be the cost of the alternate route, as to what the additional mileage, as to what it would cost per mile to build the 55 miles outside of the two miles I spoke of as running from the outskirts of Montreal—the cost of the bridge and the cost of getting to the cattle-yard.

Mr. FOSTER. That would take in the cost of the bridge, too.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, I have given the figures on my engineer's statement to me.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) bring down the engineer's statement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I thought I had it in my desk, but I find I have not.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Minister gives it after dinner, it will be all right. Now, I want the Minister to give some more information on this point—and it was a very strong point in his argument—namely, the cost of the right of way, and the cost of the right of way was, he said, heightened by the nature of the country through which the road would pass. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) said :

Just imagine getting the right of way through eleven towns and villages, one of them at least of the importance of St. Hyacinthe, and the hon. gentleman and the committee know the importance of other places.

Will my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) give us a list of the eleven towns and villages through which the alternate road would have to pass, and the population.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think I can give you the population, but I can give you the list.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier) can give the population.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bernier) will supplement my statement with a statement as to the population.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the only opportunity we have had of getting down to facts; hitherto we have been flying around in the ethereal regions, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) must give us some latitude.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What I did state the other evening to the committee with reference to the probable cost of the alternate line, was drawn out of me by a suggestion made by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) that another line could be built—I do not know whether he put that forward about building another parallel line to the line between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert; but he did with regard to a line to Caughnawaga, and coming down along the shore of the river and the canal lands. I stated that, not as a necessary part of our case, because our case on the whole, I desired it to be understood, was strong and ought to commend itself to Parliament.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. Before we go to the next section, I would like to hear from the Minister whether he has any further light with reference to the cost of that alternative line, especially the bridge over the Yamaska.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No, I have not any further information to give to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman not found his engineer's report?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not found my engineer's report. I have found the engineer's statement to me, which I used the other night. I have got the memorandum which he gave me.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. Minister object to put that on the Table?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not propose to put that on the Table.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. Minister propose to give any detail of the estimated cost of $300,000 for the Yamaska bridge?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not got any detail. I have just got what the hon. gentleman heard me say, the statement of the engineer that he estimated the cost of the bridge at $300,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, I think we may come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman has not any estimate or any statement signed by any reputable engineer, his own or anybody else. He has committed himself to definite statements before the House, but he cannot give the House the name of any reputable or competent engineer signed under that estimate.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means to imply by that. If he means to cast any doubt upon the accuracy of my statement about having received this estimate or memorandum from the engineer, I will relieve him and the House by putting my statement on the subject before the House, and leave the hon. gentleman to comment on it and criticise it as he pleases. I have stated to the House, on my responsibility as a member and a Minister, that my chief engineer and Deputy Minister gave me the information and data which I presented to the House the other night, and I think the hon. gentleman is going a long way and is scarcely contributing to the amenities and proprieties of debate, when he undertakes to assume that the statement I have made to the House is not correct. My chief engineer furnished me with data which I use, and which I state to the House on his authority. The House is entitled to accept my statement. If the hon. gentleman will not accept it, I will let him deal with it as he pleases; but I think it is scarcely confining oneself within the bounds of propriety and within the amenities of debate when the hon. gentleman either insinuates or states that I have no such authority or statement as I have given to the House.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no need for any heat in this matter, and there is no need for the ultimate resort to the absolute statement of the Minister that we are bound to receive. We receive with great respect the statements made by Ministers with reference to their departments, and yet the House, as one of its rights, insists upon having the reports of the technical officers, who certainly know more about such matters than the fleeting Minister of the department can know, both from training and from long familiarity with what is the work of their lives. If the hon. gentleman has a statement from one of his engineers throwing, by calculation or by conclusion, any light upon the matter of the alternative route, as to its cost, it certainly is an element imported into the discussion by the hon. gentleman himself; because it was on the ground of the great cost and what he thought was the non-feasibility of a reasonable alternative route that he induced the House and intends to induce the country to accept the present scheme. Now, I would like to ask the hon. Minister what reasonable objection there is to his putting these statements and this data of the engineers of his department before the House. They are not his engineers; they are ours. We pay for them. They remain there just as long as this House says they shall remain. When this House says they shall not remain in office, they do not remain in office. They are not the personal appurtenance of the Minister at all, and any Minister who has that idea in his mind had better disabuse himself of that idea first as last. They are our officers, and the only reason the Minister has a staff in that building is because this Parliament votes money for that staff, thinks we ought to have them there, and is pleased to keep them there as long as they do their work—for whom? For this House and this country. The hon. gentleman is as helpless as an infant without the staff we give him. He has no more strength or power in his right arm to carry on a line of railway or build a bridge than the pages about this House. He gets his power, and his information from which his power comes, from the staff which we give him and which we pay. We have a perfect right to go behind the Minister himself and ask for the report of our officers. Mr. Schreiber in that department is our officer, and the Minister is going wide of the mark when he says, "Yes, I have got the information from my officers; do you doubt my word? If you do, you cut yourself off from the reasonable amenities of debate." That was not true. Neither would a threat of that kind frighten the Opposition or have the least weight with any man in this House. The hon. gentleman has gone upon data and information given him by men who know and he bases his argument on that information, and as one who does not know personally. Why should we not have the information at first hand? The hon. gentleman has it, how easy it is for him to lay it on the Table. If he has not got it, should he not give the House the information that our own officers, paid by the public money, have given him and which we require?

The whole difficulty in the situation is that the hon. gentleman has got down now to particulars. As long as he can float along over the heads of indefinite statements and talk grandly of through traffic and the like, and make estimates which are all indefinite in their very nature, he does very well; but he made the mistake of committing himself to a definite line of argument, bristling with definite statements. We want to have these reports at first hand. We want to know just what these statements are worth, so far as we, who are laymen, can judge them. What childishness it is for a Minister to come down to a couple of hundred men in this House, every man with just as much common sense, presumably, as himself, business men, who have as much right to draw conclusions from data given to them as he has from data given to him—what childishness on his part to refuse to give them that data. The hon. gentleman knows that when reports of a public nature, when the reports of engineers or anything of that kind, are made the foundation of an argument, he must give every member of the House access to it. To do otherwise is simply to assume that he is the heaven-born filter, through which all information is to come out, trickling to the members of the House, just as he turns the faucet. Well, I propose, in the language of the Solicitor General, to ask that I get the water from the fountain at first hand, unadulterated, and I would like to have it, as it flows from the engineers.

I do hope the hon. Minister will not put himself in the wrong by refusing this information, and I do hope he will not proceed to the extremity of saying that because we want the statements of his engineers at first hand, we mistrust his word and are therefore no longer fit for the society of gentlemen. Now, we do want to be gentlemen on this side, inasmuch as we have the fear of the hon. gentleman's condemnation in our eyes, but we still hold to our rights and have to ask for that information.

Dr. Bournot lays down the rule very clearly:

When a Minister of the Crown quotes a public document and founds upon it an argument or assertion, that document, when called for, ought to be produced.

But, outside of constitutional rules, the common sense, business plan of dealing with us, who are a committee for the people, just as from the hon. gentleman who is in the position of one of the executive, is to give us the fullest information and the documents which he quotes. It is not dignified or common sense for a Minister to bristle up and say he will not give us the information because our asking for it implies that we do not believe him.

Another statement made by my hon. friend in his speech the other night, for which he gained great applause from the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), amongst others—and the hon. member for North Wellington is now listening—was that the building of an alternative route would be much more expensive. The argument was imported by the hon. Minister himself. It did not occur to him on the spur of the moment, but was an argument he had gone over, no doubt, for days. He had furnished himself with the written statements of engineers, he had talked to these men about it, he had the whole argument complete, and a large part of his contention was that the alternative route was simply impossible because of its cost. There were bridges to be constructed, one of which would cost $300,000, and the other $400,000; there was the right of way to be purchased, which would cost $150 an acre, and again $500,000 more, and he reiterated these points as potential arguments in the case. I acknowledge that they are, if they are true. What was one of these? The hon. gentleman said:

Just imagine getting the right of way through eleven towns and villages, one of them at least of importance, St. Hyacinthe, and the hon. gentlemen in the committee know the importance of all the other places. Is it reasonable, would any Government be safe, would I not be worthy of the severest condemnation if, as Minister of Railways, I advised my colleagues that we could expropriate the right of way from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert on the basis of paying $150 per acre.

We have the right to know what are these dozen towns and villages, which would be such an essential element in the payment of high prices for the expropriation of land. The Minister, of course, will explain that in detail to the committee.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I stated before six o'clock that I would have a memorandum furnishing the names of these places, and I will have it in a short time. I telephoned to one of the officials in my office, Mr. Jones, and he has just answered me that we will have it here shortly.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend cannot, of his own knowledge, name a number of these important towns.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will give a list. I told him, when the matter was up before, that I could not recall the names of the different places.

Mr. FOSTER. Did he get this from his engineer?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He gave them to me, and they were eleven.

Mr. FOSTER. Did he give you the names?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. They were not in the statement of any kind and the hon. gentleman has nothing but the recollection that he was told so?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I know it was so.

Mr. FOSTER. You knew there was eleven towns and villages there?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, but I know that he said so. I have already explained very fully to the committee the circumstances under which I made my statement the other night and on what authority. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman thinks that this method of catechising with regard to an inferior detail, upon which the general policy of arranging with the Grand Trunk Railway as a means of reaching Montreal, was not based or defended, is very effective as an argument. Nor was that policy founded upon the question whether or not the Yamaska bridge would cost $300,000 or only half that amount.

I think I stated to the committee the other night, that in my view—and I think in that view I was justified in speaking for the Government—and I find the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) very fully agrees with me—it would be very much better for the Government not to reach Montreal at all than to attempt to reach it in any other way than the way we have arranged. I have based the agreement upon the general value of that arrangement, as realizing to the fullest possible extent, at a moderate charge, what we desired to obtain, and which arrangement compares favourably with those between the Grand Trunk Railway and other companies upon business principles.

It was in consequence of a suggestion thrown out on the other side of the House that I stated to the committee that any of the alternative methods which had been suggested, one of them by the hon. member for Glengarry, would not be more favourable, either financially or otherwise, and having regard to the advantages of reaching Montreal over the Grand Trunk Railway—these would not be more favourable arrangements to make. I pointed out that so far as the construction of another line parallel with or exactly along the same route from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, was concerned, that my engineers stated to me that they estimated the cost of that road at $485,000 outside the two bridges, and upon the basis that $100 to $150 an acre for land damages. But they were not taking into account, and could not take into account, what it would cost to run the line through the eleven towns and villages.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Have you a written report of the engineer?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The engineer gave me memoranda upon the subject which I used in the House, and gave me along with it a map. As I read to the committee, he estimated the probable cost of constructing an independent line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, exclusive of the two bridges, at $485,440. The figures which would go to make up that amount were given in detail. I said that the land damages were estimated at a sum not exceeding $150 per acre in making up that sum total, but that the engineer advised me in these terms:

In estimating the cost of 32 miles of railway between Ste. Rosalie and Montreal, the value of the land has been treated as farm land, whereas, in passing through towns, of which there are several, the land should be treated as town lots.

And he was unable to make any estimate at all as to what the land damages would amount to. The figures as to the land damages which he included in his gross estimate of $485,000 were based upon a value of farm lands not to exceed $150 per acre. I gave that information to the committee, I stated that data was furnished to me in regard to the bridges in the gross, the Richelieu bridge would cost $400,000, and the Yamaska bridge, $300,000. If I were to put on the Table all the papers from which I made my statement, and which I have received from my deputy, it would not furnish the House with a particle more information than I have given it. I do not think that the data which I am using and which is furnished to the Minister in course of an address, is a public document in any sense to go upon the Table, therefore, I do not think that the request is a reasonable and proper request to make. I read no document but give the information as furnished to me, and the House is in full possession of the details in regard to the matter, such as they are, because there are really no details; the Richelieu bridge was stated at $400,000, and the Yamaska bridge at $300,000. If I had the detailed items going to show how the cost of these bridges was made up, and if the hon. gentlemen wished to see them, I would have no objection furnishing that information. But I have not got it; I have only got the gross amount as it was stated to me. I recollect at this moment that the engineer, in giving me his memoranda, added that he had obtained his idea as to the probable cost of these bridges largely from the Grand Trunk Railway Company, who have built bridges across both these rivers, and was, therefore, in a good position to say what would be the probable cost of these bridges.

Mr. POWELL. Will you let me see the paper?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The memoranda I have here is mixed up with other memoranda that I do not think the hon. gentleman would care to see. I will mark portions of it for him.

Mr. SPROULE. It is a question of interest to the House as to what rights the House has with regard to the services of engineers. It seems to me that one of the purposes for which the country employs them is to give information, not only to the Government, but to Parliament, which would enable Parliament to judge of the wisdom or otherwise of entering into great engagements. In this case above many others, it is most desirable that we should have not only the information that has been given to the hon. Minister, but much more specific and definite information, because it is only when we are in possession of detailed information that we are able to analyse it and judge how far we would be justified in going. I cannot see any reason why the Minister should withhold this information. Where contracts are to be let and where the Minister has to use private information, it might be necessary for him to withhold that information from the House. But there are no contracts to be let upon the basis of this information, therefore, I cannot see any justifiable reason why this information should be withheld. If he says that he has no information further than an epitome, then I think the House has a right to question whether he is himself in possession of the information which he ought to have, and which he ought to be able to give to this House before this Bill is passed. We want to be able to judge whether it would be preferable to build a new road or to purchase the one that is submitted to the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It would pay better to go by the Grand Trunk Railway than by any other way, even if you could get in for nothing by another way.

Mr. SPROULE. That may be, because there may be elements in the situation that I am not in possession of, which would make me a competent judge. But a contract is submitted for our ratification, and we are obliged, as representatives of the people, to consider it on its merits, and we wish to have certain information to enable us to judge. It is the comparison of how much it would cost for us to acquire the same service by building a railway of our own. Therefore, if such a proposition were submitted to the House that we might build a railway of our own, or, as it is stated to the House, that we cannot build a railway of our own for anything like the expenditure here called for, we naturally ask, upon what information you are justified in saying so. The meagre information given is, that this road is through a country in which it would cost a very considerable amount to build a railway—but we are not told how much per mile. We are told that the right of way will be expensive, as it goes through a number of villages. Those who know nothing of the geography, are unable to judge what this will cost, and those who live in the locality say, that they cannot locate the villages, any more than we can. The Minister says, there are eleven villages. We ask where they are, and what size they are, so that we may know whether land in the vicinity of these villages will be expensive or otherwise. But the information is not given us. The hon. gentleman tells us that the important item in the cost would be the building of two large bridges. One of these, he says, will cost $300,000. We ask for the estimate of the engineer, so that we may see on what basis he comes to that conclusion. We find that another engineer examines the locality and reports that the cost of the bridge would be $50,000. Which are we to believe? The engineer whose estimate is quoted by the Government, is certainly not more disinterested than the other, in fact, the independent engineer might be said to be more disinterested than the engineer who is standing by the Minister in the proposition he makes. Then, the Minister tells us that the other bridge would cost $400,000. The other engineer, I presume, after careful examination and working it out, says the cost will be $80,000 or $90,000. I say we are justified in entertaining a very strong suspicion that the Minister has not been furnished with data in sufficient detail to enable him to judge of the case correctly. We ask him to give the detailed information to the House, so that the House may judge whether the estimated cost of the bridge is reasonable or otherwise. If we have regard to the limited information given us as a basis for ratifying the contract entered into, we must come to the conclusion that we cannot estimate fairly whether this is a good bargain or a bad one. I say the House is entitled to more information. That is the reason why we keep engineers. There are times when the engineer's estimate must be kept private from the House, but this is not such a case, because it is not suggested that that information will be put to any wrong use. I can see no reason why the greatest freedom should not be exercised by the Minister in giving us the most detailed information that is given him by the engineer. If the engineer has given him no more information than he has given the House, I would advise him to instruct the engineer to go over the case again and furnish him with proper information on the subject.

Mr. HAGGART. I would like to ask the Minister, whether he considers that the line in this paragraph mentioned, "hereinbefore described, and of the terminals and connections hereinbefore mentioned, and all intermediate stations and premises of the company," applies to what is described in the "Montreal joint section" and "Chaudière joint section," and whether that conveys also "connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, via Jacques-Cartier."

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. POWELL. The Minister will pardon the gentlemen on this side of the House, if they are a little inclined to regard these certificates of the Deputy Minister as somewhat apocryphal. That gentleman gave a certificate which was put in before the Drummond County Committee of the value of this piece of road from Ste. Rosalie to St. Charles, showing it be a million and a half of dollars. And here we have an estimate in to-day of $1,185,000. There is a difference of $315,000 on 30 miles of railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) must be in error.

Mr. POWELL. Oh, no, I am not in error.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What the hon. gentleman would probably be justified in stating is, that the piece of road from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert cost the Grand Trunk a million and a half of money.

Mr. POWELL. No, he estimates the value.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That would be a fair statement—it was not from Ste. Rosalie to St. Henri, but from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert.

Mr. POWELL. It does not matter; it was to the bridge.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He would be justified in stating the railway was worth a million and a half, because it cost the Grand Trunk that amount.

Mr. POWELL. It was given for the purpose of a valuation. Whether it is a constructive valuation or not, it is immaterial. And now we have a valuation showing a difference of upwards of $300,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is for another line.

Mr. POWELL. Whether it is for another line or not, it is for a first-class line between these two points. That is, it is the same length of road; so, there is no difference so far as that is concerned, and the hon. Minister's explanation does not amount to much.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Whether much or little, you were stating for a fact what was not a fact, and I corrected you.

Mr. POWELL. It is entirely immaterial whether we take a new road or a first-class road, like the Grand Trunk. I desire to refer particularly to bridges referred to by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan). If there is work in this country that in the judgment of the Minister of Railways and Canals is first-class in every particular, if there is a possibility of there being in Canada a road that is equal to the Philadelphia Reading, or the best portions of the New York Central, in the hon. gentleman's opinion, that road would be the newly-constructed portion of the Drummond County road, the 43 miles constructed under the supervision of the hon. gentleman himself and the officers of his department. Now, it might be of interest to the House to know that there are some remarkably good bridges on that road. The bridges were one of the features dwelt upon in respect of the road; they were one of the chief features of the capital cost of this railway. When Mr. Phelps Johnson was upon the stand, I put him to the trouble of submitting two statements. The first was of the cost of these bridges, both on the old and new portions of this railway. But that was not quite sufficient for the purpose we had in view, and I called upon him to submit a second statement; and in that second statement we have further particulars than we had in the first. Now, for the information of the hon. Minister, I would refer him to page 155 of the report of the Drummond County Railway investigation. The very first item is the St. François River bridge, which cost $17,500.

Now, we will refer to this magnificent steel bridge. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the next page and find the statement which is adduced by Mr. Phelps Johnson, he will find that the St. François River bridge consists of three spans, two of which are 130 feet long each, and one 100 feet long. The hon. gentleman, with his experience, will know that a bridge with a span of 150 feet long is a much more expensive bridge than a bridge with a span of even 127 feet, as in the case of the smaller bridge on that particular portion of the line. Now, if he will multiply the 150 feet in each span by two, that will give him 300 feet, and if he will add the 100 feet of the other span that will make 400 feet. Compare this length with the length of the bridge over the Yamaska River and he will find that it is exactly 19 feet longer. Now, the bridge over the St. François which is first-class in every respect, cost $17,500 for the superstructure. If he will turn further to Mr. Phelps Johnson's testimony, he will find that this bridge was constructed in 1887, so that, from the sum named, 40 per cent will have to be subtracted in order to bring it down to modern prices. We will not go to the extent of 40 per cent; suppose we take 25 per cent off.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was thinking that you would have to add 40 per cent.

Mr. POWELL. That is just one difference between the hon. gentleman's judgment and the judgment of a gentleman who is in the business and who understands what he is talking about. If the hon. gentleman, instead of rushing into this matter had consulted such a man as Mr. Phelps Johnson, he would have estimated the cost of that bridge at the time at $4,000 less, which, taken from the $17,000, would give $13,000 or $14,000. I will call his attention to a later bridge which I know will meet his approval, as it was constructed under his very eye. I refer to the Maddington Falls bridge. For the information of this House I will tell him that that bridge was erected in February, 1897, and this, he will observe, was after the contract was entered into between himself and the Drummond County Railway Company, at a cost of $15,000. If he will turn to page 156 of this report he will see that, according to Mr. Phelps Johnson, the Maddington Falls bridge has one span of 103 feet, one span of 102 feet 4 inches, one of 100 feet 8 inches, and one of 98 feet 4 inches. Adding them altogether he will find the total length of the whole bridge is 404 feet, or 23 feet longer than the Yamaska bridge. This is a magnificent structure, completed to the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman, and equal to the most advanced products of modern science. The cost of that was $15,000. I think it will be assumed that this is a fair price for the superstructure. We have then left for four abutments on this magnificent bridge, $285,000, which would be $71,250 per abutment. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) adduced figures and measurements. I took the precaution to go over them and to make a calculation, and I find, taking the most extravagant price, of $20 per cubic yard for masonry, the cost of the substructure is lessened to $40,000. Adding to the cost of the Maddington Falls bridge, which is higher than the St. François bridge, to this we will find that that bridge could not have cost $55,000. If the hon. gentleman wishes to institute a comparison between the estimate for the Richelieu River bridge and another bridge—one of those magnificent bridges, not exactly constructed under the very eye of the Minister of Railways and Canals, but yet meeting with his approbation, he will find that a bridge known as the north-west branch of the Nicolet River bridge is 820 feet long. That bridge consists of three spans of 110 feet, one of 160 feet, eleven short spans of 30 feet, and that there are no less than 15 piers. These piers are of two portions ; in the first place, there is the pedestal of masonry, and in addition to that there is a steel tower. The hon. gentleman will find that the cost of these steel towers as well as the cost of the ordinary superstructure, added together, and these steel towers support a bridge 80 feet above water level, is $33,720 for the whole superstructure. The estimate which has been made by the hon. member for Glengarry is certainly in excess of what the real cost of the bridge would be. In the face of these facts, the hon. Minister of Railways must not be surprised if gentlemen of this side of the House, noticing the continued series of elongated veracities which the Minister of Railways is accustomed to submit to the House in connection with railway matters, are inclined to look upon as somewhat apocryphal these unproduced reports that are stated to emanate from the deputy of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I think, certainly, the hon. Minister is bound to say something in reply to these statements which have been made by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). They are taken from blue-books ; there is not the least doubt about the calculations; they are not the calculations of the hon. member for Westmoreland ; they are the calculations of men who know, of engineers and of bridge builders and the like of that. Yet, the hon. gentleman, who has listened to this and who persists in declaring that a bridge over the Yamaska River would cost $300,000, and over the Richelieu $400,000, is equally determined in persisting that he shall not give the engineer's statement or memorandum to that effect. I leave the hon. gentleman with his own followers ; I leave him with the country which will certainly take some cognizance of the way in which the Minister comports himself before the House. I am inclined to think, what I have had my suspicion of from the start, that from the beginning the hon. Minister has acted absolutely without information of any definite kind at all. This House has been kept in the dark from the first. The hon. gentleman did not really send an engineer down to look over the Drummond County Railway until he had made a contract with the Drummond County Company, or practically had done what is the same thing. The hon. gentleman did not bring down, even, that report to us until we had to fish it out of him, just before this measure was ready to go through this House, and it was with the greatest difficulty that we got this imperfect report brought before the House. I asked the hon. gentleman, the other day, for the engineer's report as to the condition of the road. He promised to bring it down, but I have not seen it, and the hon. gentleman has not fulfilled his promise in that respect. The hon. gentleman has not taken the House into that confidence that he should have taken it into by giving it the information which is the due of the House and which we desire to have. That brings me to another conclusion, and a conclusion which is a grave one. I have no hesitation in saying that, under these circumstances, I shall have very great hesitation in believing any assertion that the hon. Minister undertakes to make when he seeks to bolster up an argument he is presenting to the House. That is a hard statement to make, but I have to make it. I think the whole tenor of the hon. gentleman's conduct leads us to that conclusion, and that conclusion alone. I do not believe any engineer in his department will put his signature to a statement, and work it out, that any reasonable bridge across the Yamaska River will cost $300,000. I challenge the Minister (Mr. Blair) to bring down a statement from a single reliable engineer to show that. I do not believe he could get an engineer in his department to set his hand to the statement, and work out the quantities, and give it to this House, that a bridge across the river Richelieu, such as would have to be constructed for that alternate road, would cost $400,000. I challenge the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) to bring the statement of his engineer, if he can, before this House. Sir, what is the conclusion we must come to. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) has tried to crawl out of the argument he made here the other night—an argument of tremendous force if it were true—that the alternative route was so expensive that it would be folly for any business man to think of it. He stated that it would take $300,000 to build a bridge over the Yamaska, and $400,000 for a bridge over the Richelieu. I believe from the information that I have heard to-night, read by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), and given also by the hon. gentleman from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), that $60,000 is the outside of the cost of a bridge over the Yamaska—as to the bridge over the Richelieu I do not know but I believe that one-third the amount the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) has stated would be amply sufficient.

This brings us to a very lamentable crisis in the affairs of this Parliament, when a responsible Minister is going to put through a measure by dint of an argument, based on these figures he said he got from the engineers, and then refuses to bring the engineer's statement down to the House so that we may judge upon it. So much for that. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) in his desire to make a large speech and be definite—I warn the Minister (Mr. Blair) never to attempt to be definite, because it always gets him into difficulties—in order to make a speech which would have definiteness and conclusiveness in it, he went into the question of land damages. What did he state ? He referred to the St. Charles Branch and the great land damages there, and he said :

And they did not go through eleven towns and villages, they did not go through a country of the same value as the country from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert ; there is no gentleman familiar with both countries that would not bear me out in that statement.

Again, he said :

And, mark you, you have not included the land damages of from $100 to $150 per acre. Now, when you come to consider the expropriation of the right of way through that country, from St. Lambert to Ste. Rosalie,—

Those were the two points the hon. gentleman spoke of :

—who is going to say what the amount of these damages will be ? There are, to begin with, no less than eleven or twelve considerable towns and villages, some of them of considerable magnitude, towns that have grown up since the Grand Trunk Railway was built.

Would not any gentleman in this House, listening to that speech, come to the conclusion that this was a section of the country, dotted in that 32 miles with eleven or twelve considerable towns and villages which had grown up since the Grand Trunk Railway was built, and which would entail on us large and heavy land damages. Where are the eleven or twelve towns and villages ? The Minister has not given the name of one, outside of St. Hyacinthe. When I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) if he would give the basis of his information, he simply says : The engineer told me there were these, and I stated what I had heard. That information is not worth anything. That information, put as it was, was entirely unreliable, and could do nothing else than deceive the House. Whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) intended to deceive the House or not is a different matter, but I state again, that such information, given as the hon. gentleman gave it, had no other effect on the House and the country, than to deceive the House and the country. Here are the names of the towns that were sent in. In the first place, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) has gone beyond his limit ; he has passed St. Lambert, and he has taken in the city of Montreal. But his argument had not to do with St. Henri or Montreal ; it had to do with the right of way between St. Lambert and Ste. Rosalie. Of course, by such an extraordinary course as bringing in the large village of Montreal, and the considerable village of St. Henri, he could make quite a respectable showing on land damages : but that was not his proposition. What are the towns ? First, Ste. Rosalie. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) tell me how many houses there are at Ste. Rosalie, where this road passes ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not count.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) does not know, and yet he made an elaborate argument in reference to that. Does he know that the station of Ste. Rosalie is twenty acres away from the church, which is generally the important part of the village ? There is nothing there but simply a station, there may be one or two houses.

An hon. MEMBER. Just the station.

Mr. FOSTER. Just the station, my hon. friend says, and he knows the locality. That is one of the large towns, by which the land damages are to be measured. Cover it with bank bills of the denomination of $5 each ; better still, cover the ground with gold, as the great value of the large and flourishing village of Ste. Rosalie, which has grown up since the Grand Trunk Railway passed through ! The next town is St. Hyacinthe ; a town of eight or nine thousand population, I think, and that is the one town on the list. And what large town has the Minister next in consideration. It is "U. C. Crossing." That means the United Counties Railway crossing, where there are, I think, two buildings and no more. Is that a considerable town ?

Mr. BERGERON. It is in a field.

Mr. FOSTER. It is in a field, my hon. friend says. It has not the distinction of having a house there ; it is out in the field. But according to the Minister (Mr. Blair), the land damages will be something tremendous in that hive of industry which has grown up since the Grand Trunk Railway passed through it. The next place mentioned is Ste. Madeleine, and will my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) venture to say what the population of Ste. Madeleine is ?

Mr. WALLACE. Seven people.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) may be near it. The hon. Minister (Mr. Blair) is not so voluble now as he was when he was making his speech. He does not attempt to answer a question when it is put definitely to him. Ste. Madeleine is four miles from the parish church ; evidently not cutting through church property which would be valuable ; evidently not cutting through the aggregation of houses that generally collects about a church. Then, what about St. Hilaire, two miles from the church, a very, very little village. And what about Belœil, two miles or more from the parish church, and which is not a town, not even a village ? And what about St. Bruno, a little collection of houses, and St. Bazile, the same, and St. Hubert, the same, and then we come to St. Lambert, where we end for the purposes of this discussion. Again, I ask the Minister : Where are the eleven or twelve considerable towns and villages which were to make the land damages so high that we had better pay this immense amount for getting in by the Grand Trunk Railway, than to attempt to run an alternate route through them ? The information of the Minister (Mr. Blair) is just worth that much to the House. No man who listened to him, but who must have said : Of course if you attempt to put a railway through crowded and thriving towns and villages, you will have to pay heavy expropriation damages. I, for one, had that idea from listening to his remarks, but when we come to analyse it, we find that the Minister has been running through fields and pastures the whole way, and his imagination has been as rich as the towns are scarce in the country through which that road would run.

Now, who gave the information to my hon. friend? Was it that engineer? If it was, I have still greater reason to doubt the estimates and statements of that engineer, and I would like to have his statement with reference to the bridges as well. I say this is simply meant—no, I will not put it that way; but I say the result of it is simply to deceive, first, the House and afterwards the country. Is that the kind of information the Minister of Railways expects this House to pass his measures upon? When he comes to give us definite information, that is the kind of information he gives us; and we find that it has no foundation, that it is a tissue of falsehoods from beginning to end—which the Minister himself cannot deny, and which he dare not bring a statement of one of his engineers to deny. The hon. gentleman has nothing to say. He simply wants to crawl out of it, and say, "The argument was not so important, at any rate." It is so important that there is involved in it the credibility of a Minister. The hon. gentleman tries to carry his measures through the House by using as facts things that are not facts. I challenge them from my place in this House, and I challenge him to substantiate those statements as facts. The Minister's reputation and position cannot be sustained unless he sustains as facts those things which he has given this House as facts. And yet the hon. gentleman has not a word to say. He simply shields himself behind his dignity and says nothing. A man's dignity is better conserved by his substantiating the statements that he makes in this House by the reports of his officers, or by whomsoever he can bring to substantiate them, than it is by his standing in front of his followers and in face of the Opposition of the country, and saying, "I will not answer you at all; I am a Minister, and when I open my mouth, let no dog bark."

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I observe that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, in dealing with this same matter the other day, undertook to controvert the statement that had been made to the House in regard to the cost of constructing a line from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal. After indulging in some sneers at the estimates which had been given by my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), the hon. Minister used this language:

Has he any idea what it would cost? I can give him an idea of what it will cost, founded, not upon my own unaided judgment, but upon the careful estimates and calculations of my officials in the department, made not to-day, not yesterday, but before I was prepared to recommend to my colleagues the adoption of this scheme. Well, what are these calculations? These calculations are that it would cost, for the laying down of the line of 32 miles, $485,440, independently of the two great bridges, one across the Yamaska and one across the Richelieu, and outside of the probable large amount of land damages which you might be called upon, and would be called upon, to pay.

The discussion which has arisen in connection with this matter is as to whether or not the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, after stating to this House, for the purpose of controverting the argument of the hon. member for Glengarry, that his position was based upon the careful estimates and calculations of his officials, now refuses to put the House in possession of those estimates and calculations. Now, if we had no rule on this subject, it would be only right as a matter of common justice on the part of the hon. gentleman, that in undertaking to controvert the statements of a practical man, he should bring these estimates down. But, as a matter of fact, there can be no question about the duty of the hon. gentleman, after referring to these documents, to place them before the House. I read from "May's Parliamentary Practice," which is most explicit and clear on this point:

A Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it on the Table. This restraint is similar to that rule of evidence, in courts of law, which prevents counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence.

Now, the hon. gentleman is making an argument based on material to which we on this side of the House have no access, and to which we are entitled. He is arguing a case before the jury of the country on material to which he alone has access, and to which he denies us access. This constitutional authority, which my hon. friend will certainly not object to, says further:

The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested, and when objection has been made in time, it has been generally acquiesced in. It has also been admitted that a document which has been cited, ought to be laid upon the Table of the House, if it can be done without injury to the public interests.

Now, there can be no injury to the public interests in laying on the Table of the House these documents, which are made not for the benefit of the Minister of Railways and Canals, or for the benefit of his department exclusively, but are made by these officials for the benefit of the country and paid for by the country. The hon. gentleman has not any argument or any suggestion on account of which he does not produce these documents, and I think, in fairness to himself, in fairness to his position as a member of the House and a member of the Government, in fairness to his reputation as a man, he should lay them on the Table of the House, and put the House in a position to judge whether or not my hon. friend from Glengarry is right in the estimate he made in regard to the cost of this road and these bridges.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE. The Minister of Railways and Canals surely has something to say to the serious charges which are made from this side of the House. We have protested all through these proceedings that the papers which are required to form a judgment, and which he says he had before him before he would undertake to recommend this measure to his colleagues, should be laid on the Table of the House. What are we here for? We are here to vote away hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of dollars of the people's money for this one project. Suppose I go back to my constituents, and they say to me, "What position did you take on that question of the Drummond County Railway?" "Well," I say, "I did not take any particular position." "Why not?" they ask. "Because I could not form a judgment on it, because the Minister persistently refused to give the evidence which he had in his possession, or which he said he had in his possession, in order to come to a conclusion before he could justify the project before his colleagues." We are the representatives of the people of Canada, met in Parliament to decide on voting away many millions of dollars on these enterprises, and we are denied the documents which the Minister says he has. I challenge the Minister to produce those documents. There are no such documents in existence to-day. There is no engineer in Canada who would stake his reputation on the figures which we have heard given to this House this afternoon, and on former occasions. Do you mean to tell me, Mr. Chairman, that the evidence of the hon. member for Glengarry, with the evidence of the engineer he sent down there—evidence which is incontrovertible and conclusive—that there is an engineer in this country who has a reputation, and who would destroy his reputation for any ability in his profession by giving such figures as we have been treated to in this debate? The name of the engineer is, I presume, given. I was told of one engineer, who was sent down to examine this same railway and who never got beyond the city of Montreal, because it was not intended he should go any further, and the report comes from him presumably that everything is lovely and the road is in excellent order.

The whole question of building this railway is either buried in obscurity or in something which cannot bear the light of day. The hon. Minister tells us that he carefully examined into this, that he had the opinions of engineers before he could recommend it to his colleagues. Well, I make bold to say that another member of that Government had this bargain all cut and dry, had the whole thing arranged; not perhaps the details, but the essentials, long before that date. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), it is well known, had a finger in this pie, and had been boasting throughout the country that he had arranged this matter.

Mr. COCHRANE. He had more than a finger in the pie.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, a great deal more.

Mr. COCHRANE. A man could not pull out $30,000 with his finger.

Mr. WALLACE. He is sadly belied if he had not several good slices of the pie. All these things were arranged by the Minister of Public Works. Then the Minister of Railways appeared on the scene, and in order to justify the scheme, he said that he had got the opinions of engineers. Let him put those opinions on the Table; let us read them; let us tell the people what these reports are that will justify this House in voting the money or condemn us for voting it. We want to have a knowledge of all the facts. Yet the hon. Minister persistently refuses to give us the information. That may be very well for hon. gentlemen on that side, though I do not believe it is. I do not believe that those gentlemen, who sat silent all these days when this subject was open for discussion are satisfied with the course of affairs. We know how, in the days gone by, they insisted on having the fullest information of the smallest transactions as well as those involving expenditures of millions of dollars. We know the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), we know the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville). We know the hon. Minister of Customs, one (Paterson). We know the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain), and we know the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). These men have not a word to say on this question, because they are too honest to justify what in their hearts they know cannot be justified. They have a record, they have a reputation, and they are not willing, even at the demand of those Ministers, to get up and destroy this reputation which they carefully got by so many years in Opposition.

But what is proposed to be done? According to the estimate made by the Minister and submitted to the House $1,400 an acre would have to be paid for land grants. Just imagine $1,400 per acre. I know that when the Toronto, Bruce and Grey Railway went through our country, that company did not pay on an average 5 per cent of that sum; and I venture to say that the land there is as valuable as that through this part of the country. $1,400 an acre for farm lands! The railway runs through a farm, and takes four acres, and for those four acres pays $5,600, and I venture to say that the other 96 will sell for half the money in many places. That is the way the Minister makes his estimate of the expenditure that would be incurred if the railway were built, in order to present a statement that would justify such a ridiculously extravagant bargain as has been made. Then with reference to those towns, as has been pointed out by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), there are no such places. There is one town, the village of St. Hyacinthe.

Mr. TALBOT. A village—it has 10,000 inhabitants, and is one of the largest manufacturing districts of Canada.

Mr. WALLACE. I say there is one large town, you can call it a city if you like, for I suppose it has reached that dignity, and that is St. Hyacinthe. I would like this young man to get up and tell us any other town or village of any size in the whole of that thirty miles.

Mr. TALBOT. Do you want to know the names?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. TALBOT. When you get through, I may gratify you.

Mr. WALLACE. I thought the hon. gentleman was going to give the information now, he seems so very anxious. He gets his information from the Minister, and the Minister told us that there were eleven or twelve important places. There is the town or city of St. Hyacinthe, which is a large place, but I am told that this railway does not go through that city but outside of it. Whether my information is correct or not, I have no personal knowledge, but the statement has been made to-night that the railway passes two miles away to one side of that city. Now, what about those other places? There are simply hamlets, from all the information we have, and some of them have not even reached that dignity. The land damages, therefore, except in St. Hyacinthe, would simply amount to practically the value of farm land throughout the whole of that 32 miles, and the value of farm lands, we know, in any part of Canada, would not be one-tenth of the value which the hon. Minister estimates.

Now, another point. In Bourinot's "Parliamentary Practice," the rule is laid down that a Minister is not at liberty to quote from any document unless he is prepared to lay it on the Table. I ask the Minister of Railways: Is he prepared to lay on the Table the reports of this engineer which, he said, he had before him, before he would recommend this enterprise to his colleagues?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have said what I would do.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, I am asking the question: Is he prepared to lay these documents on the Table?

Mr. WALLACE.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Finish your speech.

Mr. WALLACE. I want to know, and I am entitled to an answer from the Minister. I know it has been the habit of Ministers to treat with contempt any questions put to them. But this is a perfectly pertinent and proper question. It is a question whether the documents, to which we are entitled, by the rule I have quoted, are to be put on the Table. The Minister will not say whether he is prepared to lay them on the Table or not.

Mr. FOSTER. He refused a while ago.

Mr. WALLACE. And I presume that his evasive reply to me is a persistence in that refusal. Well, all I can say is that he will be condemned by the people of this country. If he has a statement made by an engineer that engineer is responsible for it, and we ought to be in position to compare that statement with those of other engineers, capable of forming opinions as to the cost of constructing bridges across those rivers and of making the roadbed of a railway and of moving earth and all those other works that enter into the construction of a railway. If the hon. Minister refuses to give information to the House, if he is not prepared, after he has given, as he says, the reports of these engineers to his colleagues, to give to us the opportunity of judging from those reports whether we can be justified in supporting this measure or whether we would not be still more justified in opposing it, he is treating the representatives of the people with contempt. I say he is treating the representatives of the people with contempt and the people when they are appealed to and learn the facts of the case will pay the Minister off for his want of courtesy and for his refusal to abide by the rules that Parliament has prescribed and have always been lived up to until the gentlemen attained power, and which should be lived up to still.

Now, there is in this list that the Minister submitted to the House, I am told, not only the towns and villages between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, but the Minister has crossed the bridge and gone into the Island of Montreal and taken the populous suburbs of Montreal in order to give a high figure for land damages on the route. But this agreement covers from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert and that is what we are discussing. When we come to the other portions we can discuss them if we have the information to discuss them intelligently. But the information being refused on the question now before us, I think it probable it will be refused on the others as well. Now, let me say in conclusion, we are bound to have this information. Parliament is entitled to have this information. The representatives of the people want to know all about the cost of the construction of this road. They want to know if the bargain of the Grand Trunk road is a fair bargain. It strikes me forcibly that it is an unfair bargain. They have arranged for a half interest in the road, notwithstanding that the Grand Trunk is doing about 90 per cent of the business, carrying in not only its own traffic, but also that of the Vermont Central and other roads. The Intercolonial Railway is doing the other 10 per cent, but under the arrangement for half interest, as I understand it, they will have to pay half the expenses of maintenance and half the running expenses of various kinds. It appeared to me that this was a very one-sided and unfair arrangement, when we know that arrangements are being made all over the country securing to railway companies running powers over the lines of other companies upon the basis of the proportion of traffic, a basis thoroughly understood and generally acted upon, which might easily have been adopted in this agreement.

Mr. TALBOT. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) challenged us to give the names of towns and villages through which passes this portion of the Grand Trunk which the Government is now leasing for the Intercolonial Railway. The statement of the Minister of Railways and Canals was that the Grand Trunk passed through ten or eleven towns or villages. These towns are Ste. Rosalie, St. Hyacinthe, Ste. Madeleine, St. Hilaire, St. Hilaire station, Belœil, St. Bazile, St. Bruno, St. Hubert and St. Lambert, ten villages in all. So, in that respect, the Minister's statement is correct. As far as the value of land is concerned, let me give one instance. There is a Mr. Street who, in 1896, bought three acres of land, about four acres from the railway, and paid for it $1,000. I would appeal to the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), who is a fair-minded man and knows the country well, if this country from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert is not one of the finest farming sections and one of the most densely populated in Canada. I appeal to every fair-minded man in this country if it is not true that there is not a finer farming country than that between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert. As to the towns: take St. Hyacinthe. That town has more than doubled its population in ten years. It is one of the great manufacturing centres of Canada. It has a population of 10,000, and it has more manufactures than almost any other town in Canada of 50,000 population. The knitting mills alone employ 1,500 hands. This is the country that the Grand Trunk Railway runs through and through which this road would have to be built.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman has not told us how many of these places are towns and how many villages.

Mr. TALBOT. They are all important towns and villages, every one.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). My hon. friend (Mr. Talbot) has appealed to me; I am sorry I shall not be able to speak exactly in the way he would like. Now that this discussion is commenced, I might point out that there is one thing that indicates that this scheme has never been entered into for the good of the country. The Minister of Railways and Canals must be very angry against the men who have put him in the humiliating position in which he finds himself to-night.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not see that.

Mr. BERGERON. Well, if he does not see it yet he will before the Bill is through, and he will probably be sorry that he did not see it earlier. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Marcell) knows these places better than the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) being from that district, and, if I am not mistaken, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, and my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), and others, have been trying to induce the hon. member (Mr. Marcell) to substantiate the allegations of the Minister of Railways and Canals; but the hon. member has not dared to do so. He cannot do it. What we complain of is this—and this simple instance will give the public an idea of the whole transaction. We said on a former occasion that the hon. Minister had gone into this scheme without knowing anything about it. Some people might have thought that that was exaggerated. But here is the proof of it, and I call the attention of my hon. friend from Bellechasse to it. The Minister says at first that it will cost $485,000 to build a line from Ste. Rosalie, that is, from the end of the present Intercolonial Railway, to the city of Montreal.

So far as I am concerned, I would be perfectly willing to see the Intercolonial come into Montreal; but nobody ever dreamed three years ago of bringing the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal through that line. My right hon. friend would never have thought of it had not this scheme been propounded to him by some of his colleagues. It might have come in by the South Shore Railway, or by a bridge at Quebec, or by the Grand Trunk Railway, but the idea of going around like a man passing through Kingston to go from Ottawa to Montreal, would never have entered the mind of anybody until it was got up by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), prompted by some other of his colleagues for objects which are not, I repeat, pro bono publico. The hon. gentleman speaks about spending $485,000. Now, when the hon. gentleman says that his engineers have made reports, I desire to tell him, with all due respect, that we are entitled to see the reports of those engineers over their own names. We want to see the figures on all the quantities brought down over the signature of a competent engineer before we are able to judge of the merits of a Bill of this magnitude. The hon. gentleman says that he told his colleagues that it would cost $485,000 to build a line between Ste. Rosalie and Montreal, besides the construction of two bridges. I will quote his own words :

There you have got $1,185,440 as the estimated cost of building the 32 miles of railway from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert. And mark you,—

Now, this is where I think the hon. gentleman puts himself in a humiliating position. If he had known what he was talking about, he would never have uttered these words. I say he ought to resent the position in which those who have instructed him have put him.

And mark you, you have not included the land damages, at from $100 to $150 per acre. Now, when you come to consider the expropriation of the right of way through the country from St. Lambert to Ste. Rosalie, who is going to say what the amount of those damages will be? There are, to begin with, no less than ten or twelve considerable towns and villages—

This is something the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Marcell) will not substantiate. With the exception of St. Hyacinthe, there is not another town on the whole thirty-two miles. Even the villages are not crossed by the railway. I do not think there is a single parish where the church is near the station, and in our province the church is usually in a village. The station at St. Hilaire must be over a mile from the church. Belœil station is certainly over two miles from the church. Now, he says :

There are, to begin with, no less than eleven or twelve towns and villages, some of them of considerable magnitude,—

Now, just imagine a gentleman occupying the position of Minister of Railways and Canals making such a statement before Parliament, before 200 men, before the country, without knowing anything about what he is talking about, but he is simply giving us information which has been furnished to him by some one who wants to sell him a railway.

—some of them of considerable magnitude, towns which have grown up since the Grand Trunk Railway was built.

Sir, St. Hyacinthe is not the only town which has increased through the National Policy. The town of St. Hyacinthe was formerly nothing but a big village, but since the National Policy was established it has grown up to its present position of importance.

Mr. TALBOT. But they have always elected a Liberal.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman forgets that the man who was elected in St. Hyacinthe when the National Policy was introduced was a Conservative, the Hon. Mr. Teller, now judge. True, the Liberals are now in the majority, and they are very ungrateful, for after they became prosperous they turned against the Conservative party and elected Liberals. Now, I have read these words to show the humiliating position in which the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has allowed himself to be placed. I say that since this scheme came before Parliament we have been witnesses to some extraordinary proceedings. It has already been acknowledged that the Senate of Canada, through their action, have saved this country over $600,000. Now, will the Government come back to this House with the very same scheme, or a similar one, after having acknowledged that the first scheme was an extravagant one? The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has stated to the members of this House, or to the country, who does not know that line, something that is not accurate. Is it to be believed that the Government of Canada will bring before Parliament schemes of such magnitude without fully explaining them to the people of this country? If that is possible, what guarantee have the electors themselves for economical government? I am convinced that the hon. gentleman did not know what he was talking about when he uttered these words that I have quoted. If the hon. gentleman knew that St. Hyacinthe was the only town on the whole line when he said there were eleven or twelve towns, what would you call such a statement as that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said towns and villages.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman's words are down here, I have read them as they are in the "Hansard."

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. But you do not quote them quite accurately.

Mr. BERGERON. Perhaps I do not read English very well. But I have shown that there is only one town. What about the villages? At Ste. Rosalie there is nothing else than the station, the village is about twenty acres from the station. The United Counties crossing—well, that is in a field, there is only a little shanty there for the man who signals the trains to prevent them from colliding. Then there is Ste. Madeleine—I do not think there are ten houses at the crossing there. The right hon. Prime Minister knows very well the accuracy of what I am saying, and I am very much surprised that he would allow the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to put himself in that position. The idea of putting in those two names, St. Hilaire East and St. Hilaire. There is only one station at St. Hilaire, and that is about a mile from the church. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) says, that 3 acres of land sold for $1,000. It is a very nice place, although I would not like to pay $1,000 for 3 acres there. Otterburn Park is next, at the end of Belœil bridge. There is not one house at this station. It is about ten or twelve acres from St. Hilaire. There is not even a platform ; it is a pic-nic place, where people from Montreal go and have pic-nics in the summer. It is near the Richelieu River. Hon. gentlemen call that a town of some magnitude—a considerable village. Belœil is next. There are a few houses at this place, occupied during the summer by summer residents, and which are closed up during the winter. The station is about 2 miles from the church. St. Bazile ; I do not think there are, at the station, three houses. The village is far away from the road. If the hon. gentleman says, that these are towns of considerable magnitude, which have been built up since the Grand Trunk Railway was built, he is making another mistake. The railway was built where it is to-day, and it has not increased these towns at all. St. Bruno ; the same remark applies to this place. Now the hon. gentleman comes to St. Lambert. The town itself is lower than the station. I am speaking of there being houses around the station. I do not want to speak about St. Charles or St. Henri, coming into Montreal, because what the hon. gentleman is trying to put before the House is the cost of building the road between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert. I say frankly, that I am sorry to see a Minister of the Crown putting himself in the position in which the hon. Minister of Railways has put himself, coming down without knowing anything about that line, and telling the people, that, if this road was built, and there is no reason to build one, it would cross ten or twelve different towns and big villages, when, as a matter of fact, it would only cross one town. His object was to convey the idea that land would be dear. As an hon. gentleman said a few moments ago, and, I think, correctly, I do not think any piece of the land which might have to be bought, would be any more than ordinary farm land. The idea that the hon. gentleman wanted to send abroad into the country was, that the cost, on account of land damages, in crossing these towns and villages, would be very great. If everything else that the hon. gentleman has said about that scheme is as reliable as these statements, I think it is the greatest fraud that was ever brought before the people of this country.

Mr. J. E. MAROIL (Bagot). (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to take part in the debate now going on, but as I have been appealed to by the hon. gentleman from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), I deem it my duty to answer his appeal. The hon. gentleman has stated that the villages through which the Grand Trunk Railway runs between Ste. Rosalie and Montreal are places of very small importance. Now, I may tell the hon. gentleman from Beauharnois that at Ste. Rosalie, which is but a parish, while the station is two acres distant from the church, there are houses from the church down to the station ; that is to say, that the village extends from the church down to the Grand Trunk Railway station. It might be said that the village of Ste. Rosalie, from the Grand Trunk Railway station, forms a whole with that portion of the village which is opposite the church.

I do not think it necessary to dwell upon the importance of the town of St. Hyacinthe, as my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) has admitted that it is a prosperous and thriving manufacturing centre, although he has given the credit for that prosperity to the National Policy ; but, for the moment, I shall refrain from entering into the merit of that question.

I heard a little while ago, an hon. gentleman stating that the Grand Trunk Railway station at St. Hyacinthe was two miles from the town. Well, I may tell the hon. gentleman that if he had only passed once through that locality, he would soon have found out that the station was not two miles from the town. It is true that the Grand Trunk Railway does not run through the very centre of the town, but it cannot be said that the Grand Trunk Railway passes outside of the city of St. Hyacinthe. Still, I would like to see how my hon. friend would lay out the line, did he wish to build a line independent from that of the Grand Trunk Railway, and I would like to know where he could locate that line nearer that of the Grand Trunk Railway, in order to avoid paying very heavy land damages on the route, should he not want to run his line through the centre of the town itself.

Next comes Ste. Madeleine, a parish in the immediate neighbourhood of St. Hyacinthe. The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) stated that there were only seven or eight houses at that place. Let the hon. gentleman allow me to tell him that his memory needs to be refreshed, or that very likely it was very long ago that he travelled through that country. Had he visited Ste. Madeleine a few days ago, he would have found out that it is a very thriving parish, with enough shops to satisfy the wants of the people there. There is a very fine church near the station, as well as a good hotel for the accommodation of travellers. Surely people do not build hotels in places where there are only seven or eight houses. On the other hand, were there only seven or eight houses there, they would not have granted a license to that inn. The hon. gentleman's statement is contrary to the facts, and should he take the trouble of visiting that locality, he would soon find out how far astray he was when stating that there were only seven or eight houses in that place.

The hon. member for Beauharnois pretends to know the country between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, and yet he does not seem to be able to distinguish St. Hilaire station from the village of that name. Is not the hon. gentleman aware of the fact that one may start from Acton and reach the village of St. Hilaire, without going to the St. Hilaire station? The best proof that St. Hilaire is a thriving locality is found in the fact that it boasts of a magnificent church. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the station is four or five miles from the church and that houses are to be found on the whole distance? Is not the hon. gentleman aware that St. Hilaire is an important and picturesque place, a favourite resort of the sporting community? Several gentlemen from Montreal spend the summer season there and some even remain the whole year round. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the land there is very valuable? Let me quote the case of Mr. Brais, who paid $700 for a lot of 60 feet by 100. That may give us an idea of the value of the land in that village.

Moreover, near the St. Hilaire station, there are two hotels for the accommodation of travellers. Would there be any need for two such hotels should there be only a few houses at that place?

Then comes Belcœil village. I say without any hesitation that the village of Belcœil is one of the finest to be found in the province of Quebec. The village extends from the church to the station and on the whole distance the road is lined, on both sides, almost without any gaps, with houses. In the rear of the station are to be found two hotels for the accommodation of travellers.

Next comes St. Basile which, though not of great magnitude, still, enjoys some importance, and it may be remarked in this connection that this parish has been formed partly from that of St. Bruno and partly from that of Belcœil. It is of recent formation; there is a fine church at that place, and though it is not located very near the station, still, it may be seen from the railway line.

There is also the village of St. Bruno, which is but a few acres distant from the station; it is a very fine and thriving village, as the hon. member for Beauharnois is well aware. It is an old parish, settled even prior to the building of the Grand Trunk, and it is very prosperous now.

The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals stated with good reason that some of those villages are of considerable magnitude, and have grown up since the Grand Trunk Railway was built, and that they have derived great benefits from that railway in as much as they have been enabled thereby to sell and export, with more profit, their farm produce.

St. Hubert is also a village of considerable importance, as St. Bruno and Belcœil.

Let us now come to St. Lambert. From what we have heard here from some hon. gentlemen, one would be led to believe that St. Lambert was not a town but a mere hamlet. Now, let me say, for the information of the House, and of the hon. gentleman who made that statement, that St. Lambert was incorporated last year, and that it is a town now with a special charter. As to the value of the land, I heard, a little while ago, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) state that the value of the land between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert was about one-tenth of the estimation put upon it by the Minister of Railways and Canals, that is to say, that instead of selling at $150 an acre, it would only sell for $15 an acre. Does my hon. friend from Beauharnois really believe that one could buy land for $15 an acre in the parishes of St. Bruno, Ste. Madeleine, and even Ste. Rosalie? The same remark applies to the parishes of St. Hubert, St. Hilaire and St. Basile. In none of those parishes could land be bought for $15 an acre.

Mr. J. S. H. BERGERON. (Translation.) How much are you going to pay for it?

Mr. MARCIL. (Translation.) My hon. friend asks me how much I am going to pay for those lands. I may tell him that I never inquired about the price of lands in those localities, but I may take as a basis in estimating the value of those lands the price of land in my own locality. I am able to state that you could not buy land in the township of Acton for $15 an acre, and a fortiori, the lands on the line of the Grand Trunk Railway between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, which are of far better quality, could not be bought for $15 an acre. The lowest price that could be paid for those lands might be figured, without any exaggeration, at from $100 to $150 an acre.

Let me now refer to some statements made by the hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with the construction of a new line. I do not think it necessary to reply at any length to the remarks fallen from those hon. members opposite, as the hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches and those behind them have amply answered them. But I may ask my hon. friend from Beauharnois, who pretends to know that country so well, whether, in his opinion, a bridge could be built across the River Yamaska at St. Hyacinthe as easily and at as little cost as it could be built across the St. Francis River? My hon. friend knows very well that the land on both sides of that river is a kind of loam. He knows also that in order to build a bridge of such importance on the river at St. Hyacinthe, it must rest on a very solid foundation; and, a fortiori, when it is a question of rearing a structure of that kind upon loam, it goes without saying that it is more expensive than when you build it on rock. He knows also that on the River St. Francis, an estimate has been made as to the cost of the Drummondville bridge, and that of a similar structure at St. Hyacinthe. He knows also that there is a great difference between the St. Francis River and the Yamaska River at St. Hyacinthe, and that there is no comparison between those two localities as to the cost of building a bridge. The best proof that can be adduced in that connection is this, that when the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge was carried away by the flood, a bonus of $50,000 was offered that company towards the rebuilding of their bridge across the Yamaska River, and they declined that offer on the ground that it was too costly a structure. The Yamaska River is the same that flows at St. Hyacinthe.

I deemed it my duty, Mr. Chairman, to offer those few explanations in reply to the statements made by the hon. member from Beauharnois, as to the importance of the towns and villages as also to the value of the lands situate along the line of the Grand Trunk Railway between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert. I have stated the facts of the case as they are, and I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me, if he thinks the matter over and takes the trouble of refreshing his memory a little, that the explanations I have just given are fair and grounded on the facts of the case.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, before he resumes his seat, whether, as stated, there are really eleven or twelve important towns between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert. Is he able to reply in the affirmative?

Mr. MARCIL. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman wants to know whether there are ten or eleven important towns between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, and here is my reply. I do not think I have said that there were ten or eleven towns between those two points. I confess to having stated that there were ten or eleven villages between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert. There is St. Hyacinthe which was referred to during this debate as a town, although it has reached the dignity of a city; but apart from St. Hyacinthe, which is a manufacturing centre of some magnitude, there are splendid villages through which the railway runs, and the hon. gentleman is well aware of it. The hon. gentleman knows that the villages of Beloeil and St. Hilaire are unsurpassed for the beauty of their site.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) I want the hon. gentleman to tell me whether there are really eleven or twelve towns in that country? Is he able to state that between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert there are eleven or twelve towns?

Mr. MARCIL. (Translation.) I do not think the Minister of Railways and Canals has stated in his speech that there were ten or eleven towns between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert. I think the hon. Minister said there were no less than eleven or twelve towns and villages, some of them of considerable magnitude. Now, as I understand the words used by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, when he stated, on good grounds too, that there were no less than eleven or twelve towns and villages between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, he meant by the word town, St. Hyacinthe, which is even more than a town, being a full-fledged city.

Apart from St. Hyacinthe, there is the Beloeil village, which, as the hon. gentleman knows very well, is a thriving and beautiful place. There is also Ste. Madeleine, a splendid parish; there is also a village of some importance there, although it is just starting into life. The hon. gentleman knows that the parish of Ste. Madeline is of recent creation, having been detached from older parishes, and that, moreover, it is progressing very rapidly.

Above Beloeil, you come across St. Basile which was erected four or five years ago; having been formed from portions detached from the neighbouring parishes and it is also progressing very rapidly. The establishments to be found there, though they cannot properly be styled manufactures, fully supply the wants of the village. A church and shops are also found there, and the village is progressing rapidly. I think it may be said there are ten towns and villages between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? We are all aiming at the same object here—

Some hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) No, no.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) That depends, of course, upon the standpoint from which we consider that object.

At all events, we wish to know the truth; now, I want to ask my hon. friend who knows so well that country, and who is familiar with the English language, whether the Minister of Railways and Canals was right in stating in his speech that there are eleven or twelve towns of some magnitude between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert?

Some hon. MEMBERS. (Translation.) And villages.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) I have the floor and I have the right of asking a question.

Page 4224, of the unrevised edition of "Hansard," the Minister of Railways and Canals has stated.

Mr. MARCIL. (Translation.) I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, but when the Minister referred to towns, he had in view the city of St. Hyacinthe. I say the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals could not pass over in silence the city of St. Hyacinthe which is situated between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert; and that is the reason why the Minister stated in his speech that there were in that country ten or eleven towns and villages.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Would my hon. friend allow me to call his attention to the following statement. I am going to read it in English, as the hon. gentleman understands that language.

Mr. MARCIL. (Translation.) Perfectly.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Here are the words used by the Minister of Railways and Canals :

There are, to begin with, no less than eleven or twelve considerable towns and villages, some of them of considerable magnitude, towns which have grown up since the Grand Trunk Railway was built.

Mark you, the hon. Minister used the word "towns" in the plural. Could the hon. gentleman tell me whether there is more than one town between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, as implied by the Minister ?

Mr. MARCIL. (Translation.) I may tell the hon. gentleman that there is more than one town on that line, as there is also the town of St. Lambert, which was incorporated last year. There is also the town of St. Hyacinthe, which has reached, as I said, the dignity of a city, owing to its population. As a matter of fact, St. Hyacinthe, the population of which was about nine thousand at the time of the last census, has now a population of twelve thousand souls. As the population required for a town to be entitled to the dignity of a city is ten thousand, I think we might properly speak of them as the city of St. Hyacinthe and the town of St. Lambert. That is the reason why my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways and Canals was right in using the word town in the plural, because there is the town of St. Lambert and there is the city of St. Hyacinthe.

Mr. BERGERON. There is one thing in connection with this matter which I wish specially to call the attention of the Prime Minister to. We were told for many years by the Liberal party, that the National Policy of the Conservative Government had reduced the price of farming lands throughout the country, but now we hear to-night, from my hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Marcil), that in the country traversed by this line of railway, you cannot buy purely farming land for less than $150 an acre. I commend that to the serious consideration of the Prime Minister, if he ever thinks of doing away with the National Policy.

Mr. BOURASSA. That is since the Liberals came into power.

Mr. McDOUGALL. A question arose between the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), who is not in his place now, as to the cost of the Grand Narrows bridge, the statement of the hon. member for Lanark, that it cost $500,000 or $520,000, being questioned by the Minister of Railways. I also understand that it has been said outside this House, that this statement of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) is not correct.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not say that.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I was not in the Chamber, but I am informed that the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) took exception to the statement of the hon. member for Lanark. Now, the Minister of Railways has that contract in his department, as well as all the information in connection with the Grand Narrows bridge, and he should have given it to the House. But without going to the trouble of a particular examination of the records or the estimates submitted to Parliament from year to year during the construction of this work, I can inform the Minister that the contract price for the Grand Narrows bridge with Isbester & Reid was $515,000. I am quite sure that the extras did not amount to $5,000, so that the total cost of the bridge did not exceed about $520,000. The length of that bridge is 1,697 feet. It has six spans of 242 feet in length, and one span of 245 feet, making in all 1,697 feet. The deepest pier is in 76 feet of water; the next deepest is in about 67 feet—I am giving these figures from memory, but I believe they are about correct. The next pier is in something over 50 feet of water, and the draw is in about 45 or 46 feet of water, that being about the shallowest. These are the dimensions of the bridge. The bases of the piers are about 40 feet by 20 in size, and there is about a four-knot current there. The original length of the bridge as mentioned by some member in a previous discussion, was to be 1,720 feet, but that was reduced, when the construction was being proceeded with.

Mr. SPROULE. Let me say a few words in regard to the refusal of the Minister to give us the information. Either the Minister has or has not the information. If he has the information and refuses to give it to the House, then he is doing a great injustice to the representatives of the people. If he has not the information, I respectfully submit that he should get it and give it to the House before he expects us to pass this Bill. There is a double reason why we should have that information. First, the Minister has to satisfy this House as to the wisdom of ratifying this contract, and afterwards, through the same source, he has to satisfy the Senate before they ratify the contract. The Minister is aware that, when this scheme was before the Senate two years ago, it was thrown out. Upon what ground? Upon the ground that it was not a proper bargain to enter into; upon the ground that there was not sufficient information given to justify the Senate in approving of the contract. And yet, after the lapse of a considerable time, the Minister has again submitted to this House a contract which is in every respect very much similar to the one which, two years ago, was thrown out by the other Chamber. And although the Minister may by sheer force of numbers—even in the absence of information which the House should have in order to judge whether it is a provident contract or not—although he may force this by his majority through the Commons, he must not forget that it has to run the ordeal of the Senate. If he refuses to give the information which can only come from him and his engineers, then I say, that his conduct is an open invitation to the Senate to again throw out the Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That would suit you

Mr. SPROULE. I submit, Sir, that it is an invitation to the Senate to throw out the Bill. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) knows that several days ago information was asked for in the Senate, and, if he intends to treat the Senate with that silent contempt in which he treats the House to-night, then his conduct is an invitation to that body to throw out the Bill a second time. And, if in the absence of this reasonable information which is asked for, the Senate takes that course, the Senate will be amply justified by the country. I have gone carefully over this bargain which is now before us, and I can see very little merit in it more than there was in the last one. It is very much the same as the contract which was submitted to us two years ago.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPROULE. It is very much the same, and, if it is the same which was thrown out by the Senate, how does the Minister hope to get it through that Chamber now, if he gives no additional reasons why the bargain should be ratified? Nothing can be plainer, in my opinion, than that the Minister intends to invite the Senate to repeat its former action and to throw the Bill out. It may be said, that the purchase of the Drummond County under this contract is a better deal than the leasing of that road, which was before proposed. I am free to admit that, in the interests of the country, it is better we should make the purchase than that we should have entered into the former proposed deal. But the other portions of the contract are no better than before. In view of the previous action of the Senate, there is a double reason that the Minister should furnish the information desired. If he refuses, the House and the country can only come to the conclusion, either that he has not the information and does not desire to get it, or that he will not give the information, although it is in his possession.

Anyway, he is treating the representatives of the people with scant courtesy. He cannot plead, as he did in the Klondike Railway scheme, that it is a matter which has been sprung upon the Government, and that in the hurry he has not time to get particulars. In this case the Minister has had ample time; he has his engineers at his command, and there is nothing to prevent him getting the fullest information. I repeat, that he has not placed this House in possession of the facts that would enable us to do our duty in this matter. The Minister has not done his duty to the country, to Parliament, nor to his position as a Minister of the Crown. I once heard the Hon. Edward Blake make a remark in this House which, I think, applies with great force to the position we are in to-night. Mr. Blake's statement was in reference to a judgment that might be given by a court. He said: "It is not enough to satisfy this House that the court should give its judgment. What we want is a reasoned judgment; what we want are the grounds on which the judgment is based, so that we can analyse it and judge for ourselves whether the judgment is sound or not." That is what we want in this case. It is not the ipse dixit of an engineer, but his reasoned judgment; in other words, we want the data which the engineer had before him, and which enabled him to arrive at the conclusion he reached when he put the cost of one bridge at $300,000 and the cost of another at $400,000. It is only by a careful analysis of that data that we can arrive at a correct conclusion as to whether or not his judgment was correct.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). There has been a great deal of discussion on the question of land damages. We know that the true valuation of the right of way is not the same to-day as it was when the Grand Trunk was built. Then we know that if we built another railway, we would not build it on the line of the Grand Trunk. If we built it 400 or 500 feet away from the Grand Trunk, it would not touch one of the villages or towns along the line of the Grand Trunk unless it would be the suburbs of St. Hyacinthe. Therefore, all the hon. gentleman's argument about the great cost of land damages goes for nothing. But the estimates placed on the bridges and on the grading of the road were not enough in themselves to make a good case before the country; and, therefore, a large amount is added for right of way, to justify the Minister in making this enormous outlay. It must be understood that all men voting for this measure are voting to pay $1,400 to $1,800 an acre for the right of way. The Minister said there would require to be a large amount for expropriation. I have no doubt he fears that, because I believe he has been dabbling in something of the kind already and made a failure of it, and a burnt child dreads the fire. No people in the country know the value of an acre of land better than the farmers, and they will compare the cost of the right of way with the price they can get for their land. When the Government proposes to pay for a right of way of the same width as that of the Drummond County Railway, that is 66 feet, they will be paying over $1,800 an acre. I venture to say that the Minister cannot get any engineer of reputation or standing in the Dominion of Canada who to-day will sign an estimate for half the amount he estimates this road to cost. I feel satisfied that he cannot force Mr. Schreiber to sign an estimate for half that amount. It is most unfortunate that the Minister would not condescend to treat the members on this side of the House as a Minister should. He appears to think we have no rights at all; he would scarcely give a civil answer. I want to impress upon this committee that this is a most unreasonable and extravagant estimate.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Chairman, it is usually understood that publicity is the very essence of the security which the people hold under a system of responsible government. All meetings of Parliament and of parliamentary committees are open to the public. The sittings of our courts are also open to the public. All these proceedings are conducted with publicity, and that publicity has usually been held to have a value. It is insisted upon with a determined purpose—for the protection of the public. The fact that that is recognized to be the system under which our Government is carried on renders it essential that the powers that be, whether the Government of a country or the presiding judge of a court, should respect that principle in such a way as to make it fulfil to the people the purpose it is intended to fulfil. That can only be done by giving the amplest and fullest information to the people on all matters affecting their interests. Now, in connection with this railway question, which has occupied the attention of Parliament and of the country for a long time—because it is now nearly a month since the Minister of Railways introduced his resolution on the question—many long speeches have been made; and, although the Minister of Railways himself has dealt with this subject at great length, I venture to say that the people do not thoroughly understand it at this moment, and are not in a position to say whether or not the Government are acting wisely, and are properly husbanding the resources of Canada in buying the Drummond County Railway and in leasing the Grand Trunk property. Even the members of the House, who have had an opportunity of listening to everything said by the speakers on the Government side on this subject, are at this moment very largely without that precise information which would enable them to form an intelligent opinion upon it. Why are they here, and why is this matter submitted to them by the Government at all? Unquestionably, this matter is submitted to Parliament because it is impossible for the Government to impose this bargain on the country except by the consent of the representatives of the people in Parliament assembled. And yet the representatives of the people in Parliament assembled are deliberately refused that information which is essential to enable them to form an intelligent judgment on the question whether the Government are acting wisely in this matter or not. It was quite within the power of the Government, even at a very short notice, to have prepared, and prepared in such a form as could be readily comprehended, even by a person of very ordinary intelligence, all the items which enter into the consideration whether this is a good contract or a bad one. It is utterly impossible for individual members of Parliament to acquire this information, or, at least, so difficult that they cannot acquire it. Take one instance. We are asked here to vote a certain sum of money in the shape of an annual rental for the use of the terminals of the Grand Trunk Railway in the city of Montreal, but to form an intelligent idea as to whether we are paying too much or too little for the use of those terminals we would require to know the amount of user which the Grand Trunk Railway has already granted to the lines having running powers over its property and contrast that with the right of the user given the Intercolonial Railway. If those matters were submitted to Parliament, if a statement were put in the hands of every member, showing the number of miles and sidings, the number of warehouses, the actual passenger stations at Bonaventure, the cost of building, the extension of the lines—if such a statement were put in the hands of members, I think that any man who has secured the confidence of the electorate of any constituency in Canada would certainly have sufficient intelligence to form an intelligent opinion on the subject and decide, in a few moments, whether he should or should not support the bargain which the Government are submitting to us. But the Government decline to give us any information at all. And the statements that are made in reference to this matter in Parliament are so vague, so changing, so contradictory, that it is impossible for any person listening to the debate, unless he has made considerable preparation, to enable him to understand it fully and to know exactly what the agreement is and what it is that the speakers, particularly from the Government side, are talking about. For instance, in very nearly the whole of these negotiations and the proceedings which took place before the committee of investigation, the line from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, which is one important thing in this contract, is continually spoken of as 45 miles in length, and the people of Canada, if they have any opinion on the subject, would say it was 45 miles long, because when the line from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal is mentioned, it must be understood that what is meant is the distance from Ste. Rosalie to the St. Lambert end of the Victoria Bridge, because there is a specific rental for that part.

After that we come to the bridge, for which there is another specific rental, and, therefore, what is meant, when we speak of the line from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, is the line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert junction. That is talked of as a line of 35 miles, for which we are paying a rental of $37,500, or, in other words, a little more than $1,000 per mile, and that bargain is defended on the ground that $1,000 a mile is a reasonable rental. But from a brief inquiry into the matter, the fact becomes known that the line is not even 32 miles in length. Take the time tables of the Grand Trunk Railway, showing the distances, not merely in miles, but the fractions of miles, and we find that the distance from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, instead of being 35 miles, is 31.69 miles, or less than 32 miles. Therefore, there is an error of over three miles, when speaking of that portion of the line, and that error has been repeated by the Minister of Railways and incorporated in the evidence furnished before the committee, and sent to the country, with all the authority that would come from its being stated by the Minister of Railways. We have that as the deliberate opinion and knowledge of the Government, so far as we could obtain it.

When we come to cross the Victoria bridge and deal with these other portions of the property of the Grand Trunk Railway, that are on the Montreal side of the St. Lawrence, we are met with the names of a number of sidings which are very confusing. Now, it would not have been a great deal of trouble to the Government to have had a table prepared and placed in the hands of every member, which would have cost not more than probably $5—it would have been easy for the Government to have supplied every member of Parliament with a blue print or tracing, which would have shown the exact number of miles of siding and the exact area in acres which are comprised in the terminals of the Grand Trunk Railway; and I maintain that the Government could have gone further and placed in the possession of every member, without any difficulty, figures to show what all the property of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, between the Victoria bridge and the Bonaventure station, had actually cost in cash. That would probably have required but a request to the Grand Trunk Railway, and that plan and tracing should have been placed in the possession of every member of Parliament, and we would have known absolutely with what we were dealing. But, instead of that, when the Government does choose to give the information which the House would have found valuable, it seems to me that the Minister of Railways is placed in a very extraordinary position.

Why should the Government depart from that course of conduct, which is so manifestly the course of conduct that should naturally be followed by any Government administering the affairs of a country such as this, which enjoys representative institutions and in which, evidently, the Government would be expected to be taken to task by every individual, in every matter in which it failed to do its duty? Why is this course of conduct pursued? What has the Government to gain by it? Parliament is deprived of its rights, the individual representatives of the people in this House are, to a certain extent, treated with contempt and insult, because that which is their inalienable and unquestionable right—the right to the fullest information possible—is denied them, and we are asked to decide a matter, while the details are deliberately withheld from us without which we cannot give a satisfactory decision. That being the case, it is really a most puzzling question to any one of these representatives of the people in this House to address himself to, when he asks why is this done. Why does the Government not place the House in the possession of the fullest possible information? Is it because of the difficulty of obtaining it? There could be nothing more easy than for the Government, with a large and well manned railway department, under the authority of the laws they are called on to administer, to obtain promptly all the information we require with respect to every railway over which it has control. It would not only be a matter of no difficulty, but of the most perfect ease, for the Government to have got all the information and have given it to the House. Yet we are asked to decide on a course when, in the absence of knowledge, we cannot determine whether that is a wise course to take. How is it possible for any member of this House to decide that it is a wise and prudent transaction to give to the Grand Trunk Railway $140,000 a year for the use of 38 miles of road, even if in that are included the terminals which lie in the city of Montreal. That is nearly $4,000 a mile. The actual distance, according to the Grand Trunk Railway time tables, from Ste. Rosalie to Bonaventure station, is 38 miles, and for that we pay $140,000 or nearly $4,000 a mile.

Now, the Intercolonial Railway is not so exacting when it leases its lines to others. It may be that the late Government are to blame for making a poor bargain, but it will be found in the evidence taken before the special committee last session that the line in Nova Scotia from Windsor to Halifax, is leased to the Annapolis and Windsor Railway for one-third of the gross receipts, and that the Government only got something like $16,000 per year, or $300 or $400 per mile, as against $4,000 a mile when they lease a line from others.

Now, why should not the Government treat the representatives of the people in this House as reasonable and intelligent men? They may say this is rather an extraordinary proposition, but we have strong reasons to advance in support of it. It may be that at first you are inclined to suspect there was something more than a mere business transaction in this arrangement. For, there was no doubt that statements were current in the country when the bargain was first proposed that some money was to come out of this transaction which would inure to the benefit of certain politicians not belonging to the Conservative party. There can be no doubt that that rumour was current. There are a great many people in Canada who still believe that that rumour was well-founded. And when we consider the very large price which we are paying for the Drummond County Railway and that we are giving for the lease of the Grand Trunk facilities, there is certain colour given to that statement. Now, we know that every one who is innocent courts investigation, wants to make everything plain, open and above board. But the conduct of the Government in this matter is not exactly what I have described. They not only do not court discussion, they deny the House the means of maintaining the discussion. They firmly refuse to give information. They do even worse. I am informed, in some cases, the Minister has cited authorities for his statements that he has declined to produce to the House afterwards. I need not argue that that is wrong; any person who knows anything of parliamentary procedure knows that it is wrong. It is entirely contrary to what we should have in this House, and what we, as an Opposition, have a right to demand. Even without the lesson we are receiving on this occasion we did not need to be told that the Government can enforce its will upon the minority. But it is our duty to protest against that way of carrying on the affairs of the country, and to make it as plain as possible to the people that if a bad bargain is made, we of the Opposition are not to blame for it. If we assent to this contract and it turns out a bad contract, as I think it will, we want the people to understand that our assent has been forced from us, not won by appeal to reason, that we have been practically compelled to buy the pig in a poke, to use a homely phrase, to buy a railway while the Government deliberately denies us the information that would enable us to arrive at an intelligent idea of its value. We have the advantage of having men of unquestioned knowledge and experience in railway matters who, though not in a position to command the resources of the country in order to secure the assistance of engineering and other experts, are still in a position to acquire a good deal of information, and who, with that information and with the experience they have had in building railways, are in a position to give a valuable opinion on the subject. We have the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), a gentleman who is known as one of the most eminent and successful contractors in Canada, and he comes again and again, and with all the force and authority that his unquestioned standing in the railway world gives him, declares that this is an improvident contract, and that there are many ways that the Government could have secured what it is now getting at a much less cost. When a gentleman of his authority in railway matters makes such a statement, it must go far to convince us; and when in reply there is nothing but appeals to documents which are refused or such evidently inaccurate statements as that made by the Minister in connection with the land damages on this line—shown to be inaccurate by the local knowledge of hon. members from Quebec—the statement made by the hon. member for Glengarry is to a very great extent confirmed. As to these statements of the hon. Minister concerning the towns and villages through which this road would pass, hon. members in this House are in a position to judge how entirely misleading and inaccurate they are. Hon. members from the maritime provinces pass over that line probably two or three times in a session. Do they pass through any grand towns or villages between Montreal and St. Hyacinthe? Does not every hon. gentleman know that we pass through open fields? When we pass the stations you will see no buildings indicating a place of importance. A mile or so away you may see the spire of the village church, but we all know that from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal the road runs for the most part through open cultivated fields. When we are told these farming lands are worth $150 an acre, knowing as we do that the best farming lands of the most important part of Ontario are selling at from $50 to $70 an acre, we feel that we are being trifled with, we feel that such evidence as this can only be put forward by the exercise of authority, that no representative of the people could be induced to rise in Parliament and make such a statement if he were not doing it under the solicitation of the Minister and doing something that he will never be able to maintain outside of this House. We remember the statements constantly made by the members of the present Government when in Opposition concerning the ruin overtaking Canada owing to the National Policy, and we knew them to be reckless and untrue. But it was scarcely to be expected that within two or three years of their getting into office they would be compelled to set up their supporters to give such unwilling testimony to show that farming property has advanced to $150 an acre, this being attributed, as they must necessarily attribute it, to the good Government that existed in Canada for eighteen years. Now, there were several ways by which the Minister of Railways and Canals, if he desired to reach Montreal, might have proceeded. One that has occurred to me seems obvious. We know that one of the matters discussed between the Grand Trunk and the Government when they were making their arrangements, was the possibility that they might double-track the Grand Trunk, the cost to be borne by the Government and the company in certain proportions. Therefore, we know that was a matter that received consideration. What would any railway man say if he were asked what it would cost to double-track the Grand Trunk Railway? No man who knows anything about railway construction would suggest that it would cost over $10,000 a mile. Let the Government, then, if they wish to utilize that road, proceed to do that which, as we know, the Grand Trunk Railway have in contemplation, let them double track the road at $10,000 a mile. It would improve the property of the Grand Trunk Railway, and give it that advantage east of Montreal that it has west of Montreal on its line between Montreal and Toronto. Then the Government would have no railway damages to pay, no right of way to provide for, and they would have, at an expenditure of say, $320,000, which at 3 per cent would only cost Canada $9,600 a year—they would then have a double tracked railway over which to run their trains between Ste. Rosalie and Montreal. That would only be about one-fourth of the sum, $37,500, which they have agreed to pay to the Grand Trunk Railway. For one-fourth that sum they would have the privilege of using a double tracked railway, with all the resulting advantages of safety, economy and security to life and property; and they would have that property at an expense of $9,600 a year, as contrasted with $37,500. Under the arrangement made now, if it should be found necessary later on to double track the road, the Government would be compelled, in addition to paying $37,500 a year, to pay the interest at 4 per cent upon a portion of the cost of double tracking the road. So it strikes me that a most improvident bargain has been made, a most thoughtless bargain. But it may be argued that the Grand Trunk Railway would not consent to have their road double tracked; possibly they would not. I think it is well known that it is a thing they desire to do. But suppose they did not; from the statements made to us by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), and from some other authorities that have been cited, from the knowledge we have of railway construction all over Canada, from the knowledge of the nature of the ground between Ste. Rosalie and Montreal, we know perfectly well that at most $15,000 a mile, or altogether some $450,000, would bring into Montreal a new and perfectly independent road. The sum of $450,000 would involve an annual expenditure of about $13,500 to the people. And still that is not done. And why? Because the Minister of Railways and Canals wants us to believe that it would cost half a million dollars to buy the right of way. That is absurd, as every man knows. In the lower provinces we are not accustomed to think ourselves living in a country very much inferior to Ontario and Quebec, we have had a great many railways built in that country, and in no instance whatever have people who own lands been paid any such sum as $150 an acre for right of way. We know that the late Government secured the right of way through the town of Dartmouth, in Nova Scotia, following the harbour front, taking the most valuable parts of the land, for less than $1,500 an acre. In my own town of New Glasgow, one of the most progressive and enterprising in the province, very desirable lands were taken, in some cases lying along main thoroughfares, at the rate of $300 an acre. If we had time we could produce evidence of many such specific cases to show that not a vestige of authority can be produced in support of the statement made by the Minister of Railways and Canals that it is going to cost $500,000 to buy the right of way from St. Hyacinthe to Montreal. It is obvious at first blush that that statement is inaccurate. When we find here in addition, the statement that this line of road runs through ten or twelve towns between St. Hyacinthe and Montreal, and when such a statement is made to men who are in the habit of traversing that line two or three times a year and must know that the statement is not correct, the person who makes that statement must be in a very desperate position.

Now, I think it should not be expected that this Parliament would willingly give its assent to this contract. The question whether this road is going to be a profitable one for Canada, is far from being settled. The statement was freely made when the first contract was presented to the House, that bringing the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal was going to make it a profitable road. Well, in the last returns which we have, that road had been running some four months. During that four months we had all the advantages that could be derived from a Montreal connection; still we did not see the deficit wiped out, it had instead largely increased. It strikes me that it would be nothing more than prudent on the part of the Government to continue that experiment until they were able to produce results that would settle the question beyond doubt. Let them try the experiment during the whole of one fiscal year, and when we get the returns up to the end of June, 1898, then we will be in a better position to judge what the result would be if the arrangement was made permanent. We will have had nearly two years in which to realize the increased passenger and freight traffic of which they talked so confidently, and they will have ample opportunity to prove whether the road will be able to export large quantities of cereals by using this line with steamer connection at Halifax. I do not think that it would be doing any great hardship if Parliament should decide to give the Government another year to continue that experiment in the way in which they have been conducting it during the past two years. If at the end of another year the Government still thought it well to insist upon an answer to the question as to whether they should buy this road, we would be in a much better position to give the answer if we had before us the reports and returns showing what the results actually were. Therefore, even if the Minister was disposed to give us the fullest information in his power, I think it would still be an open question whether we should agree to such a proposition. Under the circumstances, when we find a Minister of Railways and Canals, a man of undoubted ability, a man at the head of a well equipped department, when we find such a gentleman advancing statements unsupported, doubtful in many cases, and contrary to experience, I think we have abundant reason to pause and to take no further step until we know what the results are likely to be. When we find the Government giving us information which bears upon the face of it the stamp of worthlessness, this Parliament is not only justified in refusing its sanction, but it would be going out of its way and failing in its duty if it consents to do anything else than defeat such a measure presented in such a manner.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall the preamble be adopted ?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no ; we are not more than to the third section of it. As I said to my hon. friend the other night, this is the only chance of really going into the Grand Trunk arrangement in detail, and it cannot be expected that all these 58 sections can be disposed of at a single sitting, or, perhaps, in two or three sittings. I want to make an appeal to the right hon. gentleman who leads the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I tried to make an appeal, in all kindness and as strong as I could, to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, but the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals is disposed to be obdurate. He has stood upon what he calls his dignity, and he does not propose that members of the House shall have any of the information which is accessible to him. I do not think the Prime Minister sympathizes with that idea of it, but I am not quite sure whether he understands the gravity of the case. One part of the argument of the hon. Minister of Railways and

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

Canals, a very important part of the argument, which he delivered here the other evening, was on the line of the necessity for the present arrangement for the reason that the building of an alternative line would be more expensive and practically impossible ; so that no business men, he went on to explain, would think that it was feasible to build an alternative line rather than accept the contract in behalf of which that argument was made. It had its force in the country ; it was intended to have a force in the country, and, wherever we go in the country, we will meet that argument in that respect. It is to that branch of the argument that we are devoting ourselves at the present time. We believe that we have proved that that branch of the argument is utterly fallacious and utterly untrustworthy. These are strong words, but none too strong to be used. When we press that view of the matter upon the Minister, he says, that he knows nothing about it himself, but that he has information which is provided by his officers. Thus, very naturally, we ask that that information shall be laid before the members of the committee, so that they may have the same right to form a conclusion upon that information that the hon. gentleman himself has had. That is predicated on the assumption, which is not a violent one, that other men in this House have brains, as well as the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, that other men in this House are quite as good business men as the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, that other men in this House know just as much about railways as the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, who knows nothing about them any more than ourselves, using the words in the technical point of view. We ask simply, that the same information which the hon. gentleman has had, may be presented to this committee, so that the members of it may form their own conclusions. Speaking of that information, the hon. Minister, in characterizing it at the commencement of that branch of the subject, said :

Has he any idea what it would cost ? I can give him an idea of what it will cost, founded, not upon my own unaided judgment, but upon the careful estimates and calculations of my officials in the department, made not to-day, not yesterday, but before I was prepared to recommend to my colleagues the adoption of this scheme.

The inference from that is, that the information has been presented to his colleagues, and it was the force and conclusive nature of that evidence that made his colleagues agree with him in adopting the measure. Perhaps, some of his colleagues can give this information in detail which was prepared long ago—accurate estimates and calculations—by the officials of his department, for I do not think the members of the Government—there are thirteen of them—are gentlemen who would be willing to take up a scheme of this kind, pass it through

Council and authorize the Minister to bring it before the House, unless they had some information to go upon, other than the mere ipse dixit of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. They must have had this information, these estimates, these calculations, before them. Perhaps some of the Ministers, other than the Minister of Railways, can give us that information, though even then it would be second-hand. Does not the right hon. Prime Minister think that we have, as members of the House, a perfect right to have that information, these calculations and these estimates of the officials of his department, who are not owned by him, but who are the officials of this House and the servants of Parliament? These are calculations, and these are estimates which the Minister says were carefully prepared, not lately, but long before he took the responsibility of presenting this matter to his associates for their adjudication and judgment. Does not the Prime Minister think we have a perfect right to get that information? Why should the Minister interpose between our officials and this House? Will the hon. gentleman assume that the Minister of Railways has any right to assume a superior judgment to the other business men of this House, and to say to the two hundred members of this House: I have looked over these estimates and calculations, and I am satisfied. The other hon. members say we would like to look over these, if you do not mind. The Minister replies: You insult me, because, when you want to look over them, you imply that my word is not to be taken, and that I am not to be trusted. That is the way we are met. Does the right hon. gentleman think that this is the way one of his Ministers ought to act? If it can be done in this case, it can be done in all cases. Are we to sit here and simply accept the filtered information through the Minister of Railways and Canals, or have we a right to have the information ourselves? Would my right hon. friend tell us what interest would be harmed by giving us that information? Is there an answer to these questions? Will the right hon. gentleman tell us why the House is not seized of that information, why it is not laid on the Table here, so that we can scan it? We are suspicious of that filtered information for several reasons. We are suspicious of it because the Minister of Railways gravely declared that to build a bridge over the Yamaska River would cost $300,000, a bridge not over 331 feet span, where the difficulties cannot be great, and when it has been shown here to-night, by conclusive testimony, out of the blue-books, sworn testimony, evidence of engineers, that bridges longer and more difficult to build have been built for $17,000, for $15,000, for the superstructure and sub-structure, of which measurements and quantities have been given. More than that, the hon. member for Glengarry, who knows more about practical railway building than any of us here, probably, and who stakes his reputation, as a member of this House, and stakes his reputation as to the information he gives, who says that he himself has looked into the matter, that he has had an engineer make measurements and calculations, and who says, that that bridge can be built for within $60,000—he says $40,000 to $50,000. There is cumulative evidence. The Canadian Pacific Railway, building a modern structure, in modern times, 3,652 feet long, over the St. Lawrence River, built it all for $934,000. Three thousand six hundred and fifty-two feet, compared with three hundred and thirty-one feet; you can calculate the proportion yourself. Is it reasonable that a three hundred and thirty-one feet bridge over the Yamaska River, would cost $300,000, when a three thousand six hundred and fifty-two feet bridge over the St. Lawrence cost only $934,000. So, the evidence grows and grows, until we are led to the conclusion that the Minister has made a mistake, and we say to him: If you have not made a mistake you are putting your engineers in a bad position. They are engineers upon whom we must rely, pass estimates, and expend money. Will they estimate that a bridge which ought not to cost more than $60,000 will cost $300,000? I challenge the Minister (Mr. Blair) to put the estimate of Mr. Schreiber before this House on that basis with the calculations worked out. He says he will not, and that I am no gentleman because I ask it. He stands on his dignity and says: I am the Minister and, consequently, you must take the information as it filters through me. Now, Sir, I say that the House is deeply interested in knowing whether or not the country has proper men as engineers. What the House would like to know is, whether there is an engineer in that department who will put his signature to an estimate worked out for $300,000, as the cost of a bridge over the Yamaska. If there is, then I would like to have the common sense opinion of builders and business men in this House, as to whether such an estimate is a fair one, and whether we ought not to change our engineer who would give an estimate of that kind for a bridge of that kind. That is a grave question, but a graver question still is: That you have a man here who, for the time being, happens to be a Minister of a department, who must rely upon the authorities in the department, and is this House to absolutely back him up in refusing to give the estimates of his engineer of the department. I say that it is intolerable. I say it is not only not constitutional, but it is illiberal and unparliamentary to a degree. I appeal to the right hon. the Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) not to allow the obstinacy of his Minister of Railways to defeat the well known principles upon which we are guided in this House, and to defraud 212 representatives of the people of information, because he says: I have got it, I will filter it out to you, and, you poor fellows there, should be very glad to get it in that way, and you will get it in no other way. This is a matter of some consequence, and I put it as strongly as I can in that light. But, there is more evidence which makes us suspicious. The Minister (Mr. Blair) was making his great speech; fresh, or pretty nearly fresh, from a most lamentable attempt to put before this House the Yukon Railway business, as to which he confessed he knew nothing. The Minister this time determined he would make a great speech, and that he would demonstrate to his followers, and especially to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that he was a man of genius and a man of power. So he made a great speech; but the foundations upon which one-third of it was built, had to crumble into dust to-night, before a little questioning and criticism. I want to call the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) to another thing. In that speech, which was meant to convert his own side of the House to an easy faith in the matter, and the country generally to the wisdom of the step, he went still further. One branch of the argument was as to the great cost of the right of way, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) led this House to suppose—a complete misrepresentation—that in building from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, you would be mulcted in extra heavy damages for land, because of the ten or eleven towns or villages through which the road would have to run. Everybody who was here to-night knows that these ten or eleven considerable towns and villages have dwindled into one town and a uniform farming country, with little aggregations around the hotels and churches of the different parishes, an absolutely agricultural country, much the same as it was years ago, with the exception of the town of St. Hyacinthe; good farms, good land, and, I dare say, a contented and a happy and prosperous people, in the possession of their habitations. But, it is not a 32 miles of villages and towns to be run through cutting into establishments, cutting into lands which are owned by men living in cities and towns. It is an agricultural country, sparsely but generally populated, and running through these different parishes would be the road, running through farm lands, and farm lands which as taken would have to be paid for and these only. And when the Minister was questioned, he did not know the name of one of these towns, except St. Hyacinthe. He told us they were given to him by some of his men whom he consulted, and he refused to bring down the statement of the engineer in writing, and he tried to put off the House in that hap-hazard fashion of hearsay from some officer in his department. Now, this strong part of his argument has crumbled into utter dust. Put all these things together, and I say we are justified in having a very grave suspicion that when the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) puts a solemn argument, coming down to definite facts before the House, we cannot believe that his representations are what they are said to be, and, consequently, we must be critical. There is the proof we have so far as it goes. I appeal to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) whether, for the sake of general credibility, we are not justified in asking that the report and the estimates of the engineer, our officer, shall be laid before us who employ him, and who pay him, and who pay him in the interests of the people. I am sure this appeal to my right hon. friend, based as it is upon constitutional grounds, will have its effect, and that, perhaps, when he takes the night to think over it, he will bring his recalcitrant Minister of Railways into something of a better frame of mind; better suited to the progress of business, better suited to the Parliament into which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) has come, better suited to the position which, for the time being, he occupies. I am certain that the Opposition in asking for this information, does not ask for anything which a business man in Canada would not say is right we should ask for, and would not admit, should be at once complied with.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). As my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has appealed to me, I certainly owe him an answer, though I am very much afraid in advance that I shall not be able to satisfy him. My hon. friend is so very hypercritical in his views of looking at this matter, that I fear whatever we might do on this side of the House, we do not satisfy him. He will pardon me for saying, that I do not think he is particularly anxious for information, when I see that at half-past eleven at night we have no progress whatever in committee on this Bill. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) appealed to me as a member of this House, as a member of the Government, to know whether or not we have come to the conclusion which we ask this House to ratify, without having more information than he himself has. I think, Sir, there is enough information for my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) and for every one else to form a proper judgment on the merits of the proposition which we submit to the House. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is a good debater, and he will pardon me if I say, that he is also a good special pleader. This scheme which is offered to the House to-day, in my judgment, commends itself on its own merits.

My hon. friend, in his speech the other day, one of very great ability, as we all know, showed conclusively to the satisfaction of every man in this House that it was absolutely impossible to have a railway from Ste. Rosalie to Bonaventure station for the sum of money which is represented by the rental of $140,000 a year which we are to pay. Capitalize that amount at 3 per cent, or 4 per cent, or 5 per cent, or 2 per cent, and double or treble the amount of capital so formed, and you would not be able to get the facilities which you have under this agreement from Ste. Rosalie to Bonaventure station. Let the amount of capital be four, five, six or ten millions, and double that amount, and you could not get for it the facilities which you get under this agreement. That is a statement so broad, so clear and so certain that it cannot be successfully controverted. But my hon. friend the other day went out of his way to answer a speech delivered by the hon. member for Glengarry. That hon. gentleman is a practical contractor, who speaks with authority, and his utterances ought to be treated with respect. I do not share all the views expressed by him; but I am bound to say that when he speaks on matters of this kind his views are entitled to respect, because he is supposed to know and does know what he is talking about. But as doctors disagree, so engineers will disagree; and my hon. friend went out of his way, it appeared to me, although it was out of the abundance of his case, to answer the statement made by the hon. member for Glengarry in regard to the estimated cost of building a road from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, passing into the city by the vicinity of the Lachine bridge. My hon. friend first stated, and in doing so he did not commit any breach of the truth, that there were some ten or eleven towns or villages which the railway would have to pass. Now, the hon. gentlemen opposite, in a carping spirit, if I may say so, at least in a hypercritical spirit, says there is only one town, St. Hyacinthe. I do not care whether you call St. Lambert a town or a village; the fact remains that from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal the line would cross the town of St. Hyacinthe and several of the wealthiest parishes in the province of Quebec.

Mr. FOSTER. Parishes.

The PRIME MINISTER. I say parishes, and parishes which would give a great deal of freight to any railway in the shape of the agricultural products which they raise and which would find a market at Montreal. My hon. friend so stated. Then he stated that the land damages would amount to at least $150 an acre. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Marcell), who knows the locality very well, gives his opinion that the land in that vicinity would cost from $100 to $150 an acre. Then the bridge across the Yamaska River, at St. Hyacinthe, my hon. friend has stated, would cost $300,000. The hon. member for Glengarry estimates it at $50,000. I need not repeat what I said on this point this afternoon. My opinion on this subject being the opinion of a layman, I do not attach any value to it; but to any man who knows the locality at all it seems preposterous to suppose that you can build a bridge across the Yamaska River for $50,000. There was another bridge on the Yamaska River at the town of Yamaska, which belonged to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and which was washed away five or six years ago by a spring freshet, and it has never been rebuilt, although there is offered at this moment a subsidy of $50,000 which was voted by this Parliament four or five years ago for the rebuilding of that bridge. That subsidy has been begging so far, for no one has accepted it. Now, we generally give subsidies for bridges to the amount of 15 per cent of the cost, which would make the cost of that bridge, which is within fifteen miles at most of the bridge at St. Hyacinthe, $300,000 or $400,000. So that the estimate of $50,000 seems to be preposterous. Whether the bridge would cost $300,000. I am not prepared to say at this moment; but even supposing the estimate of the engineer was too high, after all it is only a matter of opinion, and that is not a sufficient reason for defeating the proposition before the House. What is it my hon. friend opposite asks? My hon. friend the Minister of Railways spoke after having consulted his engineers, and having debated the matter with them again and again. My hon. friend knows that in the relations existing between the Minister and the Chief Engineer, the information given by the latter is often given in conversation or in an exchange of views, and when the Minister says: "I give you the estimate of my engineer, and he estimates that the bridge would cost $300,000," he gives you all that he could give you even if it were put in writing. There is more than that. As I stated this afternoon—and I call the attention of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) to this fact—this question is not new; it has been debated in this House before; it has been investigated by a committee of the House; and I find among the list of documents brought before that committee, all the documents asked for by my hon. friend to-day. Among them were the following: Mr. Schreiber's first estimate of mileage and cost of construction of Drummond County Railway from Ste. Rosalie to Chaudière Junction; estimate of Mr. Schreiber as to amount to be paid Grand Trunk Railway Company for use of terminals at Point St. Charles and Bonaventure station, Montreal; estimate of Mr. Schreiber as to the amount to be paid to Grand Trunk Railway Company for the use of Victoria bridge; second estimate of Mr. Schreiber of mileage and cost of construction of Drummond County Railway from Ste. Rosalie to Chaudière, including Nicolet branch. All these things have been investigated. So it seems to me that my hon. friend, if he really wants information and is not obstructing this Bill, has already got the information before the House, and the very members who were entrusted with the investigation of this measure had the information also.

Mr. BERGERON. I wish to say, with regard to the bridge for which the right hon. gentleman says a subsidy of $50,000 has been voted, that there is no parallel between that and the other bridge. The width of the river at the village of Yamaska is double what it is at St. Hyacinthe.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is wider, certainly.

Mr. BERGERON. And my right hon. friend will remember, I am sure, that it is not on account of the expense that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company do not want to build that bridge. Even if we offered them $100,000, they would not build it, because they were very glad to stop running their trains on that line, because it did not pay them. The right hon. gentleman knows very well that he cannot bring this as an argument at all to show the difference in the estimate of the bridge at St. Hyacinthe, between the hon. member for Glengarry and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The right hon. gentleman complains that we are now at 11.30 and nothing done. I think if he will reflect for a moment, he will see that if nothing is done, it is the fault of his own side. He says that the hon. Minister of Railways went out of his way to answer the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan). We do not take that view. We feel that the argument which the hon. member for Glengarry addressed to this House was most cogent to show that those resolutions should not be passed. It went to show that for very much less cost than is proposed under this agreement, a road could be built, double-tracked, from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, and terminal facilities provided. How did the Minister of Railways meet this argument? By placing against the statement which had been made by the hon. member for Glengarry the estimates and calculation of the officials of his own department. Here were statements made by the hon. member for Glengarry, a practical man, based upon practical observations, which showed that a very much better arrangement could have been made by this Government than the one proposed. How then can the right hon. gentleman say that the Minister of Railways went out of his way to answer that argument. He did not go out of his way, it was directly in his way to answer that argument, and he attempted to answer it by stating that the estimate of my hon. friend from Glengarry was not correct, and that he had careful calculations made long ago by the engineers and officials in his own department, which showed that the argument of the hon. member for Glengarry was wrong.

Now, the question we have been discussing this evening is simply whether it is competent for the Minister of Railways to attempt to meet the argument of hon. gentlemen on this side by a reference to calculations of that kind, and then to obstruct this committee, from four o'clock this afternoon until 11.30 to-night, by refusing to produce these calculations, in violation of every rule of parliamentary procedure. Yet the right hon. gentleman says that this is a matter in respect of which the Minister of Railways went out of his way to answer the hon. member for Glengarry. He did not go out of his way to answer that hon. gentleman, but went out of his way to obstruct the business of the committee by refusing to produce the calculations which he himself brought before the House, and which he, under every principle of parliamentary procedure, was bound to place before the House.

I do not understand that the right hon. gentleman has given an answer at all to the appeal made to him by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). The question simply is this, whether it is competent for the Minister of Railways to attempt to meet an argument made from this side of the House based on practical knowledge and observation, by a reference to estimates and calculations of his own engineers, and then to keep this committee back, hour after hour, by refusing to produce those documents for its information. He might just as well bring down this Bill and these resolutions and this agreement, and say: I have made an excellent agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway, take my word for it; and if you do not believe that it is an excellent agreement you are doubting my word, and I will treat any complaint made with contempt.

But the right hon. gentleman himself affords the best answer to his own argument. After stating that the Minister of Railways and Canals had gone out of his way to answer the hon. member for Glengarry, he himself attempted to answer that hon. gentleman as to the cost of that bridge. The question is whether it would cost about $300,000 or $50,000, and the right hon. gentleman said he had some personal knowledge of the country and the right of way, &c. We listened to all that with great respect, but we would listen with a great deal more respect and attention to the calculations and estimates on which the Minister of Railways made his speech the other night. The right hon. gentleman has no technical knowledge of these matters, the engineers have, and the Minister of Railways based his argument upon the reports of those engineers, but now refuses to bring them down. I venture to think that, under no authority quoted to this House, is he at all justified in the course he has taken, and I do not think that the right hon. First Minister has succeeded in justifying the obstruction to which this committee has been subjected in attempting to advance this Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not suppose it is my hon. friend's intention to finish the schedule to-night?

The PRIME MINISTER. What, then, is my hon. friend's intention?

Mr. FOSTER. My intention, and I think that of my hon. friends, is what I stated the other day, when we made the arrangement for having a vote on the third reading. I think I mentioned that on the second reading the items would have to be thoroughly gone into, and that I had a good deal of criticism to make. We really had no opportunity of getting down to ground-work on this scheme at all until we got into committee on the second reading. The hon. Minister of Railways made a very long speech on the resolution, which was replied to, and my hon. friend will recollect that we then made no criticism of the different parts of the schedule, some fifty-eight sections in all. We let that go with the idea that on the second reading we would have an opportunity of criticising the fifty-eight sections. All are not equally important, but some are, as affecting the basis of the agreement, and it will take considerable time to thresh them out. The hon. gentleman may keep us here until the early morning, but that is not the way we will get through our discussion best. We have no desire to unduly criticise all those fifty-eight sections, but they must be reviewed and those we consider most important criticised.

We have kept on this one item for this long time for one purpose and one alone, and that is to emphasize the fact that the Minister of Railways has taken ground, by refusing us the information on which he made his argument which shows pretty conclusively that he is wrong.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In what respect?

Mr. FOSTER. In this respect, that he has made a statement before this House to influence the judgment of members, which we believe cannot be sustained; and as I am not technical, and my hon. friend is not technical, and my hon. friend behind me is not a railway man, and the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government is not a railway man, why then have we not the authority of the engineer's statement? We can each have his opinion and meet assertion by assertion for a fortnight or longer, but the very argument of my hon. friend proves conclusively that we had better refer to some other authority, and that is the authority on which the Minister of Railways based the argument he made, in which argument I believe he is mistaken.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that a part of the statement the hon. gentleman (Mr Foster) has made does not harmonize with the rest. He professes anxiety to have an opportunity of discussing the 48 clauses of this Bill, and yet he has been, apparently, standing upon the ground which relates exclusively to the general question, whether any portion of this Bill ought to be considered at all, whether, in fact, the Bill should have had its second reading. His contention is, that this arrangement is not beneficial to the country, and he says one of the matters I presented to the committee the other day, concerning the erection of the two bridges which now form part of the line of the Grand Trunk between Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert, was not accurate, but was excessive. Now, I cannot see how the question, as to whether these estimates, one or both of them, are excessive, can be a material question as affecting the general proposition before the committee. Whether or not this Bill, as a whole, with all its clauses and all the clauses in the contract, should pass, does not rest upon the question whether the engineer gave me an accurate estimate of the cost of these bridges. I quoted from the engineer's memorandum to the effect that the cost of the bridge across the Yamaska would be $300,000. Whether that estimate is accurate or not, or whether statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite should be accepted, is a very small part of a very large question. All through this discussion, the hon. gentleman has been putting it forward that, when I stated the other day that I had the authority of my engineer to state to this House that it would cost $485,000 for the building of a railway, outside of the two bridges over the Yamaska and Richelieu rivers, and $400,000 for the Richelieu and $300,000 for the Yamaska bridge, a total of $1,185,000, I was giving figures which were excessive and exaggerated. Well, if the hon. gentleman is of that opinion, let him draw his own conclusions from that as he pleases, and vote accordingly. But I do not see, nor do I think any hon. gentleman in the committee will see, the relevancy or importance of our occupying the time of the committee in deciding whether or not the engineer's estimate was excessive. I have told the committee, over and over again, that the engineer gave me the total estimate of cost. He did not go into details; he did not tell me how many pounds of iron nor how many cubic yards of stone would be required, but gave me the figures exactly as I have presented them to the House. And I do not think that the hon. gentleman is treating me fairly; I do not think he is acting in a way which would commend itself to the fair-mindedness of the House, when he calls on me to produce something which I have never said I had, and which, as a matter of fact, I have never had—a statement under the hand of the engineer showing the details figured out closely and accurately of the cost of the Yamaska and Richelieu bridges. I do not think the hon. gentleman can hope to impress this side of the House, at any rate, with the idea that he merely desired to consider the clauses of this Bill, when he is resting his argument on the accuracy of the engineer's statement and comparing it with the statement of hon. gentlemen on the other side. That, surely, cannot be a sufficient reason for delaying the consideration of the Bill in detail. We have already passed the second reading—

Mr. FOSTER. I want my hon. friend to stop there. He must not use that argument, because it was distinctly understood between the leaders of the House that the vote, which should properly be taken on the second reading, should be deferred to the third reading, for the convenience of the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The vote—that might be.

Mr. FOSTER. The vote on the principle of the Bill. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knows that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) knows that the suggestion to have the vote on the third reading was made from this point of view—it was not a question as to what the result would be; there was no question as to what the sense of the House was upon the subject, and it was only necessary that the formal vote should be taken—the hon. gentleman and his friends desiring to put themselves upon record—and the third reading of the Bill was chosen as the more convenient opportunity for this purpose. The view expressed by the hon. gentleman is not the view, I think, of one who wishes to justify his delay in dealing with these clauses as they are now coming up.

Mr. D. HENDERSON (Halton). I have listened to the hon. Minister with a great deal of interest, and I may say, with some surprise at the statement he has made, that the principle of this Bill has been confirmed by the House. I certainly did not so understand it, when the arrangement was come to that the division should take place on the third reading, instead of the second reading, on the whole question whether the acquiring of the Drummond County Railway or the extension of the Intercolonial Railway was in the general interest of the country. I do not think the House has decided that question yet, and that is what we will test, when we come to the vote on the third reading. To my mind, it is a very grave question whether this scheme is to the advantage of the country generally. I, for one, representing a constituency in western Ontario, believe that, whatever advantage it may be to the province of Quebec or the maritime provinces, it is certainly not a scheme that is going to prove of any advantage to the province of Ontario. We do not in any way call for the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, or any other railway, for the purpose of taking the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal. The whole terms of Confederation have been complied with and fully carried out, so far as railway construction is concerned, when the old province of Canada has been brought into connection with the maritime provinces by the Intercolonial Railway, as it now exists. Under the British North America Act, we are not expected and not called upon to do more than was done many years ago. Therefore, I say it is a question whether this scheme here proposed is a feasible one and one that will accrue to the benefit of the country generally. The Minister of Railways and Canals, in declining to give information in detail, which he has been pressed to give time and again, I think, fully justifies us in going back and discussing this question as to whether the scheme is one that commends itself to the House. When the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), a few moments ago, was addressing the House, he raised what, to my mind, was a very pertinent question, and gave me the idea of saying what I am now about to say, the question whether the Government acted wisely in acquiring that road.

Possibly the member for Pictou at that time was not discussing the question as to whether the Government should extend the road to Montreal, but perhaps he was discussing the question as to whether they had made the best bargain that could be made for the purpose of continuing the road to Montreal. But I go further, and I say that I do not consider that it is in the interests of this country, more especially of the western provinces, that that road should be continued any further than it is at the present time. I may say that in all the arguments that have been advanced during the present session and the preceding session, I have never yet been able to discover one that convinced me that the Government were in duty bound to continue that road to Montreal, or that it was going to benefit Canada as a whole, or was such an undertaking that it should be taken hold of by the Government. Now, I have stated my position clearly, and when a division is taken in this House on the principle of the purchase of this road, I must certainly vote against the whole scheme. Now, I may give you a few examples to show how much use this road is to us in the western part of Ontario. In the western part of Ontario we ship by the Grand Trunk Railway to Montreal, and goods are then transferred to the Intercolonial Railway for the lower provinces. Now, I live on the main line of the Grand Trunk Railway, and I am convinced that goods shipped at our small way stations west of Toronto are carried to Montreal probably inside of 24 hours; then they are handed over to this new fangled system of the Intercolonial Railway which is going to be of such great benefit to Canada, and those goods cannot be carried from Montreal to the city of Halifax inside of one month. If that is going to be the case all the way through, what in the world is the use of this Government spending millions upon millions for the purpose of improving transportation when you cannot carry a package of 200 pounds from Montreal to Halifax inside of a month? That is a thing that is occurring every day and is troubling the business men of this country to-day. Manufacturers in western Ontario, who are shipping goods to the east, cannot get their goods sent forward after they are shifted from the Grand Trunk Railway to the Intercolonial Railway. The arrangement seems to be that goods sent by the Grand Trunk Railway have to be transferred to the Intercolonial Railway before they are sent forward, and they either lie there in Montreal, or they are sent forward from station to station by some slow means. I know of cases where goods were shipped from the village of Acton, where I live, a manufacturing town having industries varying from $50,000 to $750,000, and those institutions are sending goods forward to the lower provinces. It is very important for the men carrying on business that these goods should be carried promptly. In one instance, goods were shipped from the village of Acton on April the 25th, to Mr. Ross, of Halifax, and they did not reach Mr. Ross until the 22nd of May. That shows the great advantage that we in the province of Ontario are going to get by spending millions of money for the purpose of acquiring the Drummond County Railway for the benefit of a few people in Quebec.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Did the hon. gentleman inquire as to when they were delivered to the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. HENDERSON. They were shipped from Acton, 35 miles west of Toronto, left Acton on the day they were shipped, the 25th of April, and I have no doubt those goods were in Montreal inside of 24 hours, or 36 hours at the latest.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does the hon. gentleman know that?

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know that as a fact, but I know something of the expedition of the Grand Trunk Railway in sending forward any consignment that is given to it, and the delay must of necessity have occurred on this road that is being acquired for the general benefit of Canada, although it takes a month to carry goods from one province to another.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Did you have any experience before the Drummond County Railway was acquired?

Mr. HENDERSON. I never heard these complaints made before. In fact I have shipped goods myself from Acton away down to Cape Breton as the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) can testify, and they reached that far distant point in less than half the time, and in the winter season, too, when the roads were liable to be blockaded.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What goods were they that were shipped when this instance of delay occurred?

Mr. HENDERSON. They were glove manufactures. Goods shipped from the city of London to Mr. Ross, in the city of Halifax, on the 20th April, had not reached Mr. Ross on the 23rd day of May, or three days more than a month. Now, the Grand Trunk Railway carry goods direct from London to Montreal, and these goods are then offered to this Drummond County road, a sort of one-horse road which we are to pay millions of money to purchase for the general benefit of Canada, when we in the west can get no benefit out of it at all. I must protest against it. From Acton a short time ago goods were shipped to Westville in Pictou County, N.S., they were shipped on the 4th of May, and they had not reached Westville on the 2nd day of June, when the consignee was complaining of the wonderful expedition of the Drummond County Railway in getting goods down to the lower provinces. In another instance goods were shipped to Yarmouth in the province of Nova Scotia, though the Intercolonial Railway may not be responsible to the same extent, for they would have to pass over the Intercolonial Railway on to other roads. But the goods shipped from Acton on the 14th of April had not reached their destination in Yarmouth on the 3rd of May. Now these facts show why it is that the road is absolutely of no use to us at all in western Ontario for the purpose of interprovincial trade. We in the province of Ontario are very much opposed indeed to spending a large sum of money to purchase a road that is absolutely useless to the country generally, and is going out to benefit a few speculators only in the province of Quebec, and probably it may be of some benefit to the people of the maritime provinces. Therefore, viewing this scheme from the standpoint of its utter uselessness to the western part of the province, I say that the taxpayers should not be called upon to pay such an enormous sum of money, for the purpose of providing a railway for the people of the province of Quebec. For reasons of this kind, and the general reason that I do not believe in the principle of the Government acquiring railways in this manner unless we are going to adopt a general system of the purchase of railways by the Government, I feel it my duty to vote against this whole scheme.

Mr. FOSTER. Before we go any further, I might ask the right hon. gentleman how late he proposes to sit?

The PRIME MINISTER. We should make some progress first.

Mr. FOSTER. As we do not have to pass section by section, it is difficult to know how much progress is being made. There are a great many sections in the schedule, some of which are important, and which we propose to criticise.

The PRIME MINISTER. We can go on for some time further.

Mr. CLANCY. I have not hitherto taken any part in this discussion, and I am not now going to discuss the general principle of the scheme, because that has been pretty well thrashed out already. I listened with much interest to the statement that was made by the right hon. first Minister in answering the reasonable request made by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), and I listened also with much interest, because I was curious to know what response the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals would make himself. I was astounded, as I am sure every member on that side of the House was astounded, at the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals when he made that speech. His voice reached a high key and he laid especial stress upon the fact that he was in possession of reliable information in respect to the cost of this road. I will venture to say, if that statement had been thrashed out in the inquiry, that since has taken place, hon. members on that side of the House, who rose, one after another, and declared that it was the best bargain that was ever made in Canada, would not have made speeches of that kind because the hon. Minister was risking his reputation by putting himself in such an unenviable position. If these hon. gentlemen had known that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals had proceeded without having any information at all, because he declares that he has no information beyond that derived from the chief engineer of the department, who, he says, has not gone into it very carefully, they would not have approved the scheme so heartily. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals does not believe that there is any information in the possession of the department at this moment beyond mere guess work, because, if the chief engineer had made a careful estimate it seems to me, that these calculations to which he referred afterwards should be in the hands of the Minister, unless he is prepared to jump at conclusions. Take the hon. gentleman's statement here that he merely jumped at the conclusion, or if he did not jump at the conclusion he arrived at a conclusion. It is unfair to hon. members of this House to not have a definite statement of that kind given at this stage, if the hon. gentleman had that information himself. The general scheme has been pretty well thrashed out. The accuracy and worth of that scheme must depend now upon the accuracy of the details. The hon. gentleman pledged himself to this House when he made his statement, to give that information to the House, but he stubbornly refuses to give it to the committee. What is the position of the committee? I think the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who says that we ought to make some progress, knows that there is a proper way of making progress and that is to have thrashed out by this House all the information that he is in possession of. If there is any such information, if it has not been a mere guess, let us wait until we have that information. He cannot fairly ask the committee to pass a single section or to proceed one step further if we have not this information, because, I care not how friendly we may be, I care not how much we may be willing to give our opinions, we should not be expected to assume that everything is correct, because, I fancy, it has been pure assumption. I am sure that hon. gentlemen who have spoken hastily upon that side of the House took it for granted that this information would be forthcoming, but when we have arrived at the time when we are able to apply the crucial test and find out what the facts are, upon which this measure is based, we are unable to obtain the information that we require. Assuming that we divorced this question from party strife, that it were a business transaction, is there an hon. gentleman who would proceed in such a transaction without the information necessary upon which to proceed? The difficulty becomes more grave when we have the hon. Minister declaring that he had this information, that he proceeded on this information and when we find that that information is not now forthcoming. The hon. gentleman said that it is not important that we should have this information, because it is not of sufficient concern. The trouble is that the hon. gentleman thought it of sufficient concern himself and we did not discover until the progress that this measure has made in the House from stage to stage, that there was any information by which a different aspect would be given to the whole scheme. The attempt which has been made to deceive the House has succeeded up to this moment. I listened with great attention to the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, and I say that that hon. gentleman should be possessed of information, in every detail, before he would presume to submit a measure of this kind to the House. Hon. gentlemen who have already made up their minds in favour of this scheme might well, in view of the developments that have taken place, change their minds. So, I think, now, that it would not be an unfair request if we were to say that before we proceed another step we should have all the information which the hon. gentleman himself declares he has, and which would justify any hon. gentleman in this House in supporting a scheme of that kind. I hope this measure will not be pressed, because, I think, it is unfair to press it under the circumstances. The hon. gentlemen by their majority and their staying qualities, may seek to force it, but I would very much deplore it if we are driven by stress of that kind, in a matter of this importance, to a test of our powers of endurance. They may succeed in time, but that cannot justify them, any more than anything else, in refusing our request, which is so reasonable that the right hon. First Minister cannot well refuse it. If the great electorate of the Dominion of Canada sat in the gallery to-night and heard the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, by which, after the whole scheme has been threshed out and after we have entered upon this phase of it, a new question is raised, they would say that we were justified in taking the ground we do. We cannot hope to make progress until we have that information and the only excuse I have for taking part in this debate is that I feel that I and others would be wanting in our duty were we prepared to give assent by our silence in this Chamber to a proceeding of that kind. It is a matter which is so fair in itself and which is so clear a test of the good faith that must accompany a measure of that kind that there is no other course open to us.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) having referred to documents, and based an argument upon them, he is, I submit, bound to lay them on the Table of the House. In "May's Parliamentary Practice," page 321, I find :

A Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the Table. This restraint is similar to that rule of evidence, in courts of law, which prevents counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence. The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested, and when the objection has been made in time, it has been generally acquiesced in. It has also been admitted that a document which has been cited, ought to be laid upon the Table of the House, if it can be done without injury to the public interests.

In Bourinot's "Parliamentary Procedure and Practice," page 409, the same rule is laid down, as follows :—

It has been laid down by the highest authorities that when a Minister of the Crown quotes a public document in the House, and founds upon it an argument or assertion, that document, if called for, ought to be produced. But it is allowable to repeat to the House information which is contained in a private communication. When such private papers are quoted in the House there is no rule requiring them to be laid on the Table. The rule respecting the production of public papers, quoted by a Minister of the Crown, is necessary to give the House the same information he possesses, and enable it to come to a correct conclusion on a question.

I find that the Minister of Railways and Canals has founded an argument to the House, based upon a quotation from, and a reference to, estimates and calculations made by his officers. The language which he used, in answer to the argument addressed to this House by the hon. member from Glengarry, was as follows :—

I can give him an idea of what it will cost, founded not upon my own unaided judgment, but upon the careful estimates and calculations of my officials in the department, made not to-day, not yesterday, but before I was prepared to recommend to my colleagues the adoption of this scheme.

Then the Minister proceeds to state the effect of these calculations, and, among other things, he states that they show that it is going to cost $400,000 to build a bridge across the Richelieu River, and $300,000 to build a bridge across the Yamaska. Under these circumstances, I submit that it is not competent for the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr Blair) to refuse to lay upon the Table of this House the documents to which he has referred, and upon which he has founded his arguments, and which documents are not only relevant to the question now being debated before this committee, but are absolutely necessary in order to enable this committee to determine whether or not the view advanced by my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), or the view advanced by the Minister, is the correct one. As I have said, the matter is relevant, because it directly relates to the question, as to whether or not it is better, in the interests of the country, to pass this Bill adopting this scheme, or whether it is better for the country to adopt the scheme suggested by the hon. member for Glengarry that the Government should build this road from Ste. Rosalie into Montreal and construct their own terminals upon their own land. There can, therefore, be no doubt as to the relevancy of this matter to the question before the House. There can be no doubt that the Minister of Railways and Canals has referred to official documents. There can be no doubt, also, that in the public interest, as well as for the purpose of preserving the correct rule of parliamentary procedure, these documents should be laid upon the Table of the House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) rose to a point of order, but the question he raised can hardly be considered a point of order. My recollection of the statement of the Minister of Railways is, that he conveyed certain information, which he received from his officials, to the House, and he did not pretend to quote from any document. If there was a document, and if it was quoted from, that is a question which should have been raised at the proper time in this House, and there is no point of order in it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I submit that the proper time to raise this question is now, and if the Chairman should rule that the document ought not to be produced, then, of course, the question could be raised before the House by way of appeal. The hon. gentleman will see, if he looks into the reference I made, that this is the way to raise the question, and that in the English practice, if it is thought necessary, an appeal is taken to the Speaker. The Minister of Finance referred to the absence of the word "document" in the speech of the Minister of Railways; but I might cite a case that, even where a document was not referred to but where Sir Robert Peel referred to certain information he had touching the elections, there was quite a spirited debate, in which some of the present leaders of the English House of Commons took part, and they endeavoured to carry out the rule even as to that. There are cases mentioned in which Ministers of the Crown have referred to information of an official character, and the House has pressed that a memorandum of that information be laid on the Table of the House. I have a case here where Lord Robert Cecil raised the question, and the Speaker ruled immediately on it, so that there is nothing in the objection of the Minister of Finance as to its not being a point of order.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What was the document?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Attorney General was asked to lay a paper on the Table of the House, and he was declining, on the ground that it was a private document; but Lord Cecil raised the point, and the Speaker ruled.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He was quoting from a document; but the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) did not quote from a document, but made a general statement on information he received in conversation with an official.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He did not say that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I speak under reserve, but I do not recollect that the Minister of Railways pretended to quote from any particular document, and, even if there were a document, the point of order now taken is, I think, out of place.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is the language used by the Minister of Railways, and I will read it again, lest you, Mr. Chairman, as well as the Minister of Finance, may have forgotten it:

I can give him an idea of what it will cost, founded, not upon my own unaided judgment, but upon the careful estimates and calculations of my officials in the department, made not to-day, not yesterday, but before I was prepared to recommend to my colleagues the adoption of this scheme.

The Minister of Railways has not pretended that that was not committed to writing.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is nothing in that which would lead any one to suppose that it was a report.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is arrogating to himself your functions, Mr. Chairman. I call your attention to the fact that the Minister of Railways does not deny in any way, directly or indirectly, that this was in writing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

Mr. McMULLEN. He has never admitted it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) will permit me for a moment; what the Minister stated is, that these calculations were in gross; but that particular details were not given. This is all the Minister of Railways has contended, yet there his recollection is a little at fault, because he says he was referring, not merely to the lump or bulk sums but to careful estimates and calculations, upon which he was basing his argument.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call your attention to the fact that the Minister of Railways quoted this very evening a document which he held in his hand, declaring that it came from the chief engineer. Whether that is the document containing the careful calculation referred to in his former speech, I am not prepared to say, but it is quite clear that he did quote from some document to-night.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am inclined to think that this is not a case in which I should interfere. The document in question was referred to in a discussion that took place some days ago, and it is a rule which will be admitted by all the members of this House, that a question of order of this kind should be raised at the proper time, that is, at the time at which the document is quoted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He quoted the same document to-night.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I did not hear the hon. gentleman quote the document to-night; perhaps it was when I was absent. But I understand from the hon. member that the quotation of the Minister was from a discussion that took place some days ago, and I do not think, therefore, that it is a case in which I should now interfere.

Mr. WALLACE. But, Mr. Chairman, let me point out this fact, that the Minister having made the statement, we presumed he had laid the document on the Table of the House. We could not know until the next day that he had not done so, and there was then no opportunity to raise the objection. We have to assume that each Minister complies with the well-known rules that govern the British Parliament and ours. But as soon as we discover that the document has not been laid on the Table of the House, we ask for your ruling on the subject.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that you have given your ruling, and I desire to appeal from your ruling to the Speaker. It is a very important point.

The PRIME MINISTER. Make your motion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I move that this question be submitted to the Speaker in the Chair. The appeal to the Speaker is a question of right, and not a question for a motion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the proper way would be to make a motion that I report to the Speaker. I must be instructed to make such a report to the Speaker.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is on the request of the chairman of the committee I make the motion.

The PRIME MINISTER. What is your motion?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. My motion is that an appeal be taken from the decision of the Chair to the Speaker, and that the Speaker be called to the Chair for the purpose of this appeal.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Let the hon. member put the motion in writing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no motion. I claim the right to appeal.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will find in Sir John Bourinot, at page 483 :

If it be found expedient in either House to refer a point of order to the Speaker, a member will move that the chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again that day. When the Speaker has resumed, the Chairman will report that the Committee wishes to be instructed as to the point in question.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Very well ; I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion negatived.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then, there is no appeal from the Chair.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, you have had your appeal.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not think that is a proper proceeding.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

The PRIME MINISTER. The question is decided now.

Mr. BERGERON. Hon. gentlemen cannot stop us in that way. The same thing happened in 1896, during the discussion on the Remedial Bill. Although we had an immense majority, there was an appeal from the Chairman to the Speaker, and the Chairman simply called in the Speaker and reported what had taken place, and there was a vote in the full House. I do not think the right hon. gentleman will advance matters by treating us in that way.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, matters have not been advanced by treating you otherwise.

Mr. BERGERON. That will not mend them. The right hon. gentleman will no doubt remember what happened in 1896.

Mr. FOSTER. The simple question, Mr. Chairman, is this : are we to be allowed the right of appeal simply on the vote of the majority ? The right of appeal is inherent.

The PRIME MINISTER. Suppose the Speaker were in the Chair and you had an appeal from his decision, the House would vote on that. The hon. gentleman has taken his course, he has moved that the committee rise, and the motion has been negatived. There is nothing to do now, but to proceed with the question.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not think the right hon. First Minister should get behind that motion, because the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was forced to make his motion ; it was made at the request of the Chairman. He did not want to take that course. He simply made his appeal to the Speaker, and he has a right to do so. We on this side of the House would be deprived entirely of the right of appeal if we were to be subject to the will of the majority on that side of the House. You might as well wipe out the appeal altogether. It seems to me that when the Chairman insisted on the hon. member for Pictou making a motion that the committee rise and report, the right hon. First Minister should not take advantage of that fact and deprive us of the right of appeal which we have without any motion. That was the practice followed in 1896 when the late Dalton McCarthy used the right of appeal.

The PRIME MINISTER. I want to know if the right hon. gentleman has a right, after what has happened since three o'clock to-day, to appeal to my fairness. I am certainly disposed to facilitate the business of the House, and it is my duty to do so, but when there is a deliberate intent to obstruct the business of the House, it is equally my duty to see that such obstruction is prevented.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has no right to use those words. Nothing which has transpired in this day's sitting, gives him the right to make that assertion.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is a question of order raised because a certain document has not been produced. Eight days ago, when the Speaker was in the Chair, no objection was taken, either on that or the following day, to the non-production of the document, which was then referred to, but it is asked now, when the Speaker is not in the Chair, that the chairman shall rule that the document ought to be produced. If anybody has the right to rule, it is the Speaker and not the chairman of the committee, and when the chairman of the committee has decided very properly that it is not for him to decide the point of order, then there is an appeal from his decision to this House, which is clearly obstruction.

Mr. BERGERON. In the session of 1896, a similar difficulty arose. Mr. McCarthy refused to accept the ruling of the chairman of the committee and proposed to appeal to the House, and he cited that in 1885 it was settled that there was an appeal from the committee to the House. There was then a big majority in the House on the Government side, but on an appeal being taken from the ruling of the acting chairman, the Speaker took the Chair. The acting chairman informed him of what had taken place in committee, and a vote was taken, without debate, the Speaker refusing to allow any debate. Why are we not treated in the same way when we appeal from the chairman as the Opposition were treated in 1896? Are we to be treated in a different way simply because the parties have changed sides? Is this course to be taken by a Government calling itself liberal?

Mr. TAYLOR. The right hon. Prime Minister misled the House when he said that the Minister of Railways made a speech referring to these documents when the Speaker was in the Chair. He made the speech referring to them in committee.

The PRIME MINISTER. When the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) raised the point, he did not refer to what took place to-day, but to what took place eight days ago, when the Speaker was in the Chair.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is an old time rule that in settling these questions regard is always had to the practice of the House. My hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) has referred to what took place in 1896, but I would refer to the session of 1885. The Franchise Bill was then under consideration in committee, and an appeal was taken from the ruling of the chairman of the committee. In that session, as well as in 1896, on a mere formal motion, which is the question put to-night, that the committee rise and report progress, the chairman rose, the Speaker took the Chair, the chairman reported the question that had arisen, the Speaker put the question, the House divided, and again resolved itself into committee, and the committee resumed its work. That is the course pointed out in Bourinot's work:

If a question of order arise in committee, the chairman will decide it himself, unless it be deemed more advisable to refer the matter to the Speaker. Rule 76 provides that a question of order arising in Committee of the Whole shall be decided by the chairman, subject to an appeal to the House, but his order to the committee can only be censured by the House on the Speaker receiving a report thereof.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

It is out of respect to the Speaker that the practice I refer to has been followed, because the Speaker is considered the appellate authority who settles the practices, not only for the House, but the committee, and the chairman of the committee has not the right to prevent the Speaker regulating, if desired by any one in the committee, the point in dispute. According to Bourinot, if it be found expedient to have a point of order decided, any member may move that the chairman of the committee report progress and ask leave to sit again that day. When the Speaker has resumed, the chairman will report that the committee wishes to be instructed as to the point in question. The motion to rise and report progress is merely a formal one on which no debate takes place. The House then proceeds to take the matter into consideration, and the Speaker having been requested to give his opinion, will decide the matter in dispute. We have had an unbroken practice, since 1885 at any rate, that on a request of a member of the committee, an appeal will be taken, the motion is put as a matter of form, that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again, and is carried as a matter of course, and the question referred to the Speaker.

Mr. CLANCY. By what other means can we determine that the majority of the House desire to reverse a reversal of the decision of the chairman of the committee, unless we appeal to the House when the Speaker is in the Chair. No division can take place in committee, but only when the Speaker is in the Chair, and, therefore, I would like to know how it can be determined in committee that there can be no appeal since no division can then take place?

The PRIME MINISTER. I conceive it to be my duty, as far as I can, to instruct the House whenever a point of this kind intervenes. My hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was hasty in moving the adjournment of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. He did not move the adjournment of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. That was the motion of the hon. member. I must say that I have a very vivid recollection of what took place in 1896 and also in 1885. According to the ruling at that time no motion was necessary in a case of this kind. I remember a case in 1896. There was a motion to adjourn and a similar point to this was taken and an appeal was made to the Chair. It was moved also that the committee should adjourn, that is, there were two motions to adjourn. The rule was not interpreted as it was interpreted by my hon. friend from Pictou a moment ago. Even when there is obstruction, gentlemen on the other side have the benefit of the rules of the House, and the rule is that Mr. Chairman leave the Chair, call the Speaker, and the question is put by the Speaker and put without debate.

Mr. INGRAM. I was just going to draw the attention of the House to a later decision than that of 1896. Last session—

The PRIME MINISTER. The debate should not take place now.

Mr. INGRAM. I just wish to call attention to this precedent. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), who occupied the position as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole gave an outrageous decision, and the decision was appealed against and the Speaker was called in. The result was—

Mr. RUSSELL. The Speaker pointed out that it was irregular and that there could be no appeal from the Speaker to the Speaker.

Mr. INGRAM. At any rate, he decided against the hon. member for Kent.

Mr. RUSSELL. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), if he desires to have the Speaker called in, should have called for some action on the part of the House declaring that it is expedient to have the question referred to the Speaker. The procedure he has taken would involve a conflict under the rules between the Speaker and the Chairman of the committee, and there is no parliamentary rule calling for such a conflict. He should have asked the House to call in the Speaker and get his ruling.

Mr. BERGERON. Not at all.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is clear that, as he has asked the Chairman for a ruling and is unwilling to accept that ruling, his appeal is to the House. I refer to rule 76 :

Questions of order arising in Committee of the Whole House shall be decided by the chairman, subjected to an appeal—

Not to the Speaker, as my hon. friend says, but——to the House.

I understand that is exactly what we are doing under my hon. friend's motion.

The committee rose, and the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Brodeur) took the Chair.

Mr. FLINT reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I call your attention to the fact that the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) has no right—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for Yarmouth has no right to act in any official position in this House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Mr. Flint reports from the Committee of the Whole certain resolutions.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I beg to call your attention—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I beg to call your attention to the fact that Mr. Flint did nothing of the kind.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER—and reports a certain question laid before the committee. On motion of Sir (Charles Hibbert Tupper) the committee has risen to have this question decided by the Speaker.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I respectfully say that Mr. Flint did not sit in the committee as Chairman, and made no report to the Speaker in the words you have given.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman has no right—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have a right to protest against an irregular proceeding.

Mr. BERGERON. This is ridiculous, to appeal to the same man.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, the appeal is to the House. The point of order was taken—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I rise to a point of order.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am stating a point of order—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I rise to a point of order, interrupting the Prime Minister, as my right is. I question your right, Sir, to sit in the Chair. There has been an appeal made and the committee has asked the Chairman of the committee to report to the Speaker the decision given by yourself as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and I deny your right at the present moment to occupy the Chair, and claim the right to have the appeal decided with the Speaker in the House of Commons and that without debate.

The PRIME MINISTER. I say, Mr. Speaker has no point of order to decide; the appeal is not to the Speaker but to the House. The Minister of Railways made a speech the other day in which it is stated that he quoted from a document. The Chairman of the committee ruled that he did not understand that the Minister had quoted from a document, but even if he had the point of order should have been taken at the time, and that it was now too late to raise it. The appeal is from that ruling, and that appeal is to the House and not to the Speaker.

Mr. BERGERON. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has no right to do what he is doing now. He knows this is not the procedure. The Chairman of the committee should report to the Speaker himself, not to the Prime Minister or anybody else, and he has not the right to say a word upon it. It is a matter to be dealt with by the Chairman of the Committee reporting to the Speaker himself.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Let Mr. Speaker decide.

Mr. BERGERON. That is not the Mr. Speaker.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He is, under the circumstances.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have been acting as Chairman of the committee, and I understand that I am now acting as Speaker of the House. I was asked by Mr. Speaker to take the Chair in his absence.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will you rule on the question raised by me that you cannot rule on the question, that this matter cannot come before you as you stand, that you yourself were Chairman of the committee and cannot report to yourself?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is the point I have just decided.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). May I address myself to the point of order? The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is astray. This question was threshed out in 1885. The Speaker has nothing to do with it but to take the Chair and put the point of order in the House. It is not a question of what his opinion is; he is not asked for a ruling. He puts the question, and puts it without debate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. My point of order is that the time has not come when the House can decide this point, because there must be a report from you individually to some one occupying the position of Speaker, that it is impossible for you to put this question to the House as you yourself sat as Chairman of the committee, and before the question could be put before the House, you, as Chairman of the committee, must report to some other individual who is the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think the point of order just raised by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is well taken. The Speaker and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole are two persons, but, in the absence of Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Speaker is to take the Chair. And now the Deputy Speaker, who is filling the Chair of the Speaker is acting as Speaker.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I desire to appeal to the House on that ruling. I would not take the responsibility of not appealing.

Mr. BERGERON.

The PRIME MINISTER. We have another appeal.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. My hon. friend will permit me to close my remarks. There is a report made, not by the general Chairman of the committees, but by Mr. Flint, who has been called by the Chairman of the Committees to fill the place of Chairman of the Committees, a power which the Chairman of the Committees has a perfect right to exercise. Now, on the point of order from which appeal has been made to the Speaker, I have only this ruling to make, that the question as to the production of the document under discussion came before this House several days ago, and as the point of order was not taken at the time, I consider that it cannot be taken now.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the House that has to decide it, as in 1885 when the Speaker took the Chair. You a moment ago were Deputy Speaker, you are now the Speaker; but because you transformed yourself in a moment from the Deputy Speaker to Speaker, it does not give you a right as Speaker to decide this question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The members will now be called in to express their opinion.

The members having been called in,

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. In Committee of the Whole the point of order has been raised by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) to the effect that the Minister of Railways and Canals, in his speech delivered on the 1st of June, referred to a certain document prepared by the officers of his department, and the hon. member for Pictou raised the point of order that this document should now be laid on the Table. The Chairman of the Committee being requested to give his ruling on the question, decided that the point of order was not well taken, because, amongst other reasons, it should have been raised on the 1st of June, when reference was made to that document. Appeal has now been taken to this House from that decision. The question is as follows: "That the decision of the Chairman of Committee be confirmed." Those who are in favour of the opinion will please rise.

House divided.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). When about two years ago the country was startled with the announcement that the Government intended to enter into the arrangement that was then broached for the Drummond County Railway extension, it was regarded almost as a jest, not only by the Conservative press, but by the Liberal press. The "Globe" on more than one occasion had announced that the policy of taking the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal would not be judicious legislation. Later on, the Montreal "Witness," which is a very strong Liberal paper, on the 12th of June, 1897, made this remark in connection with the extension of the Intercolonial Railway :

The extension of the Intercolonial Railway seems of doubtful policy, and to create an annual charge of $210,000 a year seems unwise in view of the fact that there is no public demand for such an extension.

So it will be seen that two years ago, when the proposition was first announced, the public were taken with amazement that any Government should entertain such a proposition. I need not review the lengthy discussion which took place two years ago. On that occasion the Bill passed by one of those remarkable majorities in this House, an evidence of which has been displayed tonight, automatic, mechanical or whatever you might like to term it. But happily for the benefit of the country as a whole, there is another assembly in this country which acts as a safety valve and a check on public expenditure. I was trying to hear myself, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. BENNETT. As I was remarking, fortunately for the country, there is a second Chamber, or a Senate, and, when the Senate, in the interest of the country as a whole, saw fit to interpose and summarily throw out the then Bill, the hon. gentlemen were not sufficiently strong in their position to do that which the Government, under all ordinary circumstances, should have done. Here was a strong Government, with a large majority in the House, two years ago, that had based its political future on a certain line of policy; here was a Government, having committed itself to a policy which was endorsed by a large majority in the popular Chamber—although I am pleased to say, that on that occasion there were certain members on that side of the House who could not swallow the pill, and who, therefore, voted against that policy. I trust that on this occasion the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Monet) and the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Angers), both of whom on that occasion placed their votes against the Government, will again so record their votes. It was the right and privilege of the Government to have appealed to the great electorate and see whether the Dominion would endorse the scheme and place on the shoulders of the tax-payers a payment of upwards of $7,000,000. The Government did not see fit to undertake such a grave responsibility, knowing full well that the people would not endorse such a proposition, and so they made the temporary arrangement which has been in force for the past year or two. What has been the result of that arrangement, which has been in force for the past year or two? We know that, in past years, deficits have occurred on the Intercolonial Railway, and that this year a large deficit has occurred, although, when the hon. Minister of Railways took charge of the department, he found that in the year before, instead of there being a deficit, there was a surplus to the credit of this railway. There cannot be a doubt that, if his office were managed at all on ordinary business principles, the Minister would be able to show the House and the country the true position of affairs, and whether or not the deficit that has been caused—and it was a large deficit—was due to the taking over of this Drummond County branch. Be that as it may, there is no doubt that there has been in the past large deficits in this connection. Now, the Government permitted last year to pass without introducing a similar proposition to this. However, there is now a proposition made to Parliament on the same terms as the former proposition, although the payment that is to be made to the Drummond County Railway Company is less by $10,000 than on the former occasion. I was surprised to see this proposition introduced this year, because I had looked forward to a proposition being introduced, on the lines of that announced by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals at Halifax, in January last. I recall to my recollection having read, in the month of January last, a letter published by the Toronto "Globe," over the signature of the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). In that letter, the hon. member referred to the fact that the extension of the Intercolonial into Montreal had proved a miserable failure, and would inevitably prove a miserable failure; and, in proving his contention, he instanced the fact that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals had lately appeared in Halifax and addressed a meeting at the Board of Trade. The hon. junior member for Halifax reported that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals had set forth very good reasons and made a good case as to the failure of the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal. I am not able to use the exact words in the letter, which was a very lengthy epistle, but the most important part of it was that in which the hon. gentleman referred to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. He said, that the hon. Minister had stated in the city of Halifax that, under the present arrangement, nothing but a miserable failure could be brought about. The hon. Minister confined himself to this position on the extension into Montreal: He approaches a consignor over the Grand Trunk Railway who has goods for shipment to the ocean. These goods are brought by the Grand Trunk from western Ontario or from the western provinces. When the Intercolonial people make advances to that Grand Trunk shipper, and ask that he should transfer his freight from the Grand Trunk to the Intercolonial, he is at once met with the statement: We would prefer to carry our carload of freight to Portland, which is a very considerable distance shorter than to take it by way of the Intercolonial Railway and Lévis to St. John. Then, he said, after they meet with failure with the Grand Trunk consignor, they turn to the consignor by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who says: I am not going to transfer my freight from the Canadian Pacific car and have the Intercolonial Railway carry it to St. John. In this connection, it would not be inappropriate to show the distance between these different points, and to show the disadvantage under which the Intercolonial, with its Drummond County connection, will suffer. From Montreal to St. John, by way of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is 480 miles. From Montreal to St. John, by way of the Intercolonial, it is 740 miles, while from Montreal to Portland, by way of the Grand Trunk, it is 297 miles. So that there cannot be very much expected to be carried over the Drummond County extension of the Intercolonial Railway in preference to the Canadian Pacific or the Grand Trunk. What is the result? The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has stated, according to the hon. junior member for Halifax, that this is the dilemma that they are in. There is only one thing, the hon. Minister says, that we can do, and that is to have a line of communication from Montreal to some point on the western Ontario lakes, and he went on to point out, according to this letter, that the Canadian Pacific Railway were moving immense quantities of grain from Owen Sound to Montreal, and that the grain output of Manitoba would be very greatly increased in the future. He then pointed out that the Grand Trunk Railway were moving millions of bushels of grain, and that, if we are to do the business they wished to do, the only way they could do it would be by having a connection with the Parry Sound road, running from Ottawa to Montreal, and from Ottawa back to Parry Sound. When I saw this letter of the hon. member (Mr. Russell) I assumed he was doing a little preliminary tooting for the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair), and that we would see this session, the greater proposition announced by the Government, to purchase the Booth line from Montreal to Parry Sound. We know that the present Government has a habit of introducing schemes of the most startling magnitude, involving huge expenditures, in the dying hours of the session, and so I would not be surprised to see the Government come along with a proposition at the end of the session to purchase the Parry Sound road. There has been a good deal of correspondence in the newspapers on this subject, and as we know the Minister (Mr. Blair), when he puts his hand to the plough, never looks back, I believe that he will carry out his announcement made in Halifax, and spend millions of dollars in acquiring the Booth line. I believe myself that the Minister (Mr. Blair) was right when he pointed out to the Halifax Board of Trade, that the lamentable failure that had overtaken the Intercolonial Railway, even in this year of prosperity, was not his fault, and when he told them that the only way to overcome the deficit on the Intercolonial Railway was to buy out the Booth system, and with a terminus on the waters of Lake Huron, become a competitor with the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railways for the grain trade of the west. I am surprised that the Minister has not yet propounded that scheme to the House. We have had different views on the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. The Montreal "Witness" announced that as a business proposition it would be a mistake, and the "Globe" decried it altogether. First and foremost, the business sentiment of the country, irrespective of political leanings, was averse to this project, which, perhaps, with a decrease in the cost, is the same proposition that was before the House two years ago. The public viewed the matter with suspicion and distrust to such an extent, that when the Bill was rejected by the Senate, the Government was afraid, as was their constitutional duty, to appeal to the public. So, in the case of the Yukon deal, they were also afraid to make an appeal to the electorate, because they knew the country was against them.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Mr. Chairman, I draw attention to the fact that there is not a quorum in the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will have to take the Chair.

And Mr. Deputy Speaker having taken the Chair, he announced that there was a quorum of the House present.

And the House having resumed in committee,

Mr. BENNETT. I have to thank the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), for he has certainly brought me in a larger audience, and I trust it will be equally appreciative of my remarks as the few who did me the honour of listening before attention was called to the fact that there was no quorum. Two years ago the public regarded this proposition with distrust, and the reason, to some extent, was that this gigantic scheme was launched, not under the protecting wing of the Minister of Railways, but under the protection of the Minister of Public Works. There was a chain of circumstances revealed in connection with the Minister of Public Works' interest in this matter which caused the public to regard the Bill with more than ordinary distrust. I need not dwell upon the statements of the Minister (Mr. Tarte), upon the letters which he wrote in the press, or upon his sworn testimony. Suffice it to say, that no two of them agreed, and this was an additional reason for distrust in the public mind. According to the Montreal "Star," this road has been hawked around the country for $400,000.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. BENNETT. Just a moment; I am waiting for the chairman to decide who has the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have as much right to be here as you have.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. BENNETT. I did not ask the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) to lecture me.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. BENNETT. To resume the question why this contract was made, this railway, as was stated by the Montreal "Star," had been offered for $400,000, and I think the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) stated that he had in his possession for some time an option upon it for $500,000. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) stated time and again that parties had approached him when he was Minister of Railways and Canals in reference to the sale of the railway. The debates that were taking place from time to time on this question showed clearly that this Drummond County Railway was not of anything like the value the Government of the day were proposing to give for it. Moreover, it was established that the railway was simply for taking out timber, cordwood and tanbark, and its total receipts were so trifling, compared with its expenditure, that it only showed a cash profit of some $20,000 a year. Yet, in the face of these facts, the Government were proposing to make this enormous expenditure for this railway. Any thoughtful business man would be at once struck with the idea that if this railway could only make a bare pittance from the carrying of lumber, cordwood and tanbark, as the passenger traffic was only trifling, when the forests were depleted, the earnings of the railway would practically cease. Then, it was well-known that Mr. Greenshields, the practical owner of this railway, had become possessed of it at a cost that would bear no comparison with what the Government were paying for it; and from Mr. Greenshields' political position there was at once engendered in the minds of the public a good deal of suspicion and distrust. If the Minister of Railways and Canals had to do with the matter himself, he would have disarmed a great deal of this suspicion; but the fact that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) had been steering the deal from its inception, caused the public to look at it with a more than doubtful eye, for the Minister of Public Works is practically the master of this Administration. We heard him say so in so many words at the opening of the session, when he stated that if he were desired to place his portfolio in the hand of the First Minister, he was ready to do so at any time; but he added that no Government should be too sure of its position, as men had brought about the downfall of Governments—a clear intimation that if the Government turned him out of his portfolio, he would take a hand in turning some other people out of their portfolios. Then, this matter came into the hands of the hon. Minister of Railways, and he had to deal with it. What was the proposition? On the 2nd of February, 1897, Mr. Schreiber was sent down to look over this Drummond County Railway. Fancy a business man proposing to make an expenditure involving some millions of dollars for a railway, going to look at it in the month of February, when there would be three or four feet of snow on the ground. There were other ingredients in the proposition. We find that on the 25th of March the House was called for business, and it was to be expected that on a proposition involving such a large expenditure of money, the Government would have taken its own friends into its confidence; but for reasons best known to themselves, they did not see fit to do so. The day before Parliament met, reference to the dates will show, on the 24th of March, the Order in Council was passed, which authorized the Minister of Railways to go into the bargain. Then the House met, and it was not until the 15th of May that the contract with the Drummond County Railway was signed. If it was a business proposition, and one that the Government would commend to their friends, why this delay in signing the contract? But there were more suspicious circumstances than that. It was not until the 11th of June that the contract was brought down and shown to the House. Here was the House meeting in March, and here was a proposition involving millions of dollars; and the Government allow three or four months to pass before they let their supporters see the contract they are entering into. It was not until the 11th of June, in the dying days of the session, that the contract was brought down. But there were more startling things connected with it than that. When the proposition was first heard by the House on the 11th of June, the Minister of Railways and Canals could not make his own followers toe the mark on the statements he had then received; for we find that on the 14th, the 15th and the 16th of June, he was despatching officials from his department to make reports upon this railway. There was the position of this Bill in 1897, with all these suspicious ingredients incorporated into it, and though it passed by a majority of this House, only two supporters of the Government voting against it, it was summarily rejected by the Senate, and the Government did not dare take the manly course of appealing from the Senate to the people, for the very good reason that they felt they had not popular opinion at their back.

Turn to the arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway. The Grand Trunk Railway had their railway running, and their terminals in the city of Montreal, and their bridge across the St. Lawrence, and it is only as business men that they were prepared to accept the best proposition this Government were prepared to make; and, surely, the representatives of the company would have been very remiss in their duty, had they not accepted this very profitable proposition which the Government made them. So, to-day the Grand Trunk Railway are quite willing to go on with the proposition, as it is now before the country. Placing the two contracts side by side, we find that there has been an improvement, to some extent, on the Drummond County Railway deal, but very little difference in the Grand Trunk Railway deal. The grant of $300,000, taken two years ago, towards the Victoria bridge, was made last year by the House, and there is to be a use of the terminals and the tracks of the Grand Trunk Railway, as agreed upon two years ago. But there has been a saving of $10,000 per mile in the bargain with the Drummond County Railway. It has been estimated that the saving in this respect and by some other arrangements that have been made, will be between $400,000 and $500,000, and even a larger amount; but it is quite evident that the Government were prepared, two years ago, to accept a proposition which, by the lapse of two years, they have bettered by at least $500,000 to $600,000, and perhaps a longer discussion in this House would lead to a better arrangement and a still greater saving.

A great many adverse statements have been made relative to the proposition. It has been argued by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), from the standpoint of a practical contractor, that the Government are not making an advantageous proposition, but that it would rather be to their advantage to undertake the construction of a road themselves; and it has been pointed out that the question of terminals might easily be arranged in Montreal, owing to the fact that the Government are owners of valuable property there, adapted to the purposes of stations. It has also been argued that such a road could be constructed in a line of country well adapted for railway building, that rock cuttings might be avoided, that many bridges are not required, and that, on the whole, the cost would be about that of building a cheap railway on the prairie. Against this proposition the Minister of Railways made a very strong speech, in which he argued that the purchase of the right of way would be very expensive. I fear, however, that he has been rather imposed upon by some person, because that argument has been exploded, and, instead of all these town sites and populous villages through which, he said this suggested railway would have to pass, it has been shown that there is but one town site of any value, and that the thriving, populous villages have dwindled down to cross-road villages, so that, practically, the cost of the right of way would be simply that of ordinary farm lands.

The Minister of Railways further declared that very expensive bridges would be required, and, in proof of this statement, he referred to certain estimates made by his engineers. I, of course, have no local knowledge of the facts, but hon. gentlemen in this House who are conversant with the locality, have given estimates which vary very much from one another, and the result is, that we must be left in the dark until we have placed on the Table these statements and estimates of the hon. gentleman's engineers. I have always considered that the engineers and all officials of this country, who are paid by the people, should give their services for the benefit of the people. As he regards these figures as buttressing and strengthening the position he has taken, it would be better in his own interest to lay the statement of his engineer before the House. There can be no doubt that in no uncertain terms the Minister made the statement that his engineer was possessed of the information as to the estimated cost. There is great diversity of opinion as to the cost of these bridges and as to the nature of the rivers to be crossed. Some hon. gentlemen represent the rivers as shallow, offering natural foundations for the abutments, while others say that the rivers are deep and that the expenditure for bridging would be large. Be that as it may, the Minister has stated that he has estimates of the probable cost, and if the House is to judge of the question, they should have those estimates also. But the hon. Minister of Railways and the Premier say this has nothing to do with the proposition before the committee. We can hardly decide upon the point until we know what the cost will be. It is true, under this arrangement we are to get from the Grand Trunk certain privileges in the city of Montreal, and it is true that we cannot expect to fix the price for that ourselves. But we have engineers in the department and we have a Minister at the head of the department, and if we have placed before the House an estimate of the cost of the alternate lines including the bridges we can better decide whether we should accept the proposition of the Grand Trunk. Another good point which has been well urged by the junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), is that having regard to the large expenditure and the dismal failure of the two years' operation of this road, it would be better not to commit ourselves further but to continue the temporary arrangement. The Minister himself tells us that this scheme is an absurdity on the face of it. He so declared in the city of Halifax. He said that the Government could not but lose money by it, and that the cure for it was the purchase of Mr. Booth's line from Montreal to Parry Sound on the Georgian Bay. Under the present proposed arrangement the Government will be committed to an expenditure of $7,000,000, and the purchase of Mr. Booth's line will run into millions more. You then have a line from Georgian Bay to Montreal to carry the grain coming down the lakes. But you have the Prime Minister declaring that he is giving his best consideration to a proposition to build a canal, which if it is built will carry all the grain from the North-west country, thus damaging the very route which will only be provided at such heavy expense. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals stated that we should have 14 feet of water in the St. Lawrence Canal, and that he trusted there would be a great increase in the grain carrying trade by the St. Lawrence route, that all that was needed was increased facilities for handling this trade at Montreal. And, if the hon. Minister carried out the proposal which, according to a letter written by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) he made, he will have the St. Lawrence canals competing with this line. In view of the possibility of this immense expenditure and its results would it not be better for the Government to think twice before embarking upon it, and instead of committing the country to a contract for 99 years to continue for some time longer the temporary arrangements that they already have. I recollect that when the Minister of Railways and Canals placed this contract on the Table two years ago, some demurrers were made to it, I think, by even gentlemen on that side of the House. It was suggested that some changes should be made. But the Minister declared that the contract was like the laws of the Medes and Persians, you could not change anything in it; it was a question of take it or leave it. When the Bill went over to the Senate, these hon. gentleman got rebuked there by a gentleman that they continually parade before the people of Ontario as one of the financial giants of the country, and as one of the bulwarks of the great Liberal party. Speaking in the Senate, Senator Cox stated that the arrangement was an absurdity on the face of it in respect to the payment of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of 5 per cent on all improvements. More than that, Senator Cox said: What I think should be done with this contract is this: we should sit down at a table as business men and see where we can improve it. That was good advice, I believe. Now, Sir, the advice of Senator Cox two years ago is just as applicable now as it was then. A great deal has been said in respect to this whole question of the Drummond County Railway extension by the Liberal press of the country, who have claimed that the Government were amply vindicated in this matter by the inquiry that was held last year before a committee. Well, Sir, that inquiry was not to determine the question of whether this was a good business proposition, that was not the question discussed at all. The question before the committee was altogether of a different nature, and when these hon. gentlemen or the Liberal press point to the findings of that committee there is not a word in justification of this proposition as a business proposition. The time will come when the people will see, if this bargain is carried out, what their experience will be, and if the experience of the next few years, assuming that the line is to be purchased by the country, and assuming that the line is to be similar to what it has been, then, it will indeed be a sad one. But it will be a sadder one if we are linked irrevocably to a bargain for 99 years, and if the Senate were so strongly justified in the position they took two years ago in vetoing this Bill, it seems to me that these hon. gentlemen surely must be courting defeat in the Senate in acting in that arbitrary manner in which they are acting to-day.

Surely the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals cannot but expect an adverse verdict on the part of that body, because I presume, the Government will assume after their experience of two years ago that the Senate will not take kindly to this proposition. If the Senate does not demand the information that the hon. Minister claims is in the possession of his officials, as strongly as it is now demanded, I will be very much surprised. I regret, at this early hour to have detained the committee to the length to which I have detained it. I should have preferred to have addressed the members of the committee at a more reasonable hour, but since the Prime Minister has announced that, if any hon. gentleman is to open his mouth on this question it must be done at this unseemly hour, I have taken the advantage of the opportunity of expressing my views upon it. I shall vote against the Bill. Since we had this proposition before us two years ago I have addressed a number of meetings in my own constituency, and whenever I referred to this question of this Drummond County extension, I was endorsed, almost as strongly, I was going to say, as I was endorsed for my vote on the Yukon Bill. I will admit that the Yukon Bill is a much more unpopular measure than this. Should I be a candidate again I shall take advantage of the opportunity of discussing this proposition which the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals stated in January last, if the hon. junior member for Halifax correctly reported him in the newspaper, that it would always be as it had been for the past two years, a sinkhole for the money of the people of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have the hon. Minister's explanation as to the basis upon which he came to the conclusion to give $140,000 as rental. There must have been some basis upon which my hon. friend went, and, so far as I am concerned, I have not heard this explained. I think the hon. gentleman will feel it to be a part of his duty to explain to the committee how he came to hit upon the sum of $140,000, or upon what estimate or basis he came to the conclusion that that would be fair rental?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The answer to the hon. gentleman is that $140,000 was not hit upon as he describes it. The amount that was asked by the Grand Trunk Railway Company in the first instance was larger, and as the result of negotiations on this proposition it was reduced, and we ultimately settled on $140,000. At the outset of the negotiations the Grand Trunk had put values upon the several sections of their system which we proposed to lease, and at a certain point of the negotiations the Grand Trunk came down to the amount which we concluded would be a reasonable and fair one to pay for the privileges and rights that we obtained. As I have said, not once, but many times, we recognized that the Grand Trunk were not very far astray in the value which they placed upon the station privileges and terminals in Montreal. I laid before the committee, which investigated this matter, the figures and estimates and papers furnished to me by the Chief Engineer who was interrogated in respect to these figures and the sum which he himself had concluded was a reasonable amount to pay was very close to the amount which the Grand Trunk had decided to accept. When it came to the question of the use of the bridge—

Mr. FOSTER. How much was it proposed to pay for the terminals?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. As I have said, over and over again, we did not agree upon a total amount of $140,000 as the result of any fixed value upon the different portions. The Grand Trunk, as I have already said, more in detail placed a value of $50,000 upon the use of the bridge; they placed a value of $37,500 on the basis of an interest rate of 5 per cent on one-half the value of their lines from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert. I think this statement of the Grand Trunk was submitted to that committee, as will appear by reference to the record, and there was a reduction made from these figures. We might apply that reduction to the bridge, we might apply it to the line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, but we will find that it is not a very material consideration, I should say. The estimate of the officers of the Department of Railways was in excess of that of the Grand Trunk Railway with reference to the bridge. It was close to the sum which the Grand Trunk itself placed upon its terminal value, and they accepted the value which is placed upon the line from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert by the Grand Trunk Railway. The total amounts added together which were proposed by the Grand Trunk Railway were reduced, and whether you apply that reduction to one of these sections or the other, is not material. We fixed $140,000 a year as the gross rental.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) has not given the House the basis on which they fixed the $140,000, and it is not likely that any two men would sit down and canvas a lump sum between them as to what should be paid each year. It could not be done in that way. There must be some attempt at valuation as to the properties, and that is what the House does not know. This committee of the House is entirely independent of the Drummond County Railway Special Committee. This committee is proposing to pass this Act, based upon an agreement, and the Minister has a right to tell us upon what basis he came to the conclusion that $140,000, in all, should be the rental for these three franchises. He says, that these three franchises are not separated; but in his speech he treated them as being separate. I suppose the $140,000 was in some way arrived at by a valuation of these different facilities, and then a percentage of rental fixed upon them. So far as the House is concerned, we have no estimate of that at all, and that we ought to have.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I desire to treat the request of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) with every consideration, but I do not know whether he is serious or not. It would occur to me, that, after all I have said on the subject, he cannot be serious in asking me for a repetition of my statement. I have stated that the officers of the department, the chief engineer more particularly, advised me that the rental which was claimed by the Grand Trunk Railway in respect to the terminals and station privileges, was a reasonable amount, and he stated that under oath.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the basis on which he fixed it? Surely, he did not just sit down and advise that for the terminals you should pay $50,000 or $60,000 a year. No man would do business in that way. I give the Minister himself credit that he would not do so. He, surely, must have some basis of valuation of the privileges he is getting.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). A week ago, I asked the Minister for information as to the proportion which the user of the Intercolonial Railway bears to that of the Grand Trunk Railway. I pointed out then that the material for that information must be in his possession, because for more than a year the Intercolonial Railway has been paying the cost of maintenance on the basis of proportion of user, and returns showing that proportion are made each month. The Minister (Mr. Blair) told me that he would give that information to the House, up to the last day on which a return had been received. I was absent for a couple of days, and it is possible the Minister may have done so, but, in looking over the "Hansard," I cannot see it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I brought down the return which I promised you, and it is in the possession of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the Minister no answer to my question?

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. FOSTER. When a member of this House asks a question, it cannot be disposed of by some one crying out: "Carried." I, for one, will not stand it, and it might as well be stopped now as later. It is simply brutish, and nothing else. These gentlemen will not gain anything by that. I stated here, and I state again, and the right hon. gentleman is bound to accept my statement, that I am not obstructing, but it is my right and I intend to criticise this as long as I think it necessary to criticise it. When the right hon. the Premier accused us, on this side of the House, of obstructing, he accused us of what is not true, and hon. gentlemen will not get far by meeting a demand for information with the cry "Carried."

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It seems to me that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has no cause to get excited. This is a free country, after all, and, even if there are some signs of impatience at three o'clock in the morning, there is no cause to wonder at that. It seems to me that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is protesting in vain, when he says he is not obstructing. Even at this moment, if he will permit me to give him my mind, he is doing nothing else but obstructing. He is asking a question which has been answered over and over again. If he remembers a speech made by the Minister the other day, he will find his answer. I remember very well that, when the Minister (Mr. Blair) explained his policy and the reason why he was asking Parliament to vote that sum of money, he divided the road into three sections. The portion from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, then the privileges of the Grand Trunk Railway bridge and entrance, and then the terminals at Bonaventure. He estimated the road from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert at a certain sum which I now forget; he said, we had a half interest in the road. He then gave his estimate of the bridge, and I remember very well, and my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) cannot have forgotten, that, when the Minister came to deal with the privileges of the terminals at the Bonaventure station, he said he could not value them in money. That is perfectly true. We can hardly estimate the facilities which appertain to Bonaventure station, and if you are to have your stations in the heart of the city of Montreal, at any place where it would be useful, you can hardly estimate its value. We would have to expropriate in the most valuable part of the city, and it would be impossible to do that for four or five or six million dollars. An expenditure of $6,000,000 or even $10,000,000 would not give us in the city of Montreal what we get by this contract. Suppose the road from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert, the bridge and the terminal facilities would cost us $5,000,000, at 3 per cent, you would have to pay as much as a rental of $140,000 amounts to. Let my hon. friend apply his best judgment to this contract; let him take into consideration what we get, the entrance to Montreal, the use of the bridge and the facilities at Montreal, and let him figure if he can what that represents in capital. Why, Sir, at the rate we are paying, we are getting these on the cheapest possible terms. No such contract was ever made at such value to the country. Does the hon. gentleman think that at 3 per cent we could get for $5,000,000 what we are now getting? We could not get them for $10,000,000. It seems to me that in that fact alone the hon. gentleman has an answer.

Mr. FOSTER. What does the hon. gentleman think he gets for the $140,000 paid as rent.

The PRIME MINISTER. We get, in the first place, half the ownership of the railway from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert.

Mr. FOSTER. In 99 years will you have any of that railway at all? Do you get the ownership of a single foot of the railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Then, we will stop paying the $140,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Why do you talk about having the ownership of one-half of all these things, when you do not have them at all? You are simply paying rent.

The PRIME MINISTER. I say we have a joint ownership. The hon. gentleman says we have not because the ownership is terminable. If the hon. gentleman asks the hon. member for Halifax, he will tell him that it is a terminable ownership, but so long as it exists we have the half ownership of the Grand Trunk Railway from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert. The hon. gentleman takes exception to the terms, but I maintain my position just the same. Then, we have the entrance to Montreal by the Victoria bridge, and we have the use of the terminal facilities at Montreal. This is what we get for $140,000 a year.

Mr. FOSTER. Then why does my hon. friend come forward with a certain clause of the agreement by which it is covenanted that he has to pay in proportion to every wheel that turns?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). We pay upon that basis for the keeping up of the track. It is one thing to buy the property, and another thing to maintain and preserve it, to keep it in repair, so that it will be safe in operating. It is one thing to own the road, and another thing to pay for station officers and trackmen. After that we distribute the cost on the basis of the business done, which can only be accurately ascertained on the basis of wheelage. The Grand Trunk pay their proportion. If they are doing 60 per cent or 75 per cent of the business, they pay 60 per cent or 75 per cent of the cost of employees, trackmen, ballasting and repairing of all kinds. That is what that means. I put it to the hon. gentleman whether, after all, the Government is not in a very much better position to be paying rental, representing their interest in the value of the property, rather than to have paid the principal money and have no interest to pay? We can terminate the arrangement if we choose at the expiration of the lease, if conditions are such that it is not desirable to continue it. All we pay is a fair rental for the use of it. We have not expended capital in its acquisition.

Mr. BERGERON. How many trains a day can you run in and out of Bonaventure station?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman, but we can run in and out more trains than are now running or are likely to run for many years to come. There is no limit to our trains. We can run as many as our business calls for. We have as full, ample and complete a user of the bridge and terminals as the Grand Trunk itself.

Mr. BERGERON. Is that specified in the contract?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is sufficiently provided in the contract.

Mr. BERGERON. Suppose that for one reason or another the Government finds that in running the Intercolonial to Montreal the deficit is larger than before, and they find it desirable to discontinue it, would they have to pay the $140,000 a year all the same?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We are not proposing to trifle or play with the thing. We are proposing to continue the operation of the Intercolonial Railway, not to terminate it.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman surely understands what I mean. I understand that the result may be worse in the first year than afterwards; but there is a deficit of over $200,000, and there are many roads running to Montreal. If the deficit should increase, and the Government should come to the conclusion that the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal is detrimental, and decided to stop it, would they be bound to pay the $140,000 a year, or could they stop it at any time they desired?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have no option under the lease to terminate it at our pleasure, nor have the Grand Trunk. It can only be terminated by the consent of both parties. I trust that my hon. friend has not lost sight of the explanations that have been given with reference to the result of last year. He speaks of there being a larger deficit. I have explained to the committee how the deficit of last year arose.

Mr. BERGERON. I know the explanations which the hon. gentleman gave, and I accept them. But we do not know what the future has in store; and if it became desirable to stop these arrangements, I want to know whether we would then have to pay the $140,000 a year. There is no danger about the Grand Trunk Railway not fulfilling their obligations.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is just as much danger of the Grand Trunk Railway desiring to terminate the arrangement as the Government. This is an arrangement mutually advantageous. My hon. friend speaks of the South Shore Railway, as though, in the event of that being constructed, it would operate in some way prejudicially to the Intercolonial Railway under the existing arrangement. I cannot see that. If the South Shore Railway should be built, it will not be operated in competition with the Intercolonial. I do not know where the competition could come in. We have, along the Drummond County line, a business which belongs to that line, and which cannot be captured by the South Shore.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the South Shore not parallel it?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, but a good many miles off. It will parallel it a distance which will not enable it to compete successfully with even the local traffic upon the Intercolonial Railway or the Montreal extension.

Mr. CLANCY. If, on general principles, that Drummond County road is exempt from the competition that takes place on all parallel lines throughout the world, what is there that exempts it from the general law?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If he can point me to a case precisely similar, I will say that there is no reason why such a case would not have exactly the same results. We occupy an exceptional position with respect to this piece of road. We have at the end of the extension at Lévis a long mileage of the Intercolonial Railway, and at the other end the Grand Trunk Railway mileage. Now, a small piece of road that may be run in between St. Lambert on the one hand and the Chaudière on the other, will only be in a position to take up just such business as arises on its own line. It cannot hope to carry any traffic for delivery upon the Intercolonial Railway or at either end, unless it is going to some extreme point beyond, and unless it directly arises locally upon its own road. The extension to Montreal has not been acquired from any point of view as a local road, although I think that the business which we have had to date upon it is not to be despised. But it is not, from the standpoint of local traffic that the policy can be justified. It is because the road becomes a feeder and gives to the Government the control of a larger measure of through business, which otherwise it could never hope to do. Even the Grand Trunk Railway line, going around by Richmond to the Chaudière, is not in competition with the Intercolonial Railway. It does not carry one pound of freight from Montreal to the Chaudière for delivery to the Intercolonial destined to points beyond and on the Intercolonial Railway. It is simply by reason of the arrangement we have entered into that they have gone out of the business of carrying freight from Montreal for delivery on any point of the Intercolonial Railway. We carry it. We not only, under contract with the Grand Trunk Railway, get all the western business, which is destined for points on the Intercolonial Railway at Montreal, but we get all the local business which arises in the city of Montreal, and is intended for points on the Intercolonial Railway. The Grand Trunk Railway cannot carry goods which may be shipped by business men in Montreal by their line and delivered to us at Chaudière or Lévis, because, under their contract, they are excluded from doing that and are bound to deliver to us at Montreal every pound of freight we have control over.

Mr. FOSTER. Was that the stipulation in the first agreement made with the Grand Trunk Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I must confess that the second traffic arrangement, which is an independent document altogether, makes our position somewhat better in that regard than it was in the first instance.

Mr. FOSTER. In how far?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot just define how far at the moment. There was some misunderstanding between us as to what our first contract meant when we began to operate, and as the result of the experience we had, and with the assistance which our temporary traffic manager, Mr. Harris, rendered us, versed as he was in the Intercolonial Railway and all the intricacies of that description of business, we were led to see where we could make ourselves stronger and safer in the interpretation that we were putting upon the original agreement. We have made it abundantly clear, and it is so regarded by the Grand Trunk Railway without dispute, that all the business, no matter on what portion of its western line, which is destined for any point upon the Intercolonial Railway east of the Chaudière, or for any point on our Montreal extension, which is not served directly by the Grand Trunk Railway, belongs to us.

Mr. BERGERON. And their freight must go straight by the Grand Trunk Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It comes to the Intercolonial Railway at Montreal. It is delivered to the Intercolonial Railway at Montreal.

Mr. BERGERON. And the cars are emptied from the one company to the other.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We do not empty cars unless in the case of package goods which require to be taken out. If it is a full carload, we take the Grand Trunk Railway car and take it down. They charge us car mileage, and we bring it back.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this the difference then? In the first agreement the shipper had the control. Such shipments as were made west of Montreal to points east on the Intercolonial Railway, if the shipper indicated that they were to be delivered at Montreal, they were delivered there. But in the second agreement is it not a fact that that has been changed in this way, namely, that whereas the first agreement allowed the Grand Trunk Railway freight which originated with the Grand Trunk Railway, over which it had control, to be delivered at the furthest point, that is at Lévis, the stipulation in the second agreement is that all the freight that they control shall be delivered at Montreal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think that the difference between the two is not so well defined as the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to have the point clear, because I have a purpose in this, and my hon. friend ought to know what the two agreements are.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not the first agreement here, but I have the second.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to inquire how the hon. Minister accounts for the fact that since this arrangement went into operation, the rates of freight for western shippers to points on the Intercolonial Railway are higher than we paid when the Grand Trunk Railway made its own arrangements and negotiated for freights to be delivered at points on the Intercolonial Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman assumes that to be the case.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know it to be the case, because I am a shipper to all these points, and I had a 55 cent rate to all points on the Intercolonial Railway. But this year that is cancelled, and our goods are costing us, because we have to prepay freight at all points, considerably more than under the old arrangement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think there is no increase in the tariff.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know there is.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. Minister say that the people of Canada are getting better freight rates in consequence of carrying through this line from Lévis to Montreal? When the hon. Minister introduced the scheme, the great object he claimed to have in view was—I do not say that I quote his exact words, but I give the substance of them, namely—to make the two sides of the Intercolonial Railway ledger balance. Will the hon. Minister say that the Intercolonial Railway will pay its way instead of having deficit after deficit as has been the case in so many former years of its history? And if so will he go further and say that the freight rates will be lower? If this latter element does not accompany the first, it will not be easy to see how this scheme is in the interest of the country.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is now three o'clock in the morning, and though I cannot say, perhaps, that we have done a good days work, we have done some work. We will commence with the first item at the next sitting of the House. I move that the Committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and the Committee rose and reported.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House adjourns I would ask my hon. friend what he proposes to go on with to-morrow—the same contentious subject?

The PRIME MINISTER. The same non-contentious subject. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) may make it contentious, perhaps.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 3.05 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 7th June, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

W. J. CHRISTIE, INLAND REVENUE OFFICER AT WINNIPEG.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough) moved that the evidence being taken in reference to the papers brought down to the House relating to the case of Mr. W. J. Christie, lately an officer in the Inland Revenue Department of Winnipeg, and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts, be printed day by day for the use of the members of the said committee, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the report of the said committee.

Motion agreed to.

DISALLOWANCE OF STATUTES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). By command of His Excellency, I beg to lay on the Table certain documents relating to the disallowance of certain statutes passed by the legislature of British Columbia, and with the unanimous consent of the House, I beg to move that these papers be printed at once and the rule suspended.

Motion agreed to.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved that Bill (No. 89) relating to the Canada Life Insurance Company be withdrawn, and the fees paid thereon be refunded, less the cost of printing and translation, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the report of the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

Mr. GANONG moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 143) to amend the Weights and Measures Act, as respects the sale of fish. He said: The purpose of this Bill is to make the unit of measurement in the sale of fresh herring and sardines correspond with the unit of sale. It only affects probably the county from which I come, and seems to be an absolute necessity there. These fish are principally sold in the United States markets, and the buyers come to our fishermen to purchase them. The unit of sale in these two kind of fish has been what is known as a hogshead, but there is no unit of measurement for that hogshead; and as any hon. gentleman is aware who knows how these fish are handled at the weirs, it is impossible to measure the fish at the weirs in the hogshead. The hogshead is not used as a package in which the fish are sold, but simply as a standard of sale, and the fishermen have been in the habit of accepting what is known as five barrels to the hogshead, but we have no established size for these barrels, so that every time there is a purchase, difficulty arises as to the quantity the hogshead shall contain. All that this Bill provides is that a hogshead shall be the equivalent of five barrels containing twenty-five gallons each.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). It is very difficult to give an opinion on the measure proposed until it is in print. When it is, I shall submit it to the careful inspection of the officers of the department and see how far it is possible to meet the wishes of my hon. friend. I may say that the purpose of the law, in establishing a department of weights and measures, was to meet, as much as possible, the requirements of the public, and I do not think that in doing so we ought to indulge in too much red tape. Though it appears, at first sight, illogical to be amending all the time the Weights and Measures Act, we must always remember that the object of that law is, as much as possible, to fit the standards of measurement to suit commercial transactions and thus benefit the public in general. On the other hand, we must not be too much disposed to admit changes and thus run the risk of destroying the efforts made hitherto to unify our system. When the measure introduced by my hon. friend is printed, I shall be able, with the permission of the House, to discuss the question with him, and to draw the attention of the House to the advisability or inadvisability of adopting that measure.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

I. C. R.—EXTENSION TO MONTREAL—AMOUNTS ACCRUED TO GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What amount has accrued to the Grand Trunk Railway Company since July 1st, 1898, to date, per month as the Intercolonial Railway's contribution to the cost of maintenance of the Chaudière and Montreal joint sections, including terminal facilities, and what has been paid per month ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The following amounts accrued to the Grand Trunk Railway Company since the 1st of July, 1898, as the Intercolonial Railway's proportion of cost of maintenance of the Chaudière and Montreal joint sections, including terminal facilities :

1898—
July	$2,336 66
August	1,900 74
September	1,888 08
October	1,521 78
November	2,000 08
December	1,071 52
1899—
January	482 45
February	488 30
	$11,689 63

The account for March has been rendered by the Grand Trunk Railway and has been checked in Montreal by the Intercolonial auditor. Accounts for subsequent months not yet received from the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

The payments on this account to the Grand Trunk are as follows. No payments were made in July, August, September, November, December or January :

In October	$8,006 29
February	4,087 92
March	3,702 85
April	3,071 60
May	970 75
Total	$19,839 41

The difference between the two totals, $8,149.78, is payment on account of charges for last fiscal year, which charges had been under investigation.

THE QUEEN vs. COULOMBE.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. What steps has the Government taken to enforce the conviction pronounced in the case of the Queen vs. Coulombe and others by Mr. Justice Chauveau, of Quebec ?

2. What instructions have been given by the Government in the matter, and how have such instructions been carried out ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). No special instructions have been given to enforce the conviction in the Queen and Coulombe case, but the agents of the department have general instructions to collect the amount of all judgments obtained.

CARS FOR THE INTERCOLONIAL.

Mr. BERGERON (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. What company or firm in the United States of America, since July 1st, 1897, have been building cars of any form or description for the Intercolonial Railway of Canada ?

2. Were the contracts given by tender ?

3. If so, to whom were tenders sent, and from whom were they received ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). This question was practically answered the other day. There may be some points, however, in which the question does not correspond, so I will read the answer again. 1. The Wagner Palace

Mr. BLAIR.

Company of Buffalo. 2. Yes, the contracts were given after tenders were invited. 3. The Pullman Company, Smith & Company and the Wagner Company were invited to tender. Before making a contract with the United States manufacturers, the department applied to the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway Companies, Messrs. Crossen & Company, and Messrs. Rhodes, Curry & Company for offers. The two last mentioned firms declined to take their order on the ground that orders they had then from the Intercolonial Railway were all they could fill within the time allowed. The first two mentioned companies would not undertake the work as their shops were overcrowded with their own work.

REPAIRS ON THE LEVIS-STE. FLAVIE DIVISION OF THE INTERCOLONIAL.

Mr. GAUVREAU asked :

Whether the Minister of Railways is aware that certain repairs on the Lévis-Ste. Flavie division of the Intercolonial Railway, instead of being executed at Rivière du Loup, are sent to Moncton, because there are not sufficient tools and hands at Rivière du Loup to execute the said repairs, the shop being taken up with the ordinary work of the road ?

If so, is it the intention of the Minister, notwithstanding the report of Mr. Johngins, to provide additional tools and a larger number of hands in order to retain at Rivière du Loup the work to which the shops there are entitled ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The main workshops of the Intercolonial Railway are at Moncton, and there are supplementary shops at Rivière du Loup and Halifax. Certain work can always be done to better advantage in the larger central shops at Moncton. There is fully as much work being done at the Rivière du Loup shop now, as in previous years, and there is no more work sent to Moncton from the Lévis and St. Flavie division than heretofore. 2. A steam hammer and a lathe have been asked for as additional tools to facilitate work at Rivière du Loup, but it is not the intention at present to employ additional hands at Rivière du Loup.

SALARIES OF EMPLOYEES OF INTERCOLONIAL AT RIVIERE DU LOUP SHOPS.

Mr. GAUVREAU asked :

Is the Minister of Railways aware that the best mechanics, engineers, turners, &c., employed in the shops of the Intercolonial Railway at Rivière du Loup are leaving the service because their pay is not proportioned to their work and their skill, and finding employment in the shops of the Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway at higher wages ?

2. That the Mechanical Superintendent, Alex. Ouellet, has repeatedly urged the Department at Ottawa and at Moncton to raise the wages but that has always met a refusal ?

3. If so, is it the intention of the Minister to grant an increase of pay to the special employees mentioned?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The best mechanics are not leaving the shops at Rivière du Loup; only three machinists have left the Rivière du Loup shops during the last twelve months. It is not known where they went, but it is presumed that they expected to better their condition as men of all classes everywhere endeavour to do. 2. Foreman Ouellette has recommended, from time to time, an increase of wages for some of the men under him in the same way as other foremen make these recommendations from time to time to the mechanical superintendent, and the latter has dealt with Foreman Ouellette's recommendations in the same way as he deals with the others. There are continual applications from all parts of the line for increase of pay, and it is only occasionally that such requests can be granted. 3. It is not intended to make any general raise of pay at Rivière du Loup, as the men are receiving fair wages for the work performed, but each case as it arises will be dealt with on its own merits.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY TIME TABLE.

Mr. GAUVREAU asked :

When will the new summer time table for the Intercolonial Railway go into operation?

Is the Hon. Minister aware that the Lightning Express is not to stop at Trois Pistoles as in past years?

If so, will he issue orders that this central point, one of the most important in Témiscouata, shall enjoy the advantage of the fast trains as in the past?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It is proposed to put the new time table in operation on the 19th of June instant. The through fast express train will stop at Trois Pistoles for passengers, but not for meals.

MACHINERY FOR INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY WORKSHOPS.

Mr. GAUVREAU asked :

Whether the Minister of Railways is aware that Mechanical Superintendent Ouellette of the Intercolonial Railway workshops has applied for a certain number of tools and machines, such as a steam hammer, shapers, &c., and that he has had no reply to his said applications?

If so, is it the intention of the Minister to comply with the said applications?

If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Minister of Railways is aware that Foreman Ouellette applied to the mechanical superintendent for a steam hammer and a lathe. The matter has received consideration, and the decision will be made known at an early day.

STEEL BOXES FOR THE INTERIOR OR INDIAN DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HODGINS (by Mr. Hughes) asked :

Were a number of steel boxes purchased for use of the Interior or Indian Departments during the past year? If so, how many? By whom were they supplied? Were tenders called for by public advertisement, or by letter? If by letter, how many parties were notified? To whom was the order given? Why were not tenders publicly invited?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The goods referred to were purchased by the Public Works Department, and I will have to ask my hon. friend to allow the question to stand over for a couple of days.

SPECIAL FISHERY GUARDIAN TO SUCCEED C. E. BOARDMAN.

Mr. GANONG asked :

Has any appointment been made to fill the position of special fishery guardian in place of the late C. E. Boardman, of Milltown, N.B.? If so, who has been appointed, and by whom recommended?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No appointment has been made to the position held by Mr. Boardman. It is possible that the local fishery overseer may have appointed some one temporarily.

BARTH. BROWN, CAMPOBELLO, N.B.

Mr. GANONG asked :

1. Is Barth. Brown, of Campobello, N.B., at present in the employ of the Department of Fisheries?

2. If not, when was he discharged, and for what reason?

3. Who has been appointed in his place?

4. On whose recommendation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. No. 2. On the 10th of May, 1899, for inefficiency. 3. Charles Savage. 4. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

JAMES GLASS, FISHERY GUARDIAN, CHARLOTTE, N.B.

Mr. GANONG asked :

1. At what date was James Glass appointed special fishery guardian in Charlotte County, N.B.?

2. On whose recommendation was he appointed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. The records show that the employment of James Glass as special fishery guardian was authorized in July, 1889. The Fisheries Departmental files prior to that date were destroyed by the fire of 1897. 2. The then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, on the request of J. D. Chipman.

W. H. TRUEMAN, ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

Has W. H. Trueman, barrister, of St. John, N.B., been appointed to a position in the Department of Railways and Canals ?

If so, what are his duties, and what is his salary ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No.

LONDON LETTER CARRIERS.

Mr. BEATTIE asked :

1. Why are the London letter-carriers compelled to walk while carriers of other cities are granted free transportation on street railways, when only one and one-quarter cents per ride is asked for ?

2. Does the Postmaster General purpose increasing the salaries of the carriers to where they belong, if their increase has not been stopped, or only grant them one year at a time ?

3. Are the letter-carriers to receive their back salaries in a lump sum, which is legally due them ?

4. Why should so many of the men be employed in the service without their appointment, thereby depriving them of their annual holidays ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Beattie) if he could not recast that question so as to make it comply more closely with the rules of the House. I think it is open to objection as containing allegations of fact and also of being argumentative. It is difficult to answer a question of that kind in a fair manner without misunderstanding. If the hon. gentleman could recast the question I would answer it to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER. I see the point taken by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), and would advise the hon. member to recast his question, so as not to make any statements, but only to make inquiries. I desire to repeat my suggestion that hon. members asking questions should always do that. It would much simplify matters.

COMMISSIONS UNDER THE GREAT SEAL.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

When were regulations made, if any, respecting the issue of commissions under the Great Seal, by virtue of chap. 14, 56 Victoria ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). On the 7th September, 1893, an Order in Council was passed, under the provisions of 56 Victoria, chapter 14, regulating the fees to be paid upon commissions. No general Order in Council on the subject of commissions has been passed, under this statute, before or since that date.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

JUDGES AND POLITICS.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

On the 2nd June, instant, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), having made use of the following language :—" I think there is no axiom more accepted than that which says that a judge, when he goes upon the bench, should cut himself clear from all connection with either of the political parties, and that there is nothing more detrimental to the proper administration of justice than that judges, after going on the bench, should enter into bargains with politicians, and say, that at a given time they will come down from the bench and enter into the political arena. I will take occasion to deal with that matter later on, before the end of the session." Who is the judge or judges referred to in such language ? Has any official notice been received from any judge or judges by the Department of Justice intimating his or their intention of retiring, for the purpose above set forth ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). This question is probably not entirely in order ; at the same time, I think it is right that I should take advantage of this opportunity to give my authority for the statement I made. My authority is the Montreal "Daily Star," of Friday, February 10th, from which I make the following extract :—

HISTORY REPEATING ITSELF.

It will be remembered that it became the duty of the "Star" to criticise with severity certain Conservative leaders who during the latter part of his Premiership behaved in a manner that was as ridiculous as it was disgraceful. This was entirely in harmony with our settled policy of freely condemning the acts of any Ministers or Ministries which seemed to us to be contrary to public interest. When Sir Charles Tupper subsequently assumed control of the Government at the request of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, he approached his task with the assurance of ready support in quarters which seemed to guarantee to him, at least, the chance of conferring upon the country a good administration. Some of the best men in public life, judges and other well-placed citizens of the highest honour and ability, promised, in the event of success at the polls, to join his Government. This gave to the prospects of the Conservative party a very bright promise, indeed, of, at any rate, decency and ability of administration when it should come back from the electoral battle.

I presume that the latter part of the question can be best answered by my hon. friends on the other side, as to who these judges were.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I be allowed, by the unanimous consent of the House, to make a remark which seems called for upon the present occasion, and that is, to say, that any statement that I was in communication with, or approached, a single judge in Canada in connection with the formation of my Government, is not true. Not only did I not approach a single judge, but I had no communication, direct or indirect, with any judge, and I did not contemplate under any circumstances that any judge in Canada should form a part of my Government.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I may answer, that I never for one moment pretended to have the hon. gentleman's authority for the statement I made. I had absolutely no authority, except that statement, which I have read, from the "Star."

DAMAGES TO FARM LANDS IN LINDSAY.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. Is the Government aware that Mr. R. J. McLaughlin, of Lindsay, extracted from the farmers around Cameron Lake twenty per cent of the sums paid them for damages to their lands through flooding, such sums being out of the Treasury of the Dominion of Canada, and being over and above all fees for legal work ?

2. What sums have been paid for damages to land from flooding on the shores of Cameron Lake since July 1st, 1896 ?

3. What sums have been paid to Mr. McLaughlin direct, over and above the twenty per cent extracted from the farmers in connection with the Trent Canal ?

4. Were the cheques in payment for the damages above referred to made payable to the farmers interested, or were the twenty per cent extractions deducted by the Government and the cheques given to Mr. McLaughlin ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I think I must ask the hon. gentleman to revise the form of his question.

Mr. HUGHES. No, I shall not.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Then, I will take the opinion of the Speaker as to whether it is put in such a form that it ought to be answered.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would be far more correct to put the question in this form : Did Mr. so and so do this ?

Mr. HUGHES. I know already that he did.

Mr. SPEAKER. Then, the hon. gentleman's statement of fact may not be within the knowledge of the Minister, and that is a very different thing. If the hon. gentleman would ask if that is true, instead of stating it as a fact, his question might not be open to objection.

Mr. HUGHES. I am asking : Is the Government aware that he did this ? I am not asking : Is the Government a party to it ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The point is, that it is stating something as a fact of which the Government may or may not be aware.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I am not aware that such a statement is a fact.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will call your attention to the other parts of this question. The first is : Is the Government aware that Mr. R. J.

McLaughlin, of Lindsay, extracted from the farmers around Cameron Lake 20 per cent? Well, if the hon. gentleman had asked me, whether I was aware of Mr. McLaughlin having received from the farmers anything, I do not think there would be any serious objection to that, because it would not necessarily involve a reflection upon anybody. But to say that he extracted anything from the farmers is exceedingly offensive, and the hon. gentleman could have asked the question without unnecessarily implying a reflection upon anybody. The third and fourth parts are based upon the assumption that what he has alleged is true, and I cannot answer the question, as he puts it, without being called upon to speak of a fact of which I have no knowledge.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the Minister's objection to the general character of the question is well taken. The question should be recast.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask a question in this connection? Supposing a member on this side of the House asked a question, whether the Government was aware that a public officer was away from his duty; would you rule that out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would be better, if another question was to be based upon it, to ask the Government, if such an officer was away from his duty.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the difference? One is a statement of fact, and so is the other.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not my impression.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know whether this question can be debated here; if not, I shall debate it on another occasion.

Mr. SPEAKER. It cannot be debated here.

Mr. HUGHES. Very well, then, I stand to the question.

Before the next Order of the Day was called,

Mr. HUGHES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to call the attention of the House to a little matter in connection with the riding which I have the honour to represent. Upon the shores of Cameron Lake, in my riding, there are a number of farmers whose lands have been flooded. The Liberal candidate in the recent election, Mr. R. J. McLaughlin, whether by connivance with the department or not, I am not aware, went to the farmers and entered into a league with them.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the hon. gentleman going to move a motion?

Mr. HUGHES. I will conclude with a motion. He entered into a league with those farmers that he would get this Government to pay them for the damages to their lands, on condition that they would give him 20 per cent of the amount so received. Now, Sir, Mr. McLaughlin did get the sums paid them. I am not saying the farmers are not entitled to these sums; I know some of the farmers were entitled to more than they got, and some of them did not even get anything. Mr. William Jordan, a good, staunch Conservative, did not get anything, though he claims damages for $700; but he refused to enter into the 20 per cent commission deal. I presume that has something to do with his not having received this sum. Now, I know, for a fact, that Mr. McLaughlin did extract 20 per cent from these farmers, and I know he received it. What I am anxious to know is: Was this Government a party to the extraction? If so, we would be pleased to learn it. Mr. McLaughlin was the Liberal candidate in the recent general election. In addition to that, this gentleman has been paid his legal fees for his connection with the settlement of these claims. He has also taken a very active part in connection with other matters in which the Government is directly interested, and has been charging municipalities and persons for legal fees that any man who professes to act as a politician, invariably would scorn to touch or to charge for. He collected from the farmers and farmers' sons for services that constituted purely political work. I want to know of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), whether the Government is aware that Mr. McLaughlin has taken this 20 per cent from these people; whether the Government paid Mr. McLaughlin this 20 per cent before the cheques fell into the hands of these farmers; whether they made the 20 per cent cheques payable to him, or payable to the farmers, and who endorsed the cheques. I have pleasure in moving that the House do now adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I do not want to speak in harsh terms of the method followed by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) to bring to the attention of the House a matter as to which he may be right or as to which he may be wrong. But certainly I would appeal to the fairness and sense of justice of this House that when members are endeavouring to get information, the least we can expect is that they should conform to the rules of the House. The rules of the House provide that nothing offensive should be put in any question, and that no argument should be put in asking any question that is to be answered. My hon. friend has chosen to violate these rules, according to the ruling of the Chair, in putting his question, and when he was asked to modify his question, so as to bring it within the letter of the rule, he would not do so. Then, the hon. member immediately moved the adjournment of the House in order to bring his grievance before the House. I do not say, I do not know, whether the question is right or whether it is wrong. His statement before the House is that Mr. McLaughlin exacted 20 per cent of all claims he settled, and he says it is true. I am not here to pass judgment, nor has the House any power to pass judgment on Mr. McLaughlin, but I say this to my hon. friend, that Mr. McLaughlin has a right to be presumed innocent until he has been proved guilty, and when the hon. gentleman, standing on the floor of Parliament, not being responsible for what he says, and charges a positive dereliction of duty against a gentleman occupying a position in this country, it is nothing less than an abuse of the privileges of this House. My hon. friend is a member of Parliament. As a member of Parliament, for anything he says, he is shielded from responsibility, so that he can slander a man and the man that is slandered has no redress against him. But my hon. friend, besides being a member of Parliament, is a journalist, the proprietor of a journal, and he owes it to his constituents, in my humble judgment, and he owes it to himself, if the statement which he makes is true, to bring it to the attention of the public. That he can do in his paper, but if he does it in his paper he incurs the responsibility for what he says. If my hon. friend believes that the statement which he makes is true, alleging a positive dereliction of duty against a gentleman occupying a position in Lindsay, it is his duty to acquaint the public with it, but if the hon. gentleman chooses to bring a charge against a man who cannot defend himself upon the floor of this House, I leave the fact simply to the sense of fairness and justice of the members on both sides of this House. We know that everybody here is able to answer for himself, but when an accusation is made against a man who cannot defend himself on the floor of this House, I think it is conduct which must meet with the reprobation of every right-thinking man on the floor of Parliament, whether he be on one side or the other.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I quite agree with a good deal that has fallen from the right hon. Prime Minister on this subject. But, I think, he is mistaken when he says that the privilege which hon. members enjoy in speaking without the responsibility on the floor of this House, that would attend a similar declaration outside of the House, has a power and influence on the utterances of hon. members who may make statements without exposing themselves to the unfortunate consequences of over-stating the case. It is quite true that members of the House of Commons are privileged, but I know that no hon. member of this House can afford to make a statement, under that privilege, which slanders a man who is outside of the House, without losing character and without losing standing as a member of this House. It is a mistake, in my judgment, to suppose that there is any immunity enjoyed by members of this House, if they unjustly slander persons outside, by statements made on the floor, which they are not prepared to justify and maintain either inside or outside of the House. I come to the question under consideration, and I do not hold that the attack is upon the person who is named. I draw a distinction between the first and the latter part of this question :

Is the Government aware that Mr. R. J. McLaughlin, of Lindsay, extracted from the farmers around Cameron Lake twenty per cent of the sums paid them for damages to their lands through flooding, such sums being out of the Treasury of the Dominion of Canada, and being over and above all fees for legal work ?

Is that statement of facts true or is it false ? My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says it is a slander. He says that the hon. member who puts that statement here utters a slander which he ought not to utter under the privilege of a member of the House of Commons.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) is altogether wrong. I was going to raise a point of order. When this question was reached it was ruled out of order by Mr. Speaker, after which the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) moved that the House adjourn. He stated in his argument that Mr. McLaughlin had extracted 20 per cent from the farmers. My observations were not upon the question, but upon the statement made by the hon. member for North Victoria in his argument afterwards.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It does not appear to me that that affects the question now before the House. I do not intend to question your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but what I say is this, that I would be glad if Your Honour would carefully reconsider the matter, look into it dispassionately, and see how far this question can be considered to be out of order. I accept the ruling of the Chair, but the Chair is not infallible, and if the Chair, after deliberate consideration, thinks the ruling it has made might be modified, it can modify it. Such a course is open to it, and I am quite certain that the dignity of the Chair would be increased by such a reconsideration. But I am now assuming that the ruling of the Chair is correct. If this statement is a slander the Government have it in their power to put their finger upon it. They have at once the opportunity of vindicating Mr. McLaughlin and striking down the slander. Why do they not do it ? If Mr. McLaughlin has not done that, all the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) had to do was to say in answer to the question, "No," and it is disposed of. The question is asked of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals whether a certain statement of a course that is alleged be a fact. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says, that is a slanderous statement as regards Mr. McLaughlin. If so, the Government are bound instantly to use their power of saying, that that statement, so far as they are aware, is unfounded. But when the Minister (Mr. Blair) shelters himself under the rule of the House, as stated by the Speaker, from giving an answer, he does all he can to fasten the charge upon Mr. McLaughlin, if there is any charge. If it was in the power of the Minister to deny that statement, he has done Mr. McLaughlin a great wrong by not denying it. As to the subsequent questions, they could be modified if they are found to infringe upon the rules of the House. The rules of this House are intended to control and maintain justice between the two sides of this House, and between the House and parties outside of the House, and it should be the object of us all to maintain these rules inviolate. I hold that the course pursued by the Minister (Mr. Blair) is a most unfortunate one for Mr. McLaughlin, if he is not open to the charge that has been affirmed by a member of this House, who, I am sure from my knowledge of that member, would not make a statement unless he had absolute evidence that would prove it inside or outside of Parliament.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It would scarcely be possible for the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) to state a more unfair and unreasonable proposition in so many words, than he has just now stated to the House. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) would establish it as a doctrine, that all that it is necessary for a member of this House to do in order to force the Government into such action with regard to a question as would leave a reflection behind it, is to put his question in such a form that it would be in direct violation of the rules of the House. I agree with the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) that it is the duty of all members of this House to see that the rules are respected. It would be most lamentable if Mr. Speaker, or if the House, were to encourage a departure from these rules, because they are framed, as the result of years of experience, with a view to the better preservation of order, to the better promotion of public business, and to the engendering of better feeling among the members of this Parliament. When a question is put that is offensive in its application, and not in accordance with the rules of this House, there is only one way in which the order of the House can be maintained, and that is by calling the attention of the gentleman who has put the question in that improper way, courteously, to his departure from the rules of the House. Then, if the gentleman is well disposed, and has no desire to infringe the rules, and no desire to leave an unfavourable impression on our minds, it is quite open to him to yield to the suggestion and alter his question to an unobjectionable form, so that it will bring the information he desires. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) admits that it should be our object to see that these rules are not violated, and he is also obliged to admit under the ruling of the Speaker, that the rules have been violated in this instance. Under those circumstances, it is unworthy of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) to suggest to the House, that it should draw an inference prejudicial to the gentleman whose name is mentioned in the question. It is a monstrous proposition, that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) should give his sanction to the drawing of such an inference from that question. I told the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) that I thought his question was objectionable, and that if he would vary it so that it would not be an infraction of the rules, I should be very glad to answer it immediately. It is still open to the hon. gentleman to adopt that suggestion. I am prepared to answer the question fully, when the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) will put it in such form as will make it in accordance with the rules of the House.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) has put a charge against Mr. McLaughlin in his question, and there is nothing to hinder the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) to take such steps as are necessary to prove that charge. Mr. McLaughlin's name is mentioned in the Auditor General's Report, and why did not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) ask to have Mr. McLaughlin subpoenaed and examined before the Public Accounts Committee. That would be the proper course, and Mr. McLaughlin would have a chance to defend himself. But when you bring the matter up in this form, you are casting a reflection upon Mr. McLaughlin without giving him an opportunity to answer it.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I wish to inquire from the Minister (Mr. Blair) what ruling he is referring to, because I find by the "Hansard" of 1894, page 286, the following question submitted by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin):—

Whether the Government are aware that Mr. Senator Sanford spent a considerable time at Washington in discussions on the subject of the United States tariff, with certain members of the United States Congress?

There is a question on all-fours with the one now placed on the paper.

Mr. FOSTER. It is worse.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is worse and more offensive. The late lamented Sir John Thompson answered that question in a gentlemanly way; very much different from the treatment that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are now receiving, when new rules are established by the ruling of the Chairman, backed up by the Government and the members of the Opposition, who simply say to us: You have to sit there and put up with whatever treatment we like to give you. The late lamented Sir John Thompson answered that question as follows:—

Shortly before this session, Senator Sanford informed me that, for certain reasons of his own, it was very important that he should visit Washington in connection with his own affairs, and, as regards expressing approval, I could not do otherwise than express approval of his intention under the circumstances, although, in connection with business coming before the Senate his presence here would have been desirable. I am not aware how much time the hon. Senator spent in discussing the United States tariff question.

I could go through page after page of "Hansard" and find similar questions answered—

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), but he must remember that this motion of the hon. gentleman from North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), which is quite in order, was not moved for the purpose of appealing from my ruling. There is a prescribed time and form for criticising my ruling, or appealing from it, but this is not the occasion. In fact, the hon. member for North Victoria did not refer to my ruling, but he raised a distinct substantive question as to Mr. McLaughlin's conduct, and that is now fully open for discussion. This is not the proper occasion to criticise the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. member (Mr. Taylor) is answering the Minister of Railways.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Minister of Railways was very general.

Mr. FOSTER. He generally is very general.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) and another hon. gentleman were not quite so much in order as they perhaps should have been. I trust the hon. member (Mr. Taylor) will confine himself to the question raised by the motion.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am now dealing with the Minister of Railways, who attacked the leader of the Opposition for certain remarks which he made and pointed out to him (Sir Charles Tupper) that he was violating the rules of this House. I want to know what rule the Minister of Railways is referring to. I have no reference to the Speaker at all. I am referring to debates that took place in this House in 1894, and questions then submitted by members of the Opposition and answered respectfully by Ministers of that day. I regret to say that questions put by members of the Opposition now the Ministers will answer respectfully if it suits their convenience, but very often they will not answer respectfully.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman clearly understands the point that was raised and is now under discussion. If the Minister of Railways answered something that was raised by the leader of the Opposition, and both were somewhat out of order, that does not justify any other hon. member in going out of order.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want the Minister of Railways and Canals to tell us what rule he is referring to. He has some book in his hand, and he refers to that and says the rules of this House must be observed. I suppose he means that the leader of the Opposition must give notice before making an attack upon him.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member perfectly understands my ruling.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do certainly, and I will bow to it, but I am replying to the Minister of Railways.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have said that two blacks do not make a white, and if the hon. Minister of Railways and the leader of the Opposition were not strictly in order, that does not justify the hon. gentleman in going out of order.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, I want to know if the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals was referring to your ruling.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. TAYLOR. Hon. gentlemen will get some business done when they keep order, and not before. If the hon. Minister of Railways will admit to me and to this House that he was referring to the ruling of the Speaker when he was violating the Speaker's ruling, I will resume my seat; but I understood that he was discussing a ruling of this House, and not the Speaker's ruling at all. If the hon. Minister was not out of order—

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot permit this to go on. The hon. member knows perfectly well that no question was raised by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) as to the ruling of the Speaker or the rule of the House. If that had been raised by him, it would not have been regular. Therefore, the hon. member will please confine himself to the question raised clearly and simply by the hon. member for North Victoria. It does not matter what anybody else has done.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, as I understand the situation, it is that the hon. member for North Victoria moved that the House adjourn in order that he might attack the Minister of Railways and Canals for not having answered a question, and that is the subject now under debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. Most distinctly and positively, that was not the point raised by the hon. member for North Victoria. He raised a question, not as to a Minister answering or not answering a question, but as to the conduct of a certain Mr. McLaughlin.

Mr. HUGHES. And the conduct of the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER. And the conduct of the Government too, with reference to Mr. McLaughlin.

Mr. TAYLOR. And that is what the debate is going on about. I cannot see that I am referring to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, in any respect. I am considering the conduct of this Government in answering questions, as compared with the conduct of the late Government.

Mr. SPEAKER. If that were the question raised by the hon. member for North Victoria it would be perfectly in order for the hon. member to continue his discussion as to the general habit of this Government, or any other Government, in answering questions. But that was not the question before the House, and that is the reason why I wish the hon. member to confine himself to the subject.

Mr. TAYLOR. I certainly will do so, Mr. Speaker, as I have always conformed to the rulings of the Speaker of this House; but my attack is upon the Government for not having answered respectfully questions submitted by members of the Opposition.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, I will take an opportunity of reading a good many of them some other day. In the meantime, I hope that what has been said will be taken by the hon. Ministers now controlling the affairs of this country—unfortunately for the country, in my opinion; and that they will be, at least, respectful to the Opposition while they are here.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simeoe). It is rather to be regretted, for the sake of Mr. McLaughlin, who is personally known to me as a barrister of the town of Lindsay, and who was one of the Liberal candidates in the last election, that this matter should obtain the publicity which it will obtain by the publication in the newspapers to-morrow of the fact the charge has gone without a denial by the Minister on behalf of Mr. McLaughlin. Mr. McLaughlin is personally known to the Minister. I can make that statement as a statement of fact, because on the occasion on which the Minister was in the riding on an inspection of the Trent Valley Canal, Mr. McLaughlin accompanied the party; and it was due to him as a professional man and also as a party man, that the Minister should embrace the earliest opportunity of refuting this slander, if it is a slander. For three days, at all events, the Minister has had information that this question was to be asked; and, involving as it does the reputation and character and standing of Mr. McLaughlin, it was certainly such a question as should have attracted the attention of the Minister. The Minister was quick to endeavour to prevent any answering of the question, and why? Let a reference be made to the question, and what is in it? If it is untrue, the Minister should have desired that publicity should not be given to it. As to the first question, it is an allegation of fact, the statement being made clearly by the hon. member for North Victoria that Mr. McLaughlin did obtain, whether by way of commission or by arrangement made beforehand, a participation in these funds. The third question I need not particularly refer to. As to the fourth question, had the Minister answered it yes or no, it would either have incriminated—

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to point out that the only questions as to Mr. McLaughlin to which he can properly refer are not the questions on the paper, but the questions raised by the hon. member for North Victoria.

Mr. HUGHES. It is the Government I intended to attack.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not saying whether it was the Government or Mr. McLaughlin. That is not my purpose; but I think the hon. member should leave the details of this matter out of the discussion, and confine himself to the questions raised by this motion.

Mr. BENNETT. Then, my mind shall be a blank as to whether there is a question at all; but I shall be aware of this fact, that the hon. member for North Victoria has to-day charged publicly that Mr. McLaughlin went to certain parties who were interested, and, using his position as having the patronage of that riding, succeeded in obtaining their concurrence to his going into an arrangement by which he participated in certain moneys which they received; and I have knowledge of this fact, that if that statement is true, the Minister of Railways and Canals knew whether or not the money had been paid to Mr. McLaughlin, as had been alleged. How could the Minister have repudiated that presumption? He could have stated: "All moneys paid out by my department in this respect are paid by cheque, and I produce the cheques in support of that statement, showing that the moneys were paid direct to the parties and not to Mr. McLaughlin in the first instance." In this case there is no reason in the world why the moneys should not have been paid direct to the parties who had the claim; and if Mr. McLaughlin had any claim against them for having conducted their cases, he should have dealt directly with them. It is alleged that Mr. McLaughlin received those moneys for his political services; and the Minister, knowing for three or four days past that this question was to be asked, could have cleared Mr. McLaughlin conclusively by saying that the cheques were not made payable to him, but directly to the parties interested. And it is unfortunate for Mr. McLaughlin that the hon. Minister did not answer the question directly in the first instance.

Mr. GEORGE McHUGH (South Victoria). I am sorry to have to trouble the House, but, as a constituent of mine, and a very honourable gentleman, is concerned, I hope the House will bear with me for a moment or two. I know Mr. McLaughlin well; he is a very honourable man, and a barrister of our town, and I know that no charge can be successfully proven that he has done anything that could reflect injuriously upon him in this transaction. He may have been, and I suppose was, engaged as solicitor for some of those men who were looking for compensation from the Government; but I venture to say, that, if this thing is sifted to the bottom, neither the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) nor any other man will be able to find that he charged anything more than his legitimate fees as a barrister acting for a client. I have nothing to say to the hon. member for North Victoria for bringing this matter before the House; but, when he seeks to leave the impression that Mr. McLaughlin extracted from his clients more than a legitimate fee, the hon. gentleman puts the matter in a different complexion; and I may say, that, in so doing, he passed a reflection which a worthy and honourable opponent, such as Mr. McLaughlin is, does not merit at his hands. I have nothing to say either to the hon. member for North Victoria or Mr. McLaughlin. They are both constituents of mine, for, although the hon. member for North Victoria represents the other half of that country, yet he lives within a stone's throw of me, and I do think that I have the right here to defend the character of Mr. McLaughlin, when a charge of that kind is made against him, and when I know, from my thorough knowledge of the man, that no such charge can be successfully sustained. I know that Mr. McLaughlin did act for some men along Cameron Lake, who were seeking compensation from the Government, and I know that other solicitors and barristers also acted for other men seeking redress for their drowned lands, but I do not know of any barristers or solicitors acting in these matters charging their clients any more than a reasonable compensation for the work they did. I am not going to interfere, any more than to say, that I protest against any insinuations on the character of Mr. McLaughlin without giving him an opportunity of clearing himself.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). I wish to congratulate my hon. friend on the position he takes in defending one of his constituents, his friend Mr. McLaughlin; but it would have been a great deal more satisfactory to Mr. McLaughlin, if the hon. Minister of Railways had answered in such a way as to exonerate Mr. McLaughlin entirely from the charges brought against him by the hon. member for Victoria. The Minister of Railways said, that he had an answer to the question put by the hon. member for North Victoria, but that he did not want to answer the question, as put, because it was not put according to the rules of this House. My only object in rising is to show that we are acting entirely differently now than this House used to under the late Administration. It appears that we are not under as liberal rules now as when a Conservative Administration was in office. I would like to read just one small question, which was asked in 1894, on the 28th of May.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BERGERON. To show how questions were put then, and how they were answered.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member, I think, was in the House when I ruled just now, that the question before the House was as to the conduct of Mr. McLaughlin, or of the Government in connection with Mr. McLaughlin, and was not a question as to whether the question put should be answered or not. Any hon. member can raise that other point in the proper way at the proper time, but it is not raised now.

Mr. BERGERON. I understand that the hon. member put a question on the paper which the Minister of Railways said he did not want to answer because of the manner in which it was put. Then the Chair decided—and I am not discussing that decision at all—that, in the shape in which the question was put, the Minister of Railways was not bound to answer. A few moments afterwards, the Minister of Railways, having come to the conclusion that it would be a great deal better for Mr. McLaughlin, if he did answer, said he had the answer before him, and was ready to give it, if the question were properly put. But my only object now is to show that a question of a very similar kind was put before and answered. It seems quite clear that we are departing now from what used to be the rule of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. That, of course, is an implication on my ruling, and the hon. gentleman, in the position he occupies in this House, should not be guilty of anything of that kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think it is, because it is quite possible that your ruling, Sir, might be strictly correct, and that a similar ruling might have been given at the time the question to which my hon. friend draws attention, was put, had the point been raised; but my hon. friend is pointing out that, when similar questions were put to the late Administration, no objection was taken.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is a very interesting question, but it is not germane to the point raised by the hon. member for North Victoria. In order to keep ourselves at all within reasonable bounds, we must confine ourselves to the question raised on the motion to adjourn. I may say, that, if hon. gentlemen would look through the questions and answers of this paper, they would find that, in a great many cases, I have been unable to succeed in having carried out what I think is the proper rule of the House, and that is, that controversial questions of fact should not be stated in interrogatories to the Government.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think that the hon. Minister of Railways owes rather an apology to you, Mr. Speaker, for having got you into considerable difficulty in making some very fine rulings. The gentleman who is really the transgressor of the rule laid down by the Chair, this afternoon, is the Minister of Railways, though, no doubt, quite innocently. He went on to discuss the general question of the rules of order, and, by implication of course, he discussed your ruling, after the speech of the hon. member for North Victoria. Had he not discussed the general question of the rules of order, I do not think that Your Honour would have been put to the difficulty you have been put to in deciding the fine points raised.

Mr. SPROUE. If the hon. Minister of Railways were in possession of information which would enable him to explain or contradict the allegations of fact made by the hon. member for North Victoria—and from his remarks I take it for granted that he is in possession of such information—he should have given it to the House. But he would not take the trouble either to deny the allegations or explain them. And he says: I know from my knowledge of the man that he did not do these things, that he did nothing that was wrong. Now, if this gentleman had done nothing wrong, who could tell that fact better or more directly than the Minister of Railways and Canals, who has the information in his possession? And if he does not come to the rescue of his own political friend, one of the Government candidates, what will be the inference drawn by the country? The inference will be that the Minister did not want the facts to be known. In that case, he has done great injustice to his friend, if he is in possession of such information as would relieve Mr. McLaughlin from the suspicion of having done something wrong.

Mr. HUGHES. Perhaps I may be permitted a word in reply to some of the remarks that have dropped from the lips of some hon. members. I must apologize to you, Mr. Speaker, for having got you into this snarl; but your long experience in the Opposition should have taught you that the question I had the honour of putting on the Order paper was tame in comparison with what we of the Conservative party had to submit to for years while we occupied the benches on your right. Nevertheless, had the Minister of Railways and Canals asked me to change any word in the questions, I would have gladly complied with his request. But he did not do so.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. I beg the hon. Minister's pardon.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. To set the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) right, I may tell him what I said. I asked him if he would consent to vary his question so as to substitute a less objectionable word. And the hon. gentleman scarcely gave me a chance to get the words out before starting to his feet and declaring he would do nothing of the kind.

Mr. HUGHES. "Hansard" will bear me out when I say that what the hon. Minister asked me to do was to remodel the question, inasmuch as I had made an assertion of a fact in it. I would not submit to that, and I have been ashamed of the members on this side who have submitted to the impertinence—I will withdraw that expression if it is unparliamentary—to the assurance of the Ministers' rising in their places and, with a lordly air, telling the gentlemen on this side of the House to move for a return or to put the question in some other form—acting as though they were the head of some one-horse principality in Europe instead of the representatives of the people of Canada in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I trust the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) will confine himself within the limits which he himself laid down.

Mr. HUGHES. I will do so, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to give you further trouble. The leader of the Government, with the shrewd tact, with the ability in that particular line of which he is master, thought to draw a herring across the track to divert attention from the facts of the case, by suggesting that I was standing here and saying something that I would not say outside of the House. The hon. gentleman does not know me if he thinks I will say here concerning any man what I would not say outside of the House. There is no question as to the facts in the case; the question is, and what I want to know is, whether the Government is a party to this deal. There is no doubt but that Mr. McLaughlin extracted the 20 per cent, or took it, or held the people up for it—I do not care what term you use. As the person who controls the Government patronage, he held these people up for 20 per cent of their money. It is said here in excuse that this was as legal adviser. Is it likely that a Conservative farmer would employ this man in connection with such a case? This work is done by Government valuers and Government engineers, not by Government lawyers. And, Sir, if the Government is guiltless in the matter, their course was clear. If this man extracted this money from the pockets of these people—or, if that expression is a little too strong for the sensitive nature of the Minister of Railways and Canals, if he suggests any other term, I shall be glad to use it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did make a suggestion.

Mr. HUGHES. If the hon. gentleman had suggested that I should use any other term, I should have bowed to his superior judgment. But I should think, from his long experience, this word would not have been offensive to him. I should have thought it would have passed muster without any hesitation on his part and without bringing the blush to his cheek that I am sorry to see there to-day. This is a simple matter. Is the Government a party to this or not? The hon. member from South Victoria (Mr. McHugh) admits the facts, but he says it was as legal adviser that this gentleman was called in. I say he put himself forward as a representative of the Government in the riding and extracted this money from the people or took it from them. We know that under another Government the license commissioners hold up the hotel men and take commissions from them. We know that in the case of certain appointments under this Government commissions are extracted. What I want to know is whether in the county I have the honour to represent, this Government allows its heelers to practise these methods. If so, I have only to say that they shall not do it with my knowledge without my making known the facts. Our good friend the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), true to his old love, suggests that I should go and look up the Auditor General's Report. I know that the Auditor General's Report does show a considerable amount of pickings for this gentleman as well as others. But the Auditor General's Report is only brought down to the 1st of July, 1898, and considerable time has elapsed since then. I want to know what the pickings have been since that time, and also whether the Government is a party to this commission system or not. If the Government is not a party to it, we shall know where to place the blame. I will not apologize again, Mr. Speaker, for giving you so much worry. I always like to bow to your decisions and to save you all the trouble I can, because there are so many members of the House who are always getting into trouble and bringing in objectionable questions, a fact which I regret exceedingly. I think the Minister of Railways and Canals must see that it is due to himself to get and answer the questions I have placed upon the Order paper.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I shall be glad to do so if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) will strike out the objectionable word in the first section and will eliminate in the third and fourth sections that portion which his own judgment must tell him is not properly there.

MR. HUGHES. I think if I were to comply with the Minister's request I should be doing an injustice to the House and to the country and to parliamentary government.

MR. OSLER. Nearly an hour and a half has been taken up in a discussion which, I think, should have been avoided and would have been avoided if the Minister of Railways and Canals had given a civil answer to a civil question. I am not versed in what is the proper mode of putting a question on the Order paper, but the question as put seems a very simple one, calling for a very simple answer.

MR. SPEAKER. I must call the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Osler) attention to the fact that that was not the point raised by this motion to adjourn.

MR. OSLER. I apologize, Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about the facts as to Mr. McLaughlin, but the impression made on my mind, and the impression that I am sure must be left on the mind of any one who knows of the refusal to answer this question, is that there must be something that the Minister wants to conceal. I cannot otherwise conceive of the Minister causing a waste of an hour and a half of the time of this House in making necessary this discussion, and the impression left upon my mind is that the question is one that he does not want to answer to the satisfaction of the House.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

STRIKE OF THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY TRACKMEN.

MR. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like, in the public interest and in the interest of public safety, to direct the attention of the Government and of the Minister of Railways and Canals to the present strike on the Grand Trunk Railway. To that end I will read a statement that has been made this morning and published in the evening papers in connection with that event:

Mr. H. F. McKenny, of this city, grand secretary of the United Brotherhood of Railway Trackmen, this morning issued the following statement in reference to the strike on the Grand Trunk Railway, which began on May 22nd, and has been in force since, except for a few hours on June 5th. In the course of the circular, Mr. McKenny says:

"During this momentous struggle for fair living wages and humanitarian hours of duty, the men on the Grand Trunk Railway remained true and carefully guarded against any acts of lawlessness or any infringement of the statutory laws of Canada. We believe that they have earned for themselves the respect and admiration of every fair-minded citizen by pursuing this course, and an ultimate victory is now assured; but the trackmen, who, only through long experience have acquired the work they perform, have reached the conclusion that the company is only determined to defeat the union, and is ignoring the prospect of passenger trains becoming derailed, which is likely to occur at any moment, owing to the road being out of condition, while it is not patrolled by the workmen watching for such irregularities.

"Recognizing the great risk that shippers and the travelling public are subjected to, the union submitted a requisition to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, asking that the differences between the company and the men be settled by arbitration. It was promised that the best arrangement possible should be made, but Mr. Wainwright afterwards intimated that the company desired to settle. Messrs. Powell and Taylor, members of Parliament, offered to act as mediators, and accompanied the deputation to Montreal, where Mr. Hays, general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, guaranteed that the grievances of the men would be satisfactorily remedied.

"Believing him to be sincere, the men were prepared to resume work, and the requisition for arbitration was withdrawn.

"On Monday morning, when ready to go to work, they were informed that no employment could be guaranteed them except an application was made, and even if this was done certain of them would be dismissed.

"The company now denies any agreement that all the men should be put to work, and the executive has consequently ordered another strike. We leave it to the people to determine whether we are not justified in perpetuating the struggle against a corporation which by word and action shows itself so unreliable."

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is an instance where the leaders of a body of men seeking to have decent pay and decent hours accorded to them, say that faith has been broken with them by this great corporation. If that is the case, and the men feel that faith has been broken with them, I think that public safety is doubly endangered, and it is now the duty of the Government, and especially of the Minister of Railways and Canals, to interfere on behalf of the people of this country, and compel that great corporation immediately to consider the grievances of the men and to rectify them. The Grand Trunk Railway put forward the defence now that the men are simply a little out of form. The Grand Trunk Railway people send me a message that they do intend to do something for the men, and that they do intend to pay them better wages, but that they object to the form in which the men are moving. Well, that is not a fair way to treat the public or the men. The men are only seeking their rights, and if anything is to be conceded to them it ought to be conceded to them now before the public safety is jeopardized. I hope that not only the Prime Minister, whose name is brought forward in this paper, will make a statement to the country to-day, but that also those members of Parliament whose names have been brought into this discussion, and who I am told allege that the Grand Trunk Railway has broken faith with the men, will also make a statement, and that these statements will have the effect of bringing this dispute to an end and guaranteeing safety to the public in travelling over the lines of this company. I can say from my own observation that last week a very distinguished man in this country, who is a great supporter of the Grand Trunk Railway, and who always travels by that line in coming to Ottawa, thought that it was in the interest of his own safety to abandon the line he has always patronized in the past, and to take the Canadian Pacific Railway. I know there are others who feel in the same way. All these things go to show that the public think there is something wrong with the line, and that there is more or less risk. It is time that the Government should interfere. I may say that only last Saturday when I was travelling from Hamilton to Toronto on a crowded train, when some passengers were on the platform, a signal was made to stop the train by people at a way station who had been left there by some mistake. That signal was taken to mean by the engineer and the conductor that a rail had been removed, and that an accident was likely to happen, and a very worthy young man of the city of Toronto was so frightened at what was taking place between the officers of the train, that he jumped and broke his leg in two places. These are only a few instances of the uneasy feeling that obtains in the country over this strike, and I say it is high time that the Government should interfere and that Parliament should interfere, as it is empowered to do, and bring this strike to an end, and restore public confidence in the Grand Trunk Railway. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am somewhat sorry that my hon. friend did not give me any intimation that he would bring up this question to-day.

Mr. MACLEAN. I only saw the paper just now.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not make any reproach at all to my hon. friend. But I may say that if he had given me any intimation that he was going to bring up this question to-day and ask me to make a statement. I would have been able to bring with me the correspondence which I have upon this subject, and of which I would have been glad to give communication to the House. But in the absence of this correspondence I will state to the House from memory what took place, not only after but before the motion of my hon. friend from Toronto West (Mr. Clarke), who brought up the question the other day. Last week, having read of the strike which has taken place, I communicated with Mr. Wainwright, the Deputy Superintendent of the Grand Trunk Railway, and asked him to put himself in communication with me with regard to the strike that was then taking place. I saw him on Wednesday night, and on Thursday night as well. On the following day I was waited upon by a delegation from the Trackmen's Association, and they placed in my hands the terms which they thought they were entitled to from the Grand Trunk Railway authorities. Of course I promised them that I would exert my best endeavours to promote their views with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I intended to see Mr. Wainwright on that day also, but could not do so. But on the evening of that day, which was Friday, I learned that the same committee had placed themselves in communication with some gentlemen belonging to this House, and I thereupon wired to Mr. Wainwright and asked him if it were true my services would be no longer required. I received an answer from Mr. Wainwright that I was misinformed in some particulars. At the same time I received information that several members of this House had gone to Montreal to interview the Grand Trunk Railway. Therefore, under those circumstances, I sent away by mail the statement which was left in my hands by the committee of trackmen. I sent it to the Grand Trunk, to Mr. Wainwright, with the prayer that he would place it in the hands of Mr. Hays, and I made what recommendation I could as to the prayer of the trackmen, stating at the same time that, if my information turned out to be untrue, if the matter was not settled, I would be happy to resume—I would deem it my duty to resume—the correspondence with the parties concerned. This is the position which, therefore, I took in reference to this matter, and it is all the information I have. It would have been more satisfactory to me, if I could at this moment place on the Table of the House the whole correspondence and read it, so that the House could follow, from day to day, what took place. I have only this word to say, and I have only to repeat what I stated on former occasions, that my sympathies, personally, are strongly with the men who are seeking to better their circumstances on the Grand Trunk Railway. I have nobody to blame in this matter; I do not want to make any reflections against anybody; but, at a certain moment, the matter was taken from my hands, and, therefore, I did not pursue my endeavours any further. If the trackmen again apply to me to have the influence of the Government in their favour, so that this unfortunate strike can be brought to an end, I shall deem it my duty to exercise this influence, so that at the earliest possible moment this unfortunate condition of things may cease.

Mr. GEORGE E. CASEY (West Elgin). Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to these troubles, not only by the press, but by communications from parties living in St. Thomas and other railway centres. I have hitherto said nothing in the House upon this subject, because of the knowledge I had that the matter was occupying the earnest attention of the Government, and that all that could be done, in the way of negotiations, was being done to settle this difficulty. But I cannot allow the matter to go further without saying publicly a few words about it. I feel that this is not merely a question of obtaining rights for the trackmen. Although this is a most serious question, it is not the one with which this Government can, perhaps, directly or officially interfere. It was decided by this House, last year, and in other quarters at various times, that the relations of the employer and employed are within the powers of the provincial governments only. All that can be done, then, between employers and employers on the railways would be what the right hon. Prime Minister has told us he is doing, in offering his friendly services as a negotiator between the parties, and to try and secure as good terms as possible for the striking railway men. But there is another view of it, as to which, I think, the Government is directly concerned, namely, that arising from the fact that the lives and the property of the travelling public are endangered by the present state of affairs. The hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) has called attention to this pointedly. Any man who knows anything of railways, is aware that a very few days of absolute negligence of the track is liable to cause very serious accidents, how serious, we shudder to think. This state of things brings the present situation directly within the official cognizance of the Government. If a railway company does not succeed in obtaining and keeping at work an efficient force of trackmen, there must come a time when that loss concerns those whom the railway company serves. Of course, such a possibility is a very extreme one. It is not to be supposed that a railway company can continue long without a competent staff of trackmen; but the best trackmen they can get are those who know the road, and those who have long been familiar with the different sections of the road, who know exactly where trouble is apt to occur, and how to remedy it. I conclude, putting it briefly, with the hope that the Government will insist upon the railway company taking some means to settle this strike. Arbitration has been proposed; arbitration is a perfectly good method. In a strike in the old country, not many years ago, Lord Rosebery proposed arbitration, and did it successfully. It was carried out as a means of settling that strike, and he obtained thereby great glory for himself and his Government, and great benefit for the public and for the men employed. The Government are in a position to enforce on the company the use of some such means to obtain a settlement, if they cannot secure it by friendly negotiations. I do not think the gravity of the situation can be exaggerated. Every day that this strike continues, and that this road is being operated without the slightest care of the condition of the track, the greatest liability to accident exists.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has stated to the House the course he has taken, as leader of the Government, in connection with this unfortunate condition of affairs, and, in doing so, has dealt with the case from the standpoint of the trackmen. In doing so, he has satisfied the House, I am sure, that, on his part and on the part of the Government, there is every desire to intervene to the fullest possible extent to which the Government has power and has the means of intervening, in order to insure an early settlement of this trouble. But that is only one phase, I freely admit, of this question. The other phase, which concerns the public more particularly, which concerns the travelling public, and which concerns the protection of life and property, has been adverted to by the hon. gentleman who opened this question (Mr. Maclean), and also by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Casey). Upon this phase of the question, perhaps, the House will allow me to make a remark or two as it is a branch of the question which more particularly comes, and properly comes, under the cognizance of the Department of Railways and Canals and of the Minister of that department. Some correspondence, I may say, was placed in my hands during the pendency of the strike, prior to the intervention which took place in the matter by hon. members of this House. Following up that correspondence, I received some explicit statements from two or three quarters, bearing the signatures of a number of people in each locality, stating from their personal knowledge, there was in their opinion good ground to fear that the running of trains had become unsafe, and that as a consequence, life and property were in danger. Let me say here, that it is the duty of us all, both as members of Parliament and as members of the Government, not to unduly exaggerate a situation of this kind. It would be certainly attended with very serious results, if we did exaggerate the condition of things, since it would tend to excite fear and alarm in the public mind. I think that we ought, rather, to be disposed to allay excitement in the public mind than to increase it. These statements which were made to me, were made in a specific way, and I felt, that, being so made, it was my duty to take some action in respect to it. I did take action, although I felt quite assured in my own mind, and I think it is only fair that I should say it here, that there is no interest in the country which the travelling public would have, which is greater than the interest that the Grand Trunk Railway itself would have, to see that it takes no risk in the running of its trains, either to the passengers carried or to the property involved. At the same time, there appeared to be a duty devolving upon me, since the complaints were made in this explicit way. These came to my hands on Saturday last, and I immediately notified the Grand Trunk Railway Company that I had these complaints, that I intended to examine into them, and I asked them to facilitate in every way they could my making this investigation. I employed several engineers, and arranged that they should start out on Monday morning, and I may say that the Grand Trunk Company gave me every assistance in the matter. The engineers had actually, I believe, left home for the purpose of going over the points on the railway line to which they had been detailed, when notice came to me on Monday morning; all the public prints contained a notice that the difficulty was over and the men returned to work, and I therefore recalled the engineers. I have not sent them out since, but it may possibly be well that some such examination of the railway as was then in contemplation should take place. I have not had any information which led me to believe that there was any great urgency in the matter, because, as practical men we know that a railway that has been maintained, that is cared for, and is built of the solidity and strength in every particular of the Grand Trunk Railway, does not become dismantled and does not fall into a dangerous condition very speedily.

Mr. CASEY. Spikes and rails may get loose any time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The spikes and rails might get loose, it is true, but the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, in answering my communication to him, assured me most positively that he had a sufficient number of men going over every section of the line to see that anything that might occur, accidental or otherwise, was being looked after, and that there was every assurance given to the public. I think the House may rest convinced that so far as anything in my power is concerned, looking to the safety and security of the public, I shall not neglect my duty.

Mr. WM. B. IVES (Sherbrooke). I am very happy to notice the decidedly changed tone of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) from that which he assumed on a recent occasion whilst speaking upon the same subject.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Speaking about intervening in the strike was the question that was up before.

Mr. IVES. Intervention by the Government to save the lives of the public if they were in danger, was the question that was being discussed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair), on that occasion, evidently thinking there was no particular reason for his taking any other course, took the position that the Government were entirely powerless, and that there was no course in the world that they could take, no matter what happened. On that occasion, I very modestly suggested that the Railway Act gave the Minister of Railways power to forcibly inspect the road, and if he found it to be unsafe, to do any one of several things. He either might reduce the speed of the trains, he might order that a pilot should precede all passenger trains, and that passenger trains could only be run at a certain rate of speed with a pilot in front; or the Minister might absolutely stop the running of passenger trains altogether. I went further and suggested that the Postmaster General might bring a very strong argument to bear, by withdrawing the mail subsidies, but at that time the Minister of Railways took the ground that there was nothing in the world we could do. It was not ten days after that before he acted under the section of the Act, and arranged for an inspection by engineers, and his engineers, he tells us, had actually started out when it was reported the strike was off, and he recalled them. It is important that the Minister (Mr. Blair) is now at least satisfied that he has power to act. The whole matter is in the hands of the Government. The Grand Trunk Railway, like any other railway in Canada, can, under the Act, be controlled by the Department of Railways and Canals. The responsibility rests where I sought to place it; it rests on the Department of Railways, and if the track does run down, if accidents occur and lives are lost, the Government will have to answer to the country for what they do or fail to do in the matter. The men, it appears, were ready to come back to work and thought the strike was settled; but they have been disappointed, and they now feel, whether rightly or wrongly, that they have been taken in by Mr. Hays and the head officers of the Grand Trunk Railway. They were led to go back to work under a sort of implied promise that their grievances would be redressed, and before they could get back, great pains were taken to inform them that they must return at the old wage, and that the company did not intend to employ those who had been most active in advocating an increase of wages. I say, Sir, that disappointment, and the feeling which naturally results from it, renders the situation more dangerous now than it has been at any previous stage. It was bad enough before; it is infinitely worse now, and the Government will have to watch very closely indeed to see that the public interest is not endangered by this state of things. The trackmen are not capitalists; they are utterly unable to remain without work for any great length of time, they have families to support, and if a compromise is not effected very soon, and if those men are kept out in a semi-starvation condition much longer; it would be a marvel if some malicious interference with the tracks in different parts of the country does not actually take place. The railway company, as the Minister says, will undoubtedly do everything in their power for the safety of the public and their own property, but if the feeling grows sufficiently intense, it will be utterly impossible for the railway company to safeguard the public interest, and then the Government, if they do their duty, must interfere actively and effectively. As a first step, they will have to see that fast trains are not run at all, and that will unquestionably be an effective interference, and it is what the Government will have to do unless the strike is settled.

Mr. ALEX. McNEILL (North Bruce). The question we now have before us is one of the most serious questions to which at the present moment the House can direct its attention. I hope it will be discussed absolutely clear of all party lines, and one reason why I make that statement is that I am going to say a word in disapproval of what the Minister (Mr. Blair) has said, and I wish it to be understood that I do not make that statement with any party bias whatever. I speak of the statement the Minister has made as an individual member of the House, and not as a member of the Government. I regret very much the condition of the mind of the Minister (Mr. Blair) in reference to this question; and I do not think that he realizes the danger that exists at the present time to the lives of the people who are travelling on the Grand Trunk Railway. The principle laid down by the Minister is absolutely unsound. The principle he laid down was that the company was as much interested as any one else in the country with reference to this matter. I do not think so. He said that because the Grand Trunk Company were so much interested, we might be satisfied that they would take care that the track was safe.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said they would have every interest in doing so.

Mr. McNEILL. I quite understand what the hon. gentleman said. That was the basis of his argument, and it was an unsound basis. It proves a great deal too much. If that be true, it is true in regard to every railway. If that be true, all legislation which has been adopted in the mother country, for the purpose of protecting the public against the negligence of railway companies—if I used a harsh word, I would say against the greed of railway companies—is unnecessary. In the mother country, as every hon. member of this House knows, they have been obliged to take this matter up, and say to the railway companies: You must consider something else than merely the profits of your own company; you must consider the public interest and the public safety, and we will not allow you to say that you will stake your profits against the public safety." There is legislation in the mother country regulating the hours of labour on railways—why? Because it is necessary in the interest of public safety that that regulation should obtain. If the argument of the hon. Minister of Railways is correct, that legislation is absolutely unnecessary, because the railways will take care of their own property, and thereby guard the safety of the public. Now, I venture to say that the condition of things on the Grand Trunk Railway system at the present moment is a source of very great danger to the travelling public, and whatever action the Government can take in reference to this matter, they ought to take speedily. There is to my mind a great deal of force in what has been urged by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that the men are now smarting, not only under a sense of not having been treated fairly in the first instance, and not having received, as they ought, living wages, but under the feeling that there has been a breach of faith with them. There may be individuals who are carried away by a sense of injustice at the way they have been treated, and may be impelled to do things which they themselves might perhaps afterwards be the first to regret. The condition of things is, I think, most dangerous, and the Government ought to grapple with it immediately. I should like very much if my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), who I think has had a great deal to do with the negotiations that have been going on, would be good enough to tell the House and the country what those negotiations have been, and whether he considers that there has been a breach of faith, so that the House and the country may know really what the position of this question is. At all events, we know that the men were back at their work or were ready to go back, and now we know that the strike is on again, because they feel that they have not been well treated, and that there has been a breach of faith. I was sorry to hear a few moments ago the statement made by the hon. member for Elgin that this House cannot interfere as between employers and employed on the railways, as this is a provincial question. I cannot believe that that is sound doctrine. If it be a question affecting the public safety, surely this House can interfere.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like the hon. gentleman to say that that remark came from the hon. member from West Elgin (Mr. Casey).

Mr. McNEILL. I said the hon. gentleman who had spoken a few moments ago, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). I do not think the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) has spoken. I think the question of the hours of labour is one which this House should take up and grapple with very promptly. A statement which I will make in reference to a matter which comes within my own knowledge will be of itself sufficient to show that this matter of the hours of labour in connection with railways is altogether on a wrong basis. I know of railway employees who day in and day out during the week, the same gang of men, have to bring in a train within a few minutes of midnight, often at midnight, and who, after that train comes in, have to do the shunting necessary and to put their engine away, and who cannot as a rule go to rest before 1 o'clock in the morning; and these men, day in and day out, have to be ready with their train to start again at 6 o'clock in the morning, having first done the shunting and made all these preparations necessary to take out the train. That is to say, these men have not more than four or five hours of sleep, generally only four hours, day in and day out during the week. This is surely a matter which affects the public safety. At least, it is so regarded in England, where the Board of Trade have interfered, and have induced the railway companies to shorten the hours of labour, when they were as much as 12 hours in the day, in place of 18 or 19 or 19½ hours, as in the case to which I have referred. If that condition of things exists in Canada, it can only exist at the peril of the travelling public. I have been informed on authority which I do not doubt for a moment—and I have mentioned it in this House before—that engineers have been seen asleep on their engines, simply from the fact that they were overworked, and did not get that amount of rest which human nature requires. These men, who have to work some 19 or 19½ hours a day, are being slowly murdered. No constitution can stand that. It is just as if they were taking a certain amount of poison regularly. That simply means death to these men; it means the breaking down of their constitutions, and it is not only on behalf of the men that I speak—and any person who has a spark of humanity in his breast must sympathize with them—but I speak on behalf of the travelling public, whose lives are imperilled by these things. I am not in the habit of expressing my sympathy for strikes. Perhaps a strike may be a necessary evil; it is a great evil, at any rate. But my sympathies have gone out for these unfortunate men as they have never before gone out to any men on strike, either in this or any other country. I do hope the Government will at once take this matter up, and do what they can to put the men in such a position as they ought to be placed in. I believe that if the Government take the matter up energetically, we can very soon have the difficulty settled by arbitration or otherwise.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I quite agree in the statement just made by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), that a more critical time has now arisen in the history of this strike than at any previous date. It looks very much as if the Grand Trunk Railway authorities had acted in bad faith towards those who intervened to try and effect a settlement, and I think it is very unfortunate that any such misunderstanding should have arisen and that matters should be in their present complicated state. I understand the right hon. gentleman to say, a few moments ago, that having found that some hon. members of Parliament were using their good offices, he stepped out. I would like to know whether he had intervened before the members to whom reference has been made.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have said that I interviewed personally Mr. Wainwright on Wednesday and Thursday of last week. On Friday a committee of trackmen called on me and placed in my hands that delegation. I expected to see Mr. Wainwright that afternoon, but did not. I learned on that day that certain members of the House and the trackmen were together and were going to see the railway authorities themselves. I wrote then to Mr. Wainwright, stating: I hear you are now negotiating with the men, so, I presume, my services are no longer necessary.

Mr. WALLACE. The statements made by the right hon. First Minister and by the hon. Minister of Railways, when this matter was brought up before, were of such a character that there was not much encouragement to suppose they were prepared to intervene.

The PRIME MINISTER. At that moment I was negotiating with Mr. Wainwright.

Mr. WALLACE. That was before this time. In fact they said that the time had not arrived and that there was no effective interference which they could make. But the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) pointed to the clause in the Railway Act, which gave the Government ample powers to protect the lives of the public, and that the Postmaster General has also great controlling power over the railways with regard to the carrying of the mails, so that in both these ways the Government could have used effective means to put a pressure on the railways and bring about a settlement.

But it appears now that two things have been done. While the men were requested to get back to work, on account of their interview with the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), and the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) had with the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and while these gentlemen supposed they had made a settlement that would be satisfactory it is now found that the Grand Trunk Railway are making a selection. It is not that the men are to go back to work, but these men may make application to be taken back, which is quite a different thing, signifying that the Grand Trunk Railway Company is taking this opportunity of making a complete dismissal of all their section and road men, and then selecting those whom they will require. They are adopting a wholesale weeding out process, under the cover of this strike.

Another feature that is of interest to the general public is the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway Company are singling out men who took an active part in the strike, particularly the section foremen, and that these men are deprived of their employment in large numbers and cannot get the jobs they had before. If that is the case, if these members who tried to effect a satisfactory settlement, have been deceived, then the case becomes more serious, the question will be more embittered, and the critical position worse to-day than it was in the earlier stages of the strike.

The public are looking at this matter with a good deal of interest. In the first place, considering the enormous franchises given to railway companies, the great advantages given them, we are bound to see that every effort towards absolute safety that can be devised will be used by them to protect the travelling public and their employees. If eighteen hundred sectionmen are out of employ, that is of greater consequence than if eighteen hundred conductors and engineers and firemen struck, because in the latter case, the trains could not run and the business of the country would be impeded, which would be unsatisfactory, of course, but would not be dangerous to human life. But here we have the engineers and conductors running the trains, but we have not the roadbed and the bridges kept in that order in which it should be kept, by inspection from day to day: and more particularly at this season of the year, when we have had a great deal of rain and there is danger of slides and floods, is this inspection required. Most of the accidents that have occurred in that respect in past years have occurred about this time of the year. We are now without that protection.

Then, with regard to the question as to whether these men have been used well or not, a railway man the other day gave me some particulars. He said that at the town of Meaford, these sectionmen had to take a train at 5.30 in the morning and go to Collingwood, where they were employed during the whole winter, putting up buildings and doing other work. They worked at Collingwood all day and returned by train, reaching Meaford at 9.40 at night, and for all that time they got one day's pay, 97 cents. They were not allowed any living allowance while away, so that these men have pretty hard times, going away in the winter mornings at 5.30 a.m., and returning to their homes at 9.40 p.m., and doing that day after day the whole winter long for 97 cents a day. That being the case and times having improved, these men had a fairly good ground for asking an increase, more especially as the other great railway company, the Canadian Pacific Railway, is giving higher wages for the same kind of work. They went to the company in the manner prescribed by the railway company dignitaries themselves; they laid their complaints before the lower grade of officers, and the answer was given that nothing could be done. They then asked to appeal to the highest authority, Mr. Hays, and Mr. Hays refused to see them. If that is the case, there was nothing left for them to do but strike. That is the way it appears from the information we have from the public press. So, a large measure of sympathy goes out to these railway men from the public because of the hard treatment they receive from the railway companies, and because, when their grievances were brought in proper form before the railway authorities, they were refused that consideration and hearing which every man is entitled to, I do not care what his occupation may be or who his employer may be. So, I hope that the First Minister will be able, notwithstanding that he told us that he found others, and that he retired, to find effective means to act with the authority and power which his position carries with it. I am sure he can act effectively, if he will, in settling the differences between the Grand Trunk Railway authorities and its employees.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). Mr. Speaker, as one or two of the members of the House who have spoken, have expressed a desire, in which many members have joined, that I should make a statement of what took place with reference to the arrangement with Mr. Hays, I shall do so as briefly as possible, and shall confine my remarks as largely as possible to the letters and telegrams I have in my possession.

During the afternoon of Friday last, Mr. Wainwright had some negotiations with Mr. Taylor, the representative of South Leeds—or, probably, it would be better to say, that Mr. Wainwright had an interview with Mr. Taylor. I came along just as the conversation was about ending. The conversation was in regard to a settlement of the differences between the Grand Trunk Railway and the trackmen, and the proposition that was being discussed was, that what I will call a modus vivendi should be established during ten days, during which the strike should be suspended, and that during that time a settlement should be made between the workmen and the authorities of the Grand Trunk, and that the trackmen would be represented by Mr. Taylor and some other member of Parliament. As, during the year 1896, I had in hand the case of the trackmen on the Intercolonial Railway, and had agitated an increase of pay for them, Mr. Taylor asked me, if I would go with him and see the gentlemen who were members of the Grand Lodge of the Trackmen's Union, in the city of Ottawa. Mr. Taylor succeeded in getting these gentlemen together, and they said, that they had no authority to accept any proposition, that the gentlemen with authority in the matter were the officers of the union in the city of Montreal. They expressed their opinion, however, quite favourably to the proposition, and, inasmuch as I had acted for them before, they requested that I should go to Montreal, in company with Mr. Taylor, and see those gentlemen of the order who had authority to treat. Consequently, Mr. Wainwright, Mr. Taylor and myself went to Montreal the next morning. Immediately on our arrival in Montreal, we interviewed the gentlemen who had authority to speak for the order. They said, that the best thing to do was to see what Mr. Hays was willing to do for them, and, in accordance with their suggestion, we went over to see Mr. Hays. I shall say very little concerning the interview with Mr. Hays, and nothing more than is necessary to the proposition I am going to state. Mr. Hays took this position, firmly and distinctly—that he would not treat with the men, so long as they were strikers, and would make no promise whatever to them until they had returned to their employment, except that he would be willing to meet Mr. Taylor and myself, or any other two members of Parliament immediately after the men's return to work, at whatever place and at whatever time an appointment was made for, and he made the rather peculiar statement, that, if it was necessary in order to keep his appointment, he would walk either to Gananoque or to Ottawa. He would not vary from that or promise anything further than that. We returned and saw the men. There were numbers of rumours in circulation as to there being what we might call a slump of the trackmen, and that many were returning to work, and also that the railway authorities had succeeded in getting a number of men to take the places of those who had gone on strike. After some conversation with the trackmen, in which I gave expression to my opinion that, probably, if they did rely upon Mr. Hays, the best thing to do under the circumstances was to accept his proposition. But I told them that, before accepting it, inasmuch as Mr. Hays's proposition was so utterly at variance with, and fell so far short of, the claims put forward by the trackmen, when they went on strike, they should communicate by telegram with the subordinate lodges, and get their assent before they accepted Mr. Hays's proposition. I then left for Ottawa, which was just as the trackmen's representatives in the city of Montreal proceeded to interview the heads of the order, known as the Order of Engineers and Firemen. I know nothing, except by hearsay, of what took place between these people, but I am informed that the trackmen were strongly advised by the representatives of the other order to accept Mr. Hays's proposition, and the advice was taken. Accordingly, Mr. Taylor, who had remained in Montreal, about seven o'clock sent Mr. Hays a note, which I will give verbatim, as nearly as Mr. Taylor can remember it:

C. M. Hays, Esq., Manager G.T.R.

Telegrams are now being sent to all the men to go back to work at once.

(Sgd.) GEO. TAYLOR.

To that message Mr. Hays made no reply whatever. He did not complain that it was not in accordance to the terms of his proposition. I might say, there is no possibility of there being any error on my part as to the proposition being to take back all the men who had gone on strike. In fact, he requested Mr. Taylor and myself to advise them to go back to work. On my return to Ottawa, I was somewhat surprised, after the advice I had given, to be assured that Mr. Hays's proposition had been accepted without communication with the men or officers of the subordinate divisions of the union. The following morning, that is, Monday morning, there was placed in my hands the following despatch, addressed to W. Pole, who was the head of the order, at St. James Hotel, Montreal:

Have received orders from roadmaster that any trackmen who were not on duty Saturday, June 3rd, will not be permitted to resume work without first making an application and being accepted by me for re-employment. Please wire quick.

For reasons that will be patent to you, in view of the difficulty between the subordinate officers and the company I shall not give the name of the gentleman who signed the telegram. To that telegram I replied by a telegram to Mr. Hays. My impression was, from the date June 3rd being mentioned, that Mr. Hays or some officer of the company had issued an order that no one who did not report for work before June 3rd, would obtain employment afterwards, and I imagined that this rule stood in the way of the subordinate officers along the line taking the men back. With that impression I sent the following telegram :—

June 5th, 1899.

Charles M. Hays, Manager G.T.R., Montreal.

Have been advised foremen at Bridgebury refused to let trackmen go to work. Please arrange.

(Sgd.) H. A. POWELL.

I have practically given away the name of the man, I cannot recall that. Then after I had sent that telegram another telegram was placed in my hands, addressed to the executive of the order at 193 Sparks Chambers, Ottawa :

Foreman refuses to employ men not working on June 3rd. Answer.

To that I replied by the following telegram to Mr. Hays :—

Charles M. Hays, Manager G.T.R., Montreal.

Further advices state trackmen on system generally who reported for duty are being refused employment, except on conditions. Can't you remove difficulties at once ?

(Sgd.) H. A. POWELL.

To that despatch I received a telegram in reply :

Montreal, June 5, 1899.

Your messages received. You will recall I was particular to have it understood by Mr. Taylor and yourself that I made no promises of any character whatever in connection with the trackmen returning to work. We are re-employing, as rapidly as their applications can be considered, such of the old men as we have work for and whose conduct during the recent strike was not objectionable. You are misinformed about trackmen being refused employment under any other circumstances.

(Sgd.) CHARLES M. HAYS.

To that I replied : .

Charles M. Hays, Manager G.T.R., Montreal.

Your telegram received. You made no promise other than to enter into negotiations concerning grievances if strikers returned to work. This applied to all the strikers, and not a part of them, as you know. Your course, if persisted in, will render the situation again critical.

I then wrote a letter to Mr. Hays, which is as follows :—

Ottawa, June 5, 1899.

Chas. M. Hays, Esq., Manager G.T.R., Montreal, Que.

Dear Sir,—I received your telegram this p.m., and wired reply, of which doubtless you are now in receipt. The information I received is that you are not taking the men back as a matter of course in pursuance of our understanding. As Mr. Taylor and myself informed you, we appeared on behalf of the trackmen, being asked by the officers of the association to interview you, and as you expressed the desire to have the men back, requesting us to advise them to go back, it is difficult to conceive how any construction could be placed upon your remarks which would limit them to a portion of the men only. Such an important qualification should have been expressly made. You certainly stated clearly and distinctly that it would be impolitic for you to make any promise to the men whatever until they had returned to work, and you declined to make any other promise than this : That as soon as the men had returned you would negotiate concerning their grievances in a fair and friendly manner. Inasmuch as you gave no expression to any idea you had in your mind as to the exercising your discretion in taking back the men, I suggested, and I trust not in vain, the desirability of acting upon the views which both Mr. Taylor and myself entertained, and which we communicated to the committee. Of course, I do not suggest that you take back any who have been guilty of crime by injuring the property of the company. It would really be too bad if a matter which has come so near solution should be reopened for dispute and agitation.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) H. A. POWELL.

Mr. Taylor returned in the evening to Gannanoke, and on his arrival at Ottawa on the evening of Monday I showed him the telegraphic communications that had passed between Mr. Hays and myself. Thereupon he sent Mr. Hays a telegram, of which the following is a copy :—

Chas. M. Hays, Manager G.T.R.

Just arrived here. Have seen messages that passed between Mr. Powell and yourself. Saw several gangs of sectionmen on my way down. They all started to work this morning, but roadmaster called them off until they signed new applications, and I hear instructions are that only part of the men are to be taken back. This is contrary to our understanding, and if you carry this into effect I fear the situation will be worse than it was before. I strongly advise you to take all on except violators of the criminal law, and everything will go smoothly.

(Sgd.) GEO. TAYLOR.

I received to-day from Mr. Hays a letter answering both my letter and Mr. Taylor's telegram. You will notice that my communication is solely connected with the proposition that passed between us. The following is the letter from Mr. Hays, which was written yesterday :—

Montreal, June 6th, 1899.

Hon. H. A. Powell, M.P., Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—Your telegrams as well as letter of June 5th, relative to the trackmen, duly received, and both are based on a misapprehension as to the state of affairs existing.

The day following that on which the trackmen quit work I had notice issued to them that all who did not return within 24 hours would be considered as having voluntarily left the service of the company, and that we should reserve the privilege of dealing with them thereafter as we saw fit. During the period in which they were on strike we engaged quite a large number of men to take their places. There were at Kingston, Actonvale and one or two other points on the line, acts of violence engaged in by the striking trackmen or their sympathizers, instigated by the trackmen, which were only quieted by the action of the officers of the law. When the men, upon the advice of their leaders, after your conference with them, abandoned the strike and made application for their places we could not, as you will well appreciate, treat them on any other basis than that of new men presenting themselves for employment. We could not, with justice to the men who had come to us when their services were needed, dispense with those who were satisfactory, neither could we be expected to give re-employment to men who had been guilty of acts of violence themselves, or of instigating others thereto. With these last two exceptions—and they are not numerous—we are putting the men back to work as rapidly as their applications can be considered. If it should develop that in the pursuit of this policy there has been an injustice done in any specific instance, I shall be glad to give it my personal consideration upon it being brought to my attention.

As Mr. Taylor wired me to much the same effect as yourself, perhaps you will kindly hand this letter to him for his perusal also.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) CHAS. M. HAYS,
General Manager.

I may say that the statement in that letter that a notice had been issued had never come to my knowledge. It had never been mentioned between us that an exception was made of any man or class of men whatever; although, of course, there would be an implied understanding that they were taking back the strikers and not criminals, men who had come within the range of the criminal law.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell), if he understood that there was any order issued on Saturday, the 3rd of June, that the men must resume work within twelve hours?

Mr. POWELL. No; I know or heard nothing of any order being issued as to returning to the work at any time, or on the 3rd of June. I simply imagined that probably that might have occurred. It was simply an inference from the statement in the telegram.

Mr. INGRAM. Did not the general manager know anything of that?

Mr. POWELL. I do not know. So far this was the conclusion, that the men were to go back. There was no qualification in any way. The men were to go back, and Mr. Hays made no promise whatever, except that if they were to go back, he then would immediately treat with Mr. Taylor, or myself, or any other members of Parliament in respect to the grievances that the men had. He advised us that we should advise the men to go back. I may say that since then these gentlemen, the grand officers of the union in Ottawa, applied to me and asked me what it meant. Mr. Lowe came to Ottawa, and I told him plainly that there was no question about the agreement being to take all back. Had I the slightest idea that they would have accepted Mr. Hays' proposition without notifying the subordinate lodges I would have stayed in Montreal, and I would have got the arrangement in black and white if it could have been got in writing. But my coming to Ottawa prevented that being done, if it could have been done. I was told by the head of the order that the committee had issued orders to renew the strike, and had called the men out. This was on the night of Monday, the 5th of this month, and that would take effect yesterday morning. I do not know the state of affairs at the present time, although, last night, I was informed by one of the gentlemen of the union that the men, quite generally along the line, especially in Ontario, were now out on strike, and that to-day the strike would be universal all over the Grand Trunk from Portland to Sarnia. Whether this is true or not I cannot say. When we went down to Montreal on Friday night, Mr. Taylor, myself and Mr. Wainwright being together, Mr. Taylor and myself watched the road from Coteau Junction to Montreal station. It was about 10 o'clock when we arrived at the station at Montreal. On that stretch of road we only saw one man with a shovel fixing a culvert, and another man walking the track. No other human beings were in sight on the track, except two groups of boys, of four and six each, with their books, going to school, I presume.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Mr. Speaker, as I was one of the parties referred to in connection with this matter I thought it should be right I should say a word or two. The interview, in the first place between Mr. Wainwright and myself, was not of my seeking. About 3.30 on Friday I received Mr. Wainwright's card on my desk, and I met him at the door. The first thing he said to me was to find fault with me for having made a speech in the House on the Tuesday previous, and he inferred that that was the first time that the matter had been brought up in the House. If he will refer to "Hansard" of the 27th of May he will find that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and other hon. gentlemen, made stronger statements than were made by me, when I spoke. If any hon. gentleman will refer to my speech he will see that I neither took sides with the railway company nor with the men. I made a statement of the facts and "Hansard" will reveal these facts. I met Mr. Wainwright and discussed with him, for a few moments, the statement I had made on the previous Tuesday. He referred to me as having made the statement that the road was in a dangerous condition. I asked him why the strike was not settled, and he said: Why do you not settle it? I said I thought I could settle it in twenty-four hours. He said: Go on and do it. Just then the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) came along, and we had a further discussion, the result of which was that I sent down town for the executive of the trackmen. They came up with the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke). These gentlemen, with myself and the hon.

member for Westmoreland, had some talk in my room in reference to it. I conveyed to them the statement we had received from Mr. Wainwright. The statement made by the executive was that they could say nothing until they should have met that night at eight o'clock, and they promised that they would come back immediately after their meeting that night. Mr. Wainwright intended returning to Montreal on the 6.30 train. Mr. Powell, whom I will refer to as Mr. Powell, with his consent, and yours, Mr. Speaker, went down to Mr. Wainwright's car at the station and told him of the interview we had had with the executive, that we expected to hear from them again that evening and advised him to remain over until the morning. Mr. Wainwright immediately said: I will remain over, and in the meantime, I will communicate with Montreal. Then, in his car, I prepared what I thought would be a telegram covering the matter, and left it for him to improve upon that he might communicate with Mr. Hays. I understood when he left the car that he had prepared a telegram and sent it to Montreal. Having had our interview with the executive at nine o'clock, we went down again and told him the result of the interview with the general committee after it had met that night. In the meantime he said that he had talked with Mr. Hays and he asked us to go on to Montreal in the morning. We went to Montreal, and Mr. Powell has given the conversation that took place afterwards. After Mr. Powell left for Ottawa on the 5.30 train; he left Montreal for Ottawa during the time that I went to have a talk with other members of the executive board in Montreal in reference to the engineers. I went to see one of the members of the board on behalf of the executive of the engineers, and he strongly advised the trackmen to accept the proposition that the men go back to their places and leave the result to follow the interviews that might take place with Mr. Hays at his convenience. It was strongly and greatly to the credit of the judgment of the engineers that they gave this advice to the trackmen, because I think it was more on the advice they tendered than the advice we tendered to the trackmen that they sent out the telegrams, some 58 in number, which I wrote, to the different secretaries of the order all over the country, containing simply the one word, which was the cipher to the trackmen telling them to return to their work. I took the eight o'clock train for home, expecting that this arrangement would be satisfactory. But on my way down on Monday I saw crowds at the station, and I conversed with the men and as soon as I got here at six o'clock I sent a telegram, which Mr. Powell has read. I said, of course, as the telegram reads, that we did not consider that any person who had violated the criminal law should be taken back, but we expected our conversation referred to all the men. I received two letters on Tuesday morning. I will not give the names or places, but they show the course that was adopted by the Grand Trunk Railway Company in trying to settle this trouble:

Roadmaster — has refused to allow me to resume duty for interfering with men who were patrolling track during strike. I would like to meet the man who accuses me of this, as it is false and cannot be proven. I interfered with no one, and am now ready to resume duty at once.

This man denies the interference of any one, and yet he is not given the chance to resume work. Here is another communication which I received:

Knowing you to be the friend of the workmen of Canada, and, as I understand, just now taking up the case of the striking trackmen on the Grand Trunk Railway system, I wish to call your attention to the following message to foremen and men who were ready to resume work on receiving the word from Chairman Pole, of the Executive Committee of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trackmen. The following is a true copy:—

"T.K., a.m., 5-6-1899.—Advise all foremen and men desirous to go back to work must make written application to me."

This was a telegram that came from one of the roadmasters to the men, and it stated that before they resumed work they must make written application.

The press says the men were to go back to their places as formerly, but to my own knowledge one foreman and one man between Kingston and Belleville have been told their services were no longer required. The question I would like to ask is: Has the company the right to ask us to make such application, we having been in the employ of the said company, some of us, upwards of 20 years, until present trouble? Many of the men and foremen fear that advantage will be taken of them if they should make such application, and are not satisfied by any means. Please give us a word of advice in the matter.

To that letter I made no reply, because I had hoped until to-day, until the order had gone to call the men out, that the matter would be settled, and even yet I hope the Grand Trunk Railway, knowing the temper of the men, will come to an amicable arrangement. I say now, as I mentioned in the discussion with Mr. Hays at Montreal, that every credit was due to the striking trackmen, who were two weeks on strike, and yet not an accident of any kind had happened, and nothing was interfered with. There was some little trouble at Kingston, but it was not caused by the trackmen, and I was told by one of the conductors that the trackmen themselves interfered to prevent that trouble.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR. All over the line, so far as I can understand, the trackmen did the best they could to preserve and protect the Grand Trunk Railway property. Of course, if any of them violated the law, no person could justify them, but, as I urged upon the general manager, the men are deserving of every credit for acting as peaceably as they did. I do not know what will be the result if the strike goes on for another two weeks. It is true, as my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) stated, that although the Grand Trunk Railway people say they have any number of men at work on the road, yet they are not to be seen, and they were not to be seen the morning we went down, for from Coteau to the headquarters at Montreal, there was but one man visible. They have men walking the track, but these men have no tools with them and they are simply reporting what they hear with reference to the men. I had hoped, and still hope, that the Grand Trunk Railway authorities will accept the proposition. I feel and do feel, that the trouble in arriving at the settlement was caused by under-officials, and not by the general manager, and not by Mr. Wainwright.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR. I feel that a little cool-headedness will settle the matter. I know the temper of the men, and I know that every one of them is willing to go back and to leave their grievances for future adjudication. The matter was in a fair way for adjustment, but the under-officials put in hard and fast rules to the effect that the men should go on their knees and make an application for new work. I do not think that was at all necessary. One dollar a day is not a fair wage for a man in this age.

Mr. D. HENDERSON (Halton). I assure you, Mr. Speaker, and I assure the House, that I have no desire to say anything to aggravate the trouble that exists in the country in connection with this Grand Trunk Railway strike. But, Sir, we must remember that the old province of Canada had $15,000,000 invested in the Grand Trunk Railway, and on that ground alone I consider that this Parliament has some right to speak. We have an interest in that property, and we have the right to demand that not only shall that property be protected, but that the lives of the people who are travelling on that railway shall be safeguarded. I do not regard the inspection of the road by a man sitting in the rear end of a train travelling at the rate of forty miles an hour, as the kind of inspection that is necessary to give confidence to the travelling public, or to afford protection to the property of the Grand Trunk Railway, in which the country has a large interest. The question before us now is, has faith been kept with the men as an outcome of the recent negotiations. From all I can learn, I do not think that the general manager has kept faith with these men, and if he has not done so—and I believe he has not done so—the Government of this country has a perfect right to interfere and to tell the manager of that great corporation that the interests of the 1,800 men who went out on strike must be guarded, and that if he will not instantly take action to grant the relief which is demanded, the time has arrived when the Government must speak.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I have but a few words to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If my hon. friend (Mr. Robertson) intends to speak more than five minutes, of course we will call it six o'clock.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 121) respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.—(Mr. Dyment).

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY.

House proceeded to further consider the proposed motion of Mr. Sutherland for the third reading of Bill (No. 90) an Act respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company; and the motion of Mr. Douglas in amendment thereto.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). When the debate was adjourned the other evening, I was speaking of the evil effects of extending these railway charters. This practice, as followed in this House from time to time, has had an evil effect upon the development of the North-west Territories generally, because settlers were never certain when a road projected to be built through the portion of country where they were settled, would be built. The railway under consideration was chartered 20 years ago under the name of the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway. The incorporating Act was passed in 1880. In 1884, the company came to Parliament and got an Act changing the name of the railway from the Souris and Rocky Mountain to the Great North-west Central, and an extension of time was granted for the completion of the work. After that, I believe, they built some 50 miles of the road, running from close to Brandon to Hamiota. Then, the work stopped for a long time, and the company got into litigation and could not go on. In 1886 a further extension of time was granted, and the people were still anxiously waiting for something to be done. Now, I claim that the principle of extending these charters is wrong, for this reason. When a charter is granted for building a railway in a new territory, a land grant of 6,400 acres a mile goes with the charter. At the time this land grant was given, the land was of no value, because it was without railway communication and there were no settlers there. In the meantime, the development of the country goes on, settlers go in, and the land naturally increases in value. In that way the charter becomes valuable, owing to the labour and industry of the settlers. If this sort of thing were allowed to go on, it would come to this stage, that the holders of these railway charters would not do any railway construction until the country was settled to such an extent that it would be a good paying speculation for these people to go in and build the road without getting anything in the way of subsidy. Still they hold a land grant made valuable by the industry of the settlers. That is the case here. Last year these people came and asked for an extension of time; the members from the west opposed that application as long as they could in the dying days of the session, and they at last agreed to allow the Bill to pass on condition that the company would build ten miles last year and ten miles this year. Up to this spring there has not been any of the road built at all, and, consequently, the charter has lapsed. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or the gentlemen who purchased this charter on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, purchased it subject to these conditions, and they should now come to Parliament to ask that those conditions be changed, but they should go on and complete the road. It would be no great thing for a great corporation like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to construct 20 miles of a prairie road in four or five months. This road passes through a level prairie country, and I am sure that its construction would not cost more than $8,000 a mile; and if the company wanted to build the road, they could do it as well this year as to wait till next year. We are under the impression that unless the amendment of my hon. friend from East Assinibola (Mr. Douglas) is carried, they will be back next year asking for another extension of time, hoping that more people will crowd into that country, and the lands will become more valuable, and that they will be able to make more money out of the subsidy than it will cost to build the road. The lands in that part of the country are today worth at least $3 an acre. They can realize more at present on the proceeds of the sales of lands than it would cost to build the road, and they should be obliged to go on and build. Just imagine a man living 50, 60 or 100 miles away from railway communication. He might have the finest soil in the world, and be able to raise 30 or 40 bushels of wheat per acre, and it would be impossible for him to haul it in and market it at a profit. This country is not like other portions of the territories, where the farmers can turn their attention to stock-raising. This road runs through a wheat country, one of the best in Manitoba, and, therefore, it is impossible for the farmers to turn their attention to the raising of stock, as they can in some other portions of the territories and in Manitoba, but they have to stick to the raising of grain, and that cannot be done profitably, unless there is a market in the near vicinity. These people are 50 to 100 miles away from railway communication, and 50 cents per bushel for wheat—which was the price paid last year—will not pay the farmer the cost of his labour and his machinery. We are spending an immense amount of money to induce people to come into the country and settle on our land; but, if we refuse them railway accommodation, all our efforts will be in vain, and many of those people who have come will be obliged to leave. The people that are settled in this section are more valuable settlers than those we are getting in now. A great many of them are from the old country and the older provinces of Canada, and the only possible way by which we can keep them in the country is to show them that something is going to be done with this road. It does not matter how little of the road is built this year, if only something be done to give the settlers confidence and encouragement to struggle on some years longer. If the company would only undertake to build 15 miles of a prairie road, that would be an encouragement to the settlers. But, if this Bill is allowed to pass, giving another extension of time, the people will simply conclude that we are to go on continually repeating the same old story that has been repeated since 1880, and that nothing will be accomplished. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway propose to spend $20,000, and they do not tell us how. I am sure they are not going to spend it in surveys. Well, if they would only add $60,000 more and make it $80,000, that would enable them to lay down 10 miles of track, but an expenditure of simply $20,000 will be of no avail whatever. If the Canadian Pacific Railway would even build 5 miles of road, that might give the people some confidence; but they do not seem to indicate that they want to do anything. Their only desire appears to be to obtain an extension of time. There has been a strong agitation all through that part of the country against any further extension. In the district of Saskatoon, there is an extensive settlement, and many of the people went in there on the strength of this charter, expecting that some time in the near future that road would be built. They have erected fine buildings, churches and schools, and have settled that country for some 40 or 50 miles around, and are anxiously waiting for something to be done in the way of railway accommodation. Let us go further, to Battleford, which is a town of some 400 or 500 people. These people went in there far from railway communication, and have built fine schools and churches and other buildings, in the expectation that this road would be built, and all the land between Battleford and Saskatoon filled up in the near future. There is a tract of territory there, some 100 miles by 90, not a quarter section of which is not capable of sustaining a settler and his family, fine agricultural, wheat-growing lands, with any amount of fine timber for the construction of buildings, and also fine rail timber for the making of fences, and abundant water supply—everything necessary to build up a prosperous agricultural community. The only thing that is required is the railway, and without that railway we cannot expect any advance in settlement. You may send immigration literature and fine views to all parts of the world, and the people will say this Saskatchewan country is a very nice country, but there is no railway. And when they take up the papers of the country they will see this discussion and learn that this road was chartered twenty years ago, but that the charter had been extended year after year and the road has not been built; and that until now the Canadian Pacific Railway, the greatest corporation in this country, has secured control of the charter. I am sure the Canadian Pacific Railway could very easily build more than twenty miles this year if they wanted to do so. They have had enough assistance in various ways from the people of this country; they might take into consideration the settlers who have been waiting so long for this road. If the Canadian Pacific had not bought this charter, several other companies were prepared to take it over and proceed with the work. The Northern Pacific people would have been glad to get the charter, and, instead of building twenty miles, they would have been prepared to build a hundred miles this year. They know that this land grant of 6,400 acres a mile is an exceedingly valuable asset, in view of the tide of immigration flowing in there; they know that it will be worth more than the cost of the road. They know this is a first-class business proposition and they wanted to get hold of the charter. But the Canadian Pacific managed to get ahead of the others and secured control. Had the Northern Pacific secured control, they would not have come to the House to ask for an extension, but would be prepared to carry out the conditions of last year, made when we had the exhibition of Mr. Delap and his friends and Mr. Charlebois and his friends struggling over the carcass. I think the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) spoke of them as vampires or sharks. Now, we have got rid of the vampires and sharks, and we want something done with this road. I hope our friends on both sides will consider the case of these settlers, and remember that they are anxiously waiting for something to be done. It should not be lost sight of either that the building of a railway in that country is not a difficult matter. We are not asking anything unreasonable, when we ask that twenty miles be built this year. In one season the Regina Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway Company, beginning about the opening of the month of June, built 250 miles of road before the snow fell on the prairie. So it is plain that we are not imposing too much on these people when we ask them to build twenty miles. There must be something at the bottom of this effort to avoid carrying out this condition. We know that the Canadian Pacific Railway are well able to finance this enterprise, that they could build a hundred miles if they wanted to. It seems plain that there must be a nigger in the fence somewhere, and I think we are justified in coming to the conclusion that the reason for not building this road this year is not that they cannot raise the money but that they want to put it off for another year, leaving us no guarantee that they will not come back and ask for a still further delay next year. Without taking up more time, I declare myself a supporter of the amendment of my hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas).

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). The fact that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis), who has just taken his seat, has not been listened to with the attention that should be given to a subject of such importance makes it imperative upon me to go into the history of this railway project very carefully. That history extends over a period of some twenty or twenty-two years. I do not desire to weary the House with details, but I ask the attention of hon. members, and I think I will be able to convince them that this is a case calling for action on the part of this House. It will be within the memory of men still living that a considerable number of settlers went into that country as far back probably as 1874. They were led to believe that if they remained in that country and were industrious, a railway would be extended to that section to carry out their produce. Many of the pioneers have died, many of them have grown gray, many of them have left the country, I fear, with a curse, because they have not had railroad communication. Originally this proposed road was known as the Souris and Rocky Mountain road. I think that one of the promoters was the late Mr. Beaty, known to history as "boy" Beaty. You will remember, Sir, that he was said to have made use of the expression with regard to some proposition connected with this road, "there is nothing in it for the 'boy'." This, as it was subsequently explained, arose out of a clerical error, that word written was "coy." instead of "boy." And, I think, en passant, that it is due to the memory of that deceased statesman that this explanation should be made upon the floor of Parliament, in order that members and the country generally may know exactly what the facts were. I feel and have felt for some time that the memory of that gentleman should be vindicated in this particular.

Now, the House, and the members of the Railway Committee particularly, will remember that for the last four or five years the committee has been appealed to by the promoters of this railway for extensions of time. I do not think that the records of railway construction in Canada show such a case of scallawaggery as we know in connection with this railway. Members from the west, as you know, have been very earnest in opposing the extensions of time and were anxious that the road should be constructed at least before the last of these settlers who went out twenty years or more ago should die. I think it is only fair that these people should be protected. The members from the west have refused on all occasions either to present a petition in favour of the extension or to father a Bill for that purpose. In a moment of weakness, to quote an expression of the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), I consented to stand sponsor for a Bill, and when it was printed it appeared in my name, granting an extension to that company. That was the first session that I was here, and I did not understand the practice very well, and when I discovered what the Bill really was, I was obliged to vote against it, for doing which I was commended by the people of that country, more especially the few surviving settlers in that district that this road was designed to serve. Well, it came to such a pass that it was absolutely impossible for these sharks and vampires, as the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) called them, to get anybody from the west to introduce a Bill at all. Now, we have the spectacle of unsuspecting representatives from the east doing so, no doubt without mature consideration, and without realizing the consequences that such action would entail. Well, they introduce these Bills, and we find ourselves obliged at the present time to give all opposition possible to them. I am sure the House will agree with me that the time has come when we should have, at least, a small portion of this railroad built. Year after year we have been promised, sometimes 10 miles, sometimes 5 miles, and sometimes less or more. Well, it has come to that pass up there that the people would almost be contented if they could only see a few stakes along the road; if they could only see a surveyor's flag once in a while set out there it would be some small consolation. But we do not even see a stake driven, nor a surveyor looking over the ground. We think the time has come to insist on something being done in the building of that railroad. We feel that inasmuch as the representatives from that country are unanimous in desiring the construction of that branch, at least their representations should be listened to by the other members of this House. I did not hear the words of the hon. member for Assiniboia the other day in the Railway Committee to which I understood some dissent was taken, but I must confess that I sympathize to a considerable extent with the proposition that when a railway scheme is before a committee of this House it is, at least, a fair thing, to ask that members who represent the district affected should have some consideration given to their statements. We find that notwithstanding the fact that we cannot even get a member from the west to introduce a Bill, or even to father a Bill, the House seems willing to grant the desires of these railway promoters. When it comes to a position like that, it seems to me that it is incumbent on the members from the west to offer all the opposition in their power to the granting of those vast concessions. I may say that a large number of petitions have been sent to me to oppose any further extension; because, you will see, Mr. Speaker, that when a large settlement of thrifty people go into a country like that, railway communication becomes very necessary to them. It is a beautiful country, a rolling country, with hills and valleys, in fact it is calculated to remind one of those lines that are found, I think, in William Cullen Bryant's poems, which members of the House probably remember:

These are the gardens of the desert, these
The unshorn fields, boundless and beautiful,
For which the speech of England has no name—
The Prairies. I behold them for the first,
And my heart swells, while the dilated sight Takes in the encircling vastness. Lo! they stretch

In airy undulations, far away,
As if the ocean, in his gentlest swell,
Stood still, with all his rounded billows fixed
And motionless for ever. Motionless?
No! they are all unchained again. The clouds Sweep over with their shadows, and beneath
The surface rolls and fluctuates to the eye;
Dark hollows seem to glide along and chase
The sunny ridges. Breezes of the South!
Who toss the golden and the flame-like flowers,
And pass the prairie-hawk that, poised on high,
Flaps his broad wings, yet moves not—ye have played

Among the palms of Mexico and vines
Of Texas, and have crisped the limpid brooks
That from the fountains of Sonora glide
Into the calm Pacific—have ye fanned
A nobler or a lovelier scene than this?
Man hath no part in all this glorious work:
The Hand that built the firmament hath heaved
And smoothed these verdant swells, and sown their slopes

With herbage, planted them with island groves,
And hedged them round with forests. Fitting floor

For this magnificent temple of the sky—
With flowers whose glory and whose multitude Rival the constellations. The great heavens

Seem to stoop down upon the scene in love—
A nearer vault, and of a tenderer blue
Than that which bends above our eastern hills.

The country in which these people have settled reminds one very much of those beautiful lines which I have just quoted. If you were to visit that country, Mr. Speaker, and I hope you will have an opportunity within two or three years at least of visiting the North-west, you would sympathize with these settlers whose progress is so much retarded by the lack of a railway in that country. They are obliged, as you probably know, to carry their grain in carts, or wagons, or sleighs, some 20 miles, some 30, some 40, and some 50 miles. It is not long since that it cost, at least, one bushel of wheat to send another bushel of wheat to market, and when you remember that fact you will agree with me that it is an additional hardship to force these unfortunate people to draw their grain the distances that I have mentioned. I stand here now in the name of the people of the great North-west to protest against the pursuance of that policy any longer. I am here to demand that the railway company be compelled to build at least 15 or 20 miles this year. It is not a large amount of money to ask the Canadian Pacific Railway to expend. If they spend $100,000 or so, it will be amply sufficient. When it is remembered that this Dominion of Canada has given the Canadian Pacific Railway in cash, in lands, and in completed roads, value to the amount of $125,000,000, it is surely a moderate proposition to say that they should at least spend $100,000 in the interests of the people of that country. They have secured this charter from the Great North-west Central people. It is a very valuable charter, because it gives a land grant of some 6,400 acres per mile for its entire length, and I understand it is designed to extend the railway to the Yellow Head Pass in the Rocky Mountains. I claim that the land grant alone will be amply sufficient to build that entire line, and if they should receive $2 an acre for that land grant, a moderate sum, that would give them $12,800 per mile. I am told by competent engineers that that line can be built on the average for $7,000 or $8,000 per mile. So you see that the country is presenting to that company the entire cost of the road, besides a handsome subsidy into the bargain. That being the case, I say it is one of the most moderate demands that can be made to ask them to expend at least $100,000 in extending that road 15 or 20 miles this year. They told the Railway Committee, and the committee believed it, that they would spend $20,000 before the snow flies. I would like to ask any hon. member of this House who may sympathize with the Canadian Pacific Railway, what use will that expenditure of $20,000 be to the settlers in that country. It might be of service on that portion of the road already built, but it would not add one yard to the mileage, because when you undertake grading, you must do it on a more extensive scale than would be involved in an expenditure of $20,000. I am sure I will not appeal to this House in vain in asking that the amendment which my hon. friend has introduced to compel this company to build 20 miles this year, should be carried. There is another point that may be very well considered. I believe, and in this statement I am absolutely serious, that the time has come when the Government and the people's representatives should consider the desirability of, at least, owning the railways which are to be built in the future. I believe the time has come when the people are recognizing this, and the time is coming when that feeling will be much stronger.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that, while he has been somewhat discursive, he is now going away from the point.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for going beyond the strict line, because I desire to adhere, most carefully, to the strict line, and I have always bowed to your ruling with the greatest submission. But I was going to point out that the time had come when we should nationalize this road. I believe it would be better if, instead of giving the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other corporation, such valuable considerations this Parliament should cancel the charter and build that road itself. That road can be built for at least $7,000 or $8,000 a mile. The country would own the road and we would have the balance of the land grant free. The policy of this country, as pursued by both Governments, has been to build the entire railways for these projectors, to pay every dollar that is put into them, hand them over, and then allow them to scorch the poor settlers with heavy freight rates. It is a fair proposition, and I feel that the time is now ripe when every representative of the people has to consider for himself whether it is not high time that we should take stock of the position and whether it is not time that, if the country is going to pay for these roads, as it has paid for them in the past, the country should own a railway of its own. It is quite true that we own the Intercolonial Railway and we hear a great deal about the loss on that road. But the country has been benefited, and the people have been benefited by low freight rates. This is an important consideration in that country, as it would be an important consideration in the west if we could get this great Great North-western Railway built by the Government and owned by the Government and make it a colonization railway. The settlers who have grown gray in that country waiting for a railway would then be afforded some measure of relief, and, I think, if we look at this question fairly in the face and if we are prepared to grapple with it, this carnival of handing over the resources of the country to these promoters and enabling them to fatten at the expense of the public will not go on. I am sure I can appeal to hon. gentlemen, and I am sure they will see the force of the position I take and be disposed to support that position. In connection with this matter there was litigation extending over some five, six or seven years. I am sorry I have not the entire record here to read to the House. It would not take over a year and a half, but I have only been able to secure a portion of the record. I propose to read the portion I have here to-night, and, perhaps, if hon. members will bear with me in patience, I may be able to read the balance, probably, before the end of the session.

Mr. TAYLOR. There is only twelve minutes left.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As you all know this railway got into litigation. There was a man named Delap, a capitalist in England—I do not know that I can select a parliamentary word, but, if I were to say that he was jolled, probably it would suit—with apologies to the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) into investing his money in this enterprise by one Charlebois. I think that probably the name of Charlebois is more or less familiar to the people of Canada. It seems to me that I have heard it before. He took the contract, I understand, for building that railway, and he induced Mr. Delap to put his money into the enterprise. Mr. Delap sent his agent, a lawyer named Stevens, out to make the arrangements with Mr. Charlebois, and from the information which has been furnished me, I am led to believe that Mr. Stevens threw his client down and made an immoral bargain with Mr. Charlebois. In that way the case got into liquidation and dragged for some five or six or seven years, and so far as I can understand it is not absolutely settled up to the present time. The Canadian Pacific Railway has now purchased the claims of some of these promoters, I think that of Mr. Delap amongst them, and it is endeavouring to get the project in some sort of shape, and we are extremely anxious that they shall be obliged to build a portion of the road, 20 miles, this year. Coming back to the litigation, the case ran the gauntlet of the Canadian courts and was finally appealed to the Privy Council in England. Let me read a brief extract from the decision of Mr. Justice Gwynne, of our own Supreme Court here, when that court heard the case :

It is apparent that the company is one of these companies formed, as is not unusual in this country, for the purpose of constructing railroads, not as purely commercial undertakings, and not constructed fully or chiefly with subscribed capital, but chiefly upon the security of Government or municipal subsidies, or both.

So I am able to summon Mr. Justice

Gwynne in support of a proposition I laid down some time ago, that the practice in this country seems to have been, and actually is, that these railway promoters have exploited municipal authorities, have exploited the provincial governments and the Dominion Governments, and have got in subsidies more than would build the entire roads. In addition to that, they get permission to issue bonds for far more than the road costs, and in that way they get a large sum out of the railroad, in addition to what they get from the Government. I reiterate, that it is the bounden duty of the representatives of the Dominion in this Parliament to see that the exploiters do not go any further, and that the country gets the benefit of the subsidies that are given. Let me continue reading from the judgment :

In the present case the subsidy was a Government land grant, which could not be obtained by the company until they should enter into a contract for building 50 miles of the road to be completed by a fixed date.

I am afraid the House is not giving me that attention that is desirable under the circumstances, because it is extremely important that hon. gentlemen should be well versed in the judgment of Mr. Justice Gwynne. He is a very able judge, and anything he has to say on the railway question is of the deepest interest.

Mr. TAYLOR. You have six minutes more.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I shall continue to read from the judgment :

If Charlebois had agreed with Stevens to pay the shares up in full, so as to transfer them as shares paid up in full, it is plain that he did not do so unless Stevens paid the money upon the shares as a loan to Charlebois, and upon his promise to repay Stevens the amount, which promise Charlebois has fulfilled.

This Stevens is the man I alluded to a short time ago, as having been charged with making an immoral bargain with Charlebois. I thought his name was spelled "S-t-e-p-h-e-n-s," but I find it is spelled "S-t-e-v-e-n-s."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the House will bear with me a second, I will finish this paragraph in the judgment.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hour for private Bills having elapsed, the debate will be proceeded with on the motion of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), that this House do now adjourn.

STRIKE ON THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY TRACKMEN.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Maclean, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. J. ROSS ROBERTSON (East Toronto). Mr. Speaker, this motion brought up by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has, of course, a direct bearing on the strike of the Grand Trunk trackmen. As I understand it, some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House took the advice of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), and tried to mediate in this matter. It looks as if these hon. gentlemen were deceived by the management of the Grand Trunk Railway. I cannot see that a particle of blame attaches to the hon. gentlemen of this House who were good enough to try if they could settle this difficulty. Indeed, they would not have had to interfere, if the hon. the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) had hinted, at the outset of this trouble, that the Government could not afford to have the country disgraced by the spectacle of hard-working men, decent Canadian citizens, struggling for an increase in the beggarly pittance which the Grand Trunk Railway Company pays to its trackmen. I suppose that the hon. the First Minister is still waiting for the Grand Trunk Railway side of the story, he having received the trackmen's side of the story to-day. I know his unwillingness to condemn the Grand Trunk Railway unheard, but what evidence can improve the position of these poor men, who have to solve the problem of life for themselves, their wives and their children on a gross income of 98 cents a day? If the Grand Trunk Railway authorities have any evidence which can better the lot of these unfortunate trackmen, General Manager Hays ought to place that evidence at the disposal of the hon. the First Minister, and the First Minister should immediately acquaint this House with any facts which will show the Grand Trunk Railway authorities in a better light.

I suppose there was no precedent which would justify the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) in attempting mediation, when this subject was called to his attention. There was no precedent, Mr. Speaker, which justified the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in attempting to give away one-half of the Yukon to Mackenzie & Mann. The Government cannot find precedents for doing anything it does not want to do, but, when it comes to something it wants to do, it makes precedents as it goes along. It is a pity that the Government did not do what these three members of Parliament tried to do.

And again I say that these three hon. gentlemen are to be praised, not blamed. They acted in good faith, and they could not foresee the perfidy of the Grand Trunk Railway authorities. Perfidy, I admit, is a strong word to use; but what other word will describe the conduct of General Manager Hays and his assistants, who used this conference with members of Parliament to crush struggling men—yes, to work a bunco game on poor trackmen who, throughout this entire trouble, have acted the part of decent, law-abiding Canadians. It has come to be a rule, Mr. Speaker, that a humble member of this House is in danger of having his motives aspersed if he ventures on words or actions which do not meet with the approval of the hon. the First Minister or the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). I am not referring to any previous debate; I am speculating as to the possibilities in connection with the question now under discussion. I know that the rules of this House forbid any hon. member from questioning the motives of another hon. member; but when the Government loses its temper, trifles like the British constitution and the rules of this House cannot quench the fiery eloquence of the hon. the First Minister or the silver-tongued orator of North Oxford. It would be a great grief to me, Mr. Speaker, if anything I have said or anything I may say on this question should fail to win applause and approval from those hon. gentlemen, who are first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of their countrymen. I do not care what the hon. the First Minister or the hon. member for North Oxford may choose to say or think about my motives. I can tell the hon. the First Minister that I neither covet his smile nor fear his frown. My motives and my acts alike are subject to the judgment of the people who sent me here. The end of my parliamentary journey is not far off, but while I am here, I propose to follow my own standards of duty, regardless of what the hon. the First Minister may say of me or my motives. It might be as well for the hon. member for North Oxford, his Sancho Panza, not to waste so much of his valuable time and energy in crushing a poor, humble member of Parliament. They say it is a glorious thing to have a giant's strength, but the hon. gentleman should use his strength in battle with great men like Judge Clark of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I would suggest to the hon. member for North Oxford that he is apt to give himself a lot of unnecessary concern about the motives of people who are daring enough to disagree with him. I hope I shall not say anything which shall draw him out from among those brilliant flashes of silence which made his reputation among the brilliant statesmen of the Liberal party. I know he considers himself a great weight and authority in his own party. His authority, however, does not reach as far as this desk; and, on this or any other question, I will say what I think, and the hon. member for North Oxford may say what he chooses, and think what he likes—that is to say, if he ever does think.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, I remember, Sir, that in the celebrated discourse of Cicero, he tells us how a great orator declared that Tisias did not go to the Campus Martius because he lost one arm. Well, Sir, although one of my arms is disabled, I can assure the hon. gentleman from whom I heard a murmur just now, that with one arm tied up I am still equal to come to this Campus Martius. I have not risen in this debate, Mr. Speaker, to utter one word of adverse criticism in regard either to the Government or to the Grand Trunk Railway; but I think the country owes a debt of gratitude to my hon. friends the member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and the member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). I rise to say that the correspondence which has been read here to-day, on the face of it, needs some explanation, and I will tell you why. I have a great respect for the ability of Mr. Hays. There cannot be the least doubt that from the hon. member for Westmoreland and the hon. member for Leeds we heard a true account of what took place between them and Mr. Hays. Well, Sir, can you conceive of a man in the responsible position of Mr. Hays, and a man of his ability, making an agreement such as he made with those two hon. gentlemen, intending two days afterwards to take the course he did, thereby placing the undesirable state of things that existed in a far worse position, and making the difficulty that had to be solved still more difficult of solution? It is not possible for me, Sir, to believe that Mr. Hays deliberately made the agreement that he made with the two members of Parliament, with the intention of taking the course that he took, because he is a clever enough man to know that the moment he took the course that was subsequently taken, the telegram, the debate that has taken place here to-night, and questions in the press, would have followed, demanding an explanation of what could have made him make such an agreement, and two days afterwards break that agreement. So that I say that on the face of this correspondence there is something to be explained. I will now call attention to the letter of Mr. Hays. The agreement is put forward by Mr. McKenny, grand secretary of the United Brotherhood, as he understood it, and it is exactly the same as the agreement that has been described to us to-day by the two hon. members of this House. This is what he says:

The two members of Parliament reported to us that Mr. Hays had stated to them that if the trackmen saw fit to return to work, the differences between the men and the company would be negotiated immediately by Mr. Hays with two members of Parliament.

Mr. Hays writes on June 5th, after his attention has been called to the conduct of himself and his officials, addressing Mr. Powell:

Your message received. You will recall I was particular to have it understood by Mr. Taylor and yourself that I made no promise of any character whatever in connection with the trackmen returning to work.

Fancy the conversation that, according to that letter—if that letter were one that had a strictly historical character—fancy the conversation that would take place between the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and Mr. Hays. Mr. Hays would say to these two gentlemen: Now, you will notice that I am making no promise whatever that the men are to go back to work. He does not say, in his letter, that he stated definitely to them: "I am not going to let these men go back to work," but that he said: "I was particular in making it clear to them that I was making no promise." The thing is ridiculous. The letter evidently has the character of an afterthought, and I wish to point out to the House that we have not all the facts, but that there is something behind which we have not got.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). I must express my deep regret that this strike should have continued so long, and I do not think we are contributing very much to its settlement by the discussion in this House. In the first place, immediately after the attention of the right hon. First Minister was drawn, some days ago, to the fact that this strike was on, he entered into immediate communication with the heads of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for the purpose of doing anything that could be accomplished to bring about a settlement. These negotiations were in progress when the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) interfered—I dare say with the very best intentions—but from all I have heard it was very unfortunate that they should have interfered at all, and I am very much afraid that their interference has really injured the condition of the men rather than improved it. Things are back now into a worse hole than they were in before. The Government were superseded by these hon. gentlemen, the job was taken out of the hands of the Government. These hon. gentlemen assumed the responsibility, and I presume that the correspondence between the right hon. Prime Minister and the company then ceased. I think that was exceedingly unfortunate. These hon. gentlemen might have done what they thought best to do, but I am afraid their action very seriously interfered with the Government exercising any influence they might have exercised to bring about a settlement.

I sympathize with the men very much. A dollar a day at this season appears a low wage. I do not know whether the company pay that wage all the year round, but if they do the case is not so bad as if they paid a dollar a day now and possibly something less in winter. You can hire a man the year round for less than you can employ him only in the summer months, because at this season men's wages are higher than in the winter. I think the men themselves are deserving all praise, at least those of them who have refrained from taking any revenge on the company, and I do hope that when this strike is over every man who has been in the employ of the Grand Trunk Railway will be able to prove that he never countenanced or encouraged in any shape any attack on the company's property, or in any way endangered the public travelling along that line. If any of the men have thus acted, I can fully sympathize with the views expressed by Mr. Hays. No man who has secretly attempted to take revenge on the company by the destruction of the company's property or doing things he ought not to do, deserves to be reinstated, and I am confident that no hon. member of this House would take back a servant who had thus acted when out of employment. I do hope that it will be shown that none of the Grand Trunk Railway men have been guilty of anything of the kind. There was an outbreak at Kingston, but it is stated that those implicated were not in the employ of the Grand Trunk Railway in that district.

I do hope, in the interest of the men, and the travelling public and the general interests of the country, that this strike will be brought to a satisfactory conclusion before long, and I do sincerely regret that any person should have interfered between the Government and the company, and taken the settlement of this matter out of the hands of the Government.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). It would be cause for deep regret if the speech just made were allowed to go unchallenged. Its whole burden was to the effect that while the Government were striving to bring about a settlement of the dispute, members of Parliament deliberately interfered and prevented a settlement being made. There is nothing further from the truth. No hon. gentleman in this House, so far as I am aware, had cognizance of the fact that the right hon. First Minister had written or telegraphed or in any way used his influence with the authorities of the Grand Trunk Railway to bring the strike to a termination. The approaches that were made to my hon. friends from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) were made by an officer of the Grand Trunk Railway, and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) made a most uncalled-for statement when he alleged that these hon. gentlemen interfered and interrupted and destroyed whatever negotiations were going on between the First Minister and the Grand Trunk Railway authorities. But if the action of these hon. gentlemen, taken in good faith with the sole object of putting a stop to a condition of things deeply to be deplored, failed, surely that is all the more reason why the greater influence which hon. gentlemen opposite, the Premier and his colleagues, can exercise, should now be brought to bear. Not one moment should be lost in bringing all the pressure the Government can bring upon the Grand Trunk Railway to put an end to the condition of things existing on their line to-day; and from what I know myself of the conversation that took place with my hon. friends from Westmoreland and Leeds, I have no hesitation in taking the responsibility of saying in my place in the House to-night, that deception has been practised on the men, and that they would never have returned to work unless they had reasonable assurance that their case would be submitted to arbitration and their condition ameliorated. The fact that these men are compelled to work in all weather, is in itself a reason why they should receive higher wages in winter, because of the severity of the climate in that season. The fact, too, that they are compelled to work for 98 cents a day is in itself sufficient to justify me, at any rate, and the great majority of the members of the House in saying that they have a legitimate grievance against the authorities of the road. And in view of the relations between that road and the Government of this country, the Government have a right to step in and demand that the condition of the men shall be ameliorated. I would not have risen but that I desire to enter my protest against the attempt made, wilfully or unknowingly, by the hon. member for North Wellington to bring discredit upon my colleagues, whose action in this matter was straightforward, whose action was above-board, and whose effort was to settle the strike, after appealing to hon. gentlemen opposite to settle it, and when that appeal, so far as my hon. friends knew, had fallen on deaf ears.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.) I do not rise for the purpose of taking part in the discussion but rather for the purpose of making a practical suggestion. No good purpose will be served by discussion along the lines upon which it has been conducted. To debate whether the officials of the Grand Trunk Railway have observed good faith or whether the hon. members who interfered were actuated by proper motives will result in no practical good. What we ought to do in this case is to follow the precedent laid down in a similar condition of affairs in England. In 1893 there was a strike of some 200,000 miners, the public safety became endangered. Mr. Gladstone interfered because public safety was endangered; that is conceded on all hands to be about the only ground on which the Government ought to interfere. They should never interfere until that time arrives. Well, the modus operandi was this: Mr. Gladstone wrote to the representatives of both the miners' associations and coal owners, and invited a conference between the parties under the chairmanship of Lord Rosebery. This conference was held and terms of settlement were arrived at. Representatives from each side were chosen to arbitrate. An outside chairman or umpire was to be selected. If they could not agree on the man he was to be nominated by the Speaker of the Commons. Well, this court of arbitration was constituted and a complete settlement effected. We ought to follow in the line of that precedent. The leader of the Government should enter into communication both with the representatives of the railway company and the employees. I understand the employees have an organization that extends from one end of the track to the other, and that they have men authorized to speak for them. Therefore, conditions are favourable for a settlement and the demands of the men are reasonable. I would suggest, therefore, that letters be despatched at once with a view to a conference to be held under the chairmanship of one of the members of the Government. I do not wish to make invidious distinctions, but if I were asked to make a selection, I would choose the tactful and peace-making Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). The conference should be held and proceedings taken along the line followed in England. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that I am not allowed to move a resolution in amendment to a motion to adjourn. If it were parliamentary, I would move a resolution in some such words as the following :—

Resolved, that the leader of the Government be requested to enter into communication with the representatives of the Grand Trunk and of the employees of the said company now on strike, with a view to arranging a conference to be held under the chairmanship of a member of the Government, for the purpose, if possible, of amicably settling disputes now pending between the parties.

I do not agree with the suggestion that has been made imputing improper motives to the members of this House who tried to make a settlement of the strike. They made the effort, I believe honestly, and honourably. They failed, but that was not their fault. The Government, however, has greater influence in settling matters of this kind than an Opposition, I think, therefore, that this is a matter that ought to be undertaken by the leader of the Government and his colleagues. The safety of the travelling public demands and necessitates this interference.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not rise to make any remarks, but simply to ask the First Minister whether he has with him now copies of the correspondence he has held with the general manager or other officers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company referred to by him to-day, and, if he has, will he lay them on the Table?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I will have the correspondence here to-morrow.

Mr. J. D. REID (South Grenville). Mr. Speaker, it is very seldom that I trouble the House, but I ask the indulgence of hon. members for a few moments that I may be heard on this subject. So far as this strike on the Grand Trunk is concerned, I claim that it is not a political matter. It has been stated in the House that the men are receiving 98 cents per day. I claim that the statement ought to be made that the men receive $1 per day. The fact of stating it at even 2 cents less than the dollar makes it appear smaller than it really is. There is no man, I believe, who receives $1 a day but willingly pays the 2 cents per day for the benefit he derives from the insurance fund to which it is contributed. Therefore, I ask, in justice to the Grand Trunk Railway Company that the rate of pay per day that the men are receiving shall be plainly stated. In speaking of this matter I wish it distinctly understood that I have no axe to grind, that I am merely looking at it in a fair, honest manner. As to the wages that the men are receiving, I believe they are far too small, and that the demand the men have made for $1.25 per day is fair and reasonable in the present condition of things in this country. I think there is nothing unreasonable in the men's demands. But I think the Grand Trunk Railway and the men should be allowed to settle this dispute unless public life or property is endangered. And until this House or the Government has information that public life and property are in danger, I believe that the Grand Trunk Railway should be allowed to run its own affairs, and that they and the employees should be allowed to settle the strike. If that is done, I believe that the parties would settle the strike far better in the end for the men, with whom I sympathize greatly.

Now, I have never met the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway; I would not know him, if I met him. But I have met the superintendent, Mr. McGulguan, and I believe that he would try and do what is in the interests of the men. The officers of the Grand Trunk Railway hold a position of responsibility and trust, and I believe that they must be allowed to settle this matter themselves. I have, as I said, a great deal of sympathy for the men; I hope that they will win, and I wish them every success. But I believe that, from the shape this matter has got into now, we are in danger of injuring their position, and, if the strike continues, loss of life may ensue. In reference to the part that several members of this House took in trying to secure a settlement, I think that they deserve a great deal of credit. But I think it is very unfortunate, both for the men and for the company, that, when these gentlemen made such an important arrangement of that kind, they did not put down in writing the terms agreed to, and take it to the representatives of the men. I do not believe that either the representatives of the men or the general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway would go back on one word of what they had agreed to. I do not think that Mr. Hays, occupying the high position he does, would want to go back on one word of what he has said. This is a dispute between the Grand Trunk Railway and the men, and it is better to let them settle it between themselves. Had the representatives of the men and Mr. Hays settled this matter themselves, we would not be in the position that we are in to-night. I believe the Government has power to interfere, when life and property are in danger. I do not know whether the Government have been served with any notice that life and property are in danger, but, if they have been so notified, it is their duty to take action at once. If any accident should occur on any portion of the Grand Trunk line, there is no question that the Government would be held responsible, as soon as they are notified of the danger. The Grand Trunk Railway is a large corporation, and General Manager Hays and his assistants are responsible for the running of that road, and for the protection of life and property entrusted to their care. Now, I wish to say, in concluding, that I am in sympathy with the men. I believe every man in this House would like to see those men, who are hard-working and honest, receive more wages. I believe that is the wish of every person, and I hope that everything will be done by both sides of the House to try and get this matter settled to the satisfaction of all. But let us not make it a political matter, as the consequence then might be detrimental either to the cause of the men, or to the property of the Grand Trunk Railway, in which so many shareholders have invested their money.

Mr. JAMES KENDRY (West Peterborough). I deeply regret the strike that has taken place on the Grand Trunk Railway, and I think it has now reached such a point that it is the duty of the Government to take hold of it at once and settle it. I heard the Minister of Railways and Canals say, that the track was in good order. Well, I know, as a matter of fact, that in the section of country where I live, no one is looking after the track at all, and it is a mere matter of chance, if an accident does not take place. I say, the Government should take hold of this and compel the Grand Trunk Railway to settle the strike. We know that these men are scarcely getting $1 a day, while on the Canadian Pacific Railway, I believe, their trackmen are getting $1.25 a day. Now, why should the Grand Trunk Railway pay only $1 a day, when the Canadian Pacific Railway pay $1.25. I say these men have been deceived by the officers of the Grand Trunk Railway: I say, that Mr. Hays, who is president of that road, has deceived them. Some of these men live in my riding, and I know, as a matter of fact, that they would not have gone to work unless they believed that this thing was settled. I am glad to know that some hon. gentlemen in this House have interceded in behalf of the men, and I think they deserve the thanks of this House for so doing. As to the president of the Grand Trunk Railway, if his word is not as good as his bond, then he is not fit to manage that road. When these men went home, having the assurance of the manager that he would settle the difficulty, no matter whether he gave that assurance in writing or not, he should have settled that strike. Hereafter, the business people of this country will not be in a position to take the word of the president. I think, however, the man who is chiefly blameable is Mr. Wainwright. We know that he is the lobbyist of the Grand Trunk Railway, and I think he has misled the men in this strike. Surely, these men have a right to be paid the same as the trackmen on the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other road in this country, and I say, that 98 cents a day is not enough to keep them alive. We have all heard a great deal about the growing time. Well, if we have growing times, these men are entitled to get $1.25 a day or whatever other roads pay. In this House we are the guardians of the people; the Minister of Railways and Canals has control of the traffic of the railways, and I think it is time that the Prime Minister should compel the Grand Trunk Railway to settle this strike. A storm is going on at this moment, and, when you consider the expansion of the tracks of the road from the heat, and the wash-outs that may take place from the rains, you can easily understand the increased danger there is of accidents. I have every confidence in the First Minister that he will exert his influence and his authority to compel a settlement.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). I would not undertake to say anything more on this question were it not for the change of circumstances that has occurred since the question was last discussed in this House. We have the statement of the general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway to the effect that he will not deal with the striking trackmen of that company, and we have the statement of those who are guarding the interests of the trackmen to the effect that their men have been ordered out. Now, this is the stand that the two parties concerned in this contest have taken up. We have the evidence of the assistant to the general manager discussing the settlement of this question with two members of this House, and we have had the conversation that occurred at that time. These two gentlemen proceeded to accompany him to Montreal and make an effort to bring about a settlement. This is an evidence that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and those that are concerned in the strike on behalf of the men, are agreed that it would be well to try to bring about an arrangement between the two parties by arbitration or negotiation. Therefore, I think, we have evidence that it should induce the Government to interfere in this matter. In this connection we find the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) sending out his engineers to investigate certain complaints. I understand that from north of Toronto certain complaints have been sent of the state of the track in that district. The papers in that district circulated the report that the Government had sent out detectives for the purpose of investigating that matter in that locality. I am not aware whether it is the case or not, but I am aware according to the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, this afternoon, that engineers have been sent out. I do not know what their report is; the hon. Minister did not say what they had reported to him. He did not say whether the complaints, as sent in, were justified or not, but the hon. Minister did make a statement that I entirely disagree with. He said that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had their track in such a condition that it was impossible for the track to get out of repair in the short time since the strike occurred. I know that statement not to be correct. In this country, whenever we have excessive heat or excessive cold, the railway tracks contract and expand, and it is a common thing, on our railways, to find freight trains out on the main line trying their best to get into a side track in order to let a passenger or other trains pass, and it is necessary for the trackmen to examine these roads every day and examine them very closely during the season of excessive heat or cold. So, I say, there is not a railway in this country but must be properly looked after every day, both in winter and summer. We have the statement of the management of the Grand Trunk Railway Company that 1,800 trackmen left the service of the company, that about 800 men have been re-employed or engaged in the service of the company, leaving them about 800 or 1,000 short of their full complement. In that case the works of the company are disorganized, and will any hon. gentleman pretend to say that where large works become disorganized they are in a safe condition? No man will say that they are safe. The general manager said to these gentlemen, and we have no reason to doubt these gentlemen, that if these men will return to work, in the course of ten days they will be in a position to negotiate, and, perhaps, bring about a friendly agreement. He has apparently gone back on that statement, according to the documents read in this House to-day. We have the statement made by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) to the effect that the general manager would walk to Gananoque or Ottawa in order to bring about some kind of an arrangement, that he would take back all the men, but now we find that he repudiates that statement. As one who knows something about trackmen and something about the service of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, I know perfectly well that in every branch of the service of that company there are men who have been there for long years, until they have arrived at the age of 45, 50 or 55 years. It may be the view of the general manager that these men have lost their usefulness to the company, and it may be that they are taking this means of removing the old men, the men who have been long in the service of the company. We have hon. gentlemen making statements to this House in respect to the dollar a day. I have seen the statement made by the management of the company that it is not correct, and that they have men in the employ of that company who are receiving $1, $1.10, and so on up to $2.50 daily, engaged in the track service of the company. But the great bulk of the men are the men who are receiving $1 a day less two cents for insurance. What is the position of those men who are receiving a low grade of pay? Every railway company in this country is supposed to have its section gangs, numbering five on every section. When it comes to the cold weather, or the winter season, all these companies lay off two or three of these men from each section, and it is the men who are receiving the low grade of pay that are laid off. Consequently, these men are not in a position to provide for their families, and now they are losing valuable time. It is valuable time because this is the season of the year when they make their income, and it is on this season of the year that they depend on making sufficient to keep themselves and their families during the winter season. So, I say, for that reason and for others, the Government should interfere in this matter. Surely there can be no harm if the right hon. leader of the Government, as suggested by my hon. friend from Prince (Mr. Bell), should intimate to the Grand Trunk Railway Company that one or two members of the Government are prepared to treat with the general manager and the employees engaged in this conflict. Why? Because the general manager has stated that at Kingston and Actonvale, damage has been done to the tracks of the railway company. If that be true in regard to the first strike, what are we liable to expect now when the men have been called out again? There will naturally be a few sympathizers with the men who may not be discreet men, who may do violence to some of the tracks of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and, if that happens, what might be the result? We might hear, to-morrow or the next day, of a very serious accident occurring on the Grand Trunk Railway Company's property in which valuable lives might be lost. So, I say, that it is not the time to lock the stable after the horse is stolen; now is the time to try to bring about an arrangement whereby the loss of life may be prevented. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said that these men who have done damage should not be taken back. I have yet to learn that any trackmen, engaged by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, has committed any violence by injuring the track the cars or anything else; but, I say that if any employee has so far forgotten himself as to do violence to the company's property, the management would be justified in not re-engaging him. Fault has been found with the two hon. gentlemen who took part in this struggle. I cannot see, after what we have heard, how these gentlemen, having any concern for the welfare of the country, could refuse the encouragement they received from the representative of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, how they could refuse to accompany him to Montreal. When the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) had prepared a telegram and submitted that telegram for the consideration of Mr. Wainwright, who either improved on it or sent it to Montreal as he found it, it seems to me that these gentlemen were quite warranted in going to the general manager and trying to bring about a satisfactory arrangement. That being the case, I think Mr. Hays, instead of taking the arbitrary ground that he would not arrive at any conclusion with these men, that the statement should go forth to the people of this country that he was granting or guaranteeing nothing to the men at all, should have acted in a fairer spirit. What does he say? He says: let the men come back unconditionally. Now, if he was eager to bring about a settlement, if he could forget his vanity for a moment, he should have put in black and white some sort of a statement which would have been signed by these two gentlemen, and if that had been done, no doubt a settlement would have been arrived at. If we are to have this question brought up in the House almost every alternate day for the purpose of urging the Government to effect a settlement, would it not be better that the Prime Minister should take the matter in hand, and if the right hon. gentleman does so, Conservatives and Reformers alike in this country will give him all the credit he deserves.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). I may state, Mr. Speaker, that coming as I do from a railway town, although I have not many railway men in my constituency, my sympathies are largely with the railway men, in relation to their request for an increase of their wages, and their request to get pay for overtime. I am, in fact, with the men in everything but their action in going on strike. I have always been opposed to strikes of any description, because I feel it is dangerous to the community that a large body of organized workmen should be ordered to strike, and thus paralyze the business of the country, at the beck and nod of one or two leaders who may or may not be responsible men.

Mr. INGRAM. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) object to the way the railway companies amalgamate?

Mr. HUGHES. I have always taken a stand against combines of any description for any illegal object. I believe they are against the interests of the public, and I trust I shall not change my views on that matter. The railway men in the community whence I come will bear me out in the statement that again and again in matters of dispute the men have come to me and I have acted as an intermediary, and in every single instance the men and the company have been satisfied, and the rights of the men have always been guarded. That has been the case on more than one occasion. This question of increasing the wages of the Grand Trunk trackmen came before me as far back as February last, when it was suggested to me by certain officers of the company—not the head officers of the company by any means—but by officers of the company who should have been in a position to understand the matter, that they thought possibly the company would be willing to pay $1.10 a day as the minimum wage, and to remove certain disabilities in the way of not paying for overtime. I was then led to believe that the head men of the labour organization would be satisfied with nothing short of the rate paid on the Canadian Pacific Railway, namely, $1.25 per day, and would permit of no settlement on any other basis. I will say here that take them all in all, the striking trackmen are as fine a body of men as you can find in any country, but it is unfortunate that they should be led by one or two men who assume to direct their action. What has been the history of strikes? I venture to say that three-fourths of the tramps in Canada and the United States are tramps because they were at one time strikers. They lost their positions when they went on strike, others took their places, and although the head centres continue to draw their pay, the unfortunate men were forced to travel from centre to centre looking for work, until faint and heart-sore, they gave up hope and became a burden on the community. It was my privilege to be on the staff ride between Toronto and Hamilton during the Queen's Birthday week, and I told many of these men whom I met that if they went back to work and asked the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition to mediate a better solution could be brought about than could possibly be obtained by their remaining on strike. Again, I recommend to the heads of the strikers' organization that course. I know, Sir, that there are not 5 per cent of the men who would not rather be at work than on strike, and I know that if the leaders of the organization adopt my suggestion, before three weeks are over the men will be in a better position than they otherwise would be. While the position of some few may be improved by the strike, I say that a large number of these men will never get back to the positions they have recently left if they persist in continuing on strike. I know the feelings of the heads of the company towards the men, and I know they have the greatest sympathy with the men. It has been charged against the company that they do not look after the interests of Canadians, but I could point to several Canadians who have been sent across the line by the company to occupy high positions on the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway, and I know on the other hand that very few Yankees have been brought in here. Mark you, I have every sympathy with the men, and I have in the past taken occasion to have their pay increased, and I shall be glad to do so again, but I stand here to-night to condemn in the strongest manner possible anything that savors of a strike until all other means fail. With all due deference to the leaders of this strike, I do not think they exhausted every other resource, although of course I may have been misinformed as to that. I again make the suggestion that the leaders of this strike should order the men back to work, and that they should ask the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition to act as intermediaries between the men and the Grand Trunk Railway Company. If that be done, I venture to say that a satisfactory settlement will be arrived at in very short order.

Mr. GEO. McHUGH (South Victoria). I feel a strong interest in this matter, Mr. Speaker, for I believe it is a question which concerns more than the two struggling parties to the issue, because the travelling public as well are very much interested. I might say in reference to the Grand Trunk Railway Company that I have a very strong sympathy with it. It is the only railway system that passes through the section of the country which I have the honour to represent; it has done us a very good service, and I should not like to see any barriers placed in the way of its continuing to render that good service; I know well many of the employees who are out on strike; I know they are hard-working, honest, industrious men, and I know that they have given good and faithful service to their employers. I know also that it was because they felt that the wages they were receiving were scarcely adequate to support themselves and their families that caused them to go out on strike, and it was not any mere matter of sentiment. I would like to see both sides of this House treat this matter, not from a political point of view, but as a matter that very much concerns the people of this country. I take for granted that any hon. gentleman who occupies a seat in this House has more or less influence with the railway element in the section from which he comes. They look to him at times for advice; and if both sides used their advice in an effort to bring about a conciliatory settlement of this difficulty, I think the result would be more likely to be brought about than if one party or the other tried to make political capital out of it. The right hon. the Premier said to-day that he had the matter in hand and was trying to bring about a settlement until he thought the matter was taken out of his hands. This is one of those unfortunate things that sometimes happen, when people, in acting from the best of motives, make a fatal mistake. If both parties took hold of this question, without any desire to gain a political advantage the one over the other, but simply with the object of doing what was in the best interests of the country, I believe they could do a great deal towards bringing about a settlement of this unfortunate affair; and if they do that, I am sure the two struggling parties will very much appreciate their action. I do not wish to detain the House any longer. I know that the question has been discussed, perhaps more than it should have been, but I thought that before the discussion closed, I would say just a word on behalf of these men, who I think cannot be blamed by any person for having gone out in the hope, not of tying up the railway, but of bettering their condition. We all must admit that the pittance they were receiving was not sufficient to support themselves and their families, and, whether they have been mistaken or not, I am sure that this House and this country will sympathize with them in their efforts.

Motion negatived.

QUARANTINED IMMIGRANTS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask the Government whether they have any information in respect to the steamship "Lake Huron," which is said to be detained at Grosse Isle with 1,000 Doukhobors on board, among whom two cases of small-pox broke out yesterday and eleven to-day?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The only information I have is what I have just been told by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who I am sorry is not in his seat. The ship is detained with small-pox on board, but to what extent I have no information.

RECIPROCITY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

Mr. N. C. WALLACE (West York). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the right hon. First Minister to some despatches that have appeared in the Chicago "Record." There is one dated Washington, D.C., May 31, which says :

All of the British colonies in America—
Meaning the West Indian and South American colonies—

—are about to send agents to the United States to negotiate reciprocity treaties, and the first delegation is expected this week. This is done, of course, with the consent of the mother country, which claims the right to control and conduct all relations between her colonies and foreign countries, and Mr. Tower, charge d'affaires of Great Britain in Washington, will be present at the interviews to represent the person of Her Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria. No attempt will be made to apply the reciprocity section of the Dingley Tariff Bill.

Then it goes on to say that the matters that will come up will be the duties on those products which Canada supplies to a considerable extent to the British West Indies, and which Canada can still further supply. It says :

One of the most important concessions to be demanded will be a reduction in the duty on flour. In Jamaica it is 8s., or $2 a barrel ; in St. Vincent, Grenada, 4s.; in St. Lucia, Barbados, St. Kitt's and British Guiana, it is 4s. 2d. In the Virgin Islands, Antigua and Dominica it is 5s., with 12½ per cent ad valorem additional. In Honduras it is 2s. 1d.; in the Bahamas 2s. 6d., with 10 per cent ad valorem ; in Turk's Island 3s. 9d.; in Trinidad 3s. 4d., and in Montserrat it is 2s.

Now, there has been a good deal of discussion in the press and elsewhere about a proposed alliance or annexation of the West Indian possessions, or some of them, to Canada, and I would like to know whether, in the face of the conferences that are being held between the Government of the United States and these colonies, the Government of the Dominion of Canada are watching these proceedings, and whether they have taken any steps in connection with them in the interest of Canada, or whether they propose to do so. In my opinion, if a reciprocity treaty be made with the United States, it will be most injurious to the interests of this Dominion. The British West Indies and the British possessions in South America—

The PRIME MINISTER. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot make a discussion now.

Mr. WALLACE. I was calling the attention of the House to an important matter. If it is necessary, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude with a motion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman would have no right to move a motion now.

Mr. WALLACE. Why ?

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Because a similar motion has just been dealt with.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But other business intervened.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The question raised by my hon. friend is a very important one, and if he makes a brief statement, I am sure the House would not be disposed to press the rule.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman has made his statement.

Mr. WALLACE. I just call the attention of the Government to this matter. I do not wish to discuss it further than to say that it is the duty of the Government to watch closely the trend of affairs there, and to see that the interests of Canada are protected.

The PRIME MINISTER. We are watching closely the interests of Canada in that respect. So far as the Government are concerned, we have received no information whatever of the statement contained in the newspaper from which my hon. friend has just read.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. J. A. GILLIES (Richmond). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) to the incomplete state of a return which he promised to this House some time ago, and which he laid on the Table a few evenings ago. I refer to the papers connected with the dismissal of a fishery officer in my county, Mr. Lenoir. The principal paper on that file is an alleged report of the Commissioner of Fisheries, Prof. Prince. In the return furnished to me, there is no report from Prof. Prince. There is a memorandum which cannot be properly designated as a report. It is headed as follows :—"Report from the Commissioner of Fisheries to the Minister as to the record of fishery officer Lenoir." Then what purports to be the report says : "Lenoir's record not satisfactory." There is no date to this or signature, and it is evidently no report. I ask, therefore, that the report upon which the hon. Minister dismissed Mr. Lenoir be furnished to the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman is altogether astray. This matter was brought up last year by Senator Miller, who thoroughly examined into it, and took the trouble to come to the department and see all the papers. The hon. gentleman has every paper in the record.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no report.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know what you would call a report. There is a statement given by Professor Prince to me, that Lenoir was not an efficient officer. That is all there was.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no signature to it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. GILLIES. This is not a report.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know what the hon. gentleman calls a report. That is the report given me by Mr. Prince, and on that report Lenoir was dismissed.

Mr. GILLIES. Do I understand the Minister to say, that the paper I have in my hand, containing simply these words: "The record of Lenoir not satisfactory," without any signature or date, is the only report he has from the fishery commissioner, Professor Prince?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is all there is.

Mr. GILLIES. And upon that report Lenoir was dismissed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Precisely.

Mr. GILLIES. We will have something to say on this, when the hon. gentleman gets to his estimates. If that is the way he governs his department, I am not at all surprised at the indignation of the public.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—APPEALS FROM THE CHAIRMAN.

On motion of the Minister of Railways and Canals, that the House resolve itself again into committee on Bill (No. 138) to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal,

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER said: With the permission of the House, before we proceed with the consideration of this Bill, I would like to make a full statement, in view of what occurred last night.

With the view of preventing any such misunderstanding with respect to the procedure on the questions that arose during yesterdays sittings in Committee of the Whole, and on the appeal to the House from the decision of the Chairman of the committee, I may state that I have referred to the authorities on such subjects, and find the following rules laid down authoritatively:—

1. If the committee wishes assistance or information on a point of procedure which they are in doubt, or on which the chairman has not expressed or does not wish to express an opinion, they may ask the advice of the Speaker. But, as a rule of practice, the chairman alone is responsible for the business of the committee, and no appeal can be made from his decision on a point of procedure except to the House.—(Mr. Speaker Brand, "Blackmore's Decisions," p. 21, "Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure," p. 483.)

2. In the former case, where the committee refers to the Speaker for advice, progress is reported on motion duly made, and when the Speaker has given his advice, the committee resumes in accordance with the regular practice of the House.—(Bourinot, Idem, p. 483.)

3. In case of an appeal to the House, there is no such motion made, but the chairman leaves the Chair immediately, and refers the point in dispute to the Speaker, so that the House may decide thereon.—(Bourinot, Idem, p. 482 and note, Rule 76 of the House.)

4. If the Speaker is absent, and the Deputy Speaker has to take the Chair in case of such an appeal, it is in accordance with regular practice of the Canadian as well as English Commons, for a member to take the Chair of the committee for the moment, and make the report of appeal to the Deputy Speaker, who will thereafter submit the question to the House for a final decision.—(May, 191; Bourinot, Idem, p. 482 and note p. 487.)

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into committee.

I. C. R. EXTENSION TO MONTREAL—AGREEMENT WITH THE G. T. R.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. I asked last night for the basis on which the hon. Minister arrived at the $140,000 which he pays as a sort of rental. The hon. gentleman was looking over his papers in order to get those estimates, but some other question arose, and he did not give the committee that information.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I knew that I had given the special committee a full, detailed statement, which hon. gentlemen will find in the report of that committee, but was not able at the moment to lay my hands on the precise page. It will be found on page 11 of the report, filed as exhibit No. 15, being the statement furnished to me in February, 1897, by the chief engineer, giving his views as to what would be a reasonable amount for the Government to pay for the use of the station and terminals. He makes up the amount in this way, and I will read his estimate to the committee. He has estimated that these 4 miles of railway—that would be 4 miles of the terminals which we are to use—might fairly be called our portion, not, as he and I understood it, that we are to imply that there were any particular 4 miles which we would use of the many miles constituting these terminals; not that we would be limited to the use of any 4 miles of them, for they would all be open to us—but that, as a means of arriving at an estimate of a fair rental, it would not be unreasonable to ascribe to the use by the Government 4 miles of those terminal lines of railway. He put this at $320,000, and took one-half of that amount, $160,000. He estimated that there would be 10 acres of land for terminals at $2 per superficial foot, $871,200. The passenger station, if we were starting to build, would cost $100,000, and the Grand Trunk, for the purpose of this calculation, paying one-half, that would amount to $50,000. Then, for tracks, at $4,500 per mile, $18,000; freight sheds, $30,000; engine-house, $30,000; proportion of workshops, $30,000; sundries, $50,000, a total of $1,239,200, which, at 5 per cent, would represent $61,960 per annum.

The amount claimed by the Grand Trunk Railway, as the value of the proportion of the terminals that the Intercolonial Railway would use, was $62,500. Then, a further statement was prepared by the chief engineer in the same month, February, 1897, and was furnished to me. I will refer to a memorandum containing the statement which appeared at pages 13 and 14 of the Report of the Drummond County Commission:

The cost of the construction of this bridge—
That is, the Victoria bridge.

—was, I think, $10,000,000. It could probably now be completed for $6,000,000.

For the use of this bridge by the Intercolonial Railway, a fair rental would appear to be about $60,000 per annum.

Those who recall the actual figures, will remember that, if you divide the $140,000 in three sections we would give practically $40,000 for the use of the bridge. Accompanying and forming part of this memo. was an estimate of tolls over the Niagara bridge, on the basis of the number of passengers, number of locomotives, and so on, making a total of $247.50 per day. This, multiplied by 313 days, gives a total of $77,467.50. Such is the calculation he made for my use, applying the figures on the basis of the rates which now obtain, and had obtained, over the Niagara River bridge, which, as the chief engineer stated, and which appeared the other night in the statement of the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Gibson), to be, I think it was, one-thirteenth of the length of the Victoria bridge. These are the two statements.

Mr. FOSTER. So, what my hon. friend has taken, as the basis of his calculation, is to estimate the cost, and take half the cost, and allow a permanent rental of 5 per cent on that half.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is the principle, but it will be seen that I have not allowed that always.

Mr. FOSTER. But that is the principle. I would like to ask the hon. Minister, how it is that the deputy seems in one case to have taken half the value, and in others the whole value. For instance, when he estimates the 4 miles of railway at $320,000, he takes half of that as the amount on which 5 per cent is to be paid. But when you come to 10 acres of land for terminals, the whole amount is put in and 5 per cent calculated upon it. In the same way, with all the other things, except the passenger stations. So, except for the passenger station and the 4 miles of railway—I suppose, from the bridge to Bonaventure station—nothing is divided.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will observe that this statement contains an estimate of 10 acres. Of course, one at all familiar with the character of the terminals, would know that it would be impossible to lay down the tracks for the various descriptions of traffic upon such a limited acreage as that. This is, of course, largely, if not altogether, a matter of conjecture, not at all easy to figure upon. But this was, at all events, the mode which the chief engineer adopted, according to his best judgment in forming an opinion as to what these rentals might reasonably be.

Mr. FOSTER. Did my hon. friend ever contemplate the view, that, having made your valuation—however at hap-hazard it seems to be made, and without principle, and because half is taken in some respects, and the whole is taken in others—it would have been much cheaper for the Government, if they once ascertained the cost on which they were to pay interest for ninety-nine years, instead of paying an exorbitant interest of 5 per cent, for the Government to borrow the money and pay it over, seeing that they can borrow at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, or a little more than half of 5 per cent? This would save an immense amount in the course of ninety-nine years.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Such a mode of effecting an agreement would not have been practicable.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I could furnish the hon. gentleman with more than one reason; but one, I think, will satisfy the committee. It would not have been open for the Government to buy from the Grand Trunk the privilege of using the terminals and paying cash, representing the capital value at the rate of interest agreed. We could not do it, in view of the mortgage obligations of the company, in such a way as to relieve the property from these obligations. I at once admit, there is not much practical danger of the encumbrance on the company's property being foreclosed; still, we should have been unable to come to Parliament and defend ourselves against the criticisms that the hon. gentleman and his friends would have offered. That was entirely out of the question.

Mr. FOSTER. The ground upon which I understand the hon. gentleman to say, that this course, not the other, was pursued, is, that these terminals and buildings are under mortgage.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, mortgage after mortgage.

Mr. FOSTER. But, if the Minister would be in danger of having this foreclosed, under the terms I suggest, he runs the same risk under the arrangement he has made. But the hon. gentleman has bound himself to pay $2,500 a year for ninety-nine years, and he has not lifted the mortgage. The mortgage remains exactly as it was.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman has not, I think, as clear an apprehension of the difficulties which I am trying to point out as he would have if he were a professional man. We do not have to face the possibility of a foreclosure of these mortgages because we are only under obligation to pay rent from year to year. The moment that any legal procedure were taken to foreclose these mortgages, and the Grand Trunk Railway ceases to be in a position to continue us in the possession of the property, our obligations to pay rent ceases, our lease is at an end. We are not called upon to pay one moment longer than the Grand Trunk Railway is in a position to continue to us the use of their property in accordance with the terms of the lease.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not suppose my hon. friend contemplated that as an eventuality.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not, I do not think that would be likely to occur. But this I do know, that we would be laughed to scorn, not by the hon. gentleman alone but by every member of this House, if we had come to Parliament with any such proposition as to purchase the terminal rights. We would have been asked the question: How is it that you undertook to pay the capitalized value of this property to a company whose property is subject to mortgage, when to-morrow you are liable to be deprived of the use of that property? You parted with this enormous sum of money, $4,000,000, represented by these rentals, and you have not a thing to show for it. Why, I would have been ashamed, and Parliament would have been ashamed, of any such transaction. My hon. friend will see that there was only one way in which, under existing circumstances, we could have acquired securely and safely the right to use this property, and that was by paying a rental for it, a fixed annual amount for the time that we may be allowed to occupy it under our lease.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend did not do that, because there was no legal difficulty in the way, otherwise the assumption is that he would have taken that method, and, consequently would have saved to the country the difference between $36,000 a year and $62,500 a year, in perpetuity, you may say. I think that is a fair inference. Now, I want to put this question to the hon. gentleman: If there was merely this legal question in the way, why did not the hon. gentleman make this bargain with the Grand Trunk Railway upon this basis: There is a valuation, you agree to it, and I will agree to it, and I will pay you the current rate of interest thereon, that is, the rate at which the Government can get money. If the hon. gentleman had done that, he would have made exactly the same saving, and the inference is that he did not do it because of the legal difficulty which the mortgages impending upon the property placed in his way. There is no reason why the hon. gentleman should, for perpetuity, pay 5 per cent upon one-half of the large valuation of these properties. Although the lease is only for 99 years, it is practically in perpetuity. Well, the credit of the country is improving, 50 years from now it may be better than it is, and 100 years from now, still better. But without anticipating any better credit, at the present time money is worth 2½ per cent; yet my hon. friend for 99 years pledges himself to pay 5 per cent interest on this great valuation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is not drawing a logical conclusion from the facts as they exist. He does not imagine that it rested with us to say what the Grand Trunk Railway should accept. It did not rest with us to say what the Grand Trunk Railway Company should dispose of these privileges for. True, it rested with us whether we would give the amount which the Grand Trunk Railway Company exacted. The hon. gentleman's inference is that it was in our power to go to the Grand Trunk Railway Company and tell them: We are prepared to give you so much, we are prepared to give you a rental upon what we consider to be a fair value for such proportion of that property as we are going to use, and we put that rental at such a rate of interest as we choose to fix, and you must accept it. The hon. gentleman ignores the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway had resolved not to part with the privileges which we desired to acquire for any less sum than $150,000, and that altogether outside of any question of the rate of interest. The very best reduction we could secure from them was to reduce the sum of $140,000. Now, it is entirely immaterial how you figure that out, whether the Grand Trunk Railway were to get 5 per cent upon a proportionate valuation such as we make here, or whether you make the valuation higher and the rate of interest lower. The least sum for which we could get the privilege was $140,000. As I have said, we got the amount down until we reduced it to $140,000. That was not done by any process of calculation, but it was the result of a good deal of negotiating as to the final maximum that the Government would be willing to pay. Finally the Grand Trunk Railway came to the conclusion that they would accept that amount, but not one farthing less. You have got to look at the question from this general aspect, look at all these privileges and their enormous value to us. I say that you cannot estimate within many millions what the value of that property is. Of course, we are only going to use a small share of it relatively with the Grand Trunk Railway, and it is not worth so much to us as to them, but we are getting it at a price which, I think, no man can gainsay is a reasonable and fair price. We are getting the use of splendid facilities, of magnificent terminals, of all that we could desire in order to get into the city of Montreal, and we are getting it at a gross capitalized value of $4,500,000, figured out at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. Before the committee the other night, going over all these different provisions which constitute the whole series of railways that we are acquiring, I put a fair and reasonable valuation upon them. You can absolutely throw away millions even then, and after you have dropped these millions from the fair and reasonable value of the whole, you have then got only 3 per cent upon $4,500,000.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend constitutes himself a splendid advocate of the Grand Trunk Railway authorities when he goes to make a bargain with them on behalf of the country. The Grand Trunk Railway, probably, knew the gentleman with whom they had to deal. Instead of going as the representative of the people of Canada, he seems to have gone rather as the advocate of the Grand Trunk Railway itself. There was no difficulty in making a bargain. The hon. gentleman stated that he could not make any better bargain, and it is not on record that he tried to make any better bargain. It is not on record that he tried to make a better bargain, and he plumes himself because in the whole transaction he just got $10,000 a year off the amount that was formerly asked. Is it that the Grand Trunk Railway Company sets its foot down and says: We will take that or nothing. The hon. Minister says that the facilities of the Grand Trunk Railway Company are large: there is no doubt about that. The fact that the hon. Minister gets an entry by this railway and gets a 5 per cent user of these terminals does not abridge one iota the benefit of these terminals to the Grand Trunk Railway. The fact that the hon. Minister pays for the maintenance besides all this, does not compel the Grand Trunk to abridge, to the least possible extent, any of the privileges or the share that the Grand Trunk has of these terminal facilities. They have property of immense value; the Grand Trunk have all the use of that property and they get $140,000 in cash for which they do not bridge themselves by one single facility or privilege or bit of the user that they will make of these terminals. Then the hon. gentleman pays for the maintenance on the basis of user. When the bargain first came down it was a bargain very much harder than this. The points will be brought out as we go through it. We have brought out one of them already. The Grand Trunk Railway Company, which set its foot down, and which would not take one cent less, actually has given to the hon. gentleman, under Senatorial pressure, the sum of $6,000 a year in perpetuity. That is a neat and handsome sum. Then there is the 5 per cent section, to which we will come by and by, in which a very material change has been made. What I want to call the attention of the committee and of the country to is this: There were two parties to be benefited, and the Grand Trunk having those expensive terminals there with these facilities for the use of which the hon. Minister was bound to pay—a mortgage as he says, although that does not make any difference—the Grand Trunk Railway Company is getting the use, without the abridgement of one single bit of these facilities, and in addition to the use $140,000 a year based on the valuation of one-half of that with an interest rate of 5 per cent per year. What I think the hon. Minister should have done was not to accept the valuation which the Grand Trunk made, not to undertake to pay for a user which he did not need, one-half when the user was only 5 per cent. He would have good reason for saying: I will pay you interest at the rate at which the Government can get this money for. If he had done so he would have saved the difference between $36,000 and $62,500 a year, and in 99 years he would have saved an immense sum to this country.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have had occasion to make several statements on this subject. I have stated to the House on every such occasion that I had an opportunity that these negotiations occupied a good deal of time, that I devoted my best attention to them with the assistance of my officers. I approached the Grand Trunk Railway Company in respect to it in the most earnest and sincere and devoted way, the standpoint of the public interest, the best arrangement I could for the country. I have stated that. I need not repeat it. Whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) accepts that statement or not is to me—I wish to say to him now—a matter entirely immaterial. I have put the statement before Parliament, I have put it before the country, and I am content to leave the result of the negotiations as they are embodied in the contract, as evidence which will, I think, amply support my action in the matter. I repeat again, what I said a moment ago, that it is perfectly idle to talk about getting the use of this property from the Grand Trunk Railway Company on the basis of any valuation we chose to put upon it and agreeing to pay them at the rate of 3 per cent a year. The Grand Trunk Railway Company would not dream of it. I started in the first instance with what they thought too low an amount. I told the Grand Trunk Railway Company that it ought to be done for about $110,000. They would not dream of it. They told me there was no use of talking about it. I went up a little, and they came down and we got together at $140,000. At one point it was a question whether or not the negotiations should terminate, and the whole arrangement be at an end.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) permit me to ask if, when these negotiations took place, with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the hon. gentleman had committed himself to the purchase of the Drummond County Railway or was it afterwards?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, Sir; the Government were not committed, in the remotest degree, to either of these propositions until we knew with confidence that we could carry them both out.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman occupies a still less defensive position than if he had the excuse of saying that, having been committed to the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, he found himself in the hands of the Grand Trunk.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said nothing of the sort.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend says that he was not in that position. It makes his position all the less defensible than if he could plead so paltry an excuse. The hon. gentleman with his eyes opened, and not committed to any scheme, went into this arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. He has admitted that he could make no better terms. The hon. gentleman had the other alternative, and that was not to touch it at all. Then the hon. gentleman himself was in doubt. He said that he declared to the Grand Trunk that about $110,000 would be ample.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CLANCY. Did not the hon. gentleman commence with that proposition with the Grand Trunk Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Certainly, I tried to make the best trade I could. I tried to get the railway for the least rental, just as any business man would do in purchasing a piece of property. I did not jump at the proposition of the Grand Trunk the moment they presented it, and say, Yes, we will take that. There was a great difference of opinion, and during the negotiations there were two or three occasions when they came nearly ceasing altogether.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what was the basis of the calculation of making $110,000 offer to the Grand Trunk? Was it a simple gamble, to use an expression employed by the hon. member himself; was it a mere gamble? The hon. gentleman declares that he went over $110,000 without taking into consideration anything rather than whether the Grand Trunk Railway would take that sum or not. He declares that there was a property of immense value belonging to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but he has failed to state, that while it was valued by the Grand Trunk Railway Company it had not that value to the people of Canada who are asked to make this vast expenditure for the purpose of carrying out the hon. gentleman's scheme. It does seem that the more the hon. gentleman discusses this question the more does it become apparent that he had set his mind upon carrying out this scheme, and that no matter what objectionable features there were to that scheme, he was bound to go through with it. Under these circumstances I do not think that the people of Canada will be disposed to take that view of it. In the first place the hon. gentleman has not shown that it was necessary to entertain a certain offer and the hon. gentleman has no justification for the ground that it was necessary for him to come to such terms as the Grand Trunk would exact from him. Suppose the Grand Trunk Railway asked the Minister for $200,000 would he have acceded to that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will draw an inference. The Grand Trunk Railway offered to take $156,000, and they did not get it. It is not reasonable to ask, would I give $200,000 when I would not give $156,000.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the negotiations have ended there if they refused to come down, and would the whole scheme have fallen through?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It would.

Mr. CLANCY. Then, if the Minister's last limit was $140,000, he must have had some basis to guide him in that, and he should have stated it to the House.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understood from the Minister last night that certain returns had been laid on the Table, but I have been unable to procure them so far.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They were in the hands of the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart).

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I spoke to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) about it, and I spoke to the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) about it, but they state that the documents referred to did not contain the information I asked for. This agreement provides that the cost of maintenance shall be fixed on proportionate user, and that returns shall be made for that purpose. These returns would readily disclose to this committee what the proportionate user is. I think the hon. gentleman stated that the user of the Intercolonial Railway was about 5 per cent compared with the Grand Trunk Railway.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The statement which I laid on the Table shows a percentage larger than that. I think it averages 20 or 25 per cent. It varies, of course, by reason of the circumstances which would be disclosed in the return which I brought down.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Do I understand from my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) that the relative proportion is about 20 per cent, or one-fifth?

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, I think it fully amounts to that with the business we are doing.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Of course, my hon. friend will bear in mind that it is only a small portion of the terminals which is being used by the Intercolonial Railway, or will be used for a great many years.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It will be used in a sense just as much as a terminal as if we were doing ten times the business. We have to go over the tracks, but we do not go over them as often as if we did a larger business.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think it might be well to bear in mind what Mr. Wainwright stated about this. He deposed before the committee.

By Mr. Borden :

Q. Your use of these terminals would be very much larger than anything the Intercolonial could make?—A. Certainly.

Q. What proportion?—A. That would depend upon the business they do. The position is this: the agreement provides that we have the use of those terminals in common. I have shown in this plan that it involves the use of 40 miles of sidings, freight sheds, round-houses and all appurtenances. It is very much like going to a man who owns a palace, with my wife, having married, and asking him to give me his whole house. Of course, I can only use one room, but in a few years there may be a large family. I do not know what proportion will be our use and what will be theirs.

Q. How long do you think it will take this Intercolonial to have a family large enough to occupy this palace of the terminals?—A. I think it will not take them long, and I think the proposition to extend the road to Montreal is one of those things that will add materially to the traffic.

Q. You have something of an idea of the business that came over the Intercolonial before they connected with Montreal?—A. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Q. You have an idea of the relative proportion which your business at Montreal bears to that business?—A. Well, it is very large, of course, in comparison.

Q. Could you give any idea of the proportion?—A. No, because it varies materially.

The family does not seem to have increased very largely during the past year. I am a little surprised that the proportion should be so large as 20 per cent, because Mr. Wainwright would not undertake to say that the use would be one one-hundredth. This is Mr. Wainwright's evidence :

By Mr. Haggart :

Q. Is it a 100th?—A. I would not like to make a positive statement. While they have in common the use of these facilities they only pay according to wheelage.

Q. Are there any other roads that have the use of your terminals in Montreal beside the Intercolonial?—A. The roads that are running into Montreal, of course, with cars—

It is unfortunate that we have not the return which my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) did lay upon the Table, as he says, but which I have not been able to obtain access to.

Mr. FOSTER. The ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) had these papers, I had them, and the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) had them as well. They came into our hands as we were at the time making some criticisms and investigations. Now, there was nothing in these papers at all to show what my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) wanted, and what we have asked for repeatedly, namely, that during the months which the Intercolonial Railway has been using these terminals, and the Grand Trunk Railway as well, what proportion existed between the two users. For instance, if there are a thousand cars of the Grand Trunk Railway that used these terminals for a certain length of time, but only one hundred cars of the Intercolonial Railway used them, then we could get the proportion. The Minister gave us the amount we paid for user, but that does not answer the question of my hon. friend at all. It is as wide from it as it possibly can be. The only way in which the question of comparative user can be concluded is to let us know just what has been the proportionate user by the Grand Trunk Railway and by the Intercolonial Railway during the nine or ten months they have been operating it together. The return my hon. friend did not bring down. What he brought down was the amount the Intercolonial Railway has paid, but that does not show the proportion of user.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the hon. gentleman will see, on reference to the question asked by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), and on reference to the Journals of the House, that the return asked for by the hon. gentleman was brought down, and just as he asked for it. I handed the memo. to my officer; he procured the information as I suppose, and placed it in my hand, and I brought it to the House and laid it on the Table. While I did so, I am free to confess that the statement was not worked out month by month in such detail as the hon. member now asks for. It gave the payments of the different months, and the amount was totalled.

Mr. FOSTER. Of money simply. Does not my hon. friend see that that does not give us the total user by the Grand Trunk Railway of these terminals for that time? It simply gives us what we were charged for our use during that time. We cannot get at the truth in any other way than by getting the user of the Intercolonial Railway on the one hand, and the user of the Grand Trunk Railway on the other, so that we can compare the two.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have never brought in the information in the form in which the hon. gentleman has stated it. The way this matter is disposed of is this. The Grand Trunk makes out its claim month by month, and, before settling the account finally, the general manager sends up his auditor, who goes over the Grand Trunk books and ascertains whether the amount that has been charged, is accurate or otherwise. There are some considerable sums, which I know, from statements I have received, are still in dispute between the Grand Trunk and ourselves; but we are not furnished, nor do I think the general manager is furnished, with a statement from the Grand Trunk Company of their number of cars, the quantity of freight, or the number of passengers, or whatever may be necessary to arrive at a conclusion. They simply make out their claim for the money due on account of the Intercolonial, and the auditor goes through the books for that month, and verifies the correctness of the statement.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend does not seem to understand that I asked for the information which I really did ask for. I am certain my hon. friend understood it at the time, because I made it so plain that a child could understand it. I referred to section 3 and section 33 of this agreement, and I pointed out that the cost of maintenance was to be based on the proportion that the combined engine and car mileage of the Intercolonial trains bore to the total combined engine and car mileage running over the joint sections each month; and I pointed out that, under section 33, "Her Majesty and the company shall each furnish to the other promptly, each and every month, all the information necessary to the ascertaining and checking of the rates, fares, charges, shares of costs and other returns to be made as under these presents." So that, if this agreement is carried out, as we must presume it is, my hon. friend must have in his department the information showing precisely what the proportion of the Intercolonial engine and car mileage is to the combined engine and car mileage over those portions of the Grand Trunk terminals which are used by the Intercolonial, and my hon. friend will see that it is extremely important that we should have that here.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would like to see where the importance of that comes in, unless the hon. gentleman thinks that the officers of the Intercolonial are going, with their eyes open, to pay more money than they ought to pay.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend, or any other member of this committee, must see, without any explanation from me, how extremely important that is.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I confess, I do not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Are we not dealing here with the question, whether this is a fair rental or not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No; you are dealing with the principle—with the question, whether it is fair for one company to contract to pay the other, which maintains and supplies all the staff, and keeps the road up, according to the proportion of business which each does.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Let us not confuse maintenance and rental. I am not finding fault with the basis of maintenance. I cannot think my hon. friend is really so difficult of comprehension as he seems to be. I want the proportion of cost of maintenance for the purpose of comparing the user of the Intercolonial with the user of the Grand Trunk, and for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not $140,000 a year is or is not a fair rental. Surely, my hon. friend does not find that so difficult of comprehension as he seems at first to find it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I confess, I cannot see the relevancy of it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I regret that my hon. friend cannot. I will go on and see if I cannot make him see the relevancy of it. I do not despair of doing so. Suppose the Grand Trunk uses these terminals 100 times as much as the Intercolonial. Then, you have this state of affairs, that, if the Grand Trunk were leasing and paying on the basis of their user, they would be paying 100 times the $140,000, or $14,000,000. Does not my hon. friend see that it is most important to know just what user we are making of these terminals, as compared with the Grand Trunk Railway? I think my hon. friend should bring down the information which I asked for two weeks ago. I pointed out the very sections of this agreement under which the return was to be made. I pointed out to him that his officers were entitled to receive, and must receive, under the terms of the agreement, at the end of each month, the precise information I desire. I brought that question to the hon. Minister's attention last night, and he told me he had brought the information down.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Did you find the statement? I told you I handed it in.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I did not find it. The information I asked for is not there, and I looked carefully for it with the clerk.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I furnished the statement long ago.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). On that I join issue with the hon. gentleman. If he will refer to "Hansard," he will see that I asked him exactly for what I have asked to-night. I pointed out then these two sections, under which it is apparent the information must be in his department at the end of each month, and he said he would bring it down.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I handed the request to my officer at once.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If he did, and if, as the result, we have the document he refers to to-night, he handed to his officer something which did not correspond with what I asked.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What date was it?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). About ten days ago, just at the conclusion of a debate upon the Drummond County Railway resolutions.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will look it up.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not think that I have very much further to say until I get that information. It seems to me—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You can argue it on the one per cent basis.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not want to do that. I want to argue it on the real basis. This is not an academic discussion, I suppose, altogether.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It is only twenty after eleven.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not know what my hon. friend means by that?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hour is early.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend the Solicitor General seems to think this is a somewhat humorous phase of the matter. He thinks, I suppose, that to pay $140,000 a year for a one-hundredth user of these terminals would be perfectly just on the part of this Government.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You are not arguing it seriously, because that would be wasting your time and ours.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am sorry my hon. friend regards it in that light; we cannot all of us bring to this matter the ability and learning of my hon. friend.—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is not ability that is lacking on the part of my hon. friend.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). —but he should not, from the height of his knowledge and great ability look down upon the humble efforts of hon. gentlemen on this side to throw some light on the question. We are endeavouring, in all seriousness, to show, what ought to be apparent to hon. gentlemen opposite without any argument, that if the Intercolonial Railway makes only one-hundredth part of the user of a portion of the terminals which the Grand Trunk Railway does, $140,000 a year is an absolutely excessive price. If my hon. friend the Solicitor General thinks this is not a serious proposition, let him get up and show that it is not an excessive price, under the circumstances. And, perhaps my hon. friend, the Postmaster General, who seems also to regard this matter from a somewhat humorous standpoint, will be good enough to enlighten the committee and show that the argument I am making is not a good one. I venture to think that any hon. gentleman would find it a very difficult proposition to show that if, as the hon. Minister of Railways says, this is to be argued on a basis of one-hundredth part of the user, $140,000 a year is not only an excessive, but an absolutely scandalous price. That is the reason why I asked the Minister of Railways ten days ago to bring down this information, which we have not yet got, and which, I supposed, from his statement last night, had been laid on the Table.

Mr. BRITTON. Do you not accept the hon. Minister's statement when he says that it is nearer 25 per cent than 20 per cent?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am informed by the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) that the Minister said to him in this House that the percentage was about 5 per cent. He said that to me only to-day, and I venture to submit to my hon. friend from Kingston, who is a reasonable man, that when I asked for this information ten days ago and the Minister of Railways told me he would bring it down, and when I was informed last night that it had not been brought down, it is nothing unreasonable on my part and nothing to provoke the hilarity of hon. gentlemen opposite, to inquire why it has not been brought down. Does the hon. member for Kingston think that I am taking any unreasonable view?

Mr. BRITTON. I do not think that the rent we are to pay for these terminal facilities depends upon the amount of the user.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It does not depend upon it altogether?

Mr. BRITTON. Certainly not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It does not depend on it at all?

Mr. BRITTON. I do not think so. If we get an undivided half of all these terminals, year after year, the basis of computation as to the amount we are to pay does not depend on the amount of user we make of it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If my hon. friend will bear this in mind, he will see to what his argument will lead him. If we require to use simply one mile of those forty miles of terminals, and if we use that one mile to the extent only of one-thousandth part of what the Grand Trunk Railway uses it—

Mr. BRITTON. In that case you would not have rented it at all.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax)—his argument would be exactly the same. Under those circumstances, we might require to use a part for the purpose of making connection at Montreal, and it would be more relevant to inquire, first, what is the value of the portion of those terminals as compared with the remainder? Second, what user do we make of that portion as compared with the user of the Grand Trunk Railway? Both of those circumstances, while they would not absolutely control the amount of rental we should pay, would, nevertheless, be perfectly relevant matter to consider. At all events, they would be sufficiently relevant to justify my asking the Minister of Railways to bring down information upon those points which, under the terms of this agreement, must be in his possession.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was going to ask my hon. friend a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Certainly.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was going to ask whether it would be a fair proposition to say that we would set on one side the amount of user which the Intercolonial Railway would make of this railway and its terminals, and on the other the amount of user which the Grand Trunk could make even if it had a great deal more business than it has now?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). May I ask the hon. Minister to repeat that, as I was interrupted and did not understand him.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was not putting a very serious question to my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax).

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) takes an interest in this matter, and I desire to lay before him his responsibility in regard to it. I do not think the hon. member can have retrograded so far that he has no regard for the pledge of a Minister whom he supports. I refer to the Minister of Railways and Canals. We have a perfect right to ask for the information upon which certain sections of this agreement is based, information which it is enacted here shall be furnished to the Minister of Railways and Canals. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to think that we of the Opposition have any right to the presentation of our views to the country at all. Leaving all the other points aside, have we not a right to such information as will enable us to show our position and the grounds for it first to Parliament and afterwards to the country—because the arbitration must finally rest with the country? Our contention is this: You are giving $140,000 a year for rental, we want to know the proportion of user. This information must be in the hands of the Minister if he has carried out the agreement under which he has been working. We asked ten days ago that this information should be laid before the House. The Minister took note of it and promised to bring the information down. He was reminded last night that it was needed for the discussion of this schedule, and replied that he had laid it upon the Table. We come now to this conclusion, and my hon. friend for North Wellington will not dispute it—that the information has not been brought down, and, consequently, we are absolutely deprived of the ground for argument as to our position in regard to the inordinate payment of $140,000 a year for rental. The Minister of Railways and Canals deliberately violates his promise and is backed up by the Prime Minister in doing it, and is backed up by the hon. member for North Wellington in doing it, and he is backed up by the member for Kingston (Mr. Britton). Notice was given ten days ago that this information would be required, yet he has not the information here to-night, though we are going over the items on which that information was required. The hon. Minister himself acknowledged that the information is not here. Now, I put it to the hon. member for North Wellington: If he were on the Opposition side and was making his argument to the House and the country, would he not think he had a right to the information promised by the Minister and that must by this time be in his hands? And would he not have firm grounds for saying that as the Minister had not implemented his promise and brought down the information, it would be better to leave the matter over until the information is before the House? The hon. member has taken that position over and over again as a fair-minded man and relying on his rights as a member of this House. We might be this night on the third reading of the Drummond County Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries gives one of his laughs, one of his superior kind of laughs which indicate to himself, if not to others, the supreme contempt in which he holds any one who would make an utterance which would provoke in him such risibility. But we might be to-night on the third reading of the Drummond County Bill, and I have asked the Minister of Railways and Canals, over and over again, until I am tired for the engineer's report on the state of the road before it was taken over. I have not received that information. And if we were reading the Bill for the third time, I should have come to the final conclusion of this question without having the information to which I have a right and which the hon. Minister has promised. Likewise he has promised the other which we require particularly at this stage of the measure. The Minister of Railways and Canals has the very grave idea of the question, that it does not matter. He said at one time that our proposition of user was 5 per cent, and he says to-night that it is 20 per cent. How does he know? He could only say that, if it is a true statement on the basis of information which he has in his possession. And then he said to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden): You can make it one per cent if you like. That is his view of his promise to give the information and of the importance of the information itself. Now, I am coolly and calmly putting this to the members of the committee who are present. I think this is not proper treatment, and I think we have grounds for saying until the Minister brings down the information which he promised and which ought to be given, we ought to intermit the discussion.

THURSDAY, 8th June, 1899.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have found the reference of exactly what I did say on the occasion referred to. It was on the 20th May. I quote from page 3866 of "Hansard":

I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) to one piece of information which he might afford to the House, and which must be very accessible. Under the third clause of the agreement of 1898, the cost of maintenance of the Montreal section and the Chaudière joint section is to be apportioned. The share of the Intercolonial Railway on the one hand and the Grand Trunk Railway on the other is to be in proportion to the engine and car mileage that each road bears to the total combined engine and car mileage. By the 33rd clause of the agreement, Her Majesty and the company are to furnish to each other promptly, each and every month, all the information necessary to the ascertaining and checking of the rates, fares, charges, shares of costs, and other returns to be made as under these presents. Therefore, the Minister (Mr. Blair) must have from the Grand Trunk Railway Company returns and information which indicate exactly each month, what the proportion of user, made up in that way, by the Grand Trunk Railway and by the Intercolonial Railway respectively is. I venture to submit that information of that kind will be very useful to the House at some stage of the proceeding. It has not been brought to the attention of the House so far, as I understand, and it will be clear to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) that it might at least be useful to some hon. gentlemen in the House for the purpose of making up their minds as to whether the arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway was a fair arrangement. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) himself, in giving evidence before the committee, stated what is, of course, the case, that the arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company is so necessarily connected with the agreement now brought before the House by these resolutions, that the two must be considered together. I would like, therefore, if the hon. gentleman will, before this vote is taken, or before the Bill founded upon this resolution is brought down, be good enough to furnish that information to the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There will be no difficulty, I think, in furnishing that information, if the hon. gentleman desires it. Does he desire it for the whole period that the arrangement has been running?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not want to put the hon. gentleman to any unnecessary trouble, but I thought it was probably easy to furnish it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think there will be no difficulty so far as I am aware in furnishing it down to the last date we have received a statement from the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It will, I should think, be furnished before the introduction of the Bill or before the Grand Trunk Railway matter is disposed of.

Last night I brought the matter to the attention of my hon. friend once more, and I stated explicitly, because I was anxious that there should be no misunderstanding:

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). A week ago, I asked the Minister for information as to the proportion which the user of the Intercolonial Railway bears to the Grand Trunk Railway. I pointed out then that the material for that information must be in his possession, because for more than a year the Intercolonial Railway has been paying the cost of maintenance on the basis of proportion as user, and returns are made each month. The Minister (Mr. Blair) told me that he would give that information to the House, up to the last day on which a return had been received. I was absent for a couple of days, and it is possible the Minister may have done so, but in looking over the "Hansard" I cannot see it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I brought down the return which I promised you, and it is in the possession of the House.

It turns out that no such return has been brought down. I do not suppose that any hon. gentleman opposite believes that I went to the trouble of bringing that to the attention of the Minister without entertaining a very strong opinion that the information asked for was relative to this question. I submit to the Minister of Railways and Canals that he should, in pursuance of the pledge he made to me, bring down that information before seeking to go further with this Bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What objection is there to bringing down these papers? It does appear to me to be treating the House with scant courtesy, when information is promised and it is not brought down.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There would be no objection to furnishing the information at once if I had it. My hon. friend has not thought it worth while to take my statement into his consideration, a statement which I have already made to the committee more than once, as to how the accounts were made up. The Grand Trunk Railway will send in a claim at the end of each month of the amount which they demand from the Intercolonial Railway. The general manager, having received that demand from the Grand Trunk Railway, sends his auditor up to Montreal, and he goes over the books. My hon. friend is under the impression that the Grand Trunk Railway transcribes for the Intercolonial Railway all the books of the company for the month, showing what their business has been and what our business has been over the joint section. But they do not do that. They make out a claim, and the auditor examines into their books to see whether the claim is correct. In doing that he satisfies himself from the company's books what the amount of tonnage is, what the number of trains are, or whatever facts it is necessary to ascertain in order to determine whether the charge is proper. I spoke to Mr. Schreiber on the subject, since the hon. gentleman mentioned it the other day, and I have information from him as to how the accounts are investigated and certified by the auditor of the Intercolonial Railway. We do not receive any statement from the Grand Trunk Railway Company of the amount of business which they do; we do not get anything showing what the hon. gentleman claims this statement ought to show.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But you can get it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I presume we could.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman has paid accounts on it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have paid accounts on the report of our auditor.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think the Grand Trunk Railway will be complimented by the haze which the hon. gentleman throws over their methods of keeping accounts. The hon. gentleman knows that the manner in which the Grand Trunk Railway is run guarantees that they know exactly every one of these items, and the hon. gentleman could get them in a few hours, if he wanted to get them.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What the Grand Trunk Company is able to furnish us promptly would be a statement of the outlay made by them in respect of the whole line, including the terminals, and then a statement as to how much they charge us. Whether our proportion is stated correctly by them, whether they have overcharged us or not, would at all times depend upon the result of the investigation of the company's books made by the auditor of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend does not seem to understand the point that we are making. Let me read, for his information, the third section of his own schedule:

That Her Majesty shall and will pay to the company a share of the cost of maintenance of the Montreal joint section and the Chaudière joint section, including tracks, bridges, switches, sidings, signals, appliances of all kinds, platforms, water-tanks, water supplies, fuel stations, fences, crossings and all other appurtenances and appliances used by it jointly with the company, and upon the two joint sections it has the right and privilege of usage included in this demise; such share of the cost of maintenance—

Which has been paid now for about thirteen months. This arrangement has been going on since March, 1898; payments have been made since then. Now, what is the basis of the payment:

—such share of the cost of maintenance of each joint section to be in the proportion that the combined engine and car mileage of the Intercolonial Railway trains made over each of the above mentioned joint sections bears to the total combined engine and car mileage running over each of the above mentioned joint sections during each month; every engine, passenger and freight car counting each as one car.

That is the very basis of the charge that is made, and the payment that has been made by the Intercolonial Railway is on the basis of the proportionate user of the combined engine and car mileage of the Intercolonial Railway, compared with the combined engine and car mileage of the whole. So that no payment could have been made without first having ascertained the cost; that is the very basis of it. For thirteen months the arrangement has been in operation, and these payments have been made. It was just thirteen days ago that the hon. Minister of Railways said that that could be easily given and should be given. It was to be given before the resolutions were passed. The resolutions have been passed, and we have not that information. We are now at the only stage when we can have committee discussion upon this measure. The hon. Minister has not brought the information that we consider vital to the discussion of this matter. Surely, because we are two parties, pitted against each other, we are not going to withhold what is fair-play from one to another. The hon. gentlemen who are in majority to-day may be on this side of the House afterwards; but whether they are or not, the fact that they are in the majority is the best of reasons why they should be fair and not, with the power of their majority, seek to prevent members from having the basis that they require and the information which they ought to have. I would like the hon. Minister to say whether he proposes, under these circumstances to press the matter further to-night when we have not the information we should have.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. member asks me to furnish, and he now interprets the request, as made before, as a request to furnish a statement which will show what the engine and car mileage of the Grand Trunk has been for that period per month on these sections, as compared with that of the Intercolonial.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We want the gross.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. Minister (Mr. Blair) has in "Hansard" what we want, and it was placed there and put before his eyes thirteen days ago.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I stated to the hon. gentleman that the Grand Trunk Railway Company does not furnish, nor has it furnished, as I am told, such a statement. I have certainly never received such a statement.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They are compelled to.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They are not compelled.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, by the 33rd section.

Mr. FOSTER. Surely the hon. Minister read the 33rd section.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I know what it contains.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) permit me to read the 33rd section:

That Her Majesty and the company shall each furnish to the other promptly, each and every month, all the information necessary to the ascertaining and checking of the rates, fares, charges, shares of costs and other returns to be made as under these presents.

How is the hon. gentleman to make a computation of the Intercolonial Railway share unless he has this information furnished him by the Grand Trunk?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The officer goes to the books.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) has made an appeal to me, and I will endeavour to meet him as far as I can, and if my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) is willing to bring that information down we can go on and come to a conclusion and get through with this business. The object of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), who made this request the other day, is to have the information upon which the payments are made by the Intercolonial Railway to the Grand Trunk for the use of their road.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What I asked for was the information showing the exact proportion of user. I asked distinctly for what my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) will find at page 3866 of the "Hansard," for information showing the exact proportion of user. This bears upon the section which makes the cost of maintenance payable on that basis, and in regard to which returns must be made monthly by each railway to the other. This information, which is relevant to the matter. It is quite true I did not make any argument on the subject then. I did not state what the argument was that I proposed to base upon that information, and I would not have thought it would have been necessary to have asked the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to bring it down.

The PRIME MINISTER. Perhaps there is a discrepancy between the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) as to the exact information which is wanted. But we can now come to a conclusion. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals tells you that he has information as to which statements have been made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company monthly, showing the amount which is due under this agreement. This statement is audited every month by the auditor of the company. He has that in his office and he tells you that it is all the information upon which he proceeds. My hon. friend is quite willing to bring that down. I will undertake to have it on the Table of the House to-morrow, and we may go on with the business before us. Will that be acceptable?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would like hon. gentlemen to understand that I cannot furnish at this moment what I have not got, and I have not got the information that the hon. gentleman desires. The officers tell me that they never have received from the Grand Trunk Railway Company a statement of the total engine and car mileage except that month by month the auditor of the Intercolonial Railway, for the purpose of verifying the accounts, goes over all the station books and other books of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. They do not require them to transcribe these accounts, but they open and exhibit their books to the auditor of the Intercolonial. He goes over them and finds out from them whether or not the proportion charged of the whole cost of maintenance is correct according to the contract.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am not inclined to be otherwise than serious about this. I am not sitting here until twelve o'clock at night for fun. I do not want any information that the hon. Minister cannot furnish. Notwithstanding what he has said, I do not see how it is possible that the information cannot be in the office of the Department of Railways and Canals. If it is not there and cannot be obtained within a reasonable time, within ten days after I have asked for it, I am not going to press for it. I asked for it; I gave reasonable notice, and if it cannot be furnished we will say no more about it, but I did ask for it in time and surely the hon. Minister will not say that we are unreasonable in desiring that the further consideration of this Bill shall be deferred until it can be brought down. I can assure the hon. gentleman as to the relevancy of this information, and that we are serious in asking for it. How is it possible that the auditor, or some official of the Railway Department, is not in possession of this information? The proportionate cost of maintenance can only be arrived at by first ascertaining what the user of each railway is. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to tell us that he has an auditor in his office who, after going down to investigate these accounts in the books of the Grand Trunk, will come back without being able to tell the hon. Minister what the proportion of the user was? The hon. gentleman will not admit that he has an officer in his department so inefficient as that. This officer must have ascertained the very thing that we want to know, and if he came back from the Grand Trunk books without that information all I have to say is that he is not fit to hold his position.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Is that a fair statement?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is my opinion and that is the statement I am prepared to make. I cannot bring myself to believe that the hon. Minister is correctly informed when he states that this information is not in his department, because the first thing that he must ascertain is the proportion of user. That I asked for ten days ago.

The PRIME MINISTER. Whether the auditor is competent or not is a question as to which the hon. member (Mr. Borden) may have his opinion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is merely an illustration.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, I do not criticise the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) at this moment. His object is to have certain information, and the Minister (Mr. Blair) tells him that he has information in his department which is not exactly the information which the hon. gentleman asks, but whatever it is he is ready to bring it down.

Mr. WALLACE. He says he has no information.

The PRIME MINISTER. No. The Minister says he has the monthly account given by the Grand Trunk Railway to the Intercolonial Railway. Then he has the fact that these accounts have been audited by the auditor, and whether the auditor should have taken an extract of the books as is contended by the hon. member for Halifax, or whether it would be sufficient for him to make a general report, is a question that in future may be open to debate.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The 33rd section of this Bill provides for returns.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They have never been made such as the hon. gentleman states.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If they have not been made the agreement has not been carried out, and I was proceeding upon the assumption that the agreement had been carried out. The agreement says that each railway shall furnish to the other the necessary returns for the purpose or determining the proportion of user.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not the language.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then I will read it:

That Her Majesty and the Company shall each furnish to the other promptly, each and every month, all the information necessary to the ascertaining and checking of the rates, fares, charges, shares of costs and other returns to be made as under these presents, and Her Majesty and the company mutually agree to give the necessary facilities, including access to the books and papers to the auditors of the Intercolonial Railway and of the company respectively to enable them to verify the accounts under this agreement.

That all traffic balances, charges and shares of cost, and other returns to be made under these presents, shall be made monthly, and Her Majesty and the company mutually agree to promptly audit and pay each to the other each month the total amount chargeable against the other for the month immediately preceding.

That is to say, each party has to render accounts to the other at the end of each month, and then access to the books of each railway is to be afforded to the other for the purpose of verifying these accounts. The sending of the auditor is for the purpose of verifying the account which has first been received from the Grand Trunk Railway. If that course has not been pursued, then the agreement, it seems to me, has not been carried out.

The PRIME MINISTER. That may be or it may not be; it is a question of opinion.

I imagine that perhaps railway companies who have a great deal to do, and who transact enormous business each day, are not so particular as to the form of doing business as perhaps a gentleman versed in the law would critically require. Agreements of that kind have been made before, and I imagine that railway companies are in the habit of rendering these accounts after the usual manner they adopt. The moment the Minister says: I have not the information which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) asks, but I am willing to bring to the House to-morrow the information as to how we have been carrying out the contract, the hon. gentleman should accept that, and he will see afterwards whether that satisfies him or not. I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) to proceed with the business of the House in view of the undertaking of my hon. friend (Mr. Blair), that he will bring down to-morrow what information he has received, and the accounts rendered to him and audited by our auditor. That should be satisfactory.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It appears to me that the Prime Minister is anxious that this information should be given, but that the Minister of Railways is not so anxious.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You are quite in error about that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If I am in error I accept the correction. The Prime Minister says that the Minister of Railways has certain information in his possession and that information will be given to-morrow. But a moment afterwards the Minister says: The Grand Trunk Railway sends us an account and we audit that account, and that is all we have. That is not the information that has been asked for by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says that perhaps a little carelessness is practised in connection with furnishing these returns.

The PRIME MINISTER. I did not say "carelessness."

Mr. MONTAGUE. The "Hansard" will show what the right hon. gentleman did say. He said they might be too busy, they had a great deal of work to do, and these matters might be neglected.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is not what I said. I said that probably railway companies, having a great deal of business to do, did not render these accounts in the critical manner in which a counsel learned in the law would expect.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then there has been neglect.

The PRIME MINISTER. Not necessarily.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not only neglect, but a direct want of observance of this agreement. If ever there was a case in which the greatest possible care should be exercised in furnishing this information, this is the case. The right hon. gentleman knows that this matter has been discussed in Parliament before, and that this is an arrangement made by the Government with the Grand Trunk Railway for the purpose of seeing how it would pay. It is a sort of trial trip, so to speak.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) said not a bit of it, but such the country understood it and such this Parliament understood it last year. It is a temporary arrangement, the Minister of Railways told us, for the purpose of showing that it was a good arrangement to be made permanent by the House. Such being the case, the greatest possible care should have been exercised in getting every possible information, which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) knew the House would require before this Act was passed. There are two things required from each of the railways under the 33rd section. The first condition is, that the information necessary to the ascertaining and checking of the rates, fares, charges, shares of cost, shall be given in a series of returns by the Grand Trunk Railway to the Intercolonial Railway. I am not a lawyer, but if that is not declared in that 33rd section, I do not think my judgment is worth a cent, or the judgment of any other man who reads it.

The PRIME MINISTER. Be easy.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is impossible to be easy when hon. gentlemen opposite, either are colour blind and absolutely unable to see anything, or are not willing to see anything. I challenged the Prime Minister to read that 33rd section, and to say to the House that it is not contemplated by it, that the Grand Trunk Railway shall give all that information to the Intercolonial Railway as the basis upon which the charges shall be made. That is the first thing required by the 33rd section, and the next thing required is, that the books of the Grand Trunk Railway shall be open to the inspection of the officers of the Intercolonial Railway, in order to see whether these returns are correct, and whether the proper proportion has been charged up against the Intercolonial Railway. If that is not implied in the 33rd section, the hon. gentleman made a stupid bargain, a careless bargain, one that no Minister of Railways should ever make. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that that information is obtainable. He knows that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway separate their roads into their various divisions, and are able to tell to an exact nicety just the train mileage and the earnings of every particular branch. If they were not, their accounts would get into a very serious mixture. If the hon. gentleman has not got that information, he can get it, and the Prime Minister, instead of asking us to go on with the work of the session, should promptly, candidly, and openly say to the House: We will get that information, and we will allow the Bill to stand until that information is got. Now, I ask the Prime Minister to say whether that 33rd section does not contemplate that the very fullest possible returns are intended to be made by the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial every month for the purpose of arranging a settlement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman will allow me—

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Prime Minister understands the question very well, and if he will pay me the respect and the House the respect of giving an answer to that question, we would like very much to have it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Prime Minister will give his answer later, if he chooses. I would like to mention to the hon. gentleman one fact, and I would ask him to test the soundness of his own proposition by inquiring into the fact. I will venture to say—though I do not know, never having been so told by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or by the Grand Trunk Railway Company—that if the hon. gentleman chooses to telegraph to either of these companies, he will be told that the Canadian Pacific auditor goes to the office of the Grand Trunk, when he receives his account for the Canadian Pacific proportion of charges for the month, and he examines the books, which the Grand Trunk throws open to his inspection, and he simply reports whether the charges are correct or not; and it will end there.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. Minister answer me one question? He stated to-night in the hearing of the committee, that the user of the Intercolonial of these terminals was at least 20 per cent. On a previous occasion, some weeks ago, he stated that it was 5 per cent. I would like to ask him on what basis of knowledge he makes the statement that we have a user of 20 per cent. He must have some basis, or else it was a guess. He now says he cannot give the proportionate mileage.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. When the question was first asked me, I had not made any inquiry upon it, and I stated that I thought it was about 5 per cent. I asked my deputy what he thought was the amount, and he told me he thought it was over 20 per cent. He also stated, as I have said here to-night, that there were not furnished any copies or transcripts of the Grand Trunk books, and that it was the auditor of the Intercolonial who examined the account and verified its correctness; but he did not furnish us with any statement such as the hon. gentleman asks for, of the gross amount of engine and car mileage of the Grand Trunk as compared with the Intercolonial.

Mr. FOSTER. The auditor must have a test when the Grand Trunk bills are presented for payment.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He looks over the books and finds out.

Mr. FOSTER. When he looks over the books, there is a test by which he finds out.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He finds out what the gross engine and car mileage of the Grand Trunk has been, and what the gross engine and car mileage of the Intercolonial has been, as shown in the books.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the auditor has it. That is all we want.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have said he does not have it in the sense contended for.

Mr. FOSTER. Why, the Minister has just stated that the auditor has it. He must have it, or he cannot pay the bill.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know what all this has to do with the ratifying of the lease?

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to tell him?

Mr. McMULLEN. I will tell you. This is a matter of detail altogether; it is a matter that can be adjusted afterwards; it is a matter which the lease provides for. If afterwards the auditor of the Intercolonial or the Minister of Railways is not satisfied with the claim presented by the Grand Trunk, under the terms of the lease, he has a right to challenge its correctness, and the Grand Trunk must prove that the Intercolonial is indebted to them in a certain amount, or they need not pay the money. That is an after consideration. I contend that the arguments that hon. gentlemen opposite are presenting have no right to stand in the way of the ratification of the lease. The lease provides that in proportion to the car mileage made by the Intercolonial in Montreal, they shall pay their share towards keeping the track in order. That is the arrangement. Up to the present time, the auditor of the Intercolonial has gone over the books of the Grand Trunk Railway, and he has reported what the percentage was, and that percentage has been paid. If that system is not satisfactory, hon. gentlemen may next year, or the year after, demand, not only that that statement be produced, but that the Grand Trunk Railway be called upon to furnish the car mileage on their own line.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They cannot do it.

Mr. McMULLEN. They can do it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister says they do not.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I do not.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Grand Trunk Company can furnish their car mileage and the Intercolonial can furnish theirs. That is only a question of detail, and should not stand in the way of the ratification of the lease. I hold that hon. gentlemen opposite have no right to go into the question of the settlement of the account between the Grand Trunk and the Intercolonial in dealing now with the principle of the lease itself. For instance, if hon. gentlemen choose to summon the auditor of the Grand Trunk before the Public Accounts Committee this year, they can examine him on oath as to the basis on which the account is made up. Very well, while you have the power in your hands to regulate the payment, not only now but every year to come, for the 99 years, why should that stand in the way of the ratification of the lease? It is only a matter of detail.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask the hon. Minister a question? What is the information necessary to arrange the proportion of this cost between the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, which the auditor has to have?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He has to go to Montreal—

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the information—not about going to Montreal—what are the figures?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He has to find out whether or not, in the first place, the gross charges upon the road made by the Grand Trunk Railway are correct. He has to look at the vouchers, to see the vouchers, on the one hand; then he has to ascertain whether or not the amount which the Grand Trunk Railway charge against the Intercolonial Railway is correct, and, in order to do that, he goes over the books of the Grand Trunk Railway, which are thrown open to his inspection, and satisfies himself whether that charge is correct or excessive. That he does, unquestionably, by seeing what amount of engine and car mileage, on the one hand, is Grand Trunk Railway, and what portion, on the other, is Intercolonial Railway. But he does not make any return of that. He simply reports to the general manager whether the account is correct or not, just as he finds the facts to be. Is it not, now, grossly unfair for hon. gentlemen to pretend that it is any part of the business of the Minister to busy himself about whether or not the auditors of the Intercolonial Railway are doing their duty? Is he not clearly justified in assuming that the general manager and the other officers who have the supervision of these matters, are doing their duty, and not paying one cent more than we are entitled to pay under the terms of the agreement?

Mr. MONTAGUE. What the hon. gentleman has said is, that, in order to reckon how much ought to be paid by the Intercolonial Railway and how much by the Grand Trunk Railway—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Grand Trunk Railway pays the whole of it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But you pay your share. In order to reckon how much should be paid by the Intercolonial Railway, it is necessary for the auditor to have the car and engine mileage, the cost of maintenance of that section of the line. Is not that information necessary to a reckoning of the proper share of the Intercolonial Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Now we have it clear. Let me read the thirty-third section, remembering what the information is that is required for a proper settlement of the account. The thirty-third section says:

That the companies shall furnish, each to the other, promptly each and every month, all the information necessary for the ascertaining, &c.

That section requires that that shall be furnished, and the Minister says it is never furnished.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If you will apply to the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has a precisely identical agreement, I am satisfied they will tell you that they do not ask the Grand Trunk Railway, nor is it according to railway usage that they should, transcribe all their books and hand over a copy of that transcript. They simply open their books to the auditor.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why, when I asked the question, the hon. Minister said, referring to the returns made up to the last day of each month:

I think there will be no difficulty, so far as I am aware, in furnishing down to the last date we have received a statement from the Grand Trunk Railway.

That is inconsistent with the statement now.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I made the statement to the hon. gentleman in good faith, supposing the information would be forthcoming; but I tell the hon. gentleman now the full extent to which it is possible to get it, unless you take the time of getting an abstract from the books of the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). It has been evident all along that the Minister of Railways has got into a question that is too deep for him.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALLACE. But, when the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) gets on his feet and tries to elucidate and elaborate this statement, he is a sight for the gods. He was completely in a labyrinth of his own imagination, which is not very extensive at any time. He said: What have we to do with the lease? Why, if I understand it rightly, it is the lease we are to consider.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not say so.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I said: This is a matter of detail; that we should ratify the lease, and this was a matter of detail, to be dealt with afterwards.

Mr. WALLACE. What I have in my notes here is, that the hon. gentleman said: What have we to do with the lease; it is a matter of detail? Well, it is the details we are considering. It is the lease we have before us now; the lease is the bargain made between the two parties; and, if ever there was a precious lease, without beginning or end, made in the interests of the party of the second part, it is this lease between the Government of Canada and the Grand Trunk Railway. Why, the hon. Minister of Railways, when asked by the ex-Minister of Finance, whether 5 per cent of the traffic that came on this road was Intercolonial Railway traffic, or 20 per cent, he said he could not tell, that he had not his mind directed to that subject. But Mr. Wainwright, who, probably, knows more about it, and who had his mind directed to that subject, which was, in fact, the subject he had to consider, fixes the figures at nearer 1 per cent than 5 per cent or 20 per cent. If it is 1 per cent, it is a most extraordinary bargain, that, for 1 per cent of traffic, we are paying for one-half of the road.

Take another and a very important aspect of the case. You rent a road, and you pay for it how much? You pay for 35 miles from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal a rental of $140,000, or $4,000 per mile. Supposing you rent a farm for $4,000 a year, and you get about 1,000 acres of good land for $1 an acre, and supposing, as in this case, the Minister made his boast that the income from the whole was $2,740 per mile over this railway, that is, the total income over each mile of road for which he pays $4,000 a year rent per mile. According to the boast of the Minister of Railways, the total receipts per year on that mile is $2,740. And the average expenses per mile about balance the receipts. They are about $2,750 a mile, against receipts of $2,740 a mile. And in addition to these expenses you are paying $4,000 rent per mile of road. Then, when we say: perhaps this part of the road is more valuable than the other and we wish to have the figures to decide that, the Minister of Railways and Canals has not a single figure to submit to the committee. The country have been looking with suspicion on the Drummond County deal and have been demanding to know the true inwardness of what are considered to be very peculiar transactions. But though the Government have been operating this road for two years, the only thing the Minister tells us is that his mind has not been directed in these channels and he cannot give us information. And the hon. member for North Wellington tells us that the rents which we are considering is a matter of no consequence and that "we"—that is, these big-headed statesmen, these intellectual giants—do not bother themselves with the paltry details of a lease, that the bargain is made, and you simply give to the other man what he wants. The Minister of Railways and Canals says that, allowing a wide latitude in every direction, there are millions in this bargain for the country, that it is the wisest bargain that can be conceived by great statesmen, and the hon. member for North Wellington, parrot-like, says "hear, hear." But when it comes down to figures he says we pay $140,000, and when an hon. member on this side asks what he would do if it were $156,000, he says, We would not accept it. The payment of $156,000 means ruin for Canada, but when the payment is $140,000 that is a bargain in which there is millions for the country. What an absurd statement that is. We want the information to guide us in coming to right decision on this question. Two years ago the Government could only say: We anticipate that the renting of the road by the Government will produce certain effects. But since that time we have had a trial of it, they have been running the road under a temporary agreement. They should be prepared to come here to-night and tell every month's receipts and every month's expenses. But, instead of that, we get nothing. I voice the opinion of this House and the country, yes, and the opinion of many hon. gentlemen on the other side, when I say that we have found that the Minister has come here, so far as information is concerned, dumb as an oyster, as void of any knowledge of the matter as if he had never been Minister of Railways and Canals.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Thank you very much.

Mr. WALLACE. Do not thank me; my duty is to tell the truth, and that is what I am doing. Then, they tell us that the auditor who goes over the books of the Canadian Pacific Railway has access to the books and can challenge any account, and that our auditor will do these things. Then, Sir, the auditor has been doing these things for two years. But where is his report? The Minister will give us no information, he says his mind has not been directed to these subjects. Where, then, has it been directed to? And what assistance does the Minister get from his friends. None, except from the hon. member for North Wellington. Where are the Minister's colleagues? Where is the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), with his clear and lucid mind? Why is he not assisting to explain what he knows requires explanation? Where is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding)? Slumbering in his place—"dreaming the happy hours away." Where is the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), that he gives his colleague no assistance? Why, even the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) is dumb to-night, contrary to all precedent. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), whose face we have hardly seen for weeks and months, since the plebiscite on prohibition, is here to-night. I suppose his very arduous duties down at his farm, with his valet to assist him, prevent him from attending to his duties in this House. But, though he is here to-night, he does not come to the assistance of his colleague the Minister of Railways and Canals. There is not a word from the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs), who votes with the hon. gentlemen opposite every time. They have gerrymandered him out, and he will be as subservient after the operation, if it ever comes into effect as he has ever been. The Minister of Railways and Canals likens this case to one going into a palace; and he says that if you go into such a building you have to pay your expenses, that you have to pay for half the building if you own half. But that is not a parallel case. This is like a man going into a hotel. He has all the conveniences of the hotel. He can go to the bar and quench his thirst, he can go into the lavatory and perform the necessary operations of nature. He can go into the dining-room for a meal. But he does not pay half the cost of the hotel, he pays about $3 or $4 a day. According to the analogy of the Minister of Railways and Canals he must rent the hotel, but you do not require to rent the hotel, you pay for what you get. Now, in this case we want the returns of the business that has been done on this part of the Intercolonial Railway system, we want the figures which will justify the Government in adding this piece of road to their system. They have now had some experience in the running of that road, and we want the figures to show that it is a profitable undertaking to pay $4,000 a mile per annum as rent, then to pay $2,750 per mile expenses, and then to get receipts of $2,740 per mile, or less than the running expenses, and you are the $4,000 rental out of pocket every year. The Minister of Railways and Canals in his speech says:

Mr. WALLACE.

We all know that times are not better in the maritime provinces to-day than they have been at almost any period during the last ten or twelve years. I would be very sorry indeed, if I were required to make a positive statement on the question, to say that we are enjoying greater prosperity in the province of New Brunswick in the last year or two than at any period during the ten years preceding. What inference do I draw from that?

Well, the inference I would draw from it would be that they had been humbugging the people. If they say that business is no better there than it has been at any time during the past ten years, they have been misleading the people, for they have been telling them about this growing time, and about the great efforts the Government are making to promote the prosperity of the people. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think we are entitled to the fullest information regarding this arrangement before we launch out into an expenditure of seven or eight millions of the people's money in an enterprise of this kind. The people require some arguments that will justify it. We cannot go back to the people and say: Well, we opposed it, but we could not get the information. They would ask us: Have you exercised the full rights of an Opposition to obtain this information? And if we go back to them and say: No, that we have not done our duty in this regard, that we have permitted the Government to railroad these matters through, why, Sir, they would relegate us to the Government benches, or some other place. We must do our duty as an Opposition, we must show to the Government and to the country how utterly ruinous and fallacious are the plans and the programme of the Minister of Railways and Canals. But perhaps we are doing an injustice to the Minister of Railways and Canals, because it is said, and believed, that he is merely a puppet that is moved, and that the inspiring motive behind the Minister of Railways and Canals is another Minister who is not present to-night, but who is known to have made his boast that he was the man who manipulated these matters. When the Government thought that a railroad was required in the Yukon country, it was not the Minister of Railways and Canals who sent up his engineer, but it was the Minister of Public Works who sent up his engineer. Now, how was it that in this case the Minister of Public Works has been permitted to make this bargain and to plan this thing out? He is like the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) who, a year ago, when he had got up a scheme for building a railroad fraught with loss to the people of Canada, the most wild-cat, impacticable scheme that ever was proposed to this House, compelled the Minister of Railways and Canals to get up and present it for the consideration of Parliament, though the Minister of Railways and Canals had refused to sign his name to it, and his name does not appear to the document to this day. He steps out, and another Minister steps into his office and signs as acting Minister of Railways and Canals. The Minister of Railways and Canals apparently had a little conscience when his colleagues, his wicked partners, were entirely void of it. Now, I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals, if he has any conscience left, to come down and say what we already know, that this scheme is not a good one for the people of Canada, that it is not one that he himself had planned out, but that it was forced upon him by that dominant power whose motto is "business is business," and of whom the Premier stated "nothing is too good for Tarte."

Mr. R. R. McLENNAN (Glengarry. There was a good deal of discussion yesterday about some bridges connected with this road. I promised the hon. Minister of Railways that when I got further information, I would furnish it to the committee. I am sure he would be disappointed, if I did not do so. The hon. Minister said that the bridge across the Yamaska River would cost $300,000, and that the bridge across the Richelieu would cost $400,000. I made an estimate, which was questioned and criticised. Since then, I have taken the trouble of sending an engineer down there to examine the place more carefully.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What did you do ?

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). I sent an engineer there.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What is his name ?

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). In giving my estimate of the Yamaska bridge, I estimated the spans at 100 feet. I find that they are a little longer than 100 feet. I said that there would be the same number of piers and abutments, but, owing to the additional length, the superstructure would cost a little more than my first estimate. I put it at between $40,000 and $50,000 yesterday. The estimate of the engineer I have in my hand. This bridge at Yamaska has two piers, composed of 13,860 cubic feet. The masonry consists of two abutments, which are even larger than the piers, being 19,504 cubic feet. Added together, there are 33,364 cubic feet, or 1,250 cubic yards, which, at $15 per cubic yard, amounts to $18,750. We find that masonry was contracted for in that locality, on another road that was built at $13 per cubic yard. The masonry on the swing bridge at Sault Ste. Marie cost $12 per cubic yard, and I say, that $15 per cubic yard is a good price, as any man who understands this work will admit. There are 381 lineal feet superstructure at $50 per lineal foot, although the price I got from the bridge company was $45 ; but, as the piers and spans are a little longer, I put it at $50. That would be $19,050, or, together $37,800 add for contingencies $2,500. This makes the total cost of this bridge, that was estimated by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals at $300,000, to be $40,400. Now, in reference to the bridge over the Richelieu, there are five piers, comprising 28,000 cubic feet ; then, there is a pivot pier, there being a swing, in which there are 16,000 cubic feet. There is another pier on the highway, which is additional and which amounts to 3,920 cubic feet. The abutments amount to 10,880 cubic feet, or, altogether, 58,800 cubic feet, equal to 2,200 cubic yards, which, at $15 per cubic yard, would make $33,000. The superstructure, 1,112 feet, at $60 per lineal foot, amounts to $66,720. It is considered by the engineer that $60, $15 more than the price which I quoted for 100 feet spans, should be sufficient for the superstructure, and the difference in the price would cover all the superstructure, including the draw. So that, altogether, for this bridge, that was estimated by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals at $400,000, this engineer estimates, would cost $99,720. He had added for contingencies $2,500. He says, that there is a good foundation ; that it is very near the rock, and that there would be no difficulty in getting a good foundation. Though it is a little longer, he estimates the cost of contingencies, foundations, &c., the same as he does the other. Thus, these two bridges would cost $40,400 for the Yamaska, and $102,220 for the Richelieu. There is a crossing a short distance from the present bridge that, if we were building a new road, it might be located there, and it would cost much less than the present bridge. The prices I gave to this House could be depended upon, as they are very little different from the estimates I had made in the first place. The prices I gave in the first place would be sufficient, taking into consideration any change that has taken place since, or any estimate that has been made to carry out the work, as I gave it to the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. If anything more was required than the speech we have lately heard from the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to convince us that he is early to be transferred to the Senate, I would like to know what it is. That hon. gentleman has always been looked upon as the economist of this House, but, after the statement he made here to-night, he never intends to face the electors of North Wellington again. Here we are discussing a question, a proposition to place upon the people of this country, and upon their children and their children's children, an annual charge of $140,000 for ninety-nine years. The hon. gentleman is going to blindly commit the country to this payment of $140,000 for ninety-nine years, and asks the committee to get the details afterwards. He says: Confirm the lease now, and bring down the papers and discuss the detail as to whether the bargain is a good one or not, afterwards. That is, practically, the whole extent of that hon. gentleman's speech. He thought he had done such a big thing that the Ministers and other members of the House would smile on him, and, because they did not do so, he got up and paraded himself before them to solicit applause for the way that he had put it. According to him, we must not question whether it is a good bargain or a bad one: we will simply vote the money, and settle the details afterwards.

The Minister (Mr. Blair) made the statement that it would require $700,000 to build two bridges, and my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), a gentleman of experience, pledged his honour as a member, that he could build the two for $150,000 and to-night the hon. gentleman (Mr. McLennan) produces an estimate from a competent engineer saying that these two bridges could be built for $144,000, which the Minister said would cost $700,000. No doubt the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) would say they would be cheap at $700,000, although they can be built for $144,000. But more than that, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) does not want the Minister to keep his faith with the House. Ten days ago the Minister (Mr. Blair) promised to bring down the documents which the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Borden) asked for; but to-night he comes here without the documents, and word came to the Opposition when the House met at 8 o'clock, that the Government were going to force this Bill through if it took until daylight. They arranged to get the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who used to be one of the greatest economists who ever entered Parliament, to say it was only a question of discussing the lease, and thus deceive the people of the country. Sir, we want the people of this country to know now, that this is one of the most outrageous bargains ever introduced into Parliament. This Government is compelling the people of Canada to pay $140,000 a year for 99 years, for a privilege that could be got for $30,000 a year, if there had not been a job perpetrated by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) long before this Bill was ever introduced. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) knows that he has a pledge from the Government that they will send him to the Senate, so that he will not have to face his constituents, and he approves of this deal. He knows very well that he will not have to go before the electors again, and so he says to himself: Let the other fellow that will follow me take the chances.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We were talking about some information which the Minister (Mr. Blair) seems to be now gathering from the columns of "Punch," paying no attention whatever to the debate. I am very sorry that the Minister (Mr. Blair) is deeply engaged, but I suppose it cannot be helped. If the Minister treats the House in that way, the Government cannot wonder that public business is being delayed. I do not think there is any desire on this side to lengthen the debate unduly.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am glad I made that remark, because it excited the risibilities of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), and awoke the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), so that now, whether he is receptive or not, he at least can hear what is being said. As to the lengthening out of the debate, I do not think the hon. gentlemen supporting the Government, if they were here, would allow this lease to be ratified, without the information which has been asked time and again from the Minister, and which time and again has been promised by him. Every time the debate lulls upon this side of the Chamber, the chairman (Mr. Campbell, of Kent) begins to get his papers together for the purpose of carrying the Bill. The chairman, whom I know very well, knows his business, and while he is doing that, I do not see the Minister (Mr. Blair) rising to make any promise with regard to this information. We have had promises from the Minister in the past, and even if we cannot get the information, it would be pleasant to get another promise from him. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) would even say he would try to get the information, it would make us think we had accomplished something. The Prime Minister, who seems exceedingly anxious to get the Bill through—because, no doubt, it is a stumbling block in the session—promised us whatever information there is, but immediately that he has won us with his sunny smiles and winning ways, the Minister of Railways declares that there is no information. If the Minister cannot give us this information let him give us a promise of it. We have sufficient confidence in his promise that we will agree to leave the Bill over until he fulfils his promise. Now, I think that is a very reasonable proposition.

The CHAIRMAN.—Shall this first clause be adopted?

Mr. FOSTER. Carried.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You cannot carry it in clauses; the Bill has to go as a whole.

Mr. FOSTER. We have been taking it by sections.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You can read it by sections, but the Bill must be carried as a whole.

On section 3,

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I would like to ask the Minister (Mr. Blair) to give us his opinion with reference to that clause.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What clause?

Mr. FOSTER. The third clause which has just been read by the chairman, while the Minister very courteously had his back to the chairman and to this side of the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) better not be impertinent.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, while the Minister had his back to the Chairman, a feat which he is more able to perform with despatch than to bring down information which he deliberately promised to the House and as to which he deliberately broke his promise to the House. The Minister of Railways is of course responsible to the hon. members on this side of the House as well as to the members on his own side, for the delay of business which has occurred. It was the obstinacy of the Minister of Railways and Canals which kept us here yesterday until three o'clock in the morning on one particular point. That was this, that in order to influence the House and the country, under his weight of ministerial responsibility, the Minister of Railways and Canals came gravely before this committee, and, as an argument why the committee should pass this arrangement, declared that to build a bridge across the River Yamaska $300,000 would be necessary, and to build a bridge across the Richelieu $400,000 would be necessary. That was challenged by my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), who is a practical man, and who had made an estimate that the bridge across the Yamaska could be built for $40,000 and the bridge across the Richelieu for one-third of the estimate of the Minister. When this statement was made, the most natural conclusion was that the Minister would give the House his reasons for his estimates. When he was questioned, he said that he gave these estimates based upon memoranda and calculations that had been given to him by his engineers, not yesterday nor the day before, but preliminary to his recommendation of this scheme to his colleagues; and when we asked, in order that we might have the information at hand, as he had, the memoranda and figures given him by his engineer, he flatly refused to give that information to the House. He refused it on the ground that it was derogatory to his dignity to be asked to give it; and so he did not bring down the information. The prolonging of the sitting until three o'clock in the morning was not the fault of the Opposition; it was due to the obstinacy, pure and simple, of the Minister himself. The Minister has had a bad education. On a previous occasion he undertook to institute a comparison between his bringing up and mine, much to my detriment. I am sorry my bringing up was not in accordance with his view of what a bringing up should be; but we will let that pass; I did not criticise him much in that respect. But the hon. gentleman is now showing to this House the results of his education in another sphere—not a family education, but a political education. The hon. gentleman, while Premier of the province of New Brunswick, always carried his measures through in this way. It was foreign to him, during his incumbency of that position, to give any information to the House. When he had thought out his scheme he brought it to the House and asked the House to pass it. When asked for information, he simply laughed in the faces of the members, and said: "What you are to do is to pass the measure that I bring down." This practice for many years has ingrained itself into the constitution of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and he brings the same habit to this Parliament. From the very first moment that he attempted to put legislation through this House to the present time, he has proceeded on the assumption that it is not necessary to give information to the House, but that after he has talked the measure over with his engineers and brings it here, all the House has to do is to pass it. The hon. gentleman sits there under the weight of a promise he made to myself, that he would give me the report of his engineers on the Drummond County Railway, in order to give me the opportunity to have the information before the discussion period passed; and where are we with reference to that matter? The resolutions in the committee have passed, the second reading of the resolutions have passed, yet the report is not down; the Bill is introduced and read the second time, and the committee stage is through, and yet we have not got the information. The hon. gentleman has not had the honour or the manliness or the simple carefulness of a Minister, to give that which he promised over and over again and which it is my right and the right of the House to have. There is not a man in the House who can deny my right to that report or that it is the duty of the Minister to bring it. But when we are face to face with the third reading of the Bill, he may bring that paper and fling it on the Table of the House and imagine that he has fulfilled his promise. What chance does it give for consideration or discussion if a report or a series of reports are thrown on the Table at such a time for me to digest in order to help me to a conclusion in reference to the Bill? Does the Minister deny that he has done that? He cannot deny it; it is plain and patent; it is on the records of the House. Does the Minister of Customs approve of that? Would he treat a man in that way? Does he think it would be fair to treat a member or the House in that way? The Minister of Customs will not get up and say that he thinks it would. Let him ask his colleague, and if his colleague will tell the truth, he will say that he did promise this information. If his colleague will not tell the truth, I can turn up "Hansard" and show where it was promised. Will the Minister of Agriculture say that I had not the right to have the Minister's promise implemented days ago, when we were at the committee stage? He will not, because he would not hazard his reputation as a fair-minded man by making any such statement as that. He is in the same boat with this Minister who promises and does not perform, who absolutely is false to his promises in this House over and over again, who systematically breaks his promises in order to prevent information coming to the House. That is the Minister of Railways, who leads these gentlemen behind him. That is the kind of constitutional treatment these gentlemen have to swallow, and they do it. They know it is not right. They know this Minister is not doing what a Minister ought to do, and yet they swallow it. They will swear about it, some of them, amongst themselves; but they will not venture to get up in the House and say to the Minister: Why don't you do what a white man ought to do? Why don't you do what you promised? Why are you false to your promises over and over again, written in "Hansard"? Men sit behind the Minister who has been false to his promises over and over again. No man can contradict it. You all sit there and hear me say that, and you know it is true. Not one of you would hazard your reputation by getting up and saying that the Minister of Railways is right when he promises and absolutely refuses to fulfil his promises.

When he tries to put this measure through and absolutely will give no information such as every member of Parliament has a right to, they sit there, they swallow it all, and they are not growing fat upon it. But every day they sit there and qualify that by their silence, the process of deterioration is going on in this House, its tone being lowered, constitutional and parliamentary usages are being made a by-word and reproach—simply what for? That the Minister of Railways may carry out his old process, and be false to his promises in this House, as he has been in other Houses. We have always been taught to think that truthfulness is what a Minister of the Crown especially ought to possess. There has generally been a pride among private members, who sit behind a Minister, in the thought that he will not lie. There can be no longer any such pride on that side among members sitting behind this Minister, because he will make a promise to this House and fail to keep it, which just means exactly the plain English I have used. There is not a man among them who will get up and justify his conduct. The hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Dobell), who is an honest business man, will not get up and say that the Minister of Railways is doing what he ought to do. Then the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), unregenerate as he is, will not stand at the back of the Minister of Railways on this occasion, and I do not think that the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) will get up and back the

Mr. FOSTER.

Minister of Railways in exhibiting himself to this House, over and over again, as the Minister who breaks his promises absolutely, time and time again, and cares no more for them than the idle wind. That is a fine education for the country. Generally the citizens of Canada have had pride in their Parliament, generally they have had pride in the members of the Government that for the time being had the administration of their affairs. They can no longer have this pride, because at least one of the Ministers systematically withholds information and shuffles and twists in the meanest and most undignified way to prevent information coming to the House; and actually gets up, as a Minister, in his place, and makes promises which he subsequently fails to perform. There is no doubt about that, these hon. gentlemen know it, they sit there and neither dare speak in favour of his Minister nor get up and say to him that he ought to do his duty. Now, I ask the hon. Minister of Railways, and I want his attention, or otherwise I shall move that this committee rise—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I question much whether the rude and insulting language the hon. gentleman has used entitles him to any notice from me, even though he is a member of this House and I am a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. FOSTER. I am obliged to take the methods which alone can have any effect at all on the Minister of Railways.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You can take any methods you like.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask why he has not given us the report of his engineers, which he promised me days ago, on the Drummond County road. Why has he not given that report to me? He dares to get up and say that I am rude when he actually made a promise and failed to fulfil it. Yet he thinks he ought to be treated as a white man. Will he answer that question? Why should he not give us that report? The hon. Minister is as dumb as he is apt to break the pledge which he makes before his colleagues in this House. He has no reason for not bringing it down.

(The Minister of Railways and Canals left the Chamber.)

Mr. FOSTER. As the Minister has gone out, I move that the committee rise.

Motion negatived: Yeas, 19; nays, 37.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to have the opinion of the Minister of Railways on the clause I have just read, the third clause, and it is impossible for us to go on with this measure unless the Minister who has charge of it is in his seat. I appeal to the hon. Minister of Finance who, I suppose, is leading the House, whether we can proceed with this measure when the Minister in charge, from whom we require explanations, is not here. Are we to have another breach made in parliamentary practice? I want the hon. Minister of Finance and the Government to understand that we are not going to be just played with on this side. I want them to understand that they are dealing with men who propose to be dealt with as men, and who, when promises are made, are not going to be put off with lies. We are being put off with lies.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. We are being put off with lies, and hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches must understand that they are not going to play with us as though we were boys. We want the Minister here who has charge of this measure.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The Minister in charge has been in constant attendance for many hours.

Mr. FOSTER. So have we.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There may be a difference of opinion as to whether the hon. gentleman's attendance was necessary. Perhaps some of us may think it is not. All the hon. gentleman has just said is a repetition of what he said when my colleague was present, and in his absence I shall not undertake to reply to my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there no one to answer?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The Minister of Railways has explained it a dozen times.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. Minister has never once explained that clause, and, when the Prime Minister himself is asked to read that clause and give his opinion upon it, he refused to do so. The point I want to understand in that clause bears on the information that the Minister of Railways and Canals promised thirteen days ago, and that he said last night was down, when it was not down, and he knew it was not down, I believe. And it is not down yet.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has answered the hon. gentleman time and again. He has said, that he has brought down all the information that is necessary, and he is willing to bring down anything more that there is in his department.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to judge of what is necessary?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Minister of Railways and Canals has told the hon. gentleman that he has brought down everything.

Mr. FOSTER. And the Prime Minister, a while ago, made a most magnanimous proposition. Go on, he said, and pass this Bill, and the information will be brought down to-morrow. This after we are through the committee stage. And the Minister of Railways and Canals says, that he has not the information.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. How can he bring it down, if he has not got it?

Mr. FOSTER. But he said, at one time, he had it, and would bring it down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not the information you are now asking for.

Mr. FOSTER. He said, at one time, that he could bring it down, and then he said he could not. Which are we to believe? I would like the legal ornament of the Cabinet, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is a lawyer with a reputation—

An hon. MEMBER. Try the Solicitor General.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, after we exhaust the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the Solicitor General might try his hand. I want to ask the hon. Minister with regard to the third clause in conjunction with the thirty-third clause. I will read it for the benefit of my hon. friend. The third clause has reference to the cost of maintenance:

That Her Majesty shall and will pay to the company a share of the cost of maintenance of the railway between and including Ste. Rosalie and Bonaventure station, and Chaudière bridge and connections, including tracks—

And so on.

—such share of the cost of maintenance to be in the proportion that the combined engine and car mileage of the Intercolonial Railway trains made over each of the above mentioned joint sections bears to the total combined engine and car mileage running over each of the above mentioned joint sections during each month; every engine, passenger and freight car counting each as one car.

Now, section 33 provides for the return, and says, that it shall be monthly. The inference is, that no single monthly payment could be paid or audited, unless that combined car mileage and mileage of the Intercolonial Railway is returned, as the basis for that payment. If the payments have been made for twelve or thirteen months, the statement as to car mileage must be made for those months. It is not necessary for me to carry that further. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has declared that it is so in one breath, and in another has declared that it is not. I would like some information on the subject.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have nothing to add to what the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has just said. This very point has been threshed out for the last three or four hours.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. Minister must see that certain things are called for between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway in this agreement. The Minister, surely, understands that before the charges against the Intercolonial Railway can be properly adjusted, there must be a basis; and that basis is the car mileage, as the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well. I think he will go with me that far. Am I not right?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am listening to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague).

Mr. MONTAGUE. Now, has the department of Railways and Canals paid even a single month to the Grand Trunk without having these facts before it? Under the section, it must have had these facts. The Grand Trunk were bound to give that information. I venture to say, that the Solicitor General will not stand up here—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman cannot draw me out.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend the Solicitor General says, I cannot draw him out; he is not in this business. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries said, the Minister of Railways and Canals has explained this matter, and the Minister of Railways and Canals, when he is asked, will not explain anything; and the Prime Minister, when he is asked, whether this clause does not compel the giving by the Grand Trunk to the Intercolonial Railway of the very information we are asking for, refuses entirely to answer.

Mr. MORIN. They are all alike.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, I cannot agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Morin). I do not believe they are all alike. I do not believe the Solicitor General, who has listened to this debate, thinks that the Minister of Railways and Canals is taking proper ground. The Solicitor General knows perfectly well that, if this agreement is carried, that information must be, month by month, in the Department of Railways and Canals. He will not deny it. Nor, will the Prime Minister or the Minister of the Interior, who is also a lawyer. Then, it must be assumed, either that the Minister of Railways and Canals has paid monthly charges to the Grand Trunk without having the information by which the same could be measured, or else that that information is in the hands of the Minister, and he will not bring it down. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as a lawyer, knows perfectly well that the position taken by the Minister of Railways and Canals is untenable. I say, with all respect, the Minister of Railways and Canals is simply trying to bull this measure through the committee without giving proper information. We are told that, if we do not pass this measure, we may stay here till morning. That may not have been said publicly, but it has been told to me that the Government intend to put this through, if it takes until morning. It will take a great deal longer than morning, if the information is not forthcoming. We do not need to go back many years to recall when gentlemen who are now on that side, were in Opposition. And I am not overdrawing the picture, when I say, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when in Opposition, would have got in such a state of rage and excitement that the very galleries themselves would have trembled, if information had been refused by the Minister of Railways and Canals, as at the present the Minister of Railways and Canals refuses it to us to-night. The hon. gentleman will not deny that he would not have allowed a proposition like this to go through without that which we are asking for, was supplied him. How can we tell whether this is a good bargain or not, when the very foundation of the bargain, the figures upon which we alone can come to a conclusion, are refused to us?

Mr. CLANCY. I want to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), because he is the keeper of the purse strings, a question. In adjusting the accounts between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway, are they kept, especially the mileage, in the Intercolonial Railway, or is the Government dependent upon the Grand Trunk Railway to keep the mileage both of the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway? I ask that question because the books of the Grand Trunk Railway, for the purpose of an audit, are not conclusive. It is an easy matter for the Grand Trunk Railway to do a good deal of padding.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid I cannot supply the information. The arrangements between the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, and how they keep their respective accounts, are some thing with which I am not familiar.

Mr. FOSTER. We are in the committee stage of this Bill, and there is no one here who will attempt to explain a single section of it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Minister of Railways and Canals has spent hours upon hours on these very points.

Mr. FOSTER. We are now in the committee stage, going through item by item, where every man has a right to ask questions and to receive answers, yet there is no Minister who will answer a single question with reference to it. The Prime Minister said: We will go on and pass the Bill, and the information will come down to-morrow. That does not suit us. This is the committee stage, and we want the promised information at this stage. I say that the treatment that has been accorded to us is simply outrageous—I do not think that is too strong a term—and we are determined to make our protest against that outrageous treatment. Until we have the information that has been furnished to us 13 days ago, we are not justified in passing the committee stage of this measure under the indefinite promise that any information that can be obtained will be brought down to-morrow. If this is to degenerate into a contest of strength, let it come; we cannot help it. This is a Parliament, and there is a constitution and parliamentary rules, and we are not going to be trodden upon.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I may state that before this matter came up for discussion, the ex-Minister of Finance came to me and suggested that we would facilitate as far as possible the passing of this Bill upon the understanding we then had from the statement of the Minister of Railways and Canals last night, that the information which he promised to me on the 26th day of May would be brought down. We came here to-day and asked the Minister of Railways and Canals for the information, and we learned that this information had not been brought down, and further that the hon. gentleman does not propose to bring it down. I venture to say that under these circumstances we cannot be blamed for exercising our right of insisting that this information, which was promised so long ago, should be brought down before this Bill goes any further.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is merely repeating the statement he made at least four hours ago, and he was answered by the Minister of Railways and Canals that he had brought down all the information in the possession of his department; and he told him further that the special information which he sought to get could not be obtained. The Prime Minister intervened and stated that any information which was not brought down and which it was possible to bring down, would be brought down. If all the information which the Minister of Railways and Canals has is already put before the hon. gentlemen, what more can they want?

Mr. FOSTER. He can get it if he wishes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Minister of Railways and Canals says he cannot, and I prefer to believe the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a question of taste.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is a question of taste, and I am proud to say that I arrange myself on the same side as the Minister of Railways and Canals. When he tells him that he has not this information and cannot bring it down, and when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) says that if it is not brought down your Bill cannot be put through, it looks as if the hon. gentleman was simply obstructing.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). This agreement says distinctly that this information is in the Department of Railways and Canals. The 33rd section shows that this information must be in the possession of the department. No hon. gentleman on either side of the House can read that clause without coming to the conclusion that, if the agreement has been carried out, the information is there. I asked for that information on the 26th of May, and the Minister of Railways said it would be brought down. He has conveyed no intimation since that it would not be brought down. Under these circumstances it does not seem worth while for the hon. Minister of Railways to say that the information cannot be brought down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Did the hon. gentleman not hear him say that the information could not be brought down?

Mr. WALLACE. It seems to me extraordinary for the hon. Minister of Railways to say that he cannot tell us the amount of the money that has been paid out every month for the last thirteen months under clause 3 of this contract as our share for running over this road from Ste. Rosalie into Montreal. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries tells us that this information has been furnished. I want to know how much money has been paid out. We have not had a particle of the information which is necessary to enable us to come to a correct conclusion as to this enormous contract. We cannot consent to pass this Bill until we have this information. It may be that, under the terms of this clause 3, as Mr. Wainwright has indicated, we do one per cent of the business. If that be the case we would only pay one per cent of the running expenses. But, if that be the case, where is the sense of being half owner of this road? The right hon. Prime Minister told us yesterday to take it at a valuation of $140,000 a year, the amount that we pay as rental for the half ownership and fix it at any rate of interest we please. Three per cent on that $140,000 would represent a capital of $4,666,000, and he says that we have a splendid bargain. The right hon. Prime Minister says that we might double that which would give $9,300,000, or, as he says, call it $10,000,000. If we had to purchase $10,000,000 worth of property in order to become the half owners of a road 35 miles long where would be the profit in the transaction? Yet the right hon. First Minister says: Put it at $10,000,000 and we have millions and millions to spare; we have a tremendously fine bargain. We do a business there of $2,740 a mile. That is the highest amount of business that the hon. Minister has been able to point to, and that was done at a cost of $2,750 a mile, so that we cannot pay our expenses. It cost the Grand Trunk about 60 per cent of its receipts to run the road. The Canadian Pacific Railway has 1,000 miles running through a wilderness, where there is scarcely any traffic, and where there is no business to develop. Another portion of that road runs through the mountains of British Columbia, and another portion runs through the North-west, which is not settled and which has no traffic that will develop into any kind of magnitude; yet they are running their road for 60 per cent of the cost.

The Intercolonial Railway takes on an average about one hundred cents to collect a dollar, as compared with sixty cents on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. The Government tells us that such a heavenly born bargain as this never was thought of before, but we want the details of it which the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) with that audacity which characterises him above all other members of the Government, tells us have been furnished time and again, when we know as a matter of fact they have not been furnished. The Prime Minister disappeared from the House to-night because he is disgusted with his colleagues not coming before the House in a businesslike way. It was humiliating to Alexander Mackenzie to find out he had to run the whole Government himself and it must be humiliating to the Prime Minister to see the way the Minister of Railways disappears from the House when he is asked to give information about his department. We demand that the Minister of Railways should be here. We want him here even though he sits dumb, because we think we will be able to ram some solid facts into his pericranial concavity. The Solicitor General says he cannot do that, but I have not so low an opinion of the Minister of Railways as he has.

An hon. MEMBER. You will have the Minister here soon.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, trot him out, and we will adjourn the House until he comes.

An hon. MEMBER. Here is the Minister (Mr. Blair) now.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister (Mr. Blair) has just entered the Chamber, and if he knew with what painful anxiety his supporters were waiting for him he would not have deprived them of his presence so long. We are delighted to welcome him back to the House, because if he does not give us the information, it will be our duty and our pleasure to convey to him some information as to how a Minister should conduct his department.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. BERGERON. The Minister of Railways is not listening to you.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is engaging in conversation the Minister of Railways, and I will proceed as soon as the Minister of Agriculture gets into cold storage, or turns the best part of his person around, because his face is not too good for this side of the House, and as soon as he observes some courtesy—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the point of order, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) should discuss the question before the Chair.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, and, Mr. Chairman, when we are addressing the Minister (Mr. Blair) on an important point with reference to his department, and we find another Minister of the Crown standing with his back to you, Sir, and to the members of the Opposition, and engaging in conversation, it is high time that you should call order to these gentlemen, and not to those who are transacting the business of the country.

An hon. MEMBER. Go ahead.

Mr. WALLACE. I am waiting for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to observe these courtesies which gentlemen recognize, but I am afraid I will have to wait in vain. As the Minister (Mr. Fisher) knows he cannot get figs from thistles. There are some people whose hide is as impenetrable as a rhinoceros, and who have not the slightest idea of the courtesy which characterizes gentlemen, and which conduces to the rapid conduct of public affairs. After all the time we have been waiting for the Minister of Railways and Canals to hear our words of wisdom, it is highly improper for him to turn, not his rear, but a kind of a side-wind to the House. After waiting his royal pleasure so long we can fairly ask the Minister of Railways to give a little attention to the House. We want an explanation of this third clause of the agreement, and we want to know what proportion of these expenses are paid by the people of Canada and what proportion by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. One mile of travel by the Intercolonial cars for every hundred miles travelled by the Grand Trunk cars—that is the rough estimate of Mr. Wainwright. If the Minister, out of the 13 months for which he has returns, will bring them down for one month, that will satisfy us, because it will be a fairly good index of what has been the result for the 13 months.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will tell the hon. gentleman what I will do. I will wire to-morrow morning to the Grand Trunk Company to send here a statement of the total car mileage of the Grand Trunk and the total car mileage of the Intercolonial for any month the hon. gentleman names.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, we will adjourn the House until he does that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. WALLACE. Surely the Minister does not want us to pass the Bill before furnishing us with the information. The payments made each month are made on these figures, which the Minister must have in his department.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The figures of the payments have been given to you, based on the car mileage.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If any hon. gentleman would look at the statement filed and in "Hansard," in answer to a question of the ex-Minister of Finance to-day, he will see there stated every dollar of the amounts paid. After the answer was given, it was handed to the ex-Minister of Finance.

Mr. WALLACE. That makes it more extraordinary still. This information, which we should have had elaborated and placed on the Table of the House, had to be asked for, and the Minister tells us that he answered that question to-day. I would like to ask him why he would telegraph to Montreal if he has answered the question?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He said he would telegraph for the car mileage.

Mr. WALLACE. The payments made are based on the car mileage. Under clause 33 of the agreement the statements are to be made precisely on the first day of every month. We want one of those statements. This has been going on for twelve or thirteen months under this agreement, and we ask the Minister to let us have these statements that have been presented monthly. They will give us the information we want in order to form a conclusion. The Minister shakes his head; what does that mean?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I mean that it would not give you the information you are demanding now.

Mr. WALLACE. That is all we are asking. We are easily satisfied.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was given to you to-day.

Mr. WALLACE. No, it was not given to us, as the Minister of Railways knows.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The car mileage was not given, but the amounts paid were given.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How do you get at those without the car mileage?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I understand that we are to pay a proportion of the cost of maintenance dependent upon the car mileage; and under the 33rd section the Grand Trunk are to give us whatever information is necessary in order to enable that to be ascertained. The Minister of Railways explained to-day, not once only, but ten times, in my hearing, that in the first place the account is rendered by the Grand Trunk against the Intercolonial, which account they make up from the car mileage. Then the auditor, with his account in his hand, goes to the Grand Trunk office, the books are opened, and he verifies the correctness of the account, and ascertains that the charges are for the proper car mileage, and then the account is paid. But the Minister explains that the car mileage itself is not in the department. It is simply verified by the auditor of the department in an examination of the Grand Trunk books.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman say that when the Grand Trunk puts in its bill to the Intercolonial Railway, and gives the Intercolonial Railway auditor the opportunity of examining its books, it is doing all that is required by the 33rd clause?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Perhaps it is not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What sort of excuse is that to come to Parliament with? The Minister of Railways and Canals knows as well as any man in this House that under the 33rd clause of the Grand Trunk Railway Company is compelled to give to the Intercolonial Railway officers every information—to furnish a return.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It does not say so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It does not say train mileage; but I ask the Minister of Railways what is necessary to figure up the amount paid by the Intercolonial. First, they must give the engine and car mileage. They give them a complete return, which it is necessary to have before the matter can be figured up, and after they have done that, under this clause, they open their books to the audit of the Intercolonial Railway to see whether their statement is correct.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You say what you think they ought to do; but you cannot say they do that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman is getting through what appears to be a very small hole. He admits that he made an agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway, which was a trial agreement, to see how the arrangement would work. The arrangement was rejected by the Senate. The hon. gentleman promised every information, and now he has to admit that clause which compelled the Grand Trunk Railway to give to the officers of the Intercolonial Railway essential information has been disregarded absolutely by the Grand Trunk Railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then if it has not, he has the information in his office. If he has, why does he not bring it down. If he has not got it, then he has allowed the Grand Trunk Railway to disregard an essential portion of the agreement necessary for the protection of the interests of the Government, and that had to be carried out, if he intended to fulfil his promise to give us all information.

Mr. TAYLOR. The ex-Finance Minister put this question on the paper to-day :

What amount has accrued to the Grand Trunk Railway Company since July 1st, 1898, to date, per month, as the Intercolonial Railway's contribution to the cost of maintenance of the Chaudière and Montreal joint sections, including terminal facilities, and what has been paid per month ?

The Minister of Railways says that he laid the statement on the Table to-day.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not say that.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, he answered the question, giving the dollars per month that was paid. Will he tell me that he cannot go over to his auditor, who went down there when the Bill was presented to the Intercolonial Railway for a certain amount of money, based on the mileage, and obtain from that auditor how many miles of mileage were used by the engines and cars of the Intercolonial Railway to produce that amount of money. He will not say that his auditor cannot tell, from the number of dollars, what mileage was used.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You must not say that I will not say it, because I have said it, and do say it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman speaks for himself, but I make this statement that there is not an auditor or accountant in this country, who cared a fig for his reputation, who would allow any gentleman to make the statement that he cannot tell the number of miles used by the railway, when he has the amount of money that was paid for the use of that mileage. I asked the hon. Minister a question yesterday :

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to inquire how the hon. Minister accounts for the fact that since this arrangement went into operation, the rates of freight for western shippers to points on the Intercolonial Railway are higher than we paid when the Grand Trunk Railway made its own arrangements and negotiated for freights to be delivered at points on the Intercolonial Railway ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman assumes that to be the case.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know it to be the case, because I am a shipper to all these points, and I had a 55 cent rate to all points on the Intercolonial Railway. But this year that is cancelled, and our goods are costing us, because we have to prepay freight at all points, considerably more than under the old arrangement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think there is no increase in the tariff.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know there is.

Will the hon. gentleman lay the two tariffs on the Table so as to verify his statement ? I am in a position, from my personal knowledge, to know that since the arrangement before the House was entered into, the same class of goods that formerly were charged a 55-cent rate to all points on the Intercolonial Railway, are now charged on an average 60 cents to 85 cents. What benefit is it to Ontario manufacturers, who have to ship goods to the maritime provinces, to commit this country to a payment of $140,000 a year for ninety-nine years and have the railway tariff raised besides from ten to twenty per cent ? The hon. Minister contradicted my statement, and I ask him now to lay on the Table the tariffs which he must have in his office, so as to decide between us. I maintain that there has been an increase in the tariff. The hon. gentleman says there has not, and I ask him to bring down the two tariffs.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said I was not aware, and I do not think that there has been any increase.

Mr. WALLACE. You know that the Harris tariff is very much higher.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know it. All I know is that in the Harris tariff, there were some trifling alterations made in the classification. Some classes of goods that for instance were in number nine were put in number eight, and some that were in number ten were put in number nine ; but in the examination of the classification sheet, as it came in and was submitted to the Governor in Council, the hon. Minister of Finance, whom I asked to go over with me, and myself were disposed not to allow of any increase, and we were assured by our officers that there was nothing in it but a removal of some inequalities. There were some articles included in one classification which ought to be in another, and I was advised that the transfers I have mentioned were necessary in order to make our classification uniform with that governing the western railways. It is pointed out by our officers that the fact that we had one classification and they another was going to militate against general uniformity and make it exceedingly difficult for us to make our through rates work harmoniously and satisfactorily. But there has been no such thing as a general increase or any substantial increase on any of the articles. If there was, it was not done knowingly, and I do not believe it was done at all. I do not undertake to question what the hon. gentleman said, but that is a matter that probably will be susceptible of explanation when the information is had.

The hon. gentleman is entirely overlooking the fact, when he speaks of having shipped goods before the arrangement was made, that he was then shipping over the Grand Trunk Railway for a part of the mileage, which is now part of the Intercolonial Railway. The Intercolonial Railway tariff, as applied to the Montreal extension, may have been somewhat different from the Grand Trunk Railway tariff as applied to that end, before the change took place. I do not believe that the Grand Trunk Railway rates have been wholly or in the main better than the Intercolonial Railway. I rather think the Intercolonial Railway rates have been lower.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understand that by this arrangement, all freight taken by the Grand Trunk Railway west of Montreal, as soon as it reaches Montreal, is handed over to the Intercolonial Railway and has to conform with the Intercolonial Railway tariff. Arrangements, of course, are made on through freight. I have the two tariffs, and, before this Bill is read the third time, I shall have them here. The Grand Trunk tariff gives the rates, and the rate to Intercolonial points is 55 cents per hundred pounds. As soon as this arrangement of the hon. Minister came into operation, that was cancelled, and they sent a new schedule, mentioning every station, and to none of them is the local rate as low as 55 cents.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) suggest that the rate was the same, say, to Rivière du Loup as to Halifax?

Mr. TAYLOR. That is what I say.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is entirely incorrect; that would be unreasonable.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will stake my reputation, as a member of this House, against the hon. gentleman's reputation, as a Minister, that I will produce the document which shows the rate on goods from our factory to all points on the Intercolonial Railway is 55 cents per hundred, and it makes no difference whether it is Halifax or any other point. That has been cancelled, and we are paying now from 65 to 80 cents.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, if he thinks that is a common-sense arrangement?

Mr. TAYLOR. That was the arrangement with us and with others in my town, and,

I believe, that every manufacturer in Ontario—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would ask the hon. gentleman: Does he think it would be fair to charge a man the same to Rivière du Loup as to Halifax?

Mr. TAYLOR. That has nothing to do with it. I am telling the hon. gentleman what the arrangement was. The hon. Minister says, that this scheme of his will be better for the people of Ontario, and we find it is worse. It is worse for the manufacturer, and it is decidedly worse for the consumer, because, of course, we have to add the extra freight charge on the goods, and take it out of the consumer. The hon. gentleman wants to know, if it is fair to charge the same rate to Rivière du Loup as to Halifax. That is the railway business. To secure our business, they gave us that rate, and they had their arrangement with the Intercolonial Railway. But, as soon as the present arrangement with the Grand Trunk was made, they began to quote us a rate to Montreal, and told us we must pay, besides, the Intercolonial rate to the point of delivery. These are the arrangements we are working under now, and it costs 20 cents per hundred more on our goods than formerly. I ask the hon. gentleman to lay the tariff on the Table, and he will see that his own statement is not correct. Then, as to the dollar value of the Grand Trunk Railway account, and the idea that from it a statement cannot be made out, I will guarantee that the auditor, if he has not the miles down, will soon work it out from the number of dollars. Any accountant will do that; I will undertake to do it myself. If I know that $500 represents, for instance, a mileage of 40,000 miles, I will be able to figure out the mileage represented by $600, or any other sum. If his auditor cannot do this, he is not worthy to stay in the Department twenty-four hours. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) asked for this information ten days, and the hon. Minister said he could have it, but now he seeks to get out of it by saying that it cannot be done. I think it is not fair to his auditor to say, that he cannot make up a statement of this mileage.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It varies every month.

Mr. TAYLOR. And the number of dollars varies accordingly. And, by the number of dollars, he can know the number of miles.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not mistaken. I have had as much to do with auditing accounts as my hon. friend (Mr. Blair). An auditor who could not make up such a statement, would not be worthy to audit the accounts of the Intercolonial Railway, or any other railway.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if the auditor's report is filed each month with the Department, and becomes departmental record thereafter. Also, whether the auditor is furnished with the mileage of the Intercolonial Railway kept separately, or whether he proceeds upon the blank statement that so much mileage is due. In a sense it might seem idle to ask such a question, because if the mileage were given it would be easy to learn the sum of money due to the Grand Trunk. I do not like to ask too many questions, but I would like to know also whether there is any provision in the agreement for a check on the part of the Government as to the expenditure that must be made in maintaining that part of the road in which we hold in joint ownership, or whether it is in the hands of the Grand Trunk without check or provision beyond the mere statement of the accounts. If the hon. Minister will give this information, he will at least throw some light upon the matter.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I presume the hon. gentleman would be ready to acknowledge that no Minister living ought to be expected, with the other overwhelming duties which he has to discharge, to follow in detail and to know how the under officers of the railway service work out minor but still important matters. I confess that I have never had the time, I have never felt called upon to take the auditor of the Intercolonial Railway and accompany him in the performance of his duties to see how he did it, to trace out the results and determine whether his system was accurate. I have taken it for granted that whatever was necessary to be done by the subordinate officials of the department, under the general manager and under the chief engineer, would be done. When this matter came up I had occasion to make inquiries regarding it, and I was told that the officers of the department did not furnish, either at Moncton or here, any statement which would show the amount of engine and car mileage of the respective railways upon the Montreal extension.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman think that an absolute requisite to a proper keeping and checking of the accounts?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. According to my judgment I do not think that it is at all necessary, I do not think that it is a matter of any substantial importance.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.). What check have you on your officers under these circumstances?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have the assumption that the officer, when he examines these books, will be convinced that the accounts have been properly made up or he would not approve them. Surely you do not imagine that after the accounts are rendered to the department and placed in the hands of the auditor in whom you have confidence, that you need some one else to check him.

Mr. CLARKE. What information has the auditor in his possession other than that supplied by the Grand Trunk Railway authorities?

Mr. IVES. Let me add another question to that one. We understand that the account is rendered monthly or periodically by the Grand Trunk Railway in connection with this mileage. Now, will the hon. gentleman say what the character of that account is? Of course certain things must be known to enable the auditor to check the account.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have never seen one of these accounts, they have never come before me. But I will tell the hon. gentleman what I judge would be the nature of that account. The account would state what the gross payments were which have been made by the Grand Trunk Railway on the road in the way of maintenance and repairs for the month, giving them in detail. The auditor would examine those items and see whether they were charges of a nature proper to be included in such an account. Then he would examine the vouchers and see whether they correspond with the items contained in the account. He would have access to the company's books of which there must be a great many, because the books of every station would have to be examined. There would be a page for every day of the month, which would contain a list of the engines, the number of the engines and number of the cars, with the name of the cars, if they had a name. Every page would contain all these particulars, and that page would be multiplied for each day by the number of stations on the whole line. By totting up that page you would see how many engine miles there were, and how many car miles there were on that day. In that statement, I presume, you would see whether it was a Grand Trunk Railway engine or car, or an Intercolonial Railway engine or car. The auditor would examine all these books which will be put in his hands for the purpose. We will say that there are 40 or 50 stations, then there will be 40 or 50 books, each book would be examined by him, and he would tote up all these particulars. He would not make any copy or any abstract of the books, but he finds out in that way what proportion the total car mileage of the Intercolonial Railway bears to the total car mileage of the Grand Trunk Railway, and the engine mileage accordingly.

Mr. IVES. Do I gather that the Grand Trunk Railway agents keep both the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway mileage?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They keep both.

Mr. IVES. They are the joint officials of the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, and they keep the whole account, both the mileage of the Intercolonial and the mileage of the Grand Trunk Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is my belief, I cannot see how it could be done otherwise.

Mr. IVES. It seems to me that the Grand Trunk Railway, in rendering an account to the Intercolonial Railway or to the Department of Railways, for this monthly maintenance account, would state the total amount expended, with the car mileage of the Intercolonial Railway and the car mileage of the Grand Trunk Railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am told that that has not been the custom.

Mr. IVES. Then they do not give the data the auditor must have?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, it will be very easy to verify it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. First of all, the Grand Trunk Railway has to make up the account. Now, do they make it up by having the train and car and engine mileage?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am informed they have not been doing it that way. They have their books which show how much has been expended on that section or on that division for that month. The items which constitute that account are made up and handed to the officers of the Intercolonial Railway. I presume that is the way, I have not seen one of them, but I presume that is the way in which the accounts are furnished. They render an account containing the gross expenditure for the month in detail, then they say that the proportion of the Intercolonial Railway is so much.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How do they figure that out?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. By examining their books and taking the proportion. If there are 10,000 engine and car miles of the Grand Trunk Railway and 1,000 engine and car miles of the Intercolonial Railway for the same period, they would know that the Intercolonial Railway bill would be one-tenth.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the hon. gentleman will permit me—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) shakes his head.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, that is just what I have said all along.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is just what I was arguing, that before the Grand Trunk could make any charge against the Intercolonial they must know the engine and car mileage.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Of course they must.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, now, it would not take the Minister fifteen minutes to get that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You are wrong about that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to ask the Minister if this account is not just the same as an account for furniture. It is an account the Government owe for value received. Does the hon. gentleman intend to say that he would accept an account for furniture or for furnishings for $20,000 without the items?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does he say that he will accept that en bloc and send his auditor to go over the account afterwards. No, he will not. He will demand the items.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am doing that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, then in this matter you are not doing that; that is just exactly what you are not doing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They do not understand the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They do not understand him?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think you can or you would not ask these questions.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not think the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was so wholly stupid as to think that we did not understand the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. The hon. gentleman is not nearly as acute and bright as I thought he was. I submit to the merest page in this House that the hon. Minister of Railways does not understand this question or he would not refuse to give this information to the House. It is as clear as the nose on the face of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the account rendered by the Grand Trunk Railway, is either en bloc or in items.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It must be in items.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is in items so far as the amounts which make it up are concerned, but the basis upon which these amounts are charged ought to be there if it is an account which can be adjudged as to whether it is correct or not. My argument was that before it could be made out by the Grand Trunk they ought to have the basis for that account which is the engine and car mileage, and I submit that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, before he would send his auditor to examine these accounts, ought to have these details, if not for his own information, for the information of the Public Accounts Committee.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Do you suppose that it is possible for me to follow all these details? That would not be possible if there were five Ministers in the department instead of one.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How long will it take to examine this; it will not take the fifteenth part of a minute.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Who says, oh? The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals knows what that account is.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I never saw one of them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I submit he ought to have seen them before he came here and asked that this bill be passed. He ought to know what the basis is.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I know the basis.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the basis.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is a wheelage basis.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the wheelage basis? Is it one to five or one to ten or one to one hundred?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot tell you.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He knows it is a wheelage basis, but he does not know whether it is one to five, one to ten or one to a hundred or one to a thousand.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not audit the accounts on the Intercolonial.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, we had better get the auditor here.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You had better get the whole staff in here and swear them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is no use of the hon. gentleman getting abusive.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We are asking for reasonable information upon this subject. We are asking for information that the hon. gentleman could get in fifteen minutes if he wanted to get it. If he has it in his department he could give it to us in fifteen minutes. He ought to have it. He had a right to demand it from the Grand Trunk, and the Grand Trunk had a right to give it to him, and if he has not got it he could get it in half an hour.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I could not get it in that time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It could be got.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have no doubt it could be got. It is not in the department, and I do not believe that it is in the department at Moncton.

Mr. INGRAM. Is it the train mileage that the hon. gentleman is speaking of?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, the engine and car mileage.

Mr. INGRAM. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the officers of the Intercolonial could not furnish the mileage, and that the Grand Trunk did not furnish the Intercolonial mileage over their lines.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said they opened this book to us.

Mr. INGRAM. Never mind about their opening their books. Am I correct in my understanding?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You are not correct, if you mean by that that they do not afford the auditors of the Intercolonial the fullest information on the subject. They throw open their books. Let me say here what occurs so that I will not be misunderstood. I have stated that the Grand Trunk Railway Co. keep, themselves, in their books, the record of every mile that is travelled by their own engines and cars and by the Intercolonial engines and cars. I am not sure but that the Intercolonial keeps an account of its own mileage. I am not sure that it does; I think the chances are that it does furnish that information, but it is put in possession of an account of the whole amount containing the items which go to make up the expenditures for the month, and they furnish to the officers at Moncton a statement of what proportion of that amount is payable by the Intercolonial. Then I have told you that the officers of the Intercolonial are sent to Montreal, and they satisfy themselves and so report whether that proportion is accurate or is not.

Mr. CLARKE. Do they depend entirely upon the information supplied by the Grand Trunk?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am under the impression that they do not. They must depend upon the Grand Trunk books for information as respects the engine and car mileage of the Grand Trunk, but I think there could be no more conclusive evidence as to what the car mileage would be than these books which I do not think could be misleading.

Mr. IVES. Are these monthly accounts or statements not allowed to remain in the department as vouchers?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They remain at Moncton.

Mr. IVES. I think from what the hon. gentleman says now—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said that all along.

Mr. IVES. I understood that these accounts contained the amount of the claim which the Grand Trunk asked the Government to pay as their proportion of the mileage. If we have the total expenditure for maintenance and the proportionate amount which the Grand Trunk ask the Government to contribute, under this arrangement, we could ascertain what the proportion of the Government is and what that of the Grand Trunk is.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I told hon. gentlemen that long ago, but it was not satisfactory.

Mr. IVES. That would furnish the information we really want, which is the proportion of the car mileage of the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman says that he can get this information from the Grand Trunk Railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I can telegraph for it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister could have saved this debate by getting it thirteen days ago. He assumes a different position now from what he did before.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Exactly the same.

Mr. MONTAGUE. "Hansard" will show that the hon. gentleman said he could not get this car mileage.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. "Hansard" will show that assertions were made in this House that I had all this information in my department and under my hand, and that I affirmed I had not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister does not desire that we should pass this Bill without this information.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no reason why you should not take it on the third reading.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It does not refer to the Bill at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I never saw the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) so complacently accept everything, as he does from the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair). The Minister seems to be a decided admirer of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. FOSTER. Doubtful.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think it is doubtful.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We usually admire each other.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think you could help it, for if there was ever a pair of twins in stupidity as to not understanding what we want to-night it is you two. Now the Minister of Railways and Canals knows that we know he is not stupid.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do know that you know you are only having a little fun.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not at all. We are most serious, and the Minister (Mr. Blair) takes this expenditure of this too large a sum of money, without any degree of seriousness whatever.

Mr. INGRAM. Up to the present I have refrained from saying anything with respect to this deal. Now, I am not asking the question I shall ask for the fun of the thing, but I am doing it in all seriousness, and I trust the Minister will treat me in that way. I ask the Minister (Mr. Blair) if any employees of the Intercolonial Railway are in control of the cars or trains passing over the Intercolonial Railway and into the terminal points in Montreal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Invariably.

Mr. INGRAM. Whom do they report to?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. These officers are joint officers of both roads, and they must report at the different stations and their destinations.

Mr. INGRAM. Every man who is in charge of a train makes his report at the end of his trip whether it be in Montreal or at the end of his division. In that daily report is the mileage of the engine and of every car on that train.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The driver does not make it to the head office but to his divisional point.

Mr. INGRAM. I differ from the Minister again. There is only one head office on the Intercolonial Railway system and that is at Moncton. It does not make any difference whether there are three or five divisions, all these reports must go to Moncton.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The reports which are made by the driver or the conductor at these divisional points, are I suppose sent to Moncton ultimately.

Mr. INGRAM. Again I must differ from the Minister. That is not the practice. The practice is that there is only one head office for the conductor, no matter what division he is on, and all the reports go to the head office which is at Moncton. Now, I never was in Moncton, but I know what the system is on the Intercolonial Railway as on every other railway. That is the means by which the railway finds out the mileage of the different cars no matter to what line they belong. At the expiration of the month the mileage of all these cars is figured up, and the business-like way would be that the car mileage office at Moncton would report to the Government at Ottawa, the total mileage run on the Government railways. Now, that I presume is done on the Intercolonial Railway as it is done elsewhere, and there is no doubt that the Minister can get his mileage at Moncton or in his own department.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think there is no doubt that the Intercolonial Railway has the account of its own mileage, but that would not do because you have to get the Grand Trunk Railway mileage too.

Mr. INGRAM. The Government must keep track of the mileage of the Intercolonial Railway cars.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have never disputed that, but that is only a small portion of the information asked for.

Mr. INGRAM. It was asked here to-night what the mileage of the Intercolonial cars at the Grand Trunk Railway terminal points was. I understood the hon. Minister to say that he had not the mileage or that his officers told him they could not produce the mileage. That cannot be so, for it would be a very unbusinesslike method of carrying on business. If the hon. Minister inquires this morning in his office, I am sure that he will find that my statement is correct, and what my hon. friends here are complaining of is that he has not produced the mileage.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter into any discussion of the merits of the Drummond County purchase. What has struck me in this long debate has been the fact that the Ministers, either through ignorance or wilfully, have been withholding proper information. The information asked for on this side of the House has, I think, been entirely reasonable. It is information that should have been supplied to this House to enable the members to form anything like a correct judgment as to the merits or demerits of this bargain. I think it has been a very humiliating scene to-night, to see the surly manner in which Ministers have evaded answering questions. Promises, as distinct and straight and square as promises could be made by one man to another, have been given by Ministers, and have not been kept. It is a very serious and very humiliating thing to find Ministers of the Crown taking that position. One of two things must be the case, either that the Ministers themselves do not know the bargain they have made, or that they have found that it is so bad that they decline to give the House the information which they must have in their possession. I think the inference to be drawn is that they went into this project, as they went into the Yukon Railway project, without any knowledge of what they were doing, and that they asked the solicitors of the other side to draw an agreement with them. The agreement presented here has evidently been drawn by the Grand Trunk solicitors and the Drummond County solicitors, and the Ministers apparently know very little about it. It involves millions of dollars. The rental is about $140,000 a year, which capitalized means a very serious sum. I did not intend to speak on the subject, but I must say that the impression left on my mind by this debate is that the Government, either from want of knowledge or wilfully, have endeavoured to keep back information which they ought to have given to this House, and which they promised they would give before the Bill was passed.

Mr. McMULLEN. As hon. gentlemen appear to be a little tired out, I will assist them for a few moments.

Mr. FOSTER. You have a large reserve fund, you know.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to draw attention to this point on which hon. gentlemen have been harping for the last six hours. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) four times to-night has demanded that the Minister of Railways and Canals should comply with a certain promise which he made in answer to himself on the 26th of May, that he would do certain things. What was it? Here is what the hon. gentleman asked:

Therefore, the Minister (Mr. Blair) must have from the Grand Trunk Railway Company returns and information which indicate exactly each month, what the proportion of user, made up in that way, by the Grand Trunk Railway, and by the Intercolonial Railway respectively is.

The hon. Minister said:

There will be no difficulty, I think, in furnishing that information, if the hon. gentleman desires it. Does he desire it for the whole period that the arrangement has been running?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not want to put the hon. gentleman to any unnecessary trouble, but I thought it was probably easy to furnish it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think there will be no difficulty, so far as I am aware, in furnishing it down to the last we have received a statement from the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It will, I should think, be furnished before the introduction of the Bill or before the Grand Trunk Railway matter is disposed of.

Now, the hon. Minister tells you that he went to his Department and thoroughly investigated all the papers and documents relating to this matter, and he has come back and reported to the House that there were no documents or papers in his Department that would enable him to give the hon. gentleman the information he asked for.

Mr. BERGERON. Why did he promise it ?

Mr. McMULLEN. He did not promise it. He said he thought there would be no trouble in furnishing it. He turns to his Department and asks his officers about these papers, and they say they are not there. Then he says the matter is settled every month ; the auditor of the Intercolonial goes to Montreal and goes over the accounts from beginning to end, and is in a position to certify that the charges made by the Grand Trunk are correct, and on the basis of that certificate the Intercolonial is called upon to pay its proportion. Is that not right ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, that is right.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yet the hon. member for Halifax claims that the hon. Minister has broken his promise ; the ex-Minister of Finance and the ex-Minister of Agriculture have done the same thing. They have been demanding that he should produce what he has told them he has not in his office, and he has explained distinctly and clearly the way in which the accounts are made up. Now, what do these hon. gentlemen want ? We know perfectly well what they want : they want to take up time, in the hope of making an impression on the public mind that the Minister is not acting properly. This whole question over which hon. gentlemen are delaying the House is a side issue altogether, a matter of detail, and not one that affects the lease at all. It is merely a matter of adjustment of accounts between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway, and ought to have nothing to do at all with the ratification of the lease. The Grand Trunk Railway has to satisfy whoever is at the head of the Intercolonial Railway that the account is right before they can get a dollar ; and if the Minister of Railways should demand an account in a different shape, the Grand Trunk Railway would have to comply with his demand or go without their money. These hon. gentlemen are trying to make a mountain out of a mole, and if they want to waste time they are succeeding admirably.

Mr. BERGERON. If there ever was an occasion on which the saying : "Deliver me from my friends" would be applicable, it is the present one. The hon. Minister of Railways might well repeat that exclamation after the manner in which the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) showed up his incapacity. It is quite evident that if the hon. member for North Wellington had been promoting this measure himself, he would have taken an entirely different course to that followed by the Minister. What is the hon. gentleman's excuse for the Minister ? He said that if the Minister of Railways and Canals had done his duty—for that is the only conclusion to be drawn from the hon. gentleman's remarks—he would have given us just what we have been asking for.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, and not only what we have been asking for, but what the Minister promised us. The hon. Minister promised us everything before he would introduce this Bill.

Mr. McMULLEN. Everything in his department.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend need not interrupt, for he will have every chance to reply, and I must say he is a great acquisition to us just now. We know how intensely he has been suffering of late years through not being able to ventilate his opinions in this House, but if he will only stay with us now and give us occasionally some explanations, he will help us in a most effective manner. He has just proved that the Minister knows nothing at all about the lease. The hon. Minister promised to give us certain information which my hon. friend has just declared it ought to be easy for him to give. Will the hon. member approve the conduct of the Minister who, for thirteen months, has been paying the Grand Trunk Railway rental on this line, without knowing what he has been paying for. What would be the state of any clerk who would pay out money without getting vouchers in return and who, when asked by his employer : Why did you pay this ? What proof have you that it was due ? would say : I know nothing about it, but you can take my word that it is all right. The position of the Minister of Railways is exactly the same. He told us that there would be no difficulty in giving a report of the mileage from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, but when we want that report, he says he cannot give it. My hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Ingram) is a man who knows a great deal about railway operations and my hon. friend from Toronto, who has just spoken, knows something about them, and they know, as we all do, that any railway company can, at the end of every month, give a complete return of the car mileage which has been used on their line.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) And every car separate.

Mr. BERGERON. But here we have the admission of the Minister that for thirteen months the Dominion has been paying the Grand Trunk Railway money without having the first proof that the money was due, and that he cannot give us the proof. The right hon. First Minister told us that if we would let the schedule go through, this information, which the Minister of Railways says he cannot get, would be laid before the House. Which are we to believe? This is a sample of the way we have been treated since this measure came before us. Some hon. gentlemen opposite say this is obstruction. The new members say so, but the old members, for instance, the hon. member for North Wellington, know that it is not. If these gentlemen were in Opposition, and a similar course were pursued by the Minister in office, my hon. friend from North Wellington alone would keep the Government for six months. He could not allow—and he would be right—a Bill of this kind to go through Parliament in the form in which it is brought before us. We have had two occasions to doubt the, well, I will say sincerity so as not to use any other word, of the Minister of Railways and Canals in bringing this measure before Parliament. We sat here until three o'clock yesterday morning. Why? Because the hon. Minister, in answering the argument of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), declared that he had in his possession figures from his chief engineer showing that it would cost $300,000 to build a certain bridge. The hon. member for Glengarry, who is a practical man, had figures to show that it would cost $50,000. Here was a large margin of difference, and we asked that the Minister lay on the Table the figures which he said he had from his chief engineer. We know Mr. Schreiber as a man with a reputation to sustain, and any statement of his we could discuss. But the Minister refused to bring down those figures. Why? My impression is that the people of Canada know to-day that the Minister could not bring down a statement signed by Mr. Schreiber to uphold his argument. If this be so, we have a Minister of the Crown trying to put through a measure which was before Parliament on a previous occasion and could not command the confidence of Parliament, and making statements to support it which he knew he could not substantiate by the signature of a responsible engineer. To-night, we are on clause 3, which speaks of the car mileage as the basis of the payments made by the Dominion of Canada to the Grand Trunk Railway for carrying the Intercolonial Railway from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal. Is it not absolutely necessary that we should have here the reports which must be in the hands of the Minister—for I cannot imagine that the head of a department would have paid large sums of money to the Grand Trunk Railway without having in his possession these returns. Another thing that makes me believe that he has these returns is that he promised to bring them down. But to-night he refuses to bring them. Why does he refuse? Can there be any reason but that they tell against the running of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal over this line, and he prefers to stay here obstructing the business of the House—because it is not we but the hon. Minister who is obstructing, for we are only asking for information to which we are entitled—rather than give the information?

Now, I desire to ask the hon. Minister a question which I think is a very pertinent one. How about this Jacques Cartier Junction branch? If I understood him, well, he spoke about having the right of carrying the Intercolonial Railway trains over that branch of the Grand Trunk Railway system to Montreal. How will he bring his cars over the Jacques Cartier branch unless he makes a special provision, for that is not the mail line of the Grand Trunk Railway over which the Intercolonial Railway cars will come into Montreal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The contract provides for that.

Mr. BERGERON. No. Well, will the hon. gentleman explain how? I am asking for information; there is no obstruction in this.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that over the Jacques Cartier Junction line connection can be made with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. BERGERON. But it is far from Montreal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is about 15 miles from the bridge, I believe. This matter is expressly provided for in the contract.

Mr. BERGERON. I doubt it, and I wish the hon. Minister to explain.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I suppose the hon. gentleman is serious in asking the question?

Mr. BERGERON. Yes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Then the 9th and 10th lines of the first clause will give him the information he desires—I do not mean the recital, but the first clause of the contract at the bottom of page 2.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not think that is quite an answer. I have read this clause to which the hon. Minister refers. If I merely wanted to take up time, I could easily do so by reading this section; but I do not wish to take up the time of the committee for nothing. This branch to Jacques Cartier Junction is not part of the main line which the Intercolonial Railway will use.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. But it is one of the lines of the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. BERGERON. But the Intercolonial Railway comes in by the St. Henri Junction and this is above that. How, then, will he carry on his arrangements for that branch?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This is not a branch to Jacques Cartier; it is the Junction of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Pacific main line being intersected there by the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. BERGERON. But the Jacques Cartier line does not stop at Jacques Cartier Junction, but goes on behind the mountain to the parish of St. Laurent. What is called the Jacques Cartier Junction is not merely a switch from one road to another, it is a little line that goes from Montreal to St. Laurent.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is part of the terminals of the Grand Trunk Railway, it was built to enable the Grand Trunk Railway to get a carload of freight to and on the Canadian Pacific Railway line.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister of Railways and Canals, in order to get a line into Montreal over the Grand Trunk Railway, got it by paying, if I may put it that way, half what the line cost, or upon the basis of half ownership, and he pays by reason of that, $140,000 a year for the privilege of using this line to get his cars into Montreal. That is one part of the bargain; the other part is as to maintenance. Now, he does not make a stated agreement as to what his share of the maintenance should be, but that share is to be computed upon the basis of the car and engine mileage, or, in other words, the Intercolonial Railway has to pay according to the extent to which it uses that line into Montreal. Now, he pays the half on the basis of half the cost, or on the basis of half the usage, when he pays for the privilege of getting in. But when he comes to pay his share of the reparations, his share of the maintenance on that line, when he comes to have that reckoned up, instead of being one-half, it will be about one-twenty-fifth, or one-twentieth. In other words, he has purchased upon the basis of a half the right to get into Montreal on a line as to the user of which he will only stand in relation to the whole usage of the line to the extent of one twenty-fifth; in other words, he has paid too much for his privilige of getting into Montreal as one twenty-fifth stands to one-half. If the hon. gentleman had paid upon the basis of user, which was the proper basis, it would have been a good scheme to have got one twenty-fifth of the railway and to have gone in on that. Of course, I am guessing at the figures, but if I am wrong, will the hon. gentleman state what the figures are. But the hon. Minister does not want to bring down those figures because they give away the whole bargain from beginning to end.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) the lecturer of the Government side, undertakes to lecture us when we are trying to get information. Perhaps the hon. gentleman forgets what he used to do when he occupied a seat on this side of the House.

Mr. McGREGOR. That is not what you want.

Mr. INGRAM. If the hon. gentleman has anything to say, why does he not get up like a man and say it? Probably he does not understand anything more about this question than the member for North Wellington does.

Mr. McGREGOR. If I did not know more about it than you do, I would sit down.

Mr. INGRAM. If you would think more and talk less you would act the part of a gentleman, and that is what you are not doing now.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman knows that he has no right to use such expressions.

Mr. INGRAM. What expression did I use that was out of order?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The expression in which he said that the hon. member for Essex was not acting as a gentleman.

Mr. INGRAM. I said that if the hon. gentleman would think more and talk less, he would act the part of a gentleman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman knows that such an expression is never used in Parliament. It is absolutely against the rules of debate, and I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw the expression.

Mr. BERGERON. We have the same rules in committee as they have in the House. Nobody can interrupt unless he is allowed to do so. The hon. member for Essex has been allowed a latitude that would not be allowed in any other place.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron), who knows very well that the ruling has been given.

Mr. BERGERON. You were too quick, Mr. Chairman; we had not time to discuss it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw, withdraw.

Mr. INGRAM. I have nothing to withdraw. What I said was that if the hon. gentleman would think more and talk less he would act the part of a gentleman.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). And you went on to say that he is not doing so now.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Chair has ruled that it is out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw, withdraw.

Mr. INGRAM. I did not say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McGregor) was not a gentleman.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, you did.

Mr. INGRAM. What I said was that if the hon. gentleman would think more and talk less he would act the part of a gentleman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman added that the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) was not acting the part of a gentleman.

Mr. INGRAM. No.

Mr. FOSTER. What he said was that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McGregor) was not carrying out that precept of thinking more and talking less. He was talking more and thinking less.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is the hon. gentleman going to obey the Chairman?

Mr. INGRAM. I fail to see where I am out of order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Chair has ruled that you are out of order. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the hon. gentleman withdrawing.

Mr. IVES. I think when the hon. gentleman who interrupted, declares that he is a gentleman, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) ought to accept that.

Mr. INGRAM. I have not said that he is not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think it is out of order for the hon. member for Essex (Mr. McGregor) to interrupt.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No interruptions should be made except with the consent of the hon. member who has the floor. At the same time the statement made by the hon. member (Mr. Ingram) was out of order.

Mr. INGRAM. What is the statement?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must withdraw the statement in which he said that the hon. member for Essex has not acted as a gentleman.

Mr. INGRAM. Mr. Chairman, you entirely misunderstood me. I will stand by the statement, although if the statement is unparliamentary, I am willing to withdraw it. I think, Mr. Chairman, you misunderstood the statement I made. If it be true, as the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said, that the Intercolonial Railway has no means of keeping an account of the mileage, how did the auditors, engaged by the Government know whether the Grand Trunk accounts are properly kept? This is one of the complaints we have, because we would like to know on what basis we are paying this $140,000 to the Grand Trunk for using its tracks, whether it is on the basis of 100 cars a day or 500 cars or 1,000 a day? It is very important to know that, because if the Intercolonial do not intend to use the tracks to any great extent the amount to be paid the Grand Trunk would certainly be smaller, whereas if the Intercolonial were going to use them to a greater extent the amount would be larger. I think I can guess very fairly the reason why the mileage was not given to this House. I met Intercolonial Railway freight agents in the west between Buffalo and Detroit. I found that they were putting forth great efforts to secure traffic for this new line to show the people that this is a good Bill. I understand now that there is a decrease of about $200,000 in the receipts of this railway. That would be shown by the mileage over the line, and that is the reason why these figures are not brought down. They would show that the bargain with the Grand Trunk is not a good one. More than that, they would show that the deal between the Government and the Drummond County Railway Company was a bad deal. The Opposition have to do their duty, and if it takes from now until to-morrow night they must persist in getting the information which is so important in considering a Bill of this kind.

Mr. D. HENDERSON (Halton). I find that there is an absolute determination on the part of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals that he will conceal from this committee the information that is necessary to enable us to determine whether the contract is a reasonable one or not. I said, last night, that I was not in sympathy with the arrangement which the Government had made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Drummond County Railway Company, because I did not think it would be in the interest of that part of the country which I have the honour to represent that such an arrangement should be made. I gave very potent reasons to show that we were handicapped in business by reason of this new arrangement instead of being bettered. If we are going to have forced upon us an arrangement that is opposed to our best interests then we ought to make the best out of a bad bargain. I am sure that we would be willing to assist the Government, and it seems to me that assistance is required by any suggestion that we could possibly give, that might enable them to improve the bargain which they have made, but we must trust to the Government to give us some data which can assist us in coming to a conclusion.

I understood that the $140,000 is considered as half the rental of that portion of the road, which is being used by the Intercolonial Railway, and that would give $280,000 as a total rental. The only way we can arrive at what would be a fair rental for us to pay is by ascertaining what proportion of the user the Intercolonial Railway traffic bears to the joint traffic of the two roads. Suppose our share is 1 per cent of the user, then our share of the rental would be only $2,800, and the 99 per cent which should be paid by the Grand Trunk Railway Company on this joint rental would be $277,200. If we use 2 per cent our share of rental would be $5,600 and the Grand Trunk Railway's share would be $274,400. Let us take 10 per cent as our share of the user, and the Grand Trunk Railway share at 90 per cent. I question very much whether the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway, as compared with the Grand Trunk Railway, has amounted to more than 10 per cent of the traffic, and if it does not, our share would be $28,000 and the Grand Trunk Railway's share would be $252,000, instead of our share being $140,000 as it is now and the Grand Trunk Railway's share being the same. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) rose from his seat tonight and became communicative, and as he had been a short time before in communion with the Minister of Railways in the corridor, I thought perhaps he would give the House the benefit of the information we need. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) did not do so. I will not insist upon getting the exact figures, but surely the Minister (Mr. Blair) can give us within 5 per cent of what our share is for the 12 months which this road has been operated jointly. If we could arrive at that, we would be able to go back to our constituents and defend our course in allowing this Bill to pass. We must obtain that information in order to show our constituents that we have been doing our utmost to prevent a very bad bargain from being made. We are not obstructing on this side of the House; the obstruction comes from the Government benches; because if the information which was promised and to which we are entitled had been given by the Minister (Mr. Blair), this Bill would have been passed by the House now and have gone to the Senate for discussion. I have a sincere desire to get information, and if the Minister does not give it I can assure him that I am a stayer. I am not particular whether I go to bed at all or not, and the Government will not frighten me. I can sit up at night as well as any man, and when the interests of my constituents are at stake, and when the Government proposes to waste millions of dollars of the money of the people of Canada, I am going to watch on the walls and do everything I can to prevent that waste of the people's money. I hope to be able to show my constituents that I have done my part at least. Now, I believe that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) knows more of this matter than he has admitted, and I think it would be a wise thing for him to disclose the whole thing. I am perfectly satisfied that the Minister (Mr. Blair) can tell us all about these facts, and I appeal to him to keep the House waiting no longer for them. I look upon the Minister (Mr. Blair) as an intelligent man, as a man who knows what he is about and I give him credit for a great deal more common sense than he would lead the House to believe he is entitled to. It is a humiliating position for the Minister to assume when he comes before this House and states, that he does not know the very essence and basis of a contract to which he has committed the country for a term of ninety-nine years. We cannot possibly suppose that the man who has been selected by the right hon. First Minister to occupy the position of Minister of Railways and Canals actually knows so little about his department that he cannot give us the data on which he makes this calculation. I am satisfied that he knows it, but I am afraid that he has discovered that he has made a very bad bargain for the country, and for that reason he does not want to disclose to the country the nature of the bad bargain he has made until he gets the measure through the House and it becomes law. Then he can snap his fingers at us, and can say, "Gentlemen, I can tell you now that it was only 5 per cent."

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is quite entitled to enjoy the opinion he has expressed and to declare it with all the freedom he chooses. He is quite free to say that he thinks I have put myself in a humiliating position in respect to this matter; but I take leave to say in all courtesy to my hon. friend that there are humiliating positions and humiliating positions. I think I would much sooner take the humiliating position described by the hon. gentleman than be in a position which some hon. gentlemen occupy. I have before me an instance which I think worthy of note, and I will mention it to the hon. gentleman. I can recollect an hon. gentleman stating in the House something which, if true, would be calculated to have a very injurious effect upon the Intercolonial Railway business. I think a member of this House, even though a member of the Opposition and intensely anxious to discredit the Government of the day, might, at the same time, occasionally have in his mind the fact that statements which he is making in his desire to prejudice the Government, may and often do operate most disastrously to the interests of the country. And a statement such as an hon. member of this House made the other evening was calculated to do a great deal of harm. If it was not true, it was most unfair and indefensible. The statement made was that since the Intercolonial had been extended to Montreal, in the months of April and May last goods were shipped from Acton and other places in the neighbourhood to points on the Intercolonial—to Halifax, Westville and Yarmouth, which is not on the Intercolonial, and that it took these goods from the 23rd of April to the 26th of May to reach their destination. The statement was that that happened, not only once, but several times, and the hon. gentleman would lead the House and the country to believe that it was a matter of common occurrence. Now, I take occasion to say that the hon. gentleman ought to have fully informed himself of the accuracy of his statements before he gave them the wide currency which they must necessarily have received, coming from a member of Parliament. It has gone abroad all over this country, that the management of the Intercolonial is so pernicious, is so defective that it is not wise for a man to send his freight by that route, to reach any point in the maritime provinces, because when it should go in two or three days, it would not be likely to reach its destination in five weeks. That was the statement the hon. gentleman put forward. It startled me when made, and I tried to get from him some assurance as to whether he had inquired where the delay had taken place, whether on the Intercolonial or on the Grand Trunk. The hon. gentleman was very positive that it had not occurred on the Grand Trunk, although he made no inquiries on the subject. He preferred to assume without making any inquiry that the Intercolonial Railway was not managed so as to justify people in doing business with it. I inquired by telegram this morning of the General Manager. I have not a copy of my telegram, but the answer will show what the inquiry was. I wired to the General Manager saying that a member of Parliament had made this statement in the House last evening, that goods had been shipped from Acton to Halifax, he believed they were gloves, and that it had taken from the 23rd of April to the 26th of May to reach their destination. I received the following reply :

Moncton, June 7th.

I have telegraphed to the stations about the delay of goods from Acton. Delays of that kind are very unusual, and there must be some special circumstances about them. As a rule, freight is taken over the Intercolonial more rapidly than over other railways of the same mileage. The average time of cars from Montreal to Halifax in May was two days and twenty-three hours, and from Montreal to St. John two days and six hours.

Mr. BLAIR.

(Sgd.) D. POTTINGER.

Mr. D. HENDERSON (Halton). I am glad that the hon. gentleman has brought this matter up in this way, because it gives me the opportunity to emphasize a little more than I did last night the statement I then made. I tell the hon. gentleman that I have the information on the most reliable authority, and I care not what any manager of the Intercolonial Railway may say, he cannot deny the fact which I have asserted. I did say that a case of goods which had been shipped from Acton on the 25th of April to a gentleman named Ross in the city of Halifax, only reached there on the 22nd of May, or in a month less three days. It was given to me unsolicited by the accountant of the firm which shipped the goods, who knew what he was talking about. That is only one instance. Other instances have occurred in other parts of the province. I stated :

From Acton a short time ago goods were shipped to Westville in Pictou county; they were shipped on the 4th of May, and they had not reached Westville on the 2nd day of June.

Whether they have reached their destination yet or not, I do not know, but I am prepared to furnish the most undoubted testimony on the subject. If necessary, I will get affidavits to prove what I say, and I will take no statement of the Minister's, obtained from any of his officials, who do not know what they are talking about, and do not know whether the goods have arrived or not. So that the statement made by the Minister is not a contradiction of what I said, and I think the Minister, in challenging the remarks made by me, should at least have before him some kind of evidence to show that the goods are even there yet.

Mr. BERGERON. He does not deny it.

Mr. HENDERSON. He certainly does not. I say it is a disgrace to this country that we should be called upon to spend millions of dollars in obtaining a railway that is going to treat the shippers of western Ontario in that manner. If that is to be the management of the road, I would prefer throwing up the whole thing. Unless a better system is adopted than that, the whole interprovincial trade of the country will be destroyed. Travellers are sent down to take orders, and the goods are shipped, but the people cannot get their goods. We could send goods to Victoria or Vancouver and have them sold and the money in the bank almost before you could get them to Nova Scotia or New Brunswick over the Drummond County Railway. I thank the hon. Minister for having brought this matter up because it gives me the opportunity of reasserting what I said on a former occasion. The information was given to me by the shippers, and given in a way which showed me there was something radically wrong with the whole system. I am quite sure the hon. Minister will withdraw his charge against me of insincerity because I assure him I am most sincere in this, and make my charge on the strength of information from a gentleman whom I have known for a great many years, and who, I know, would not give me a statement that was not absolutely correct.

Every session of Parliament we are bonusing railways for the purpose of creating railway competition. Only a few days ago a deputation was down here from New Ontario seeking a large bonus in order to create competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway between Winnipeg and Port Arthur. For what purpose was that competition desired? In order that the public might get better rates. But in this case, instead of bonusing a road to get better rates, we are actually bonusing a road to destroy competition. We are paying the Grand Trunk Railway a large sum every year on condition that it will refuse to take goods from Montreal, which are intended to be shipped to points on the Intercolonial Railway. So that we are really bonusing a road to destroy competition. If we are going to adopt that system, we should cease bonusing railways to create competition. The whole purchase of this road is rotten from beginning to end, and I hope this Bill will never become law.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.). It strikes me very strongly that both sides of this House are acting as so many children. I do not think that there is anything to be gained by this discussion. If the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has information which the Opposition require, and he has told us that it can be got at Moncton—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I say it cannot. They tell me they have not got it.

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman knows very well that there is not a car running a mile on the Intercolonial Railway or any other railway, of which there is not a record kept in the books of the railway. Is there any good reason therefore why the Minister should not get the information we desire. There is no great urgency required in the passing of this Bill. There is plenty of time to pass it in the next two months. The Opposition do not want to keep it from passing, but want certain information, which can be easily furnished by the Minister, and which, I think, in his own interest, he ought to furnish. The best thing he could do would be to adjourn the House and get the information, and the Bill would then go through without any trouble.

Mr. FOSTER. It is now half-past four o'clock. Of course assertions on one side or the other may be taken for what they are worth. We came here yesterday afternoon without the least intention of doing anything like obstructing the Bill. As an evidence of that, let me say that I had a conversation with Sir Charles Tupper before he left the House. I said to him that we had nothing to gain by staying late to-night, and that I thought we ought to get away by twelve o'clock, and get through with our criticism on the measure. The committee have heard what the hon. member from Halifax has said. I went back and spoke to him and we both came to that conclusion, and we came to that conclusion on the ground that we had the information which each considered vital for the presentation of our own argument. There is nothing more vital to the presentation of the case from an Opposition standpoint, than that we should know exactly, from practical work, the user of the Intercolonial Railway of those lines and facilities in proportion to the user of the Grand Trunk Railway. If we do not have that information, we are robbed of what we consider as our right on our appeal to the country. No gentleman on either side will contend for a moment that it is not possible to get in a short time the entire car and engine mileage and the proportion of that which belongs to the Intercolonial on these lines and in these terminals.

The Minister himself has not undertaken to say that this cannot be got. Now, on the 26th of May this information was asked for, in no casual manner, but in a most explicit and definite manner, and the Minister gave the questioner an answer that the information could easily be got and would be brought down. Last night, to prevent mistakes, the same matter was brought up by the member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) and with the same detail, or nearly so, with which he first asked for the information. The Minister said the information had been brought down. The hon. member from Halifax rested content with that. But to-day—or rather yesterday—he found that it had not been brought down. Now, this is a vital point for the Opposition in the discussion of this question. It is for the members of the Government, if they choose, to keep this an enduring session. They can keep it, if they wish, until 12 o'clock on Saturday; they cannot keep it longer.

Mr. McMULLEN. All right; go on.

Mr. FOSTER. I am talking to the members of the Ministry who, I trust, have a greater feeling of responsibility—

Mr. McMULLEN. We have something to say.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope I shall have order for a moment. I am putting forward frankly the facts of the case. I say this point is vital to the Opposition.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is not.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I do not suppose there is any use in attempting to argue with a kicker like that. However, that is the Opposition opinion, that it is vital that we should have this information, and, I believe we ought to have it. We asked for it in plenty of time. Between the 26th of May and to-day the Minister could have communicated with Moncton, with Montreal, with every point on the system and had this information ready to hand. But not only has he not got it, he absolutely refuses to get it. I want the members of the Government who are present to think it over and decide whether they will prolong this struggle. It is not a matter of moment whether this Bill passes to-day or whether it passes to-morrow. There is plenty of business for the House to take up. It is simply a question whether the information shall be given and the business go on, or whether this struggle is to be kept up. My own advice and desire is that the information should be had and the committee stage should not pass until that information is given.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has referred to me, I desire to say a few words. I am bound to accept his statement that he and his associates did not intend to obstruct this measure; but he will pardon me if I say that if they had desired to obstruct they would have proceeded on the very lines they have followed. The idea of our going on in this struggle, as he suggests, is not creditable to either side. There is something in what the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Macdonald) said that there is a good deal of childishness in the whole proceeding. Within the last four hours—without being discourteous, I may mention the fact—there has not been a new thought advanced. Hon. gentlemen have gone on repeating what they had already said. They had a right to ask for information, but, not meeting with the response they desired they have repeated again and again what they said in the first place, so we are about where we were at nine or ten o'clock. This is not the final stage of the Bill. Why not agree to let the Bill go through the committee stage? Hon. gentlemen have the right on the third reading to raise every objection they wish. In the meantime, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has stated that he will give hon. gentlemen opposite any information in his power. It is not for me to say what that information is, he must answer for that himself. He said that the information asked for is not in the department, but that, what information he can procure he will produce. I agree that any information that can be obtained ought to be obtained. But we cannot gain anything by sitting here and repeating what has been said again and again. I would suggest, as a fair and reasonable adjustment of the differences, to pass this Bill in Committee of the Whole, hon. gentlemen opposite reserving their right to deal with the matter on the third reading, if the Minister has not, in the meantime, produced such information as they think they should have.

Mr. FOSTER. What we ask is simply the recognition of the right to have the information for the full discussion on the committee stage of the Bill. There is no doubt about that right, and my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) understands that. I say that should we forego that right for information which can be had, it will not facilitate public business in the least. There is other public business waiting our attention, so that even if we do not go on with this Bill immediately there need be no delay in our work. Now, we have our rights, and one of them is to have this information at this stage of the Bill. I do not think it is fair or right for the Government to try to press us to forego the freedom of discussion in committee and press the Bill forward to the third reading stage. If it could be shown that there is any public business which was being impeded by the delay, then there would be a strong argument against our position. But the road is working and will be working, just as it has been for the last twelve or thirteen months. There is just this one question, I would say to the Minister of Finance, whether we shall have this information and be able to present our arguments with that information before us. Outside of that, I do not think, speaking for myself, and, I think, of my friends, that it will take five minutes to dispose of the rest of the schedule. But this is our vital point. You may say that we are all foolish and stupid in considering this our vital point; but that is the way we look at it, and we have a right to whatever we think is the strongest presentations of our position.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is not germane to the passing of the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. If the ideas of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) prevail we will not talk about it any more.

Mr. WALLACE. To my mind, the proposition of the Minister is the most extraordinary one. He says that we are to go through the committee stage and then, at a later stage, the Minister of Railways and Canals will give us what further information he may—and the Minister of Finance does not say what that information is to be. That is not the way parliamentary business is conducted and no one knows it better than the Minister of Finance. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that for two years they should have been preparing these statements that we are asking for. But they are purposely withheld, and withheld for certain reasons. It was almost pathetic to listen to the hon. member for North Wellington. What did he tell us? He said that the Minister went to his department and spent many weary hours looking over the records—

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not say that.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman said the Minister went all over the documents. Then he says the auditor goes down to Montreal. What is the use of talking that way to this Committee? What does clause 33 say :

Her Majesty and the company shall each furnish to the other promptly, each and every month, all the information necessary to the ascertaining and checking of rates, fares, charges, charge of costs and other returns.

That is all we want. That is the statement prepared by the company, and which is prepared by the Intercolonial Railway the 1st of every month. We want these statements, they are withheld, and they are withheld for a purpose. And what is the purpose? Why, it is because the Government are afraid to show the state of the comparative business of the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. They have got that statement, they get it every month. Why don't they present it to this House?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You are asking for information that we have not got.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the Minister tell me that he is working under an agreement for fourteen months, and that the very essence of that agreement is being violated every month? Because that is what he means when he says that he has not got the information. His own clause says that Her Majesty and the company should each furnish to the other every month all the information necessary. Has that been done?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The auditor is satisfied.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister is trifling with the intelligence of the Committee in resorting to such a subterfuge. We did not ask him if the auditor is satisfied. We want to be satisfied ourselves. The fact is that in every month but one there has been a tumble down in the share that the Intercolonial Railway has to pay. In July their share to pay was $2,336; in August, their share to pay dropped to $1,900; in September, their share to pay dropped again to $1,880; in October, to $1,521; in November, it increased to $2,000; in December it dropped to $1,071; in January, to $482.45; in February, it increased a little, being $488.30. There is the record, and there is the reason why the Minister dare not furnish that statement presented to his department, and which he has in the department, but which he dare not lay on the Table of the House. But it would be still more damaging if we could get further information relative to the proportion of the expenses to be paid by the Grand Trunk Railway, and by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and by the Intercolonial Railway, because it would annihilate the proposition that we are to pay for one-half of this. Even the hon. member for North Wellington will admit that we are entitled to this information. But that hon. gentleman, looking to his future prospects, is always ready to come to the rescue of the Government, not with argument, not with logic, but with a hungry growl that we hear issuing from the depths.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Am I not hungry at this hour?

Mr. WALLACE. I am hungering for a little information, the smallest quantity of information will satisfy us. We may hunger and hunger apparently still unsatisfied. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said to-night in answer to the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) that they did not increase the tariff of rates.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think we did.

Mr. WALLACE. Does not the hon. gentleman know that he was going to revolutionise the affairs of the road; that he appointed Mr. Harris who presented a new schedule of rates for the whole of the Intercolonial system? Does the hon. Minister not know that when these rates had been submitted to him for his approval and that when they were put into force in the maritime provinces it almost raised a rebellion, and that it would have upset the Government if it had been persisted in and continued. The Minister knows that he had to dismiss Mr. Harris, withdraw his tariff and practically revert to the old tariff. The hon. Minister says he does not recollect much about that. Nobody knows better than he does that he was deluged with letters of protest against this high tariff which had undoubtedly increased the receipts of the Intercolonial. Are we not justified in our suspicions as to the course of this Government when they refuse to give us information. Do we not know the history of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway? Do we not know that, without the authority of Parliament, and without a contract, the Government undertook to run the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, and that they ran it at a loss of $36,000 or $37,000? I say in the face of facts like this we are justified in demanding all the information and not scraps of information. When we ask for the documents the hon. Minister says that the auditor goes down to Montreal, and he is perfectly satisfied.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I said he came up to Montreal.

Mr. WALLACE. Worse still; we supposed that we had an officer of the Government who would examine into these accounts but now we find he comes up from Montreal which, I presume, means that he is the auditor of the Grand Trunk Railway, that he says to the Minister that it is all right and the Minister is satisfied. If that is the way things are going on it is on a par with the Yukon Bill, with the extravagant bargain of the Government with the Canadian Pacific Railway in building the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and with what is looming up in New Brunswick where the Minister had to say that the Government were not committed to the acquiring of the Great Eastern Railway, but that he himself, as a private individual, expressing his views to his fellow-citizens down there, which he said was not binding the Government. But the machinery is at work to accomplish his desires in that direction. We want the information and I can tell the hon. Minister that we are going to have it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You will have to wait until it can be got.

Mr. WALLACE. We do not begrudge the time. We will wait. We want to go on with the business; we will go into supply or anything else. I would appeal to the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) to give us that information that we desire so as to enable us to proceed with the business of the country and not assist his colleagues in obstructing and preventing due progress being made in the conduct of the public business.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no refusal on the part of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to give information, so that a very large part of my hon. friend's speech was wasted. The Minister says he is willing to give it. There is no other business that can be satisfactorily gone on with. Going into supply has degenerated into a mere form, and we can make no progress in that way. If this information which cannot be got at present can be got before the third reading the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals will give it, and then hon. gentlemen opposite would be in as good a position at the third reading as they are now.

Mr. FOSTER. No, we will discuss it now.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Possibly the Minister would be correct in saying that the information desired is not in Ottawa.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Nor in Moncton either.

Mr. CLARKE. Does the Minister say that the information upon which the auditor based his certificate to the Government is not here nor in Moncton?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not in writing.

Mr. CLARKE. How are the payments made? The Minister stated that these payments were made on the certificate of the auditor, and the auditor must have some papers before him.

Mr. WALLACE.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He had the books.

Mr. CLARKE. I understand that the agreement made with the Grand Trunk Railway provided—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It has not been so interpreted. They did not make a transcript and copy thousands of pages.

Mr. FOSTER. Nobody asks that, and you know it as well as any man in this House.

Mr. CLARKE. Did not the auditor visit Montreal at the end of the month and make a statement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He never made a statement to me; I never heard anything about it.

Mr. CLARKE. But he must have made a statement upon which your accounts were paid.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He examined the books and certified as to the sum to be paid out.

Mr. IVES. I understood the Minister to say that these accounts were in the department at Moncton.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have stated over and over again that I presume these accounts rendered by the Grand Trunk Railway against the Intercolonial Railway are there. That is a matter of inference simply.

Mr. IVES. Do they not show the cost of maintenance and the proportion the Intercolonial Railway owes to the Grand Trunk Railway on its wheelage basis?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I presume they do.

Mr. BERGERON. What is the name of the auditor?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have two or three.

Mr. BERGERON. What are their names?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know them by name, but I will get their names for you.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no use in the Minister trying to fool the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) should be so insulting.

Mr. FOSTER. I will give expression to my opinion.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I shall decline to notice his inquiries if he does not make them in proper terms.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I shall appeal to my benevolent friend the Minister of Customs. There is no use fooling about this matter. The Minister knows that he can get the combined car wheelage of the Intercolonial Railway and Grand Trunk Railway for any month simply by asking for it, and he can have it here inside of an hour if he wishes. Whether that mileage be in Moncton or Montreal or elsewhere, the Minister can telegraph and get it. He knows we have the right to that information, and whether we stay here a week or a month we will have to get it. Why not give it and let the Government go on with the business. There is the Redistribution measure, there are nine-tenths of the Estimates to be passed, there is the Senate Resolution and the Prohibition Resolution, and you cannot make progress, even if you attempt to keep us here until Saturday night without giving us the information.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows that that has nothing to do with the passing of this Bill. He can bring these men before the Public Accounts Committee and examine them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows that he is only fooling, humbugging, and nothing else.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Nonsense.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I am surprised to hear the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) making such an extraordinary statement.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not want to see them making an exhibition of themselves.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a fine thing you cannot see yourself.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can see you.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I am at a great loss to understand what the Minister of Railways can possibly mean when he assures us on his honour as a Minister that neither in his department at Ottawa nor in the Office at Moncton are there any statements on which these accounts are based.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Do not state it any more broadly than I have stated it. I have stated that I am assured by the officers of my department that there are not here in Ottawa nor at Moncton any accounts or statements showing what the proportion of the mileage is between the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The Minister does not state this on his own authority. He simply states that the officers of his department have assured him.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How could I? I say I have never seen such a statement; but I stated to the committee that I would wire to the Grand Trunk Company, and I have no doubt that they would as expeditiously as possible furnish me with the information.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The House is bound to accept the statement of the Minister; but what then becomes a most puzzling question for the House is how these figures are arrived at, if there is not a knowledge of the mileage of the Intercolonial and the mileage of the Grand Trunk. Would not the auditor obtain these?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have never seen the auditor that I know of. I certainly have never spoken to him on this subject.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The hon. gentleman must have seen some figures. First of all, the Grand Trunk furnishes an account showing the amount in detail; then, having the amount in detail, and the gross sum ascertained by addition, the figures we have can only be arrived at by a sum in proportion. For instance, the sum of $2,230 for July represents the Intercolonial proportion of the gross outlay of the Grand Trunk.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Unless that payment is short of the full amount, because sometimes items are in dispute.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). It is true, in order to arrive at these figures, the Grand Trunk must have known exactly the proportion of mileage which the Intercolonial bore to that of the Grand Trunk.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Certainly, they must have had it before them.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). And the auditor obtained access to those figures. We have arrived at that point that the Grand Trunk know exactly what proportion existed between the gross mileage of the Grand Trunk and the mileage of the Intercolonial. That information must be in the Grand Trunk office.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Oh, yes, I take it that the Grand Trunk could furnish that. But I could not say how long it would take them to furnish it. They could easily make it up.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Is it not certain that the Grand Trunk must have those figures in the office?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Certainly they have.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The figures showing not only the gross outlay for maintenance, but also the percentage for mileage. Therefore, it strikes me that all the Minister has to do is to telegraph to the Grand Trunk.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have had enough experience to know that when you expect as a matter of course that railway accounts are going to disclose such and such things, you must not be too confident about it.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). There is not the slightest doubt that the hon. Minister can get the information desired if he wishes to do so, and he ought to be aware that he cannot coerce the Opposition into consenting to let this discussion cease before we get information which we deem vital to a proper understanding of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The suggestion of the Minister of Finance, it seems to me, was a very fair one. Differences have arisen as differences have arisen before and will arise again, but I do not see why the committee stage should not pass and the Bill stand for its third reading. By arrangement with the leader of the Opposition, instead of taking the vote on the second reading, it is to be taken on the third reading, and at that stage my hon. friends can make all the discussion they choose on the point they have now raised. The hon. leader of the Opposition said plainly that the Bill would probably pass in five minutes and that he had no points to raise.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). There is so much more advantage in discussing this matter in committee that I do not see how we could consent to let the Bill pass that stage, unless we get the information the Minister has promised us and failed to bring down.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is all very well to say: Let the Bill go through committee, and we will give the information on the third reading. But we have been trying thirteen days to get that information. I asked the leader of the Opposition if he proposed opposing this Bill at any length, and he said no, that it was his intention to let the Bill go through with moderate discussion, but at that time he expected that the information promised would be brought down. It has not been brought down, and the Minister of Railways and Canals has not the remotest intention of bringing it down, although he knows that all he has to do is to apply to the Grand Trunk Railway office to get it. What is the reason that there is so much anxiety to get this Bill through before this information is given?

Mr. McMULLEN. Humbug.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman will have to withdraw that remark before we proceed any further.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). It is a word very frequently used though not in good taste.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is not out of order.

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

Mr. BERGERON. Nobody knows better than the hon. member for North Wellington that this expression is unparliamentary.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Landerkin). Shall this clause be adopted?

Mr. BERGERON. There is a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I have not heard it stated.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. member for North Wellington has addressed to the hon. member for Haldimand the epithet "humbug."

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He could not do that, he is bound to address the Chair.

Mr. BERGERON. But it is because he does what he is bound not to do that he is out of order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I would like to hear the point discussed.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Brodeur). took the Chair.

Mr. BERGERON. In case you may not have understood the point, Mr. Chairman, I may explain that the hon. member for North Wellington addressed to the hon. member for Haldimand the epithet "humbug."

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. BERGERON. I am putting the case as I understood it.

Mr. COWAN. You were asleep.

Mr. BERGERON. After I have put it, we can discuss it; we are here for that purpose.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand the statement is disputed. I would ask the hon. gentleman for North Wellington if he used that expression concerning a member of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. While the hon. member for Haldimand was speaking I declared his argument was humbug.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must hold that the expression is not out of order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am bound to say if we had a Minister of Railways and Canals who knew his duty as well as the Chairman of the Committee knows his, we should not be here at half past five in the morning asking for information. I congratulate you, Mr. Chairman, on the manner in which you have contributed to the good order, elegance and language and gentlemanly conduct among the members of the House. I shall make an argument applying the elegant language which you have now decided to be part of the language of Parliament—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. For the information of the hon. gentleman, I must draw his attention to the fact that the word "humbug" applied to a member of the House, and "humbug" applied to language are not the same. That is the difference as I draw it from Blackmore's decisions. I do not say that the word is polite, but it is not unparliamentary.

Mr. BERGERON. We knew before that it was not polite.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose, Mr. Chairman, I should characterize your decision as humbug, how would you take it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. You would take it as a compliment, no doubt. I was going to say that no greater humbug of argument was ever presented to this House than that of the Minister of Railways and Canals. It was a concoction of humbug throughout. I am not in the habit of using this language, but as it has been added to the polite and elegant language of the House I may use it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Chairman said it was not polite.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But he said it was parliamentary, and what is parliamentary is supposed to be elegant, and what is elegant is polite, and what is polite on one side of the House is polite on the other. I bow without humbug to your decision; but I say with all respect that I trust you will see, after a while, that it is better to revise that decision; that it is better for the preservation of elegance of language, good manners and kindly feeling that when a member is endeavouring to get through the thickness of his brain—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. All this, of course, has a direct bearing on the Grand Trunk contract.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When a gentleman is endeavouring to get through his thick brain as I was an expression of opinion on the Grand Trunk question, to be told by the elegant, eloquent, learned and polite gentleman from North Wellington that I was talking humbug was a pleasant change in this long sitting, and I am glad that it is one that the House enjoyed. Now, I want to analyse what the Minister of Railways has said in the light of your ruling. Thirteen days ago he promised to give us certain information. He has not done it; he has humbugged the House. Last night he told us that the information was down; the statement was a humbug. He now suggests that this Bill should go through the committee and bring down the information at the third reading; that is an attempt at humbug. He is attempting to humbug the House and what we on this side propose is that he shall not humbug us any longer as he has done for the last thirteen or fourteen days. Now the hon. gentleman has time and again told this House that it was impossible to get the information that the Opposition asked for, and he won't deny that. I have heard him say: You are asking what I cannot get.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What I have not got.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If he knew that he could get it, why didn't he make an effort to get it? We know perfectly well why that information was not brought down. The hon. gentleman knows just as well as he knows that he is sitting in one of the front seats, that he can get that information in an hour, and his colleagues know it perfectly well. The hon. gentleman has a reason for not bringing it down, and that reason is that it will show that his whole arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway is a humbug, because he is paying at the rate of a half ownership for that railway, while his user of it is only about one 25th. Mr. Wainwright himself says that we are going to be a user of it to the extent of 1 per cent. There is the reason this information is not brought down, and there is the reason that this side of the House proposes to get that information before this Bill gets into the stage where we have not freedom of debate.

Mr. F. A. MARCOTTE (Champlain). (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I think it my duty first, to offer my thanks to the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Malouin), for the hearty way in which he greets me, when rising in my seat to deal with a question of such vital importance to the country a contract to which the Government proposes to commit the House for a term of 99 years. What has struck me in this long debate has been the fact that the Ministers, either through ignorance or wilfully, have been withholding proper information in connection with a matter of such vital importance as the construction of a railway from Montreal to Quebec. In France and in other foreign countries, whenever they have to deal with a railway question, and to figure at the cost of a railway question, they do not make their valuations at haphazard and without principle as they do here; they do not bring down fanciful and chimerical data as those given to the House by the Minister of Railways and Canals. The hon. gentleman came gravely before this Committee and declared that to build a bridge across the Richelieu, $300,000 would be necessary, while an hon. member, who is a practical man, stated that that bridge could be built for $60,000. Now, when statements like those are made by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, although I feel inclined to give the preference to the estimation of the hon. gentleman on this side of the House, and I believe that such a bridge could be built across the river Yamaska for $60,000, instead of $300,000, as figured out by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. Still, I say that, being in the dark, as we are in such matters, the Opposition are only exercising their just rights when demanding that full information be brought down, before committing the province of Quebec and the country to such a contract; and that the Government are bound to furnish us with that information, unless they intend to favour certain private interests, as was the case in several instances, since they came into power.

We are entitled to get information as to the cost of the Drummond County Railway from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal. We want to get full information on the cost of a new line of railway and whether the Government will have to bonus a new line.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Brodeur). (Translation.) I draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that it was the understanding of the Committee that the contract was to be taken clause by clause; now, as clause 3 is under consideration, the hon. gentleman will please confine himself to that clause.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, while you were absent from the House, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals stated that you could not carry the Bill in clauses, and it had to go as a whole.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Brodeur). (Translation.) Then I shall have to read the whole schedule, section by section.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Yes, that is the most regular proceeding; but the Minister of Railways stated that it was not to be taken by sections, and that it must be carried as a whole.

(The Chairman proceeds to read the Bill in English, clause by clause.)

Mr. CHAIRMAN. It was the understanding of the committee that the whole question of the schedule would be discussed, but at the same time it would put the matter in order and facilitate the business of the committee if I should read the whole section which I shall do except the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. FOSTER. When did the Chairman come to that conclusion? It is now six o'clock in the morning and we have been discussing the question since nine o'clock last night. It seems to me that every method that possibly can be taken in order to thwart the Opposition is being taken.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I think that when the House was in committee before it was distinctly declared from the Chair that the whole schedule would be put as one motion and not clause by clause.

Mr. FOSTER. When my hon. friend (Mr. Marcotte) proposes to discuss the whole of it he is stopped.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I will have to read this whole schedule in order to bring the matter properly before the committee. We are supposed to be on section 3, and the discussion has been confined to matters relating to the third clause.

Mr. MARCOTTE.

Mr. WALLACE. The third and the 33rd clauses.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I drew the attention of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) that it was necessary that the whole schedule should be read so as to place the matter properly before the committee. I think it is better to read it unless the committee is willing to dispense with the reading.

Mr. BERGERON. I think it would be more regular, Mr. Chairman, that you should read it. My hon. friend expressed the idea that it was not to be taken article by article, and when the point of order was taken I said to the Chairman in French that the understanding was that we were dealing with the whole thing. So as to make it more regular, I think the Chairman should read the whole schedule.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. That is the only regular proceeding.

Mr. BERGERON. I did not hear the sixth clause read.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. It is the sixth clause I am reading.

Mr. BERGERON. But you stopped about the middle of it.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, you have just read the Bill in English; but I believe that we, as French-speaking members, have also certain rights and privileges here, and that you, Mr. Chairman, as well as the hon. members of this House, will see to it that those rights and privileges are respected. I am glad to see that the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) is of my opinion; and I hope he will support me in my demand that this Bill be read in French. I am happy to have the support of such an able and prominent colleague as the hon. member; when I insist upon the exercise of one of the most unquestionable rights and privileges claimed by the French-speaking members, and I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to read this Bill in French.

I have, on previous occasions, called attention to the fact that the French language was overlooked in this House, but I am happy to be able to say, Mr. Chairman, that you always read in French the motions before the House.

Now that the Bill has been read in English, I think I am perfectly entitled to demand that this Bill be now read in French, as it is most desirable that the rights of the French language, as an official language, should be upheld in all their integrity.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The Clerk informs me that he has got no French copy of the Bill.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Here is a French copy of the Bill.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I hope the Chairman will not hesitate a single minute to read the Bill in French, for the benefit of the members who do not understand English. Why, Sir, shall it go down to history that under this Liberal régime, with a French Canadian Prime Minister as leader of this House, a fact the hon. gentlemen opposite take such a pride in, the Chairman hesitated to read this Bill in French, after having read it in English? I hope at least the hon. members from the province of Quebec behind the Treasury benches will raise no objection to my demand.

If I insist upon the Bill being read in French, it is not only that I claim it as a right, and for the information of the House, but also for the sake of your personal dignity, Mr. Chairman, and in order to secure for the French language in this House the respect it is entitled to.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I have no objection to reading the Bill in French, but the only official copy at hand is the one I have just read.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) The copy I have just handed you is official.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that I am bound to furnish you with a French copy of the Bills before this House.

Mr. DUGAS. (Translation.) As a French-speaking member who has sat here for several years, I wish to say that, within my recollection, the Bills before the House have always been read in French, when the members insisted upon it.

Mr. BERGERON. It is unjust to treat us in that way. The two languages are official in this House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Is there a rule which would oblige this to be read in French?

Mr. BERGERON. There is a rule, and the hon. gentleman, as a Minister of the Crown, ought to know it. When we had a Speaker that could speak the two languages he did it himself, and when we had a Speaker that could not speak the two languages the Clerk was ordered to read in French.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Is there a rule of the House requiring that every Bill should be read in both languages? If so, it would seem to be in order that we could make every member speak in both languages as well.

Mr. BERGERON. We have here the official use of the two languages and everything that comes before the House we have the right to have put by the Chair in the two languages.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman cannot ask to have the whole Bill read in French, but only the motion before the Chair. He cannot ask to have the two clauses already passed read in French now. The demand must be made at the moment. We have passed two clauses, and no demand was made to read them in French, and you cannot ask to have these two clauses read in French now.

Mr. FOSTER. For the first time in this House is the right denied, and that by a Liberal Government, which has always been recognized of having proceedings given in the French as well as the English language.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentlemen forgot their duty to the French language when they allowed motions to pass without being read in French, and they have just now awakened to a sense of duty.

Mr. BERGERON. I can ask that a motion be read in French at any stage.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But not a motion that is already passed. The hon. gentleman cannot ask to have the motions of last week read in French. He has the right to have the schedule read in French.

Mr. BERGERON. I am not asking for anything else.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Rule 33 of the rules of the House and Bourinot's work are very clear on this point, that all motions before the House shall be put in both languages.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understood the hon. member for Champlain to ask that the whole Bill be read in French.

Mr. MARCOTTE. No, all I desire is that the schedule be read in French.

Mr. BERGERON. And that was refused.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I did not refuse to read the schedule in French.

(Mr. Deputy Speaker then proceeded to read the schedule in French.)

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I have to offer you my congratulations for having consented to read in French, in such a rapid and expeditious way, the Bill now before the House. I have a few remarks to offer in connection with the trouble we have experienced in getting that Bill read in French. After it had been read in English, I asked the Chairman to read it in French. I am astonished that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who claims to be French and who descends from an old French family, well known for its patriotism, and whose grandfather fought for the upholding of that language, is found to-day among the hon. gentlemen who seem to object to my demand—

Mr. BOURASSA. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I think the hon. gentleman is out of order in making comments on the question connected with the reading of the Bill in French; he ought to confine himself to the Bill under consideration. I protest against the manner in which the hon. gentleman deals with the issue now before the House. We are not dealing now with the official use of the French language, but with an altogether different matter.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I say that the hesitation shown by some hon. gentlemen opposite, when the question of reading the Bill in French came up before the Committee, is not creditable to them.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman is out of order in referring to that matter. He cannot indulge in such remarks, when a question of order is raised.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I say that the hon. gentlemen opposite—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) Order. I have already told the hon. gentleman that he cannot refer to that matter. He cannot impute motives to those who differ in opinion from him. The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, you ought to make known your ruling to the House.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) You might as well ask the Chairman to translate into English and French speeches delivered in this House, for the information of those who are not conversant with that language.

Mr. DUGAS. (Translation.) As the hon. gentleman who presides over this Committee is a French Canadian, I think he ought to be held responsible for what the hon. member for Champlain has said—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I call the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Dugas) to order. Under no rule of this House am I held responsible for the statements of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte). I repudiate any such responsibility.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would respectfully ask Mr. Deputy Speaker to give us that ruling in English.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think I am obliged to translate my ruling. But as a favour to the hon. gentleman, I may tell him that I had to call the hon. gentleman to order for referring to a certain vote which was given last year in the Senate.

Mr. MILLS. If there is a ruling from the Chair, we are entitled to have it in English as well as in French.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. As a question of parliamentary procedure it is undoubted that the Chairman of committees is not bound to make his ruling in both languages.

Mr. BOURASSA.

If the hon. gentleman merely asks me what I said, I am willing to tell him; but if he makes his request as a matter of right, I think he is going too far.

Mr. MILLS. You rule, then, that the Chair is not obliged to give his ruling in English?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. By the rules of the House we have a right to use either language in asking questions, and if the Chairman of committees is not familiar with one of the languages, then the Clerk has to translate the question. But as regards the rulings of the Chair, there is no rule by which a Chairman is bound to repeat in one language what he says in another. But if the hon. gentleman wants me to repeat in English what I have said in French, I have no objection to do so as a matter of favour.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding.) The point of order should be stated in English also by the member who is speaking, in order that we may understand the ruling.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Chairman of committees has the same privilege as any other member in the House, to speak in whichever language he chooses.

Mr. BERGERON. No, the Chairman, I submit, is obliged to answer in whichever language he is requested to answer.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am sure that there is no rule by which the Chairman of committees is bound to give his rulings in both languages.

Mr. BERGERON. In the Act providing for a Deputy Speaker, it is clearly stated that if the Speaker is of one language the Deputy must be of the other language. The reason was that any member of the House is entitled to hear in his own language anything that may fall from the Chair.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is no such rule.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Some hon. gentlemen opposite seem disposed to trifle with the matter now before the House. They are not arguing it so seriously as the importance of the matter warrants us to do. As I have already stated, we are destitute of information on the subject of the Drummond County Railway, because the hon. Minister of Railways has declined to bring down any data on the matter. As I said, in France and in other civilized countries of the world, whenever some railway contract is submitted to the Chambers by the Government, the members of Parliament are given all the desirable information, from a financial standpoint, as also from that of the public interest. The Government furnished the minutest details as to the construction of such railways, they even figure out the cost by inch and foot.

Mr. H. S. HARWOOD (Vaudreuil). (Translation.) In France they do not figure out by feet and inches, but they use meters and centimeters.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Yes, but the hon. gentlemen opposite are far from figuring out the matter so accurately when they endorse a wild-cat scheme like the contract now before the House. Take the case of the Yamaska River bridge. An hon. Minister declared on the floor of the House that to build a bridge across the Yamaska River, $300,000 would be necessary, while an hon. gentleman on this side of the House challenged that statement, and made an estimate that the bridge across the Yamaska could be built for $60,000. Nobody knows what that bridge is going to cost, even if it were built by some private company. Some hon. gentlemen opposite laugh, but I think it is nothing unreasonable on my part, and nothing to provoke the hilarity of the hon. gentlemen opposite, to ask for accurate data, when the public interests are at stake. And, if I am not mistaken, the province of Quebec may call the Government to a strict account for trifling in that way with such a grave matter, and for making an estimation at haphazard, as to the cost of those works. I appeal to the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) whether he knows what that bridge on the Yamaska River is going to cost? The hon. gentleman does not vouchsafe an answer.

The contract now before the House is a matter of the utmost importance, from the standpoint of the general interests of the country, involving, as it does, the expenditure of a large sum of money for a term of 99 years. The hon. gentlemen opposite seem amused with my remarks. These ironical cheers and laughter, from the other side show that those hon. gentlemen are lacking in public spirit. There is no fooling and humbugging about such a serious matter. The hon. gentlemen laugh and make merry, when the country is going to the dogs. when the country, I say, is on the verge of bankruptcy. The hon. gentlemen are here to protect the interests of their constituents, and they think perhaps they are discharging their duty to their country when they laugh in my face, or if they do not laugh, they sleep in their seats, while, we, on the Opposition side, we are watching on the walls and doing everything to prevent that waste of the people's money.

I have asked the Minister of Railways and Canals several questions, without that hon. gentleman condescending to give an answer. The inference to be drawn from his silence is that he cannot reply to my statements. In passing this contract, the Government have not taken into consideration the interests of the country at large. Here again I call the attention of the hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that the Government have acted in the matter recklessly. Last year, they brought down a Bill dealing with the purchase of the Drummond County Railway. What is the difference between the scheme brought down last session and the Bill introduced this session? I appeal to the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) whether the measure presented this year to the House is not better and more advantageous to the country than the Bill of last session? The hon. gentleman is silent. I ask the hon. gentleman to vouchsafe an answer. You are silent, because you cannot vindicate your course.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman should address the Chair.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I am trying to impress upon the House the importance of the matter under discussion, and nobody vouchsafes a reply to the question. I have asked, this is no question of detail. And in this connection, let the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet) allow me to congratulate him on the vote he gave last session.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) It was not last session that I gave that vote. Therefore I call the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman ought to know the difference between that contract and that now before the House.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) The question now before us is as to the lease of the Grand Trunk Railway, and not as to the purchase of the Drummond County Railway.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) It comes to the same. I have to congratulate the hon. gentleman on the stand he has taken—

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes."

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes." The hon. gentleman ought to infer from that Latin sentence, as applied to the contract now before the House, that, after having feared last year to vote on that question, he ought to have the same fear this year. Mr. Chairman, I hold again that there is not a single gentleman opposite who can say that the contract introduced this year is not better than that of last session.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) If the contract now before us is better than that of last session, that is no reason why we should vote against it.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) It is a reason why I should congratulate the hon. gentleman, should he vote, as he did, last year. "Timeo Danaos." He should fear, this year, as he did last year, to vote in favour of this measure, but it is likely that party spirit will prevail this year. I appeal to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, whether the contract before us is not better than that of last session? The Minister does not answer my question, and I infer from his silence that he has no good reasons to offer the House, and that it is impossible for us to have a reply in French from a Minister of the Crown. Among the Ministers I now see on the Treasury benches, there is probably only one who understands French.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Brodeur.) (Translation.) I am sorry to have to call again the hon. gentleman to order. We are now in Committee of the Whole on a Bill, and the hon. gentleman should confine himself to the question, without entering into considerations foreign to the debate.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Has not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcotte) the right to interpellate the Minister? He asked the Minister a question and he should have the right to expect an answer from him.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I am trying to show, Mr. Chairman, that the present contract is better than that of last session, and I want an answer from the Minister of Railways and Canals. When I address the hon. gentleman in French, I cannot get any answer from him; that is the reason why I protest.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) By dint of protesting you will pass for a Protestant.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Here, the Ministers decline to answer the interpellations of members, on very important questions, while in France and other foreign countries, the Cabinet furnishes the House with the minutest information about the construction of railways. Here the Minister of Railways and Canals refuses to give us any information and does not even condescend to answer the question I asked him. And I say that it is the duty of those who wish to protect the public interests, and to prevent the waste of public money, to enter here their protest against such a course. I say again that this bargain is better than that of last year. Last year, you acted foolishly, recklessly—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I call again the hon. gentleman to order; he should address the Chair.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I accept your ruling. If the bargain they now propose is better than that of last year, the inference to be drawn from that is that they were prompted to vote merely through party spirit, and that they voted in favour of that measure, without taking into consideration the interests of the country. I may also infer that they did not act as intelligent representatives of the people, that they did not bring their judgment to bear upon this measure after a careful analysis of the data which they should have had to enable them to reach a fair conclusion. The Senate thought it their duty to reject that scheme, which was worse than this one, and the Senate deserves credit for their action, although you now talk of abolishing it.

I ask the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Monet), who wants to do away with the Senate, whether his vote does not justify the stand taken by that body—

Mr. SAVARD. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman is completely out of the question; I call him to order. The vote of the Senate has nothing to do with this debate.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman should confine himself to the last section of the Bill. That is the section now under discussion, and I invite the hon. gentleman to return to the question.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I am dealing now with the question of principle. I wish to obey your ruling, Mr. Chairman, still, I cannot help saying that such a ruling tends to banish from the debate the teaching of history. The beacon light of history illumines the future. Must history be eliminated from the proceedings of this Committee, and more particularly when the Ministers obstinately refuse to throw any light upon the debate and to elucidate our doubts? The Minister of Railways declines to answer our questions and to give us any information. Let him procure us reliable data, and all the information we want. Let him give us a carefully prepared estimation, so that we may figure out the matter.

Can the hon. gentlemen opposite tell us whether it would be more cheaper for the Government to build a bridge at Quebec? The hon. gentlemen seem puzzled by this question. They do not know whether it would have been preferable to make an arrangement with the Great Northern Railway Company or with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, from Quebec to Montreal. They do not know whether it would be cheaper for the Government to choose that line or to build a railway on the south shore, from Montreal to Quebec; and, by the way, it should not be forgotten that the Government promised to build that railway. The hon. gentlemen cannot give us any information about that; they are absolutely ignorant.

Let us go a step further. They do not even know whether it would be cheaper for the Government, if they once ascertained the cost on which they were to pay interest for ninety-nine years, instead of paying an exorbitant interest of 5 per cent, to borrow the money and pay it over to the Grand Trunk, seeing that they can borrow at 2½ per cent, or a little more than half of 5 per cent. The Government would thus have saved an immense amount of money in the course of ninety-nine years. Now, I ask the hon. gentlemen, whether they do not think that the Government have acted recklessly in the matter. I would like the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) to tell me what he is now saying to his neighbour.

Mr. BOURASSA (Labelle). (Translation.) I say that what the hon. gentleman says is dull enough, to be sure.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, it is not given to everybody to be eloquent, and to have read many philosophical works. Some have nothing but their own stock of intelligence to draw upon, while other gentlemen borrow from other sources their wisdom, and are literary thieves. The question is to be able to make out the difference between 2½ per cent interest and 5 per cent, on a capital of $140,000. Can the hon. gentleman from Labelle figure that up? Perhaps he had better consult his hon. friend from Chicoutimi (Mr. Savard) to give more weight to his arguments.

Mr. BOURASSA. (Translation.) That shows you the importance of having an intelligent man on this side of the House.

Mr. SAVARD. (Translation.) If he wants to lend weight to his case, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Marcotte) should apply to his neighbour (Mr. Bergeron).

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) The hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay is a man of importance, as every one knows; as to my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) he is a man of note, an intelligent man; he is the leader—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman is out of order. I have to invite him again to confine himself to the discussion of the schedule of Bill No. 138.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I am sorry to see that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has left the House, the more so, as I had a few questions to ask him.

I say again, that the hon. gentlemen opposite know absolutely nothing about the question under discussion. I appeal to the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Malouin) to tell me whether this bargain is apt to secure the building of the Quebec bridge? He ought to be able to tell me whether it would not be cheaper for the Government to build that bridge and to pass by the north shore, entering into arrangements with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, instead of purchasing the Drummond County Railway. On the other hand, would it not have been a wiser policy for the Government to build the South Shore Railway instead of leasing the Grand Trunk Railway, and paying such exorbitant interest as they are proposing to pay by this scheme? There is not one single gentleman opposite who knows anything about these questions; and I challenge them to answer my question.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I must again tell the hon. gentleman that he is wandering from the question before the Committee.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I think, Mr. Chairman, that I am perfectly within the question. I do not wish to disobey your ruling, but I cannot help saying that the hon. gentlemen opposite have not sufficiently pondered the consequences of this Bill. I appeal again to the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Malouin), whether he has no opinion to express upon such an important question as the construction of the Quebec bridge. It is impossible to go into the merits of this question without dragging in other questions which are closely connected with the subject-matter. I am not travelling outside the four corners of the question when I bring in the matter of the Quebec bridge, as it was propounded by Sir Charles Tupper, the leader of the Opposition, that great statesman whom the country is so proud of. Let me say here, by the way, a word to his address, that great politician has surely—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I must tell the hon. gentleman that he is not equal to his own record in this House in straying in the way he does from the question at issue. As I have previously told him, the debate is simply on the schedule of the Bill under discussion. I think the hon. gentleman is not doing justice to himself, in acting the way he does.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) The fact is, that as we have no information, I have to look for arguments wherever I can find them, and that is why I have to resort to comparisons.

Mr. Chairman says I am not equal to my own record. I have the honour of representing here the electors of Champlain, and I am doing my best to serve their interests. If I resort to comparisons, it is only to elucidate the measure now before the Committee, and I am doing my utmost to throw some light on the subject and to call the attention of the Committee to some important facts.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough) at this moment addressed the House in Gaelic.

He was answered in the same language by Mr. McDougall (Cape Breton).

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) The hon. member for Guysborough knows perfectly well that there are only two official languages in this House, French and English. He knows that I have a right to participate in the debate on this Bill. Because I speak French, I do not see in that fact anything to excite the risibilities of any hon. member. For, such is the meaning of the interruption of the hon. member for Guysborough, and I did not hear the Chairman calling him to order. I await the ruling of the Chairman in connection with the words uttered by the hon. member for Guysborough.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. L. P. Brodeur). (Translation.) I have no opinion to express on the matter.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, as we cannot prevail upon the hon. gentlemen opposite to answer our questions, nor upon the Minister of Railways and Canals to give us any information, I would like to ask the hon. gentlemen whether it would not be a wiser policy to wait another year before adopting this measure. We have engineers who are paid large salaries, and it is a question whether it would not be cheaper for the country to have them figure out exactly the cost of a railway, whether it were built by the Government or leased from the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I want the House to give me information. I ask whether it would not be cheaper to build a railway, with its terminals either at Ste. Cunégonde or at St. Henri. True, that is not very near Montreal, but if a station were built at St. Henri it might acquire a great value later on. Every one knows that when it was built, the Grand Trunk station was not in the centre of Montreal. Why, I ask, when the Government decided to extend the Intercolonial to Montreal, did they not appeal to the engineers who are in the Government service? There are among them able men who are paid by the people to give such information to the Ministers. They could have perhaps propounded schemes calculated to elucidate our position. Those are the problems yet unsolved and which claim the attention of all public men, and of all those who are interested in the future of our country; and as we have not yet been supplied with all the necessary data in this connection, the inference to be drawn from that is that statesmen are scarce in the ranks of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

There is yet another question I wish to approach, and it is that of modern progress and of the advancement which is taking place everywhere throughout the length and breadth of the land. I see with pleasure that the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), who is an intelligent man, understands the drift of my remarks. I say to the Ministers: "You should not commit the country to a contract for a term of 99 years, for the lease of the Grand Trunk from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, because no one knows to what an extent science may progress during that time. We all know that the province of Quebec is bound to play an important part in connection with the application of electricity. The future of that province is bound up with electricity. Now, I ask, is it a sound policy—when one knows the marked difference there is between the cost of steam and that of electricity, and that the latter power is much cheaper than steam—to block the progress of the country by committing the House to a contract for ninety-nine years?

Electricity, which costs almost nothing, could supercede steam which is in use now, and our hands would be tied for ninety-nine years. This is an important consideration which commends itself to all scientists, and to the attention of all those who have at heart the good of the country. It was on good ground, as you see, that I said that the hon. member for Berthier fully realized my meaning. I say to the Government: "It is an unwise policy for you to tie the hands of the country for ninety-nine years, it is a serious mistake—"

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) And an unpardonable one.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Yes, an unpardonable fault, as just remarked by the hon. member for Beauharnois. The least I can say, without wishing to be offensive, is that the proposed scheme is inimical to the future progress of the country.

The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe is amused at my remarks; can he deny that electricity is destined to play a great part in the future? Can he deny that within those ninety-nine years, our whole system of transportation may be revolutionized? We should not, therefore, tie the hands of the country. Instead of paying a 5 per cent interest to the Grand Trunk Company for the lease of their road from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, would it not be cheaper, I ask, for the Government to borrow the money and pay it over, seeing that they can borrow at 2½ per cent on the English market or elsewhere?

Would not 1 per cent on such a considerable capital as $140,000 contribute materially towards the redemption of our public debt? Can the hon. gentleman figure out the product of 1 per cent of the price paid for the lease of the railway from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal? Not one of the hon. gentlemen opposite can answer my question, because there are no data before us. There is nothing in what I say to excite the hilarity of the hon. gentlemen. I challenge them to figure out the product of that 1 per cent on that capital, for 99 years, as a contribution towards the sinking fund.

I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to this matter. Let us take the bargain with the Drummond County Railway people, by which we were to pay $64,000 as a yearly rental. That sum represents a respectable capital; now, supposing the hon. gentleman had gone to England and borrowed money on the English market, he could undoubtedly have got money for 3 per cent, instead of 4 per cent, which he proposes to pay now. Now, 1 per cent would have contributed nearly a half towards the redemption of the whole debt. I shall bring out those figures later on. We can now get money at 2½ per cent. The question now is, Mr. Chairman, what have been the receipts of the Intercolonial from the Grand Trunk Railway, since this trial agreement was made, after the Senate—that Upper Chamber which is respected by all right-thinking men in the country—had thrown out the Drummond deal. Last year, a fabulous sum was placed in the Estimates, with a view to ascertaining how this trial arrangement would work, for the twelve months. Those twelve months have not yet elapsed, and we have no satisfactory result. We are now invited to vote a considerable sum for the purchase of the Drummond Railway. As the trial agreement agreed upon by the House last session is not yet through, it is but fair to ask whether the hon. gentlemen are trying to deceive the House or have failed in their experiment? I am inclined to think that they have failed. They should at least wait till the twelve months' experiment is through. The hon. gentlemen are ready to vote in favour of a new arrangement, without ascertaining, first, whether there is an increase or a decrease in the receipts of the road. In using the word increase, it is likely enough that I am saying a useless thing, but I use it purposely, to show the House that I am free from prejudices and ready to consider both sides of the question.

The country is being deceived by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and I make bold to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that they shall be called to a very strict account at the hands of the people. There may be some gentlemen of good faith among them. I see the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier) in his seat; and let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that I believe in the sincerity of that young man. Last year, he voted in favour of that trial agreement, to see how it would work for twelve months; but, I ask, why does he not wait till the trial period has elapsed? I cannot help telling him that he is inconsistent.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) The Estimates have not yet been voted, and when they are passed, the twelve months will have elapsed.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Let my hon. friend allow me to tell him that his remark is quite illogical. Last year, you voted a certain sum for a trial arrangement of twelve months.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman is out of order. He should address the Chair. He should make a serious discussion, based upon the schedule now before us.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I do not think that I am not seriously debating the question. I am bringing down data and statistics, based on the experience of last year, which defy contradiction from hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, I can fairly be charged with not discussing seriously. A trial agreement was made last year, in order to see how it would work. Now, the hon. gentlemen opposite are ready to vote in favour of this new agreement, without taking the trouble of ascertaining whether the former experiment will result favourably, and I draw the inference that they are acting inconsistently. Will the hon. gentleman who has interrupted me tell me whether, last session, he was sincere or not?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I am always sincere.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) If so, why, then, does he not wait till the twelve months have elapsed, in order to see whether the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal is going to be productive of the anticipated good results? If they are not willing to wait, then I have a right to infer that the hon. gentlemen are not sincere, and that they have no good reasons to urge. After voting in favour of that trial agreement, the hon. member for Two Mountains show a lack of consistency in endorsing another measure, without waiting for the results of the former experiment. Are the hon. gentlemen opposite truly actuated by public spirit? Were they, then, really in earnest and sincere? Their present attitude shows that they did not act inconsiderately last year.

The extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal must necessarily create competition from the Grand Trunk, and should the Government build the South Shore railway, you will have three parallel lines, the Grand Trunk, the South Shore line and the Drummond Country Railway.

During the electoral contest at Nicolet, we had an opportunity of discussing that question of building the South Shore railway. I see on the opposite side of the House the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Mignault), who takes an interest in that railway. Who was it that promised to build that railway? It was the hon. gentleman himself. I call to witness the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) whether they have not pledged themselves to build that railway? Is the House going to sanction a new procedure by which the hon. gentlemen will be allowed to prove false to their promises? If the hon. gentlemen are willing to build the South Shore Railway, as they have pledged themselves to do, let me tell them that it will prove injurious to the Intercolonial. We will then have three lines, three powerful competitors, the Grand Trunk, the South Shore Railway and the Intercolonial.

I attended the Bécancourt meeting at which the Prime Minister declared that he was in favour of the South Shore Railway.

An hon. MEMBER. What year?

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman knows so little about the question that he asks when that promise was made. That railway line is a most important one and runs through a densely populated country. As to the date of that promise, let me refer the hon. gentleman (Mr. Talbot) to the hon. member for Yamaska who made that promise.

Mr. MIGNAULT. (Translation.) You ought to know it, as you attended that meeting.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I was at Bécancourt.

Mr. MIGNAULT. (Translation.) You were not at Yamaska.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I know that that promise was made at Yamaska first. Did not the hon. gentleman pledge himself to have that railway built?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I call the hon. gentleman to order. He should address the Chair. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the South Shore Railway has nothing to do with the Bill under discussion.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) When we are asked to vote $140,000 to the Grand Trunk Railway and $1,600,000 to the Drummond people, I think we are entitled to refer to the competition which will be created by this new road. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. O. S. Talbot) is amused at my remarks, I see, but I am afraid he is in the same boat as his colleagues and has nothing to say on the question. I am sorry the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. S. H. Leduc) is unavoidably absent from the House; because he could tell you that if you buy the Drummond County Railway, you prevent the building of the South Shore Railway. In a large country like ours, where we need so many railways for colonization and other purposes, that it is not desirable to build too parallel railways like the Drummond and the South Shore, about four or five miles distant from each other. I think the Government ought not to buy two railways so near each other. They ought to build the South Shore Railway and drop the Drummond deal altogether, because the latter will lead to a deficit. There is a decrease, they say, of $209,000 in the receipts of the Intercolonial, instead of $150,000 last year; that is a large deficit, and it will go to swell our public debt which is already increasing at too rapid a pace. Before coming into power, the hon. gentlemen had pledged themselves to reduce the public expenditure. But now they laugh when you remind them of their promises, and of the interests of the province of Quebec. They have humbugged the province of Quebec. This is a most serious question and I defy the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted me to contradict any statement of mine. I am happy to see the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) who is one of my friends, in his seat. I may, perhaps, give him some useful information on the matter, if he is not quite conversant with the details of this Bill. The hon. member for Two Mountains laughs. But in order to go to the root of the matter—

Mr. MARCOTTE.

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) Is it a Greek root or a square root?

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Let the hon. gentlemen laugh, if they like. In spite of their ironical cheers and laughter it is none the less true that they have pledged themselves to build the South Shore Railway and that a powerful railway competition will thus be created with the Drummond County Railway.

Mr. SAVARD. (Translation.) I call the hon. gentleman to order. He is altogether straying out of the question. The Bill which is now engaging the attention of the committee is an Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway for the lease of a portion of their road from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal. Therefore, the South Shore Railway has nothing to do with the matter and is altogether foreign to the debate. I want the hon. gentleman to confine himself to the matter under consideration.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) ought to confine his remarks to the question before the Committee.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I have never wandered from the debate. I think when we are discussing the Drummond deal, we are entitled to get information on such an important matter—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) I have to call again the hon. gentleman to order. The Bill which is now engaging the attention of the Committee is not for the purchase of the Drummond County Railway, but for the lease of a portion of the Grand Trunk road between Ste. Rosalie and Montreal. The hon. member cannot contradict my statement, because it was at his own request that I had to read from beginning to end the Bill under discussion when I temporarily presided over the Committee, a little while ago.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I am very much obliged to the hon. member from Chicoutimi and Saguenay, for having read in extenso the Bill, although he has been rather expeditious. He did not dwell long enough upon certain important clauses, and that is why I have to emphasize those points. The question is about the lease of the road for 99 years. Did the hon. gentlemen figure out the profits of that undertaking, and ask themselves whether it would result advantageously to the country? On the other hand, should they fulfil the promises made during the Nicolet election, did they ask themselves whether in building the South Shore Railway, they would not create a ruinous competition with the Intercolonial? In order to show that the deficit will only go on increasing, I have only to refer to the competition which will be created with the Intercolonial, from the South Shore and the Grand Trunk. My conclusions are grounded on all those facts.

It must be borne in mind that we have to speak on a question about which we have not even a scrap of information. I challenge the hon. gentleman to contradict my statement, when I say that it would be cheaper for the Government—if they once ascertained the cost on which they were to pay interest for ninety-nine years—to borrow the money and pay it over, seeing that they can borrow at 3 per cent instead of paying 4 per cent, and they would thus save 1 per cent per year. Could the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier) tell me what would be the product of 1 per cent for ninety-nine years?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I do not feel disposed to educate the hon. gentleman on the matter.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman might derive some benefit from my education. Can he deny that the Government would save 1 per cent per year in borrowing money and paying it over to the Grand Trunk? Now, let the hon. gentlemen laugh if they like, and make merry. I could understand their hilarity if the interests of the country were not at stake.

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) Order.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I am perfectly in order.

An hon. MEMBER. You are altogether straying out of the question.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) If the hon. gentlemen do not know anything about the railway competition which will be created with the Drummond County Railway, no wonder they take so little interest in public affairs.

The Minister of Railways refuses stubbornly to give any information to the House. He wants the hon. gentlemen behind him to vote this year, as they voted last year, blindly, without judgment or reflection. They voted for the building of a railway of 750 miles, granting the company a subsidy of 7,750,000 acres of land, without knowing the value of those gold-bearing lands. While, to-day, you see a company building the same road without any Government subsidy, without a cent of public money.

With precedents like those in view, it is high time we should ponder and pause a little before blindly voting, like the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. ETHIER. (Two Mountains.) (Translation.) The hon. gentleman was never in the Yukon country that I know; how, then, can he say that he knows more about those gold fields than the members on this side of the House.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) The hon. member for Two Mountains will not set the St. Lawrence on fire. Last year, the hon. gentlemen opposite voted in favour of the Yukon deal, without knowing anything about it. The hon. Minister of Railways could not explain his bill.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) Could the hon. gentleman tell me what county the Minister of Railways represents here?

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) The mountain brought forth a mouse, they say, but the one just brought forth by the hon. member for Two Mountains is still smaller. On a question of such moment, he is shifting and using subterfuges. The hon. gentleman and his friends may laugh, if they like, but they cannot contradict my statements. Their incapacity, their impotency are well known. They do not take into consideration the interests of the country at large. They are so short-sighted that we will have to lend them a telescope in order to allow them to see, in round numbers, the immense sum of money saved by the members on this side of the House, with the help of the Senate.

I do not intend to protract the debate at any further length. And why so? Because the Minister of Railways is unable to give to the House any information, so as to allow us to conduct this debate in an intelligent way. We have to consider, first, the interests of the country; we have to bear in mind the results of the vote we are to give on this question. That is the reason why we want full information on the matter.

When the Government decided to purchase the Drummond County Railway, they sent down an engineer—

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is wandering from the question at issue, when he refers to the visit of the engineers. The debate is now on the lease of the Grand Trunk by the Government.

Mr. MORIN. (Translation.) That is the business of the Chairman, to call the hon. gentleman to order, and not the business of any one of these fellows.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I protest against the rude and improper term used by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Morin.)

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Savard). (Translation.) The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Morin) ought to be called to order for applying the term "fellows" to the hon. gentlemen. He should not use such an improper term. The Chairman has already given his ruling on the question of order, and the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Marcotte) has been called to order ten times for the same breach of the regulations of the House. The hon. gentleman should confine himself to the question before the Committee.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) Were we to bow to the ruling just made by the Chairman, the freedom of debate in this House would no longer exist. We are destitute of any valuable information bearing on the question at issue, and when we ask for further information, they try to close our mouths by calling us to order. I see the hon. member—I was going to say for One Mountain, but, to be parliamentary, I should say for Two Mountains, seems to be greatly disturbed over this question. One would think that the hon. gentlemen opposite are feeling the reproach of their conscience in face of the public interests they are sacrificing; their better feelings prevail over their partisanship. One would think that the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Savard) still retains some of his former Conservative ideas, which were good.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman should confine himself to the question at issue; he is altogether out of order. I need not insist any further on the matter, because the hon. gentleman is perfectly well aware of the rules. Let him confine himself to discussing the question before the Committee.

Mr. MARCOTTE. (Translation.) I bow to the ruling of the Chairman; but, on the other hand, when one is interrupted, he has to refer to matters more or less foreign to the question at issue.

Before resuming my seat, let me sum up my statements. The proceedings in vogue here are altogether different from what prevails in England, in France and other civilized countries of the world. In those countries, whenever the Government wants to build railways, they have reports from their engineers with full data bearing on the proposed works. Those governments summon to their aid experienced men, when the interests of the people are at stake. It is quite different with us here; we are destitute of all desirable information, and we are, as it were, shut in within a circle.

Then, as to electricity. I hold that the Government should bear in mind that the future of the country is bound up with it. Before the ninety-nine years have elapsed, electricity will be the motive power in vogue in Quebec, where there are so many natural resources and wealth. It will aid in developing our trade and commerce. The hon. gentleman ought to remember that by committing the country to a contract for a term of ninety-nine years, they are tying our hands, and handicapping at least three generations, and jeopardizing the future of the country. The hon. gentlemen have reached power through false pretenses; they have falsified their promises and deceived the country. And not satisfied with deceiving the present generation, they want to deceive three more generations, with this contract for ninety-nine years. I call your attention to this fact, Mr. Chairman, and I insist upon the Bill being postponed for further consideration till next year. We may, perhaps, thus save any other large sum of the public moneys; and any gentleman who takes that stand, will have deserved well from his constituents and from the country.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The Bill which is now engaging the attention of the committee is an Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway, and to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway. The Minister of Railways and Canals has been unable to explain to us the manner in which the cost of user was apportioned between the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The Act provides that it should be in proportion to the respective mileage of the cars and engines belonging to the Intercolonial Railway, and running over the several sections of the Grand Trunk Railway, and the total traffic of all kind. For some reason and by some person or persons unknown, the Minister of Railways and Canals has been prevented from obtaining that knowledge concerning this Bill which he naturally would be most desirous of possessing, and which he would be only too glad, I am sure, to communicate to the House if he were permitted to do so. But since the hon. Minister does not possess the information, I thought we had made a reasonable proposition when we ask that we might suspend proceedings until he could secure it, but as he has not seen fit to accede to that proposition, of course we are bound to conclude that it was not a reasonable one.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Would my hon. friend pardon me, if I should leave the Chamber?

Mr. BELL. Is the hon. gentleman going for the information? Otherwise I should regret very much his departure. The return brought down by the hon. Minister yesterday shows that not only have the accounts been rendered monthly by the Grand Trunk Railway, but have been audited by the auditor of the Railway Department, and it is fair to assume that the auditor of the department was satisfied that these accounts were correct. It is then very difficult to account for the fact, stated by the Minister of Railways and Canals, that he has never seen these returns, that he does not know of their existence, that no man in his department has seen them, and that, so far as he can learn, they are unknown to the officers of his department either in Ottawa or Moncton. This is indeed a psychological problem worthy of special study and rivaling in complexity even the famous fifteen puzzle which occupied peoples minds some years ago.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The bargain which the Minister of Railways and Canals has made with the Grand Trunk Railway consists of two parts. First, he took a lease of a certain section of the Grand Trunk Railway for 99 years, upon the basis of paying the Grand Trunk Railway $140,000 a year, which is 5 per cent upon half the cost of that portion of the Grand Trunk Railway line. He therefore really purchases the half of that portion of the Grand Trunk Railway line, though he does not own it, since he only gets the lease of it for 99 years. Then the Minister of Railways and Canals made another arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway which was that he was to bear a proper share of the maintenance of the track over which his engines and cars run. Now, that share of maintenance is to be figured out upon a wheelage basis. What this committee wants is to get the relative wheelage of the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway over that line. It has been stated in this committee that the wheelage of the Intercolonial Railway as compared with the Grand Trunk Railway is only one to twenty, whereas the amount which the Minister of Railways and Canals has really paid to the Grand Trunk Railway is half the cost of the whole line. Now, the Minister of Railways and Canals has stubbornly refused to bring down that wheelage: he has refused to bring it down because it would give away his whole case, for he will not be able to convince a single Canadian taxpayer that this is a good bargain.

There is no use in trying to bluff us. We are anxious to get on with the business. Therefore, last night the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), who has just entered the Chamber, arranged that the debate should be closed and that the Bill should pass with very moderate criticism. That moderate criticism was being proceeded with when the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals refused absolutely to give the information to the House. My hon. friend the Liberal whip (Mr. Sutherland) shakes his head. If the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals were now in the Chamber and the right hon. the Prime Minister asked him if he had tried to get that information he would be compelled to say that he had not turned a finger to get it. He never tried to get it, but last night he made the statement that the information had been placed on the Table of the House. Upon that understanding the hon. leader of the Opposition and those more particularly interested in the matter, decided to allow the Bill to go through and not to prolong the debate. I think the right hon. the Prime Minister should step in between the House and the Minister of Railways and Canals and that he should have this information brought before the House instead of keeping the House here. Instead of the charge being true as against the Opposition that they are obstructing in this matter, it is the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals who is obstructing by refusing to give that very reasonable information which any deliberative assembly would require before passing a Bill such as this.

Mr. SPROULE. During this discussion the Opposition, in this House, have been endeavouring to acquire that information which we regard as essential to enable us to do our duty. At the beginning we intimated to the hon. Minister of Railways that it was most desirable that certain data should be furnished to this House. Although the members of the Government might be disposed to take upon trust any statement that might come from the high authority of the hon. Minister of Railways, we who are in Opposition, are not so confiding and so respectful of his judgment. We regard it as a matter of great importance, as intelligent representatives of the people, that we should bring our judgment to bear upon this question after a careful analysis of the data which we should have to enable us to reach a fair conclusion. We have repeatedly intimated that the information was desirable, not only that it was desirable, but that it was not being furnished, and that in the time to come our demands would be made even more imperative, that if the information was not furnished to the House we should not be disposed to go on with the consideration of the measure and allow it to pass. In view of the action of another portion of this Parliament in refusing to accept a similar measure, two years ago, because of the refusal of the hon. gentleman charged with that responsibility to furnish information, and in view of the fact that at some future day the Government intended to submit a further measure for the consideration of the House, one would naturally have expected that these hon. gentlemen would have fortified themselves with that which would be required by Parliament, the data which Parliament should have to enable it to do justice to this measure and to the people they represent. We naturally ask ourselves why it is that the hon. Minister of Railways should refuse to give us this information. Who is the hon. Minister of Railways? Is he a man eligible for the position, possessed of the ordinary qualifications which we would expect to find in a gentleman occupying that position? Is the hon. Minister possessed of the ordinary intelligence of humanity? If I were to bring my anatomical knowledge to bear on his brain and I would judge it to be beyond the ordinary measure—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I do not think this is a subject to be discussed on the Bill in committee.

Mr. SPROULE. I respectfully submit to your consideration the fact that we have not been furnished with information upon this question, and we naturally ask ourselves what is the composition of the man who is responsible. Is he possessed of the intelligence, or the willingness to satisfy our demands. We naturally go further because we are reasoning human beings and inquire into the composition of the man. We have to satisfy ourselves before we pass this Bill. That leads us to say that we admit that he is possessed of natural intelligence. Then, has he had the experience which would teach him that this information is desirable? We know that he has had parliamentary experience, not only as a member of this House, but in another Parliament, and that he has had the opportunity of learning what are the duties which would be expected of a Minister of the Crown. We will naturally admit that he is a man of parliamentary experience, which will exonerate him from any blame in connection with that. Was he aware of the fact that such information would be expected by the House before they would deal with this question? His long parliamentary experience ought to have made him aware of that fact. Why is it not forthcoming? This naturally leads to the inquiry, can the information be got, and we conclude that there is evidence that this information is available. The hon. Minister was not a member of the Joint High Commission, therefore he had plenty of time to perform his duties in his department, and he had employees at his disposal and under his command who could have collated the information which we know is accessible, but he did not take the trouble to collate it, which leads us to the conclusion that there must have been absolute carelessness on his part in the discharge of his duty or a determined refusal to comply with the wants of Parliament. We have satisfied ourselves so far with regard to these questions, and I proceed with the inquiry. First, Parliament needs the information; second, the Minister is possessed of ordinary average intelligence to enable him to understand that. Then, he has had sufficient time since the last Bill was thrown out of the Upper Chamber to get the information and a large staff at his disposal for that purpose. Then, why is the information not here? We have the direct statement of the Minister that he has not got the information and will not get it. What is the cause of this stubbornness on his part? This leads to an inquiry into the composition of the human brain, the organ of the intelligence and the memory. This opens up a very wide and interesting field for inquiry, especially to the medical man. We know that there are anomalies in human nature that cannot be accounted for by any of the known sciences at our command. Is it so in the case of the Minister of Railways? If so, we should be charitable enough to excuse him. Judging of the composition of the brain from the conformation of the head, I should say that it was a natural brain discharging the natural functions of a brain. But we are confronted with the fact that it is not discharging those functions, and we ask ourselves the reason why. This leads us to consider the composition of the human brain. It is composed largely of albumen, which may be present either in deficiency or excess. In this case I should say there is a superabundance. Then, we may inquire what is the physiological action of the human brain. This cannot be accounted for by any of the known laws. The human brain is not only the seat of intelligence and memory, but the seat of the enervation of the human body. If there is a want of nerve power, there will be a comparative paralysis. Sometimes the paralysis shows itself suddenly, sometimes gradually. In this case the paresis, while coming on gradually, reached its culminating point last evening at about 11.30 o'clock, and all the efforts of the medical profession could not drive it back.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). That does not speak very well for the profession.

Mr. SPROULE. The profession has not reached the limit of its power. We might naturally suppose that the Minister of Railways had reached a time when the action of the memory would be weakened; but we find that his memory is tolerably good on all other subjects. Then, it is an axiom that when we cannot account for an action on rational principles, we are bound to follow out the inquiry. Some distinguished men say that the action of the human brain is subject to planetary influences. Zadkiel said that the position of the planetary bodies had some peculiar influence over human nature, and often accounted not only for the good nature but the crassness or obstinacy of human nature, both in individuals and in nations. May it not be possible, therefore, that the conduct of the Minister of Railways is brought down by some influence over which he has no control? If that is the case, we are obliged to excuse him. If I should judge by his conduct in this debate, I should say that he was labouring under the influence of some great planet. I have been thinking during the last twenty-four hours whether it would not be in the interest of this country to call in the celebrated astronomer, Dr. Wiggins, to give his opinion whether or not that is the case. We might also call to our aid the services of the biologist and of the microscope in this inquiry. Then, it is said that there is a strange resemblance between the lower and the higher orders of living beings.

Darwin says that every man hath his counterpart in the monkey or in some other of the lower animals. As good Presbyterians we believe in the law of foreordination and it may have been foreordained from the foundation of the world that the Minister of Railways would be possessed of the brain of some lower order of being, and therefore would not be responsible for his actions. It is said that there are two things in life which, once they take hold, will never let go. The question being once put to Sir John Macdonald, he said they were a Scotch Tory and an English bulldog. This led me to examine into the Minister's genealogical tree, but I could not get much information there. I have been told that he once had the peculiarities of a Tory; if so, he has them no longer. There is one lower animal which I think may be said to be his counterpart. That is the badger, which runs to its hole, and will do nothing but snap and show bad temper. His conduct here leads very largely to that conclusion. Now, after following out this inquiry, I am as much in the dark as when I began, but I intend to continue it until I satisfy myself of the cause of the anomaly which we have in the conduct of the Minister of Railways.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The questions that have arisen in this committee are interesting and important. I understand that the sections that have been under consideration are sections 3 and 33. As I understand it, the Minister of Trade and Commerce practically takes the position, at one time adopted by governments in England, that when the Government assumes responsibility for a proposition, it is not the function of the House of Commons to inquire too narrowly into the details, but to leave these with the Government—that it is for the House to consider questions of policy. While this view at one time prevailed in England, the development of parliamentary government in the mother country has gone on until this view no longer obtains, and on every proposition that involves the expenditure of a large sum of money the British Governments of the present day are only too anxious, especially in the common stage, to give all the information at their command. In this connection nothing could be more valuable or instructive than to consider what the best authorities have to say upon the right and duty of the House to have before it such details as may be necessary to arrive at a judicious conclusion as to the soundness or otherwise of the proposition submitted by the Government. We must not forget that the Minister of Railways and Canals himself, as will be found at page 4264 of "Hansard" of 1897, declared that he did not pretend to have experience in railway matters, and was not versed in the details of railway management. This was on the 16th June, 1897. It is evident that his experience has not increased his knowledge since the time when he made that candid confession. May points out that Parliament has no direct control over any single department of the State, but that it may order the production of papers and may express its opinion, but it has no power to give instructions privately to any officer of the Executive Government, that its power in this respect is exercised through the responsible advisers of the Crown. In this case, we cannot send the order direct to Mr. Schreiber, the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, or to Mr. Pottinger, the Superintendent of the Government railway system, but we can request the hon. Minister who is in control of these officers, and who is the servant of Parliament during the session of Parliament, to obtain that information, and in the light of the authorities, he has no more right to refuse Parliament or this committee such information as we consider necessary and as it may be possible to obtain, than his own officers have the right to refuse him. There is one exception to that general proposition, but one not applicable to the management of the Government railways, and that is the case of information, the production of which would be prejudicial in the public interest. Todd in one passage tells us that the House of Commons has become the dominating power in the legislature. I call attention to that as illustrating the change brought about in legislation in England. Where once the Crown was the dominant power, and the opinions of the people's representatives counted for very little, we now rejoice under a system of government under which the Chamber made up of representatives of the people is the dominant power in legislation. He tells us also that since the Reform Bill of 1867 the House of Commons has shown a disposition to encroach more and more upon the sphere of Government, and now claims to have a view on every subject, and cites the increase in the number of questions asked of the hon. Minister as an instance of this tendency. I defy the Government and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to point to a single instance where the Government in England in recent years has refused the fullest information at their command in the consideration of any measure involving the expenditure of a large sum of public money. Todd says: "It is imperative that Parliament shall be duly informed of everything that can be necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the Government." This is the system that has developed in England, and that we enjoyed here until we came face to face, as we find ourselves now with a Government that cares little if anything for precedents in England, and relies simply on the power of a silent but willing majority. We find this Government, time after time, resorting to the illegal use of Orders in Council to do as it pleases, whether Parliament is sitting or not, relying not upon argument or upon the merits of the case, but simply on the strength of numbers. To understand how extraordinary it is that this information is not willingly given by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, it is worth while to consider his attitude in 1897, before such a flood of light had been thrown upon this transaction. On the 20th of May, 1897, he declared he had no wish to conceal anything from the House, but a desire to put the matter in a form which it should be properly presented. This was before he saw how vulnerable he was, how easily his businesslike methods could be exposed, how difficult it was to justify the policy to which he had committed himself and the Government. He is not now willing that we should have the means to consider this measure fairly, but stubbornly refuses to place upon the Table information which is at his command and which he could get by telegraphing to the proper officers. On the same day, the 16th June, 1897, he asked us to take time to consider the question in all its bearings, and said that as they were considered the Government propositions would "justify themselves." But now, when we seek to now look behind the bald proposition, that the hon. Minister lays before us, we find a stubborn refusal, contrary to all precedents to the spirit that ordinarily actuates a Minister who has the sound proposition to make and one that will command the confidence of the country, to give us the information necessary to an intelligent consideration of the question. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, speaking on the 16th of June, 1897, said :

I am willing, as a member of this Government, to take upon myself, if it were necessary, the entire responsibility of having initiated this policy, of having it pressed upon the consideration of my colleagues. There is nothing in it, I tell these hon. gentlemen, upon which they can found a suspicion of jobbery, there is nothing in it that will not stand the test of critical examination by the business men of the country.

It is clear that this magnificent proposition that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals is boasting about was capable of being improved. I think the right hon. Prime Minister will admit that we have not before us a proposition which is an improvement on the proposition of which the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals was so proud.

The PRIME MINISTER. Better pass it, then.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Adopt it blindly because we have found out that the hon. Minister of Railways did not know what he was talking about on June 16th, 1897, when he said that this was such a magnificent proposition. The right hon. Prime Minister has practically admitted that the action of the Senate has given the country a better proposition, no matter how bad it may be. The hon.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Pictou).

Minister of Railways and Canals dare not give the information that he has at his command. He dare not carry out our instructions to the officers paid by this country to give us such information as they are able to give. The reason is obvious and this action reflects no credit on the Government. After the hon. gentleman spoke in 1897 in connection with that suspicion of jobbery he found that that suspicion had not cleared away. He changed his base, hoisted the white flag, showed cowardice in the extreme, and has not allowed this matter to be probed any further than he could avoid. The conduct of the Government in committee has been disgraceful and the action of the Opposition, if required to be vindicated, has been vindicated. In June, 1897, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals asked: Where are the figures on which you can hang a suspicion of jobbery? We answer: Gives us the figures. The Minister is afraid to do it. He knows that they would be injurious to the Government in a political sense and injurious to their character. On June 24, 1897, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), in explaining the vote in the Estimates for the purpose of running the Drummond County Railway and the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal, said that it was desirable that an experiment should be tried for a few months with the object of seeing what would be the result of extending the Intercolonial to Montreal. We are asking, when they say that they are warranted in making the temporary arrangement permanent, that the facts, figures and details that have come to their knowledge and to the knowledge of their officers, as a result of the temporary arrangement, should be furnished to us. We can hardly imagine upon what ground this Government could refuse that information. At another period in the history of this case the position of the hon. Minister of Railways was entirely contrary to what it is now. I find that on April 30, 1897, he promised to present the whole matter to Parliament in connection with this principle for which I have been contending. He said :

Some of the important details of the negotiations are not finally agreed upon. We are making all possible speed in bringing matters to a head, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that there will be no unnecessary delay in presenting the whole matter to Parliament.

Now is the time when it is most important that we should have the whole matter before us. We have a proposition, as I have said, involving an enormous amount of money. In order to come to an intelligent conclusion, as business men, whether it be a good policy or a bad policy, in which we could justify ourselves in whatever course we took with the business men of the country, it is necessary to have this information. The Government refuses to put us in possession of the information without which no business man in this country would venture to enter into a business arrangement. The position is an extraordinary one, and it has become the duty of the Opposition to protest in such a manner as will receive the attention outside as well as inside of this House. In doing this, they feel that they are fairly performing the important trust that devolves upon them.

Mr. DAVIN. Looking at this agreement, I think that under ordinary circumstances our contention would commend itself to the judgment of the country. Before this matter came before the House for the first time, the Government in making an agreement like this, practically occupied the position of an agent, and this House, as the principal, wants an explanation as to the cost in a very important particular. We want to know how the burden will fall upon us by and by. If this were before us for the first time this would be a reasonable request. But the position we are now in is not an ordinary one. It is an extraordinary one, because we know that when this proposition came before us in its original shape the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals betrayed the same characteristics that have distinguished the treatment of this matter this session, in fact, the characteristics that have distinguished that hon. gentlemen pretty well in regard to everything that he has been responsible for. The hon. Minister has never brought forward a proposition in regard to which he did not wish to keep back some information, which, in a great many cases, he has been forced ultimately to give. What possible information have the members of this committee as to the proportionate user of this line. It seems to me that if the hon. Minister had made a bargain that he thought would reflect honour on the Government he would be forward to place in the hands of the committee all the information that they require. The information asked for has reference to the details of a great agreement without which the Opposition cannot intelligently vote upon the measure. It does seem to me that the Minister of Railways is sacrificing the reputation of the Government by the obstinacy which he is displaying. I am astonished that members behind the Minister do not come forward and insist on his giving the House this information. How are we to understand their silence in view of their history in Opposition for eighteen years, during which they insisted on the Conservative Government laying before Parliament every detail, large and small, relating to every Government contract? Never could an Opposition spend its strength with more faithfulness to its duty than on an occasion of this sort, when a Government is trying to hector Parliament to carry through a contract without laying before them the information to which they are entitled. Suppose it went forth that the Government succeeded in tiring out the Opposition in this contest, it would be one of those victories which are worse than defeats. It is possible that the information might entirely alter the attitude of the Opposition. It is possible that it might lead to another alteration of the contract that would put half a million dollars into the pockets of the people. It must be remembered that this information is such as cannot always be kept from the people, and when it becomes known, whether it justifies the contract or not, its publication will be a condemnation of the Government and a supreme justification of the course of the Opposition. Now that the Minister of Railways is here, I sincerely hope that, after having slept over his determination, he will decide to afford the House the information which is necessary to enable us to give an intelligent vote on this matter.

Mr. JOHN B. MILLS (Annapolis). I have listened with patience to this debate, and the more I have heard the more I have been impressed with the reasonableness of the stand taken by the Opposition as contra-distinguished from that taken by the Minister of Railways and Canals. The contract, section 3, which we are now discussing, has been in force for months, and it must be that the officers of the department have gathered the information that is necessary to its administration. Why, then, is not that information brought before this House? Since I entered this House in 1887, in every case there has been a demand for such facts to be placed before the House as would enable the House to come to a reasonable decision upon the question now before it, and those facts have invariably been given.

But, perhaps, we are treating this matter too seriously. Perhaps the hon. Minister is attempting to hoodwink Parliament or to bulldoze Parliament in reference to this matter. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) considered the action of the Minister from one point of view. I do not know whether he was serious or not, but there was good deal of common sense in what he said notwithstanding that he was called to order by the chairman. His point was that, perhaps, there was something strange in the make-up of the Minister that led to his conduct and caused him to be recreant to his duty to bring down these papers. The Minister has come in after refreshing himself with sleep. I thought, perhaps, he had gone out to get the information that is required by this Parliament, but it seems I was mistaken. Since the hon. gentleman came back to his seat, I have been considering him phrenologically, I have been taking a glance at his cranium to see if, considered in the light of phrenological science, I could learn from it the reason for his extraordinary procedure. For I hold the hon. Minister to blame in this matter. No one can blame the Opposition, they are simply doing their duty; and if they neglect that duty, they would be held responsible by the people whom they represent. I have sent to the library and procured a work upon phrenology, which, I think, may help us to explain this block to the work of this Parliament. I find that the depth of the head as shown above the ears indicates high ambition as regards affluence, social position or political power—perhaps, all three combined. I see that this development is very large in the cranium of the hon. Minister. I see also that the organs of selfishness and greed are large, indicating that a hand is continually and systematically held out somewhere for a good deal of something "for the boy." The organ of spiritualism and veneration is fairly large, but is overpowered by this selfishness and greed and this inordinate ambition to which I have referred. This indicates that the Minister of Railways and Canals, like the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), thinks that elections are not won by prayers alone, that something else is needed to win stepping stones to affluence and power. Another organ that was very prominent in the hon. Minister is secretiveness. I think, probably, this is the main cause of the block in the proceedings of this Parliament, causing the long sessions we have had since yesterday—and, judging from what I see in the hon. gentleman's cranium, likely to cause it to last until Saturday night. I see by this authority on phrenology that "secretiveness is situated in the centre of the lateral portion of the brain just above destructiveness and below cautiousness." It should be understood that there is no such thing as a bad organ in anybody's head. Secretiveness properly used is necessary and good, for people should be as wise as serpents, though as harmless as doves. In some cases this organ of secretiveness is inordinately developed. Secretiveness, in excess, manifests itself externally, or by a natural language, in a variety of ways. When you see an individual taking a side glance and working his head round à la Grimaldi, as we have frequently seen the Minister look at his followers behind him, you may be sure the possessor has very large secretiveness. Where secretiveness predominates over all the other powers, the individual's sole delight is in plotting. Pope, we are here told, took so great a delight in artifices that he endeavoured to secure all his purposes by indirect means. Lady Bolingbroke said, in the French phrase, that he played the politician even about cabbages and turnips. Here the Minister is playing the politician, not about cabbages and turnips, but about the Grand Trunk and Drummond County Railway arrangements. As was said by Lord Vargrave, who was a personification of secretiveness in excess, so it can be said of the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair). He loves intrigue, for intrigue sake. He loves to surround himself with the "most complicated webs," to sit in the centre of a "million of plots." He cares not how wild some of them are. He relies on his own ingenuity, promptitude and habitual good fortune to make everything he handles conducive to the purpose of the machine, self. Secretiveness disposes to be secret in thought, word and deed. It makes the fox careful not to be observed, the dog to hide its bones it cannot pick, the cunning man to conceal his intentions and sometimes to profess opinions opposite to those he really entertains, and the Minister of Railways to keep back and conceal data necessary to enable the House and country to intelligently grasp this railway scheme.

An hon. MEMBER. Why?

Mr. MILLS. Let the hon. gentleman go down to "Coontown" and he will learn "why." He is more interested in leg shows than he is in the business of the country. That is the reason "why." I am afraid he has not been asleep since he was there last night; I am afraid his mind is still wandering on the sights he saw there, and he is asking himself, "Why?" The matter which is before the committee is one which was of interest to every well-wisher of this country. It is not only important on account of the financial consideration involved, but on account of the precedent to be established. Shall it be established as a precedent, that a Minister of Railways, or a Government, can bring before this House a large undertaking without giving the necessary data whereby those called upon to vote are enabled to make up their minds intelligently? If they are mere voting machines and are bound to support the Government in any event, no information is required, but we, who are voting against the Government, contend there is not reason why we should not have this data. If we allow this matter to go through without the necessary data, we will be establishing a precedent for all time to come, and Governments will refer to this as a precedent whereby they can put through any deal and conceal their facts.

Mr. GILLIES. As a member of this House, I deeply regret the course which is being pursued by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals in regard to this transaction that we are now deliberating upon. In criticising this proposition, it is necessary that we should investigate and analyse the two propositions put before Parliament. The proposition which the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals presented, with a considerable flourish of trumpets, last year, under which the Intercolonial was to be extended from Lévis to Montreal, involved a payment of $64,000 a year for ninety-nine years, which amount, capitalized, would represent $2,100,000. That proposition was abandoned by the hon. Minister of Railways, and he submits this year a proposition to acquire the property for $1,600,000 cash, and the saving to the people of the difference of $500,000 between these two amounts is an ample and abundant justification of the patriotic action taken by the Senate last year. An amendment has been made in the proposition now before the committee, by which, instead of paying 5 per cent upon one-half of the cost of improvements made by the Grand Trunk on their line between Ste. Rosalie and Bonaventure station, we are to pay upon our proportionate user, based upon wheelage. In order to consider this contract intelligently, we must have the proportion of user brought down to the House. The third section of the agreement, as clearly as it can be written, defines what share of the cost of the maintenance of the railway and terminals between Ste. Rosalie and Bonaventure station shall be borne by the Intercolonial and by the Grand Trunk respectively. Then, the thirty-third section definitely specifies at what periods of time returns shall be sent to the Department of Railways, which is at the end of every month. It provides that the books and accounts of each of the two parties to this contract shall be open, each one to the other, and that returns shall be furnished by the parties to this contract. This contract has been in operation for some time past between the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Has that section of the contract been observed by the Minister? Has he seen that our proportion of the user of this property was regularly filed every month, as ordered by that section? If he has not, then, I say, there has been remissness on the part of the Department of Railways which is nothing less than culpable. If the department has lived up to the terms of this section, the information is in the possession of the Minister, and should be laid on the Table of the House. The hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), on the 26th of May, drew the attention of the hon. Minister to the necessity of having this information brought down. That was on the 26th of May, and here, on the 8th of June, the information then promised has not been brought down. It is no wonder that members on this side of the House have become alarmed at the awful indifference exhibited towards the interests of this country by the Government in this matter. The conduct of the Minister, in withholding from this House information to which it is entitled, is an insult to the people of this country, degrading to Parliament, and a disgrace to the Government.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Chairman, I have been stating to hon. gentlemen opposite that I would make the necessary inquiries, and would obtain, if possible, from the Grand Trunk Railway Company a statement of the particular facts which they desired. I have received by wire this morning from the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and it has been typewritten and placed in my hands, a statement for the last six months for which the information is obtainable, and I am now prepared to furnish it to the committee for its information. Before I do so, however, I wish to avail myself of the present opportunity of saying to my hon. friend from the city and county of Halifax (Mr. Borden), that I would be very loath indeed to treat any request which he might make to me with the slightest disrespect. I entertain too good a feeling for the hon. gentleman, and too high an opinion of him, to treat him in any way that would savour in the slightest degree of discourtesy. If he infers from anything which has occurred that such was my purpose or intention, I can assure him that it was not, and I know him well enough to know that he will accept my statement to that effect without hesitation or qualification. The hon. gentleman might perhaps have been justified in thinking that I had been remiss, from the fact that he had called my particular attention to the particular information which he desired, and that it had not been furnished. But the hon. gentleman knows very well that any Minister, and particularly one who has charge of the Department of Railways, is at times completely overwhelmed with the calls which are made upon him. I may be wanting in some of the necessary qualities which a Minister of this department should possess, because I admit it is not possible for me always to carry in my mind an accurate and specific recollection of all the matters which hon. gentlemen from both sides of the House from time to time call my attention to. At the time the hon. gentleman made his request, he did not make it in writing or in the form of a question of which he had given notice, but rose in his place and stated what he desired just as the House was adjourning; and, although I took a memorandum of his request at the time, and forwarded that memorandum to the Deputy Minister, it passed out of my mind, except that there had been a request for information. I called on the responsible officer in my department to know if he had the statement prepared for Mr. Borden, for the hon. member's name was on the memorandum. It was handed to me, and I brought it to the House, and until the hon. gentleman called my attention to it yesterday by his reference to "Hansard," I did not carry in my mind that what he desired was the particular class of information which he asked me to furnish. I say this much to explain why it was that the papers which he received, and which I assured him yesterday contained the information he asked for, did not appear to contain that information. Now, there is nothing in this information, as hon. members will see when I lay it on the Table of the House, that anybody would hesitate to furnish, or that could have any prejudicial effect on the question before the committee ; but, on the contrary, there is everything in the statement which would tend to strengthen and support the proposal which we have submitted. There are gentlemen who thought they could judge what the percentage would be. One hon. gentleman, who is now in my eye, did not hesitate to inform the committee last evening that when this information was obtained it would be found to be of such a damaging character—showing the percentage not greater than 3 per cent or 4 per cent, or perhaps even less—that the committee would then see the reason why the Minister of Railways had refused to furnish the information. You will soon be in possession of this information, and then you will observe how completely it will upset the conclusions which the hon. gentleman drew from the imaginary facts he presented. This is the first moment of time in which the statement I am about to present has been in my hands or in the department, so that I could not have furnished it before, and it has been obtained upon telegraphic communication with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The statement, which bears the signature of the Deputy Minister, is stated to have been received from the Grand Trunk Railway Company on the 8th of June. It is headed "Montreal Joint Section—Combined Engine and Car Mileage," and it is for the last six months—November, December, January, February, March and April. I need not go over all these figures. There is a column showing what the Grand Trunk totals were, another showing what the Intercolonial totals were, another showing what the two together were, and an additional column showing the Intercolonial Railway percentage. I will read the Intercolonial Railway percentage of combined engine and car mileage for the six months I have mentioned, for the different sections :

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY PERCENTAGES.

	St. Lambert and Point St. Charles.	St. Hyacinthe and St. Lambert	Ste. Rosalie and St. Hyacinthe.	Chaudiere Joint Section.
November.....	12.82	20.90	22.13	68.39
December.....	10.46	16.20	17.13	70.93
January..	9.42	14.88	15.69	69.65
February.	10.65	17.19	18.39	68.62
March.....	11.62	18.45	19.49	68.64
April ..	16.81	29.73	30.70	70.81

Now, if you will combine these percentages over the whole of the divisions, you will find that the combined car mileage of the Intercolonial Railway system upon these sections, instead of being 3, 4 or 5 per cent, averages over 25 per cent, the average being, I think, some points over 25 per cent. I have a statement, which I obtained since yesterday evening, showing the actual cash amount. This statement is under the heading, The line from St. Lambert to Ste. Rosalie, which, as hon. members will recollect, is the only portion of the railway over which we have acquired the title to half the property :

Mr. BLAIR.

Line from St. Lambert to Ste. Rosalie, 1st March, 1898, to 1st March, 1899.
Maintenance and repairs.....	$56,133 32
Intercolonial Railway proportion....	13,143 26
Intercolonial Railway percentage of the whole—23.41-100.
Operating stations (including salaries)	$16,961 39
Intercolonial Railway proportion.....	5,413 16
Intercolonial Railway percentage of the whole—31.91-100.

This does not include anything west of St. Lambert, viz., bridge or terminals. That does not cover all the charges which are paid and adjusted in account between the two railways. There remain the station expenses, &c., including the salaries along this joint section.

St. Lambert to Ste. Rosalie.
Intercolonial Railway proportion—
Total for twelve months of maintenance and repairs and station expenses	$18,556 42
Total including Grand Trunk and Intercolonial Railway proportion—
Total for twelve months of maintenance and repairs and station expenses	$73,094 71

These are the statements, Mr. Chairman, which I offer to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I suppose it would be hardly regular to lay them on the Table, as we are in committee. I can hand them to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), which will be the same thing.

There has been a disposition on the part of some gentlemen in committee to say, that the Intercolonial Railway ought to have on record all these particulars, ought to receive, month by month, these various details, and that the Minister of Railways and Canals was remiss, in that he had not made it a point to follow the action of his subordinate officers at Moncton and see that they procured this information from the Grand Trunk, to be preserved of record in the Moncton office. I am not going to controvert that view, at least that portion which involves the statement that it would have been possible for the officers of the Intercolonial Railway at Moncton to procure this information from time to time and have it on record. I can see, after what has occurred, that it would have been a great convenience, if that had been done. But I am not willing to accept any blame because I have not followed this up and seen that it was done. The possibility of any question arising in Parliament, requiring that this detailed information should be forthcoming, did not occur to me. I do not think it occurred to any officer of the Intercolonial Railway. The course pursued, I may be permitted to repeat, was to send the auditors of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, on receipt of these monthly statements, and have them go over the books of the Grand Trunk, and verify, by such examination as they felt necessary, the correctness of the accounts rendered. That the auditors did not carry away and preserve the statements is, as I understand, the gravamen of the complaint that is made. But you can well understand, Mr. Chairman, that these officers might naturally feel that, their business being to audit the accounts, it was not necessary for them to make abstracts from the Grand Trunk Railway books, having verified the correctness of the figures by a personal investigation. On their certificate that the account was correct, the amount was paid. These accounts did not come under my eye, did not require my sanction; they have been going through the same channel year after year, as they will go through for years to come, as part of the regular procedure in the department. The details of our railway system are too multifarious to pass under the eye of any Minister. The hon. leader of the Opposition, if he thinks it worth while to make any reference to the subject, will be fair enough to me. I am sure, to say, that it is unreasonable for any hon. member to think that a Minister could give his personal attention to all these multitudinous details.

Mr. HAGGART. I cannot but say the Minister is to blame for this position. In my remarks asking for papers to be brought before the House, I asked for these percentages. The hon. Minister said he thought he had brought them down. I saw him afterwards, and told him that the percentages were not among the papers, and he said he was aware of it, and would telegraph to Moncton and get the information at once.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. But the information was not in hand.

Mr. HAGGART. I cannot understand that. The amounts are paid upon a mileage basis. If the officers had not the figures, they could at once telegraph to the Grand Trunk and get them. For the discussion of this question, it was most important that we should know the percentages, for it was on that basis we were paying. The hon. Minister says, that the Opposition were calculating it at 3 or 4 per cent. The hon. Minister himself gave us what he said to be as close an estimate as he could give, naming 5 per cent; and all our arguments have been based on that verbal statement of the Minister, that the user by the Intercolonial Railway was 5 per cent of the whole.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very glad that this question has assumed a shape at last that enables us to hope to bring this long debate to a conclusion. I left the House last night, but, before going conferred with the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), who, in my absence, was leading this side of the House; and I understood from him that he expected that by twelve o'clock, at latest, this measure would be passed through committee. I was greatly surprised this morning to find that, owing to an unfortunate misunderstanding—which I do not intend to go into, as it arose in my absence—the debate had been so much prolonged. With the information that the hon. Minister has now laid on the Table, the difficulty seems to be entirely removed. I am quite sure that every person will admit that the Opposition were only exercising their just rights, when they required that this information should be brought down. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has frankly admitted, in the explanation he has offered to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden)—which, I am sure, will be accepted—that his inability to comply with his first engagement arose from the fact that the officials at Moncton had not the reports in their possession. When this clause of the agreement came up, it was absolutely necessary for its intelligent consideration that that information should be had, and I am glad that the hon. Minister has, through communications with the Grand Trunk, been able to furnish that information. I hope that we shall now make more rapid progress with the public business. I do not see any reason to suppose that we shall not be able to run through the remaining clauses without occupying a great deal of time.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Of course, I accept, in the most unqualified manner, what the hon. Minister said, and feel that he has expressed himself in a very courteous way with regard to myself. There was no feeling on my part that any disrespect was intended. I recognize that the hon. Minister is a very hard-working member of the Cabinet, probably none more engaged than he. I can readily understand that a memorandum taken down, as this was, during a sitting of the House, might be in such a shape that what was desired might not be fully understood at the time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. As a matter of fact, I found that the memorandum could not be furnished me; they could not find it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I hope the hon. Minister will accept my assurance—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax)—that I was acting in all sincerity. I am sure that the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and others believed that we could get home at a very early hour last night.

Mr. POWELL. I may say, that I see nothing here about the terminals in Montreal.

Has the hon. Minister any explanation concerning that ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not received that, but it may be forthcoming. They brought the statements over as they got them. The terminals are differently circumstanced from the other items, because we pay a fixed rental for them.

Mr. POWELL. The Minister, I think, said that the average, as shown by these figures, was about 39 per cent.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said, that about 27 per cent would be the average over all.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. Minister must see that he is mistaken. The majority of the percentages are on the section between Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, though the Chaudière section runs up to 66 per cent ; but that is a very small proportion of the whole.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. But the general statement shows a total of about $73,000 expended by the Grand Trunk, of which $18,000 or $19,000 was paid by the Intercolonial Railway.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think we might as well take recess now, considering the arrangement I have just made with my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper). The committee might rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again ; and, this afternoon, we could give an hour to these resolutions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, Mr. Chairman,—

The PRIME MINISTER. Of course, if that is not understood—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My judgment, from what I could learn from my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) who was leading this House in my absence, is, that an hour would dispose of the rest of the Bill. I do not myself see any reason why this should not be sufficient for the discussion of the whole question, when we meet again.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask, whether the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals is going to furnish information called for by clause 33.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not have that in mind at this moment. I understood, from hon. gentlemen opposite, that, even if I got one or two months, that it would help. I asked the Grand Trunk to send the last six months, and I thought that would furnish a fair average for the year.

Mr. WALLACE. I am speaking, not of the number of months, but of the character of the information.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know of any other information that I have been asked for.

Mr. POWELL.

Mr. WALLACE. I refer the hon. gentleman to section 33 :

That Her Majesty and the company shall each furnish to the other promptly, each and every month, all the information necessary to the ascertaining and checking of the rates, fares, charges, shares of costs and other returns to be made as under these presents.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understood, if my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) would allow me, that the hon. Minister has given all the information on this subject that he is able, at the present moment, to lay before the House, and I think it is sufficient to meet this particular case. If there is any further information required, I would suggest that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals would furnish it before the third reading of the Bill, so that any question arising in regard to the information necessary may be at hand.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If there is anything I am asked to do which I can do, I will be glad to do it by the third reading. I suppose we will report the resolutions now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As I understood the suggestion made by the Prime Minister, it is, that, practically, the Chairman should leave the Chair until three o'clock, and that then we should resume and dispose of the whole subject.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would have been disposed to propose that the committee should rise, and that, when we meet again, we should give an hour to this matter. But I was met, at the very moment when I proposed that, by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) asking for more information. Unless the Opposition are able to agree as to what they want, we shall have to go on.

Mr. WALLACE. According to the right hon. First Minister it is a crime to ask for any more information. We must not open our mouths. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals gives us more information which is fragmentary and not full, and then the right hon. First Minister says that if you do not accept that you will not get any more.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not understand it in that way at all. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has stated this is all the information he is able to furnish, and he says that, anything further it is possible to give, he will give. I think the proposition made by the right hon. Prime Minister is one that both sides of the House is willing to accept.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then, it is understood that we will give an hour more to this resolution, after which the committee will rise and pass it.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. With the general understanding of the committee, I will leave the Chair until three o'clock.

The PRIME MINISTER. Resuming at three o'clock and giving an hour to these resolutions.

At Three o'clock the committee resumed.

Schedule agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall I report the Bill?

Mr. HAGGART. Before the third reading of the Bill, the hon. Minister will bring down the further information we asked for, namely the percentages at the terminals at Montreal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understood the hon. Minister to say that if there was any further information that was available, if members would suggest it previous to the third reading, it would be submitted.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes. This morning at half-past eight, I sent a telegram to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, of which the following is a copy:—

Chas. M. Hays, General Manager G.T.R., Montreal.

Will you kindly have sent me by wire as speedily as possible statement showing us for last six months detail of Intercolonial Railway engine and car mileage, and that of the Grand Trunk, per month. We have had an all-night session of Parliament, and are still sitting in committee on Grand Trunk contract. Opposition demanding information in respect to Montreal under third clause of contract, which I am unable to furnish unless I receive the same from you.

In answer to that, they sent me the information I have already given to the House. I dare say that at the present moment the terminal percentages may be here also. They are not on the same footing as the other percentages, as for these terminals we are paying the company a fixed rental. If the statement is not at hand, I will ask for it and will have it here.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Just one moment, in which I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to a matter which was mentioned last evening, but which was not dealt with very fully; that is, whether or not the connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway is really included in the demise of this lease. The clause in the agreement proceeds in this way:

Now this indenture witnesseth that the expression "Montreal joint section," wherever used in this indenture shall mean the company's line and connections at Ste. Rosalie, and the whole line and branches and appurtenances hereby demised from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert and the Victoria bridge, together with the terminals at Bonaventure station in the city of Montreal and at Point St. Charles, St. Henri and between Point St. Charles and the Bonaventure station, and also with the Canadian Pacific Railway via Jacques Cartier Junction.

It may be that the true construction of this will include the connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, but it does not say so. The last word to which grammatically you can refer the word "with" is the word "terminals"; you have not the word "connection" there. The hon. gentleman will further observe that although these two joint sections are defined as having a certain meaning, yet when he comes to the demising part of the lease, the expressions "Montreal joint section" and "Chaudière joint section" are not used, but a particular description of what is demised is attempted in these words:

An undivided one-half share interest, right and title or interest in the company's line of railway—

And so forth. Then, further down it says:

—and the use of the Victoria bridge across the River St. Lawrence as it at present exists or as it may at any time during the subsistence of this lease be improved, reconstructed, enlarged or extended, and over the company's line and lines of railway over the said Victoria bridge and into the Bonaventure station into the city of Montreal and the other terminal points, junctions and connections of the company hereinbefore more particularly described.

I have no doubt the hon. gentleman will say that refers you to the beginning of the paragraph; but when thrown back to that, you have not the word "connection" used with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway via Jacques Cartier Junction. It may be that the point I am making is too critical; but it was pointed out by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), and if there is any doubt about it the hon. gentleman might make it clear by a short supplementary agreement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think there is no ground for apprehension on the score pointed out by the hon. gentleman. You will observe that the clause goes on to describe what is meant by the Montreal joint section. What does that mean? It includes all the terminals of the Grand Trunk Railway at Montreal and one of the terminals in the junction with the Canadian Pacific Railway at Jacques Cartier Junction. It does not appear to me to admit of any doubt; but with a view of making the matter abundantly plain, we go on to say by a later clause:

The above joint sections are all shown on the plan annexed hereto, the portion of the Montreal section from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert station being shown in red, and from St. Lambert station to Bonaventure station, and intermediate connections, and Jacques Cartier Junction, being shown in green, the Chaudière section being shown in red.

If you will look at those plans, you will see that the company's lines in the terminals, extending to the Canadian Pacific Railway at Jacques Cartier Junction, are coloured green, as described in this portion of the agreement.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is quite possible that the plan, which we have not had an opportunity of seeing, may make it perfectly plain.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And even without the plan. The plan is particularly valuable, because it shows us all the tracks laid down which we have the right to use. Every track which is put in that plan passes under that contract. It may be that the general words "all the terminals at Montreal," if Jacques Cartier Junction had not been mentioned, might have been claimed hereafter by the Grand Trunk Railway Company not to include that particular portion of the terminals, but it being mentioned, you can only give effect to the reference by recognizing that the Jacques Cartier Junction and the tracks connecting therewith come within the terms of the conveyance.

Mr. HAGGART. The Minister would have made himself more clear if he had mentioned it in the demise of the two joint sections, because in a dozen places afterwards in this agreement the joint sections are mentioned as the Montreal and the Chaudière joint sections. It refers to the two joint sections, and the percentage we have to pay upon them. But there is no mention in the demise of this joint section, and the only possible connection that can be made between the demise of the two joint sections is the company's line, hereinbefore described, and the terminals and connections hereinbefore mentioned. Whether that would cover the two joint sections, I do not know, my opinion is that it does not. I was particular in asking the Minister whether, in his opinion, and in the opinion of the Department of Justice, these words covered the two joint sections, and covered the junction with the Canadian Pacific Railway via the Jacques Cartier section, and he thought they did. There has been a plan furnished to the department; is a copy annexed to the indenture?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The copy of the plan which was signed by all the parties when the contracts were executed, was carefully looked over. I cannot say that I have looked over the present copy myself, nor can I say that I have had any officer of the department look over it. The Grand Trunk officers sent it in as an exact copy of the plan which is attached to the original contract, and I believe it to be an exact copy.

Mr. HAGGART. Would the Minister be kind enough to get an officer of his department to look over the plan and see if the plan laid upon the Table of the House is a copy of the plan which is attached to the indenture?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, if the hon. gentleman desires.
Mr. BLAIR.

sires it. I think the hon. gentleman has not had in his mind, in examining the different clauses of the contract, the fact that we are only taking a conveyance from the Grand Trunk Railway Company of the Chaudière joint section and of that portion of the Montreal joint section from Ste. Rosalie to St. Lambert; we are getting a half interest in those sections. The language which the hon. gentleman finds somewhat ambiguous is language which is employed to express a different interest, a right to the user, and not a conveyance of one-half the property, as in the case with the portions of the line which I have mentioned.

Mr. McDOUGALL. With a view to the consideration of some arguments that were imported into the discussion which took place on the subject of this Bill some days ago, I asked the following question from the Minister of Railways and Canals:

What was the regular tariff collected per car-load on flour carried between Chaudière and St. John, Halifax, Pictou and Sydney, over the Intercolonial Railway, in June, 1896? What was the tariff between the same point in June, 1897, and 1898? What was the tariff between Montreal and the same point in June, 1898?

The Minister of Railways and Canals answered:

I have to ask the hon. gentleman to move for a return in this case, as the answer will be voluminous.

Now, I did not move for the papers, because I felt satisfied that I could not get the information. The information sought by me could have been put in two or three lines. I asked what was the rate charged per car-load on flour from Chaudière, in the first place, to St. John. The Minister could have answered that by saying $50 or $60, or whatever it was; and the same way in respect to Halifax, Pictou and Sydney. I simply asked for the car rate according to the Intercolonial Railway tariff on that particular date, and also for the car rate the succeeding year. I am satisfied the Minister can get that information in a few hours at least; if he has not got it at hand, he could get it by telegraphing to Moncton. I want to know whether the Minister will favour the House with an answer to these questions before the Bill comes up for its third reading. My object is to range these facts to bear upon the consideration of the argument presented by the Minister as to the advantage gained to the Intercolonial Railway system by the extension of the road to Montreal. I want to compare the charges made by the Intercolonial Railway in carrying flour from Chaudière to the eastern points, with the rate made at present over the same distance, and from Montreal. The Minister has only to get his officer to refer to the tariff in operation at those dates to give him the figures.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would ask the hon. gentleman to take my statement as accurate, that the information is not capable of being furnished in such a small compass as he imagines. I will undertake to secure it for the hon. gentleman if he will simply move for a return. It is unreasonable to ask Ministers to stand up in answer to questions and read column after column of figures when a motion for a return would only involve a few days' delay.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would suggest that the hon. member for Cape Breton should give the hon. Minister a memorandum in writing of what he wants.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If he will give me a memorandum of what he wants, I will hand the information to him in writing.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. Minister has not explained the effect of the traffic arrangement which is a sequence of the resolutions. It does not appear in resolutions at all.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is a reference in the schedule to this arrangement.

Mr. FOSTER. But the arrangement itself is not in here.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is a reference in the schedule, section 40, which is as follows:—

In consideration of the rents and covenants herein reserved and contained, Her Majesty represented by the general traffic manager of the Intercolonial Railway of the one part, and the company by its general traffic manager of the other part, have entered into a mutual traffic arrangement in writing of even date herewith, which traffic arrangement is hereby declared, covenanted and agreed to be and form a part of and be supplemental to this contract, and shall be read herewith and shall be binding upon all parties hereto during the continuance of this leasing contract, except so far as the same may be altered with the mutual consent of Her Majesty and the company. When and if the traffic arrangement shall be so altered from time to time, such amended supplemental contract shall be substituted for the supplemental traffic contract of this date.

The difference between the supplemental arrangement and this one is that there is withdrawn from the former contract all reference to matters which are purely of a traffic character. Except a clause of the contract which relates to traffic for ocean points. I furnished the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart). If he will remember, with a copy of the traffic arrangement.

Mr. HAGGART. The traffic arrangement was furnished to the committee which investigated this matter.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It was furnished to the House. Does the hon. gentleman not remember having had it in his hand?

Mr. HAGGART. The traffic arrangement which was attached to the indenture was furnished to the Committee of Inquiry, and if the hon. Minister remembers he was examined upon it. I have not seen a word of it in the resolutions, and as it is a sequence of the resolutions the hon. gentleman should have explained it as part of the indenture.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) does not controvert the statement that I gave him the papers, and that one of the papers which he had in his hands was a copy of the traffic arrangement. I think there must be some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who remember as to that.

Mr. HAGGART. I have no doubt about it. I think the papers were handed to the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), who immediately handed them back.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, that was the original contract. I refer to the supplemental traffic arrangement which accompanied the papers laid on the Table. The original contract was not laid on the Table; I handed it to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper). I am asking the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) if he does not remember having received this other paper and having examined it?

Mr. HAGGART. No, I never saw it. However, I may tell the hon. gentleman that I saw it, and read it, and know all about it, because it was furnished to the committee that inquired into this matter of the Drummond County Railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am calling the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that it was not only furnished to the committee that was appointed to investigate into this matter, but that it was furnished to this House at the time the papers were laid on the Table. It does not come properly as an attached paper to the schedule and does not require to be passed upon in the same manner by Parliament. Of course its confirmation in effect follows with the confirmation of the contract agreed upon.

Mr. POWELL. Why does the hon. gentleman not put it in the schedule here? If it were incorporated with an Act of Parliament we would have the whole thing together. It is true the contract says that this would be subject to change, but it is a statutory recognition of the power to change it. Would it not be better to add the supplementary agreement to the schedule?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not seen the necessity or advantage of that. The hon. gentleman has anticipated what I was going to say. It is an agreement which is liable to be changed from time to time according to circumstances as they may arise. Therefore, it does not seem necessary that it should be incorporated in the legislation. It might have a misleading effect, because a person who would see it in the statutes might think that it was a final arrangement, whereas in six months we might change it. This contract reads in the following terms:—

This supplemental and traffic agreement, made this first day of February, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight:

Between Her Majesty, represented herein by the general traffic manager of the Intercolonial Railway, of the one part, and the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, represented herein by the general traffic manager of the said company, of the second part:

Whereas an agreement has been entered into between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada and Her Majesty Queen Victoria, of even date herewith, for the leasing of the said company's line between Ste. Rosalie and the city of Montreal;

And whereas, for the better interpretation of certain clauses in the said leasing agreement, the parties hereto, represented as aforesaid, have agreed to enter into this supplemental and traffic agreement, which shall be taken to be incorporated in and read as part of the said leasing agreement.

Witnesseth that the said parties contract and agree each with the other as follows:—

Notwithstanding anything contained in any agreement between Her Majesty and the company heretofore made and now existing, it is agreed between Her Majesty and the company that during the continuance of the contract to which this is a supplement, percentage divisions via Chaudière Junction shall be suspended, and that with respect to all traffic originating throughout the company's system, or connections west of Montreal, and offered for shipment to any point on the Intercolonial Railway, or reached by its connections, Montreal shall be the junction point, and the company undertakes to route all traffic destined to points on the Intercolonial Railway and its connections, via Montreal and the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend explain the points of difference between that agreement and the one that existed before.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The meaning of that clause is that Montreal becomes the junction point instead of Lévis or Chaudière. The old contract between the Grand Trunk and the Intercolonial not only contained provisions in respect to the acquiring of that railway, but it contained a provision having reference to traffic matters and making Lévis the junction point. That means that this is really the point of connection between the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk Railway. And this is the point at which the Grand Trunk receives from the Intercolonial and delivers to the Intercolonial the exchange traffic which is to take place between them.

Mr. FOSTER. That is plain, but I do not think the hon. gentleman quite understood what I wanted to know. I want to know in the first place, what is the betterment of the present traffic arrangement, which he read, as compared with that of 1879, but more especially what is the betterment as compared with the hon. gentleman's agreement with the Grand Trunk presented in 1897?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is only one point: I do not know whether what I have already said would be regarded as a betterment. Here is one feature of it which I think is a distinct improvement on the other arrangement, and it is that the Grand Trunk Railway Company are bound to route over the Intercolonial Railway and deliver at Montreal all freight taken from the west and destined for points on the Intercolonial Railway. Under the agreement, I admit that this business will come to us notwithstanding the fact that we may not solicit it. It comes to us without any special effort upon our part. It is only fair to say that while we are receiving that advantage, and in that respect this present traffic contract is an improvement upon the one which was included within the contract first entered into between the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway in 1897, there is, on the other hand, as a compensation, as it were, or a quid pro quo for the advantages we receive, a corresponding advantage which the Grand Trunk Railway receive in that we are obliged to deliver to the Grand Trunk Railway all unrouted freight, all freight, rather, that is under control, originating on the Intercolonial Railway. We have the two corresponding conditions. They give us all freight coming from the west at Montreal. We give all freight that we have control over, and that has not been routed by the shipper by any other route, to the Grand Trunk at Montreal. There is that difference, if that will be called a betterment.

Mr. POWELL. There is no question about that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I appreciate it as such, and I think the Grand Trunk Railway recognized, when they were making this concession, that they were conceding a point to us.

Mr. FOSTER. I see by the agreement of 1897, that according to the 40th section, all that the Grand Trunk Railway bound itself to do was that in case of any freight from points west of Montreal, the shipper's wishes were to rule as regards through routing to Montreal, but I think it gave the company absolute option of making a transfer, in all cases of freight originating on their system, at Lévis instead of at Montreal. The present arrangement seems to make it obligatory to make the transfer at Montreal of all through freight originating west of that city. The shipper, I suppose, still holds the right to say that the goods shall be interchanged at Lévis instead of Montreal if he chooses, but of course that will be a small amount.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In a sense, probably that might be sustained, although we know that in the practical operation of the railway such cases are not likely to arise.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, but the absolute right rests with the shipper always.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Possibly so, but it is entirely immaterial to the shipper whether the shipment comes to the Intercolonial Railway at Lévis or at Montreal, and I do not think that any question can be at all likely to arise, as between the shipper and the Grand Trunk Railway, in respect to that freight. The Grand Trunk Railway could say: We will take your goods and deliver them to the Intercolonial Railway, and provide for their delivery to the Intercolonial Railway at Montreal; or they might say: We cannot arrange in any other way because we have contracted with the Intercolonial Railway to deliver them at Montreal, all freight which may be destined for points on the Intercolonial Railway east of Montreal. While not prepared to discuss the academic question as to what might possibly be the legal effect, if a controversy were to arise between the shipper and the Grand Trunk Railway, I do not think it will become a practical question.

Mr. POWELL. Look at the first section. Apart from the academic question as to whether or not the Grand Trunk Railway might not be forced to take freight having been routed that way, yet for the purposes of this agreement the junction point is Montreal, so that in the division of rates the Government road get from Montreal down, no matter who hauls the freight.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is quite right. In adjusting the proportion of freight over the whole line, from the point of receipt to the point of destination, we would get such proportion as is calculated upon the basis of Montreal delivery.

Mr. HAGGART. There is a through freight arrangement for which an allowance of some 40 miles odd was given to Halifax.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (reading):

In connection with the import and export traffic via Halifax and St. John, or any other port in the maritime provinces that may be selected, it is understood that during the life of this agreement, the Intercolonial Railway will accept 425 miles on Halifax, and 375 on St. John. The St. John rates are to be the same as those quoted by the Canadian Pacific Railway to and from that port or west of St. John, and the same as then quoted by the Grand Trunk Railway to and from Portland. The Halifax rate to be one cent per 100 pounds on all classes and special class over the rate to and from St. John or Portland, on both exports and imports, the company to have as its proportion the mileage as per the various routes west of Montreal.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the mileage to Halifax?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Eight hundred and forty-eight.

Mr. FOSTER. What would be the purposes of shortening the real mileage to about one-half?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The object is this. Hon. members know that full ocean freights at ports to the east or the north of Boston, New York and Portland, are controlled by the prevailing rate at these points. From any point in western Canada, I take it that the rate to New York is identical with the rate to Boston and the rate to Portland. The three rates are the same, and New York must necessarily govern. No railway company which drains a producing country in Canada could get a higher rate for carrying goods—I am speaking now of the general rule—for carrying tonnage to Boston than a railway company would carry the same tonnage to New York for, so that there are always the freight rates which control the rates of ocean shipments from Canada. With that knowledge, it can be seen very clearly that neither the Canadian Pacific Railway at St. John nor the Intercolonial Railway at Halifax could get a higher rate of freight than the shipper can secure the carriage of his tonnage for to one of the United States ports. That I put forward as a general rule. It was deemed desirable to arrange with the Grand Trunk Railway for freight which was destined for Atlantic ports for shipment to European ports not served by the existing lines of freight steamships between Portland and European ports. No railway company in the position of the Intercolonial Railway could expect that the Grand Trunk Railway Company would give any portion of the tonnage which originated on its own line to another road as long as it had its own line upon which to carry such tonnage. It has the port of Portland, and it has certain lines established between Portland and certain European ports. It has a line established with Liverpool, it has a line established with Bristol, but there are other ports which we have subsidized lines of steamships running to St. John and Halifax, and to which ports the Grand Trunk Railway has no line steamship running from Portland, viz., Belfast, Manchester and Dublin. Now, any freight on the Grand Trunk Railway line intended for either Manchester, or Belfast, or Dublin, we could reasonably arrange for, if we desired to do so, from the Grand Trunk Railway Company. We could say to them: Under this contract we desire you to deliver to us at Montreal such tonnage as your shippers wish consigned to either of the ports to which you have no line of sea-going steamships.

Mr. POWELL. Under what section can you claim that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Under the clause I have just read in connection with the import and export traffic via Halifax and St. John. What the hon. gentleman refers to is that portion of the traffic arrangement which fixes the mileage proportion between us and the company. You must necessarily, if you are to have a traffic agreement at all for the class of ocean business to which I have referred, some understanding with your connecting railway as to the percentage of rates which they will allow you. We call a specific mileage an arbitrary. They say to us: We will divide with you our whole rate from the point where the business is received by us to your point of shipment, upon the basis of an allowance of 425 miles from Montreal to Halifax, and 375 by St. John.

Mr. Haggart. You say that the arbitrary that is allowed by the Grand Trunk Railway, if the goods are sent via Halifax, is 425 miles; if it is originated the other way is there an arbitrary allowed to the Intercolonial Railway as against the Grand Trunk Railway?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The arrangement is that, taking the whole mileage over which the goods will be carried from Halifax, if that be the point, to the western point of delivery, that portion of mileage which is to be allowed to the Intercolonial Railway as between Halifax and Montreal will be only 425 miles. It works undoubtedly both ways. We could not get paying ocean business unless we did have such understanding, could not make any arrangements for carrying freight coming from the ocean to points west unless we had an agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway or some other company to carry it for us when it reached the end of our line. They have agreed here: We will allow you your proportion of freight from Halifax to the western destination on the basis of 425 miles for your portion of the distance.

Mr. Powell. Taking the freight, which is the basis of the freight charge from Montreal to Portland, as being reasonable, bearing in mind the fact that through freight rates are very low, does he not think that the Intercolonial Railway, in only getting one-half that amount is losing money on every tonnage of through freight that it carries under that agreement?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman will not be justified in assuming that the Intercolonial Railway is going to haul very much freight, even under this clause, unless it can find its profit in that haulage for the whole line, upon being paid on a basis of 425 miles, and it will not do business unless it does.

Mr. Ives. I understand the arbitrary is allowed the Grand Trunk Railway on business that it originates intended for the ocean and which is carried over the 425 miles. The Intercolonial Railway allows an arbitrary on the difference between 425 miles and the actual number of miles. That is the advantage given by the Intercolonial Railway to the Grand Trunk Railway for the Grand Trunk Railway origination of business. Now, the Minister of Railways and Canals says it works both ways, but I think it works both ways against the Intercolonial Railway in respect of freight brought by ocean steamships to Halifax and taken over the Intercolonial and delivered to the Grand Trunk Railway at Montreal for the west. Then what I want to know is: Where does the arbitrary of the Intercolonial Railway come in? Does the Intercolonial Railway get its full mileage on that traffic, or does it have to haul for the 425 miles maximum? If so, it does not work both ways, but the arbitrary is in favour of the Grand Trunk Railway, whether the freight originates on the Grand Trunk Railway or on the Intercolonial Railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The contract includes both import and export traffic, and the hon. member must be aware that the rate of land carriage upon these shipments, and the whole arrangement, in fact, is practically settled with the shipper abroad. We have no agents in Europe to look up business for us, it would scarcely be worth while to incur that expense. But when business does offer which we are willing to take, we know what we are to receive under this arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway—we are under no compulsion as regards import business—but if we take export business we can fix what the rate shall be, and such rate is proportioned upon the basis of the mileage which the Grand Trunk Railway hauls, allowing 425 miles for our portion of the haul. This is not, however, by any means a leading feature in our contract, or in the supplemental contract, but something of the kind has always been included in any traffic arrangement in times past between the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. Ives. Is your general manager, without consulting the Grand Trunk Railway, at liberty to make through rates as to export or import freight which comes to Halifax?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think so, any more than the Grand Trunk is allowed to make a rate without consulting us.

Mr. Powell. Do you not consider that on this ocean freight, on the terms of this division, the Intercolonial Railway would be hauling at a loss?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think so. If rates were high, it is quite probable we would be able to get a sufficient proportion on this basis to pay us a little margin, although, perhaps, it would not be very much.

Mr. POWELL. Does not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) think that the present traffic arrangement between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway, by which the Intercolonial Railway had an arbitrary mileage of 303 miles for 274 real miles between Halifax and St. John, would be a great deal more in the interest of Canada than the arrangement he is now making, which involves a loss on every ton of freight we take over. We haul on this 425 miles for nothing. Suppose the charge on through freight is five-tenths of a cent per ton per mile—which would be a fair rate on a road like ours—we have to haul this through ocean freight for half that, and it involves a loss.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not agree to that proposition.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Wainwright swears to it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot help that; you are asking my opinion.

Mr. POWELL. I may compliment the Minister on the scheme he has adopted of having these large engines, but nevertheless you cannot haul freight on a road like the Intercolonial Railway below three-tenths of a cent per ton per mile without a loss. If instead of hauling your freight to Montreal at a loss, you gave it to the Canadian Pacific Railway on the interchange of traffic at St. John, on the basis of the existing traffic agreement by which they give you 303 miles on an actual mileage of 274, the Minister will see we not only have the Canadian Pacific Railway rate, but we have, in addition, the advantage afforded by this arbitrary mileage. Thus, on a thousand tons of freight coming to Halifax, the Intercolonial Railway would be in a large amount, by shipping it via the Canadian Pacific Railway, and interchanging traffic at St. John; whereas if you ship it to Halifax, its destination being west of Montreal, there would be an actual loss. This boasted arrangement which the Minister has made, and his decrying of the arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, is a direct reversal of the actual conditions of trade as they are. I have in my possession the proportionate division of rates on two car-loads over the Intercolonial Railway, since this traffic agreement was entered into, and exclusive of this extra provision made in case of trade going to Halifax. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the Intercolonial Railway was only allowed two-tenths of a cent per ton per mile.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Where did that freight come from?

Mr. POWELL. One car from Hamilton, and another from St. Catharines, and it was an actual loss.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not agree with you that it would necessarily be an actual loss.

Mr. POWELL. On canal or prairie level roads, with these immense trains, they could haul at a rate of two-tenths of a cent per ton per mile or less, but as the hon. gentleman ought to know, you cannot do that on a road like the Intercolonial Railway. I submit that this arrangement is a great detriment instead of a benefit to the country, and the rescision of the agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway would be a great detriment to the country, when you compare it with the adoption of this agreement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is embarking upon a subject which is largely technical, and about which he has much to learn. It is a subject which only men of experience understand in all its bearings. I will indicate the weakness of the position of the hon. gentleman in one particular. He says that the arrangement which we are seeking to annul between the Canadian Pacific Railway and ourselves, under which the Canadian Pacific Railway allows us a fixed mileage of 303 as compared with the actual mileage of 274, is a more beneficial arrangement with the Intercolonial Railway than is the present clause. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway brings no business to Halifax that it can possibly divert to St. John.

Mr. POWELL. That applies to the Grand Trunk Railway. They will not bring any to Halifax if they can take it to Portland.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Do not interrupt my argument, if you please. That has nothing to do with the question. I point out that the ocean-borne tonnage which the Canadian Pacific Railway either takes to or brings from the west, reaches its own line by St. John in 999 tons out of every one thousand tons carried. It is vital to the Canadian Pacific Railway that it should drop the western freight at St. John, and it will not carry any freight beyond St. John than it can possibly avoid. Its agents on the other side make arrangements with the shippers, and these shipments are about all brought by the line of steamers to St. John. What the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) has said with regard to the additional mileage allowed by the Canadian Pacific Railway when it carries tonnage between St. John and Halifax has no application. As to ocean-borne freight, the additional mileage allowance does not apply. It applies to local inland tonnage chiefly, and in its application it deprives the Intercolonial Railway of earnings which rightfully belong to it.

Mr. POWELL. I will give the hon. gentleman Mr. Wainwright's testimony on that point :

Q. As a railway expert, what on ordinary freight is the charge per ton per mile that would pay expenses?—A. That is a very difficult thing to answer, as it depends a good deal upon the description of freight, the quantity you can carry and the distance of haul. In carrying coal, for instance, we do not calculate at a rate per ton per mile; we calculate what we can carry a train-load at. It is carried in train-loads, and we afford to carry it very much cheaper per ton per mile than in the case of other classes of freight.

Q. Take hauls of 400, 500, or 1,000 miles, for instance, what would you regard as a satisfactory charge?—A. We look upon half a cent to five-eighths of a cent per ton mile as satisfactory.

Q. That is a satisfactory rate?—A. It is a covering rate, if carried for some distance in train-loads.

Q. And there is a fair profit in that?

Mr. Haggart.—It is according to the distance altogether?

The Witness.—Yes, entirely.

By Mr. Powell :

Q. I am asking about long distance train-loads. As a supplementary question, let me ask you what proportion would be profit and what proportion expense?—A. That goes into the question entirely of working.

Q. Well, ordinarily, there must be some recognized figure on long hauls?—A. The working of the railway may be expensive or it may be economical.

Q. I understand all that. Take a fairly economically managed road, take the Intercolonial, for instance, what do you think would be the cost per ton per mile over that for long hauls, under favourable conditions?—A. I could not tell you as to the Intercolonial. On our own road at half a cent per ton per mile, under most favourable conditions, we should not make more than one-tenth of a cent per ton per mile.

Q. Railway experts have informed me that, on these long hauls, the cost ordinarily would be three-tenths of a cent per ton per mile. I should like to ask you if that would be a fair estimate of the cost of the transportation of freight?

Mr. Morrison objected to the question on the ground that it was going beyond the scope of the investigation.

Question allowed.

A. It would depend upon the construction of the railway and the grades. One road can be worked very much cheaper than another.

Q. I recognize all those things; but would that be a fair rate on a perfectly level road without any drawbacks at all?—A. That is about the mark, everything being favourable.

Now, you are hauling it for half of the rate which Mr. Wainwright says would be satisfactory.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You do not know.

Mr. POWELL. Well, I do know, because I have the division of rates and the proportional allowance on two cars. I may say that this clause will mean a loss to the revenue of the country, and if the Minister cannot get a better arrangement, it would be far better for him not to dabble in ocean freight at all, but let it go by way of St. John.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose we are originating traffic 1,000 miles west of Montreal, on the Grand Trunk Railway system, and supposing that is going through as an export from the city of Halifax, who fixes the rate on that export freight which is originated at that point a thousand miles west of Montreal? Is it done by one road or is it done after consultation?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It has to be done by agreement between the Grand Trunk Railway traffic officers and our officers.

Mr. FOSTER. After it goes a thousand miles to Montreal and 800 miles to Halifax, and gets on the ocean, when you come to divide the rate, does the Grand Trunk Railway get its proportion for a thousand miles?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And the Intercolonial Railway, which carries it 840 miles, gets its proportion on the arbitrary 425?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. That is largely an advantage which is given to the Grand Trunk Railway, because it originates the traffic. Now, when we originate freight, say, in London, if it comes to Halifax—I hope the Minister will arrange for that business as well as for the business of the west—and we carry it eight hundred odd miles, and we give it to the Grand Trunk Railway, to take it one thousand miles west of Montreal, to the point of distribution, are we paid the rate that is agreed on, on the 800 miles, or on the arbitrary 425 miles?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If we agreed with the Grand Trunk Railway to carry that freight from Halifax and deliver it to them at Montreal for western destination, the rate being fixed to our satisfaction, I think under this clause the proportionate tons would be for the 425 miles.

Mr. FOSTER. When it reached Montreal and was transferred to the Grand Trunk and then carried a thousand miles west, they would get their proportion on that thousand miles, that is there is no arbitrary in favour of the Intercolonial Railway even when we originate the traffic. I am glad to understand that. Now, one other point: Will my hon. friend explain why he is so very anxious to take everything away from the city of St. John—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman will not make any point there.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope I have not misunderstood the hon. Minister's proposal. But before he answers that, I want to ask how this arrangement under the supplementary traffic arrangement varies between St. John and Halifax. This is a local question, but one of some importance. In this, has the hon. gentleman not given Halifax the advantage over St. John in the matter of the arbitrary?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How it will work out I can better answer, and my officers can better answer, after the experiment is tried—

Mr. FOSTER. So my hon. friend first makes an arrangement—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to finish what I was going to say. My own view would be that the difference between the two mileages allowed here is not prejudicial either to St. John or to Halifax. We agreed upon a difference in mileage, which, I think, experience justified the officers in recommending, seeing that Halifax is some 100 miles further from the west than St. John and the difference allowed to them being 50 miles. Both are practically on the same footing.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I figured it out and found that 425 bore the same proportion to the actual distance to Halifax as 375 bore to the actual distance to St. John.

Mr. FOSTER. But the city of St. John has a much longer sea voyage, has it not?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Considering that my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) and some others have been assailing the Minister of Railways and Canals for doing some great injustice by his general policy to the city of Halifax, it is refreshing to have the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) intimating that by his present policy the hon. Minister is taking trade away from St. John to Halifax. It balances the argument in a very convenient way, and I thank the hon. gentleman for it.

Mr. FOSTER. You are welcome.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I assure the hon. gentleman it will be found of great value in answering some of the statements made on the other side of the House. I would like to say a few words in answer to what was stated by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). I understood his argument on the probable loss on the traffic to be based on figures given by Mr. Wainwright to the committee. He argued that half a cent per ton or five-eighths of a cent per ton was the lowest rate at which the traffic could be carried. When asked directly about the Intercolonial Railway, Mr. Wainwright did not answer.

Mr. POWELL. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to correct him. Mr. Wainwright said that would be a fair average rate for the traffic, but if the actual cost was considered, he would make a reduction to about three-tenths of a cent per ton.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Powell) will, perhaps, allow me to remind him of something about this traffic. Mr. Wainwright could not answer about the Intercolonial Railway, but my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) assumed that the statement regarding the Grand Trunk might apply to the Intercolonial Railway, because they are roads of a similar character. Therefore, it is fair to assume that if the traffic is carried at rates very materially below that given by Mr. Wainwright it would be carried at a loss. For many years the Intercolonial Railway has been carrying a large portion of its traffic at three-tenths of a cent per ton.

Mr. POWELL. Coal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. A very large portion of its traffic—not export traffic, and it is the universal practice of railways to make better rates for export traffic than for local traffic or for through traffic that is not for export. If twenty years ago we could carry coal at three-tenths of a cent a ton without loss—and that was the claim made by hon. gentlemen opposite—they always said that while they were carrying it at a close margin—

Mr. POWELL. What was your claim about it?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I said it was not too low for a long haul. But I did claim in one case that it was too low for a short haul. If we are right in assuming that three-tenths of a cent per ton which was the rate for many years on coal traffic, while not very profitable, was a paying rate, a rate which guarded against loss, surely with the facilities and improvements since then in the form of larger cars, more powerful engines, better tracks and other things that have cheapened transportation, it would not be an extreme stretch to say that you could carry it for two-tenths of a cent per ton to-day. So I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) has established that there is any loss on the traffic. This, perhaps, is a fair matter for debate. It is a question where somebody must be given the benefit of the doubt. The Minister of Railways and Canals has given the benefit of the doubt to the maritime province ports of St. John and Halifax. He is not absolutely sure that he can do this traffic at a profit, but he is willing to try. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) says that this is bad business, that the Minister is going to make the trial first and see if he can make money by it. I think that the idea that this is a concession to the Grand Trunk is a mistake. Whatever concession is made regarding ocean traffic is made to the ports of St. John and Halifax and not to the Grand Trunk Railway. The whole country is interested in having the traffic carried through the lower provinces, and if there is a doubt in the matter surely it is wise to give the benefit of the doubt on that side. We are spending vast sums of money in opening up and providing facilities for transportation from the west, by the construction of railways, the deepening of our canals and otherwise, measures which are practically approved of on both sides of the House. It is recognized that this transportation problem cannot be viewed from a narrow standpoint, but you must take a broad view of it, you must have with regard to it what may be properly called a National Policy, to carry the traffic of Canada to Montreal and Quebec in summer, and to Halifax, St. John and any other ports that may be opened up in the winter. Therefore, what the Minister is doing, where the absolute cost of transportation is open to doubt not to give the benefit of it to the Grand Trunk—because the Grand Trunk does not want to take away traffic from Portland—but to the maritime ports of St. John and Halifax. And in the carrying out of this policy, I think hon. members should give their support and commendation.

Mr. POWELL. I wonder if the hon. Minister (Mr. Fielding) has the slightest confidence in his own argument.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. I almost doubt it. The hon. gentleman is too good a logician for that. The point I made was not as to helping or hindering the ports of St. John or Halifax with regard to the trade of Canada. I say it would be better to build them up, but I say you will better build them up by the existing arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Under that arrangement, the country would be making something; there would be no likelihood of the deficit of the Intercolonial Railway being increased by haulage for nothing. If the trade came to Halifax, would it not be in the interest of the country to have it transferred at the port of St. John or at the union station of St. John rather than take it to Montreal by the Intercolonial Railway at a loss?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If I may deal with the Halifax end of the question, I think the Minister of Railways and Canals has answered that by showing that the trade is not taken to Halifax by the Canadian Pacific Railway. They have every interest to take the traffic from St. John and not to take it over the Intercolonial Railway at all, and that is what is happening and will continue. Whatever may be thought of the hon. gentleman's argument elsewhere, I feel confident that he will not get the support of the hon. member for Halifax or of any man who is interested in Halifax.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) must know that under this arrangement you cannot hope for one ton of traffic that originates on the Grand Trunk system.

Mr. FIELDING.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not correct, because they have engaged to give us any freight which may be intended for ports in Europe with which they have no steamship lines connecting.

Mr. POWELL. I do not think so; I think you had better look that up. So far as Halifax is concerned, it may expect to get freight, oceanic freight, that is routed by way of Halifax, but what possible interest would prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway from hauling freight from Montreal to St. John. The only case in which Halifax might expect to benefit would be in the case of freight originating on the Grand Trunk Railway and routed by way of Halifax for foreign ports. In respect to that freight the Intercolonial would be carrying it at a loss, and it would be better for the country if the Intercolonial had made this arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway, of course, would carry all the freight for shipment to St. John, and the Grand Trunk, for the same good reason, would carry it to Portland.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in assuming that all the expectations of the city of Halifax in reference to this matter are from freight coming from Europe. The commercial bodies and others at Halifax hope and expect that traffic will come from the west and be shipped from Halifax. Time alone will show whether this expectation is correct, but it is the expectation of the business people of Halifax. It would not be wise to assume that there is no expectation of Halifax securing a share of the traffic of the west.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not wish to be understood as accepting the statement of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) as to what will be the lowest rate at which we can carry freight over the Intercolonial for shipment to Halifax or St. John. There are too many varying conditions enter into the question to enable the hon. gentleman to make any calculation which would be accepted as applicable even in a general way.

Mr. POWELL. Would not the climatic conditions affect the question? In winter they would be most unfavourable.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The climatic conditions do not enter into it to any great extent.

Mr. POWELL. Yes, if there is a snow-storm the cost is increased.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No doubt winter storms do make the operation of the Intercolonial more expensive than some of the western roads. But the Intercolonial can add to its general tonnage without materially increasing the cost.

over that of carrying the same tonnage on other lines. You have to have your staff and equipment so as to keep the road clear in the winter, but when once clear you can add to your tonnage and thereby reduce the percentage cost for the whole quantity carried. There are few railway men who will tell you what the cost of carrying freight over their lines is. They are not going to give you the lowest limit. I do not know that I would care to do it even if I were in possession of any information which would enable me to do so. There are a lot of considerations that we must not forget in figuring upon the question of cost. We would require a very much larger rate to carry coal from Sydney or Pictou to Montreal if we had to take back our cars empty, than if we could get return cargoes. We made arrangements, during the last winter, under which we were able to get loads for all the empties which were brought to Montreal, and we brought many thousands of tons of coal last winter to Montreal. The fact that we are able to get return loads materially reduced the cost. This is a consideration which must be taken into account before coming to any conclusion as to the cost. Then, if you take an ordinary railway company which has to pay interest on its bonds, and which is expected to pay dividends upon its stock, you are dealing with a different problem than when you have a Government railway which has not to pay interest on the capital with which it has been constructed.

Mr. POWELL. What is the return freight ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have carried a good deal of flour to maritime province ports. We get a large amount of coal from Springhill, which was brought to Montreal, and we carried, I think, as much as 100,000 or 125,000 barrels of flour as return cargoes.

Mr. POWELL. That would be practically the limit of the return freight.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That would be the limit, perhaps, of the flour that was sent to Springhill, but there is New Glasgow, Pictou and Sydney, to which the amount of freights that are sent is increasing every year. The amount of the tonnage we carried this present year is at least 200,000 more than was carried two years ago. My hon. friend will remember that he pointed with scorn to the calculations of the officers of the Intercolonial when they said that, when we should get into Montreal, we would be able to add 200,000 tons to the tonnage. Taking ten months of business, and adding to the ten months a reasonable addition for the increase between this year and 1897, and it will be shown that we carried very close on 200,000 tons more.

Mr. POWELL. How much of it is Springhill coal that goes to the Canadian Pacific Railway in St. John which did not go before, but went by means of barges ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not the figures at hand.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). As some reference has been made by several hon. gentlemen to the city I represent, I wish to say, that I did not understand myself as assailing the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. What I ventured to do, on the occasion referred to, was to point out that, if the Intercolonial was to compete with the Canadian Pacific, they had better take the freight to the city of Halifax than to St. John. By carrying the freight 97 miles further, they save 250 miles of an ocean voyage ; and it was conceded by the Minister of Railways, in the Drummond County inquiry, that the advantage of Halifax over St. John and Portland, as an ocean port, was very considerable, and it has been considered in the agreement we are now discussing, as equivalent to 1 cent per 100 pounds on all classes. In reference to what the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) said in regard to the competition by means of the Canadian Pacific Railway, if the Canadian Pacific Railway had running powers into the city of Halifax on such a basis as was urged on the Government by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, or, to put it in another way, if the Canadian Pacific Railway had a line from St. John to Halifax, I have not the slightest doubt that it would be better for Halifax to compete by that line for the trade of the west, because it would be a shorter line. Under the existing conditions, no doubt, the observations of the hon. Minister of Finance have weight ; but, if you had proper running powers for the Canadian Pacific Railway, so as to put that railway in the same position as if its line were extended to Halifax, I think he will agree that Halifax would have a better chance for competing for the western business, via St. John, over the short line than over the Intercolonial Railway. We have not that, however, and I am willing to accord my support to the Minister of Railways in endeavouring to secure as best we can that business for Halifax by the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. Minister of Railways said there was a large increase of coal carried by way of Chaudière during the last year or two. I have the figures, and I find that for the year 1897-98 there was carried by way of Chaudière only 9,084 tons. The heading of this table is as follows :—

The following table shows the number of tons of coal carried over the Intercolonial Railway from the Nova Scotia collieries to Chaudière Junction and St. John for points west thereof, and to local stations in each year since the road was opened as a through line.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What is this intended to prove?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I wanted to prove that the statement made by the Minister to the House was not in accordance with the facts, when he said, that last year the coal carried—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was not speaking of last year, but of the present year, only ten months of which have expired, and I estimated the remaining two months.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think the hon. gentleman is not correct. In 1893-94 there were carried 102,273 tons. Will the hon. gentleman tell me that the increase during the present year will come up to that, or to anything like what it was in 1889-90, when it amounted to 164,453 tons? This table shows an increase in the local traffic in coal. I am aware that there was a very large increase on the division of the Intercolonial Railway on which I reside, and that is not attributed to the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal, nor is it that he was able to use box-cars for taking coal from the Sydney collieries to New Glasgow. This year, for the first time in the history of the Intercolonial Railway, he got return cargoes. How can that be attributed to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal? The traffic in coal, delivered at short distances, amounted last year to 351,069 tons; the year before that, to 331,469 tons, and, the year before that, to 369,708 tons. I understand that there was a falling off in shipments from the Springhill colliery, but there was a large increase in the shipments from the Cape Breton collieries. More than that, there was a large increase in the freight rates charged on these short sections. I know that there used to be charged 40 and 50 cents a ton, where we now pay 75 cents a ton. I know this fact from personal experience.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. When the hon. member for Halifax states that if we had running powers for the Canadian Pacific from St. John to Halifax, that would be the best line we could have for the development of the western trade, it is enough to say that we have had such an arrangement for many years, and it has been so favourable to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has taken exception to it, and, yet, so far as freight traffic is concerned, it has not given satisfaction to the people of Halifax.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It was not such an arrangement as the people of Halifax desired.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Canadian Pacific Railway have had everything their own way.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well we will not agree in that. Just a word to the Minister of Railways and Canals. It is apparent that the statement he has brought down does not touch the terminals.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have stated that I will get that. I will have it to-morrow without fail, I imagine.

Mr. HAGGART. I would ask the Minister of Railways, when he brings down that information, to bring this also. Supposing two cars start from Hamilton, via Montreal, one for Halifax and one for St. John, will he give us the total freight on each, with the amount paid to the Grand Trunk and the amount paid to the Intercolonial Railway? The hon. gentleman stated that the railroad on which the freight originated, had not the arbitrary power of fixing the rates on the Intercolonial. I am aware that the Intercolonial specially exempted itself from having the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific Railway make through freights over its lines. As a general rule, they can do it, because the railroad on which freight originates, can make the rates over their own line and the connecting lines. I wish the Minister to be certain on that point. But, surely, he is mistaken in reference to ocean steamers. They have an arrangement with nearly every railroad on the continent of America, under which they can quote rates for passengers or freight to any part of the country, and their proportion is an agreed percentage.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend is surely in error in that. I know that the steamships which sail from Halifax and St. John, are practically in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and have almost refused to enter into contracts.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman misunderstands me altogether. I am talking of every steamship company that has agents in Europe for the purpose of carrying passengers and freight to this country. They have a common arrangement, by which they can quote rates by the Intercolonial, as well as by every other railroad, and the percentage to be paid to the railroad is fixed.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They cannot really do it, because the ship-owners will tell you that they are squeezed by the railroads, unless they have been able to compel or induce the railway companies to agree to give them an outward freight, and stipulate as to the rate for the inward freight.

Mr. McDOUGALL. When a shipper in England asks a shipping agent, what it will cost to deliver goods in Toronto from Halifax, for instance, surely, the agent must depend upon a rate supplied to him by the Intercolonial Railway. It will be for the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk to divide the amount they get for the delivery of the goods at Toronto between themselves ; and what I understand the ex-Minister of Railways to ask is, what proportion the Grand Trunk gets, and what proportion the Inter-colonial gets, for carrying that freight.

Bill reported.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to inquire again what progress has been made with the evidence in connection with Mr. Oglvie's report ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I think I will be able to lay it on the Table to-morrow.

THE CASE OF MR. BOWER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the hon. gentleman had time to look into the case of Mr. Bower, the surveyor who went up for examination, and whose letter I handed him across the floor of the House some days ago ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I gave instructions to my deputy to see the chairman of the Board of Examiners and endeavour to meet the hon. gentleman's wishes, if possible. I have no reply.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. With regard to the return ordered in connection with the New Westminster Crown and Timber Office, and my request for a preliminary return, showing the correspondence leading to the commission and the commission itself, when can we have that ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I inquired yesterday, and think it will be ready to-morrow.

Mr. PRIOR. Will it be long before the returns are brought down with reference to the Songhees Indian reserve, and also the claims for compensation for lands taken for fortification purposes at Macaulay Point ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If there has been an order for that return, it has not been called to my attention. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to send me a memorandum, giving the page of "Hansard," on which the order is recorded, and I will have the matter looked up at once.

Mr. PRIOR. Page 207 of "Hansard."

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Steamboat inspection.....	$27,200
Inspection of Dominion steamers and fog alarms	1,300

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That item 207 stood, subject to the understanding that the committee would be free to consider as well as any item in No. 208. I wish to call attention to a return which the hon. Minister of Marine was good enough to expedite in connection with the appointment and dismissal of Mr. Russell, inspector of steamboats, and his recent reinstatement in the public service. There seems to be an absence of some material papers in that return. The first part of the return, which leads up to the dismissal of Mr. Russell, appears to be all right, but the second part does not contain any paper, except one, bearing on the order for papers in connection with his reinstatement to the public service and for all communications concerning this officer since he has been discharging duties in the Yukon district. The only paper in that part of the return is a letter in which Mr. Russell forwards some views of Dawson City, and a sketch of the Yukon River.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I understand that there are some communications which the hon. gentleman thinks have been forwarded to the department, respecting Mr. Russell's conduct since his re-appointment. These are probably not on the files at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is an omission, no doubt inadvertently, because this return contains no information whatever, showing how Mr. Russell came to be ordered to go to the Yukon, although it was clear that he was up there, since he forwarded to the department some views that he had taken. I call attention to some important papers in connection with this officer since he was reinstated and which are missing. In the first place, he was dismissed on complaints in my time, and these are in the returns ; but, as the hon. gentleman admitted a few nights ago, there were complaints also in his time, which he investigated and dealt with. None of these complaints appear. On page 3159 of the unrevised "Hansard," the hon. gentleman is reported as having said :

I wrote Mr. Russell, the inspector, calling especial attention to these complaints.

But there is no communication whatever to Mr. Russell on this subject here :

I also wrote my collector of customs, requesting, &c.

There is nothing of that here, though, of course, it might well be out of this return, strictly speaking.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I had no reference to complaints against Russell.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The complaint was the way vessels were running there.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It had nothing to do with him personally ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
No. But at page 3160 the hon. Minister said:

In fact an investigation was made under my own management, and while a great deal of evidence was given,—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is some mistake there.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I took part in this discussion, and "Hansard" carries out exactly what I founded my request upon and pressed the hon. gentleman so much about this return for.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was no investigation made by me.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
The Minister so stated.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There must be an error.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is the whole sentence, and perhaps the Minister will have his mind refreshed by it:

Yes, I did look at the record.

I was referring to the old investigation, and knew nothing about this, and I asked the Minister if he had looked at the record to see if this would warrant the officer's re-statement.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is all right. I think the hon. gentleman will find a letter from me in the return brought down.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
That is, to Russell?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
The Minister says:

In fact an investigation was made under my own management, &c.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is a mistake in reporting. There was no investigation under my management.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. Minister's memory must have been at fault either then or now, because he particularizes what the complaints were, and they are not what I had in my mind. He says there was a complaint of intemperance.

Russell had discharged his duties for some months. Then complaints were made to me that his habits were not what they ought to be.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. These were personal complaints.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
Yes, but official. The hon. Minister goes on:

I made inquiries,—

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Of course, as Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

—and found that there was a time when that was so, but that he had reformed, and they were now all right.

This is most important in connection with this subject. For what was the point I was raising? This is a subject, perhaps, too large to enter into now, but one that I will enter into at some fitting time. Here was an officer dismissed by the Governor in Council for very grave cause, he not only having violated positive instructions but violated a statute which had been called to his attention. Contrary to instructions he persisted in having financial transactions and relations with these men whose work he was instructed to inspect, having these men in the position of his debtors in connection with the very work he was inspecting. The law forbade it, his instructions forbade it, and surely there could hardly be more serious charges. In connection with the whole subject and this officer's conduct there was his misrepresentation of the facts to the department and his exceedingly improper conduct, when he was dismissed from the service, in getting him out of his office and getting him to obey an Order in Council that provided for his dismissal. My point was that it was an extraordinary thing that a man like that should be taken into that very service again as inspector, when the law requires on its very face that the man should be above suspicion, should be wholly untainted with anything that would suggest that he was other than a man of complete independence in relation to the proprietors of steamboats. This officer having failed in that regard and having violated his oath—because there is an oath of office required under the statute—was dismissed, and afterwards reinstated. And the Minister admitted that he had not very closely investigated his previous record, because he did not recollect very serious charges against him. But he went on to state that there were complaints against him in his own time.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I understand it thoroughly now. If the hon. gentleman will refer first to page 3160—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.
I am referring to page 3159.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman referred to the statement that I made:

I know that other officers on the coast had charges made against them in connection with property that they were surveying, in fact an investigation was made under my own management—

That was against other officers, not against Russell. I refer particularly to the inspector of hulls at Victoria. This is not misreported when taken in its proper connection.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have accepted the hon. Minister's statement as at page 3160. I am now dealing with that at page 3159, where it is made clear that Russell was a man whose conduct was investigated by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries after a complaint had been made, and whom the Minister found guilty but forgave.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is the hon. gentleman's language :

Russell had discharged his duty for some months, when complaints were made to me that his habits were not what they ought to be. I made inquiry and found that there was a time when that was so, but that he had reformed, and that they were now all right.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I had my attention called to Russell's conduct by some hon. gentlemen. I do not now recollect exactly. I mean my attention was called personally and verbally to the statement that this man Russell was in the habit of drinking. I spoke to the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) on the subject, and he gave me the assurance that while there might have been some truth in the statement at one time, he was able to assure me that Russell had reformed and that I need not trouble myself. And nothing further was done than that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I accept the hon. Minister's statement as to the facts, but surely it is a most extraordinary proceeding in connection with an office of this character, when complaints are made that they should be disposed of in this summary and casual manner, no inquiry held and no record made in the department.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I spoke to the hon. member for Burrard.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think that this is the way to conduct public business or that it is the way the hon. Minister usually conducts public business. If an officer in such a position is reported to him by a member of Parliament to be conducting himself improperly, I think the matter should not end there. The Minister has officers in his service, he has an agent for the province, and there should be some official investigation ordered of the complaint thus made. I accept the hon. Minister's statement that there is no official correspondence touching these complaints.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no recollection of any.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, but, now that he puts it in that way, of course with the understanding that he will look into it. I call his attention further to the extraordinary absence of any instructions to this officer in regard to his performing any duties in the Yukon district. There is not a line showing the assignment of this officer to a particular district. The Act provides that the officers are appointed for such district as the Governor in Council prescribes. The Order in Council prescribes that this man shall be appointed inspector for the province of British Columbia, and the Minister put through an Act last year giving him some powers in regard to the North-west Territories and the Yukon district, and by an assignment of powers, an officer could be told off to perform special duties. But there is no authority of that formal character, and there is no letter beyond this one of the 27th of April, 1898, assigning to him the duties of hull inspector for the Skeena River and the northern part of British Columbia, and of boiler inspector for the province, by virtue of section 4 of the Act of 1878. But there is no authority in these papers for this officer to act in the Yukon district and the North-west Territories, although the Minister tells us that he was the officer who was assigned to perform those duties. After his return he writes :

I took the liberty a few days ago to send you a photograph of Dawson City, which I procured whilst I was there.

That was written October 1st, 1898. The Minister told us in committee that this was the officer who was performing the duties of steamboat inspector in the Yukon district, and to confirm that regulation there is this communication. It is clear this officer must have made some report, or there must be an extraordinary state of affairs in the department. It was his duty to report in connection with all the work he did in the Yukon district, to report the name of every vessel that he inspected, and the Order in Council called for all communications from this officer since he has been discharging such duties in the Yukon district.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Do you think it covers the official reports ? I do not so read it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly, I do not think it could be made plainer. The clerk who prepared these papers evidently read it in that way. This officer went up there as steamboat inspector, but he was not vested with any authority. Of course, if the Minister states, after investigation, that he was not invested with any authority, and that he did not inspect any ships, of course I accept it. I have looked through the returns, and while it appears that certain vessels plying in the Yukon waters were inspected, some of those vessels were inspected in Vancouver and some in Victoria previous to their voyage north. But my point is as to whether this man performed any duties in the Yukon, and if he did, that would be shown by an official report which will give the names of the vessels that he inspected, and the work that he did.

Mr. TAYLOR. In this item for fisheries and fishery protection service, I see there is an increase of $5,000. I want to know why this increase is necessary. In my opinion it is quite unnecessary; and if the Minister and the Government would conduct the business of this country as they promised to do, that is to say, on business principles, instead of increasing this item by $5,000, they would have decreased it from $95,000 to $75,000. I will refer to a few details to show how they are throwing away the people's money for the benefit of their political friends. In the Auditor General's Report for 1897-98, K-96, I find the name of F. F. Courtney, of Halifax, who received $241 for supplies for one of these steamers. Among the items charged the hon. gentleman will find two bushels of pease, at $2.50 a bushel. Well, pease were sold last year all through the country at 60 cents, that is what we paid the farmers for them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is beans, not pease.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, beans are the same price; they were sold last year for 60 cents a bushel. Now, we will come to Charlottetown, to friends of the hon. Minister, Davidson & Co. He had to give them something, and they put in a bill for $464. Among the items they supplied to the steamer were 120 pounds of beans at 3 cents a pound; that is equal to $1.80 a bushel. Twenty pounds of cheese at 14 cents per pound; we all know what cheese was worth last year.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Eight cents per pound.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Cape Breton says it was worth 8 cents per pound down there.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that cheese is selling for 14 cents per pound in Ottawa to-day.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not talking about to-day. I am talking about what is contained in the Auditor General's Report. The next item I take up is four cases of condensed milk, which is made in that country. It is charged at from $7.95 to $9.60.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is not made in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, but it is made in Truro, and my hon. friend says that it is sold in Victoria at $5.60 per case. Five barrels of flour at $6.50 per barrel; four pounds of currants, 10 cents per pound. Every person knows that you can get three pounds of currants in any retail store for

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picton).

25 cents, but the hon. Minister has to give his political friend in Charlottetown 10 cents per pound. The next item is a case of lobsters, $12. Some of my hon. friends from the maritime provinces will be able to tell what these are worth.

Mr. McDOUGALL. They are worth $7 to $8 per case.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) from Cape Breton says that they are worth from $7 to $8 at the outside value.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will this friend of yours enter into a contract to furnish them at that price?

Mr. TAYLOR. He is talking about last year.

Mr. McDOUGALL. That is when these articles were supplied.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend from West Huron, to help to strengthen the case of the Government, stated that cheese was selling at 14 cents per pound in Ottawa. The price of cheese to-day in Ottawa is 8 cents per pound.

Mr. McMILLAN. I was in a store in Ottawa to-day and saw cheese retailed at 14 cents per pound.

Mr. TAYLOR. The next item is fifty pounds of split peas at 5 cents per pound. If my hon. friend will turn to the Auditor General's Report, I-19, Kingston Penitentiary, he will find that my friend James Crawford supplied the Kingston Penitentiary with 14,833 pounds of split pease at 1½ cents per pound. Yet my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) pays his friend in Charlottetown 5 cents per pound, or 300 per cent profit.

Mr. ELLIS. Surely my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) would not feed the Canadian navy on the same food that he would give to convicts.

Mr. TAYLOR. We all know what split pease are. They are just the same pease that go to the Canadian navy or to Her Majesty that are supplied to the convicts. They are grown by the farmers, and they are put into the machine and split. We will now go back to Halifax. One of the steamers in the service required some repairs and the hon. Minister gave the job to Longard Brothers, of Halifax. These men had some repair work on one of the steamers, and they sent in a bill for 7½ days' labour at $5 per day, 228½ days' labour at $4 per day, and 87½ pounds of solder at 35 cents per pound. We all know what solder is worth. I would ask my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) what solder is worth?

Mr. WOOD. Tin has gone up, you know.

Mr. TAYLOR. Longard Brothers supplied men at $4 per day to do the work on this steamer, when they perhaps hired these men for $2 per day. I see another amount where the same prices are charged by political friends who supplied labour at 20 per cent more than they could have hired it for. Longard Brothers got altogether $1,729. Then we have Archie Currie, of Souris, P.E.I., who presented a bill for $947 for supplies for one of these steamers. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) will find it at K-104 of the Auditor General's Report. One item there is four bushels of green apples at $2 per bushel. Some of my hon. friends will know who Archie Currie is. As I am informed, he is one of the political friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. Another item is 170 pounds of beans at 4 cents per pound, another 44½ pounds of cheese at 14 cents per pound; four barrels of flour at $7 per barrel; fifty gallons of coal oil at 30 cents per gallon. Coal oil, we know, is worth 19 cents to 20 cents per gallon, sold down there by the barrel. Another item is fourteen pounds of rope at 12 cents per pound, 6½ cords of wood at $5 per cord. What is wood worth in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. ELLIS. I pay that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think you would get wood in Prince Edward Island for very much less.

Mr. McDOUGALL. You can get lots of it for $3 a cord.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is quoting cheap prices when he is not supplying the goods himself.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I could supply all the cordwood the hon. gentleman wants at $3 per cord.

Mr. TAYLOR. If my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) would invite tenders for his supplies he would not have to pay such prices. This gentleman supplied 175 pounds of beans at 4 cents per pound, equal to $2.40 per bushel. Then the hon. gentleman had another friend at Halifax, and he had to have a little patronage. There was W. C. Anderson, of Halifax, who received something.

Mr. MILLS. He is a Grit.

Mr. TAYLOR. He puts in a bill for $126.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What page is that on?

Mr. TAYLOR. Page K-92. I intended to draw the attention of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) to these matters, but I see he is in the gallery entertaining a number of his friends. As his constituents know, when he was running an election, he scored the Government for having paid too much for jack-knives, and small articles of that kind. If the farmers of Frontenac knew that the Government were paying these prices they would catch these Patrons by the neck, and ask them why they did not get up and criticise the Government for paying such prices. W. C. Anderson of Halifax, supplied 120 pounds of red onions, equal to two bushels, at 4 cents a pound, or $2.40 per bushel.

Mr. McDOUGALL. They were sent from Montreal to Halifax and sold at $1.25 and $1.50 per barrel.

Mr. TAYLOR. And yet, here is Mr. Anderson of Quebec paid $4.80 for 120 pounds of red onions. A. Chouinard & Co. of Quebec had to receive a little pap out of this $5,000 extra which the Minister asked for. They got 15 cents a pound for 28 pounds of biscuits, and $2.40 a dozen for condensed milk, and $9.60 for two cases of condensed milk; when my hon. friend (Mr. Earle) away out in Victoria, B.C., sells milk made in Nova Scotia at $5.60 for two cases. But Mr. Chouinard has to be paid for his work for the Liberal party. Then here is Kirouac & Fils who were paid for two bushels of beans at $1.50 a bushel, $6.50 a barrel for two barrels of flour—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am told that beans were sold in car-load lots at $1.15 per bushel in Halifax, and if they charged $1.50 by retail it would not be a very large profit.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Why should you allow them to buy at retail prices anyway?

Mr. TAYLOR. This fellow was not so bad about his beans as some of the others.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, you give up the beans.

Mr. TAYLOR. By Auditor General's Report at page K-94, we find they have another friend at Quebec whom they have to provide for. Louis Marois had a little account of $302 in which items occur such as these: Apples, $7 a barrel; two bushels of beets at $1.50 per bushel; eleven bushels of carrots at $1.50 per bushel; and two barrels of onions at $5 a barrel. Is there a farmer in this country who produces these articles that will approve of such prices?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What time of the year was that?

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not care if they were kept on cold storage from the fall till the spring, the price is too high. Will the Minister attempt to justify such prices at any season of the year? They have another friend at Quebec, Mr. Charles A. Parent, who is an active supporter of the Prime Minister and his friends, and he had a little account of $1,363.35. Let me ask my hon.

friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) what is the price of axes ?

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). It depends on the make.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know the best axemakers in Canada as well as in the United States and I know the prices. Parent supplied four axes at $1.10 each.

Mr. WOOD. That is cheap.

Mr. TAYLOR. What do you sell cotton waste for ?

Mr. WOOD. It depends on the quality.

Mr. TAYLOR. The quality that is used by an engineer for cleaning his engine.

Mr. WOOD. There are several kinds.

Mr. TAYLOR. Parent charged 8½ cents a pound for 251 pounds of cotton waste, and 10 cents a pound for 100 pounds—

Mr. WOOD. I consider it very cheap.

Mr. TAYLOR. You do, but you sell it at 1½ cents or 2 cents a pound.

Mr. WOOD. Nonsense.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am in the manufacturing business, and I know what I am talking about.

Mr. WOOD. I buy hundreds of bales of it, and I never can buy it for that.

Mr. TAYLOR. Tell me what you paid for it.

Mr. WOOD. Oh, that is private.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That cotton waste was only purchased after samples and prices had been submitted to the agents, and the samples approved of.

Mr. WOOD. Was it white or coloured ?

Mr. TAYLOR. One hundred pounds were white, and the other was coloured. We will take something that every one knows the price of. Here is a gentleman named Trumble, at Quebec, that supplied the steamer with bread. He sold 170 loaves at 20 cents, 260 loaves at 18 cents, 212 loaves at 16 cents per loaf, and, if you turn to K-108 you will find that the steamer "Petrel" was supplied with bread at Owen Sound by W. T. Bell at the following prices:—350 loaves at 6 cents, and 464 loaves at 5 cents. Bread is bread at Quebec or Owen Sound, and it is supplied to the steamer at Owen Sound for 5 cents a loaf, and to the steamer at Quebec for 18 cents a loaf.

Mr. FOSTER. They must be sweetbreads.

Mr. MCGREGOR. They are four-pound loaves at Quebec, and two-pound loaves at Owen Sound.

Mr. TAYLOR. How do you know ?

Mr. TAYLOR.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Where is that item for bread at Quebec ?

Mr. TAYLOR. At page K-95: W. Trumble & Co.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That must have been under the old regime, because he is a good Tory. It is a legacy from the old system.

Mr. TAYLOR. No matter what the people did, if my hon. friend the Solicitor General will apply his eyesight to the Auditor General's Report, on page K-95, the fourth item from the top of the page, he will find that W. Trumble & Co., of Quebec, supplied 170 loaves of bread at 20 cents, 260 loaves at 18 cents, and 212 loaves at 16 cents.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How many pounds to the loaf ?

Mr. TAYLOR. This is the 4-pound loaf, the largest loaf we have.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, a 6-pound loaf.

Mr. FOSTER. No, never.

Mr. TAYLOR. Now, take the steamer "Petrel." When she went to Owen Sound her people were told to obtain supplies from a political supporter, and they went to F. N. LePan & Co., who put in a bill for 12 gallons of boiled oil at 75 cents a gallon. If you go down to Chown & Co., of Kingston, you will be able to get boiled oil at 44 cents a gallon. LePan & Co. got 14 cents a pound for cotton waste, and 8 cents a pound for red lead.

Mr. WOOD. Was that genuine or No. 1 ?

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not care whether it was genuine or No. 1, or the best white lead.

Mr. WOOD. Was it brown or dry ?

Mr. TAYLOR. If the hon. gentleman will rise and tell this House what he supplies the best quality of red lead or white lead for, I will accept his statement.

Mr. WOOD. I am not in that line just now.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, do not contradict me.

Mr. WOOD. I am merely asking you the quality.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then, I say that at 8 cents a pound there is 50 per cent more profit than there is on the best white lead. I went into a store down here and asked the price of the best white lead, and they told me $6 a hundred. Hon. gentlemen have another friend up in Owen Sound, and they could not give all the trade to LePan & Co., because the other man would be mad. So they go to Mr. J. W. Redfern and they get raw oil from him, but he does not charge more than 70 cents a gallon. His conscience was not as strong as the conscience of LePan & Co. He charges

6 cents a pound for red lead. These are just a few of the items I have selected that go to show why the hon. Minister is asking for an increase of $5,000 on this item. He claimed that the department, if run economically, could reduce very materially the prices charged by the late Government. Why do these hon. gentlemen not do what they promised to do—run the affairs of this country on business principles? Here is the Minister asking for $100,000 to be expended on the fishery protection service. The great bulk of the money is to pay for men and supplies on these steamers, and there is not a single article purchased except from political friends, who are permitted to charge whatever prices their conscience will allow them to charge. For instance, take condensed milk made at Truro and sold at the next port at $9 a case, when it can be taken over to Victoria and retailed there at $5.60. The steamer "Quadra" is on the coast at Victoria, or I believe she is engaged at present in cruising with a pleasure party, and we will not see the items of her supplies for this year until the next Auditor General's Report is presented. But on page K-18 of the Auditor General's Report for last year, it will be found that Fell & Co., of Victoria, supplied condensed milk at $5.60 a case, when the hon. gentleman pays at Charlottetown, Halifax and other places in the maritime provinces from $8 to $9 a case. I do not know who Fell & Co., of Victoria, are; but my hon. friend from Victoria says that the supplies out there were bought by tender, which makes the difference. Fell & Co. supplied coffee at 25 cents a pound and cheese at 10 cents a pound. I presume my hon. friend the Solicitor General will endeavour to say that the old Government did the same thing. I say that makes no difference. The members of the present Government, when in Opposition, condemned the late Government, and said, "When we get into power, we are going to run the country on business principles."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You have to convert the people around. They have been spoiled.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend admits the truth of my statement. They have to convert the people, and the way they do it is by purchasing supplies and paying them two and three prices for them. That is an admission from the Solicitor General which ought to damn the Government in the eyes of all honest men.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Perhaps we ought to have adopted a more speedy method of conversion by cutting the heads off the Tory contractors.

Mr. TAYLOR. I venture to say that if the inspectors are put on the stand, they will tell you that they have nothing to say in regard to these supplies; they are simply told that Mr. So-and-so will furnish them. Now,

I quoted a few moments ago the prices paid last year for flour—$6.50, $6.75 and $7. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the Auditor General's Report at page I-25, he will find that last year the contract for flour for St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary was let by tender, and the price was $3.49 a barrel.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is the honest department.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is the honest department of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. I want to draw attention to the prices, where large quantities of goods had to be let by tender for supply the year round. The prices charged was $3.49 for supplying the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary with flour, and just to show you the difference, when purchased without tender, as compared with goods purchased by tender, why you paid for baking soda for the steamers, 59 pounds, in one of these accounts, at 50 cents a pound, and for baking powder supplied by contract by Crawford & Co., at Kingston, 12½ cents per pound.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What brand of baking powder was that?

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many pounds of cotton waste were bought?

Mr. TAYLOR. 249 pounds.

Mr. FOSTER. I protest against the Solicitor General giving 249 cotton waists for the use of his department.

An hon. MEMBER. It is a waste of the people's money.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis), a short time ago, discussing the question of beans down there, said that $1.50 per bushel was not too high, yet at Kingston, Crawford & Co. supplied them at one cent per pound. Currants, that run all through the accounts I have been reading, are charged at 10 cents per pound, whereas in Kingston they are supplied at 5½ cents per pound. Pease are supplied at 1½ cents per pound, equal to 82 cents per barrel, yet $2.40 are charged in these accounts I have been reading. Cheese was supplied at Kingston during the same year at 9 cents per pound. In one of the accounts I have just read, you will find 50 pounds of sago and tapioca charged at 8 cents per pound, but according to the Auditor General's Report, page I-19, 4 cents was charged to Kingston per pound for sago and tapioca. My hon. friend, therefore, just paid 100 per cent more to his political supporters down there for the items of sago and tapioca. This was at Charlottetown.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How much is sago and tapioca worth at Charlottetown?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I really cannot tell.

Mr. TAYLOR. Eight cents per pound are charged for these articles at Charlottetown by his political friends. No doubt on the line of conduct advocated by the Solicitor General, in order to convert these people into supporting the present Government, and so long as they get these prices they will in all probability continue to support it. I ask hon. Ministers how are they going to account to the people for this failure to redeem their pledge that they were going to conduct the affairs of the country on business principles. What will the farmers think of these prices, who are purchasing the greatest proportion of the goods I have been reading? How will they measure up this Government, which is paying three or four times what the goods are worth, for the purpose of converting the people? I fancy that when they come to cast their next ballots, many of them will not do as they did before, but will say: We elected this Government, thinking they were going to save 25 per cent to 50 per cent of the people's money, as compared with the late Government; thinking they were going to do business on business principles, but in place of that they are spending $100,000 on what under the late Government cost only $95,000. And for aught we know the Government will come down with Supplementary Estimates to make up any further deficiency arising out of these big prices. The hon. gentleman has no right to ask for an increase of $5,000 this year for goods that could be supplied at $5,000 less, and that, if tenders were called for, could be supplied at $10,000 less, taking the quantity of supplies required. If he would call for tenders from Conservatives as well as Reformers, this saving would be effected. I have no fault to find with the Government for giving their political friends the advantage, all other things being equal, but they have no reason to give their political supporters double prices for everything they supply.

I have two or three other tables to refer to, and when the hon. Minister of Militia submits to us his estimates, he will have not only to do as well as the Minister of Marine but go one or two better, because I can show that he has paid prices for goods that are utterly exorbitant.

For the benefit of my hon. friend from Hamilton, who is an authority on hardware, I would ask him to refer to the "Maritime Merchant, Halifax and St. John," in its issue of Thursday, 9th June, 1898, page 58, in which he will find quotations for white lead:

Pure is now selling at 6 cents, and No. 1 at $5.50 for ordinary size packages, and smaller packages half a cent higher. Brandon's B.B. No. 1 at $6 a 100.

If these hon. gentlemen read the newspapers they will find in them quotations for all staple articles, flour, cotton, nails, paint, and the farmers know whether they are paying too much for these goods or not.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The farmers of this country know whether they are paying too much for these goods or not. I asked the Prime Minister the other day what the binder twine made in the penitentiary was sold for? He said it was sold, but he could not give the prices, because the parties had not disposed of it. Binder twine is one of those articles the price of which is published every day. However, I will discuss that point when we come to the penitentiary accounts. The wholesale prices of all these staple articles are published, and the farmers know whether the merchants are taking advantage of them or not. Now, I hope that in concurrence on this item the Minister will ask the House to be divided, because I will move that it be reduced by $5,000. Our constituents will, I believe, feel that we are not doing our duty if we allow $5,000 more to be given for this service this year than last year, considering the exorbitant prices that have been paid for supplies.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to an item that was brought up on a notice given by me some weeks ago. I asked the following questions:

1. Who was the purchaser of the fishery cruiser "Dolphin"?
2. Was the sale by public auction, public tender or by private sale?
3. If by public tender or public auction, in what paper or papers did the notices appear inviting such tenders or announcing such proposed sale?
4. For what figure was she sold, and who was the purchaser?
5. What was the cost of repairs and fittings of this boat for the years 1895-96, 1896-97, 1897-98?

To this the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries replied as follows:—

1. H. B. Harrison, of Owen Sound. 2. Private sale, first having been offered to the Government of Ontario for $600 and declined. In 1893 the department offered her for sale for $700, but could not get a purchaser. 3. Answered by No. 2. 4. $700. H. B. Harrison, of Owen Sound. Repairs and fittings: 1895-96, $414.08; 1896-97, $346.64; 1897-98, $335.22.

I could not get the original cost of this boat, but I think it was something like $3,000. She was in the service some time and needed repairs. I have been told that the money spent on her repairs in the last three years had made the boat almost as good as new. I am also informed that if notice had been given in any paper published in Owen Sound, Meaford or Wiarton that the vessel was for sale she could have been sold for $2,000. But no such information was given to the public and the first intimation that the people had was that she had been sold to Mr. Harrison for $700. I believe that Mr. Harrison supplied the lumber for the repairs and his bill represented a very large proportion of the sum for which she was sold. The boat was sold to a political friend of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I call attention to this to show what has been done by these gentlemen for their political friends. I have a letter from a party saying that he would willingly have taken the boat at $2,000. It seems to me that the hon. Minister has been guilty of squandering public property.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. A short time ago I explained this matter at some length. I do not think that my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) was then in his place. If he will look at the observations I made then, I think he will be satisfied, I think he will say the public interest was excellently well safeguarded in this case.

We have now been six days on the Estimates of the Marine and Fisheries Department. There were some explanations I intended to give in reply to my hon. friend's (Mr. Taylor's) observations—which they deserve—which will show that the prices paid are such as must meet with the approval of every reasonable critic. But, as I believe the House is willing to give me the vote to-night, I will not take up time.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the Prime Minister say what will be the Order for to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. We intend to take up the Drummond County Railway Bill and other Bills.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 6 p.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 9th June, 1899.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REDUCTION OF QUORUM OF PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE.

Mr. SCRIVER moved :

That the quorum of the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills be reduced to ten members for the remainder of the session, in accordance with the recommendation contained in their fifth report.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, do you not think it is rather an unusual thing to change the quorum of a committee at this stage of the session? Standing committees usually abide by the quorum that is given to them when they are struck.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill F (No. 144)—from the Senate—for the relief of Abraham Aronsberg.—(Mr. Landerkin.)

STRIKE OF THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY TRACKMEN.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would take the opportunity of asking the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) whether he is in a position to lay upon the Table of the House, as he promised two days ago, the correspondence in connection with the trackmen's strike on the Grand Trunk Railway?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have all the correspondence in my hands, but if my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) will permit me, for reasons which seem wise, I would prefer to wait until Monday before presenting them.

CHARGES AGAINST GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS IN YUKON.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved :

That leave be granted to lay on the Table of the House copies of the commission issued to William Ogilvie, Esq., under the provisions of Chap. 144, Revised Statutes of Canada to hold an investigation and take evidence under oath in regard to certain charges against certain officials in the Yukon territory, together with a copy of the evidence taken under such commission, that the same be printed and that Rule No. 94 be suspended for that purpose.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Government to use what influence or pressure they can in connection with the printing, as I have myself been waiting for some time in order to bring forward an important portion by which I propose, on my responsibility, to challenge the administration and the Government in connection with the Yukon.

Motion agreed to.

I. C. R. RATES ON FLOUR.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) asked that a return be brought down showing the regular tariff rates collected on each car-load of flour between Chaudière, St. John, Halifax, Pictou and Sydney over the Intercolonial Railway in June, 1896, and between the same points in June, 1897-98, and between Montreal and the same points in June, 1898. I am unable to give him any tariff between Chaudière and the points named, because I am informed by the general manager that there was no such tariff, but I am furnishing him with the rates on car-loads of flour in the years 1896, 1897 and 1898, from Chatham to these different points which he has named, and from Montreal to the points named.

Mr. McDUGALL (Cape Breton). Cannot the Minister's officers give him the proportion that was paid to the Intercolonial Railway out of the car rate from Chatham to Halifax? I refer to the apportionment between the two railways.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. member will look over the sheets I have here, he will see if the information contained in them will answer his purpose. If there is any other information which I can get, if he will send me a note I will try and get it. I beg to lay on the Table, Mr. Speaker, the combined engine and car mileage in connection with the Montreal terminals.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (Picton). I call the attention of the Government to the Votes and Proceedings, page 402, where there is a return in connection with the telegrams and correspondence with Archer Martin, and another in connection with the correspondence with Frederick Peters. The report recommends the printing of the papers, and though it has not been adopted, I wish to call the attention of the Government to the incompleteness of both of these returns. The date of the telegram received from Mr. Peters and the date of the telegram sent him are omitted. Possibly owing to the fact that Mr. Archer Martin's name alone was used, there is not included the correspondence with Archer Martin, as Martin & Langley.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). With reference to the telegrams, I have laid a memorandum on the Table. It was handed to the clerk and I saw the clerk hand it over to the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It has not reached me, and according to the Votes and Proceedings it has not reached the Clerk of the House. It would be obviously unfair to print these papers until they are completed.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. At all events, I have laid the memorandum on the Table of the House. As to Mr. Archer Martin, the return brought down includes all the correspondence that can be found in the department. If the hon. gentleman can give me any information which will enable me to trace up any other correspondence, I will be happy to try and do it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I refer to the Orders of the House, both of which passed on the 24th of April. Of course, if the hon. gentleman tells me that there is no correspondence with Martin & Langley in regard to liquor permits, I will accept his statement.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. None that we can find; that is, with reference to the permit to Mr. Macaulay; that is what the hon. gentleman meant?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. I happen to know that there is further correspondence in connection with Mr. Macaulay, but it may not be possible to find it, and of course I accept the hon. gentleman's statement.

MR. BOAZ GROSS, OF HILLSBORO, N.B.

Mr. McINERNEY. I wish to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when we may expect the papers in connection with the case of Mr. Boaz Gross, who had been harbour master at Hillsboro', N.B., until he was dismissed by this Government notwithstanding the protest, I believe, of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Lewis), who supports the Government. There was an investigation into Mr. Boaz's case before a commissioner, and the papers can be prepared in a very short while, but, while that Order passed the House on the 24th of April, they have not been brought down yet.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I thought the papers had been brought down, but I will make inquiry about it.

MR. McNEILL, OF RICHMOND, N.S.

Mr. GILLIES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to make a request which will now be a daily one until it is granted. When will the papers in connection with Mr. McNeill, late lighthouse-keeper in my county, be brought down? On the 19th of May the Minister promised they would be brought down on the 25th, but that date is now long past, and I want to know why the papers have not been laid before the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I think they were brought down, and if they have not been I will see about it.

Mr. GILLIES. I never heard of them having been brought down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, I will inquire about it.

L. C. R.—EXTENSION TO MONTREAL—
PURCHASE OF DRUMMOND COUN-TY RAILWAY.

On the order,

Bill (No. 133) an Act to authorize the acquisition by the Dominion of the Drummond County Railway.—(Mr. Blair.)

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I trust that my hon. friend will not go on with that today, for two reasons, one of which I think he will understand is a very good one. Some days ago I asked the Minister of Railways for the reports of his engineers with reference to the condition and status of that road at the present time, or when it was taken over. Those reports have not been brought down. Then, with reference to the Grand Trunk agreement, what I propose to do, as to any remarks I may make, is to make those remarks on both measures at one time, instead of making two sets of observations. The terminal proportions have just come in at this moment, and I have not had any opportunity of looking over them. Under these circumstances, I would suggest to my hon. friend that this might be left over say till Tuesday.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I thought my hon. friend had exhausted all the criticisms he could offer on this subject. I am afraid they are inexhaustible. We have already spent a very long time on this Bill, and I suppose that the House will agree with me that it is important that we should dispose of it. There is no objection to letting the Bill stand over till Tuesday, with the understanding that we will dispose of it then.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make no objection, with the exception that I would like the Minister to bring down that report.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am really not aware what report the hon. member for York refers to. We have had a considerable number of reports furnished to the House from time to time with regard to that road. These reports were submitted to the investigating committee which sat last year. That committee examined them, the engineers were on the stand and they were questioned day after day, and I do not really know just what reports the hon. gentleman refers to that have not been furnished.

Mr. FOSTER. As to the first point, information that goes before an investigating committee of this House is not information which is brought before the House, and which the House requires for the discussion of the measures which the Minister brings before it. But I have not been able to find any document of the kind I refer to, in the records of that committee even, and I am quite certain it has not been brought down to the House. What I refer to I explained in detail the other evening, I think, on two occasions, and it will be found in "Hansard." In brief, it is the report of the engineers approving of the road, and on the condition of the road which is taken over.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The engineers who satisfied the Department that the road was in condition were brought before that committee, and gave evidence under oath, and the report of the committee is in the hands of every member of this House. I do not know how I could possibly supplement the information which has been already supplied. I will have the reports which have been furnished to the department gone over, but I imagine it would be quite an undertaking to have them copied again; and while the officers and employees of the department are all very much engaged, I hope the hon. gentleman is not going to put them to the necessity of copying these again. If there is any one report which the hon. gentleman is satisfied has not been furnished, or any two or three, I would be very glad to get them; but I am not really aware of any.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not think the Government will lose anything by delaying the Bill until Tuesday.

The PRIME MINISTER. We do not want to have any delay; we want to favour the business of the House as much as we can. I am willing to let the Bill stand till Tuesday, but I hope it will be understood that the debate must be concluded at the sitting on Tuesday.

Mr. FOSTER. The road had to be bettered, so far as one portion was concerned, and the subsidized portion had to be built. I have never yet seen the reports of the engineers as to the condition of the road or the report which recommends the taking over of the road, upon which alone the department take it. These reports are not voluminous and are not many, and they are easily got at in the department.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This is a fact known, I think, to every gentleman who has followed the Drummond County transaction down to the present time—that the engineer of the department reported when he was satisfied that all the requirements of the subsidy contract had been complied with. We had to be satisfied as to that, and the Auditor General had to be satisfied before the subsidy could be paid. The Auditor General was satisfied of that, and he paid the subsidy. In addition to that, under our arrangement with the Drummond County Company, we required that certain additional things should be done. Our engineer reported that they could be accomplished by the expenditure of $100,000. We took the road off the hands of the company under the arrangement that we would expend that sum on the road through our own employees. We did not get any reports as to that. We put our employees on the road to do this work, under the engineer at Moncton, and he has had the work done under his eye, and knows what is required, and he pays the men as the work goes on. I understand that we have expended $100,000. I brought down a return the other day showing that we had. The work has been going on, and has been done, I judge, from what has come to my knowledge; but we have no reports in respect to that from our engineers, any more than from any other work done on the Intercolonial. So that, I do not know what report my hon. friend has particular reference to. I will bring down again the reports we received from our engineers, and under which we agreed to deduct the $100,000 from the purchase money, if rent had not accrued over that sum.

Mr. FOSTER. That is all I want, if the hon. gentleman will bring it down.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It has all been sworn to in the evidence in the hon. gentleman's hands.

Mr. FOSTER. I was not a member of that committee.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You have the report in your hands.

Order allowed to stand.

DEALINGS IN LAND BY GOVERNMENT AGENTS.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to bring a matter of some importance to the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior, and, if necessary, I will conclude the few remarks I propose to make with a motion to adjourn. The case in question refers to the land department under the control of the Minister of the Interior, and if the facts are as stated in the press, they reflect very seriously upon the manner in which the land department is administered by certain sub-agents of the Government under the immediate jurisdiction of the hon. Minister.

I am not personally cognizant of the case, but my attention has been drawn to a report in the Winnipeg "Telegram" of an interview had with a gentleman from the town of Glenboro', which reveals, if true, gross official misconduct on the part of some land agents, accused of speculating in lands, to the detriment of bona fide settlers, by utilizing the information which they, as Government officials, obtain. The hon. Minister of the Interior, after his experience with the Yukon officials, and the notoriety, unenviable as it was, which they obtained by grossly abusing the privilege afforded them of entering into unfair competition with the bona fide miner, in staking claims, by availing themselves of information which no outsider could obtain, and which abuse became so gross that it received adverse criticism, not only by the press of Canada, but throughout the world, and the hon. Minister was compelled by the pressure of public opinion to prohibit the officials in the Yukon country from staking claims in the future. This mode of procedure is equally as imperative in the land department as in the Yukon district. Our agents should be prohibited obtaining lands themselves either indirectly or directly, at the Government price, and then selling at a profit, to the detriment of bona fide settlers. I will read the interview, so that the hon. Minister may have an opportunity of making a thorough investigation into the case, and, if the charge be true, bringing the guilty to justice, and thus preventing a practice, which, if persisted in, will undoubtedly result in undermining all confidence in the administration of our lands and bring our officials into disrepute:

YUKON TACTICS.

A Strange Method of Transferring Land.—An Agent gets Himself into Trouble with an Icelander.

A gentleman in the city from Glenboro' gives an account of a land deal which took place between John Harrower, a Government land officer of Baldur, and an Icelandic farmer, named Arni Sveinsson. It appears that the latter, wishing to buy a certain quarter section, which he understood was Government land, went to Harrower for it, and was told to come again, as he would have to look up the records and ascertain whether any one else had previously purchased it. Harrower then bought the land in the name of a friend, Mr. Hyllard.

When Sveinsson returned, Harrower resold him the land for the sum of $1,120, part of which was paid in cash. Upon finding out the fraud, the purchaser obtained the arrest of Mr. Harrower on the charge of obtaining money under false pretenses. Mr. Sveinsson's contention was that the agent made him pay the cash for land which his sons had a perfect right to obtain by homesteading. It was, he claimed, land which had been thrown open for homesteading some years ago, but had been given mostly to political friends of the Government during the past three years.

Mr. R. A. Bonnar appeared for the prosecution, and Ald. Mathers for the defence. The case was tried on Friday and was dismissed with costs to each, as it was held that the actual transaction between Harrower and Hyllard had not been fully proven.

In speaking of the case, the gentleman from Glenboro' stated that it was well known among the people of that section that the Icelanders had often been deceived in this manner by land agents, and that the present instance was only another example of the Yukon tactics which had been adopted in that district. The Icelanders, however, are now becoming fully aware of the dealings of the agents, and are now on their guard against such frauds.

It would appear from this interview that the Icelander applied at the land office for a certain quarter section, and was put off by the agent on the plea that it would take him some time to hunt up the records and find out whether the land was really at the disposal of the Government. Had this Icelander possessed the knowledge and experience of the average Canadian, he would have known that the land agent could have given him the information within five minutes, by turning up the books in his office. But apparently, if this report be true, the land agent saw his opportunity to make a little money on the quiet, and, in the absence of this Icelander, had the land purchased for himself in the name of one of his friends, Mr. Hyllard. The Icelander found out this deception, and brought the land agent into court, and a noticeable feature of the case, to a lay mind at any rate, is that, while the charge was dismissed, each party had to pay his own costs, thus implying reasonable foundation for the charge. It was dismissed solely because the Icelander was unable to actually prove, to the satisfaction of the court, the arrangement that had been made between the land agent and his friend.

It is charged that this is but one of many such cases in that district; and, if that be true, it is really too bad, because these Icelanders are among our best settlers—

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. ROCHE—hardy, industrious, thrifty, and I am sure the Government are anxious to encourage that class of settlers; but, if such a practice as I have pointed out, is allowed to continue, those settlers will write home to their friends, and the result will be very detrimental.

I bring this to the hon. Minister's attention that he may have an opportunity to inquire into the case, and, if this fraud has taken place, purge the service of the official who committed it.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The matter which the hon. gentleman has brought to the attention of the House was not in any way made known to me until he rose to speak, and his remarks are the first information I have received upon the subject. If I understand the statement correctly, it is to the effect that a land agent of the department caused to be purchased a certain piece of Government land in the name of somebody else. The hon. gentleman will see, of course, in such a case it was impossible for the superior officials of the department to know that anything wrong had been done, and, in the absence of any complaint to the department, it would be impossible for the fraud, if such there was, to be checked. I am afraid that my hon. friend has been misled, to some extent, by the report he has read, but I cannot pretend to make a full statement from memory about a land transaction of that kind, and prefer replying at the next sitting of the House, when I will give a statement of the facts, so far as I can procure them from the department; and, if any wrong has been done, will have an investigation, and see that it is righted.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the First Minister to the intimation given that the Government have determined upon a policy with regard to all the applications before Parliament for the construction of railways in the Yukon. I would like very much, if the right hon. gentleman would state to the House what the policy of the Government is in that regard, and on what grounds it is based. I have a very strong opinion myself, and should be glad to have an opportunity of pressing some of the reasons—and, perhaps, I had better do it in advance—for questioning the wisdom of the policy which I understand the Government have arrived at.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member can hardly do it just now. He cannot do it, because the motion to adjourn has just been put and lost.

ALASKAN BOUNDARY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Then, Mr. Speaker, deferring that, I would like to call the attention of my right hon. friend to a statement which is made on the authority of the Associated Press on a very important subject, and which appears to conflict with the statement made by my right hon. friend to the House based on the information he had down to the time when he spoke. I read from the Montreal "Gazette" of to-day:

THE ALASKAN BOUNDARY.

A Compromise Arrangement said to have been Effected in London.

London, June 8.—It is learned by the Associated Press that United States Ambassador Choate is hourly expecting the consent of the authorities at Washington to a compromise arrangement of the Alaskan question on the lines of a prospective settlement and for carrying on the discussion in the high commission. While yielding in certain matters, it is understood Mr. Choate has been able to effect an arrangement satisfactory to the United States. He has been largely helped by the reasonable attitude assumed by the Canadians during the past week.

The Canadian High Commissioner, Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, and the Marquis of Salisbury, are agreed on the lines of the compromise.

Washington, D.C., June 8.—It is learned at the State Department that while a sensible advance is making towards the arrangement of a modus vivendi for the regulation of the Canadian boundary question, a conclusion has not been reached. Expert geographers are being consulted on the exact location of some of the boundary points, though as far as the Dalton Trail is concerned the definite point has not been located.

London, June 8.—The correspondent of the Associated Press learns, upon high authority, that the Alaskan modus vivendi does not imply that the boundary question has been settled or compromised, but simply that a temporary boundary has been arranged, and will be preserved for two years, which interval will be available for the settlement of the main question at issue.

My object, and my only object, in drawing the attention of my right hon. friend to this matter is to learn whether anything has transpired since the communication he was good enough to make to the House upon this subject?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I may say to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) that nothing new has taken place respecting this question since I addressed the House on the last occasion. There must be some confusion in this report between the permanent settlement of the boundary and the modus vivendi. I stated, when I last addressed the House on this subject, that we had reached an arrangement for a provisional boundary line on the Dalton trail. Everybody is aware that on the Chilkoot Pass and the White Pass, the Summit has been recognized as the boundary for the last two years, being accepted by both the Canadian Government and the American Government. We did not come to any definite arrangement, that is to say, of a provisional nature on the Dalton Trail. We have been treating upon this subject, and as I said the other day, we have come to the conclusion that we can adopt a provisional boundary upon the Dalton Trail which, I think, will be acceptable to both sides.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would the right hon. gentleman state at all definitely where the provisional boundary is?

The PRIME MINISTER. I should be glad to state to my hon. friend what the boundary is, but I am afraid I cannot do so unless I have formal authority from the Imperial Government. I have every reason to believe that this provisional arrangement will be accepted; but we have not been notified yet of its acceptance, and, pending that, of course, I cannot speak on the subject. With regard to the settlement of the boundary generally, I have nothing more to say. The attitude of the Canadian Government, which is said by the correspondent to have been reasonable of late, in our judgment has always been reasonable, and I do not see any variation in anything we have done recently to justify our action at different times to be differently characterized.

DEADMAN'S ISLAND.

Mr. PRIOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Government to the fact that telegrams received from Vancouver, B.C., state that Mr. Ludgate, to whom the Government gave a lease of Deadman's Island, has given up his lease and left the country and has no intention of carrying out the terms of the lease. Has the Government any information on the subject?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). None.

FAST ATLANTIC SERVICE.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the Government whether the Government are taking active steps to promote the fast service across the Atlantic?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We are taking active steps about that all the time.

SUPPLY—RAILWAY COMMUNICATION WITH THE CANADIAN YUKON.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). moved that the House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I am glad to avail myself of this opportunity to refer briefly to a subject to which I attach very great importance. It will be within the recollection of the House that last session the Government introduced a Bill for the purpose of providing for the construction of a railway from Glenora, or from the Stikine waters, to Teslin Lake. That measure, which passed this House, was not approved by the Senate, and, of course, fell to the ground. When that measure was pressed upon the House—I shall not do more than simply refer to the fact—the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) declared that it was of the greatest possible importance that it should pass without delay, as matters of very great moment relating to the safety of life and property in Dawson were involved. I confess that I was greatly surprised to find, under these circumstances, when Parliament decided that the work could not be proceeded with as proposed, the Government, for reasons which I have never yet learned and now confess myself entirely unable to understand, determined that no further charters should be granted to enable parties who had Bills before Parliament to carry out a project of railway connection with that country. The importance of the most rapid and perfect railway communication between the Canadian Yukon and the outside world does not require a single word to accentuate it. I have never been able to learn, and confess myself quite unable to form any conjecture, on what ground the Government, having attached such immense importance to this matter of railway communication should have used their power and authority to prevent such a work being carried out by parties who were ready to promptly engage in the work—who had, in fact, spent a large sum of money in preparation for it—and who were not only ready to build rapidly a line of communication on the Dalton trail to the waters of Fort Selkirk, but were ready and offered to deposit the sum of $250,000 in the hands of the Government as a guarantee that they would actually complete that work within eighteen months. The representative of the Government on the Railway Committee, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), took the ground that the Government could not accept of this deposit. But it was promptly offered as a guarantee of bona fides, and of the prompt and rapid completion of an important line of railway, and that without asking the Dominion of Canada for any assistance whatever in completing the work. That was suspended, but I am advised that the parties who made that offer and who were prepared to deposit in the hands of the Government $250,000 as a guarantee that they would complete that work within eighteen months if the charter was granted—I am advised that they expended no less than $40,000 on a survey, and have their plans and everything in a position to submit them now to the inspection of the Government. I take the opportunity of drawing the attention of the Government to this matter as one that strikes me as of great importance, and in connection with the intimation that it is still the policy of the Government not to allow any further charters to be granted or any progress to be made with the extension of railway communication into the Canadian Yukon, or to connect Dawson City with the outside world. I do not require to say anything to convince hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that the whole country is deeply interested in having the most complete and rapid communication between the Canadian Yukon and the other portions of Canada, and I may say the other portions of the world. Therefore, unless there be some reason, of which I have no conception, why the Government should interpose to prevent parties spending their own money in constructing lines of communication so deeply important, I had hoped that they would reconsider that question in the light of the suggestions which I am venturing to make, and give it, at all events, their closest consideration before arriving at a conclusion so entirely adverse, in my opinion, to the interests of the whole country. The right hon. gentleman knows that it is not merely a Canadian question, he knows that there is a large amount of British capital already invested and being invested in that country, he knows that it is important that British capitalists of standing and character should be induced to assist in the development of what is now one of the most important sections of the territory of Canada. I have felt this matter of sufficient importance to warrant me in saying these few words across the floor of the House, and to intimate my deep concern in this matter. There are four or five different projects, some applying to one section of country and some to another, some applying to the Atlin Lake and some of them, I believe, even to the Teslin Lake line, and there are a number of applications; and I was in hopes that the Government, when not enforcing the prohibition which prevented action being taken last year, would have been disposed to allow these others to be carefully considered by a special committee of the Railway Committee, with a view to arriving at a policy that would be best calculated to promote the interests of Canada.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am very much obliged to my hon. friend for bringing this question to the attention of the House. There is no question, at this moment, which, in my estimation, has so important a bearing upon the future of Canada as the very question which my hon. friend has referred to. I may say at once that it may, perhaps, seem a little strange to the public at large that we should refuse at this moment to grant any charter to a railway from the waters of the Pacific to the Yukon country. I may also say at once that we do not object, and would not object, to any scheme to build a railway from waters that are absolutely and without doubt in Canadian territory to the Yukon country. But we have a decided objection, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me when he gives his attention more closely to the matter, to granting a charter to a line into the Yukon from the disputed territory between Canada and the United States. At the present time most of the charters which are asked for are to build a railway on the Dalton trail, that is to say, from Pyramid Harbour towards Dawson City. At the present time Pyramid Harbour is in the disputed territory; we claim the ownership of it and the Americans claim the ownership of it—and they have at present practically possession of it—as they have of the Lynn Canal. Well, if we were to grant a charter, and I believe it is so provided in the charters which are asked for, they would have to be supplemented by American legislation, and so we would be providing for railway communication from the waters of Pyramid Harbour, which are practically now in possession of the Americans, towards Dawson City; if we were to grant that, we would only be complicating the question of determining the boundary between us and the Americans. If we were to grant the charter which is asked for, and under which, as I understand, the sum of $250,000 is already laid down, we would build up an American city Pyramid Harbour and make it all the more difficult to get back what we claim belongs to us, that is to say, to establish the boundary where it ought to be. At the present time the question between us and the American authorities is the location of the boundary on the Lynn Canal. I have stated before what our contention is, and I may state it again. We claim that the boundary is at the entrance of the Lynn Canal, and that consequently the whole of the Lynn Canal belongs to us. The Americans claim, on the other hand, that the boundary passes around the Lynn Canal, that they should have all the shores around it, that is to say, that they should be confirmed in the possession of Skagway, which they now hold, of Dyea and of Pyramid Harbour. Now, I think it is clear that Parliament acted with questionable wisdom when, in 1897, we granted a charter to the British Yukon Railway Company, because this company is acting under a Canadian charter and an American charter, and the consequence is that we have contributed to build up Skagway, an American city, between which and Seattle there is a great and increasing trade. American interests have been established there, and are increasing all the time, and we have met, and are constantly meeting, and will constantly meet, until this question is determined, the antagonism of powerful American interests which have been built up at Skagway, to our contention for the settlement of the boundary. If we were to grant this new charter from Pyramid Harbour we would create on the other side of the Lynn Canal another American city; and there being an American city at Pyramid Harbour and another one at Skagway, it is clear that when we come to the point of settling that boundary, those powerful interests will weigh enormously at Washington against our contention of what is the true boundary. Therefore, under these circumstances, we believe that we ought to delay the granting of these charters from Pyramid Harbour to the waters of the Lynn Canal until the question of the boundary has been settled in some way or another, as we believe it will yet be settled by the recognition of our contention of what is the true boundary line. When it is settled, as we believe it will be, that the Lynn Canal belongs to us and that Pyramid Harbour is ours, then we would be in a position to grant a charter from Pyramid Harbour, as being in Canadian territory, and there would be no need for an American charter. We had better wait for one or two years, and have the certainty of having a Canadian city at Pyramid Harbour, rather than build now and having it made an American city. Under such circumstances, I put myself in the judgment of the House, and I call the attention of my hon. friend to this view of the question, which, perhaps, has escaped him up to this moment, that it is in the best interests of Canada, as a whole, not to allow more American cities to be built on the

SIR WILFRID LAURIER.

Lynn Canal, but to wait until the question of the boundary has been determined. I may say, further, that if it be determined afterwards by the arbitrators that the Lynn Canal does not belong to us, but that it belongs to the Americans, then the policy of Canada will be to get access to the Yukon, not by the Lynn Canal, but by building railways from the waters of the Pacific, from a harbour on what is indisputably Canadian waters, to have a railway built, though it would, perhaps, be longer, from Observatory Inlet, or some other point, through the Cassiar district, the Atlin district and Yukon district. That is the view that we have adopted. I know that, as a general rule, it is, perhaps to some extent, an invidious task to prevent the building of railways in this country; it may be a still more invidious task to prevent access to the Yukon by the building of railways, but the reasons seem to be so strong and overwhelming in favour of staying our hand and in favour of waiting until we know whether the harbours on the Lynn Canal be Canadian or American, that in the meantime we throw ourselves on the judgment of the House and on the judgment of the country, as to whether it is not advisable not to allow any more charters to issue for railways to be built on the Lynn Canal until this question has been determined.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, by the common consent of the House, I may be permitted to add a single remark. I fail to see how the construction of a railway from any one point to any other point is going to determine the settlement of the boundary that has to be determined, if it ever is determined, by independent international experts. The only question that could arise is one that could not arise in this case, but might in reference to Skagway or Dyea. It could not arise in reference to any settlement made now, because, if a railway were built, and the commission decided that it was to be Canadian territory from the waters of the Pacific to Fort Selkirk, the question would be disposed of just as completely, whether the railway was in existence previously or not. I would also remark to my right hon. friend that in reference to the proposed construction of a railway from the waters of the Stikine to Teslin Lake, the contract provided that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann might build this line from Pyramid Harbour to Fort Selkirk. There was no boundary question to be determined then; that question was still an open one, perhaps more so than now, and I cannot see, if that were the case, when that authority was given, why the same reason should not exist now. I do not want to say a word further, because I am quite certain that the right hon. Prime Minister has arrived at the conclusion which he has, believing it to be a necessary conclusion in the interest of Canada; but it does not appear that that would conflict in any way with the ultimate settlement of the boundary. At the same time, I agree with the right hon. Prime Minister that the construction of a railway is important for the settlement of that country, and, if the ultimate decision of the boundary should say that Skagway, Dyea and the Lynn Canal are in United States territory, I quite agree with the Prime Minister that we must then have, as promptly as possible, a direct communication from a place undoubtedly on Canadian waters through the country to the city of Dawson. As no subsidy is asked, it does not appear to me that the grounds stated are sufficient to prevent the construction of the railway at the present time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I do not imagine that there is anything that I can add to what the right hon. Premier has stated which would convince the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Tupper) of the strength of the case against our granting further charters at the present time, if what the right hon. Premier has said has not convinced him, as it does not appear to have done. I can call the hon. gentleman's attention to one reason which he has alleged against the action which the Government has taken in this matter, or against the conclusion which it has arrived at, which has not, apparently, been in the hon. gentleman's recollection. He points to the fact that, as part of the arrangement which was entered into with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and as one of the conditions of the charter which was to be granted for the construction of that line, it was proposed that the railway might be built through the Chilkat Pass from Pyramid Harbour and into the Yukon country. That is quite true. But my hon. friend has forgotten that that was to be a subordinate undertaking, that the line from Glenora to Teslin Lake was the primary undertaking of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. As to whether or not the line from Pyramid Harbour into the Yukon should be constructed by them was a matter resting entirely in the discretion of the Government, and before building which the Government's consent was to be obtained. The power which was conferred on Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann was held in suspense and was entirely conditional upon the Government consent. If the question should be raised by Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, the Government would be free to consider whether, under the then existing circumstances, it would be wise to authorize the construction of that line. So long as the conditions exist as they exist today, the case seems to be clear, beyond all question, that the true policy, in the interest of Canada, is to stay our hands and grant no further legislation as respects, at all events, the building of a railway through the Chilkat Pass. There is no doubt that there are only two routes—one through the White Pass, and one through the Chilkat Pass—which would be available for the purpose of railway construction. I think we all agree that it was the misfortune, rather than a matter of mere carelessness, that we should have, as a Parliament, chartered the White Pass Company, because it is a fact, as the Prime Minister has stated, that it has, in a measure at all events, weakened our position. It may not be, as a matter of law, that by reason of the building up of these towns at the terminus of this railway our position, from the legal point of view, has been impaired; but we know, as a matter of fact, that it has immensely increased the strength of the antagonism which has been aroused in all parts of the United States against any arbitration which would involve the handing over of these towns to Canada, should they be found, in a friendly negotiation, to be in Canadian territory. Let me say a word further in regard to the other route. There are four or five Bills now before the Railway Committee which cover legislation for railways into the Yukon. Four of them, I think, apply to the Chilkat Pass, and one, or possibly two, provide for the construction of railways from some point on the Stikine River or from some point on the Pacific coast below or in British Columbia.

Now, the impression that strikes my mind very strongly is, that at the present moment it is undesirable that we should grant any charters for the construction of a line by that route at present. When, as the right hon. the Prime Minister has stated, it is definitely determined where the Canadian and American boundary is to be, and if it should be decided against us, then it will be a very important question for the Government to take up the matter of railway legislation passing through entirely Canadian territory; instead of granting charters now, which might prejudice our action, which might not conform to the ideas we will then have when we consider the question further, and which may not be for the public interest when we have had our surveys completed. It is certainly unwise at this stage that we should grant any charters in that direction. No great harm can be done to the interests of the people of the Yukon, because they have access now by the White Pass line to the waterways and can get down the river during the summer season. That road will answer every useful purpose, at all events for the present. For these reasons, I being authorized by the Government, intimated to the Railway Committee this morning that these charters would not be favoured by the Government, and that if they were pressed we would have to ask Parliament not to sanction them.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) The question which has been raised is an important one, and worth considering entirely apart from any party basis. For my own part I would like to give all the weight that is possible to the consideration which was urged by the right hon. the leader of the House, I have no hesitation in saying, that the ground upon which the Government adopted this policy would be a patriotic and a good ground, provided that it actually existed. But we must be pretty certain that there is strong force in the contention, and I think there are some other things on the opposite of the question that will have to be looked into, as a compensation. The leader of the Opposition has brought to the attention of the Government, the fact, that in their proposed legislation of last session, they proposed to build a line of communication through American territory, from a point where, certainly both sides of the River Stikine are in the disputed territory and may belong to the United States or may belong to us. At all events, they occupy exactly the same position in that respect, as do these places on the Lynn Canal. The Government had then no hesitation in attempting to push that line of communication and giving an alternative power to build from Pyramid Harbour to the same contractors. It is not possible to contend that the disputed boundary was not a question then, just as much as it is now. It has been under active discussion for the last eight or ten years, and for the last six or seven years especially, continuous efforts have been made by both the United States and the Canadian Governments to have the disputed boundary settled. Preliminary work had to be done, and the result of that preliminary work is now in the hands of the Government as contributory to the ultimate settlement of the question. Therefore, the very same objection could be urged with reference to the legislation undertaken in the Mann & Mackenzie proposals. The argument now used is, that if a town is built up at Pyramid Harbour as at Skagway, it might add strength to the opposition against the Canadian contention and in favour of United States contention. I believe that the whole business interests of the Pacific coast, and the prospective profits and prospective trade for which they are looking, will be just as strongly against the Canadian contention, as if these towns were established. I believe that the Prime Minister will not weaken the United States case nor strengthen his own, by now announcing in Parliament that he proposes that no more American towns shall be built up along the disputed territory, at all events, with the aid of a charter granted by this Parliament. There is, I think, an argument on the other side which my right hon. friend may find quoted against him, and that is, that the Canadian Government has not that strong faith which it ought to have in the possibility, nay, in the probability of this disputed territory belonging to our own country. If our contention with regard to it is just, we should hope that any body of experts would recognize its justice and give that territory to Canada. It therefore shows a want of full confidence in the Canadian contention, that the Government should announce that they are adverse to fostering trade and commerce in that territory, for fear it may be built up with United States towns, and that the pecuniary and trade interests of these United States towns may be used to defeat the Canadian claim. That does not give much credit to the international experts who are to decide the question, if we ever get it as far as arbitration before a tribunal, and it does not show a very strong faith by the Canadian Government in their own contention. There is another point which may be looked at. Whether fortunately, or unfortunately—very unfortunately I think for this ground now taken by the Government—the Parliament of Canada, having the disputed territory question well before its mind, has granted one charter at least, and I am not sure that we have not granted two. That charter has progressed in its execution so far that the road is now becoming an active participator in the trade. This present action of the Government is an immense leverage for the success, to the point of making inordinate profits of that railway company which received its charter only two years ago from this same Canadian Parliament. The statement made by the Government to-day, that they have put their foot down against the establishment of any alternate routes into that country—by the Dalton trail for instance—will certainly have the effect of making a complete monopoly of the road which has already been constructed under a charter which has been given by this Parliament. If the stock of that railway company was worth 50 per cent two hours ago, it is now worth 100 per cent, by virtue of this statement which has been made by my hon. friend, and it will not only engender very much bad feeling, but, I think, cause a very great deal of grave talk, that a road which members of Parliament are interested in and have worked for, in which they are to have prospective gains, has been put in a position, and a very strong position—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What members of Parliament does the hon. member refer to?

Mr. FOSTER. I believe there are members of Parliament interested in that road.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. FOSTER. I think so—very much interested in getting the charter for that road through the Railway Committee and through this House, and I think they must have prospective property in that road.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name them.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, if there are not, that was my impression.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You stated there were.

Mr. DOMVILLE. You are always stabbing some one in the dark.

Mr. FOSTER. If there are no members of Parliament interested in it, my statement will not go any great distance, but I understood there were.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It was stated, not as an understanding, but as a matter of fact.

Mr. FOSTER. I stated my impression of it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Your impression does not create a fact.

Mr. FOSTER. No man's impression can create a fact but a man may have an impression that a certain thing is a fact. If no members of Parliament are interested in this road, that part of my argument goes; if they are, that part of my argument is very strong. At any rate, that part of my argument is very strong with reference to those fortunate persons who have the charter; for this change certainly has the effect, so far as it goes, of giving them a monopoly of the railway facilities into that territory. These are considerations of some little weight which militate against the idea that my hon. friend has introduced. I do not think there is so much force as he thinks in his contention that to allow of the extension of railway facilities would prejudice the Canadian case. I believe the Canadian case is strong on its own merits. If the question is decided at all, I believe it will be decided by an international arbitration of experts, who would certainly not give away the case against Canada, because of the chartering of more railways under circumstances where railway facilities are so much needed for ingress into that country, and for the development of the country. These are some views which occur to myself with reference to this matter, and I think there is some weight in them.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Speaker, will you permit me—because I happen to have introduced the particular Yukon railway Bill referred to—to make one remark. If the hon. gentleman has any reference to me because I did introduce that Bill, I want to say that he had better be a little more sure hereafter of there being some fact to his fancies. I introduced that Bill at the instance of a friend in Nova Scotia, who was interested with certain English capitalists, in the regular way, and I helped to get the Bill through, for which I received nothing. I have not, never had, and never will have, a dollar of interest in the British Yukon Railway; and there is no member of Parliament here who has ever had or will have, so far as I know, any stock in it, unless he goes on the stock exchange and buys it. If the hon. gentleman meant me, because I introduced the Bill—and he could have referred to no one else—all I have to say is that it is quite gratuitous on his part even to throw out the hint. I have never had and never will have—I could not afford to have—a dollar of stock, present or prospective, in that company.

Mr. FOSTER. I am quite frank to say exactly what was in my mind and how far it went. I was told that the hon. member for Guysborough was a director of that company.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I am not even a stockholder.

Mr. FOSTER. That was the impression with which I rose to my feet. It is no argument and no charge against a member of this House that he is a stockholder or a director in a railway company in this country; and it is especially none if he is a stockholder and director in a road which does not come for a subsidy and does not get a subsidy from this Government or this Parliament. Members of Parliament are perfectly free to become stockholders in railway companies if they choose. They are perfectly free to become stockholders in companies which get subsidies, and it is a fact that they often are. But what I intended to add when on my feet was that, under the circumstances, when the Government interposes its veto against any other road being built into that country, then it became a question whether any member of Parliament who is a director in the company should not resign his directorship. That is what I meant to say and all I meant. It implied no charge or disgrace.

Mr. McGREGOR. You said the legislation along that line would make him rich.

Mr. TAYLOR. Would it do him any harm if it did?

Mr. FOSTER. I certainly said—and no person in this House will contradict me—that if the stock of that railway, when it was open to competition, was worth 50 cents on the dollar, and the Government declared that no other road could be built for one, two or more years to come, the result would be that its stock would be doubled. Is there anything wrong in that? I have no hesitation in saying that if Parliament, by its veto in a case like that, stops railway construction into that country and makes this a monopoly road, members of Parliament, who were free to go into the company when it was not under these conditions, would do better to get out of it. If there is anything implied in that, my hon. friend may take it to himself. There is nothing implied, and I intended to make the second statement when I made the first. If the hon. gentleman is not a stockholder or a director, my impression and information were wrong.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I think it will be felt by members on both sides that the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has been peculiarly unfortunate from beginning to end. He attempted to base an argument against the Government for refusing to grant any more charters through the White Pass or the Chilcoot Pass, on the alleged fact, which he stated with all the authority of an ex-Minister, that certain influential members of this House were largely interested in the present Yukon charter, and he inferentially argued that the policy of the Government was dictated or influenced by that fact.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend will allow me to interrupt him. I made no such inference. I do not think my words would carry such an inference, and I certainly had no intention that they should carry it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman may have had no such intention, but I am sure that the members of the Government and hon. gentlemen sitting around thoroughly understood him in that sense—that we were influenced in our policy by the fact that influential members held stock or were interested in this railway. I have no hesitation in saying that this matter has received the closest attention of Her Majesty's Government, and that the conclusions which they have reached have been reached solely on patriotic grounds. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), who sneers at that, evidently does not think so. He measures corn by his own bushel, and feeling that no such motives would influence him if he were a member of a Government, he cannot understand how they would influence any Government; but such is the fact, nevertheless. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) refers to the fact—and it is one that we cannot ignore—that Parliament did, in 1897, grant this charter to the White Pass Railway, and that the refusal of a charter to another company will very largely appreciate the value of their charter.

But the hon. gentleman will recollect that this House consented to the passage of that charter at a time when the value of the Yukon gold district was quite unknown, and I venture to say, that, when the White Pass Railway charter was being considered by the committee in this House, no one had any conception of the value of our gold territory in the Yukon. If we had then the knowledge which we subsequently possessed, that would, no doubt, have materially influenced the action of the Government and Parliament. The hon. gentleman will recollect that, when the Government brought on its policy last year for the building of a railway by Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, they took special care that it should entirely run through British territory. They expressly provided that a terminal at Glenora, on the Stikine, should be established for the time being, and the road afterwards carried down to Observatory Inlet. Our main object was, that the trade of the country should, as far as possible, be kept within our territory, and that, if there was to be a great city built up on the Pacific coast, that should be a British, and not an American city.

I do not think the hon. gentleman was happy, either, in intimating that the members of the Government have not faith in Canada's case by submitting this policy. He is not aware of the position taken by our adversaries, the United States. The contention they put forward is, that, no matter where the line may run, no matter whether, according to the Canadian contention, it may run across the mouth of the Lynn Canal, following the range of mountains, or in any other direction, the settlements they have upon tide-water shall be preserved to them, irrespective of whose territory those settlements are built upon.

There would be a very strong argument advanced by them, if we granted a charter for the construction of a railway to Pyramid Harbour, and in a year or so Pyramid Harbour grew to be a settled town. They would say: Here is a great American city, built on this territory, on the supposition that it was American territory, and it would be outrageous to transfer that to British jurisdiction.

Mr. GILLIES. Will the hon. Minister allow me to put him a question? He was one of the negotiators at Washington, and is it not a fact that the granting of a charter to the White Pass would operate against him, as one of the negotiators?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not going to make any statement in addition to that which the right hon. First Minister was authorized to present on the reading of the protocols. The hon. gentleman knows that I am not in a position to say anything about what took place. I am simply presenting the argument which the Americans have insisted on all along, as appears by the papers published, that settlements along the sea-coast shall belong to them, no matter where the arbitration may put the line; and I say, that if we now were to grant a charter there and the result was the building up of a large town, they would contend most strenuously that that town should belong to them for all future time, whatever compensation the arbitration might allow to us. And we desire that if a town be built up, it should be built up on British territory.

Mr. J. A. GILLIES (Richmond). As one of the Bills on the Order paper stands in my name, it is only proper that I should make a few observations on the question before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will try and avoid discussing that Bill.

Mr. GILLIES. I propose discussing only the general question before the House. It will be in the recollection of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine that a certain section of the schedule attached to the Mackenzie & Mann contract, and which is a part of that contract, provides :

The Government shall submit to Parliament at its next ensuing session a measure for the necessary Act confirming this agreement and authorizing the Government and the contractors to perform and carry out the same, also incorporating the contractors and such others as may become shareholders into a company under the name of the Canadian Yukon Railway Company or other name approved by the contractors (hereinafter referred to as the contractors' company), with power to acquire and perform and carry out this agreement, and with all necessary provisions in that behalf, and with all necessary powers to build and operate the railway above mentioned and an extension thereof northward to Dawson City or thereabouts, and an extension southward to a point in British Columbia to be designated by the Government and capable of being made an ocean port, also a line of railway from the waters of Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk or thereabouts by way of Chilcat Pass, also branch lines of railway from any points on the company's railways to any property owned by the company, also lines of railway from any navigable waters to any property owned by the company ; provided that the power to build said line from Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk, and said branch lines, and said lines from navigable waters shall not be exercised without the consent of the Governor General in Council.

The right hon. First Minister has said, that the provision securing to Mackenzie & Mann the right to extend the railway from the Lynn Canal to Selkirk was to be a matter of subsequent legislation. Such is not the case. The Government committed themselves, the moment they signed this document, to the policy of giving Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann the right to build from the Lynn Canal northward to Selkirk. Therefore, the very question before us now, namely, the policy of incorporating a company to build from the waters of the Lynn Canal to Selkirk, was adjudicated upon by the Government themselves last year in their dealings with Mann & Mackenzie.

As this subject is one of supreme importance to the Dominion, and as I am talking altogether in a non-political sense and non-partisan spirit, I hope that the right hon. First Minister will understand that I am endeavouring, as a true Canadian, to take such a course as will in every possible way assist him and his colleagues in the negotiations now being carried on. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman will pardon me, when I state that he may not be as intimately acquainted as I am with the applications and the terms of the applications that have been made to this Parliament for the building through British territory of a railway from the waters of the Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk, in the Yukon country. I was approached last year by a number of wealthy gentlemen, and asked to put before this Parliament an application to incorporate them and give them power to build from the international boundary line between Canada and the United States, or the waters of the Lynn Canal—should that be found in Canadian territory—a railway by the Dalton trail to Fort Selkirk. I was not representing paper men in this matter. I was sent for, and, in consultation with them, I told them honestly and frankly that the Government had submitted a policy to Parliament under which they proposed to have a road built through that country. I told them that the parties with whom they were dealing had to deposit with the Government, as evidence of their having the capability in that regard, the sum of $250,000 which was to be absolutely forfeited unless the terms and conditions of the contract they were entering into were fully carried out. I am now referring to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. I told my people that before I would submit a line in the way of a charter to this Parliament, they would have to make the same deposit with the Government as a guarantee of their good faith, and that the deposit was to be made before a charter was granted. The parties did not want an acre of land or a dollar of money. They were not, as I said before, mere men on paper ; their names are well known some of them known throughout the continent as men of wealth and position. After consulting upon the terms, that would confront them here, I went to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), who is now in his place and will corroborate every word I say. I told the Minister of Railways and Canals frankly and squarely my position in the matter and told him what my people were prepared to do as to deposit. I saw the situation as it stood ; with Mackenzie & Mann before Parliament, nothing in the way of legislation that I proposed would go through if that Bill became law. But I said : If I remain inactive until the fate of the Mackenzie & Mann Bill is decided in Parliament, I shall be out of court, because the time will have run so far that I shall not be able to apply for my charter. The Minister of Railways and Canals heard me out and suggested that I should go on and make my application, and, of course, if the Mackenzie & Mann Bill were defeated, the road would be clear for me. I did so. I did not interview the Prime Minister. I was dealing with the Minister of Railways and Canals who, I felt, would communicate to his colleagues the proposition I had made to him. Now, I will read two sections of the charter that I submitted to the House last session. I do this for the benefit of the Prime Minister, because I feel absolutely certain that up to this moment he had not been aware of their existence. The 12th section of this Bill—the Bill was in Mr. Belcourt's name—said :

The railway hereby authorized to be constructed shall be commenced within three months and be fully completed and put in operation within eighteen months from the passing of this Act.

I may say that that eighteen months was afterwards changed to two years. The 13th section provides :

The company shall deposit with the Minister of Finance and Receiver General the sum of $250,000 as a guarantee for the commencement and completion of the said railway within the times above mentioned, and the said deposit shall become absolutely forfeited to and for the use of the Government of Canada if the said railway shall not be so commenced and completed within the periods aforesaid ; and upon the completion of the said railway within the periods aforesaid, the said deposit shall be repaid to the company with three per cent per annum added thereto.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that the right hon. the Prime Minister would at once admit the soundness of my financial position the moment I made this proposition. Before this was approved by the Governor in Council, I said, I will deposit $250,000 with the Finance Minister which shall be absolutely forfeited unless the road is commenced within three months and completed within two years. I was not asking for the charter first and to make the deposit afterwards. If that had been the case my position would not be so strong. A stronger proposition than that never was put before any Government in Canada. The Bill went through stage by stage and we went before the Railway Committee. The Minister was withholding the policy of the Government respecting the construction of railways in the Yukon and the incorporation of companies for the construction of railways in that territory. We then proposed to the Minister of Railways and Canals, who was at the Railway Committee, that the charter should be passed by the Railway Committee, and should be reported to the House upon the declaration of the Government's policy. On the 28th May, 1898, that charter was put through the committee. As you will see by referring to the Order paper, Bill (No. 108) to incorporate the Alaska and Northwestern Railway Company stands for report. On the 2nd June, 1898, the Minister of Railways and Canals declared the policy of the Government to be to disallow any railway legislation affecting the Yukon for that year, alleging the negotiations that were about being entered into between the two countries respecting the boundary line. I then withdrew this Bill, in obedience to the declaration made by the Minister and stated before the Railway Committee that I would be before them at the ensuing session. So this year we gave the necessary notices, and reintroduced the Bill, exactly as it was passed by the Railway Committee last year—word for word. Now we find that the Government at this stage announces—and I hope they have not come to a final decision in the matter, but are open to further argument, because a Government ought to be like a court, ready to hear matters brought before it—announces its policy to be the continuation of the stand taken last year.

Mr. GILLIES.

Now, let me tell the Prime Minister that the parties I represent have made an actual survey of that territory from the waters of the Lynn Canal right through to Fort Selkirk. The engineering corps was in charge of a well-known railway engineer, Pierre Humbert. I have the original plans here in my possession, and I am ready to submit them to the Railway Department at any moment. The plan for the distance between the waters of the Lynn Canal and the international boundary as claimed by us and the Americans were deposited at Washington on the 11th May, 1898, the very day the Bill was brought down in Congress, that is, the Homestead Bill enabling railways to be built in that country. We have our plans filed in Washington, and we have our plans here, and we have the surveys from water to water. Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand how the chartering of a railway corporation within our own territory can in any way operate adversely to our interests in any negotiations that are being carried on between Canada and the United States. The international boundary may be far south of the point where the Americans contend it is, and I hope it will be found to be where we claim it should be. If so, and if we begin our operations, how can it complicate the question in dispute between us and the Americans. Obviously, we cannot charter a company to build in American territory, we can only charter a company to build on our own side of the boundary line, wherever that may be. Now, if the boundary line be where we claim it is, how can that be held by the Americans to be a giveaway upon our part of any of our rights, more particularly in face of the fact that a railway has already been chartered by us in 1897, when we chartered the British Yukon Company to build a railway through the White Pass from the waters of the Lynn Canal, or from the international boundary right through ? Under those circumstances, how can it be alleged by the Americans that we have given away any of our rights if we charter another company to build from the international boundary line, wherever it is found to be, through to Selkirk ? I am now before the Railway Committee with this Bill, it is one of a number of Bills to build railways into that country. Every statement I have made in this House is absolutely correct.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to make one observation. In a portion of his statement he intimated that he had spoken to me when the Mackenzie & Mann question was pending, and that I advised him to introduce his Bill, assuring him that there would be no objection to it. I do not think the hon. member intended to convey that impression. But he is quite correct otherwise in stating his conversation with me, and I think he will say that my suggestion went no further than that if his Bill was introduced, it would then be in a position to receive consideration.

Mr. GILLIES. I did not say that, because that would be going too far. Before introducing my Bill, I went to the department, and submitted it to the Minister of Railways and Canals, as I have outlined it to-day. I told him that I knew exactly the position of matters, and that if the Mackenzie & Mann Bill went through there would be no room for any other legislation. I suggested to him that I could introduce my Bill, and allow it to proceed concurrently with any other legislation, and the Minister advised me so to do. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a most important matter to the people of Canada; I feel that it cannot be too highly appreciated. In making this application to build this road I am representing parties who are putting their money into it, and who have authorized me to make this application. We only ask that the House give us the right to build through Canadian territory, and that is the only power that they can confer upon it. I am confident that my appeal to the Government will not be made in vain, especially when I expressly state that it is not made in any political or partisan spirit. I am representing parties who are deeply interested in this matter, largely Canadians. If the Parliament of Canada, controlled as it is by the Government, turn us down at this stage, and turn us out of Parliament, they will be committing, in my opinion, a grave wrong towards the people of Canada, and one which they will regret themselves for many a long day.

Mr. J. DOMVILLE (King's, N.B.) There is no doubt a good deal in what has been said with regard to the principle of building up American ports, but I think there is a broader principle than that. My hon. friend says there is a railway built from the White Pass down to Bennett. We all admit that Bennett is in Canada, you cannot stop goods going there, you cannot stop ships going through the Lynn Canal, and you cannot stop this railway chartered by the Government taking stuff from that point and carrying it across into Canadian territory. Put aside the question of going down to Pyramid Harbour. Many hon. gentlemen in this House have had but little chance of learning the history of this matter, and may have formed a wrong judgment from what they have heard. But unless you are on the spot yourselves, as two or three gentlemen in this House have been, it is impossible to arrive at a correct impression of the requirements of that country. Let us leave aside for the moment this international boundary question, never mind about Pyramid Harbour or the Lynn Canal, but let us suppose that we start to open up the great Yukon territory from Canadian territory. Now, they talk of the Dalton trail. Those who have been on the Dalton trail, like myself, know that it is not a bridle-path, it is a wide territory, it is, in fact, marked all over on the map as a prairie country. When you are going to Selkirk, after leaving Bennett to the left, you pass through the White River district, with its gold, and what is supposed to be a large copper area, on the Nordenskiöld River, where there is a great unknown country to be opened up. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, I see, is amused, nevertheless that is a fact. Now, if I want to start to-morrow from Bennett, in Canadian territory, what has that got to do with the boundary dispute? If I am going to the White River to the left, or to the west, if I am going down to the river where there is supposed to be a large copper area, what is to prevent me from doing so? What is to prevent a policy of starting from Bennett with all these branch railways? I do not think that has got anything to do with the international boundary question. It is simply locking up that country, and how anybody who has been out there and seen the money invested and the people going in, and the necessity of opening up that country rapidly—I cannot understand why, under these circumstances, anybody should object. I can understand the reluctance of the Government entering into any engagement which may contribute to building up towns in territory which the Americans now claim as their own. I can readily understand the Government's reluctance to enter into any engagement which might be considered as conceding anything in regard to Pyramid Harbour, but they certainly ought to grant charters to companies which, perhaps, wish to get to the water. They cannot get to the water now, to Pyramid Harbour, because there is nothing at Pyramid Harbour to go to, and there is no certainty that there will be, because if it follows that, as a matter of course, it is American territory and that you cannot build it up, then these railroads cannot go to it, but there is the other alternative of building through what is Canadian territory. I think that we are all Canadian enough to want to build railways through our own territory. I think we would all be satisfied to see the Government liberally assist a railway which is going through British Columbia; wherever it may be located we cannot yet say, because no survey has been made. A progressive Government, such as we have to-day, should desire to open up that country. And I think, we are all patriotic enough to wish, irrespective of party politics, to see that country opened up. I am not finding fault with the Government, but I think they should hesitate and consider before it is too late whether they should not grant charters from Lake Bennett to railways that wish to go through to the Yukon territory. To my mind, it would seem as if we were locking up that country against all comers, although I do not suppose the Government intend to convey that impression to the House now. I merely point this out because I am pretty conversant with that country. I have said very little about it, although I was there; I have rather listened to those who have never been there and who have given us such wonderful impressions as to the results that we may anticipate from its development. I speak, not with the view of censuring the Government, but I ask them to reconsider before their policy is too firmly fixed, to grant charters from Lake Bennett or Atlin or anywhere else in Canadian territory from which railways might be pushed forward. I ventured to point out last year, in a friendly way, that the Stikine route was impossible. I spoke from data and I was correct. Everybody else, who differed from me, was wrong as to the best way of getting into the Yukon. I took advantage of the opportunities I had while out there of learning the country, and I was satisfied that it is an absolute impossibility to get in there by that route. I am satisfied that there is only one correct way of getting in there from a Canadian standpoint, but it would be at an immense cost and take a good many years. I refer to the construction of a railway from Edmonton through the Cassiar district, working its way westward, and opening up the new gold districts as it goes. Pending that, there is only one way and that is by way of the Lynn Canal, where ships can get deep water right up to the wharfs. It is thirty or forty miles to get across from Skagway to Lake Bennett; some call it 42 miles and some 36, according to the straightness of the line. Having got across through the pass, the route lies down the rivers in the summer. By way of the Dalton trail, if other railways were shut out, there would only be one bridle-path or one company, which would be a great mistake in the interest of opening up that country. I think that we might fairly ask the Government to reconsider the matter, and that if they decide that they will not charter a railway to come down to Pyramid Harbour, at least they can allow gentlemen to have charters to go from Lake Bennett, or wherever they might wish to push a railway, which will open up the country, which will return a profit to the Government and make a way for the sale of the goods of Canadian merchants in that country. Possibly the Government, in looking at this great question, happened to look at that side of it, and I hope that they may see their way to chartering railways having for their object, not so much getting down to the water, but to open up the country from such a point as one like Lake Bennett. It is called the city of Lake Bennett, Atlin on the right, and White River on the left. I do not think we should drag in the name of any gentleman in this House, as some of them do, as being interested in a railway, because, if we do, I am afraid we should have to exclude a great many members who are interested in all sorts of things, mines, railways and many other projects. So long as they do not ask for Government assistance, so long as they are not receiving any Government aid, and are in no way entrenching on the public treasury, I think the least we can do is to allow every citizen of Canada, even if he is a member of Parliament, to contribute his quota to building up the best interests of the country. Therefore, I trust the Government will reconsider this matter so far as it concerns branch roads going into the Yukon, leaving aside, for the present, the great question of how it is going to be approached from the Lynn Canal. A railway has already been chartered from the Lynn Canal. The White Pass Railway is already 16 miles through the Pass, and had reached the summit when I left; so that, whether the Americans give us a part of that territory or whether they establish their claim as to the Alaskan boundary, there is one unalterable fact that this Parliament cannot change, that neither this or the other side of the House can change, and it is that goods being imported into that country will go by the Lynn Canal and will go over the White Pass, or over the Chilkat Pass from Pyramid Harbour. They will go in by way of the Lynn Canal because it is the only way of getting into that country.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). Mr. Speaker, in listening to the discussion on this very important question, I may say that I was deeply impressed with the statement made to the House by the right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It seemed to me that he advanced arguments of very great weight in support of the position that the Government had taken. I am not quite satisfied, as I think has been conceded on this side of the House, that the course that the Government have taken in reference to this question has been inspired by patriotic motives, and I can very well understand that, having been engaged, as they have been engaged, in discussion and in controversy with the representatives of the neighbouring friendly state, they should feel how important it was that their policy should, at least, give to their opponents no possible peg on which to hang a sound argument. I say I was very deeply impressed with what the right hon. Prime Minister said on that subject, but, I confess, that when I heard what was advanced by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) I was very much impressed with what he said. I listened very carefully to the discussion which has taken place since, and I have not heard, so far as my humble judgment can enable me to form an opinion, an argument advanced which displaces the arguments advanced by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

I have not heard an argument advanced which to my mind meets the point, that this is a question which is to be left to arbitration by experts. If it were a question to be decided by compromise, I could admit the force of the arguments that have been adduced on the Government side of the House, but if it be a question to be left to experts, I cannot see that the arguments that have been advanced by the Prime Minister, and by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, carry very great weight. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) spoke of American citizens building up, what he called a city, on this territory; but what we would scarcely expect to be a city before this question was decided, unless indeed it grew very rapidly. What force is there in the contention that these people would have any right to object to the decision of the arbitrators, if they go there deliberately, knowing that the territory is in dispute, that the arbitration is pending and that the arbitrators may decide that it is Canadian territory. I do not see where the Canadian case could in any way be weakened, or the American case in any way strengthened, by men settling on territory when they know that it is in dispute and the subject of arbitration. It may be the weakness of my comprehension that is at fault, but I confess that I absolutely fail to see where the strength of that argument comes in. If the question in dispute were to be decided by the commissioners there might be some force in the contention (although even then there would not be very much), but if it is a question which is to be decided by experts, I cannot imagine that these experts will be swayed from what they consider to be a just decision, by the mere fact that these individuals chose to settle on the territory at a moment when the question was about to be arbitrated. Under the circumstances, the Government should take this matter further into consideration and see whether, after all, the arguments which are adduced in favour of refusing these charters are not overborne by the arguments which are adduced in favour of granting them. I do not mean to say there may not be some objections to granting the charters, but it is a question as to on which side the weight of objection lies. It is a very important matter for Canada, and the question is whether there are greater objections to the granting of the charters than to the withholding of them. I have listened with as open a mind as possible to the argument on this question—which I am glad to say has been entirely removed from party bias, and I have come to the conclusion that the weight of objection is to the withholding of the charters. I hope the Government will reconsider their decision.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I was not in the House when the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) spoke, but I understand from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) adverted on the supposed fact, that supporters of the Government were interested in the White Pass, or more correctly speaking, the British Yukon charter.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) can hardly put it in that way. I did not use the words, nor did I mean to use the words "supporters of the Government." I said: "members of Parliament." I stated at the outset that I was not going to discuss the question on a party basis, and I did not.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) was understood by members on this side to draw the inference which he has now repudiated, that the Government were led to a conclusion on this subject by the fact that supporters of theirs were interested in the charter. As my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) states he had no intention of leaving that impression upon the mind of the House, nothing further need be said about it. It seems to me proper, when a statement or rumour is referred to in the House to the effect that members of Parliament are interested in this charter, that a statement of any knowledge the Government may have upon the subject, should be made. I have to say, that I do not think it would be possible that members of the House of Commons could have in any way communicated any information of the kind to any member of the Government without my having been advised of it, and I state upon my responsibility as a member of the Government and as a member of this House, that so far as I am concerned—and I believe I can speak for my colleagues—we have no knowledge that any member of Parliament on either side of the House, is directly or indirectly, in any way, shape or form, interested in the British Yukon charter. If any such interests exist, it is without the knowledge of any member of the Government, to the best of my belief.

Now, my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) appears to be in such a frame of mind, that I think there is a chance of getting him over to our view on this subject.

The PRIME MINISTER. I hope so.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am afraid you do not know him.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think he may be regarded as being open to conviction, although, he may be like a countryman of mine who said he was open to conviction, but he did not think any man alive could convince him. My hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) was impressed with the statement of the Prime Minister, but that impression seems to have been removed by a statement made by the leader of the Opposition to the effect, that inasmuch as the boundary question was one which would be settled by international experts upon the strict rights of the case, therefore, the question of whether a town was built up within the disputed territory, would in no way affect the settlement.

Mr. McNEILL. Built up, pending the arbitration.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. A moment's consideration will show, that although that statement appears plausible, yet as an actual fact, in connection with international negotiations no such proposition would stand the test of examination. If it be necessary to prove by actual fact that such is the case, we have only to refer to what has already taken place in connection with these very negotiations. I am not at liberty to say anything whatever as to what took place which is of a confidential character, but I am at liberty to discuss that which is of public notoriety in connection with the proceedings of that commission. It is known that when a rumour went abroad that a proposition was being considered, whereby Pyramid Harbour shall be given to Canada—I am not now speaking of the correctness of that rumour as stated in the newspapers—immediately upon that being known the towns on the Pacific coast called public meetings, and tremendous pressure was brought to bear upon the United States Government and upon the United States commissioners, and such a feeling was created in the United States, as resulted, I have no doubt, in what I conceive to be the unreasonable position which was subsequently taken by the United States in connection with these negotiations. We had such a result brought about by the fact that there were two towns upon the Lynn Canal, and that the trade connections of these two towns were able to affect the negotiations in such a way that we were subsequently placed in an unfavourable position. I give that fact for the consideration of my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill). I say it is a fact, that when any negotiations of the kind are taking place the parties will not be guided altogether by the hard and fast mathematical lines by which a court of law would be guided. It is a case of negotiation, and when the parties come to decide what they will agree to, the first thing they consider is what will be the result of this agreement if it is carried out. I apprehend that I have only to appeal to the common sense of the House when I say that the United States commissioners, finding such a condition of affairs as exists there—towns being built up and improving in commerce, trade connections and population, and considering that those places might possibly be transferred from the jurisdiction of the United States to the jurisdiction of Canada, would be most likely to refuse to agree to any proposition that might be made which would be likely to have that result. Now, my hon. friend says, and with some degree of plausibility, that he supposes the question will certainly be settled before the railroad would be built, or before any town would grow up upon the Pyramid Harbour as a result of the construction of a line of railway over the Dalton trail. But my hon. friend would be the first man who would condemn this Government if, because we believed it probable that a settlement would be arrived at in a few months, we committed ourselves irrevocably to something which would have the effect of placing us in a false position. I say that would be an incautious thing to do.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend did not quite catch the argument. I did not say that the town would not rise up before the railroad was built. I did not wish him to understand that. What I did say was that I thought there could not be a very large city created or grow up there before the arbitrators had decided. I was not using the argument in the sense in which my hon. friend imagines.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I think I apprehended what my hon. friend said correctly. Perhaps I have not made myself clear. What I understood my hon. friend to say was that it would not be a good reason for not chartering this railway that we were afraid of complicating the boundary question, because there could not be a place of any special importance built up upon the Pyramid Harbour as the result of the construction of the railway, or granting the charter for the railway, before the boundary question would be, in all probability, settled.

Mr. McNEILL. If my hon. friend will just add to that, and if there were, I did not consider that the arbitrators would regard that as of much importance, in view of the fact that this settlement had been made by men who knew that the arbitration was about to take place.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That is another point, of course.

Mr. McNEILL. That is part of my argument.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is becoming convinced, and is trying to strengthen his former conviction.

Mr. McNEILL. I am only asking my hon. friend to do my argument, poor as it was, justice.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I am striving to meet the argument of the hon. gentleman, as he presented it. I could not convince him, of course, by misrepresenting his argument. The hon. gentleman will remember that the city of Skagway, having 14,000 or 15,000 inhabitants and a city organization, was absolutely unknown a year and a half ago. When towns and cities spring up so rapidly as they do under these circumstances, it would be, in my judgment, manifestly unsafe for the Government, if they considered that point of importance, to pass it over for the reason the hon. gentleman presents—that the arbitration would probably be settled before the town sprang up. I venture this statement, that if a charter were granted for a railway over the Dalton trail, and active work were begun by a company known to possess sufficient capital to carry it to a conclusion—which I presume is the case with the company represented by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies), a town of 10,000 or 12,000 inhabitants would spring up within six months from the time work was begun. Any one who has followed the negotiations from the time the boundary question commenced up to the present time, must be convinced that the arbitration would be most materially affected by the fact that such a town was there. I do not see how my hon. friend, knowing what has happened, can come to any other conclusion than that the existence of such a town would most materially affect the situation that would have to be dealt with by the arbitrators. I do not intend to spend any special time in the discussion of the question further than to point out that my hon. friend from Richmond, in giving the account of his proceedings, has not stated anything which it is necessary for the Government to controvert. He stated that he had brought this matter forward in good faith; nobody disputes that. He stated that the proposed incorporators were men of substance; nobody disputes that. The bona fides of his proceedings is not in the least doubted. Nor do the Government find it necessary to question the solvency or the financial ability of the men he represents. The Government are treating all parties alike, whatever be their political relations, whether they are friendly to the Government or not. My hon. friend would possibly have some good ground of complaint if we had selected some of those interested and had said to them: We will give certain gentlemen a charter for a railway over this line, but we will not give you one. But we have not done that. We have not taken a course which would leave us open to the imputation of being actuated by favouritism; but we have decided that no charter shall be granted for the present over this line, and that decision applies to friends and foes alike. Therefore, I do not think we are open to the charge that we are actuated by any other motive than that stated so fully and fairly by the Prime Minister. Let me call attention to another fact, which has been adverted to, but which I do not think has been placed clearly before the House. It was brought out in the course of the debate that in the charter which had been brought down to the House last session, for the proposed Stikine-Teslin line of railway, there was a provision that Mackenzie & Mann, the incorporators of the company, might build from the Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk. But clause 11 of that Bill distinctly shows that the idea which the Government had at that time was the same as it is now, although it works out in a different way and causes different action at this time.

The company may lay out, construct and operate the lines of railway, and extensions and other lines mentioned in clauses 1 and 2 of the said contract, provided that the power to build the line from Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk and the branch lines and the lines from navigable waters to property owned by the company shall not be exercised without the consent of the Governor in Council.

So that the question of policy was still held by the Government within its own control, just as it is at present.

I desire to say nothing further, except to advert for a moment to the remarks of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville). It will be manifest that the point brought up by the leader of the Opposition is different altogether from that discussed by the hon. member and the arguments used in support of the position taken by the members of the Government who have spoken and in support of the position taken by the right hon. First Minister, do not apply at all to the question of internal lines within the Yukon district. Therefore, I am not discussing that point, and I do not desire that the reasons given should be taken as intended to apply to charters over lines of railway within the Yukon district, except those which may run to the coast.

Mr. McNEILL. Is this policy to last only until an arbitration is finally arranged? My right hon. friend has argued all through on the view that this may interfere with the negotiations. But the only negotiations at present are concerning the appointing of a board of arbitration. Is it only until that is settled that this policy is to apply? If an arbitration be agreed upon, are the charters then to be granted?

The PRIME MINISTER. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I confess that the position might be seriously affected, if the matter had been referred to arbitration. When it is referred to arbitration, then we may consider the question again. I do not wish to say in advance what we may do, but I say this, that the weight of the objection would be very much less, which at present seems to me insurmountable.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I think the Government have come to a decision very late in the day. They have granted charters to railways to go into that country on the line they now refuse.

They gave permission to Mann & Mackenzie, the contractors, to build a railway in there as a portion of their line, if they desired. Owing to the course which the Government have taken, two very considerable cities have been built on the American coast, which would have no existence there to-day, if it were not for our railways in our Canadian territory. Those cities have been built up entirely by the trade in furnishing supplies to Canada. I think it very unfortunate that, whatever the course the Government desire to take to keep the resources of Canada for ourselves—which is the line they are taking to-day—they did not come to that decision before, because, now that these cities are established, our present policy will simply have the effect of giving them greater importance in consequence. Another point that strikes me is: we are told there is to be a modus vivendi for two years in another portion of the disputed territory, and that modus vivendi gives the United States full control. I think that will be quite unfortunate, because, the moment you hand over possession and control to-day, and cities are built on that disputed territory, you will find it most difficult to resume possession; and the arbitrators, in the face of the fact that the Canadians have handed this territory over and invited, as it were, the Americans to go in and build cities, under their control and management, will find it difficult to hand that back to the Canadian people. So that, I think, in that regard, it would be unfortunate to have a modus vivendi for two years. I think that we should not give up any of our rights, but insist on exercising our claim to all the territory we believe is ours.

The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has told us that the Americans have been most unreasonable and most unfair—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not say that.

Mr. WALLACE. Not in just so many words; but the hon. Minister said that they were very difficult to deal with.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think I even said that.

Mr. WALLACE. He said a good deal more than that, and put it a good deal stronger than that, as the "Hansard" report will show.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The best way would be to tell me what I did say.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not take it down exactly, but it will be seen in the "Hansard" report.

The PRIME MINISTER. Better wait, then, until the "Hansard" comes down.

Mr. WALLACE. I can give the substance very well, and it is this, that the American

Mr. WALLACE.

Government have been very unreasonable, very hard to deal with, and very unfair in coming to any agreement on these matters between Canada and the United States.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, he must surely be thinking of some language used by somebody else on some other occasion, for certainly I did not make any such statement. The hon. member is in error.

Mr. WALLACE. I made no mistake. I was listening, and the "Hansard" report will show that I am right; but, if the hon. gentleman denies having made the statement, I need not pursue it. But I say, that I quite cordially agree in that statement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Perhaps you think I ought to have made it, and, therefore, conclude that I did.

Mr. WALLACE. I was pleased to hear those gentlemen who, in the years gone by, told us how easy it would be to deal with the people of the United States if there was a proper spirit exhibited by the Canadian people, but that the Canadian Government of those days were very unfair to our friends south of the line, and that if there was any spirit of fair dealing on their part at all, they would find the Americans ready to meet them half way. Those gentlemen on the Treasury benches were never done preaching that doctrine. Now, when they come to deal with them themselves they find, apparently, a different state of affairs, as has been confessed by the Minister of Railways and Canals this afternoon, and as has been felt by all these gentlemen when they tell us that the proposal on which they separated from the United States commissioners was of such an unfair character, so thoroughly unreasonable, that they not only refused to consider that matter, but dropped all negotiations on the other questions, because the United States commissioners were so exceedingly unfair and selfish with regard to the settlement of the Alaska boundary question. Now, the Government are confronted with the same difficulties as the former Government had been in the past, the unreasonable desire, the selfish desire, I must say, of the people of the United States not to deal fairly with the people of Canada in these matters. These gentlemen say to-day that they are not going to build up American cities or do anything that will contribute to the prosperity of the United States settlements along the boundary. Why, Sir, we were told only a short time ago that the Yankee dollar was so much better than the English shilling that we should rejoice whenever Americans came to deal with us, that we should meet them more than half way, and that we should have that reciprocal spirit which would conduce to the prosperity of both countries. But they are finding out now by experience that it will pay Canadians to look after their own business, to protect their own interests, and that the Yankee can be very well left to look after his own affairs. I am glad to see a spirit prevalent to-day among these gentlemen, that did not exist in the past, of having a little more regard for Canadian interests and a little less for those of the United States.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals how long they intend to continue this policy in the event of failing to reach a settlement with the United States, because they have kept it up for two years, and it would be satisfactory to know how long that country is going to be shut up for the want of railways?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the Premier has already practically answered that question. Personally, I am confident there will be no disposition on the part of the Government to keep the country shut up one hour longer than is necessary. We will determine that question when the field is clear of existing difficulties.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the First Minister to say that he has determined on this policy now because he hopes to have a settlement inside the next two years; but he did not say, in the event of a settlement not being reached, what other policy he would adopt.

Mr. MACLEAN. Would not this be a good time for the Government to consider the building of a railway through Canadian territory from Edmonton or from some point on the Canadian Pacific Railway? We want a line that will give a market for the products of Manitoba and the North-west provinces, and to keep the market in the Yukon for ourselves instead of giving it to the Americans. When we find these obstructions put forward by the Americans to our getting into our own territory, why not build up a Canadian route from some point like Edmonton, or some point on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and forever hold that market for Canada without paying any regard to the Americans?

The PRIME MINISTER. I may say in reply to the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) that if we cannot settle that question so as to have access to the Yukon from the Lynn Canal, then our policy will be to build a railway down to a harbour which is in Canadian territory. In regard to the suggestion of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean), to build a railway from Edmonton, that is a matter that must be considered by itself.

Motion agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Excise, $462,095—

Salaries of officers and inspectors of excise, and to provide for increase depending upon the result of excise examinations $315,395

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). In that item there is an increase of $10,318.75. I move that the item be reduced by $3,000, so that the increase will then be only $7,318.75. Since the estimates have been prepared, we find that we can reduce the amount.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to know from the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue if he has made any appointment to the excise office in St. Thomas?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Not yet.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman has received recommendations, I suppose?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think I have received a few.

Mr. FOSTER. We want an explanation from the Minister of two things: First, as to what causes the increase, and secondly, as to why he has reduced his first estimate by $3,000?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I hold in my hand a list of all the factories and other establishments in the Dominion which are under the control of this department, they number 637. In the current year no less than 96 new ones have been established. When it is considered that in the excise department the duty of the officers is not only to gauge and to measure the goods once they are manufactured and ready to enter into consumption, but that they are obliged even to follow the process of the manufacture of those goods from the beginning, and to attend to every step connected with the distillation from the moment the grain is brought into the distillery, and so with other goods, one can readily understand that this increase is necessitated in order to pay our officers. One can readily understand that an increase of 96 in the number of these establishments will necessitate an increase in the vote.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the nature of the increase?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There are 20 more brewers and maltsters, 20 cigar factories, 5 tobacco factories, and 42 bonded warehouses, and the increase is continuing, especially in British Columbia and the North-west. I have a list here of recent increases, in bonded warehouses, and I find among the names of places in which these have been established, Vancouver, Trail, Victoria, Kaslo, Lardner, and so on. I thought at first we should require an increase of $10,000, but I find there is a hope of reducing the increase to $7,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman employ new officers or officers already in the service, and add to their present duties?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That depends on the circumstances. In some cases the officers already in the service will have time to attend to the new establishments, but in others new officers will have to be appointed. For instance, there is to be a new distillery in Berthier, in the province of Quebec, which will require two new officers. We are notified also of the building of a distillery at Beauport, Que., which will require at least two officers.

Mr. FOSTER. How does my hon. friend (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) select these officers—for instance, take Berthier?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We need one experienced man at least. We are obliged to bring in a man from Ontario, as we have had no distilleries in Quebec and have no experienced officers. We have brought Mr. Taylor from Windsor, an experienced officer in the business of distilling, and he will teach the other officer, whom we employ in the neighbourhood of Berthier.

Mr. FOSTER. You do not make the new man a full-fledged officer, I suppose, until he has experience?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. He is appointed at $500, and will be promoted as he gains experience.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose that at first he is a probationer and does not go on the regular staff until he has passed certain examinations?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. He is appointed a deputy collector of the lowest class—class B.

Mr. FOSTER. Does he have to pass any examination?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No. Probably my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is aware that in our department the only officers who are not obliged to pass examinations are the deputy collectors.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY.

The House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Sutherland for the third reading of Bill (No. 96) respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company; and the motion of Mr. Douglas in amendment thereto.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Mr. Speaker, when the hour for private Bills

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

expired last Wednesday, I think it was, I was endeavouring to give the House the history of this Bill from its beginning, some twenty or thirty years ago, down to the present time. I greatly regret that I was unable to cover the entire ground that day. I was especially unable to do that as I desired to give the House the history of the litigation in connection with that same Bill. It seems to me that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which has secured control of this charter, or is about to secure control of it, could very well afford to give the people of that country an extension of, say, 20 miles of the road this year. The members from the west met together and discussed the matter very fully with the very able solicitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and they came to the conclusion that they could not possibly agree, in view of what the interests of the people of that country demand, to allow this Bill to pass unless the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should see its way clear to construct, at least, 15 miles of the road this year. In the course of some five or six weeks this charter will expire and I am disposed to think that, unless we can get some portion of the road constructed this year, it will be better, in the interest of all concerned, that the charter should expire. The members came to the conclusion that the very least they could agree to, in respect to construction this year, would be 15 miles, and I think that was an extremely moderate amount. The statute-books are loaded up with legislation, passed during the last 15 years, in regard to this railway and the record has been one that is a disgrace to the people of the Dominion. We feel strongly, that we surely do not appeal to this House in vain when we are asking it to insert a clause in this charter that, at least 15 miles shall be built this year. The company that now controls the road announces its willingness, and has agreed to the insertion of a clause in the Bill, to expend $20,000 this year. The House will understand that it would be just as desirable, in the interest of the country, to agree to the expenditure of 25 cents during the present year for any benefit that will result to the settlers. It seems to me, in view of what has been done for the Canadian Pacific Railway, in view of the land grant which this charter carries, it will be as little as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company could do to expend $100,000, or $150,000, which would build 15 or 20 miles of the road this year. Every person familiar with railway construction in the North-west will understand that it is simply a matter of grading 15 or 20 miles, and the rails can be laid two or three weeks after the grading is done. If the House can see its way clear to put a clause in this charter to compel the company to build 15 miles this year, I believe it would be an inestimable boon to the settlers who would be enabled to get their wheat to market much cheaper than they are able to do at the present time. My impression is that the land grant carried by that charter is probably the most valuable land grant that will ever be given to any railway company in this country. At the present time, the land is pretty well exhausted. It will be almost impossible for the Government, or Parliament, to confer on any corporation such a land grant as this. This land is worth, at least, $2 per acre. As the charter carries 6,400 acres per mile, it is worth $12,800 per mile, and when you estimate a mileage of 700 or 800 miles, which will carry the road to the Yellow Head Pass, you will begin to understand the great value of this land grant. My belief is that it would be in the interest of this country and of the North-west if that charter were allowed to expire, as it will expire, in five or six weeks, and that the Government should take control of the land grant. The value of the land is infinitely greater than the cost of the road will be. The Government will be able to build the road itself and have a surplus of probably $3,000 or $4,000 a mile, enough to pay for any loss that might be sustained in operating the road until the country is well settled. It seems to me that this is a reasonable proposition and the time is coming when the Government, and when Parliament should consider this question from the economic standpoint. The time will come, and that before very long, I predict, when the Government will be forced to take control of the railways, and it seems to me, that there should be inaugurated, at the present time, the policy of the nationalization of railways. We, at least, could commence with the new ones that are to be built and inaugurate a policy that will ultimately lead to the nationalization of the entire railway system of the country. I am going to explain that, in connection with this Bill, the company has power to bond to the extent of $35,000 a mile. That will result in a very large fixed charge being imposed on this railway, and I cannot better illustrate the disadvantage of having large fixed charges against any railway than by reading you, very briefly, the experience in connection with two North-west railways. I quote from a very clever pamphlet, written by Mr. Willison, the clever editor of the Toronto "Globe." Although he does not arrive at any particular conclusion, still, many of his facts are interesting :

The history of the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway is faithful to the details of American railway methods. More than $3,500,000 was received from the sale of bonds. The road cost for construction and commission and disbursements in connection with the sale of bonds probably $2,500,000. Rolling stock and terminus were supplied by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The road received also a land grant of 1,400,000 acres and a cash subsidy of $80,000 a year. It was leased for six years to the Canadian Pacific Railway without rental, and this lease has just been renewed. But the original promoters got a million or two out of the speculation.

This is the point I have been seeking to illustrate. The promoters make vast sums of money and the public pay for it. In connection with this enterprise, would it not be well for Parliament to take a lesson from this experience and say that, instead of speculators making a million or two out of these enterprises, the people themselves should make a million or two. I am quite prepared to admit that it would be a shocking precedent to establish, that the country itself should make a dollar out of any of these enterprises, but things have gone so far in the opposite direction, that it would not be a bad idea to try it for once, and if it should prove an utter failure, we, I suppose, must return to the old methods which have proved such a curse to Canada, and especially to the North-west Territories. Let me give you, briefly, the history of the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company :

The Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company was incorporated in 1890. The length of the road as projected is 340 miles, of which 295 miles has been constructed. The promoters received the usual land grant of 6,400 acres per mile, and mail subsidy of $80,000. The subsidy is to be paid direct to the London agents, as trustees for the bondholders. The bonding powers given to the company were to the amount of $25,000 per mile. With this the enterprise was launched. Almost immediately the road passed under the operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

That is the worst of it in that country ; pretty nearly every railway that is built there gets under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if we allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to take over control of this territory, and if the report that the Canadian Pacific Railway is about to secure the control of the Northern Pacific system be true, then we will indeed have a tremendous monopoly established. If the House does not throw this charter out, I hope it will at least see the necessity of protecting the interests of the people. If the entire railroad interests of the North-west Territories are to be controlled by one company, let this Parliament at least see that that company shall afford proper accommodation to the people. I appeal to the House, and I hope my appeal shall not be in vain, that they shall insist that this company be compelled to build fifteen miles of the road this year. I continue to read :

Many of its promoters were closely identified with that company. At the session of Parliament of 1891 the Canadian Pacific Railway obtained permission to issue its own 4 per cent consolidated debenture stock to the amount of $20,000 per mile of the Calgary and Edmonton Railway. This was stated to be for the purpose of "satisfying or acquiring obligations entered into in respect of the acquisition, construction, completion or equipment of the Calgary and Edmonton Railway." The 295 miles of the road were opened in October, 1892, the Canadian Pacific Railway agreeing to operate it for the first five years, furnish the rolling stock and retain all income other than the subsidy. To estimate correctly the resources which from various channels has been provided for, the construction and operation of this 295 miles of prairie road is scarcely possible upon the information available. But a more or less close approximation may be calculated from the above facts. Railways sometimes calculate their land grant upon a business of $3 an acre.

I have valued the land grant at only $2 per acre.

The Calgary and Edmonton Company will not say that half that figure is an excessive basis. That gives $2,832,000 under that head.

If you estimate the land grant for 800 miles you will see what a tremendous subsidy we are giving to the company to build this road. In view of that tremendous subsidy, amounting to eight or ten million dollars—I am sorry I have not had time to figure out the exact sum—surely it is not asking too much to insist that they shall expend $100,000 to extend that road during the present season.

To this amount must be added the road's bonded indebtedness, consisting of $5,458,940 first mortgage 6 per cent twenty year bonds. It may be that these bonds were subjected to a discount, but the measure of guarantee which was given them by means of the mail subsidy no doubt materially strengthened them. Roughly speaking, therefore, and leaving out of the addition the mail subsidies, the promoters raised upon the road in bonds and land the amount of $28,000 a mile.

Just think of it; raising $28,000 per mile on a road that did not cost more than $8,000. That is the most vicious part of this railway policy as it has existed in Canada. It is on a parallel with this: A man builds a house for $4,000, and then he comes to Parliament and obtains power to raise $10,000 on it, constituting himself a joint stock company, and taking in his wife and a child or two in order that he may evade individual responsibility, and in that way he makes money at the expense of others:

The cost of the road according to the company's own figure has been $3,717,882, or $13,000 a mile.

According to the company's own statement the cost of the road is only $13,000 per mile, and yet the Parliament of Canada gave power to the company to bond at $28,000 per mile; more than double what the road cost on the company's own estimate. It seems to me that members of Parliament have never yet wakened up to the actual facts in connection with the bonding of these railways by the companies.

Actually, however, the construction probably did not cost more than $7,000 a mile. The road-bed is now in very poor condition. At this rate the total cost was $2,065,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON.

That is Mr. Willison's estimate and I think it is a fair estimate for these prairie sections. Yet, despite these facts, we, the representatives of the people in the Dominion Parliament, enable them to bond the road for $28,000 a mile. This is such an outrageous proposition that it does not need to be restated in order that the members of this House may understand its enormity. Just listen to the words of Mr. Willison:

The road-bed is now in very poor condition. At this rate the total cost was $2,065,000. Over against this is a bonded debt of five and a half millions, and the 1,888,000 acres of land grant. In view of all these facts we should make it an inflexible feature of our future railway policy that we shall not vote public money for the construction of parallel roads, that we shall rigidly limit issues of the stock and capital, and force railway construction and railway operation down to business principles. It is time we learned something from a very instructive experience.

Indeed, it is time that we should learn something from the very instructive experience of the past. If we allow this company the privilege of bonding to the extent of $35,000 a mile, it will be quite plain to the people of Canada that we have not learned anything from our very instructive experience in the past. I appeal to the House that this Parliament should preserve the rights of the people by inserting a clause that the company should at least build fifteen miles a year. The settlers went into that country with the promise that the railway should be built, and they look to the Parliament of Canada to protect their interests. A large number of them have passed over to the great majority; a large number of them have grown gray waiting for this accommodation, and not a few, I believe, have left that country with a curse. This is the kind of thing that has helped to mar the fair prospects of the North-west in past years. It is because of the experience of these settlers that I rise to protest against that policy being continued; it is because of this that I rise to-night to ask that the members of this Parliament consider the interests of the people, and not the interests of the railway company. We are sent here to represent the interests of the settlers and not the interests of the railway companies. I appeal to the House to insist that this clause be placed in the charter and that some semblance of good faith be kept with those settlers after twenty years' delusion and bad faith.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Vote.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that, on a momentous occasion, such as this, when the interests of the great North-west are at stake, the members from Manitoba and the North-west are ready to go to a vote on this Bill without stating the views they hold. If they will not state the case, I will try and say something on behalf of the North-west; and I am sorry that, when I say this, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways are not in their places; but I am glad to see that the Minister of the Interior is here, and I hope that, after he hears what I say, he will at least give his colleagues some advice as to what they ought to do in regard to this question. For years the question of railway reform has been before this country; for years the members from the North-west have come down to Ottawa; for years they have filled their newspapers with editorials claiming that the North-west was ground down by a grasping monopoly, created by the Conservative party and known as the Canadian Pacific Railway. Yet to-night we hear an hon. member from the North-west, who has been known there as the champion of the people in railway matters, saying that he will be satisfied, if this great railway monopoly is allowed to take over this road and build 15 miles this year. I say, he should have come out strongly and said, that, as a supporter of the Government, he would decline to support them, if they did not take such measures before this Bill went through, as to protect the people of this country, and especially the people of the North-west. There is only one way to bring about railway reform in this country; that is, by insisting on some kind of concession being given with each railway Bill, as it goes through. If the people of the North-west to-day have any advantages in regard to railway rates over what they had years ago, it is because the Government got certain concessions from the Canadian Pacific Railway; when the Crow's Nest Pass Railway was chartered, two years ago. If the people of the North-west have anything else to thank this Parliament for, it is the concession that was obtained from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at the time their monopoly was bought out, some years ago; and the only way we can get concessions for the people is to insist on some concession in regard to each railway, as its Bill comes before this House. If the people of the North-west have railway grievances, as the Winnipeg "Tribune" says they have, as the members from the North-west say they have, why do not these hon. gentlemen come forward to-night and say, that this Bill shall not go through until those grievances have been amended? Some of the grievances of the people have been amended in the past by compelling railway companies, when they come before Parliament, asking for privileges, to give some concessions to the people in return. What was done in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass Bill, two years ago? The Canadian Pacific Railway Company asked Parliament to give them a large grant of land, a large sum of money, a railway charter, and practical control of one of the only two remaining passes of the Rocky Mountains. Parliament gave that franchise to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; but what did Parliament exact from that company in return? The concessions granted by the Canadian Pacific Railway in favour of the people of the North-west, at the instigation of the present Government, were as follows:— (1) rates to and from points on the Crow's Nest line to be taken out of the 10 per cent clause and to be subject to approval by Governor in Council or a railway commission; (2) reduction in rates on west-bound traffic originating east of Fort William, on certain classes of goods, of from 10 to 23½ per cent; (3) reduction in rates on east-bound traffic originating west of Fort William, grain and flour, of 30 per cent; (4) the Railway Committee may give running powers on terms fixed by the committee; (5) the Crow's Nest line and extensions in British Columbia to be subject to the Railway Act; (6) the price at which the company may sell the Crow's Nest lands to be regulated by the Governor in Council; (7) 50,000 acres of coal lands to be handed over to the Government.

If valuable concessions, such as these, could be obtained by the Government from the Canadian Pacific Railway, when the Crow's Nest Bill went through the House, why are not valuable concessions of the same kind going now? And why are not the members from the North-west insisting on the Government they support getting similar concessions? Why are they allowing this Bill to go through without demanding concessions? What is the Minister of the Interior here for, unless to demand those concessions? Why are not the members of this Government who opposed the Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly, insisting on concessions for the people now? This charter, which is being extended to-day in the sole interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is a most valuable franchise. We have been told to-night that it gives the Canadian Pacific Railway Company 6,400 acres of land per mile for almost 800 miles of road—for 400 miles at least—and what is the value of this land? The Reform party, when in Opposition in this country, valued that land at from three to five dollars an acre. Surely, it is worth at least that amount to-day. Six thousand four hundred acres per mile, at $3 an acre, is equivalent to almost $20,000 per mile: and we have been told to-night that this road can be built for $7,000 a mile, and I believe it can. Then, why is the Minister of the Interior not insisting, on behalf of the people of the North-west, on getting the same concessions now as were got at the time the Crow's Nest Pass Railway was chartered? I will not consent to this Bill going through, until we have some explanation in that respect. In 1884 the members from the North-west came down here and said, that the crying evil of that country was the monopoly enjoyed by the Canadian Pacific Railway. They aroused such an agitation here that at last the Dominion Government, under the leadership of Sir John Macdonald, had to buy out the monopoly clause for the Canadian Pacific Railway in return for which the Government guaranteed the interest on the company's stock for a great many years. That interest is now being paid, and the country has sustained no loss. On that occasion the people of the North-west got a concession from the Canadian Pacific Railway in return for the franchise given to them. Why is not a similar concession being got now? This is a valuable franchise, not only conveying a large land grant, but, I believe, granting to the company the last of the existing passes through the Rocky Mountains. If you insisted on concessions to the people two years ago in return for the Crow's Nest Pass, why are you extending this franchise without protecting the people? I say, that the North-west members will not be doing their duty, if they do not insist, and especially if the Minister of the Interior does not insist, on getting for the people of the North-west on this occasion the same concessions as were got for the people two years ago. The right hon. gentleman who leads this House, in 1884, when the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly was before the House, spoke of "the many obnoxious clauses which the people of Canada were subjected to under this instrument." Two or three of these obnoxious clauses have been got rid of. The one in regard to the construction of other railways has been got rid of, but there are many others. I will tell the North-west members a most objectionable thing in the Canadian Pacific Railway charter to-day, that is, that the company are entitled to a 10 per cent dividend on what the road was supposed to cost. The North-west members ought to insist on the surrender of that 10 per cent clause or this Bill shall not pass. But I have not heard one of them say that.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. You have not been in the House.

Mr. MACLEAN. To-night I insist that this concession, so valuable as it is, giving so much land to the Canadian Pacific Railway, going so far to strengthen its present monopoly, should not be granted unless the legislation I call for be inserted in the Bill.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Spend the summer here and know a little about it.

Mr. MACLEAN. I have read the speeches of the hon. gentleman and others about this grasping monopoly, but now he seems to be the apologist of that corporation, and desires to see the people of the North-west kept under the grasp of that monopoly. He is now willing that the company should be allowed to take advantage of that clause and earn 10 per cent on inflated capital before they can be called on to pay any share of taxation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I rise to a question of order. There is one hour for private Bills, and there is a large number of very important private Bills on the paper. I do not think that this discussion is either germane to the Bill or the amendment, and should not be allowed to interfere with the progress of business.

Mr. HENDERSON. With reference to the point of order, I would just say that the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has very little reason to complain to-night. He allowed the whole hour the other night, without any objection, to be used in discussing this Bill in a manner not calculated to throw any light on it whatever. I understand it was the hon. gentleman himself who caused the obstruction on that occasion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. I spoke but a short time, three or four minutes, and that in favour of the Bill passing, and against the amendment. I am not objecting to opposition by the hon. member for York (Mr. McLean) to the Bill, but I think that his argument ought to be germane to the matter under discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question before the House seems to be a very restricted one, and I do not think it allows a discussion on all the affairs of the Canadian Pacific Railway in connection with the North-west. I think the hon. gentleman should confine himself to matters connected with the extension of time on this railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will you, Mr. Speaker, read the amendment?

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not know that that will afford the House very much more light. The amendment is by Mr. Douglas:

That the Bill be not now read the third time, but referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to amend it by striking out section 3 and substituting the following:—

"Section 5 of the said Act is hereby amended by striking out the words '1st day of August' in the seventh and eight lines thereof and substituting the '1st day of December.'"

Whatever that may mean, it cannot give rise to a discussion of the whole affairs of the North-west and the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MACLEAN. With all due deference to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I beg to draw your attention to the fact that this company is asking for an extension of its charter, and that is really the clause under discussion, and I am giving some reasons why the extension should not be granted. And especially as the hon. gentleman who preceded me went over the whole range, I would ask the indulgence of the House on this, the first opportunity I have had, through no fault of mine, of discussing this measure, to give my views upon the question before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will please confine his argument to the question of extending the time of the charter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As my hon. friend was not here on a former occasion when this Bill was reported from the Railway Committee, I would tell him that other hon. gentlemen, of course in the exercise of their right, spent a great deal of time in talking out the hour and preventing the vote being reached. I am quite sure that the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) does not wish to follow that course, and as there are a number of very important Bills on the paper, I hope that he will be sufficiently brief to enable a vote to be taken and other Bills reached.

Mr. MACLEAN. I understand the Bill to be for an extension of time for this railway charter, and that the amendment bears on that question. I say that this extension should not be granted for the reasons I have just urged, and which, I think, are quite germane to the question before the House. It is not in the public interest that a great monopoly such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has been condemned from time to time in this House as a grinding and grasping monopoly in the North-west, should be given this extension and this franchise unless they give the same concession to the people which it gave in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass charter. The North-west to-day has substantial grievances against the Canadian Pacific Railway. The people there are calling for a railway commission to remedy these grievances. Then, I say, do not give this additional franchise to that company, do not strengthen this monopoly, unless it will consent to the establishment of a railway commission and the surrender of that 10 per cent clause. Hon. gentlemen say theoretically that the Canadian Pacific Railway are in favour of a railway commission. But I would have concessions insisted upon before giving it any further favours. The people are sick and tired of giving and giving to the railways and getting nothing in return. You can get something if you stand up like men and insist on getting it, just as you did get something in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass charter.

An hon. MEMBER. No, not a thing.

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon. Minister of Railways said that he had got concessions, substantial concessions, and the people have obtained reductions in freight rates. In that Crow's Nest Pass charter a clause was inserted providing that it be taken out of the 10 per cent clause, so that the 10 per cent clause does not govern in the case of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. Do you not want to obtain that concession for the North-west people? If you do, you must insist on getting it just as you did in the case of the Crow's Nest Pass.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The House has perfect power to amend the Railway Act in such a way that the 10 per cent clause will not apply, without any concession from this company.

Mr. MACLEAN. That does not meet the case at all. Either substantial concessions were got in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass charter or they were not. If the hon. Minister of the Interior says that the concessions obtained were not substantial, he is going against the Minister of Railways, who said that they were, and who justified that charter on that ground. I am told that the hon. Minister of the Interior has a very extensive proposition to submit, in a very short time, in connection with the Rainy River Railway.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should not touch upon that.

Mr. MACLEAN. I am speaking directly to the question of the extension of time and explaining why it should not be granted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The 10 per cent clause does not apply to this charter.

Mr. MACLEAN. It does. It applies to all the rest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I say: Do not give them this concession until they waive their right to that 10 per cent clause over the entire system. It may not apply to this particular charter, but it does obtain all over the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This is not the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Does the hon. gentleman know where the 10 per cent clause is to be found?

Mr. MACLEAN. I understand perfectly what I am talking about. I say that the grievance of the North-west to-day is this 10 per cent clause which obtains over the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Do not give the Canadian Pacific this additional concession unless they withdraw the 10 per cent clause which now obtains over the Canadian Pacific Railway. I was going on to say that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in connection with Mr. Greenway of Manitoba, we are told, has made some arrangement in regard to the Rainy River Railway. The province of Ontario has given immense sums to that railway. This Parliament of Canada, I am told, will, in a few days, be asked to give large sums to that railway. The province of Manitoba is prepared to vote large subsidies to that railway. And the justification of these subsidies is that concessions will be demanded in the interest of the people of Canada generally, that freight rates will be regulated, that running rights will be accorded to other companies over this railway, and everything done that it is possible to do to protect the rights of the people. If this is to be done, with Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, who claim to be rivals of the Canadian Pacific Railway, why should not the same be done in connection with this road, which is not Mann & Mackenzie's, but, I am told, belongs or will be going out and out to the Canadian Pacific Railway? I think these are all reasons why this extension should not be given to-night. These are reasons why the North-west members should insist that every concession that was given to the North-west and British Columbia in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass, and which we are told are to be given in connection with the Rainy River road, should be given in connection with this Bill. For seven or eight years I have been a member of this House, and during that time I have studied the transportation problem and tried, in my humble way, to get some sort of practical reform. I have agitated in the newspaper and in this House and in the country. I have come to this conclusion—that there is only one way to secure railway reform in this country, and that is not by large and sweeping and general measures, but by taking each Bill as it comes up, by following each franchise as it is given, and demanding in return for it some kind of concessions to the people. The hon. gentleman who last spoke says he is in favour of the nationalization of the railways. I also am in favour of that; but it cannot be secured by any sweeping measure, but must come by degrees. The Government should maintain the railway system they have and expand it gradually, get running rights here and there, and in that way, be a competing road to the two great monopolies in this country. You will never get out nationalization of the railways with any one measure—it is too big a problem for that. But if you go to work seriously and take up each franchise as it comes before us and insist on some kind of protection to the people, you will gradually get it. Why, in another place, a railway measure was under consideration, and it was suggested that the concessions should be given provided the railway would give something in return, say a two-cent passenger rate. To get cheaper fares for the people we should take each railway Bill as it comes up and tell the promoters: You can have your franchise if you will give a two-cent passenger rate. If one road gave that rate, as in the State of New York, every other road in the country would be compelled to follow the example. But if you say you must not interfere with vested rights, that you must not treat one company in this way because some other company was treated differently in the past, you will never get it. If the members from the North-west—and I appeal to them especially—desire to see railway reform in this country, they must band together and take these Bills one after the other and see to it that they provide substantial protection for the people they represent. It will not do for them to say, as the hon. member who has just taken his seat said, that they will be satisfied if the Canadian Pacific Railway will build 15 miles of this road this summer. That is no concession to the people of the North-west. They should insist on the same concessions as were given to the people in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. I trust that the hon. members from the North-west, before this Bill is allowed to go through, will press upon the Minister of the Interior to do for the North-west what he did for British Columbia in connection with the Crow's Nest Pass road. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish further to take up the time of the House. But there is another amendment, and it may be necessary to speak on this Bill again in order to bring out further the views I hold in regard to this whole railway problem. I do say that this is the opportunity of the Government and of the Liberal party which condemned that Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly as no other monopoly ever was condemned in this country, to compel the company as they are well able to do, to do something for the people of the North-west. And especially is it the duty of the Minister of the Interior, who sits here as the representative of these prairie provinces, to insist on having the same rights for his provinces as were given to British Columbia two years ago.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I desire to say only a word or two, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) assumes the right to lecture the members of the North-west on what constitutes their interest. I am inclined to think he would do better to acquire at least an elementary knowledge of the subject before he discusses it. The 10 per cent clause of the Canadian Pacific Railway has no existence as applied to this charter.

Mr. MACLEAN. I did not say it had.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If the hon. gentleman will listen, he will know more about this subject than he does now. The 10 per cent clause is a clause in the original Canadian Pacific Railway charter. It was put there, as the hon. gentleman can easily find out, and as old members of the House will remember, to override the 15 per cent clause in the General Railway Act of Canada. There is a 15 per cent—not 10 per cent—clause which applies to all these charters; and it is in the General Railway Act, so that it does not constitute a corporate right on the part of any particular railway company, but may be amended from time to time by this Parliament without respect to any concession to any company. So if my hon. friend desires that Parliament should retain power to do away, not with the 10 per cent, but with the 15 per cent clause, his desire is already gratified. I think I know something of the desires and wishes of the people of the North-west in connection with this charter, and I say that the wish of the people is that the road should be built. My hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) has moved a resolution requiring that as a condition of this Bill, 15 miles of the road shall be built this year. That is what the people who are interested desire, and I shall have much pleasure in voting for my hon. friend's amendment.

Mr. LEIGHTON McCARTHY (North Simcoe). I agree with what my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) has said in regard to monopolies in general. But in regard to this railway, I happen to have particular knowledge. It has been subjected to, perhaps, the largest suits in the courts of law that we have had in this country during the last five or six years. The company was in such an impoverished state by reason of this litigation that the enterprise could only be carried on in some such way as this. It was open to anybody to purchase the charter, but the only people who would buy it were the Canadian Pacific Railway. The litigation prevented its being built and this extension of time is only fair and reasonable. I agree generally with what the hon. gentleman says concerning monopolies, but in this case, where the request is fair as between man and man, I believe that the extension should be granted.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). I wish to take the opportunity for one minute to point out to the House that we ask for a vote here to-night for the purpose of keeping faith with the settlers of the North-west along the line of this 20 miles of road. Last session, owing to the stand taken by the hon. members from the North-west, an arrangement was made, an agreement was entered into and a charter given whereby 20 miles of railroad were to be built before the 1st of August this year. The settlers along that piece of road had the right to believe that this Parliament would see to it that this portion of the road would be built by the date named. These settlers have made their calculations accordingly. We have reason to believe that men have gone into that country on the strength of that understanding. When the Canadian Pacific Railway bought out the rights of the North-west Central, they bought them subject to that understanding, and we ask you now to say that that understanding shall be carried out, and that there shall not be a breach of faith on the part of this Parliament towards the settlers in any part of this country, even though they are so far away as the North-west. There are vested interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other railway, I mean the vested interests of the people in that particular part of the North-west through which this railway runs. I say that the men who have invested their time, their labour, and their money, and who have spent their lives in the development of that country, are entitled to the consideration of this House, above and beyond even the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is for their interests we ask protection.

STRIKE OF THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY TRACKMEN.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have a letter of some importance in my hand which I want to read and place it in the hands of the Premier. The letter is from the treasurer of the township of Leeds :

Lansdowne, June 9th, 1899.

George Taylor, Esq., M.P., Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I thought I would drop you a line this a.m., and to tell you how matters are going in Lansdowne with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway strike. The first of the week the company sent a car here with a number of men to go to work. Among them is a half-negro, who, I hear, has been telling around of his fighting qualities with fist or revolver, saying that he could make short work of anybody. The gang went to work during the day (Wednesday). The same night, between 11 and 12 o'clock, as I and my family were going to bed, we heard a shot fired from the car. I looked out from my bed-room window to see if I could see or hear any party. Immediately there was another shot fired, and I heard the bullet strike near me, followed in a short time by more shots from the same direction. I think altogether there were five or six shots fired. After a while we all retired. Next morning there was a good deal of talk about the shooting, and of the character of the men sent here. In the evening (last evening), about half-past seven, I went upstairs in my store, and found a bullet hole through one of the east windows, which passed along striking the wall, tearing the mortar and lodging in the floor. My bed-room window is about 10 feet further east from the line of the shot, appearing as if the parties shooting were trying to shoot where they saw the light. On finding matters as stated, I asked some parties up to show them what had taken place the evening before. I then went to our magistrate and had him come and see it. We then went over to the car where the men were stopping, bringing back with us their foreman, and showed him what had been done, and also some bullet holes in my neighbour's drive-house. The result is that five or six of them were arrested and locked up. The case will be heard this afternoon before Justice Mulvaugh. I may also mention that we were waked up by two more shots fired about six. Now, we, as private citizens, believe that it is high time, when our lives are in danger, for the Government to take hold of this matter of the strike and have it settled at once. I thought it was well enough to let you know how matters are here.

Yours respectfully,
(Sgd.) G. F. DEANE.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Salaries of Officers, Inspectors of Excise,
&c. $315,395

Mr. CLANCY. I would ask the Minister of Inland Revenue to explain more fully this increase of $10,000 in the item for salaries of officers and inspectors of excise.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not know if my hon. friend was here before six o'clock when I attempted to explain that increase. It is not $10,000 but $7,000. When the amount was given to the printer, there was a mistake made. I explained before dinner the wonderful amount of increased business we have over last year. We have now 637 different licensees, distillers, maltsters, breweries, cigar and cigarette manufacturers, bonded warehouses, vinegar factories, &c. Only last year the number of the licensees was increased by 96. As I explained before dinner, our work has not only to do with gauging, measuring and testing the products of all these factories, but we have actually to take a share in the manufacturing of them. We have to watch them from the beginning. In the distilleries, we have to see the grain coming in, to see it weighed, locked up, taken out, placed in the mash, test the force of the mash and follow the different processes of distillation and to test the different degrees. In all the distilleries, breweries, cigarette, tobacco and vinegar factories, we must keep a continuous supervision of every act, from the beginning of the manufacturing of these products until the processes are perfected. Not only that but we must watch the product, while it is kept in our stores, and until the duty is paid on it. An increase of 96 of these factories in one year out of a total of 637, is an increase of nearly one-seventh of the whole, so that one can readily understand that would necessitate an increase in the staff of our offices. Furthermore, in Quebec, where there were no distilleries, before this year, they have already established one, and they are establishing another one near Quebec. Each one of these distilleries requires, at least, two officers. It appears as if this were an increase over last year, and so it is an increase, but I have a list of the salaries paid in the excise branch of the department for the past ten years. By following it up one will be able to observe the gradual increase, and to show how little it has been increased this year. When you take the year 1896-97, you will see that we asked for $311,000. This year we are only asking for $312,000, or $1,000 more. It is true that last year we only asked for $305,000. We have been trying, as much as possible, to reduce the expenditure, but, after all, there is no such elasticity in our funds as there is in the spread and multiplying of the factories. We have, therefore, been obliged to admit that we have reduced too much our estimate from the year 1896-97, which was the first year I had the honour to be in charge of this department. Ever since I have been trying to reduce the estimates from $311,000; I reduced them to $307,000 and to $305,000. We are finding an increase in the work, especially in the North-west and in the Kootenay district in British Columbia. Every month we have been called upon to appoint new officers in the Kootenay district. It is developing with such rapidity that the officers we have there are not sufficient, and we have to increase their number.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Preventive service $15,900

Mr. FOSTER. Here is an increase to be explained.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That is an increase of $3,000. I have a list here of the amounts voted for preventive service, and one will see that I have been too greedy in trying to make economies in the expenditure. We have come to the point where we must admit that we are, to a certain degree, incapable to carry on satisfactorily the preventive service, since the increase in the duty on spirits and tobacco, it is well known to every one that smuggling has very much increased, and that it requires the interference of a larger preventive force than before. I might read the amounts voted for the past ten years and compare them with this $15,000 that we are asking. In 1889-90, the amount was $15,000; in 1890-91, it was $15,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Are you giving the sums voted or the expenditure?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The sums voted; sometimes we do not expend them at all.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be better if we knew the sums expended each year.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I am very sorry, but I think, in the supplementary estimates for this year, we will have to acknowledge that we have overdrawn the account. This year we are obliged to ask $1,000 more in the supplementary estimates. When we are called upon to put down smuggling and illicit distilleries, I think I can safely appeal to the committee to help to obtain the amount sufficient, at least as much as was required for so many years when there was not the same damage done by smuggling.

Mr. CLANCOY. How many new officers have been appointed and where, under this additional expenditure of $3,000?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. They are not appointed yet. This is for next year. We have to pay not only the salaries of the officers, but their travelling expenses too, and, naturally, the more means we have at our disposal, when they can be employed usefully, the more work we can do.

Mr. FOSTER. How can my hon. friend explain that last year he only expended $13,000?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I did not spend as much as I would like to have expended.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid that with my hon. friend's disposition to spend money it is dangerous to put too much money in his hands. He has enunciated a very dangerous and pleasant principle for a spending department. Thirteen thousand dollars was the limit spent last year, and how does the Minister propose to spend $2,000 more this year?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not think we deserve the title of the spending department, because I think the Minister of Customs and I deserve a better title. We are both contributing very largely to the revenue, and we ought to be encouraged in every way. On account of the increase in customs duties on liquor and tobacco, our expenditure needs to be increased to protect the revenue. I am constantly receiving information that there is illicit distilling in such and such a place, and we are hampered for want of money.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose, besides being hampered in protecting the revenue, the Minister finds that he is hampered by certain demands made upon him in the interest of the revenue of private individuals.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not know, but I suppose that was the experience of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster).

To pay collectors of customs allowance and duties collected by them for 1898-99	$5,500
---	---------

Mr. FOSTER. Has the Minister had a conference lately with the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) on the iniquity of paying civil servants from more than one source. I am sure he is contravening the doctrine that is held so strictly by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), who is not present.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My conscience prevents me from having too many conferences with my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) who is now absent, but I am sure that it will be admitted that this item is amply justified, for, by utilizing the services of the customs officers, instead of appointing special officers, we save a great deal of money.

Commission to sellers of stamps for Canadian twists tobacco	$100
---	-------

Mr. WALLACE. I have a letter from a tobacco dealer in Ottawa, who makes the complaint that the Minister has remitted fines that have been imposed by the courts, and he also complains that the Minister permits a $2 license to be given to some men in Ottawa, while this gentleman is charged $50 for a similar license. The $2 license is given to a farmer, who presumably makes his own tobacco, and the $50 license is charged to the man who manufactures the Canadian tobacco into twist. I think that complaint should be investigated by the Minister.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. If my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) had been kind enough to send me that letter, he may be certain that I should have looked into the matter at once.

Mr. WALLACE. I shall send the letter.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The only way that I can remit a fine imposed by the court is by Order in Council. Farmers have been fined $50 for exposing a few pounds of twist tobacco on the market, and in many cases I thought the ends of justice would be served by diminishing the amount of penalty, and I have asked for an Order in Council. In other cases, farmers come into market without having the twist tobacco stamped, and I personally feel that the ends of justice would be served by not insisting on a too heavy penalty, and I have power to use my judgment under the Act. There are a great many cases in which I feel a great deal of satisfaction in being allowed to go into the merits of the case, instead of applying the letter of the law. Especially is that the case in instances where a man takes a few plugs of tobacco and exposes them on his shelves. In that case we give a strong warning, and sometimes impose a little fine, and perhaps confiscate the tobacco. There are many cases in which one must look at the intention rather than at the letter of the law, at all events in the case of those who offend against the law in ignorance. In such cases I feel that I have a right to exercise my judgment, and, where the law allows it, to deal with them as leniently as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. This commission on stamps seems to be a practice not very widely extended. Is it an old custom? It is a small amount of money, and seems to be confined almost to one locality.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We only send the stamps to postmasters, and only in the province of Quebec. The farmers who grow tobacco, and who want to dispose of it on the market, make it into twists, and, in order to prevent frauds, we require them to put the stamp inside the twist at the time they make it. If they were allowed to put the stamp on the outside of the twist, it could be removed and used again; but they are obliged to weave the stamp with the twist, so that when the twist is opened the stamp is torn. It is a very simple way to prevent the stamp being used twice.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not an answer to my question. I want to know why this commission on stamps is confined to so small an area? I find that this is confined to about three localities. Surely twist is made in more than three localities in Canada.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. All I can say is that these stamps are supplied to postmasters in Joliette and Montcalm—in two or three counties where the farmers grow tobacco and put it into twists. Farmers can procure the stamps when they go to town, from our regular officers; but in a few cases they are supplied to postmasters for the convenience of the farmers.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not yet got what I ask for. The question I ask is how do you account for these sales being confined to so small an area? The stamps are really all sold in two places, St. Eustache and St. Alexis. Do they not make twist in other places than these in Canada?

Sir HENRI JOLY DE LOTBINIERE.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I am explaining that these stamps are supplied to postmasters for the convenience of the people.

Mr. HEYD. I understood the Minister to state that fines were collected from merchants for exposing tobacco for sale outside of the boxes. What good object is served by that?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I said I did not wish to take up the time of the House in explaining why that regulation had been imposed. I must say that at first sight it appears rather tyrannical. When I took charge of the department, there were many things in the regulations that struck me as being tyrannical as well as useless; but I have since learned to appreciate the necessity of these regulations. It is so difficult to discover frauds that one must not neglect any means in order to discover them. For instance, when a man buys a box of tobacco at the factory, say 50 pounds of plug, he brings it to his store; and on that box he will see printed that he is not allowed to sell the tobacco outside of that box. There is the same regulation on cigar boxes in regard to the sale of cigars. They must be sold from the box in which they were placed by the manufacturer. It appears at first sight to be an absurd regulation, but you must remember that these boxes bear the stamp of the department. As each cigar and each plug of tobacco cannot be stamped separately, the box is stamped. If the people would always sell directly from the box, it would very much facilitate the work of our officers. A revenue officer goes into a store, and begins to handle some of the plugs in a box. He is sufficiently acquainted with the mode of manufacture to know that the box comes from Tuckett or from McDonald, and if he finds in the box a plug which has not been manufactured by Tuckett or McDonald, he will say: You have no right to have that plug there; it has been smuggled or manufactured illicitly; it has not been manufactured by the man who sold you that box." One can readily understand that what appears at first sight to be an unusual or even a harsh or tyrannical precaution, will help in a considerable degree in the discovery of frauds. What would prevent the sale of plugs which had been smuggled or illicitly manufactured if the sellers were allowed to lay them on the shelves of their shops? But the moment they are obliged to put them in certain boxes bearing the name of the maker, the revenue officer, if he is well acquainted with his business, will at once find out if anything is placed in that box which has no right to be there.

Mr. WALLACE. Is there any case of tobacco manufactured in Canada being illegally sold?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, we have not found any boxes of tobacco illegally manufactured in Canada, but have found cigars.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Minister said that there was plug tobacco illegally manufactured in Canada.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I was under the impression that there was, but Mr. Gerald, who is thoroughly acquainted with the business, informs me that so far we have not discovered any illegal manufactured plugs, but we have cigars. We have got a case in Ontario in which we obtained judgment against a man who manufactured cigars without taking a license, and put them in old boxes which had been stamped.

Mr. HEYD. I wish to draw attention to a considerable hardship with reference to this tobacco business. If the object is to protect the revenue by insisting that the tobacco must be sold from the boxes that originally contained it, the law does not accomplish its object. Under the law the grocers are obliged to sell direct from the box. Although a box may contain fifty pounds of tobacco, he must continue selling from that box, even when only three or four pounds are left in it. That is very inconvenient and embarrassing and does not prevent fraud, because there is nothing to prevent a grocer breaking open a box without touching the stamp and putting the tobacco into a box of the same kind standing on the shelves. That subjects the trade to great inconvenience and does not protect the revenue.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. HEYD. You are not in the business, as I am.

Mr. H. F. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). What is to prevent a dealer from taking a box that was never stamped, breaking the cover, taking the plug of tobacco out, and placing that tobacco into a box stamped, which had been opened, and out of which the contents have been sold?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Where would you get the tobacco from?

Mr. McDOUGALL. There are tons of tobacco smuggled into the country that never pay any duty.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Suppose a man buys a box of tobacco from Mr. McDonald, of Montreal, the name of McDonald is upon it and the Government stamp. On opening the box the stamp is destroyed. If when that man has sold all the tobacco out of the box, he fills it again with smuggled tobacco, any one of our officers who happens to come in and examines the contents will know at once that it is not McDonald's tobacco which is in the box. If the officer does not know that, he does not understand his business. This is why the traders are compelled to sell the tobacco from the box, and I do not see any hardship in that. The box is opened, and his customers can see the tobacco and buy as many plugs as they like. But if smuggled tobacco is put into the box, any officer who examines it will soon detect the fraud.

Mr. McDOUGALL. What is there to prevent anybody buying boxes of tobacco from Mr. McDonald, of Montreal, and sending them out of the country, say, to St. Pierre Miquelon, and then smuggling them back, and putting the tobacco into empty boxes of the same kind that had been previously opened, and from which the duty paid tobacco had been sold? If I understand aright, it is through the excise authorities that the stamp is put on tobacco manufactured in this country.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. McDOUGALL. That stamp has to be marked under customs authority as well as excise when duty is paid on it. If the tobacco was sent out of the country and brought back again, it would have to undergo examination by the customs authority. The tobacco sent out of the country is not liable to the inland revenue duties no more than customs. For instance, you can go to St. Pierre and Miquelon and buy there at 25 cents a pound tobacco that would cost you 50 cents a pound here; and if you can smuggle it in, you can sell it at half the price at which you can sell it if bought under the laws of the country. What I contend is that there is nothing to prevent a man taking the contents of a box of tobacco he has smuggled from St. Pierre and putting it in the box from which he had sold tobacco by the pound on which he had paid duty in the regular way. I am quite sure that has been done in a great many cases, in hundreds of cases. If it were not for the opportunity thus offered, there would not be so much smuggling going on. These people who are importing smuggled tobacco and selling it under the noses of a preventive officer and the excise officers, could not dispose of the tobacco without being detected, unless they had some such means as this of carrying on their operations. Now, another question—there are many cases in which small traders buy less than fifty pounds. Take a case like the Joliette factory, the smallest package of black plug tobacco that these people make is twenty-five pounds. The little traders who come from the towns and villages cannot afford to buy twenty-five pounds, so they buy smaller quantities, carry their purchases to their little stores and retail their tobacco by the plug. These people are breaking the law. It is impossible for the small traders to carry on the business of selling tobacco under the present arrangement. I do not mean to make this a complaint against the present Government, because the management of the department in this respect is not different from what it was in the past. As a man engaged in business in the country, I have had experience in finding people selling tobacco by the plug and by the pound over the counter at less than I was obliged to pay for it by the half ton and quarter ton. How could these people do that unless they were smuggling their tobacco, or getting it in other fraudulent ways? It is not forty miles from my door where tons and tons of tobacco have been smuggled and disposed of in this way. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue ought to know it, the hon. Minister of Customs ought to know it. The Minister of Customs had many cases before the courts in my constituency in the last two years, as well as in other parts of Canada, and his officers ought to be able to inform him how to detect these frauds.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. What does my hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) suggest?

Mr. MCDUGALL. I do not mean to suggest anything. It is not for me to suggest anything; it is for me to show the hon. Minister and this House that the law is ineffective.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Everybody knows that, but we are doing our best to prevent these illegal acts.

Mr. MCDUGALL. It seems to me it ought to be the duty of the Minister, when I make a statement of this kind, to try to invent some way in which the law can be carried out with more effect. It seems to me that some better system could be adopted. I would not like to make suggestions on the spur of the moment; it is not my business to do so. I point out to him the consequences of the present law. Not only is the law not carrying out its object, but it is an injury to honest business people.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is not showing that there is anything wrong in the law; he is simply saying that in spite of the law smuggling goes on. Of course, we must acknowledge that. The regulations are all right as far as they go, but, apparently, the hon. gentleman wants them more stringent—

Mr. MCDUGALL. But they are worthless.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They are the same as have been in existence for many years.

Mr. MCDUGALL. I do not deny that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I suppose we should learn to improve as the years go, but how can we do better than by employing vigilant officers to detect and prevent these frauds? If the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall)—of course I do not suggest that he should do it now—could give the Minister of Inland Revenue the names of some of these people who are selling smuggled tobacco, I will guarantee that within forty-eight hours there will be preventive officers after them. Of course you cannot make a law that will entirely prevent smuggling; the only thing you can do is to keep it in check. You cannot have a perfect guard upon our seacoast, particularly in view of the difficulty we always have with regard to St. Pierre. They may take the tobacco out of Canada in bond, then smuggle it back into Canada and put it into these boxes which contained tobacco on which duty was paid. The only thing you can do is to watch incoming vessels as closely as possible, and then, if you find a man selling tobacco at less than it can be bought for in the regular way, there is a strong presumption that somebody has been guilty of smuggling. I think the hon. Ministers of Customs and Inland Revenue have been particularly vigilant. I can safely say that in the maritime provinces the general opinion is that the customs and excise laws are more thoroughly enforced than they ever were before.

Mr. MCDUGALL. With regard to giving names I have not them now, and if I had I would not retail them before this House. I refer the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue to the hon. Minister of Customs, who had his officers engaged in carrying on many prosecutions in my county, prosecutions which went to prove that a large quantity of tobacco had been smuggled and that smuggling had been going on for some time. I think if the hon. Minister of Customs will consult the papers in his department, they will fully corroborate the statements I have made with regard to the facilities that are afforded to carry out this system of fraud in connection with the importation and sale of tobacco.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). I think the Minister of Finance is the chief sinner in this regard. Two years ago he put a duty on tobacco—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There may be something in that.

Mr. WALLACE—that had the effect of encouraging those who carry on this midnight work to carry on with increased vigilance by affording them larger profits. But the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue tells us that they have these regulations about boxes, which regulations, I agree with the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd) are most harassing for dealers, and which, I venture to say, very few dealers rigidly observe. These regulations do not answer any useful purpose. If it were necessary for the protection of the revenue, if these rules did their work effectively, I would say that every one is bound to put himself to a little inconvenience to protect the revenue, and see that the business is carried on properly. But the regulations do not succeed in that. Take, for instance, Macdonald's tobacco—one of his expert officers or one acquainted with the goods, can tell at a glance whether it is Macdonald's tobacco that is in the box or some other. But take another case. The gentleman to whom he refers as T. and B., whoever he is—and the Minister of Inland Revenue seems to be quite familiar with him—makes a very fine brand of tobacco, which is sold all over Canada. Mr. T. and B. has a similar factory in the state of Ohio.

Mr. TAYLOR. Taylor Brothers.

Mr. WALLACE. Taylor is the boss, I guess. They have a factory in the United States, and Mr. T. & B. tells me they make precisely that same plug in the United States from the same leaf, of the same weight, the same shape, the price stamped on it, and everything. Now, the excise duty on the Canadian tobacco equals 39 cents a pound, 25 cents excise, and 14 cents additional that the Government have put on. The excise duty in the United States is 6 cents a pound.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The war tax is higher than that, is it not?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think it is higher than 6 cents; I think the excise tax is just 6 cents a pound. That is an advantage of 33 cents a pound. They can pay the American excise duty, and bring it up to the Canadian border, and have it exposed for sale, and still sell it for 33 cents a pound less on the American side than it is sold on the Canadian side. There is a strong inducement, therefore, to take a 20-pound caddy across the border line, and make $6.60 out of it. Then, they take that tobacco out of a caddy that is exactly the same size, and has the same weight of plugs, the same number of plugs in it, and they put it into a Canadian caddy, and sell it here. Now, the Minister of Inland Revenue sends his expert along. His expert is not clever enough to tell whether that is made in the United States or Canada, nor can that be told. Mr. Tucker tells me that they make precisely the same article in the two countries. Therefore, if they choose to bring it in and put the smuggled tobacco into that same caddy, they are getting a certificate, in effect, from the Minister of Inland Revenue that that smuggled tobacco is all right, and he has certified to a wrong, because he and his agents are not able to detect the difference.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Would there not be the same difference. If there were no regulations about quantities?

Mr. WALLACE. He is telling us that he makes this regulation.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It does not prevent it in that particular case, but in many cases it does.

Mr. WALLACE. In that case they practically get a certificate that it is all right. If there were no such regulations, they would have to prove their case.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Would not that be very much worse?

Mr. WALLACE. It could not be worse. In the one case it comes in free; it is smuggled and put into that box, and then it is secured by the certificate of the Minister of Inland Revenue that it is all right. In the other case there are no such regulations; they would have to prove their case; there would be no certificate from the Minister that it was all right. They destroy the American box and put it into the Canadian caddy. I am certain that that is done. The member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) tells us, what I am sure is a great grievance in his part of the country, that tobaccos are sent across here. It is a round-about process—a good deal of risk in it. But tobaccos come across the boundary line of the eastern townships; they come across the boundary line all along, and there is no way of preventing those tobaccos from coming in and being consumed in Canada, especially that "T. & B." The Minister cannot by any machinery of boxes and caddies that he has detailed to us, provide one particle of protection to the revenue in that regard, but, on the contrary, he is rather giving a certificate, when the man gets the tobacco across and gets it safely taken out of the American caddy and put into the Canadian caddy, that everything is all right, because there is the plug tobacco made by T. & B.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It would be exactly the same, if there was no box.

Mr. WALLACE. If there was no box, there would be no certificate from the Inland Revenue Department that everything was all right; everything would be open to suspicion, and would require proof. But the moment the Minister permits without detection that caddy of tobacco to be taken across and taken out of the American caddy and put into the Canadian one, then he has thrown the mantle of his protection over that caddy, and says it is all right, our officers must not touch it, because there is the "T. & B." box, and there is the "T. & B." tobacco. The Minister of Finance says no law can prevent smuggling.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not absolutely.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, that is a question. A law, well administered, can either prevent it or reduce it to a minimum. You cannot, perhaps, prevent crime by making a law against the crime, but you can punish individuals and preserve good order in the community. But, if the smuggling has increased, as I learn from the Minister of Finance that
